Documents on the Movement for Independence in India, 1947 Part 1

Going beyond the legalistic notion of independence as a 'transfer of power', the Towards Freedom series documents within the overarching framework of the 'movement for independence' the largely unaddressed discourses on the struggles for social justice, economic empowerment, and cultural autonomy. Through meticulously selected historical material from the period 1937-47, relating to the activities, attitudes, and ideas of diverse sections of Indian society, it brings to the fore the varied contributions to the attainment of independence.

This volume, published in three parts, systematically covers the major socio-political developments during 1947, the year that saw the end of colonial rule and the emergence of two nation states. The first part pertains to the main political developments that took place in the three-way conflict between imperialist, nationalist, and communal forces. This story continues in the second part, which takes up the question of the princely states, the settlement of boundaries, and the rehabilitation of refugees, while the third traverses the issues of caste, religious minorities, language and literature, educational policy, the position of women, the future of the Congress organization, the functioning of provincial ministries, the economic consequences of partition, and the peasant and working class movements.

The documents in this part present multiple points of view, represented by a range of sources, from newspapers, private papers, institutional collections, speeches, and writings of principal players to colonial archives. The striking level of popular involvement in important issues is reflected in the delightful letters to the editors, maps of proposed boundary lines, cartoons with acerbic wit, and quaint advertisements, such as the one for a balm, titled 'Freedom from Pain', evidently inspired by the impending freedom of the country!

General Editor’s Preface

It gives me great pleasure to place in the hands of readers the tenth and last volume of the Towards Freedom series of the Indian Council of Historical Research (ICHR). The project taken up by the Council many years ago is at last approaching completion. Since the volumes in the series have been published at intervals of months and sometimes years, a part of the General Editor’s duty has been to state at the beginning of each volume the objective and the general guiding principles of this endeavour. I shall address that task first and then share with the readers a few thoughts which crossed my mind as I read the present volume.

The agenda of an endeavour such as this series defines itself in part through editorial practice and partly through attempts towards a statement of objectives. The historical context in which this project developed initially is generally known. While we must not overestimate the influence of that historical conjuncture on the academic inputs which went into the making of the project’s agenda, one has to take that into account as one of the formative factors. After the vertiginous years leading to 1947, there came a time when historians turned their attention to those years and archives began to acquire and provide access to source materials. The last years of ‘British India’ began to be addressed by professional historians and indeed the theme attracted national attention both in India and in Britain. In June 1967, the British Prime Minister Harold Wilson made an important statement in this regard in the House of Commons: ‘In view of the great interest now being shown in historical circles in the last days of British rule in India ... [there would be published] documents from the India Office records on the Transfer of Power and the events leading up to it.’ The announcement included the assurance that ‘the editors will be independent historians who will be given unrestrained access to the records, and freedom to select and edit the documents for publication’. The outcome of the project thus framed at the highest level in England was the series known as The Transfer of Power, edited by Nicholas Mansergh, Smuts Professor of the History of the British Commonwealth at Cambridge. In addition to the announcement made in Parliament, Mansergh, as the ‘Editor-in-Chief’, stated that the ‘purpose of the series’ was ‘to make available to scholars in convenient printed form the more important British historical records relating to the transfer of power in India’.

Arguably, there is an obvious inadequacy in the notion that all that happened in 1947 was a ‘transfer of power’. In Indian perception the attainment of independence was a significant moment in the history of the struggle against British rule in the subcontinent. The representation of the emergence of independent India and Pakistan as transfer of power, solely an alteration of constitutional relations, tended towards the occlusion of that history. The focus on the legalistic notion of power transfer, and the discourse of modalities of transfer, marginalized the more significant part of the historical processes at work. Likewise, the self-imposed limitations of the British documentation enterprise left many issues unaddressed: the project was to select documents from British state papers relating to the constitutional arrangements from the Cripps Mission of 1942 to 15 August 1947. In that discourse, in the official archives and the Viceroy’s papers, the Indian voice was recorded only in terms of a few important spokesmen of political parties who were present during negotiations with the British Indian government. The Indian institutions, personalities, and events were included in the documentation only to the extent that the official papers took cognizance of them.

That is not to say that the task of documentation in the twelve volumes produced between 1970 and 1983 by the HMSO (Her Majesty’s Stationery Office) was not competently handled by Professor Mansergh and his editorial assistants. These volumes were products of the best of British scholarship. But the initial conception of the project was delimited to certain issues and historical sources. I recall that in 1971 when I invited Sir Penderel Moon, a brilliant officer of the Indian Civil Service and later a member of Mansergh’s editorial team, to a seminar at St Antony’s College, Oxford, a number of us questioned him about this and he pointed out that perhaps we had not paid attention to the subtitle of the Mansergh volumes, ‘Constitutional Relations between Britain and India’. Clearly the agenda for any Indian endeavour towards the documentation of the years leading to independence in 1947 would be different. How it would be different was suggested by Professor Sarvepalli Gopal in a luminous editorial preface to the first volume produced under the present project. He said that the projected volumes aimed to ‘present, within limits set by the sources, documents relating to the activities, attitudes and ideas of the diverse classes and sections of Indian society, all of which contributed to the attainment of Indian independence with partition’.

It is significant that the title chosen for this series was ‘Towards Freedom’. While the subtitle emphasizes the focus upon the ‘movement for independence’, the title evokes discourses in other domains as well—the struggle for social justice, for economic empowerment against exploitation, and for cultural autonomy. These were also prominent discourses within the overarching framework of the Indian people’s struggle for freedom. One is reminded of the words of Mahatma Gandhi in an essay he wrote in the Harijan a few days before his death, on 27 January 1948: ‘The Congress has won political freedom but it has yet to win economic freedom, social and moral freedom.’ This awareness of different categories of freedom allows space for a conception of the freedom struggle far wider in amplitude than the textbook approach to the struggle for independence from British rule. It makes a struggle for freedoms of many kinds thinkable. And it broadens the idea of a history of freedom struggle. This is how I understand the choice of the title for this series: Towards Freedom.

To sum it up, the present series of volumes focuses upon not just the legal processes of the transfer of power and the overtly political activities which brought that about, but also the struggle for freedom in different domains—economic, social, and cultural. The agenda of

Also see ‘His Last Will and Testament’, Harijan, 15 February 1948, where he spoke of economic, social, and moral dimensions of independence, beyond the political independence which had been attained, ibid., p. 526. This document was written c. 29 January 1948, shortly before Gandhi’s death, and it was also referred to in the AICC papers as ‘Draft Constitution of the Congress’.
the series, therefore, is open to the entry of themes relating to the struggle of the peasantry, the working classes, and different sections of people as well as to a broad spectrum of political organizations who in their own light worked towards attainment of freedom.

To anyone interested in the craft of history, a pertinent question will be how the documentation will reflect this agenda. The selection of appropriate documents is not an easy task. We are here looking at long-term historical processes such as the slowly evolving ideas about nationhood or class solidarity; the dynamics of popular participation in political movements; the links being forged between movements of the peasantry, the industrial labour, and the freedom struggle; the youth and student movements vis-à-vis the political parties; the changing social hierarchy in caste terms in relation to electoral and agitational politics; the gender relationships evolving from the traditional patriarchal structure towards developments that had liberating potentials; the anti-feudal and anti-British movement in the princely states; and the interface between all these trends in the ideational and cultural domains. The instantiation of these long-term processes through events as reflected in documents is the task at hand. The documents reflect fragments of the events which constitute links in the chain of certain historical processes of long duration.

It was decided years ago, at an early stage of this project, to distribute the work among editors on a purely chronological basis, that is, each of the volumes in the series would relate to a particular year assigned to an editor. This opened the project to the possibility that the long-term processes would be lost sight of in the depiction of the particularities of the year each editor was taking care of. I incurred unpopularity in the ICHR when I suggested many years ago that a thematic division of labour between the various editors, rather than a chronological one assigning one year to each, would have been a better organizing principle. I will not elaborate that point again. Whatever the drawbacks or merits of the chronological frame for assigning editorial responsibility might have been, it has been in operation for twenty years and hopefully it will enable us to complete the task before us. For the volume editors the limitation of chronological framework has probably been an irksome constraint. On the whole, the volume editors, each a distinguished historian, bore with fortitude the limits set on their temporal range, and they situate the particular historical conjuncture of a given year in the broader perspective of the long-term processes as they see them in the introduction to the volume. The Editor's Introduction is thus a bridge between the narrative of events and the narrative of the freedom struggle as he or she sees it. It also provides a space for the presentation of his or her approach to the themes and issues the volume addresses and the explication of that approach.

As regards the sources from which the documents are collected for the volumes in this series, Professor Sarvepalli Gopal, in his General Editor's Preface, remarked in 1997: 'Although some of the volumes contain documents drawn from regional language sources, a fully comprehensive selection from these sources merit a separate project.' This was an accurate prediction of the future output, that is, the volumes which are coming out now. In deciding on what non-English and regional language sources will be collected, the volume editors have exercised their judgement in deploying the research assistance they were provided. Judging by volumes produced till now and the manuscripts now being received from editors and being processed in the editorial office at the ICHR, the editors possibly felt that on most of the themes addressed there exists sufficient source material in English and in translation. A more systematic search for and selection of non-English sources would have made this collection more complete, but it was evidently not found to be feasible. We are committed to completing the project undertaken in 1988–89 as soon as possible, in keeping with the schedule that had been planned. This would help limit the editors’ scope for new source searches.

One more point needs to be made about the sources. Probably, in the last decade of the Raj, especially during the World War, perspicacious observers began to sense a debilitation of the imperial powers and the impending decolonization process on a global scale, and the consequent shift in the power relationships—this altered their perception of the politics of independence struggle radically. This was happening globally in old empires, among the people and leaders in the imperial metropolises as well as their colonial peripheries. On the latter process we do have some documentation in the present series, but not much on the shift in the imperial metropolis. This is because ab initio the project was meant to be mainly for the collection of sources in India. This was probably because it was clear from the beginning that we have our hands full if we look at the Indian archival sources alone. The mass and density of archival sources generated by the Government in India will be evident to even a layman who glances at the following pages. Moreover, as I mentioned earlier, unlike similar enterprises in England, Pakistan, and Sri Lanka to collect sources throwing light on the last days of the British Raj, this series includes a great many activities and events which are not overtly political or constitutional.

A few words on the editorial apparatus in these volumes may be in order. The chapters are thematically organized while the sequence of placement of documents in each chapter is strictly chronological. There are two guides for the reader, first the Calendar of Documents indicating the subject of each document and the source, and second, the Index at the end of the volume. An effort has been made to make the volumes as ‘reader-friendly’ as possible. In some collections of this nature the editorial practice has been to provide a synoptic account of the contents of each document. This has not been the pattern in this series chiefly because it would increase the size of the volumes. As it is, each volume in the series is quite bulky and the editors who tried to trim the size down are to be applauded.

I would like to put on record the annoying delays this project was subjected to on account of political interference to the detriment of academic autonomy. One result of such interference was that the ICHR authorities appointed no successor to the General Editor, Professor Sarvepalli Gopal, when he passed away in April 2002; in fact, all work on the project was suspended for about five years. I was asked in 2006 to take up the task initiated by Professor Gopal, my senior colleague at Jawaharlal Nehru University. Upon accepting this position, an honorary one, my first task was to assemble an editorial team at the ICHR and to request the editors of the different volumes to resume the work.

The disruption in the production of the volumes in the series for several years was tantamount to political censorship of academic work. It is interesting to note here that the British developed a system which prevented political parties’ interference in such matters. The British project for the documentation of the Transfer of Power was processed through a mechanism which ensured inter-party consensus in parliament.\(^7\) For this purpose a standing inter-party group of Privy Counsellors was appointed and it included a minister of the ruling party and representatives of the Conservative Party as well as the Liberal Party; thus, once the project was passed by that committee, the task was left to experts duly appointed and no political interference occurred. In the light of what happened in our country on account of governmental changes, one might say that there was much that was commendable in the mechanism devised in Britain.

It is hoped that the agenda outlined above makes it amply clear what have been and remain the principles of documentation in the Towards Freedom series. The editors of the volumes have had the freedom to exercise their choice within certain parameters and they focus upon the themes which emerge from the selected documents. An editor of a volume in this series stated what most other editors would endorse: this is not ‘an attempt to provide materials for an “official” or “definitive” statement on the history of the freedom movement’. I accepted the responsibility of being the General Editor of this series since I believe that although the Government of India has funded this enterprise, like many other research projects and institutions in this country, the output of the project is the work of autonomous minds of scholars guided by standards of the discipline of historiography. As I have said in the beginning, not only agenda statements like the one I have attempted now, but practice has defined principles as well, and that is how an academic community works.

In the days when India was hurtling forward to the tryst with destiny, in the first seven months of 1947, what were the trends in India’s polity and civil society? That question is addressed by the enormous mass of evidence very competently marshalled by the editor of the present volume. In the present part (Part I, comprising Section One covering events of 1 January 1947 to 22 March 1947, and Section Two covering 23 March 1947 to 2 June 1947) there is thorough documentation of events up to the momentous Transfer of Power plan of the HMG (His Majesty’s Government) of 3 June 1947. Compared to the previous volumes in this series, in this volume on 1947 the intensity of focus on events, both in the central arena of New Delhi as well as in various parts of the two emerging sovereign states, is much greater. We thought that a close-up picture and a concentrated study of this order was required because in those days the long-term trends in Indian polity and society reached a climactic point. Much that was below the surface in politics, and invisible even to the discerning eye, began to be seen as if the turbulence of those days brought them to the surface. It was a moment of revelation, not always of the uplifting kind. That is why this volume needs to be larger than other ones in this series though it covers a smaller span of time than any other volume.

I have said that in this small span of time we see in microcosm, so to speak, the long-term trends which go back far into history. What are these trends? First, the battle for the mind of the people of India between secessionism and the idea of an integrally united India. Second, there was a complex interplay between two processes: the process desired by the British ‘Home’ authorities and their Indian agents for a withdrawal with least damage to the interests they represented and imperial principles they upheld, and on the other hand the two major contestants in India, the Congress and the League, for the best possible outcome for themselves in the post-1947 scenario. That boils down to a trilateral dialogue. The third trend was the conflict between the politics of exclusion and its contestation through the endeavours to be inclusive—and this was a conflict which left its mark at every level, on the personal life of the victims of discrimination or violence, on politics at the level of communities, and ultimately on the founding principles of the newly emerging sovereign states. That conflict meant innumerable multilateral negotiations between majorities and minorities as they were perceived in terms of ethnicity, religion, language, caste status, and so on. All I need to do, given the very exhaustive documentation in the following pages, is to highlight what may be considered to be two frequently unasked questions: How was Independence imagined? And how was Partition negotiated towards general acceptance? If I fail to ask those questions I shall miss the wood for the tree. The documents in this collection covering the days from January 1 to June 2, 1947, throw a shaft of light on these questions.

‘We are actors today in a great historical drama,’ Sarvepalli Radhakrishnan said in one of the earliest meetings of Constituent Assembly. ‘We are involved in it and therefore we are unable to perceive the large contours of it.’ This was a perspicacious comment worthy of a philosopher. Few others could distance themselves from the immediate context and reflect upon the larger perspective. But that perspective was writ large in the initial move of the Constituent Assembly in January 1947, in the ‘objectives resolution’. The words concerning the constitution to be made were bold and evocative of the long struggle that preceded the formation of the Constituent Assembly: ‘[A]ll power and authority of the sovereign Independent India, its constituent parts and organs of government, are derived from the people ... justice, social, economic and political, equality of status, of opportunity, and before the law; freedom of thought, expression, belief, faith, worship, vocation, association and action, subject to law and public morality ... adequate safeguards ... for minorities, backward class.’ Nehru in his speech on the resolution reminded the Constituent Assembly of the past pledges looking towards Independence: ‘I felt the past crowding around me, and I also felt the future taking shape. We stood on the razor’s edge of the present ... I felt that we were coming to the end of an age, I had a sense of our forebears watching this undertaking of ours ...’

While Independence was bathed in the light of a historical vision of this kind, occasionally it was also a moment that was perceived in terms of the mechanics of what was called in bureaucratic language the transfer of power and the continuity of administration. That discourse naturally demands a lot of space in the documents which are reproduced here. Rajendra Prasad, on the post-Independence status of that issue in a memorandum to Nehru on 18 February 1947, says:

The problem of administrative machinery and its strength must be viewed in the perspective that, from June 1948 onwards India ... will be free from the foreign element in all the branches of its services ... Stories of weakening of the administration, depletion of cadres, interference, corruption and inefficiency are a common tale in a large number of provinces in India today ... The problem of administrative strength, administrative efficiency, and administrative tradition is on a par with the problem of constitution-making...

Prasad, President of the Constituent Assembly, added that apart from constitution-making what demanded attention was that, as many British civil servants had said for the past hundred years, ‘the purposes of the state are translated to the common man and woman in the factory or the field by the actions, the activities, the vigour and the character of the district administrator who is the symbol of government’s authority to them’.\(^{13}\)

Thus independence meant taking care of the nuts and bolts of the administrative machinery, not just the general constitutional principles, and Prasad believes that this aspect has not ‘received the consideration it deserves’. About this time the Viceroy writes to a British civil servant working in India that the Indian National Congress (INC) ‘have shown signs lately of realizing the value of your services’ (that is, of the Indian Civil Service [ICS]); the INC Working Committee, it was reported, approached some British ICS officers ‘to stay after the transfer of power’.\(^{11}\) Another interesting aspect of the impending situation was the British Indian authorities’ perception of the policies of the Indian government of India: for example, Viceroy Wavell writes to Pethick-Lawrence in January 1947: ‘There is no doubt that the Congress High Command are becoming sobered by responsibility.’\(^\text{17}\) Wavell cites the ‘recent action which has been taken against the communists’ and says: ‘Sooner or later the High Command [of the Congress] will have to face up to its own Left-Wing and other revolutionary influences, and each time it makes a tentative move to do so it is forced into a more realistic appreciation of what government of a great country really means.’\(^{15}\) Viceroy Wavell seems to have accepted the plausible view, expressed by Liaquat Ali Khan when the budget met with stiff Congress opposition, that Indian ‘Big Business’ was in close alliance with other Congress members, especially Vallabhbhai Patel.\(^{16}\) Around this time the British authorities in India happily note that ‘the Congress government in Bombay had decided that the only way to deal with the Communists was to resort [to] the detention without trial ... it is a strange volte face from their old attitude to such executive measures ... [and] “imperialistic” methods’.\(^\text{17}\) We see in some of the documents in this collection a new stage in the process that began in 1939—the transition from the politics of aspiration to the politics of governance. This was also part of the meaning of independence now being read by the actors we see on the stage of history. Jawaharlal Nehru writes somewhat impatiently to a minor Congress leader who raised questions about the principles of the Congress: ‘It is no good talking in terms of principles when decisions have to be made.’\(^{18}\)

There was another facet of the idea of independence as well. B.R. Ambedkar asked in memorable words: ‘What can swaraj mean to the untouchables?’ Will it mean that ‘under swaraj the Legislature and Executive will also be in the hands of the Hindus’, that is, the dominant upper castes? If so, ‘under swaraj the untouchables will have no way of escape from the destiny of degradation which Hindus and Hinduism have fixed for them’.\(^{19}\) Consider again the memorandum to the Minorities Sub-Committee from the All-India Adi-Hindu Depressed

Classes Association: they ‘look forward to the emancipation of the depressed classes in the Constitution of a self-governing India’. It was argued that the system of representation in the legislatures till 1947 did not ensure ‘any guarantee for the return [in elections] of the real representatives of the Scheduled Castes’ and proposals were made for post-1947 constitutional provisions towards that end.\(^{20}\) Thus the prospect of independence raised many expectations: political freedom, it was expected, would also bring in its wake freedom from caste oppression. Both the earlier pledges made by the Congress to the nation and the immediate circumstances (in particular the abstention of the Muslim League from participation in the Constituent Assembly) made the political leadership acutely conscious and diligent in the pursuit of protection of minorities. There were voices against this trend. ‘The minority problem should not and must not overshadow the main issue, that of Independence of India.’\(^{21}\) When a Constituent Assembly member spoke thus, he was not alone. Nor was he talking in terms of generalities, because he went on to speak of ‘under representation’ of the majority Hindu population. ‘It is very very unfortunate that the minority communities do not demand mere [sic] justice, equity and fair play’ but also extraordinary safeguards and weightage. Apart from a few such dissenting voices there were, of course, differences in approach within the scheduled caste leadership. Sometimes these differences remained unstated; sometimes they were brought into the open. For instance, H.J. Khandekar says on Ambedkar: ‘I hope, God grant him a little more good sense, he will give up the demand for separate electorates and also stop saying henceforth “I am not a Hindu” which he has been telling up till now.’\(^{22}\) There were also inevitably wrangling over numbers, to adequately represent the various categories of scheduled castes. As S. Nagappa said on that question, sometimes a community was ‘over-represented’ and some castes were so under-represented that the representatives were unable to ‘fight for their community interests’.\(^{23}\)

However, on the whole the tendency of that discourse was not narrowly to focus on adversarial positions within but to take an inclusive stance to broaden the ambit of the constitutional protection to cover a great many communities as ‘minorities’. Jagjivan Ram was farsighted in putting the scheduled castes’ demands in a larger agenda addressing the minorities. The safeguards for the minorities he proposed covered not just the scheduled castes but also ‘religious and racial minorities (for example, Christians and Aboriginals)’ as well as linguistic and cultural minorities. He was one of the earliest proponents of a Minorities Commission and suggested the institution of such bodies ‘in the Centre and in every Province’, that is, the Indian union as well as the states.\(^{24}\) Perhaps the most vocal of the minorities was the Sikh community. For instance, leaders of the community argued that the province of Punjab not only ‘was and must remain the homeland and the holy land of the Sikhs’, but also that Sikhs were entitled to ‘safeguards for the members of minorities’ in India and the future constitution must contain ‘safeguards for the protection of their religion, language, and culture as well as social and economic rights’.\(^{25}\) Or again Baldev Singh’s letter to Viceroy Mountbatten on 2 June 1947: if division of Punjab is unavoidable, Sikhs must be ‘given the same right in communal matters as has been accorded to the other two major communities’. Further, ‘we have so far not been assured equal rights with others in either the existing or the proposed new Constituent Assembly. We request you to see that this is done’. The Anglo-Indian community’s response to the question of protection as a minority community in post-independence India provides an example and an explanation of the rapid proliferation of minority grievances and resultant lobbying in political circles. Frank Anthony, representing that community in the Constituent Assembly, says: ‘I have always been reluctant, although a communal leader, to pursue communal hares and I am even more reluctant to enter into any communal dog fights ... But so long as you have a committee on minorities, so long as other minorities are insisting on their rights, alleged or real, then, certain minorities, particularly the smaller minorities have, in self-defence to ask for certain representation’ of their own rights. Immediately after that speech a scheduled caste leader from Madras expressed his disapproval of too much importance being given to the Anglo-Indians and Parsis who were by no stretch of imagination oppressed minorities. Thus there was a good deal of conflict between the claimants to minority status and protection under the future Constitution of post-independence India. At the other end stood some North-Western Frontier Province (NWFP) tribes, meeting at the Mohmand Jirga in April 1947, who opted out of that game of the minority communities: ‘We are independent and will remain so, we will never recognize anybody’s suzerainty over us. We, Mohmands, and also other independent tribes record our deep annoyance against the British and the Hindus ...’ The prospect of independence touched the minds at all levels from the Constituent Assembly to tribal Jirgas in the remotest margin of India. Independence meant different things to different people at this historical conjuncture. That is what one learns when one is looking for the answer to the question, ‘How was Independence imagined and understood?’

Independence came to the Indian people with a rider, the partition of India, that is to say the secession of some part of the people who were indivisible in nationalist imagination. That brings us to the discourse of partition. The dialectics of secessionism and integrationism is played out in the early part of the year 1947, in the efforts to preserve unity and to avoid partition. Who were involved in that last-ditch battle? Who stood for India’s unity, or made what looked like mere gestures towards the idea of keeping the subcontinent and the Hindu and Muslim communities united? Preeminently it was Mahatma Gandhi. He was one man who was not merely making empty gestures when he proposed to Viceroy Mountbatten that M.A. Jinnah be invited to form government as Prime Minister, ‘so long as all the measures that Mr Jinnah’s cabinet brings forward are in the interests of the Indian people as a whole’. Gandhiji’s ideas on this issue can be traced in his statements dispersed in various sites, often showing his angst, his perception of the threat to the ideal of Indian’s unity, and his effort to reconcile himself with the pragmatic position of the Congress which began to accept partition of India as a viable alternative.

It has often been said that 1947 saw the abandonment of the Gandhian position against the partition of India, a partition that went against the grain of the rejection of the ‘two nations theory’ by Gandhi and his followers in the Congress. That interpretation overlooks the nuances of the Gandhian position. In February 1947 Gandhi, in remote riot-affected Noakhali, is reported to have said: ‘If the Hindus, who formed the majority in the whole of India, desired to keep everyone united by means of compulsion, he [Gandhi] would resist it ... He was as much against forced partition as against forced unity’; he was personally against partition, but he conceded that ‘according to some ... the time had now come when such a division had become desirable in the interest of peace’.\(^3^1\) Again, he spoke of the same principle of freedom of choice in April 1947: ‘Are the Muslims fighting for Pakistan? ... By force they cannot have an inch of land. By persuasion they may have the whole of India.’\(^3^2\) A few days later in riot-torn Bihar he said again: ‘The Hindus of west Bengal have decided that Bengal should be divided ... why do the Hindus want separation?’ And he added: it was for Shahid Suhrawardy to persuade the Hindus to be part of Pakistan.\(^3^3\) In these and some other statements of Gandhi—particularly those made at prayer meetings, where he speaks as if he is talking to himself—presents a line of thinking which was quite consistent with his basic philosophy. He emphasizes freedom of choice and rejects coercion in any form as a means of preserving territorial unity. Given this position, there was no question of Gandhi’s ‘conversion’ to a pro-partition position, because he always prioritized intrinsic freedom over territorial sovereignty.

While Mahatma Gandhi’s digits of discourse were in this regard totally different from those of other political leaders, it is also clear that his heart did not accept partition. He continued to say in the months leading to partition how repugnant it was. Early in April 1947 he said: ‘I am aware of the fact that there is a large section [of opinion in India] in favour of the vivisection of India. Who cares for the nation today? Everyone wants to realize his ambition and grab power by creating dissensions.’\(^3^4\) ‘India is on the threshold of independence. But this is not the independence I want. To my mind it may be no independence if India is partitioned and the minorities do not enjoy security, protection, and equal treatment.’\(^3^5\) The hugely controversial proposal he made early in April 1947 to Viceroy Mountbatten to offer the Prime Minister’s position to M.A. Jinnah, was arguably a desperate effort to preserve India’s unity, although a different interpretation of that action was possible, as Mountbatten suggested half in jest when he said that he saw in it ‘wily old Gandhi’.\(^3^6\) What is clearly clear is his isolation among the political leaders around him: ‘I am sorry to say that I failed to carry any of them with me except Badshah Khan,’ he wrote to Mountbatten on 11 April 1947, and hence his request ‘to omit me from your consideration’.\(^3^7\) And beyond the circle of the circumspect political leaders, he met with the stiffest open opposition: in the prayer meetings he held in Noakhali, Patna, or New Delhi, he repeatedly referred to thousands of letters he received condemning his 'betrayal' of Hindus and casting doubts on the sincerity and efficacy of his effort to befriend the Muslims. At this juncture we hear a sad cry from his heart at a prayer meeting: ‘How can I carry conviction with the people by mere words if the sixty years of my public life have failed to convince them?’

As for the Congress leaders other than Gandhi, it was Abdul Ghaffar Khan who stood by him in trying to avoid partition, unless there was a popular mandate in its favour. Ghaffar Khan was no time-server, he was a political prisoner for twelve years in British India and later for fifteen years in post-independence Pakistan. In this first quarter of 1947 he struggled against the surge of communal fury in the Frontier; in the middle of March 1947 he and Gandhi addressed many meetings in Bihar. A week after the Working Committee accepted the partitioning of Punjab, Ghaffar Khan said: ‘I find myself surrounded by darkness, which increases the more I think of the future of India ... If India is burned down, all will lose, Hindus, Muslims, Sikhs and Christians.’ And he went on to add: ‘The Muslim League wants Partition. They can have it only through love and willing consent.’ In the middle of May, Ghaffar Khan returned to the Frontier, once again confronting the violent Muslim League opposition to him, and declared: ‘Some people mislead you in the name of Islam ... What gains will Islam and the Muslims reap from these riots and the slaughter of children, women and the aged? And how are the Pakhtuns going to be benefited?’ From then on, Abdul Ghaffar Khan’s aim was to put forward the idea of Pakhtun autonomy as a counter to the Muslims’ tendency to identity themselves with Pakistan. This was the only strategy then available to him. In Part II of this volume that story will unfold. Finally, objectivity demands that we recognize that Jawaharlal Nehru and a few others probably did not abandon the idea of the fundamental unity of India in their heart, but their pragmatic mind dictated the acceptance of an inevitable partition. It appears that Gandhi and Ghaffar Khan were not consulted when Sardar Vallabbhai Patel, Nehru, and the Working Committee of the Congress resolved to recommend the partition of Punjab on 8 March 1947. Nehru writes to Viceroy Wavell on 9 March 1947: ‘The Muslim League openly want to make the whole of the Punjab a Pakistan area and wish to use a League minority to that end. As I have written to you separately, a proper and fair solution of this differently appears to be the division of the Punjab into predominantly Muslim area and a predominantly non-Muslim area. The Congress has recommended this...’ It is interesting to note that Gandhi writes to Nehru on 20 March 1947 about that Congress resolution on Punjab partition saying, ‘I know nothing about it’, and reiterates his opposition to ‘the two nations theory’. That fact that partition in principle was thus conceded by the Congress and Nehru, while Gandhi knew nothing about it, instantiates the disconnection between the two. At the same time, it is true that Nehru often reiterated his faith in India’s unity which was the theme of the book he published the previous year, The Discovery of India (1946). And that is why perhaps, as will be evident from some documents here, Gandhi’s faith in Nehru remained unshakable.

In the documents in this volume we find Jawaharlal Nehru in a pragmatic mood about the impending partition. ‘The Congress has stood for the Union of India and still stands for it.
But we have previously stated that we are not going to compel any part [of India] against its will. If that unfortunately leads to a division, then we accept it... If we can have a united India straight away without such division, that will, of course be very welcome. He points to the need to ‘think realistically’ and confides to Asaf Ali that he finds ‘Mountbatten’s approach is friendly and he wants to go ahead fast’. On the other hand, Nehru writes, the situation is ‘tense and volcanic’ in Punjab and Bengal, there is ‘tremendous demand’ from Hindu and Sikhs for partition of Bengal and Punjab, arms are being made or smuggled in to prepare for a civil war, many of the Muslim leaders are against partition of Bengal and Punjab. The threat of communal conflict, almost tantamount to civil war, has been extensively documented in this volume along with the parallel narrative of communal politics. The police reports indicate a new trend; riots spread from towns to rural areas and there the savagery of both sides was unprecedented while police action was difficult. There appears to be a perception in British official circles that on the partition question Nehru was amenable to be reluctantly persuaded to part ways with Gandhi. An interesting example of this belief at the highest level is Mountbatten’s conversation with Winston Churchill. At this interview Churchill happened to be in bed and mulling over in his mind the Indian problem. Churchill, Mountbatten recalls, ‘asked me if I foresaw any difficulties, particularly with Mr. Gandhi. I told him that I doubted whether he would create any difficulty which would not be dealt with by Patel and Nehru’. Although Nehru was willing to accept the idea of partition, faced with the prospect of a civil war, he played a crucially important role in writing a devastating note against Mountbatten’s ‘Plan Balkan’ which would have virtually divided India into a congeries of small political entities, putting to an end the Indian Union. That note of 11 May 1947, perhaps the single most important document in this collection, was an intervention that changed the course of events altogether.

As regards secessionism, the stance of the Muslim League remained in this period relentlessly consistent with its earlier politics. Right in the beginning of his viceroyalty Mountbatten held meetings with Jinnah, not less than six times between 5 April and 11 April 1947. ‘He had brought all possible arguments to bear on Mr. Jinnah ... Mr Jinnah had not been able in his presence to adduce one single feasible argument in favour of Pakistan. In fact he had offered no counter-arguments. He gave the impression that he was not listening. He was impossible to argue with.’ The long conversations served only to confirm Mountbatten’s first impression that Jinnah was ‘in a most frigid, haughty and disdainful frame of mind’. All Jinnah had to say was that ‘there was only one solution—a “surgical operation” on India’. It seems probable that the Viceroy had formed a prejudice against Jinnah, because he was unreasonably expecting Jinnah to abandon the agenda which brought him to the forefront of Indian politics. Mountbatten’s interview with Liaquat Ali Khan yielded an equally inflexible answer, through, unlike Jinnah, he ‘smiled engagingly’. After having dealt with Congress members in the Interim Government, Liaquat Ali felt that ‘the position now [is] so intolerable that if Your Excellency was only prepared to let the Muslim League have the Sind Desert, I would still prefer to accept that and have a separate Muslim State ...'

When Lady Edwina Mountbatten had an interview with Ms Fatima Jinnah, who was supposed to be very influential in the League in matters of state, 'she made frequent references to the fact that “the Muslims would fight for separation and their rights, if these were not agreed to”.

The upshot of these encounters was favourable to Jinnah and when Mountbatten began to talk to the leaders on the other side, it is obvious from the records that his object was to assess the degree of resistance to or compliance with a non-negotiable first premise: India shall be divided. The question was only as follows: Would the Congress, Mountbatten asked over and again, ‘accept voluntarily a decision which virtually abandoned the idea of India’s unity if that were the only way that I could transfer power without a risk of civil war’? Rajendra Prasad’s answer to that question was typical of the usual response of Congress leaders Mountbatten talked to: ‘He did not see ... any alternative [to partition] but to transfer power in any manner which would not involve civil war.’ After this first round of interviews Mountbatten seems to have made up his mind: he was keen to advertise to the world that ‘it had always been and would remain his main desire to hand over power to an unified India’, but ‘when it became apparent that the retention of any form of an united India would start civil war ... he had regretfully been obliged to give up this ideal ...’

This decision was confided by him to his closest aides and advisers on 11 April 1947. In negotiating the process of partition the Muslim League, no doubt, suffered disappointments, in particular in the division of Punjab and Bengal and the failure in securing access to Calcutta. Mountbatten had his moment of revenge when he declared to Jinnah that a ‘moth-eaten Pakistan ... was all that I could offer him’.

It will be perhaps incorrect to accept Mountbatten’s tendency to explain the historic decision of partition in terms of personalities; rather than give credit to or to blame the intransigence of Jinnah alone, we need to look at the mindset that had developed in the Muslim League and the long-term trends in inter-communal conflict and the politics of exclusion.

If this is how the Muslim League and the Congress negotiated and came to terms with the idea of partition, what of the other participants in the political arena? That takes us to the smaller players in politics and the provinces. There is a vast array of data in the documents in this volume on that discourse and the groundswell of communalism. It is neither necessary nor possible to plumb those depths, given the limits of the present ‘Preface’. However, the role of the Hindu Mahasabha the traditional proponent of ‘Akhand Hindusthan’, merits attention; in Bengal the Mahasabha leader Syama Prasad Mookerjee took the lead in promoting the idea of partition of Bengal in the teeth of opposition of the proponents of ‘United Bengal’. The latter included Sarat Chandra Bose, important in his own right and as the brother of Subhas Chandra Bose, and H.S. Suhrawardy, then the Premier of Bengal, as well as the leader of the Congress Legislature Party, Kiran Shankar Roy. That campaign lasted while many minor leaders in the Congress in Bengal dithered till just a fortnight before 15 August 1947; on the other hand the Punjab partition was a settled question from the beginning of March 1947 when the Congress recommended that course of action.

Soon after that decision by the Congress, on 11 March 1947 B.S. Moonje, presumably speaking on behalf of Hindu Mahasabha, opposed the partition of Punjab and declared that it would be 'wise to stick out for Akhand Hindusthan, being prepared boldly to face bloodshed, rapine, loot, arson...'. S.P. Mookerjee and the Hindu Mahasabha had been stout opponents of the notion of Pakistan and they did not accept the idea of freedom of accession. When the Cripps Mission was in India, Sir Stafford Cripps received a Hindu Mahasabha delegation which was led by V.D. Savarkar and included S.P. Mookerjee along with B.S. Moonje. In his personal note Cripps writes that their inflexible position was met with very firm declaration from Cripps that in his view the right of non-accession was fundamental. However, when in 1947 partition was evidently imminent, Mookerjee and the Mahasabha reversed their stand and demanded the right of non-accession to Pakistan for areas which had a Hindu majority, particularly areas located in the western part of Bengal. This reversal of position was announced in the middle of March 1947 at the Hindu Mahasabha conference chaired by S.P. Mookerjee; a similar stand was taken in March 1947 by a large delegation of Bengal politicians in the legislature who met Nehru and Patel to convince them that a separate state of West Bengal was a desideratum in the prevailing political context. Curiously, as late as April 1947, V.D. Savarkar maintained the rhetoric of Akhand Bharat: ‘To frustrate the vivisection of our Akhand Hindusthan we must first vivisect their Pakistan.’ Mookerjee, with the authority of his father, Sir Asutosh Mookerjee, and the Hindu Bengali lobby behind him, said: ‘The mere mention of the word partition need not throw us into a fainting fit ... If Bengal’s constitution is left to be determined by a body of persons the majority of whom are dominated by the Muslim League policy ... we can expect no protection whatsoever from their hands. Our only salvation in such circumstances lies in demanding for ourselves a separate province ...’ Within the Congress High Command Mookerjee had a sympathetic soul in Sardar Vallabhbhai Patel. Early in April 1947 Patel advised Mountbatten that it would be best for the Viceroy to announce straight away that Bengal would be partitioned. There is evidence that Patel was in active correspondence with S.P. Mookerjee and some other Bengal leaders. However, Mookerjee’s political clout in Bengal was reduced by the defeat of thirty of the thirty-one candidates the Hindu Mahasabha had put up in the general election of 1946—Mookerjee was the only successful candidate to retain his seat in the Bengal Legislative Assembly. His source of strength was not the party he led but the large number of pro-partitionists among the Legislative Assembly members; seventy-four of them, all non-Muslim members, signed a memorandum to the Viceroy requesting steps towards the partition of Bengal and the leader of the Congress legislature party carried that to the Viceroy. A day before that memorandum was submitted S.P. Mookerjee wrote a skillfully drafted letter to the Viceroy recommending partition. He argued that if the demand for homeland for 24 per cent of India’s Muslim population was legitimate, 45 per cent of Bengal’s population being Hindu had an equally legitimate claim. Further, he built a case upon Jinnah’s argument in justification of partition: ‘Mr. Jinnah’s claim for Pakistan is based on the theory that Hindu and Muslims are two separate nations ... [T]he same logic and argument applicable to Pakistan also apply to the partition of Bengal.’ And, he added, that the League was guided by ‘fanatical notions of separate nationhood ... [But] we do not want to be cut off from the rest of India’.

From May 1947 onwards, S.P. Mookerjee was no longer leading a pro-partition agitation; he became one of many leaders swimming with the current moving inexorably towards partition. Mookerjee remained a defender of the Hindu community, as in the past. In his speeches in the Legislative Assembly of Bengal on the Noakhali riots he had highlighted desecration of ‘symbols of Hindu religious worship’ and mass conversion to Islam, which in his view, was ‘more horrible than even physical death’. Such a stance was not adopted by Congress legislators, but the general political climate and the news media encouraged the rhetoric of communal polarization. A handful of political leaders who were proponents of ‘United Bengal’, namely Sarat Chandra Bose, Kiran Sankar Roy, Abul Hashim, and a doubtful ally, Shahid Suhrawardy, were up against a climate of opinion that was adverse to their counsel of avoiding partition. In a recently published series of letters in the private papers collection of Jinnah, we see Suhrawardy confiding to Liaquat Ali Khan of the Muslim League in May 1947: ‘Even the Hindus of East Bengal, who do not count in the voting, are supporting the partition with death staring them on the face ... it is impossible to arouse Hindu opinion against it.’ Hindu Mahasabha had lost in Bengal every seat except one, that of S.P. Mookerjee, in the general election of 1946, but in 1947 the Mahasabha had the last laugh. After all, dividing people was a game that communalism, Hindu or Muslim, excelled in.

However, the storyline, as they say in the film world, is not just about partition, it was about independence, and anticipations of independence can be sensed in the documents in this volume. A little bit of the exhilaration of that moment is captured by Nehru when, reflecting on the Government’s policy statement of 20 February 1947, he recalled in his letter to his mentor, Gandhi, ‘our oft-repeated demand for quitting India. It may not be so exactly as we would have liked it. But the real thing is that they have finally decided and announced that they are quitting’. The Congress declared: ‘The end of an era is at hand and a new age will soon begin.’

'working for the establishment of Swaraj for all the Indian people ... We are here to bring about real satisfaction of the fundamental needs of the common man of this country, irrespective of race, religion or community.'

While witnessing the momentous events documented in this volume, such were the intimations of the new age that India awaited.

A big project such as this incurs many debts. I would like to thank the editor of this volume, Sucheta Mahajan; the research assistants and the editorial team at the ICHR; Arjun Dev, who acted as the coordinator of the project; and Amit K. Gupta, who was co-editor of one volume and a consultant in respect of several volumes in this series. The Chairman of the ICHR, Basudev Chatterji, edited a volume in the Towards Freedom series some years ago and is now playing an important role in pushing forward our efforts to complete the series.

From the data generated by the publishers it seems that since 2006 when this project was effectively revived and I was asked to be the General Editor, the total output has been as follows: over eight thousand pages of text consisting of documents, and about six hundred pages of editorial research aids such as calendars of documents, biographical notes, and so on, have been produced in nine bulky tomes. These figures do not mean very much since these productions are best evaluated in terms of the extent to which research has been facilitated. That is to be seen in the future but for the present it is a matter of some satisfaction that documents hitherto dispersed in many archives and depositories have been made easily accessible and that a project that began three decades ago is nearing completion.

 Needless to say, the Editorial Committee which has met from time to time was of great help. As the General Editor I would like to put on record my indebtedness to my distinguished fellow-editors in charge of different volumes, other than those mentioned above: Partha Sarathi Gupta, Bimal Prasad, Bipan Chandra, K.N. Panikkar, Sumit Sarkar, and Mushirul Hasan. I would also like to thank the Oxford University Press, New Delhi, for their cooperation.

Editor’s Introduction

Nineteen forty-seven, the year covered by the present volume, was no ordinary year. Two momentous developments stood out, independence and partition. The movement for independence reached its conclusion and new nation states emerged. Important issues to do with nation-building which had been raised during the years of struggle now demanded they be addressed. What would be the nature of the polity? Would India be a secular state or a Hindu rashtra, following upon Pakistan’s creation on a communal basis? What would be the place of minorities in the new state? How would the princely states integrate into the very different polity of erstwhile British India? How would the anti-colonial movement, which had operated as a broad front, transform into an ideologically distinct party?

One of the obvious questions associated with the year 1947 is why the British decided to quit. However, those looking for answers to why the British quit are unlikely to find them in the immediate context of 1947. They would be best off looking for these answers in the long term, in the years of protracted mass struggle against colonial rule. By 1947 what was left to decide were the modalities of to whom and how power was to be handed over.

By the end of World War II, the success of the national movement in the struggle for hegemony over the minds of the Indian people was evident. Nationalist fervour was at a high pitch and the anti-colonial movement had reached hitherto unpoliticized sections and areas. The pillars of the colonial state, the army and the bureaucracy, were weakened at their base. At the end of the war, the civil services stood depleted, weary from wartime service and handling nationalist agitations, most recently the 1942 movement. Imperialist hegemony had gradually but firmly been eroded and, equally important, was recognized by the colonial officials and the people to be so.¹

The nationalist strategy of struggle–truce–struggle²—phases of struggle alternating with phases of non-struggle—reduced colonial policy to a mess of contradictions. Repression and conciliation alternated as two poles of policy. When non-violent movements were met with repression, the power behind the government stood exposed. Conversely, the government was seen to be too weak when it went in for a truce. Loyalists deserted the sinking ship, as did Indian officials. For loyalists it was a crisis of faith; for the services, the dilemma was one of action. The same set of officials had to implement both poles of policy, repression and conciliation, and found this very confusing and demoralizing.

Looking ahead at the political prospects in India once the war ended, the Viceroy underlined the primacy of a successful settlement of the Indian question. This was believed to be essential for the future security of the Empire, to ensure British prestige in the East, and to keep India within the Commonwealth.³

When the national leaders came out of jail after long prison terms at the end of the War and toured the country, they assured their audiences that it was a matter of time before the British would go, maybe as early as two to five years. By early 1946 the British in turn made it clear that their days in India were numbered. The Secretary of State said as much in his speech on New Year’s Day, 1946. Along with other Congress leaders, Gandhiji realized that the imperial rulers were sincere in the declaration of their intention to ‘quit’ in favour of independent rule by Indians and in turn tried to convince the people of this.⁴

However, the time for exploring avenues for settlement was running out. By mid-1946 a point had been reached where government had the responsibility to keep the peace but little power to do so. The Viceroy commented on the prospect of a revolt by the Congress, this time assisted by its own governments in power in the provinces: ‘We could still probably suppress such a revolt ... [but] have nothing to put in its place and should be driven to an almost entirely official rule, for which the necessary numbers of efficient officials do not exist.’⁵

When given the option of staying on in India by changing the basis of rule to coercion, British Prime Minister Attlee argued against it on the following grounds: lack of administrative machinery to carry out a policy of rule by coercion; lack of troops owing to other international commitments; adverse opinion in the Labour Party; questionable loyalty of the Indian troops and the unwillingness of British troops to serve; adverse world opinion; and an uncomfortable position in UNO.⁶

As colonial rule could not survive on the old basis for long, a graceful withdrawal from India became the overarching aim of policy makers. Of course, the digits of the post imperial relationship had to be negotiated and modalities of transfer of power worked out. For the British government it was important that withdrawal be presented not as forced dissolution of imperial power but as a step forward in the planned devolution of power. A revised draft of a statement of policy dated 2 January 1947 set out His Majesty’s Government’s (HMG’s) proposed statement as ‘the final stage in their achievement of self government’, which ‘for the past thirty years...has been the policy of successive British governments.’⁷

A new Viceroy was accordingly appointed as part of a new policy initiative. So Mountbatten went out to India not only as the new Viceroy but also the last Viceroy, with the terminal date for British departure announced for 30 June 1948. Mountbatten even claimed in later years that he introduced the idea of the time limit and that if he had not done so the British may well still be out there! But many before Mountbatten had spoken of a time limit, including Wavell and Attlee, and members of the Cabinet had argued, from different points of view, for having a specific date for withdrawal and its announcement. For Mountbatten to claim sole credit is clearly without substance. That he insisted on its public announcement is closer to what actually happened.

When the year opened, two developments had taken place. The first was that Nehru and Jinnah had been to London for talks to tease out the contradiction between their varied readings of the Cabinet Mission Plan. Congress saw the scheme as an alternative to partition and accepted the plan without accepting compulsory grouping of provinces. This was partly because Assam and North West Frontier Province (NWFP), both with Congress inclinations, were placed in the zones in the east and north west which would make up the future Pakistan. In contrast, the Muslim League was all for compulsory grouping of provinces and accepted the Mission scheme in as much as it implied Pakistan. It is not surprising that there was trouble given the opposed perceptions of the scheme by the two principal parties.

The second development was that the Congress had gone ahead and convened the constitution making body for its area, given the Muslim League’s refusal to join the Constituent Assembly. But the impasse remained despite Congress accepting HMG’s pro-League interpretation of the Mission scheme in the 6 December 1946 statement. The deadlock in the Interim Government also continued. With the options available exhausted, new initiatives were needed.

The Interim Government was an arena where civil war by other means was waged by the League. ‘Non-cooperate from within’ was Nehru’s phrase for League’s stance in the Interim Government. The intention of the League seems to have been to open battle on every front in pursuit of the end of Pakistan. Appointments made by Congress ministers were questioned and policy decisions hotly debated. Congress members in the Interim Government found the functioning of the government to be severely compromised. Patel demanded that Leaguers should resign from the government given their intemperate speech.

This went on till 5 February 1947 when Congress members demanded resignation of League members. Though disruptionist tactics of the League members was the main ground for this demand, it was also pointed out that the Muslim League had refused to join the Constituent Assembly which had convened on 9 December 1946. This implied an ambiguous acceptance of the Mission Plan on its part. This in turn meant framing of the constitution was obstructed. The League only accepted the short-term aspects of the Plan, namely the formation of an Interim Government, which it used to reach its goal of Pakistan. When the Muslim League Working Committee met at Karachi on 31 January 1947, it asked for the dissolution of the Plan. This, despite the fact that the 6 December 1946 statement by the government had accepted the interpretation of the League on the vexed issue of grouping and asked Congress to assure that there would be a set procedure for the Constituent Assembly.

A few days before independence, Patel spoke about his experience in office in the Interim Government. As the Muslim League created deadlocks and were obstructionist, therefore Congress leaders decided that it was best to control some part of the country rather than have its writ run thinly over the whole country. Non-cooperation by the League in the Interim Government closed one more door and took the country closer to partition.

Apart from announcing a policy initiative, an additional factor behind HMG making the 20 February statement was the Congress demand that Muslim League join the Constituent Assembly or leave the Interim Government.

His Majesty’s Government hoped the impending February statement would gain time to answer the Congress demand that Muslim League leave the Constituent Assembly. Accordingly the government’s answer to Nehru’s demand was that he should await the policy statement soon to be announced. The constitutional crisis on the cards was staved off by the 20 February 1947 statement. Nehru appealed to Liaquat Ali Khan, the League leader, to meet and discuss differences as the British were fading out of the picture but got no response. The statement was double edged—on the one hand it was a response to the decline of authority of the colonial state and its instruments; on the other it was a notice to the League that agreement had to be worked out by the given time limit. The government wanted to convey the message that it was no longer willing to let the League hold the constitutional process to ransom.

The statement was not clear about the government to which power was to be transferred. Was it the government emanating from the Constituent Assembly? Would India be united or divided? The League took the cue from the proviso in the statement that in the absence of agreement at the centre, power would be handed over to the authority at the helm in the provinces. The League duly made a bid for power in the Punjab, toppled the coalition government, and set that province on the path to civil war. Congress was convinced of the intention of the British to quit. Gandhiji said that the Congress provinces if wise will get what they want.

Another aspect that changed in these months was the force of the strategic undertow to the evolution of political policy. Prior to 1947 all policy pronouncements or political settlements were conditional on ensuring military or strategic interests of Britain in the post-imperial scenario. A fixed date for withdrawal meant a change in the game, as it left no scope for awaiting protection of post-imperial strategic interests. The sequence now would be, as Ismay spelt out at a meeting of ministers of HMG, ‘Military arrangements in India must follow the political situation.’ Over time the realization dawned that a military treaty was unlikely and British interests were best safeguarded by promoting friendly relations, preferably within the Commonwealth.

Congress was in a dilemma about whether India should be in the Commonwealth or not because Congress had always stood for complete independence. In mid-April Nehru and his colleagues had sought clarification on this issue from the government: Can one be a member of the Commonwealth while being an independent state?

On the British side, the question was: Could the grant of immediate dominion status get India to join the Commonwealth? This was the British hope, predicated on the Congress realization that it might be useful for British troops to stay on for a while till their own armed forces were in place, for which being in the Commonwealth would help. But Mountbatten dishonestly said at one point that the British were not interested in India being in the Commonwealth. This was a bargaining tactic. In reality, India being in the Commonwealth would present Britain in a good light in the eyes of people across the world. Also Commonwealth as a transitional institutional arrangement would suit the British as much or more than the Congress.

His Majesty’s Government’s assessment of their strategic interests in the subcontinent after independence inclined them to cooperate with the Congress rather than prop up communal forces as they had done in the past. However, the British never pitched fully for united India; they modified their preference for united India on strategic grounds to having alliances with two dominions, both of whom would be partners in Commonwealth defence. While Pakistan would be an active partner, India would provide bases, as in the case of the Andaman and Nicobar Islands.

The move towards partition is documented in the chapter which details how the new Viceroy explores political alternatives for a couple of months after coming out to India. After discussions with Indian leaders, he realized the Mission Plan was a dead horse. In particular, he found Jinnah stubborn about getting Pakistan and impossible to argue with. The alternatives before Mountbatten appeared to be shrinking and he came around to the view that partition was on the cards.

The date for withdrawal was brought forward by Mountbatten to 15 August with announcement of Boundary Awards fixed for after 15 August. When the date of 15 August 1947 was announced, there were only 72 days to quit and divide. The early date for transfer of power was intended, first, to get Congress to agree to dominion status and, second, to enable the British government to escape responsibility for the worsening communal situation. The concern of the government was primarily how best to come out of the continuing crisis in the eyes of world public opinion. They did not care what happened to Indians.

Policy preferences before HMG were a gracious, smooth withdrawal and getting benefits from both dominions, India and Pakistan. It could be said that partition was not only the closing scene of Divide and Rule but also the first act of the drama of Commonwealth diplomacy. The intention was to showcase HMG’s intentions in the best possible way. Show of impartiality and fair play was vital, especially as world opinion was not convinced of the necessity of partition. So, since an agreed solution had not been reached, what was an award was dressed up as an agreed solution.

20 Mountbatten painted a very grim picture to V.K.K. Menon about Pakistan becoming stronger militarily if it stayed in the British Commonwealth and then argued that the only way India could prevent that was by being in the Commonwealth themselves (22 April 1947, Record of Interview between Mountbatten and V.K.K. Menon, Part 1, Chapter 15, Document No. 25). Also see Nye to Mountbatten, Part 1, Chapter 15, Document No. 35.

A point worth noting is that the 3 June Plan was an award, whatever its projection by the British as a plan agreed to by Congress and League.

The British professed that they tried their best to keep India united; in fact they took the easy way out of pleasing everyone, as Gandhiji pointed out to Mountbatten: ‘I suggest that the attempt to please all parties is a fruitless and thankless task. In the course of our conversation I suggested that equal praise bestowed on both the parties was not meant. No praise would have been the right thing.’

The British did not really make a bid for unity; they only dressed up division as maximum possible unity. As the main proposition of the Congress, namely unity, was not accepted, the British were all for meeting all its minor demands (for example, its stance on Hyderabad or on Andaman and Nicobar Islands).

In mid-April 1947, at a conference of governors, it was decided that provinces can join only India or Pakistan—no option of independence was given to them. His Majesty’s Government was not happy with closure of the option of independence, given its emphasis on presenting the mode of transfer of power as emanating from Indian and not British will. The Viceroy on his part was clear that partition must be limited to two successor states, and not lead to Balkanisation.

Mountbatten proposed that he be Governor-General of both India and Pakistan to ensure a modicum of unity between the two dominions by virtue of his being a common link. He was confident that Jinnah would welcome Mountbatten’s presence, but Jinnah decided to be Governor-General himself in order to show his independence from the British and refused to relent because he did not wish to appear to be appeasing the British. A joint defence machinery was set up to act as a link between the dominions. But the Kashmir conflict in October 1947 put paid to all prospects of joint defence. The joint defence machinery did not last beyond December 1947.

The documents on the stance of the political parties on the partition of India highlight an issue which continues to be contested—why Congress and Gandhiji accepted partition. Depending on the ideological bent of the writer, partition is either attributed to the British policy of divide and rule or the age-old rift between Hindus and Muslims. Some left wing writers have described independence as a deal between the metropolitan and Indian bourgeoisie for which the nation paid the price of partition. Or else that Congress leaders chose to have a strong Centre rather than share power with the League. Or that partition took place because of the Congress leaders’ lust for quick and easy power, leaving the people betrayed and Gandhiji no longer wishing to live for 125 years.

There was one moot point which was most debated in the public domain and which Gandhiji, Nehru, and other leaders had to repeatedly explain and defend. Why was partition accepted by Congress and Gandhiji after years of their resolute opposition to the two-nation theory and the politics of Jinnah and the Muslim League?

This partly explains the extensive documentation on the Congress relative to the Muslim League, whose stance on partition did not require explanation as it flowed from its earlier politics. Also the stance of the Muslim League is documented in different chapters on the division of Punjab and Bengal, on communalism in the provinces, and on exploring political alternatives. The complete picture can be pieced together by aggregating the documents dispersed across the chapters, which have not been organized according to parties, but on thematic lines, such as the League’s stance, as well as of the Socialists and Communists.

The documents in the present selection indicate that Gandhiji’s position was different from Congress’ but not opposed to it. Gandhiji’s nuanced position is evident in his proposal to the Viceroy that Jinnah be Prime Minister, embedded in the hope that this would satisfy his ambition and wean him away from his insistence on Pakistan.28 Mountbatten noted that this pleased Jinnah’s vanity.29 However, the Congress leaders saw the proposal as fraught with too much risk. If the Congress opted out of the constitutional arena, that would leave it open to reactionary forces. Also, many followers would see it as betrayal by the party.30 Further, the prospect of Pakistan could not be averted by appeasing Jinnah since even he could no longer call it off. Accordingly, Gandhiji withdrew his offer.31

When Gandhiji and Jinnah issued a direct appeal for peace in mid-April 1947,32 Patel pertinently pointed out to the Viceroy that Direct Action had to be withdrawn for the peace appeal to be effective.33 Patel implied that the appeal for peace by Jinnah was not sincere, an assessment shared by Gandhiji.34

By the summer of 1947 the realization had dawned on Congress leaders that conciliation of communalism was futile. Nehru described Jinnah as always wanting more even after accepting what he gets.35 Elsewhere he said of Jinnah, ‘We are up against something which is neither political, nor economic, nor reasonable, nor logical.’36 Patel was clear that there would be no more appeasement of the Muslim League. He also pointed out that new India would not have communal weightages or communal electorates.37

An alternative to partition was imposing unity by force. P.D. Tandon, Congress leader and Speaker of the United Provinces (UP) Assembly, was an active proponent of this view, as was Ram Ratan Gupta, Congressman from Kanpur.39 Both condemned the ‘betrayal’ by the Congress in accepting partition and argued for imposing unity. But Congress leaders chose to accept Pakistan rather than compel unity.

Nehru was clear that use of the sword and the lathi could not stem the communal forces—rather, the ensuing civil war would have long term consequences. He stressed this in his speech at the All India Congress Committee (AICC) session on 15 June 1947. A couple of months earlier, Congress President Kripalani had told the Viceroy, 'Rather than have a battle we shall let them have their Pakistan.' It must be remembered that as Congress did not have state power, the option of unity by force meant fighting it out on the streets against volunteer armies of the communal forces.

Hence when partition seemed inevitable, Congress tried to find a way of accepting the undesirable, not as a communal demand, but as a principle based on self-determination. Gandhiji stated that the decision had been arrived at after taking into account the views of the people of all communities, be they Muslims, Sikhs or Hindus. Nehru explained partition as the outcome of the will of some sections to not be part of India.

At the Congress Working Committee meeting on 1 June 1947, Congress President Kripalani reminded the gathering that since 1942 it had been accepted that no part of India would be forced to stay on in India against its will. At the session of the AICC on 15 June 1947, he again said that acceptance of partition flowed from the clause of no coercion in the Congress resolution on the Cripps Plan.

The fact that the settlement was final was seen as crucial by Congress leaders in accepting partition. Though Patel pinned his hopes on the partition award on the ground that there was no further uncertainty, he also expressed his dismay at Jinnah taking a communal standpoint in his broadcast over All India Radio (AIR) and the All India Muslim League’s response being contradictory and evasive and hence unlikely to be the basis for settlement.

The hope of India and Pakistan being reunited after some years reconciled leaders to the reality of division. The expectation was that once passions subsided, common interests would draw people together and partition could be revoked. Hence Nehru appealed to people to not accept partition in their hearts. This was expressed in his trademark eloquent prose: 'We have often to go through the valley of the shadow before we reach the sunlit mountain tops.'

However, if the hope of reuniting was to be kept alive, any measure that cemented partition was to be avoided, be it dividing the army, transfer of population, or parliamentary sanction.

for transfer of power to two dominions. Congress leaders too joined Mountbatten to oppose transfer of population.\(^{52}\)

The AICC resolution on the 3 June Plan made it clear that partition was accepted as a temporary measure that would bring violence to an end. This was again repeated in Gandhiji’s and Nehru’s speeches at the AICC meeting on 14–15 June.\(^{53}\) Ironically, for a believer in ahimsa, Gandhiji had a lesser dread of civil war than his colleagues. He wrote: ‘Let British leave India to anarchy, rather than as a cock pit between two organized armies.’\(^{54}\)

The one positive aspect of partition for Congress was that they would get a free hand in the rest of the country. Nehru spoke of 80 or 90 per cent of India moving forward according to the map of India he had in mind and added: ‘Those who stand as an obstacle in our way should go their way.’\(^{55}\)

Patel spelt out further what this freedom could be used for—to consolidate the armed forces and have a strong central government.\(^{56}\) Jayaprakash Narayan, the socialist leader, also appreciated the ‘emergence of a strong Union Centre’ following upon the Partition Award and its concomitant division of provinces.\(^{57}\)

If the hope was unity at the centre, the apprehension was the opposite. Nehru was concerned that the Plan shown to him in early May 1947 held out the spectre of fragmentation. In other words, it would create many Ulsters in India as a large number of successor states would be allowed to emerge first and then given the option to unite.\(^{58}\) Free choice to provinces and states was insisted upon by HMG. But the Viceroy had been in favour of only two dominions in mid-April and accordingly, the 3 June Plan limited fragmentation to partition into two dominions.

Congress then accepted partition on the grounds that it reflected the will of the people and that it was the only way out.\(^{59}\) On 4 June, Gandhiji, after meeting the Viceroy and the Congress leaders, said at his daily prayer meeting that the Congress Working Committee had agreed to the vivisection of Hindustan not under any threat of violence or coercion but as there was no way of getting round the Muslim League.\(^{60}\) There was hope that partition was only temporary and could be reversed once the imperialists were out of the picture and once Muslim League realized its folly. Partition was seen by the leaders as better than civil war or Balkanization. This helped leaders accept it. Only options left were waging an anti-communal struggle and using force, both of which could not be taken up. In the end, partition was accepted by Congress as a recognition of the failure of its strategy to draw in most of the Muslim masses into the national movement.

The letters and documents selected on this theme corroborate Gandhiji’s reading of the communal situation that both Hindus and Muslims had moved far away from non-violence.

He could not oppose Congress, he said, because Congress represented the people of India who have become communal.\(^1\)

He was asked by some colleagues and sundry elements during his prayer meetings why he did not start a mass movement. According to them, such a movement could either be against the British, whose fall out would be Hindu-Muslim unity or it could be an anti-communal movement. They believed that both movements would bring about unity. In reality, however, the possibility of anti-communal struggle was limited as cadres and the ordinary people were communalized. Gandhiji was aware of his limitations: 'I have never created a situation in my life...People say that I had created a situation, but I had done nothing except giving a shape to what was already there. Today I see no sign of such a healthy feeling. And therefore I shall have to wait until the time comes.'\(^2\)

It has often been argued that Gandhiji was ignored in the parleys with the retreating imperial power. Gandhiji was believed to be helpless because of his disciples' alleged lust for power. However, the position of the Congress leaders can best be understood in political rather than personal terms. They wanted early transfer of power to take the country forward out of the impasse created by non-cooperation by the League.

As for Gandhiji’s ‘alienation’ from the Congress, the record seems to suggest otherwise. Gandhiji dismissed any rumours of his disenchantment with Nehru by speaking very highly of him: ‘He renounces things as easily as a snake its slough.’\(^3\) He was consulted on political developments when in Noakhali. Kripalani and Nehru went to meet him there and asked him to come to Delhi. When he came to Delhi he met the Viceroy and participated in the Congress Working Committee meetings of 1 May, 25 May, 2 June, and in the AICC of 14 and 15 June.

Gandhiji put aside his principled objection to partition and enjoined on Congressmen to close ranks and fall behind Congress in accepting partition.\(^4\) At the AICC session on 14 June Gandhiji explained:

Our constitution permits it and your duty demands it that if you feel that the Working Committee is in the wrong you should remove it, you should revolt and assume all power. You have a perfect right to do so, if you feel that you have the strength. But I do not find that strength in us today. If you had it I would also be with you and if I felt strong enough myself I would, alone, take up the flag of revolt. But today I do not see the conditions for doing so.\(^5\)

The acceptance of partition by the Congress and Gandhiji was the culmination of a long and arduous period during which all the major leaders of the Congress tried very hard to counter the League’s concerted attempts to create communal violence and prevent agreement on the issue of united India. While the early months of the year saw Nehru and Patel dealing with the League’s stalling tactics endorsed by the British government, Gandhiji toured the riot affected areas of Noakhali and Bihar. He tried to provide a healing balm to the victims of both Hindu and Muslim communal violence. His efforts and methods were widely reported and debated.

Nehru appealed to Gandhiji when the latter was in Noakhali: ‘But I have an overwhelming feeling that vital decisions are being made and will be made in Delhi affecting the whole of our future as well as of course the present, and your presence at such a moment is necessary.’ Gandhiji acceded to his request subsequently but explained his position: ‘But I proceed the other way. I had learnt when still a child the formula, “As in the microcosm, so in the macrocosm.””

While Gandhiji’s efforts were heroic, their impact was limited, as even his disciples accepted. Hindu refugees were slow to return to their villages or cast off fear. Muslims in turn continued to be hostile to him in Noakhali and elsewhere. His critics commented on the futility of his method of non-violence and the politics of change of heart. Even some of his own colleagues felt his kind of politics had not yet thrown up a strategy that could counter communal frenzy. Taking off from the Noakhali tragedy the Hindu Mahasabha time and again called upon Hindus to rise to their own self-defence.

Gandhiji’s tour in Bihar and Noakhali not only reflected his efforts at combating communalism with weapons of non-violence and ‘satyagraha’ but also the feelings of fear and distrust that were mutual to both the communities. Complaints of Hindus in Noakhali and Muslims in Bihar were alike and the politics of communalism permeated every aspect of human life, including relief and rehabilitation work, as refugee camps turned into centres of further propaganda and hate speech. Amidst all of this, there were also a small crop of nationalists, both within Hindus and Muslims, who had stood the test of time, braving personal loss and treachery by their colleagues.

Ample documents cover Gandhiji and his struggle against Hindu communalism, especially in Bihar. The success of Muslim League’s Direct Action in Calcutta and Noakhali further strengthened Hindu communal forces as some Hindus came to feel the need to organize on communal lines. The Bihar riots were an example of this politics of reaction, which left 4300–700 killed, according to one estimate.

The Bihar riots are sometimes perceived as having marked the communalisation of Congress on Hindu lines. In reality, the ministry was secular and only some individual Congressmen were affected by communal sentiment and prejudice. Gandhiji insisted on an enquiry commission and on staying in Bihar, despite murmurs that his doing so would reflect poorly on the functioning of the Congress ministry and the image of individual Congressmen. His presence acted as a catalyst to the Congress ministry, despite differences with them on many issues. The simple peasants of Bihar accepted him as their conscience, which helped them along the path of repentance.\textsuperscript{76}

If we look at the challenge posed by Hindu communal forces, we find that it took two forms, majority assertion and minority fears. The first could be repressed sternly. But insecurity of minorities demanded something more than assurances. Hindu communal elements pressurised the Congress to place the interests of Hindus first and function as a Hindu body. After the creation of Pakistan on the basis of the two-nation theory it was not surprising that the demand for a Hindu rashtra, a Hindu state, became more strident.

Even before the creation of Pakistan, Hindu communal organizations sensed an opportunity when in some places ordinary Hindus moved away from support to the Congress. This was largely because the policies of the Congress were perceived by some sections as anti-Hindu.
One grievance was that Hindu rioters were selectively targeted for repression by the Congress ministries of UP and Bihar. Another grievance was that ministries continued pro-Muslim policies of the British government such as employment of greater proportion of Muslims in services.\textsuperscript{77}

The Hindu Mahasabha was heartened by the predicament the Congress found itself in—namely, facing the challenge of creation of Pakistan and the spread of communal sentiment within its own ranks. This opened up the threat of Hindu communal elements effecting an ideological shift in the Congress. The question posed to the Congress was why it continued to 'sacrifice the Hindus for these handful of so-called nationalist Muslims', who in any case were not loyal to the country?\textsuperscript{78}

The demand then was for Congress to accept it was a Hindu, not a national, body. Interestingly, this was the same as the position of the government, that the Congress should accept that it was a caste Hindu body. Congress leaders had refused to do so, recognizing this was an issue of legitimacy of its national character, not one of pragmatism as made out by those who argued for this.

Once Pakistan was announced, the Hindu Mahasabha called for 'effective steps to build up a real and powerful Hindu state'.\textsuperscript{79} In the months after independence this demand was raised with greater clamour but firmly opposed. Patel spoke eloquently of how ‘the state must exist for all irrespective of caste and creed’.\textsuperscript{80} Congress leaders knew that a Hindu state would be the real prize for communal forces. This would amount to accepting the two-nation theory, which the Congress had not agreed to even while it saw the creation of Pakistan as unavoidable in the given circumstances. This demand by the Hindu communal forces for a Hindu state was later linked with their call to murder Gandhiji and Nehru who were seen as opposing it.

The relationship between Congress and Hindu communal elements was a complex one.
At an individual level, there were failings but not so in the case of party, state governments, and at the level of the centre. The story was one of the Congress standing its ground and demonstrating resilience and optimism.

The chapters on communalism in the provinces include documents detailing communal ideology as well as communal outbreaks in some selected provinces. Punjab and Bengal, being the 'scene of action', are the provinces which generally receive maximum academic attention. However, the documentation of communalization in provinces other than these two, like Central Provinces and Berar, Madras, and Sindh, shows that communalism was not restricted only to the two provinces partitioned in 1947. Communal ideology, more than rioting, had spread widely across regions and areas of public activity and concern.

For the Muslim League, this year saw a new kind of politics—the 'civil disobedience' movements in Punjab, NWFP, and Assam. Documents pertaining to these movements have been put together as part of the stories of these provinces which were seen as constituents of putative Pakistan and were hence conflict zones.

This agitation saw an organized Muslim League attack on non-communal ministries led by Congress and its allies. These ministries had been formed after the provincial elections of 1946. However, since these areas were seen as parts of future Pakistan, the Muslim League operated with an urgency to assert its political hold over them. This urgency was exacerbated after HMG's 20 February 1947 statement was issued. In this statement, the possibility of multiple successors to British authority was envisaged for the first time. It was stated that HMG would demit power by June 1948 to a central authority if all communities reached a compromise but should that not occur, it would consider transfer of power to provincial authorities.

With its leaders in jail and its anti-government stand, these movements were manifestations of the extent to which Muslim League was able to mobilize its supporters for mass action. As one activist put it, it was an exciting time for Muslim League followers as their leaders were going to jail for the first time. League’s direct action in Punjab and NWFP came as a surprise to many, including Congress leaders, given Jinnah’s pursuit of constitutional methods till mid-1946. Nehru believed the League leaders were far too reactionary, and being landlords, opposed to social change, to dare to indulge in any form of direct action. Sapru, the Liberal statesman, was of the view that Jinnah could not resort to direct action. Jayakar, in turn, quoted Patel that Congress could create more trouble than Jinnah’s 100 mullahs.⁸¹

The ministries which the League movements sought to overthrow or besiege were those of the Unionists-Congress-Akalis in Punjab and Congress in Assam and NWFP. These ‘movements’ symbolized opposition to non-communal groupings and were, therefore, communal movements in terms of their immediate actions, interpretations, and undertones. The rhetoric and sharp opposition to coalition or Congress ministries was expressed in the pro-Muslim League press, for example, Dawn, and it fed into the communal atmosphere of the time.

In Punjab, the ‘civil disobedience movement’ tied in with the communal rioting which started on 4 March 1947, a day after the Coalition Ministry resigned from office. The large-scale rioting rapidly overtook rural and urban areas of the province. The demand for a Muslim League ministry remained unfulfilled since the Governor refused to form a communal ministry amidst widespread communal rioting. Section 93 regime or Governor’s rule was imposed once the caretaker government resigned on 5 March. The attempts to form a ministry on the part of the Muslim League continued without success. After this, Punjab saw continual rioting till it was partitioned. The documents in this section detail the complex environment of political negotiations and widening communal tensions.

In the case of NWFP, to begin with, at stake was the religious status of a girl whose Sikh husband was killed in the Hazara disturbances and who later married a Muslim. When she wished to return to being a Sikh, the League gave the call of Islam in danger. The target of the agitation was the Congress Premier in whose residence she had sought refuge. Pir Sahib of Manki Sharif, the League leader, gave a clarion call to all Muslims to oppose the government. Around March, the Khudai Khidmatgar movement picked up momentum, opposing the agitation of the League. Later they pursued the demand of ‘Pathanistan’ as an option in the referendum. On the other hand, the League’s agitation went on for two months followed by more arrests. The Congress consistently complained against Governor Caroe who was clearly pro-League but to little avail. The League ‘movement’ reached a feverish pitch just before the announcement of the referendum and vitiated the atmosphere completely.

In Assam, the issue of migrants from East Bengal and their settlement had been a matter of dispute since the decade of the 1920s. With the Cabinet Mission scheme of Grouping and Muslim League’s desire to have Assam in Pakistan as a contiguous area of Muslim majority, the provincial Muslim League increased its activity in Assam, riding on the issue of eviction of migrants. It criticized the drive to evict illegal immigrants, mostly Muslim, as communally motivated and blamed the government for the sad plight of immigrants. It had a good following in the districts of Dhubri, Nowgong, and Tezpur, where it could easily mobilize from the large Muslim settlements and also from the neighbouring districts of Bengal. Giving the call for a civil disobedience movement, the method of Leaguers and Muslim National Guards was to publicly intimidate authorities through large gatherings and mass mobilization and deter any official procedure of eviction or arrest of any leader. Patel tried his best to salvage the situation by responding to the frantic call of the Assam Premier for military aid. He also wrote to Wavell in order to place the matter on official record.

The documents relating to these Muslim League agitations have been placed together because of the nature of these struggles. The demonstrations, picketings, processions, public meetings, and mass arrests were weapons borrowed from the Congress armoury. The word ‘civil disobedience’ is a term of self-description used in Muslim League newspapers and by Muslim League leaders for this agitation, again taken from the Congress lexicon.

The direct action or civil disobedience movement in Punjab led to the downfall of the coalition ministry in the midst of and followed by violence. This was the context of the Congress Working Committee’s 8 March resolution. Nehru explained to the Viceroy that if Muslims could not be coerced, non-Muslims could not be coerced too. In the wake of the Rawalpindi riots, by the end of March 1947, the Governor could see clearly that the Sikhs preferred partition of the province to Muslim domination. On 2 April, Central Legislative Assembly members told Nehru that partition was the only solution. On 27 April, Baldev Singh, Defence member in the Interim Government, stated that the only solution was an immediate division of Punjab.

In Bengal, the demand for partition of Bengal emerged from Hindus’ distrust of the Chief Minister after the riots in Calcutta and Noakhali in August and October 1946 respectively. The Viceroy thought that the partition of provinces would reveal the limits of Pakistan and tried to convince Jinnah to this effect. Jinnah, on the other hand, saw the demand for partition of provinces as a bluff by Congress. In his meeting with the Viceroy on 8 April 1947, Jinnah tried to make a case against the partition of these provinces in the name of the inviolability of the cultural unity of Bengalis and Punjabis. Mountbatten’s reply was that Jinnah’s arguments about Bengali and Punjabi culture applied even more to the whole of India and were so convincing that he was all for revising his ideas about the partition of India. This really drove the old gentleman quite mad, in Mountbatten’s words. In the words of the Viceroy, Jinnah demanded his Pakistan be made viable and threatened to demand the partition of Assam.

The situation—as Nehru understood it—was that if Punjab and Bengal do not come into the Constituent Assembly, while some parts of these provinces do, then it implied partition of Punjab and Bengal. This is how Nehru explained the decision of the Congress to demand the partition of the two provinces to Gandhiji. The division of provinces was the only answer to Pakistan as demanded by Jinnah. Later, Nehru quipped to Asaf Ali that obviously the two-nation theory was not meant to be applied in Punjab and Bengal. Actually, Nehru had anticipated the likelihood of a partition of Bengal and Punjab as early as 1945: ‘If Pakistan is given, then parts of Punjab and Bengal, where the Hindu population is in a majority, will join Hindustan and both the Punjab and Bengal will have to be divided.

Opposed to the demand for partition was the campaign for United Bengal, begun by Suhrawardy, the League Chief Minister of Bengal, and supported by the Viceroy. Nehru was against it, as he feared United Bengal would later ally with Pakistan. Patel said it was a trap to entice the naïve into the Muslim League parlour. Sarat Bose, Congress leader from Bengal, was of the view that behind the demand for partition was Hindu Mahasabha support and the sentiments of Hindus against Suhrawardy’s government since the Calcutta riots. Sarat Bose warned Patel that future generations would condemn Congress for supporting division.

Gandhiji was against partition on any account. He, therefore, saw a ray of hope in the United Bengal scheme, as it would question the two-nation theory. When faced with the apprehension of non-Muslims about Muslim domination, Gandhiji demanded that Suhrawardy convince the Hindus of his sincerity. However, this did not happen till August 1947, when Suhrawardy needed Gandhiji more than Gandhiji needed him (to ensure the protection of Calcutta Muslims).\textsuperscript{102}

But the possibility of a united Bengal began to recede when its limits became apparent. K.C. Neogy, Congress member of the Constituent Assembly from Bengal, warned Patel that large sums were being spent to purchase votes for unity.\textsuperscript{103} P.B. Mukherji spoke of legislators being bribed.\textsuperscript{104} For Gandhiji, impure means tainted the end of unity for him. He said at his prayer meeting that he could no longer support United Bengal as it had been brought to his notice that votes were being bought by its proponents.\textsuperscript{105} Another weakness of the independent Bengal scheme was that it was a way of bringing in Pakistan through the backdoor. A letter calling upon ‘Muslim Bengal’ to sacrifice for the cause tellingly referred to United Bengal as Azad Pakistan.\textsuperscript{106}

By the end of May 1947, there was already division within the League in Bengal and the matter was referred to Jinnah who came out against Independent Bengal. On 9 June 1947 All India Muslim League Council accepted the 3rd June plan, which included partition of Bengal, though making it a point to say it was not in favour of the partition of the province but accepted it as part of the plan as a whole.\textsuperscript{107}

The Viceroy’s stance was in the end crucial as he was the one who would include unity or partition of Bengal in the plan being formulated. While the plan sketched on 10 April 1947 included partition of Punjab and Bengal, by 1 May 1947 provinces were first allowed to opt for independence, then a week later for partition. However, when shown these draft proposals, Nehru expressed his apprehensions about likely Balkanization in the proposed schedule of successor states first separating and then coming together. The Viceroy then moved away from providing the option of independence, as he was of the view that if the British fell foul of Congress, it would be impossible to continue to run the country.\textsuperscript{108}

On 20 June 1947, Bengal legislators voted for partition of Bengal, 58 for, 21 against.

Support to demand for partition of provinces by Congress did not prove to be an answer to the demand of Pakistan, as was hoped. Worse, it opened the Congress to the charge of giving in to Hindu communal sentiments. Curzon must be chuckling in his grave, remarked the Bengal Governor to the Viceroy, referring to the Congress opposition to partition in 1905.\textsuperscript{109} Having been proved powerless to change the state of affairs in Bengal, the Congress had no alternative to offer to those who argued that partition was the only solution in the context of a communal League government in Bengal. Gandhiji pointed out the dangers of forsaking the principle of unity, even if only tactically. For him, undivided India had to be upheld without any compromise.

Given the impending departure of the British, the politically sensitive areas were the territories contested by the Muslim League and Congress—namely, Bengal, Punjab, NWFP, and Assam. The situation was very complex and became messier as the momentum towards division gathered pace. Alternative political imaginings were at hand, be they in the form of United Bengal or Pathanistan.

For instance, in NWFP, the Governor claimed that if an election was held, the Congress would win but if a referendum was held, the Muslim League would win. This was because the election was about the issue of governance whereas being part of India or not was a question complicated by the existence of a political strand favouring independence. In the NWFP referendum, a demand for giving three choices—India, Pakistan, Pathanistan—was put forth. Pathanistan was sought to be used as a counter to Pakistan once it became clear that the province could not be part of India. Pathan autonomy and independence in a free Pathanistan as against assured Punjabi domination in Pakistan was the primary demand—an idea which continues to have currency. But the ruling out of the independence option in Bengal precluded its acceptance in NWFP.

Assam’s reaction to the 3 June Plan was complex. There seems to have been general relief at the final rejection of the Cabinet Mission scheme since that would have entailed grouping with Bengal. In Sylhet, the League began to mobilize the Muslim National Guards on the ground that the referendum could not be held fairly under the provincial Congress ministry in Assam. The documents selected in this volume provide accounts of these processes of political mobilization as well as the politics around the referendum. Accounts of protests, counter protests, rigging, and rioting indicate how the referendum was vitiated by communal politics and also ended up reinforcing it.

In Punjab, after the elections of 1946, some amount of negotiations between Akalis and Muslim League had been carried out with a possible coalition in mind. This had been unsuccessful and Akalis joined with Unionists and Congress to form a coalition ministry. The Governor of Punjab, even till late May 1947, was advocating a Muslim–Sikh compromise as the only logical solution to Punjab’s problems. However, the Muslim League agitation against the Ministry alienated the Sikhs and undercut the chances of any settlement. The Sikh demand for a separate non-Muslim province in Punjab became more determined—though doubts beset Akali leaders about their position in a separate non-Muslim Punjab to be demarcated by a boundary commission. Hence, appeals were made to the Viceroy to keep Sikh interests in mind while etching the boundary line and faith was pinned on the sentence in the 3 June statement which declared that factors other than population would also guide the drawing of the boundary. The Sikhs hoped that property, religious places, revenue, and interests in canal colonies would be taken into account in their favour. All this added to the fluidity of the political situation.

The chapter on Boundary Commissions covers the setting up of commissions to demarcate partitioned areas and their mode of operation. The Census of 1941 was taken as the base and population was the criterion for demarcation. The documents span the debate over the unit of territory that was to be taken for demarcation—the village or the thana—and the politics behind it. In the course of demarcation of territory, rivers and shrines were also taken into consideration along with population. The documents carry extensive memoranda from different communities and entities expressing their concerns to the commissions.

The entire operation was both botched and rushed, with the inept handling of the Chairman, Radcliffe, immortalized in the poem 'Partition' by W.H. Auden. Delaying announcement of the Boundary Commission awards to a period after the date of independence compounded the chaos and mayhem as many a village and town did not know which side of the border it was on. People found themselves on the wrong side of the border on 15 August 1947—flags of both India and Pakistan were flown in regions contested by both communities, Muslim and Hindu.

However, the above story of the colonial–national–communal conflict does not exhaust the diverse themes covered by the documents selected in the first two parts of these volumes. The documents also span the themes of the Constituent Assembly, India Independence Bill, minorities, refugees, volunteer bodies, and princely states.

Like independence and partition and other related institutions like the Commonwealth, Constituent Assembly is again not a routine annual occurrence but special to 1947. It came into being only in December 1946, since when it was a bone of contention between the Congress and the Muslim League, with the League dismissing it as unrepresentative and Congress demanding that the League join or else quit the Interim Government. Gandhiji’s perspective was somewhat different from that of his colleagues. In his view, the Constituent Assembly should not function under British auspices; it should be convened when Congress has the strength to convene it for the whole country.

A major issue with regard to the Constituent Assembly was one of representation, a need which was accentuated since it had sovereign powers and functioned as the Legislative Assembly upon transfer of power till new elections could be held and a new government set-up. Secondly, the major concern was the future shape of the Indian polity, to decide which the initial debates and discussions were held in the Assembly. The nature of Centre–state relations in future India was also a much-debated issue in the Assembly, reflecting concern with the autonomy of provinces and the extent of central powers. As a result, diverse groups and communities sought representation in this assembly. This anxiety related to representation is another facet which makes this year different. The imminence of freedom and sovereignty elicited demands for representation and claims to minority or other kinds of special status by many groups and communities. In this sense it can be said that the Constituent Assembly was, in this period at least, a political body and not merely a forum for drawing up of the constitution by experts.

A detailed selection from the debates on fundamental rights has been included in the volume since the issues continue to be of relevance today. For instance, the discussions regarding the right to practise religion as a fundamental right flow from an anxiety to reassure the minorities about the secular credentials of the state. The committees which discussed these issues displayed a fascinating diversity of opinion on the nature and terms of safeguards to be provided for minorities.

The debate on abolition of zamindari in the Constituent Assembly in the volume has been included for the diversity of political and ideological strands which it represents. Abolition was opposed by pointing out the developmental work undertaken by zamindars. At the other end of the spectrum were Nehru and other socialists who had been demanding abolition of zamindari and nationalization for many years as measures necessary to start the economic reconstruction of free India.

If K.M. Panikkar from Bikaner defended the zamindari system, Hasrat Mohani demanded that provinces of free India be made 'republics'—the Constituent Assembly, in the period covered in this volume, appears to have been a political arena wherein the contemporary political issues and political ideologies found expression.

Constituent Assembly debates have been presented unedited to preserve the unity of the documents and to give the reader a sense of the complex process of constitution making. Splitting sessions under thematic heads has been avoided consciously so as to preserve the thread of the debates.

The structure of the committees and sub-committees appointed by the Constituent Assembly must be explained so that the context of the different memoranda may become clear. The Constituent Assembly of India appointed committees to look into matters holding vital importance for the future polity of India. As such, separate committees were appointed to look into the framing of the Constitution for the Union and the provinces, minority rights, fundamental rights, and so on. Committees which dealt with more than one subject, such as the Advisory Committees on Fundamental Rights, Minorities, and others, then appointed sub-committees to go into each individual subject. Thus, a sub-committee on minority rights was appointed to report on the nature of minority safeguards recommended for free India. Each of the committees as well as sub-committees held their meetings and debated these vital issues. In the period which this volume covers, only a few reports were tabled in the Constituent Assembly for discussion, like the Union Constitution Committee’s interim report, the report of the sub-committee on minorities, and so on. All these reports were placed before the Constituent Assembly and were discussed clause by clause, wherein many amendments were suggested and dealt with. The selection of documents presented here is both from the proceedings of the Constituent Assembly as well as from the papers of its committees and sub-committees.

The selected documents point out the concerns of different communities regarding their minority status. It is interesting to note that no one community was a minority—in fact Hindus and Muslims both had a minority status depending on their location. In Bihar the minority community implied Muslims whereas in Punjab, Hindus and Sikhs were the minority.

The chapters on minorities and displaced populations in the volume cover not just religious minorities; recognizing the fluid nature of the term ‘minority’, any group/community that formed the smaller section of the population in an area has been included—such a group may not have been a religious community in every instance.

Furthermore, (religious or other) groups such as Nagas, Jains, Depressed Classes, and Scheduled Castes claimed minority status on demographic grounds—a claim noteworthy because it sought to alter the basis of minority status—from religious to primarily demographic. Different communities and groups, such as Adivasis, Catholics, Gurkhas, claimed minority status keeping in mind different entitlements. This was behind the representations that such groups made before the Constituent Assembly for minority status.

These minority populations were very often also the ones being displaced on account of communal rioting. Refugee camps and other means of rehabilitation were also started in this period which have been documented in these volumes.

Apart from the chapters exclusively on minorities and displaced populations, chapters on communalism in provinces too have documents on this theme.\(^{120}\)

The documents selected for the chapters on volunteer bodies\(^{121}\) detail the growth and expansion of many such organizations affiliated to political parties in Bombay, Sindh, Orissa, Punjab, NWFP, and other provinces. The overall increase in their membership and activity is unmistakable. While, on the one hand, this growth signifies the deepening of communal tendencies, on the other, it also signifies a leaning towards violent methods for political ends. The increase in the membership of Rashtriya Swayamsewak Sangh (RSS) and Muslim League National Guards (MLNG) in this period is linked to the increasing communalization of arenas close to the daily life of people. In Punjab, the involvement of RSS volunteers in refugee rehabilitation increased its popularity. The MLNG were at the forefront of the Muslim League–led ‘civil disobedience’ campaigns in Punjab, NWFP, and Assam. The growth of MLNG led to attempts at formation of Hindu Guards in UP. Similarly, Red Shirts, who operated on a nationalist, not communal platform, were involved in political activities in the NWFP. Most of these developments added to the prevailing communal tensions. The details of the membership and activity of these bodies have primarily come from fortnightly reports from the governments of the provinces.

Selected documents unravel the process of the making of the India Independence Act\(^{122}\) passed by British Parliament of the United Kingdom on 20 July 1947 and the outcome of a consultative process involving the major parties, the Congress and the League. Some of their suggestions were incorporated in the draft. The strategic and military interests of the British, as in the case of Andaman and Nicobar Islands, had to be balanced against the opposition of the Congress to their being British bases. The term ‘independence’ was objected to by Churchill on the ground that power was to be transferred on the basis of dominion status.

The princely states, comprising almost one-third of the area of the subcontinent, were vassal states and were administered through State Agencies and Residents in clusters. Comprising an entire section, the chapters on princely states (Part 2, Section 2) carry a diverse range of documents highlighting primarily how different states became part of the changes happening in provincial British India, whether it be popular peasant agitation, working class movements, communalism, or politics of partition. The documents highlight the movements for responsible government in the princely states, the representation of the princely states in the Constituent Assembly, and accession to the Unions.

\(^{121}\) Part 1, Chapters 10 and 24 and Part 2, Chapter 37.
\(^{122}\) Part 2, Chapter 28.
In the princely states, the movement for responsible government gathered momentum with the imminence of freedom. The peoples’ movements pressed for democratization of their domains. It is in this context that the All India States Peoples Conference (AISPC) sought to consolidate the widespread streams of resistance in the states.

These movements met with stiff resistance from the princes. Some states’ rulers were visionaries and guided their people towards responsible government. But most princes were reactionary and stood as a solid wall blocking the path of political progress. With the paramount power receding, one would have expected the princes to see the writing on the wall. But this was rarely the case. Some even saw the end of paramountcy as a return to pre-paramountcy, that is, to sovereignty, refusing to recognize the altered nature of the reality.123

The issue of representation is another aspect of the political developments in the princely states. Different political groups, be it rulers or people, sought representation in the Constituent Assembly, the forum through which they could participate in the formulation of the future polity. The Chamber of Princes agreed to accept the Cabinet Mission Plan conditionally. However, even this Chamber of Princes did not have all the princes as its members. In fact, the big seven states had kept out, which together were entitled to 38 seats in the Constituent Assembly. The AISPC pointed out this basic flaw and questioned its locus standi as the representative body of princes. Its conditional acceptance of the Cabinet Mission Plan and dillydallying with joining the Constituent Assembly was criticized in the press. Representatives of different states began to raise their demand for greater representation, citing big population, importance of the state, and so on, as reasons. Then, there were also internal dissensions within the Chamber, as many diwans and high officials within the states were looking to the Congress with an eye on appointments abroad.

Representation in the Constituent Assembly culminated in the accession of the princely states to the Unions of India and Pakistan. However, this was not before many of the bigger states like Travancore and Hyderabad tried their best to negotiate their freedom outside both the proposed new dominions and maintain treaty relations on essential subjects with both Britain and the upcoming dominions. Eventually only accession to two unions took place as demanded by the Congress and its stand on the accession of Hyderabad and Travancore was accepted on the whole.

Broadly the chapters map the long and winding road that was taken to bring these states into the Union of India and Pakistan.

With impending freedom, communities of various kinds demanded recognition and representation. This was not only about fighting for loaves as often suggested. Many issues which were kept on the backburner—for instance, class—during the course of the freedom struggle now came to the fore with the end of colonialism. Hence, issues related to caste, labour, or agrarian relations acquired salience. This does not just involve positioning for better or more territory and resources. These issues had been there earlier too but were coming to the fore now, as was the question of zamindari. With British rule ending, the emergence of a new polity involved both fashioning of a new constitution and restructuring old institutions. This was part of the process of political churning which the old and new both had to go through.

The selection of documents in Part 3 also covers a range of issues related to the society and economy, ranging from division of assets and institutions to debates about the form and direction of society, politics, economy, the role of the state, governance, and so on.

The chapter on peasant movements\textsuperscript{124} mostly covers the struggles of peasants and workers which were not against the departing imperialist power, but against feudal landowners and princely despots.

Some of the main movements were the Tebhaga, Telengana, and Warli revolts. The demand of the Tebhaga movement was, quite literally, for two-thirds of the produce, plus storing paddy in the \textit{bargadar’s} (sharecropper) storeroom. The Tebhaga struggle was special because of the participation of women and peasants from both Hindu and Muslim communities. Gandhiji lent support to the movement but warned against use of compulsion and violence. A massive struggle of the Warlis erupted in western India under the banner of the Kisan Sabha and the Communist Party. Warli tribals were caught in the landlord–moneylender–official nexus and suffered forced debt, slavery, and sexual exploitation. In the course of the movement, the Congress ministry was charged by the Communists with being soft on the zamindars, jungle contractors, and other intermediary elements and repressive against the peasants. The repression against the Telengana movement was most severe in Nalagonda in the state of Hyderabad. Martial law lasted for two months and untold miseries were unleashed by police authorities. The Punjab Kisan Morchas were the result of years of work by the Kisan Sabhas among the peasants in resistance to zamindars and communalism in western Punjab. A Kisan Sabha movement was organized in Karnataka in which activists were targeted and extermized as ‘goondas’ by the reserve police and Section 144 was enforced across the state. This is also the period when the Hind Kisan Sabha was formed which aimed for an agrarian revolution.

This chapter carries a cache of documents highlighting lesser-known agrarian conflict between Mirasdars and Adi-Dravidas in Tanjore and \textit{jagirdars’} onslaught on tenants in Patiala.

The chapter on working class movements\textsuperscript{125} focuses largely on wages, working conditions, taxes, and legislation. It carries accounts of workers’ strikes across the country as well as the different raids, arrests, and repressive measures against the Communist Party of India (CPI) and its allied organizations. The CPI presented the string of arrests of Communists as a sort of witch hunt against the party by the Congress. When the question was raised in the Constituent Assembly, Sardar Patel defended government action stating that the searches and arrests were in connection with a case of stolen defence documents and that appropriate procedure was being followed. In contrast to Communist–Congress clashes was a strike in Kanpur where Communist and Congressmen together led the agitation, which is covered by the documents in this selection.

Apart from this, the Communist Party published elaborate comments on other labour issues in the year such as the Industrial Disputes Bill. The All India Trade Union Congress celebrated the 25th year of its formation. In 1947, Sardar Vallabhbhai Patel set up the Indian National Trade Union Congress.

The chapter includes documents which highlight trade union politics embedded in party rivalries. Further, it provides accounts of numerous workers' agitations and formation of unions in various industrial units, including in distant areas.

Nationalism, colonialism, and communalism continued to shape societal developments in the post-independence era. Documents in the category of society in transition have been clubbed under the sections of caste, language, and politics; education and politics; linguistic provinces; religious and social practices; position of women; and cultural expressions.

One of the major movements was against ordering of public spaces along caste lines. A number of temples were opened up to ‘Harijans’ in South India as well as across the country. Most of these temple-entry movements were led by progressive associations from within the Scheduled Caste community. Then, there were others where Congressmen led such movements. The reaction from the upper caste community was mixed. In UP, in some places resolutions were forwarded to the AICC against the temple entry of Harijans. On the other hand, a prominent figure in Maharashtra went on a fast unto death in support of temple entry.

Documents on this theme indicate that the Congress organization and particularly Gandhiji were in correspondence with many of these organizations and movements. Most petitions, letters, and resolutions were copied to the Congress President or the AICC. The Harijan Sevak Sangh had already been active in this area, initiating self-educating and self-supporting institutions, such as community weaving centres. This met with applause as well as criticism from the organizations of Scheduled Castes. Several caste organizations began to work for material improvement in coordination with the government for scholarships, jobs, housing, and so on. There was emphasis on education informed by the Gandhian perspective, which advocated education related to everyday life and to the local economy.

Further, this year saw a major controversy over the national language and the position of Hindi, Urdu, and Hindustani in the new post-independent state. The arena was public spaces such as AIR, public signboards, schools, and so on. While Hindi and Urdu were now seen as languages ‘belonging’ to Hindus and Muslims respectively, Hindustani was preferred as the national language, including by Gandhiji, given the secular character of India and its mixed population. Provincial Congress Committees even adopted Hindustani as their language for correspondence and started preparations for its promotion. However, the conflict between promoters of Hindi and Urdu gradually led to Hindustani taking a backseat. The documents map this crucial debate.

While the debate over the national language assumed some communal overtones, education programmes and establishments too were affected by communalism and partition. The reputed Punjab University, including its famed library, based at Lahore, was partitioned between East and West Punjab. Further, there were battles between colonial, nationalist, and communal positions on this terrain around issues like imparting religious education in schools, use of the Roman script, the position of English language in education, the setting up of a new education system, strikes of primary school teachers in UP and Bengal (specifically in Noakhali), exposure of corruption in education departments, bringing back materials from the India Office in London to India, and the politics of language in literary forms. The last was the predicament of the publishers and editors of Roshni magazine who increasingly received articles in Sanskritised Hindi or Persianised Urdu while their policy was promotion of Hindustani.

Other social issues included removal of illiteracy, eradication of untouchability, abolition of beggary, promotion of inter-caste and inter-community marriages, and promotion of ayurvedic and unani medicine. The battle was on two fronts—to shed colonial elements and promote indigenous practices as well as adopt progressive measures to do away with social ills emanating from economic and social conditions. Hence, there were petitions from women organizations for prohibiting practices of bigamy, allowing divorce for Hindus, prohibiting the practice of devadasis, and enquiring into conditions of working women.

With the coming of freedom and the dissolution of the internal administrative boundaries of the colonial state, the demand for reorganization of states along linguistic lines came up. Linked to this was the demand from linguistic minorities for necessary safeguards. Issues like cow slaughter and religious conversions were raised in the context of the safeguarding of religious and cultural practices. Some of these were consequences of the communalization of society at that time. Documents related to these issues are included.

This selection has a cache of advertisements for theatre and motion pictures and documents that highlight trends of artistic expression in those days, the role of progressive cultural organizations like Indian Peoples' Theatre Association, debates on arts and politics, and the representation of communities in cinema.

The chapter 'Economic Issues and Policies' centres around debates on economic policies and problems of the times. A few months before freedom, all eyes were set on the economic future of India and Pakistan. Like everyone else, industrialists had no choice but to opt for either India or Pakistan. The partition endangered economic assets in both countries and this bred anxieties for those industrialists who were unsettled by it. A number of petitions, resolutions, and letters by these industrialists form a section of this chapter.

Another section is based on the private papers of Indian industrialists which reflect their concerns about nation-building. While Indian business classes predicted a prosperous future for India, Pakistan was perceived with pessimism. A question widely debated was whether Pakistan would be a sustainable self-sufficient economy. Papers relating to this debate are a part of this chapter.

Unlike industrialists, zamindars did not look to the future; they were gripped by their privileged present and its protection. Congress had a firm policy of land reforms at hand. Threatened zamindars wrote a number of letters, passed resolutions, and organized protests against the Congress policy, which are carried in this selection.

On 28 February 1947, Liaquat Ali Khan, then the Finance Minister in the Interim Government, presented the budget statement for 1947-48. The budget speech had mixed reactions. It was believed to have targeted the capitalists, who were seen as supporters of the Congress. Liaquat's speech alleviated the morale of the poor affected by the widespread black-marketing of necessities, inflation, and shortage of food supplies. Congress criticized the budget, while the Muslim League welcomed it. The press congratulated Liaquat for a pro-poor budget while the business community condemned him for being anti-business. Some of the sharply divided discussion on the subject is carried in these documents.

During the War, the British had ushered in a period of ‘controls’ and food rationing. In 1947, the question was whether ‘controls’ would continue. The year 1947 also brought freedom for the Indian ‘rupee’ from the bondage of British ‘sterling’. A number of writings, mostly by economists, deal with the future of Indian currency. A few weeks before independence, Indian and British leadership were caught in difficult negotiations over settlement of the Sterling Balances due to India from Britain. A number of documents pertaining to these talks figure in this collection.

The documents selected in the chapter on Congress reorganisation cover themes such as the future role of Congress; a new constitution for the Congress; factions and indiscipline; Socialists and Congress; and activities of the Congress, such as observance of Independence Day and membership drives.

The primary concern of the party was with its future role. Reorganization had taken a back seat given the involvement of the party in negotiations, in parliamentary work, in the Constituent Assembly and Interim Government, among other things. The Congress organization ended up playing second fiddle to the ‘government’ wing, to the distress of the Congress President. With independence, a change in the form of the party was on the cards to meet the new challenges. It was expected that the party, from being a platform for the anti-colonial movement, would come to represent a distinct ideology and interests. While some saw this as implying the winding up of the grand old party, others, like the General Secretary, Sadik Ali, initiated a debate on the continued relevance of the organization.

The chapter on the provincial ministries highlights the complex position of the Congress as it held office while being a popular organization working for freedom. This dual role threw up a host of issues, ranging from cooperation and rivalry between different levels of the Congress organization to emerging corruption in administration. There are specific episodes which are covered in some detail.

The Congress Committee in Cochin raised the issue of the betterment of wages of workers with the Congress President, asking him to take it up with the Madras Congress ministry. Among the educated public, a lot of people began to approach the provincial ministries through the Congress President, making demands and highlighting areas of neglect, some with a tone of appeal and others with a note of criticism. The Congress Working Committee tried to address these complaints and memoranda received from various concerned members.

The case of the Madras Premier, T. Prakasam, against whom a no-confidence motion was moved is covered by the documents. So is the case from the Central Provinces and Berar where the Congress Premier publicly stated that given the creation of Pakistan, Muslims who remained behind in India would have no political rights or representation in services. His reference to Dr Hasan, one of his Cabinet members, in this context, generated controversy, into which Gandhi was also drawn.

Documents in the section titled Foreign Relations cover themes such as Asian Relations Conference, India’s delegation to the United Nations, its position on the question of South Africa, Indonesia, Palestine, and Afghanistan, and independent diplomatic missions to the newly emerging countries. Despite its colonial past and the traumatic events in the domestic sphere, the debut of India in international politics began with the image of India as an independent nation with a promising future. This selection outlines the trajectory of India's foreign policy as Indian leaders tried to maintain a precarious balance between cooperation and critical ideological distance from the power politics of those times.

The Inter Asian Relations Conference, which was the Congress' way to declare India's arrival as a new nation, was received both with criticism and applause. The Muslim League saw this conference as a ploy in what it perceived as a game by the Congress to wrest independence without addressing the Pakistan movement. Nehru, who was at the forefront of this event in Delhi, was seen to be using his best diplomatic abilities in order to demonstrate to the world that there was no fracture within India and that the idea of India was backed by reality. On the other hand, within Congress, this conference sought to widen the discourse of resistance to colonialism and imperialism to a pan-Asian platform. The pan-Asian platform did show some cracks, however, with India inviting Tibet separately, annoying China, which showed its displeasure.135

Interesting developments occurred in the French and Portuguese colonies in the subcontinent. The French government became very anxious about the future of its territories in India as 15th August was approaching. In turn the people of the territory of Chandernagore, organized by the Socialist Party, demanded that the fate of the territory be left to its people. This view received sympathy from M. Roux, the French Charge D'Affaires, who was seen as a defeatist back home. Subbaiah, the leader of the Socialist Party, had distanced himself from the CPI and gone to Pondicherry to study the feasibility of a possible plebiscite. Subbaiah had ruled out the option of merging with the Indian Union because of repression of Communists by Congress governments. He was now in favour of having an independent state which would maintain its relations with France and Hindustan through treaties.

The chapter on foreign relations also carries documents related to the politics of the lesser-known episodes of decolonization such as in Goa—its Portuguese government, the Catholic Church and its influence on Goans, and their linguistic connections with neighbouring provinces—which were given due consideration by Nehru. The chapter carries his letters to the consul in Goa and his emphasis on Goans having the right to decide their future.

For the armed forces, civil services, and police officials,136 this year began with a lot of anxiety over the uncertainty and delay in getting a political settlement in place. European officials placed in India mostly wanted to return home but could not ascertain what shape their post-retirement careers would take. Officials voiced their difficulties about adapting to the working style of the provincial ministries.

Once the issue of partition and two-nation theory came up, the composition of the services began to be examined in terms of community. It was found that Muslims were heavily represented in the police services. Further, the Muslim League had already clarified that they did not want a unified army, which then set off processes within the military establishment for dealing with this situation. This turned out to be a complicated matter as division on communal lines would mean a very inferior share for the Muslims, a point made to Jinnah by Auchinleck, 136 Part 3, Chapter 51.

Ismay, and the Viceroy as well. This aspect also brought the issue of representation of Muslims in the Indian armed forces to the fore.

In the course of enquiring into the communal violence in the provinces, mainly Bengal and Punjab, communal tendencies within the police services also came under the spotlight. The documents in this chapter cover the deliberations on these issues.

The chapter on the future of the Indian National Army (INA) personnel focuses on the release of the INA détenus who had been put on trial at the end of the War. While there was some resistance from the Commander in Chief and the Viceroy, primarily on the grounds of their brutality towards fellow prisoners, there was a remarkable unanimity across the political spectrum in favour of their release, as evidenced in the resolution of the Constituent Assembly. In the course of this debate, the issue of the employment of INA men in responsible positions in administration such as Deputy Collectors came up. On the eve of independence, the government proposed to release INA men too as part of the general jail release programme to mark 15 August.

The impending birth of Pakistan on the basis of the League’s two-nation theory raised several questions about the nature of its polity. Was Pakistan to be a modern, secular, democratic state, or was it going to eschew the ‘western’ form of political organization in favour of a theocratic one, in which Sharia or Islamic laws would become the basis of governance, law, and politics? Similar questions were also raised about the nature of the Indian nation state. While Hindu communal organizations did step up their demand for a Hindu rashtra in the wake of partition, the Congress dismissed all such notions as antediluvian, communal, and against Indian civilizational ethos. Documents relating to these issues have been included in the chapter ‘Future Visions of the Two States’.

The chapter on the national flag comprises primarily the proposals sent to the AICC and carried in newspapers regarding the composition of the flag. These ranged from a collage of different religious and civilization symbols of the subcontinent to being markedly distinct from national flags of other countries. The focus was on a symbol that could stand for all the stories—the new nation, the uniqueness of India, freedom, sovereignty, and its civilizational legacy.

At the same time, there were proposals for the suitable remodification of the Congress flag and also the assertive demand of the Hindu Mahasabha that the only flag suitable for the country was the bhagwa (saffron) coloured flag bearing the lotus base and yellow swastika. There was a debate over the national flag when the symbol of charkha (spinning wheel) was replaced by chakra (wheel). Savarkar, the Hindu Mahasabha leader, explained that this chakra was the Dharma Chakra, and not Ashoka Chakra, reminiscent of the golden epoch of ‘Hindu’ history. The colour white was seen as the ultimate culmination of VIBGYOR and hence symbolic of purity and most suitable for the backdrop of the flag.
The chapter on the flag includes the documents about the National Flag Committees of India and Pakistan and debates in the Constituent Assembly regarding their composition. Jinnah, who had initially agreed to have the Union Jack on the Pakistan flag, later retracted, saying that it would not be accepted by the people of the country. There was an emphasis on the new flag of Pakistan being appealing to the minorities as well. Eventually, the National Flag of Pakistan was inaugurated in the Pakistan Constituent Assembly wherein Liaquat Ali Khan, the future Prime Minister, claimed that the flag stood for liberty and equality of all citizens in Pakistan.

There was discussion on whether people and organizations that were on the 'wrong side' of the border could salute the flag of their choice or not. The Congress left it to the people to decide but warned that the hoisting of the Pakistan flag by private institutions would be tolerated only in the initial state of transition.

Eventually, the national flag was introduced in the Constituent Assembly of the Indian Union by Nehru and applauded on an unprecedented scale. The tricolour and the chakra on the white background found resonance with the secular imagination of a country embedded in civilizational values as well as modern attributes of liberty, equality, and fraternity. The Hindu Mahasabha resolved to respect all flags but recommended that 'real' Hindus salute only the bhagwa flag and take a pledge to fight for the reunification of India.

As with most events of the year 1947, celebrating 15th August was also very politicized. This volume devotes a chapter to documents wherein different groups and leaders took a stand on the matter, ranging from Congress, Gandhiji, AISPC to Shiromani Akali Dal (SAD) in Punjab. The Hindu Mahasabha declared Independence Day as a day of mourning. Newspapers carried special numbers, with messages from leaders. The midnight session of the Constituent Assembly was held on the night between 14 and 15 August wherein Nehru made his famous ‘tryst with destiny’ speech. The session began with the singing of Vande Mataram and the President’s address. The session met again on the morning of 15 August and received messages of congratulations from countries across the globe. Gandhiji spent the day in Calcutta, fasting and spinning. Political prisoners were released and all major cities held their own public ceremonies to mark the day. Most celebrations on this day acknowledged the reality of partition and passed various resolutions to that effect.

Fifteen August 1947, then, was an occasion for both mourning and celebration. It marked independence and partition, which in turn reflected the success and failure of the anti-colonial movement. Success in wresting independence, failure in not being able to bring the majority of Muslims into the national movement.

The documents indicate that there was much discussion on the programmes for celebrating independence on 15 August 1947. The President of the Congress was of the view that the people of areas affected by partition and the ensuing violence could not be expected to rejoice on the day when their homes and villages would fall away from them. There were, however, others... like Lallan Prasad ‘Insaan’ from Gorakhpur in the UP, who believed that not celebrating the day of hard-earned freedom amounted to a sin. An advocate from NWFP derided the ongoing preparations for celebrating 15 August in the face of widespread devastation and massacres. The various hues in which freedom was visualized become poignantly clear from the documents contained in this chapter. The coexisting experiences of triumph and anguish, the creation of new identities, and the questioning of old ties—the documents in this chapter evoke the multitude of reactions to the dawn of freedom.

A Note on the Organization of the Volume

The organization of the volume is somewhat unusual because the year that it deals with is unlike any other year of the freedom struggle. Nineteen forty-seven was the year of independence and partition. The conflict between communalism, nationalism, and imperialism, culminating in independence and partition, has been dealt with in Parts 1 and 2. In earlier volumes of Towards Freedom, the focus was on nationalist movements and communal politics and peasant and labour movements. Here, these issues pertaining to society, polity, economy, and culture at large, which would occur in any other routine year, have been dealt with in Part 3.

Part I is divided chronologically into two sections, with Section 1 ending on 22 March 1947, the date of arrival of the ‘Last Viceroy’. Section 2 ends on 2 June 1947, after which the countdown to 15 August 1947 is announced by the Mountbatten Award of 3 June. Section 1 is organized thematically under the broad heads of political developments; communalism at the centre and in the provinces; and volunteer organizations, minorities, and refugees. This thematic pattern is repeated in Sections 2 and 3. In Part 2, Section 3 covers significant political developments in the period from 3 June 1947 to 15 August 1947. Following that, Section 4 is dedicated to princely states across the time period.

As regards the structure of the volume, themes, and not political parties, form the structural divisions. This allows one to demonstrate the diversity and complexity of perspectives on a particular issue. So the documents are organized under the head of labour, class, and movement, and within that the role and the position of Congress, Muslim League, and Communists.

The documents selected present the diversity of political opinions on various issues—at the January 1947 session of the AICC, Jayaprakash Narayan and other socialists disagreed with the Congress decision to accept HMG’s 6 December 1946 interpretation of the 16 May 1946 statement of the Cabinet Mission. These reflected the wider differences of political opinion about British policies, nature of British imperialism, and its future intentions.

Another reason for arranging documents theme-wise rather than according to parties is the existence of multiple political parties and formations among Muslims, which a party-wise classification with an attendant focus on the Muslim League would have obscured. Even the Muslim League was not a one-leader party as it is sometimes presented. For example, in Punjab, provincial leadership was a point of contest between Sir Firoz Khan Noon and the Nawab of Mamdot. A letter from Jinnah to Noon about how a certain section of Punjab leaders supported Noon as provincial leader over Mamdot reflects how the party leadership at the national level was aware of internal party differences. Further, at the Bengal end, the divergence between Suhrawardy and Maulana Akram Khan over the former’s sovereign Bengal move also points to the fluidity within the Muslim League. In Punjab, the Ahrars, Khaksars, and Jamiat represented interesting strands in the politics of Punjab—the leader of the Jamiat
Editor's Introduction

even postulated a different political settlement for India. He advocated equal representation for Hindus and Muslims at the centre as a possible basis for all-India compromise. The Red Shirts movement in NWFP was another political organization with a different ideology. When the 3 June statement announced that a referendum would be held in NWFP to decide its future, the Red Shirts demanded Pathanistan as a third choice in the referendum. The turbulent nature of the politics in that area points to the continued conflicts over questions related to representation even today.

As far as the selection of documents goes, they emanate from both official and non-official sources. Official attitudes are reflected by documents selected from sources like the Home Department, its Political Department in particular, selections from Cabinet Papers and India Office Records in National Archives of India, and Mountbatten Papers. Very often these official documents, particularly the fortnightly reports from each province to the centre, are a valuable source of information on the nationalist, communal, and popular movements. Further, selected published official documents, such as from the Transfer of Power series, have been included where they are integrally linked to the story.

A note of caution is in order about taking what Mountbatten said and wrote at face value, without cross-checking with other sources. His megalomania is well known and informs much of his claims to having single-handedly influenced key political decisions such as the fixing of a time limit for British rule. His official correspondence is usually to be preferred over his periodical ‘Personal Reports’ and interviews, the reports being overly subjective and rather rambling and the records of interviews based on his memory (rather than kept by a secretary present in the room as is official practice), and to top it, tempered with an overweening sense of the self.

A wide variety of newspapers like The Hindustan Times, Dawn, People's Age, Amrita Bazar Patrika, among others, represent the non-official point of view. Private papers of institutions and individuals like AICC, AISPC, All India Hindu Mahasabha, Jayaprakash Narayan, S.P. Mookerjee, B.S. Moonje, and others also evince the intricacy of political processes in this period. Further, the numerous instances of individuals voicing their opinions about issues of socio-political and economic importance in their letters and memoranda to various political representatives, institutions, and bodies such as the AICC and the Constituent Assembly illustrate the extent of popular involvement in such matters.

Documents from published collections of primary sources such as Selected Works of Jawaharlal Nehru, Sardar Patel Correspondence, Mohammad Ali Jinnah Papers, Constituent Assembly Debates, and others have also been selected to make the diversity of perspectives available in one place to the reader. For instance, extracts from Wavell’s journal give a day-by-day account of the political developments in early 1947 and also point out the Viceroy’s often incisive reactions and opinions. Documents have been included relating to the extremely significant issues discussed in the Constituent Assembly and its committees, for instance, fundamental rights and constitutional safeguards, which provide insights into the nature of free India.

Some documents translated from a few issues of newspapers in Hindi and Assamese have been included in a limited way as has some material from the state archives of Bengal, Madras, Delhi, Rajasthan, and Punjab.

Wherever possible, conscious preference has been given to newspaper reports over official ones to bring out diversity of opinion in the public domain. Newspapers often throw up delightful letters to the editor, maps of proposed boundary lines, cartoons with acerbic wit, and quaint

Advertisements, such as one for a balm, titled ‘freedom from pain’, evidently inspired by the impending freedom of the country.

In some places only extracts have been taken from documents given the vast number of documents that the year 1947 has thrown up. This would be especially true of the voluminous series of documents like the papers of the major political parties and leaders, proceedings of the Constituent Assembly, and memoranda submitted to the Boundary Commission. Sometimes the documents are damaged or incomplete and can only be carried as an extract. The justification is that the principle behind this selection of documents has been not so much to provide the definitive compendium as a comprehensive guide; to indicate to the discerning reader that such a range of documents exists and point to where they may be accessed. Overall, the attempt has been to balance readability with retaining the originality of the documents as found.\footnote{The text of all documents has been retained as in the original, warts and all, except in the case of obvious typographical errors in original documents. To indicate other errors in the original documents, \textit{sic} has been used. However, in the case of documents from published collections, both original errors and errors noted by the present editor are pointed out by using \textit{sic}. Square brackets have also been used to add missing text. Footnotes in original documents have been selectively included and marked with numerals. In these cases, notes/remarks by the editor have been marked with symbols.}

The outline for Part 1 which follows is organized around some select themes spread across chapters, such as the Constituent Assembly, the Interim Government, the making of the 3 June Plan, communalism, division of the provinces and volunteer organizations, minorities, and refugees.

Outline of Part I

Constituent Assembly: The Objectives Resolution and Demands for Representation

\textit{Chapters 1 and 13}

During the initial months of 1947 the Constituent Assembly witnessed debates on the Objectives Resolution and representation of minorities in the Assembly. The Objectives Resolution moved by Pandit Nehru\footnote{All references in this outline are to Part 1; hence the Part is not mentioned in the footnotes hereafter. Chapter 1, Document No. 2.} garnered widespread approval from all sections of the members in the house. The features of the resolution which were most discussed were those related to safeguarding the minorities and the right to free expression.

Vijaylakshmi Pandit hailed the resolution for addressing socio-economic inequity and cultural recognition and pointed out the deleterious effect of narrow and thoughtless strands of parochialism.\footnote{Chapter 1, Document No. 2.} N.G. Ranga was pleased to note that the resolution gave ample space for people to register dissent within acceptable limits against any law in the country.\footnote{Chapter 1, Document No. 2.} This feature was regarded as quite modern in its specificity because globally at this time, a large number of states were wary of public scrutiny of their governance and clamped down hard on protests.

Jawaharlal Nehru in an important speech made in the Assembly on 22 January underlined the need for a stable constitution as a ‘basis for further work’. He also rebutted criticisms levelled against one of the features of the resolution which argued for popular sovereignty. Terming reservations about such democratic provisions as ‘medievalism’, Nehru cautioned the audience against despotic tendencies, as these could ‘shake the basis of the constitution’. The other major plank on which political debate centred was the political representation of minorities across the country. The elections to the Constituent Assembly, as pointed out by Sardar Patel to J.V. Gohil, President of the Sindh Provincial Nationalist Harijan Party, in a letter dated 13 February, ‘have been made in accordance with the document of May 16 and no alteration can be made’. Subsequent demands made for representation were based not only on the numbers and status of the community but also on perceived fears of being marginalized by the larger community following the ‘Grouping Scheme’ of the Cabinet Mission that held sway. Communities such as the one residing in the Chittagong Hill Tracts, in a letter to Congress President, J.B Kripalani, expressed their deep resentment against the proposal for their merger with the ‘communal’ and ‘deficit’ province of Bengal. Their demand in fact was for a confederate state of their own, aligned with other tribes of the region and corresponded to what was being worked out by the Nagas at this juncture.

Rajkumari Amrit Kaur, member of the Fundamental Rights Sub-Committee on minority issues, in a memorandum dated 20 March, had a different standpoint from the committee’s understanding on securing adequate safeguards for the minorities. Kaur made a strong case for the need to look at the uplift of women—the largest minority. Her exhortation to the minorities for a more proactive role in nation-building was based on her personal and principled stance against excessive dependence on safeguards and measures by the state, as it could in the long run prove divisive.

In a memorandum by R.N. Brahma on behalf of the tribes of Assam, one gets a deeper insight into those demands for representation which went beyond the merely political. The ‘plains tribal’ people of Assam petitioned for inclusion in the Assembly to protect their culture, holdings in land, cultivation, production, and preferential treatment while conducting commerce and trade.

A similar and more nuanced plea came from the Sikhs, who stressed on special economic and socio-cultural safeguards for their community based on their military, agricultural, and financial services to the country which far outweighed those of other major communities in Punjab.

Frank Anthony in a memorandum forwarded in April 1947 stressed on the demand for reservations for Anglo-Indians in schools and the civil services as he considered it was ‘essential for their schools to continue as a distinct entity within the educational system of the country’.

Early Political Developments: The Interim Government

Chapters 2, 3, and 14

The Viceroy, Lord Wavell, on 24 February 1947 set out to write his last ‘periodical letter’ to King George VI, who was at the time touring South Africa. The Viceroy’s letter was against the backdrop of the 6th December statement of the British government which raised political temperatures in the initial winter months of 1947 in Delhi. In India the recommendations of the Cabinet Mission Plan were interpreted by political parties in different and opposed ways. The Cabinet Mission proposed on 16 May 1946, and subsequently on 16 June 1946, two plans which sought to create a semblance of a unified India. Whereas the latter plan hinted at the partition of the subcontinent and was rejected out of hand by the Congress, it found great favour with the Muslim League. The ‘Grouping Scheme’ of the provinces, as the former plan came to be known colloquially, was the proposal around which political discussions revolved for many months.

The statement issued on 6 December 1946 attempted to resolve the conflict that had arisen over the Grouping Scheme by advancing the interpretation that the provinces had to necessarily group themselves into three sections for ‘constitution making purposes’ and could only opt out afterwards. The Congress demand that provinces be allowed to opt out to begin with, rankled the Muslim League which feared that the area that would comprise Pakistan would become too limited.

The statement was held out by the government as an inducement to the Muslim League, in order to get it to join the Constituent Assembly. Jawaharlal Nehru in a speech at the AICC meeting on 5 January 1947 brought forth a resolution recommending the acceptance of the 6th December statement to a party which was deeply divided in its opinion. The Congress Socialists and the Hindu Mahasabha were against acceptance of the statement. Sarat Chandra Bose from Bengal thought that accepting the statement would be an ‘ignoble surrender of rights of Constituent Assembly and end of provincial autonomy’. Congress eventually accepted the statement but urged the need to draft the constitution ‘on as wide an agreement as possible’ and without ‘compulsion of any province or part of a province by another province’.

By this time the Mission’s consciously ambiguous perspective stood exposed. The Congress critique was based on the perspective of regions inhabited by interwoven communities, which made rigid territorial boundaries untenable. However, this position was not accepted by the British and was pilloried by the League.

The most significant voices of dissent to the Grouping Scheme came from Assam in the north-east and Punjab in the north-west. The chief objection of Bordoloi, the Congress leader, to Assam going into the Bengal-Assam section of the Constituent Assembly was that the Constitution ‘would inevitably’ be written by Bengal, and, owing to the latter’s numerical majority, Assam would be unable to opt out from the aforesaid arrangements. Such a scenario would affect a broad spectrum of communities in Assam ranging from caste Hindus to hill tribes, altering their patterns of political representation drastically. Md. Tayabullah of the Assam State Congress joined hands with fellow party men like Bordoloi in denouncing the Grouping Scheme as a way to ‘weaken the Congress’ and declared that no ‘administrative machinery imposed by the British’ would be applicable to Assam.

While accepting the terms of the 6th December statement, Jawaharlal Nehru distanced his party from any ‘compulsion or imposition’ upon the provinces as regards grouping. He highlighted the case of the Sikhs in Punjab, whom he feared, like his countrymen in Assam, would be short-changed in the constitution-making process. Drawing his vocabulary from the Cabinet Mission’s accent on working out an amicable and democratic transfer of power, Nehru merely reminded the British government and the League of the implications of riding roughshod over the rights of communities while drawing up a constitution for provinces, especially if the majority community’s concerns took precedence over those of the minorities. Close on the heels of this remark was the resolution of the Pratinidhi Panthic Board passed on 11 January 1947 which exhorted the Congress to ‘implement the assurances held out to the Sikhs by supporting the Sikh demand for communal veto regarding constitution making’.

This halfway house between summary acceptance and tacit objection to the statement appeared to the Muslim League as indecision or deliberate distortion on the part of the Congress. Maulana Azad, the Congress leader, explaining his view to The Hindustan Times on 27 January 1947, reaffirmed Congress’ commitment to Grouping in consonance with the aspirations of the communities and regions.

The Muslim League characterized the Congress’ views on the statement as ‘a jugglery of words’ in a resolution passed at its meeting in Karachi on 31 January 1947. It withdrew its acceptance of the Cabinet Mission Plan.

With the Muslim League aligned against the Cabinet Mission Plan, the Congress members of the Interim Government demanded the resignation of Muslim League members from it.

The League in turn, from what one gleans from official reports and media reportage of the time, vacillated between reaffirming its ties with the Interim Government or rescinding them. ¹⁸¹

The impasse between the two parties was sought to be broken by Gandhiji—whom Jawaharlal Nehru requested to return to Delhi from East Bengal—with an unusual proposal. In his numerous private conversations with the new Viceroy, Lord Mountbatten, and more formally in a draft agreement with Lord Ismay, Gandhi set out his scheme of giving Jinnah the option of forming the government. If accepted by Jinnah, the Congress ‘would guarantee to co-operate freely and sincerely, so long as all the measures that Mr. Jinnah’s Cabinet bring forward are in the interests of the Indian people as a whole’. ¹⁸² This plan over the course of a few weeks underwent a series of modifications and met with protest and support. Eventually, Gandhiji withdrew the plan, declaring to Lord Mountbatten in a letter of 11 April 1947 his inability to carry forward the plan within the Congress party. ¹⁸³ Congress was apprehensive of such a proposal being interpreted by its political constituency as abdicating its responsibility and that too in favour of a person who had not abjured the politics of hatred. ¹⁸⁴

Exploring Political Alternatives: The Making of the 3rd June Plan

The new year brought a new Viceroy, a new date, and a new policy. At the heart of Lord Wavell’s ‘dismissal’, was what HMG termed a ‘wide divergence of policy’ over the manner in which British colonial withdrawal was to take place. ¹⁸⁵ Mountbatten was approached by HMG to be the new Viceroy and Wavell was asked back home by the Prime Minister to force his resignation—‘Cold, ungracious and indefinite, the letter of a small man’ goes the noting in his journal on Attlee’s letter ‘dismissing’ him. ¹⁸⁶ Lord Wavell, fearing a wave of unrest, had urged his government in Britain to set a fixed date for a phased withdrawal from different regions. Whitehall did not deem it necessary to fix a date for an imminent departure of British forces ¹⁸⁷ but agreed in principle to fix a time limit for their departure. ¹⁸⁸

Notwithstanding HMG’s initial stance of maintaining a close relationship with the Indian leadership to stave off unrest, the proposed policy statement, which was to be made on 20 February 1947 by the British Cabinet on India, was gone ahead without any consultation, with the date for British withdrawal fixed at a date no later than June 1948. This statement came amid deep misgivings expressed by prominent officials at Whitehall, including the Secretary of State, who thought that ‘even though the work of the Constituent Assembly proceeded without further delay, it might well be that by June, 1948 there would be no central government to which power could be transferred’. ¹⁸⁹ The proposed policy statement was a harbinger of the political impasse which would mar the transition in India in the coming months. In India, Evan Jenkins, the Governor of Punjab, which had become a flashpoint of conflict, termed it a ‘break-down statement’. Further, due to an absence of consensus, the provinces at the centre of the storm now faced an uncertain but decidedly violent future with the British washing their hands off them.\footnote{Chapter 4, Document No. 14; also see Chapter 5, Document No. 18.}

The announcement on 20 February 1947 of HMG’s statement on Indian policy fractured whatever political consensus existed. With regard to the princely states that had not been able to align themselves within sections as provided for by the Cabinet Mission, the British government intended to ‘maintain relations with the states by adjustment of agreements’.\footnote{Chapter 5, Document No. 1.} The larger implications of this statement implied that freedom was now virtually at India’s doorstep, but the central question was to whom power was to devolve. The fixing of June 1948 as the cut-off date for British withdrawal made contenders acutely conscious of the power and responsibility that could now come to them. However, political settlement seemed unlikely given the acute disagreement over the Cabinet Mission Plan, the reluctance of certain provinces to go into sections and the League members’ refusal to join the Constituent Assembly.

The imminent departure of the British by June 1948 set in motion a series of developments across political parties to decide upon the kind of government to come up after British withdrawal. The failure of the Cabinet Mission Plan made the British uneasy and this was reflected in the government’s hurry to search for viable models within which power could be transferred. One such model came from the Viceroy, Lord Mountbatten, which envisaged a Muslim-majority Pakistan, a predominantly Hindu Hindustan, and princely states, each of which in turn, becoming ‘forms of Dominions’\footnote{Chapter 15, Document No. 8.} with the centre of power remaining in Delhi and administering reserved subjects such as defence and foreign affairs. Questions were also raised about the creation of Pakistan and the way it would be able to raise, protect, and finance its defence forces to resist ‘Russia and Hindustan at one and the same time’.\footnote{Chapter 15, Document No. 10.}

As the month of March passed, talk of partition gained momentum. Muslim League claimed Pakistan, despite deep doubts over its viability, as a counter to Congress’ demands for devolving power to the Constituent Assembly, a body of which the League was deeply suspicious. Though the Cabinet Mission had failed spectacularly, it ironically provided for sections of provinces which could be surgically excised from ‘Hindustan’ and transformed into ‘Pakistan’.\footnote{Chapter 15, Document Nos 20, 22.} Two plans for transfer of power eventually emerged from this tangle—Plan Union which rested on the now defunct Cabinet Mission Plan, and the ill-named ‘Plan Balkan’ which ensured a truncated Pakistan but hoped for a unified centre until the armed forces were divided.\footnote{Chapter 16, Document No. 3.} A unified centre was pitched for by the British even though conversations increasingly tilted in favour of a ‘Balkanised’ subcontinent.

The absence of any workable political consensus eventually paved the way for a British-backed plan for transfer of power on 3 June 1947 to two ‘dominions’, with princely states entering into independent treaty arrangements with the British. The making of this plan was fraught with enormous political ill-will and cast a shadow on the division of the armed forces.\footnote{Jawaharlal Nehru in a note on the draft proposals of this plan remarked that it ‘threw overboard...} the Cabinet plan...invited balkanization, would provoke civil conflict and demoralize the police and central services'. Nehru’s primary objections were to the fact that power would devolve on ‘consenting’ provinces and peoples. By implication, this left out large Muslim-majority areas which would be free to opt out of the Union, something which the Congress had been against. He also expressed grave doubts over states entering into treaties with the British if they so favoured, as this could jeopardize the territorial integrity of India. Jinnah, when shown the draft announcement, stood his ground on his conception of Pakistan, limiting the possibility of a settlement.

The proposed transfer of power also dealt uneasily with the imminent division of defence forces, the debate on the division of Punjab and Bengal and finally the demand to connect the resulting ‘truncated’ Pakistan by means of an east–west land corridor traversing India.

As for the division of the provinces of Punjab and Bengal, various actors within the Congress and the League and the Viceroy took positions on the question from different vantage points. There was the voice of Gandhiji, who opposed any division prior to British withdrawal. Rajkumari Amrit Kaur, member of the Interim Government, seconded Gandhiji’s views by reiterating the demand for the preservation of the unity of Punjab. An impassioned plea on behalf of the Sikhs was made by Baldev Singh, member of the Interim Government, to Lord Mountbatten on the eve of the 3rd June declaration, which sought safeguards and special privileges that would protect his community from the ‘danger of being riven into two’. In the case of Bengal, the Viceroy, H.S. Suhrawardy, K.S. Roy and Sarat Bose were against the partition of the province and in favour of united Bengal; Jinnah wanted the whole of Bengal to come to Pakistan; Patel doubted the sincerity of the proposal for a united Bengal, and given the ground reality, Nehru was not hopeful about the prospects of undivided Bengal or the Punjab.

Beginning with Calcutta in August 1946, the months leading up to the partition of India saw the worst kind of communal rioting the subcontinent has ever witnessed. This continuing conflict was compounded by the repercussions of the political decisions made in New Delhi and provincial capitals. Communal violence spread like a prairie fire, wreaking havoc in Calcutta, Bihar, Rawalpindi, and of course Noakhali, remembered today chiefly for Mahatma Gandhi’s visit there which brought a healing touch to a devastated region and its people. The Hindu Mahasabha in its session at Gorakhpur in December 1946 and later in a Working Committee meeting in February 1947 called for ‘a constructive programme with a view to canalize the energies of the vast concourse of the assembled Hindus into a fruitful channel’, advocating ‘shuddhi’ or re-conversion into Hinduism, seeking revenge for attacks on Hindus in Bihar, Noakhali, and so on, and opposing residuary powers being given to the provinces. The position of the Mahasabha, which chose to ignore its own contribution to the communal situation, was pitted against that of the Muslim League whose propaganda in the provinces in the wake of its so-called civil disobedience movement rolled over into widespread violence.

Jawaharlal Nehru’s inaugural address to the UP Political Conference at Mau on 20 April 1947 illuminated the harmful effects of communalism and the need to secure the economic structure of the Union in an atmosphere of peace and harmony.

Communalism in the Provinces

Chapters 7, 8, 18, and 19

The Muslim League called for a mass ‘civil disobedience movement’ (a term self-consciously borrowed from the Congress repertoire) in the context of the ban on volunteer bodies by the Punjab government in an attempt to control communal frenzy. On 24 January 1947, the Punjab ministry declared unlawful (under the Criminal Law [Amendment] Act of 1908) the ‘private volunteer bodies’ of both the Muslim League and the RSS. The reactions were sharp and swift. The League’s protest took a communal slant. High ranking leaders of the League also courted arrest as they ‘interpreted the declaration in respect of Muslim League National Guards as an attack upon the Muslim League as a political In

In the ensuing conflict between the government and the League, the former eventually decided to withdraw its order on the volunteer bodies four days after it had issued it and released the detenus to show its keenness in securing a truce with the League.

It was nearly a month after the League’s widespread agitation and the arrests of its leaders that a ‘compromise’ between the League and the Punjab government was sought to be negotiated. Talks took place for the withdrawal by the government of the ban imposed on public and civil liberties, specifically the release of political prisoners and the restoration of the right to hold public meetings. The movement was finally called off when the agreement was signed between the two sides based on the above conditions; the ban on processions was, however, not lifted.

Punjab politics got a further jolt when the coalition ministry in Punjab, with Khizar Hayat Khan Tiwana of the Unionist Party as its premier, resigned on 3 March 1947. Tiwana cited the necessity of having in place a fully representative ministry when the British left, a prospect currently not in sight with the Muslim League against them.\textsuperscript{218} The resignation set off a process of further tangling the complex political scenario in the Punjab. Negotiations were carried on to get the Muslim League to form the government\textsuperscript{219} amidst opposition from sections of Sikhs and Hindus.\textsuperscript{220} It was in the context of the League’s extra-constitutional assault on a duly elected ministry that the demand for partition of the province by the Hindu and Sikh minorities gathered momentum.

A section of Hindu–Sikh opinion, as reported by the Punjab Governor, Jenkins, in a telegram to Lord Wavell\textsuperscript{221} in turn had their own ambitious agenda to arm their private militias. Sections of Sikh opinion also favoured a separate state with a sizeable majority of their own men to defy both the Muslim League’s ‘Pakistan campaign’ and the Congress’ indifference to their plight.\textsuperscript{222} However, Sikh Scheduled Caste leaders like Sardar Hari Singh Nirbhay were aligned with the Muslim League’s agitation and politics, primarily because they thought that an ‘akhand Hindustan’ would sound the death-knell for communities like the Mazhabi Sikhs and other minorities.\textsuperscript{223} A deputation of Harijans from Punjab, however, supported the demand for division of Punjab.\textsuperscript{224}

The League’s Assam agitation bore a striking resemblance to the actions carried out in Punjab and NWFP in terms of the propaganda against the ruling government. However, the issues which the League took up here were largely socio-economic. At the heart of the so-called civil disobedience movement was the issue of the labourers from Bengal (majority of them being Muslims) who occupied large swathes of grazing and cultivable lands and now faced imminent eviction from the Assam valley under orders from the government.\textsuperscript{225}

Accounts of communal disturbances in Bengal in 1947 have focussed on the happenings at Calcutta, Noakhali, and Tippera. The range and the causes of violence in Bengal were manifold. Starting from minor skirmishes and clashes around religious processions, it transformed into violent killings and looting in cities like Calcutta, Rajshahi, and Dacca and was especially directed against women, leading the Legislative Assembly on 5 March 1947 to call for action against the rioters.\textsuperscript{226} In the midst of this communal disorder, talk of dividing the province into Hindu- and Muslim-majority areas started gaining ground, and more so among the minorities distrustful of the government.\textsuperscript{227} A characteristic feature of the communal frenzy in Bengal was the attacks on the police forces, where Gurkha policemen were attacked by Muslims and Hindus targeted Punjabi Muslim policemen believed to have been brought in by Suhrawardy to Calcutta.\textsuperscript{228}

Bihar was at the centre of communal carnage in the months of October–November 1946. Political debate revolved around the issues of rehabilitation of victims and the restoration of normalcy in the region, over which the opposition in the Bihar assembly eventually moved a no-confidence motion against the ministry. League leaders demanded the institution of comprehensive land allotment programmes which could reinstate confidence among Muslims in the Congress ministry. Calls for the division of the province on religious lines also started to gain an audience. The impact of Gandhiji’s presence in the province was tremendous, bringing as he did an element of introspection to the Congress fold to check elements of communalism in society and in politics. Gandhi’s presence, coming as it did three decades after his Champaran campaign (which relieved Hindu and Muslim peasants of their oppressive colonial revenue burdens) made his call for communal harmony especially resonant in Bihar.

The political salience of the capital city of Delhi did not help matters much for its residents during early 1947 as far as communal relations were concerned. The resignation of the Punjab ministry and events in Noakhali, Bihar, and the NWFP had a direct influence over the capital. The communal situation in Delhi continued to worsen, making it difficult to discern ‘political events from the communal’ and much thought went into avoiding the politicization of government servants.

The heartland, termed in colonial parlance the ‘United Provinces of Agra and Oudh’, was not untarnished either. Large scale rioting started in November 1946 with the Garhmukteshwar riots, whose impact was widespread. In an attempt to control the situation, a particularly harsh piece of legislation called the UP Maintenance of Public Order Bill came to be tabled, for which the Ministry was charged with repressing the conflict instead of redressing the underlying issues. The communal situation in UP was sought to be controlled by measures such as the establishment and strengthening of the ‘peace committees’ and Home Guards contingents and the constitution of police forces in consonance with the diverse social composition of its population. Sindh grappled with the exodus of its minority Hindu populace along with Parsis and Christians during the tense months of 1947 with grievous economic consequences for the province.

The case for a ‘Sikh–Hindu’ majority province in the Punjab gained ground in the context of the Cabinet Mission Plan’s recommendations which placed Punjab in the section dominated by the Muslim League. The Sikhs were acutely conscious of the political, social, and economic ramifications of this move, and their community was the first to campaign for a separate province for themselves. The initiative came from Gyani Kartar Singh, a Member of Legislative Assembly (MLA) in the Constituent Assembly, who resented the fact that ‘map-makers conveniently ignored the presence of Sikhs and Hindus in the central, eastern and southern Punjab’ which comprised the divisions of Ambala and Jullundur (now Jalandhar), and districts of Amritsar, Gurdaspur, and Lahore. Besides campaigning for an autonomous province, Sardar Ujjal Singh, a close colleague of Gyani Kartar Singh in the Constituent Assembly, also advanced the demand for ‘full Sikh representation in the Minority Advisory Committees’ which were being constituted under the aegis of the Assembly to ensure safeguards for the Sikh community.

The demand for the partition of Punjab and the opposition to it led to the situation spiralling out of hand. Delivering a quick rebuttal to the Congress’ resolution which called for the division of Punjab in the event of the division of the country and the concurrent Sikh claims, the League leader Firoz Khan Noon pointed out that the Congress decision to divide Punjab did not address the concerns of the Sikhs, given that state enterprises, riverine systems, Sikh shrines, and significant enclaves of Sikhs in Western Punjab were not taken into account. The Muslim League contended that the avowed aim of the Congress to divide the province was intended only to subsume eastern Punjab and make it a part of ‘Akhand Hindustan’. The only viable alternative according to the Muslim League was to have Punjab in a sectional grouping, but with enough safeguards for the Sikhs on grounds of religion, political representation, language, and employment.

Central to the problem of assigning districts to India or Pakistan was the issue of determining which community was in a majority in the district. Though a section of the Sikhs felt very strongly about an autonomous province for their people, a ‘predominantly Sikh or Muslim or Hindu’ district remained only in the realm of speculation. Demographic analyses of districts like Ferozepur, Gurdaspur, and Amritsar reflected wafer-thin majorities of either Muslims or Hindus with Sikhs being in a majority only in a few tehsils. This maze of communities in Punjab made any talk of division along religious lines complicated and fraught with grave communal repercussions. Then there was also the question of the Jats whose support to the Sikhs in the division of Punjab was sometimes doubted, as by the Governor of Punjab, who thought Jats might not be willing to be ‘included in the Sikh state’.

The debate over Punjab’s partition was also tied to economic questions. This was clearly reflected in the resolution passed by the Working Committee of the SAD on 16 April 1947 in which it listed ‘landed property’ as one of the four terms of reference which should be used to demarcate the provincial boundaries. This concern also surfaced in a memorandum submitted by Punjab representatives in the Constituent Assembly to Lord Ismay on 1 May 1947 which stated that the justification for the claim to almost half of the Punjab province by non-Muslims lay in the fact that ‘more than 50% of the urban and rural property in the province’ lay in the latter’s hands. Master Tara Singh made a case for partition on the basis of the property held by Muslims and non-Muslims, as ‘an exchange of population implied exchange of property as well’. However, the League leader Khan Iftekhar Hussain Khan of Mamdot attacked Master Tara Singh for taking a position which went against the ‘universally accepted principle of partition on basis of population’ and asserted that the ‘Sikhs had now started assessing the disastrous consequences accruing to their community from a division of the Punjab’ since they would not only ‘pass under the perpetual domination of the Hindu majority in eastern Punjab but shall also lose all their economic stake in the west’.\footnote{Chapter 20, Document No. 25.}

In the midst of increasing communal violence, with no political compromise imminent, the Congress under pressure to stake its claim assertively,\footnote{Chapter 20, Document No. 29.} the Arya Samaj pitched its case in the ongoing debate. The carefully worded petition implicitly exhorted the government to take into consideration their shrines, socio-cultural associations, their ‘holy city’ (Lahore), and their ‘holy land of Punjab’ while drawing boundaries across the province.\footnote{Chapter 20, Document No. 31.}

The political fight over the partition of Bengal can perhaps be best comprehended through a ‘gallup poll’ which the nationalist paper \textit{Amrit Bazar Patrika} carried out among its readers on 23 March 1947. Asking if readers wanted a division of Bengal or not, the newspaper requested responses in the definite forms of ‘only yes’ or ‘only no’.\footnote{Chapter 21, Document No. 1.} This opinion exercise was symptomatic of the deeper undercurrents of animosity and resentment which flowed in Bengal at this time with political parties and various sections of the population aligned to different visions of Bengal—united, divided along religious lines, united but autonomous, or united but sovereign.

The plan for United Bengal, proposed by Suhrawardy and supported by Sarat Bose and K.S. Roy, with limited or no links with any form of a central Union (which could either have been Pakistan or India or both) was vehemently opposed by the Congress and certain other quasi-political organizations which wanted a partition of Bengal into Hindu-majority regions (west) which were linked to a central Union and a Muslim-majority region (east) which could forge links in any way it wanted. The Congress favoured partition in order to protect the rights of the Hindus (over which an independent Bengal could ride roughshod with its Muslim majority and do away with the instruments of joint electorates, universal adult franchise, and other minority safeguards).\footnote{Chapter 21, Document No. 56.}

Certain other political and professional organizations also supported the partition of Bengal, chief among them being the Hindu Mahasabha, whose leader S.P. Mookerjee urged the Congress to take a more assertive stand against the League’s attempt to carve out an independent Bengal.\footnote{Chapter 21, Document No. 25.} The Socialist Party, in the words of its leader Dr Rammanohar Lohia, called for an agitation for ‘realizing two simple demands of democracy, land to the tiller and basic wage to the labourer’ to fulfill the emotional need that gave rise to the demand for Pakistan and Hindu homelands.\footnote{Chapter 9 (B), Document Nos 2, 6, 8, 9.} The Jatiya Banga Sangathan Samiti,\footnote{Chapter 9 (B), Document No. 12.} the Indian Association,\footnote{Chapter 9 (B), Document No. 7.} and the Bengali National Chamber of Commerce\footnote{Chapter 21, Document No. 56.} were some of the organizations which raised the pitch for a separate non-Muslim province of Bengal on economic, commercial, and administrative grounds. It is pertinent to point out that significant sections of the middle-classes involving lawyers, students, merchants, and so on, in Bengal advocated partition at this time.

Sections of Scheduled Castes and other Backward Castes expressed their opinions on the issue of partition. The contending parties fielded their own representatives to canvass their political agendas. While the Muslim League fielded the leader of the Scheduled Castes, J.N. Mandal, Law Member of the Interim Government, to assert that 'majority of non-Muslims were opposed to the division of Bengal'^256 as a counter to Congress arguments, the Congress fielded the Depressed Class leader P.R. Thakur to 'repudiate the contention of Mandal' and stated that a 'sovereign Bengal would mean perpetual communal strife'^257.

The conflict over Bengal revolved around another axis—the status of the city of Calcutta. This would not have been a major issue had Calcutta not been a wealthy port city and a bustling centre for trade and commerce, which served the whole of Bengal province. Calcutta was indeed the nerve centre of Bengal, but with voices clamouring for partition, a decision on the city could not be postponed. Lord Mountbatten had reservations against granting Calcutta the status of a ‘free city’ because it might not help in placating either of the two communities.^258 Some in the government held out the Calcutta issue as an ‘important bargaining point in inducing the League to accept a truncated Pakistan in Bengal’.^259 In a memorandum released from its district office in Calcutta on 31 May 1947, the Muslim League asserted its right over the city on the basis of the preponderance of Muslims in marine and riverine activities, ranging from navigation to logistics.^260

With battles for political control going on in the provinces of Punjab and Bengal, it was hardly possible that their neighbouring regions would not get involved in them. The NWFP under the leadership of the ‘Khan brothers’ had always presented a formidable challenge to overarching imperialist governing arrangements. With the departure of the British now imminent, the NWFP became conscious of its own future status and relationship with India or else Pakistan and sought to enter into agreements with them while keeping the option of a sovereign ‘Pathanistan’ open.^261 An important part of these agreements was the issue of a referendum which became a major bone of contention. The Muslim League pressed for the imposition of Section 93 and the carrying out of a referendum;^262 however, the Congress was against it primarily because there was a certain amount of dissent on the issue, not only within the Congress, but also within the NWFP government. Jawaharlal Nehru, in a letter to Lord Mountbatten dated 10 May 1947, reinforced his commitment to the idea that the ‘will of the people of the Frontier Province should be consulted before final decisions in regard to the position of the province are taken. But it is very important when this is done and in what context’^263. Similar debates took place over the position of Sylhet with rival claimants on either sides of the political fence.^264

Editor's Introduction

Volunteer Organizations, Minorities, and Refugees

Chapters 10, 11, 12, 23, and 24

The importance of volunteer organizations which sprang up in different parts of the subcontinent and were often affiliated to various political organizations can be gauged from the amount of time and energy which the provincial and central governments devoted towards monitoring them. The ban on these organizations in Punjab (the private volunteer bodies of Muslim League and the RSS) was one of the reasons which led the Muslim League to start off the so-called civil disobedience movement. Being continuously under the scanner of governments, accusations of being communal were often levelled against these volunteer bodies.

One of the most under-represented actors on the stage of partition politics were the different minorities inhabiting the country. These included Buddhists, Anglo-Indians, Scheduled Castes, and Gurkhas, among others. Whereas a section of these minorities rallied around the existing political groups of the time, certain others like the All India Scheduled Castes Federation under the leadership of Dr Ambedkar steered clear of any political affiliation, and denounced the Congress as ‘an interloper to disrupt the strength and solidarity of the organisation’. Scheduled Castes were witness to an immense wave of politicization. A section of the community led by J.N. Mandal and L. Lobo campaigned to unite them with the politics of the League, while eight Harijan MLAs in the Punjab Assembly talked of the false propaganda which was nurturing the myth that Harijans were all set to join the League.

The displacement of millions as a result of partition did not take cognizance of categories like Harijans, Scheduled Castes, or Anglo-Indians; all were part of large masses of people traversing large distances and facing extreme violence. The exodus of those people who came to be called ‘refugees’ began months before the actual partition of the subcontinent came into effect. The relief and rehabilitation measures were phenomenal, not only because they were put into effect over large swathes of land, but also because they were implemented in a context of limited resources and budgets. A large portion of rehabilitation comprised compensation to riot victims. Relief measures also had to be extended to people migrating from one province to another or when a section of the population had to be evacuated, as in Punjab’s Jhelum district and in the case of Bihar refugees migrating to Sindh. At the same time relief camps were set up and massive rehabilitation plans put in place to induce people to come back to places which they had left in terror. ‘Economic’ resettlement of refugees was a complex affair. Changes in demography, terrain, and occupational structures dictated these measures and were behind the labels of ‘usefulness’ of certain refugees while others were left to fend for themselves. Sindh was a particular case in point, where Mohammad Yunus of the Central Relief Committee, responded to queries about the prospects of the rehabilitation of Bihar Muslims by saying that on no account should the latter go to Sindh.

The relief funds being used to deliver services to the refugees also came under controversy. Jawaharlal Nehru, in a letter dated 14 April 1947, reiterated that relief work was humanitarian work which lost all virtue if it was under ‘communal garb’.\(^{274}\) The position of abducted women and their recovery was perhaps the most tragic and haunting aspect of the communal situation. It was suggested by Firoz Khan Noon, in an interview with the Punjab Governor, Evan Jenkins, on 24 March 1947, that granting an ‘amnesty’ would perhaps ‘accelerate the recovery of abducted non-Muslim women’ while in Bihar, the Premier publicly stated that those who returned women within a stipulated time period would be seen as their protectors.\(^{275}\) The issue of abducted women and their recovery caused much distress, and women were located and relocated to their parental or marital homes with very mixed consequences for themselves and their families.

First of all I would like to thank the distinguished editorial board of the Towards Freedom series, a flagship project of the Indian Council of Historical Research, who invited me to edit the volume on 1947 upon the untimely death of the eminent historian, Ravinder Kumar. I was particularly gratified to be invited to be the editor as my research supervisor and teacher at Jawaharlal Nehru University, Sarvepalli Gopal, had been the founder and first General Editor of the series. The task before me was not an easy one, as Sarvepalli Gopal, Partha Sarathi Gupta, and Basudev Chatterjee had set exacting standards as editors. Ravinder Kumar, assisted by Gyanesh Kudaisya and others, had done some preliminary work, which I gratefully acknowledge, but most of the work remained to be done. Sabyasachi Bhattacharya as the General Editor, and Arjun Dev as the Coordinator, extended total support in a variety of ways over the years, for which I wish to record my appreciation. At ICHR, the Chairman, Basudev Chatterjee, Member Secretary, Ishrat Alam, and earlier, Prabhat Shukla, were always there to take care of the administrative concerns.

There was a race against time as the editorial board kept the ship aloft in the face of uninformed politically motivated criticism when the government of the day put two volumes on hold, possibly because it was not convenient for the record of certain political forces to appear as it was, warts and all. If I ended up devoting six years to assist India towards freedom, in a manner of speaking, it was only because being on the freedom movement trail has become a way of life. Inspired by Bipan Chandra, our much loved teacher, some of us had joined him many summers ago in recording the oral histories of activists of the freedom movement. This was followed by co-authoring India’s Struggle for Independence, which is now in its fifty-fifth edition. It was at his instance that I accepted the editorship of this volume at a time when I seemed to be done with 1947, having spent two decades in that time zone. Any value the reader finds in this work is because of the intellectual rigour and passion for the study of this period of history I have absorbed from him.

After Bipan Chandra, I would like to acknowledge the support of Mridula and Aditya Mukherjee, D.N. Gupta, Visalakshi Menon, Antony Thomas, Salil Misra, Gyanesh Kudaisya, Rakesh Batabyal, Chandi Nanda, Pritish Acharya, among others, all his students who have developed a wonderfully mutually supportive group.

The vibrant intellectual environment of the Centre for Historical Studies, JNU, has sustained me through the years. My colleagues in the modern India section and on the editorial board of Studies in History were considerate in recognizing my preoccupation with the Towards Freedom volumes. My research students responded to my cri de cœur for help, be it to translate from Assamese or run to Teen Murti to check a document or decide whether to keep the report from the Amrita Bazar Patrika or the Hindustan Standard (I thought both were indispensable).
Acknowledgements

It was my good fortune that Ashish Koul took a year off from research, just when I began work on the volumes. I could not have wished for a better assistant, indeed partner, who assumed research and editorial duties with equal ease and efficiency. She was a hard taskmaster too, reminding me of my editorial responsibilities when I got immersed in teaching or supervising my research students. Quiet, determined, she would stand at the door of my office, till I joined her for the rest of the day, to plan a volume or decide on an editorial input.

Ashish was assisted by Saumya Dey, Ranjana Saha, Surbhi Mahajan, Gurveen Khurana, Lakhimi Datta and Rachna Mehra. Later Christhu Doss was the sheet anchor, assisted by R. Vineeth among others. Christhu Doss was diligent, enlivened the office with his genial presence and generously plied the team with cakes and coffee, especially when we were working late.

Saurabh Bajpai and Subir Dey were invaluable in the crucial last stages of preparing the manuscript. Their organizational skills were appreciable and they did everything from crosschecking sources and locating incomplete documents to dealing with overworked typists and assisting me in pruning an oversize manuscript to size. Further, Subir and Radha saw the manuscript through press. Vipul Dutta assisted ably with preparing an outline.

Arpita Mitra was unfailing in responding to calls for assistance, be it to summarise a chapter, check typed copy, proofread or vet editorial inputs. She did all this without ever holding an appointment as a research assistant, which makes her contribution doubly valuable. Grishma Rana, too, readily pitched in, as did Akanksha Kumar, Tanu Parashar, Radha Kapuria, Gaganpreet Singh, Elizabeth Joseph, Sangeeta, P. Satheesh and Zaheda Tarannum. Binayak Kumar Datta sent references pertaining to Sylhet. I wish to record my appreciation of their inputs and those of any I may have missed out inadvertently.

In the few cases documents in different Indian languages where have been included, translations have been done by my students. Rahul Kumar Ishwar translated from Hindi, Lakhimi Datta consulted copies of Axomiya and translated passages from Assamese and Shweta Shetty translated a document from Marathi.

I wish to thank the directors of the National Archives of India, Nehru Memorial Museum and Library, Delhi State Archives, West Bengal State Archives, Punjab State Archives, Rajasthan State Archives and P.C. Joshi Archives of Contemporary History, JNU, for permitting us to consult and reproduce documents from their holdings. Mridula Mukheijee facilitated our research greatly when she was Director of Nehru Memorial Museum and Library. Gopa of the manuscript section of the Nehru Memorial Library helped check references and locate files. One could turn to Jaya Menon in the National Archives of India for help at any time. The staff of the PC Joshi Archives of Contemporary History in JNU were a great help in tapping its rich resources. The Archives also provided a temporary workplace during the years I was Chairperson.

The team of typists, led by Shahjahan, deserve appreciation as they had an unenviable task of deciphering copies of faded newsprint made on antiquated photocopiers.

Thanks go out to the editorial team of Oxford University Press who brought to bear to the volume their vast experience of publishing the Towards Freedom series.

As always, my family, especially Bodh, Mridula, and Aditya, provided invaluable help, having to double up as editorial consultants and sounding boards. Bodh brought to the manuscript his expertise on the subject of partition narratives. Mridula and Aditya, with the keen eye of the historian and shared passion for the subject, reminded me of the broader picture of a hard won freedom when it seemed I could not see beyond the minutiae of the local communal riot. When I was invited to be editor of the volume on 1947, the General Editor of the series estimated the work would take me six months. It has devoured sabbaticals, leave, vacations, and hours after office and weekends for over six years. At such times, my children, Varun and Srikant, were a much needed reality check, reminding me that there was life beyond 1947. Perhaps I so easily seemed to live in 1947 because the big story of 1947, the subject of this volume, intersected with the small tale of 1947 of my parents, Vidya Dhar and Savitri, who, like countless displaced persons, crossed the newly etched boundaries to start new lives in a refugee colony in Delhi. As a child I remember that the reference point in many a conversation was 1947. In a sense working on this volume on 1947 was only a continuation of the family tale. It is a small tribute to my parents.

Chapter 1. Constituent Assembly

1. Rajendra Prasad Denies Allegations That Constituent Assembly Is Not Representative

Statement in the Constituent Assembly Session, 20 January 1947

The Constituent Assembly of India met in the Constitution Hall, New Delhi, at Eleven of the Clock, Mr President (The Hon’ble Dr Rajendra Prasad) in the Chair.

Presentation of Credentials and Signing of the Register
The following members presented their credentials and signed the Register.

1. Dr H.C. Mookheijee
2. Shri Balkrishna Sharma

Statement by President Re: Allegations in Parliament about the Representative Character of the Constituent Assembly

Mr President: Before we begin, I should like to make two statements in connection with certain matters.

In the course of the debates on India in the House of Commons and in the House of Lords in December last, certain statements were made detracting from the representative character of this Assembly during its last session. Notable among those who spoke in this strain were Mr Churchill and Viscount Simon. Mr Churchill observed that the Assembly, as it was meeting then, represented ‘only one major community in India’. Viscount Simon was more specific and referred to the Assembly as ‘a body of Hindus’. He went on further to ask ‘whether this meeting of Caste Hindus at Delhi can be regarded by the Government as the Constituent Assembly they meant at all’.

Both these gentlemen have held the highest offices of responsibility and have had a long and intimate connection with the affairs of India; and whatever may be their views on current political controversies, they would not, I am sure, like to make statements which are wholly contrary to facts and lead to mischievous inferences. It is for this reason that I have considered it necessary on this occasion formally to state the facts. Out of a total of 926 Members who were to take part in the preliminary session, 210 Members attended. These 210 Members consisted of 155 Hindus out of a total of 160, 30 Scheduled Caste representatives out of a total of 33, all the 5 Sikhs, 5 Indian Christians out of a total of 7, all the 5 representatives of Backward Tribes, all 3 Anglo-Indians, all 3 Parsis and 4 Muslims out of 80. The significant absence is of course that of the representatives of the Muslim League—an absence which we all deeply regret. But it is clear from the figures I have quoted that, with the exception of representatives of the Muslim League, every community in India, whatever the party affiliation of the persons representing that community, was represented in the Assembly; and, therefore, to describe the Assembly as representing 'only one major community in India' or as 'a body of Hindus' or as a 'meeting of Caste Hindus' is a complete travesty of facts. (Cheers)

2. Discussions on the Objectives Resolution

Extracts from Discussion in the Constituent Assembly, 20 January 1947

Mr President: We will now take up the discussion of the Resolution moved during the last session by the Hon'ble Pandit Jawaharlal Nehru.

Sir S. Radhakrishnan (United Provinces: General): Mr Chairman, Sir, I have great pleasure in commending this Resolution to the acceptance of the House. From the list of amendments tabled, I see that there are three different questions raised: whether a declaration of this character is essential; whether this is the proper time for considering such a declaration; and thirdly, whether the objectives included in this Resolution are matters of general agreement or they require modification or Amendment.

I believe that such a declaration is essential. There are people who are suspicious, who are wavering, who are hostile, who look upon the work of this Constituent Assembly with considerable misgivings. There are people who affirm that, within the Cabinet Plan, it will not be possible for us to effect either real unity in the country or true freedom or economic security. They tell us that they have seen before squirrels move round in a cage, and that within the limits of this Cabinet Statement, it will not be possible for us to effect the revolutionary changes which the country is aiming at. They argue from history that revolutionary changes are generally effected by violent action overthrowing established Governments. The British people were able to end monarchical despotism that way; the United States of America attained her primary freedom through direct action; the French, the Bolshevist, the Fascist and the Nazi revolutions were also effected by similar methods. We are told that we cannot effect revolutionary changes through peaceful methods, through negotiation and discussion in constituent assemblies. We reply that we have similar ends; we wish to bring about a fundamental alteration in the structure of Indian society. We wish to end our political and economic dependence, but those who are strong of spirit, those who are not short of sight, take their chances—they make their chances. Here is a chance that is open to us and we wish to use this to find out whether it will be possible for us to gain the revolutionary ends by methods which are unusual so far as past history is concerned. We want to try whether it will not be possible for us to effect a smooth and rapid transition from a state of serfdom to one of freedom. That is the undertaking which this particular Assembly has on hand. We wish to tell all those who are abstaining from this Assembly that it is not our desire to establish any sectional Government. We are not here asking anything for a particular community or a privileged class. We are here working for the establishment of Swaraj for all the Indian people. It will be our endeavour to abolish every vestige of despotism, every heirloom of inorganic tradition. We are here to bring about real satisfaction of the fundamental needs of the common man of this country, irrespective of race, religion or community. If the trumpet gives an uncertain sound, we cannot rally the people to our support. It is therefore essential that our bugle-call, our trumpet-sound, must be clear, must give the people a sense of exhilaration, must give the suspicious and the abstaining a sense of reassurance that we are here pledged to achieve full independence of India, where no individual will suffer from undeserved want, where no group will be thwarted in the development of its cultural life. Therefore I believe that a declaration of objectives of this character is essential and it is not necessary for us to wait till this Assembly is fuller than it happens to be at the present moment.

Now let us turn to the objectives themselves. We resolve that India shall be an Independent, Sovereign Republic. On the question of independence there is no difference of opinion. Premier Attlee, in his first statement, made on 15th March, said:

'I hope that the Indian people may elect to remain within the British Commonwealth. I am certain that she will find great advantages in doing so; but if she does so elect, it must be by her own free will. The British Commonwealth and Empire is not bound together by chains of external compulsion. If, on the other hand, she elects for independence, in our view she has a right to do so.'

The Muslim League and the Princes have all agreed to it. In the Memorandum on States' Treaties and Paramountcy, presented by the Cabinet Mission to the Chancellor of the Chamber of Princes on the 12th May, 1946, it is said that—

'The Chamber has since confirmed that the Indian States fully share the general desire in the country for the immediate attainment by India of her full stature. His Majesty's Government have now declared that, if the Succession [sic] Government or Governments in British India declare independence, no obstacle would be placed in their way. The effect of these announcements is that all those concerned with the future of India wish her to attain a position of independence within or without the British Commonwealth.'

All those concerned with the future of India, the Congress, the Muslim League, and other organizations and the Princes also, they all desire independence for India within or without the British Commonwealth.

Mr Churchill, in the House of Commons, referring to His Majesty's Government's offer of independence, said on the 1st of July, 1946—

'However, it is another matter when we try to short-circuit the process and say 'Take independence now'. That is what the Government are going to get and they are going to get it very soon. They should not blind themselves to the idea. There is going to be no hesitation on the part of those with whom the Government is dealing in taking full and immediate independence. That is what is going to happen.'

This Resolution on the objectives does not wish to disappoint Mr Churchill. (Hear, hear). It tells him that the expected is happening. You gave us the choice to get out of the British Commonwealth. We are electing to go out of the British Commonwealth. May I say why? So far as India is concerned, it is not a mere Dominion like Australia, like New Zealand or Canada or South Africa. These latter are bound to Great Britain by ties of race, religion and culture. India has a vast population, immense natural resources, a great cultural heritage and has had an independent career for a very long time, and it is inconceivable that India can be a Dominion like the other Dominions.

Secondly, let us consider the implications of what happened at the United Nations Organization, when the Indian Delegation, headed by our distinguished colleague, Mrs Vijayalakshmi Pandit, so ably defended the rights of Indians in South Africa—look at the attitude that was adopted by Great Britain. Great Britain along with Canada and Australia supported South Africa, New Zealand abstaining from voting. It shows that there is a community of ideals between Great Britain and the other Dominions in which India has no share. There is no sense of belonging in the British Commonwealth. We do not feel that we are all members, enjoying similar rights as parts of the British Commonwealth. Some of you may also have heard of the recent move launched by Mr Churchill and Lord Templewood for a European Union under the fostering care and leadership of Great Britain. That also shows in what way the wind is blowing.

Yet, even though India may elect to quit the British Commonwealth, there are a hundred different ways of voluntary co-operation, ways of mutual collaboration, in trade, in defence, in matters of culture; but whether all these forms of mutual co-operation are going to develop in a spirit of friendship, trust and harmony, or whether they will be allowed to die out in mutual distrust and recrimination, depends entirely on the attitude which Great Britain will adopt in this crisis. This Resolution about the Indian Republic seems to have irritated Mr Churchill and his followers. Our Chairman today referred to one statement by Mr Churchill and I will refer to some others.

When the debate on Burma took place, Mr Churchill stated that the annexation of Burma happened during his father’s Secretaryship, and that now Burma is given the liberty to get out of the British Commonwealth. He seems to look upon Burma and India as parts of his ancestral estate, and now when they are passing out, he seems to be terribly disheartened.

On the debate on India, he asked His Majesty’s Government to remember its obligations ‘to the Muslims, numbering 90 millions, who comprised the majority of the fighting elements of India’—truth is not rated high in Indian debates and international intercourse—‘and of untouchables of anything from 40 to 60 millions.’ He refers to the representatives of the Great Congress Party as the mouthpiece ‘of actively organized and engineered minorities who, having seized upon power by force, or fraud or chicanery, go forward and use, that power in the name of vast masses with whom they have long since lost all effective connection.’ A party of men who have braved the perils of life, who have suffered for their patriotism, whose love of country and capacity for sacrifice are second to none in the whole world who are led by one who is today leading a lonely trek in a far off corner of India, bearing on his aging shoulders the burden of a nation’s shame and sorrow, to talk of that party in the way in which Mr Churchill has done is—I do not know how to describe it. (Cries of shame). Mr Churchill’s outbursts are bereft of dignity or discretion. Provocative and irrelevant remarks, sneers of derision in regard to our communal divisions, have punctuated his speech on that occasion and on other occasions. I shall only say here that such speeches and such statements cannot prevent the end but can only postpone it and thus prolong the agony. The British connection will end, it must end. Whether it ends in friendship and goodwill or in convulsions and agony, depends upon the way in which the British people treat this great problem.

Republic is a word which has disturbed some of the representatives of the States in this country. We have said from this platform that a Republican India does not mean the abolition of Princely rule. Princes may continue; Princes will be there so long as they make themselves constitutional so long as they make themselves responsible to the people of the states. If the great paramount power which is sovereign in this country by conquest, is now transferring responsibility to the representatives of the people, it goes without saying that those who depend on that paramount power should do what the British have done. They must also transfer responsibility to the representatives of the people.

We cannot say that the republican tradition is foreign to the genius of this country. We have had it from the beginning of our history. When a few merchants from the north went down to the south, one of the Princes of the Deccan asked the question: ‘Who is your King?’

The answer was, ‘Some of us are governed by assemblies, some of us by kings.’

_kecid deso ganadhina kecid rajadhina_.

Much has been said about the sovereignty of the people. We have held that the ultimate sovereignty rests with the moral law, with the conscience of humanity. People as well as kings are subordinate to that, Dharma, righteousness, is the king of kings.

_Dharmam Kshatrasya shatram._

It is the ruler of both the people and the rulers themselves. It is the sovereignty of the law which we have asserted. The Princes—I count many of them amongst my personal friends—have agreed with the Cabinet Statement and wished to take their share in the future development of this country, and I do hope that they will realize that it is their duty to take notice of the surging hopes of their peoples and make themselves responsible. If they do so, they will play a notable part in the shaping of our country. We have no ill-will towards the Princes. The assertion of republicanism, the assertion of the sovereignty of the people, do not in any manner indicate any antagonism to the Princely rule itself. They do not refer to the present facts of past history of the Indian States but they indicate the future aspirations of the peoples of the States.

The next thing that we find in this Resolution is about the Union of India. The Cabinet Statement has ruled out the partition of India. Geography is against it. Military strategy is against it. The aspirations of Hindus, Muslims and Sikhs from the very beginning have been against it. The present tendency is for larger and larger aggregations. Look at what has happened in America, in Canada and Switzerland. Egypt wishes to be connected with Sudan, South Ireland wishes to be connected with North Ireland. Palestine is protesting against any division. Again nationalism, not religion, is the basis of modern life. Allenby’s liberating campaigns in Egypt, Lawrence’s adventures in Arabia, Kemal Pasha’s defiant creation of a secular Turkey, point out that the days of religious States are over. These are the days of nationalism. The Hindus and Muslims have lived together in this country for over a thousand years. They belong to the same land, speak the same language. They have the same racial ancestry. They have a common destiny to work for. They interpenetrate one another. It is not a kind of Ulster, which we can separate; but our Ulster is a ubiquitous one. Even if we have two States, there will be large minorities and these minorities, whether really oppressed or not, will look across their frontiers and ask for protection. This will be a source of continual strife which will go on, as long as we do not have a United India. We realize that while a strong Centre is essential to mould all the peoples into one united whole, on account of the grievances real or imaginary we have to be satisfied with a Centre which is limited to the three subjects, which the Cabinet Plan has put before us. Therefore, we are proceeding on the principle of Provincial Autonomy, with the residuary powers to the Provinces themselves. Events that have happened in Bihar and Bengal, tell us that there is an urgent need for a strong Centre. Yet as there are these difficulties, we propose to develop a multi-national state which will give adequate scope for the play of variations among the different cultures themselves.

Grouping has given us a lot of trouble. But grouping is subject to two essential factors—which are the integral parts of the Cabinet Plan,—a Union Centre and residuary powers in the Provinces; and in these Groups also we will have large minorities. Those who are insistent on the rights of minorities will have to concede these rights to others who happen to be included in the Groups. In a statement made by Sir Stafford Cripps on 18 July, 1946, he said:

A fear was expressed that somehow or other the new Provincial Constitutions might be so manoeuvred as to make it impossible for the Provinces afterwards to opt out. I do not myself see how such a thing would be possible, but if anything of that kind were to be attempted, it would be a clear breach of the basic understanding of this Scheme.

That is what Sir Stafford Cripps said. If any attempt is made to so manipulate electorates as to make it difficult for the Provinces to opt out, then that would be, in the words of Sir Stafford Cripps, 'a clear breach of the basic understanding of this Scheme'. After all we have to live together and it is impossible to impose any constitution against the wishes of the people who are to be governed by that Constitution.

There is also a reference to fundamental rights in this Resolution. It is a socio-economic revolution that we are attempting to bring about. It is therefore necessary that we must remake the material conditions; but apart from re-making the material conditions, we have to safeguard the liberty of the human spirit. It is no good creating conditions of freedom without producing a sense of freedom. The mind of man must have full liberty to flower and mature and to grow to its fullest stature. The progress of man is due to the play of his mind, now creating, now destroying, always transmuting. We must safeguard the liberty of the human spirit against the encroachments of the State. While State regulation is necessary to improve economic conditions, it should not be done at the expense of the human spirit.

We are actors today in a great historical drama. We are involved in it and therefore we are unable to perceive the large contours of it. This declaration, which we make today, is of the nature of a pledge to our own people and a pact with the civilized world.

The question was put by Mr Churchill to Mr Alexander whether this Assembly is functioning validly. Mr Alexander said:

I repeat, the scheme for elections for the Constituent Assembly was carried out. If the Muslim League abstained from going there, how can you prevent a duly elected Assembly from going on to do its business?

That is what Mr Alexander said. There was some difficulty about the interpretation of the grouping. Much against its will, the Congress has accepted His Majesty's Government's interpretation. The only two clauses that remain are adequate safeguards for minorities, and a treaty on the problems which arise out of transfer of power. The Constituent Assembly is legally functioning. Every part of the State Paper has been completely accepted and if we are able to frame adequate safeguards for minorities, safeguards which will satisfy not so much the British or our own people, but the civilized conscience of the world, then while yet the British have the power to put it into action, they must give this Constitution the force of law. It is essential that they should do so. If after all these conditions are satisfied, if some excuse is invented for postponing the independence of India, it would be the most callous betrayal of history. If, on the other hand, the British argue that the Constituent Assembly has started functioning on the basis of the Cabinet Plan and they have accepted every clause of the State Paper of 16 May, and have provided adequate safeguards for all minorities and therefore they should implement it, then it will be an achievement of history which will secure the co-operation and goodwill of two great peoples.
In that very speech which Mr Attlee made as the Prime Minister on 15th March, he said:

In the mass of Asia, an Asia ravaged by war, we have here the one country that has been seeking to apply the principles of democracy. I have always felt myself that political India might be the light of Asia...

nay, the light of the world giving to its distracted mind an integral vision and to its bewildered will an upward direction.

Here are the two alternatives. Accept the Constituent Assembly. Take its findings. Find out whether there are adequate safeguards for minorities or not. If they are there, give them the force of law and you may get co-operation. If, after all these conditions are fulfilled, you still try to make out that something is lacking, the British will be understood as violating the spirit of the whole State Paper, and the dark possibilities which will lie ahead of us in the present world conditions, I do not wish to contemplate.

Mr N.V. Gadgil (Bombay: General): Mr Chairman, I have great pleasure in supporting the Resolution which has been moved by The Hon’ble Pandit Jawaharlal Nehru. In the course of the discussion it was pointed out that this Constituent Assembly was not competent to pass a resolution of this character. In this connection, I respectfully draw the attention of this House to the opening paragraph of the Statement in which a quotation from the speech of the Premier Mr Attlee is given. Therein he says that—

My colleagues are going to India with the intention of using their utmost endeavours to help her to attain her freedom as speedily and fully as possible. What form of Government is to replace the present regime is for India to decide; but our desire is to help her to set up forthwith the machinery for making that decision.

It is clear, Sir, that this Assembly is here to evolve not only the form of Government but to lay down what the content of the same will be. I wish to state here, Sir, that we are not here as mere drafters of a constitution or choppers of logic. We are here, as a matter of fact, as a council of action, and this meeting of the Constituent Assembly is a stage in the progress of the struggle for freedom. It may possible be the penultimate battle or the last battle that will end the war of freedom, which has been carried on for over 75 years or more, from generation to generation. An inheritance of struggle has been left to us by our predecessors; but I do hope that when this generation is over, the inheritance it will leave, will not be an inheritance of struggle, but an inheritance of creative effort, whereby the future society of India will be built up.

Sir, there is a clear necessity for defining the objective. In the past those who have really contributed to this struggle are not the few professors and Privy Councillors, but they are the people who have been toiling in poverty, in ignorance. They have got to know what is it that they have fought for so far, and what is it in the ultimate they will be asked to fight for in case the Constitution we may frame here is not acceptable to the British Government. Now, Sir, in this Resolution, as I see it, there is nothing to which any person or any party, who is anxious to have freedom, can take objection. In the first place, the main objective is defined as an Independent Sovereign Republic. As far as I know, Sir, from the various resolutions that have been passed by the Muslim League in the course of the last six years or more, they have always stated that they are for democratic freedom. In fact, the Islamic country that leads the Islamic world, namely, Turkey, today, is a Republic. Therefore, there is nothing in this to which the Muslim League can take any objection. Let us therefore see what are the merits in this proposition and if it can be pointed out that there is anything objectionable, then, certainly, it is a matter which can be adjusted when those who want to take objection are here. But as far as I am able to see there is nothing, no phrase, no clause in this Resolution to which anybody can take objection.

Taking the several sub-paragraphs in this Resolution, the main thing that is provided for is one State, one Union. At the same time here is enough scope for every province to grow and expand and, there is nothing to prevent any province from reaching its utmost goal, consistent with the common obligation. At the same time, I wish to point out that it provides a field which gives wider scope for higher statesmanship, for higher scholarship, for better commerce and larger industries. If there is such a Union, it means there is greater political security and the Union will have economically more bargaining power. Viewed from any point of view, a State covering all the geographical unit, known as India, is a necessity for every province, for every constituent State that may go to constitute this Union. By joining they will have nothing to lose and, in my humble opinion much to gain.

Now, Sir, it also provides for fundamental rights and these fundamental rights are, what are most cherished by the common man. It provides freedom of association, freedom of speech and all other civil liberties which are to be found in the Constitution of every country. Some objection was raised because many things are not clear. Obviously, all things cannot be included in a Resolution of this kind. But if one carefully goes through the relevant portion which deals with fundamental rights, it lays down that there will be economic justice, which can only be secured if the production in the country ultimately comes to be socially owned. Private enterprise may be there, but in a limited manner. If economic justice is to be secured, it can only be, if the means of production come to be owned by the State as such. Therefore, if matters today appear somewhat not very clear, I am sure, that when these principles are incorporated in the sections of the Constitution, these matters will be made perfectly clear.

Sir, this is a sort of building. The whole Resolution has a unity just as this hall in which we are assembled. The dome is standing on the various arches down below. Similarly, the freedom contemplated is supported by the various principles which are incorporated in the Resolution and that has given balance and poise to the structure. As I said, this Resolution is absolutely necessary and though textually it may not be a part of the Constitution, that may come ultimately to be framed, it is a sort of a spiritual preamble which will pervade every section, every clause and every schedule and as I said, Sir, it is necessary. It is a sort of a dynamic, a driving power which will be available to those who will be charged with the framing of the Constitution in detail. This is in fact the foundation. People will know what they are to get. It will be a constitution which will evoke the necessary loyalty from every citizen whom it is to govern. For no constitution can evoke loyalty, no constitution can evoke the necessary sentiment unless it offers every citizen sufficient inspiration to defend it, if it comes to it, by laying down his own life.

Sir, as I said, this is not an Assembly in which are gathered mere drafters of the Constitution; it is a sort of a council of action. We are here because of the struggle that has been carried on by the people, and we have to frame the Constitution. If that Constitution is framed and not granted, people ask what is the sanction. To that my humble answer is that there are two kinds of sanctions, one, the moral sanction and the other, physical. If our Constitution is just and fair to every legitimate interest in this country, that provides the first kind of sanction; and the second kind of sanction is the determination of the people to see that whatever form of Government they have decided to adopt, is there, and if it is not granted by any power, then that determination will not be merely academic but it will work in concrete forms, though the forms may be stated today. I submit that as the Constitution proceeds from clause to clause and section to section, people will gradually know how things are moving and in fact, I feel, Sir, that there will be created such an atmosphere in the country that the necessary temper for revolution will be augmented and will be ready for use. I submit that as we proceed from clause to clause and section to section, British power in this country will be withering and by the time we reach the last schedule, we will find that the British State, so far as India is concerned, has withered away. What will be left then, will be a formal repeal of the British power, for do we not read the writing on the wall, do we not see that the pictures of those who ruled India with repression, ruthless repression, with extraordinary laws and ordinances gone? Where are the pictures? They are all gone. There you can see the writing on the wall. Mr President, it has been pointed out that the Britishers are very anxious to leave this country. In fact years ago, Macaulay wrote that it would be a glorious day for Britishers when Indian people would ask them to vacate. We have been asking them so long; but apart from what Lord Macaulay has said, the Empire that had begun in perjuries and forgeries of Clive and Hastings, sustained throughout by broken promises, and which is still sought to be continued by diplomatic clarifications, by fleeting and flexible explanations, must end. These explanations will not make it survive a day more. There must be an honest deed of transfer in favour of the masses who have suffered so long and so much under the foreign rule. The day must come when they must come into their own. If the transfer is peaceful, well and good; but if it does not come peacefully, and if a struggle becomes necessary and history demands that there must be a struggle, I can only say that we do not want to fight but if we have to, then we have got the men, we have got the material and we have got the mind too. But in that case what will happen? Britishers will go—stocks and shares, shops and workshops,—they will leave nothing behind, not even goodwill or good memories. Their trade and flag both will disappear. It is for them to decide whether they want to live upto their great ideal which was stated by Lord Macaulay or they still want to cling and ultimately meet the fate which I have just visualized.

Mr President, we have come to a stage when it becomes necessary to say in the clearest possible terms what we want to have. We have been told that other questions, such as minorities are there, difficult of solution, I want to make it clear, Sir, that this is a problem which is the creation of the foreign power. Nobody has ever succeeded in preventing the coming together of the waters of Jumna and Ganges beyond Allahabad (hear, hear); because there the three streams Ganges, Jumna and Saraswati (wisdom) join and after that nobody can distinguish the waters of Jumna from the waters of Ganges. The time has come when wisdom will dawn on both the communities and the result will be that they will form a higher unity, a higher synthesis, in which everybody will have his opportunity to rise to the highest level of life and personality. Now it has been said that it will not be possible in the near future to get what we desire. It may be a short or a long struggle but whether it is a long struggle or a short struggle although we do not want it or invoke it, if it comes, everyone of us must be prepared for it. Sir, the task that has been cast on these representatives who are gathered here, is great and historic. I have no doubt that they will rise to the occasion and lead this ancient country to its goal of freedom. They will bring into existence a society where men will be valued not by what they have, but by what they are, where men will be measured in terms of character and not in terms of coin, where pride will be a back number and prejudice will be tongue-tied, where men and women can hold their heads high, where they will be happy, because they will be equal, where religion will not be a battle-field, for all will be the worshippers of one Goddess—the Goddess of Duty, where race will not evoke arrogance on one hand and inflict humiliation on the other, for all will belong to one race, namely, the race of workers, where creeds will not disintegrate the people, for their creed will be of service to all, where freedom and plenty will be available, for none will have the monopoly of power or prosperity. All will be happy because all will be equal. It is a vision no doubt but a vision is necessary if one wants to live a life, a life with aim and purpose and for that one must have a vision; otherwise it will be the life of a crow.

We do not want that sort of life. It is a vision no doubt. All I can say in conclusion is, that unless we have vision, we cannot progress, for a people without vision perish. \textit{(Cheers.)}

\textbf{The Hon’ble Mrs Vijayalakshmi Pandit} (United Provinces: General): Mr President, it was my privilege in 1937 to move the first resolution after the inauguration of Provincial Autonomy in my Province, demanding a Constituent Assembly to draw up a constitution for an independent India. Today, ten years later, that Constituent Assembly is meeting here. This is a historic milestone in our progress toward freedom and yet, Sir, freedom remains just a little beyond our grasp. Imperialism dies hard and even though it knows its days are numbered, it struggles for survival. We have before us the instance of what is happening in Burma, in Indonesia, in Indo-China, and we see, how in those countries, in spite of the desperate efforts that the peoples are putting up to free themselves, the stranglehold of imperialism is so great that they are unable easily to shake it off. Reactionary elements in every country are getting together, Sir, under the guise of seeking protection, clinging to the Imperialist power and trying thereby to strengthen it. We have seen the sorry spectacle of what happened in San Francisco when the United Nations Organization was being born. The Asiatic nations assembled there, were dominated by the Imperialist powers and could not speak independently but only echoed the voice of their respective Imperialist powers. The result has already been seen in the fact that in spite of the brave words of the Charter, that came into existence at that time, no implementation of that Charter was possible because there was not enough strength behind it. The people of Asia were silent and could not insist upon its implementation. Even today, Asia is far behind the peoples of Europe in representation in the United Nations and it was perhaps the first time in history that at the last United Nations Assembly, a country, not free itself, was able to raise its voice for the freedom of oppressed and dependent peoples all over the world. \textit{(Cheers.) The fact, that the United Nations Assembly has recognized this, is because India even today has shown within herself the power of giving a lead to the world. An Independent India would no doubt assume leadership not only of Asia but of the world, and so when we meet here in this Assembly to draw up the future Constitution of our country, we must not forget that it is not only to ourselves we owe a duty but also to the world which looks to us....

The Resolution before us stresses complete freedom for the individual and concedes guarantees to every legitimate group. Therefore in this there is no justification for fear for the minorities. Even though certain minorities have special interests to safeguard they should not forget, that they are parts of the whole, and if the larger interest suffers, there can be no question of real safeguarding of the interest of any minority. In an Independent India minorities will not be able to look to outside powers for help without being termed ‘traitors’. We have had too much talk of rights in recent years and very little about obligations. This approach to any problem is unfortunate. The Resolution before us deals with problems which are fundamental to all of us and only to the extent that they are solved, can we safeguard the rights of any special minority. The Resolution indicates clearly that in an independent India the fullest social economic and cultural justice to individuals and groups will be conceded and, through our design for living, we shall be helping other nations to decide the pattern of their own lives.

Of all the Asiatic countries, India alone has stood for democracy throughout the years. In all our chequered history we have fought for the will of the people to triumph. In recent years, even at great peril and at personal sacrifice, the people of this country have adhered to the ideal of democracy, and, today, we are in a position of showing to the world that we can implement our ideals. The Resolution under discussion is clear in substance and in wording, but I would like to stress two points.

We have before us two aspects—the positive and the negative. The negative aspect is concerned with the ending of the imperialist domination of our country and in that we all agree. But the more important side to the question is the positive side, which means the building up in our country of a social democratic State which will enable India to fulfil her destiny and point the path of lasting peace and progress to the world. At this moment in our national history, we cannot afford to fritter away our energies in any talk or action which will defeat our objective; nor must we indulge in unreasoning fears. We must accept the challenge that has been offered and march together in order to realize the positive side of this picture.

The end of the War has created many problems, difficult in themselves and made more complex by the fact that individual demands are placed before the interest of the whole; that many nations, being still dependent, are unable to raise their voice in support or protest. But India is in a position to contribute substantially to a solution of the present problems and also in maintaining peace and security in the world. A free India becomes a power for the forces of progress. In this age of the building up of one world, we cannot talk of separate nations. We have to work in order to build up one world, of which India shall be a worthy partner. India has the right to lead because of her heritage, and also because of her present, when in the face of the complexity of her own problems, she has stood up and estimated values and not let go all those ideals which she had placed before her. Our contribution to the future is one of neutralization of political and social discontents and to that end, we must work by the establishment of freedom in our own country and helping all those who strive for freedom in the world. Unless Asia comes into her own, the world cannot function as a whole. A world which is divided into groups cannot be secure. A famous American has said, ‘No nation can exist half slave, and half free’. The same applies to the world, since freedom is not divisible. India must free herself socially, economically and then free others, and in the Resolution before us we find an attempt to work towards that end. By it, we redeem the pledge we have taken. I appeal to the Members of this House to pass the Resolution in order to show that this ancient land is conscious of the challenge that has been presented to her and can live up to the ideals and heritage of her past.

Prof. N.G. Ranga (Madras: General): Mr Chairman and friends, I am extremely glad to be able to support this Resolution. It does not mean that I am quite satisfied with it; but so far as this Resolution goes, it places before us the most effective, the most comprehensive and liberal idea of the future that our people can look forward to, once our new Constitution comes into existence. But it is much more than a liberal view of things, because it is not content with placing high ideals and noble ideas before our people. It also takes into consideration the need for assuring to our people the actual enjoyment of the rights that are stated herein, and it is in this manner that this Resolution goes far beyond similar resolutions that had been moved in other constituent assemblies and similar ideas incorporated in other constitutions of the world.
There is one other aspect also in which this Resolution is very much in advance. While in other constitutions, no specific mention has been made to assure the people the right of freedom of action in pursuance of their ideals, in pursuit of their aims, this Resolution makes it perfectly clear that our people will have the right to act whenever they find it necessary, provided such action is within the law and also in conformity with the moral standards of our people. That is a very important matter, because, from time to time, both in this country and in other countries, governments used to come forward to deny the right of the people to rebel against any particular law, any particular ordinance, any particular dictate of that particular government, and threatened the people and told them that they had absolutely no right whatsoever to go against the established law. But, Sir, while political philosophers were merely content in other countries, philosophers like Harold Laski and others, with exhorting the people to be ever ready to stand up to their rights, their obligations and civil liberties, here in India alone, the opportunity has been given—thanks to the leadership of Mahatma Gandhi—to offer satyagraha on a mass scale and to claim that right not only for large bodies of people, organized and unorganized, but also for individuals. Again and again, we have been able to reiterate our right to rise against injustice, to go against any particular law or system of laws and thus maintain that only in that way can the civil liberties of the people and also all their personal and individual rights be maintained. The State as well as human beings are liable to err and there must be some safeguard against their mistakes, and the only safeguard that can be found will be satyagraha. Therefore, Sir, I welcome this Resolution for that reason also.

Several people in this country have been complaining that such and such parties have not taken part in this Assembly and such and such other sections have not been able to come into the orbit of this Assembly and its work, and therefore, we have no right whatsoever to consider a resolution like this. Is it necessary, Sir, that all the members in a family should be present in council where the point for consideration is that the total property of that family should be increased, should be augmented? Can there be a member of any family who would be opposed to the increase of the moral and material prosperity and the rights of that particular family? This Resolution is nothing but that. We are here assembled to consider in what manner the rights and obligations, the powers and duties of every individual in this country, groups of people and the whole country, can be raised, increased and augmented. At this juncture it does not matter, if some of us are not able to be in the House. It may be that for various reasons of their own, certain parties have kept themselves away; but that need not prevent us from trying to go ahead in order to increase the total heritage of our people, in order to augment the total rights and strength of our country.

Sir, at the same time, I said this is not enough and I would like to say a few words about that. It is all very well to go back to our villages and to our friends and tell them that we have passed a resolution like this and that in future all their rights will be safeguarded and they will have no fears in regard to the future. But will it be enough if those people get the right to live, to have full employment, to gain their fundamental rights, if they are only told that they will be able to have their meetings, their conferences, their associations and various other civil liberties? Is it not necessary to enable them to create such conditions in life as will enable them to enjoy these rights that we have enumerated here? It is a fact Sir, it is a miserable fact, that millions and millions of our countrymen are not yet able to take advantage of the various liberties that we have laid down here, the various privileges, that we say, are being thrown open for everyone to enjoy. They are not educated. Economically, they are oppressed and suppressed also, and socially they are backward and downtrodden. For all these people, so many more things have to be done, may be for some time to come, before they come to enjoy these rights. They need props. They need a ladder, by which they can reach on to the stage when it will be possible for them to come to appreciate the value of the rights that we are placing before them and enjoy them.

Sir, there is a lot of talk about minorities. Who are the real minorities? Not the Hindus in the so-called Pakistan provinces, not the Sikhs, not even the Muslims. No, the real minorities are the masses of this country. These people are so depressed and oppressed and suppressed till now that they are not able to take advantage of the ordinary civil right. What is the position? You go to the tribal areas. According to law, their own traditional law, their tribal law, their lands cannot be alienated. Yet our merchants go there, and in the so-called free market they are able to snatch their lands. Thus, even though the law goes against this snatching away of their lands, still the merchants are able to turn the tribal people into veritable slaves by various kinds of bonds, and make them hereditary bond-slaves. Let us go to the ordinary villagers. There goes the money-lender with his money and he is able to get the villagers in his pocket. There is the landlord himself, the zamindar, and the mal-guzar and there are the various other people who are able to exploit these poor villagers. There is no elementary education even among these people. These are the real minorities that need protection and assurances of protection. In order to give them the necessary protection, we will need much more than this Resolution.

But it is quite possible that we cannot incorporate all those things in a resolution of this character. It is the spirit of the Resolution that has got to be taken into account; it is in that light that the Constitution has got to be formulated. And in framing that Constitution we will have to see that there is a charter of fundamental rights. We are agreed upon that, but that will not be enough. Several other countries also have had their charters of fundamental rights. Yet these fundamental rights have been neglected by their own Governments. Therefore we will have to stipulate certain provisions in our own Constitution, by which it will be possible for our masses to invoke the aid of the law as against the State, as against the Government and its incumbents from time to time in order to see that these fundamental rights are actually enforced. For instance, in France they had noble ideals of equality, fraternity and liberty, and they laid it down that no Member of Parliament could possibly be put in jail while the House was in session. Yet that right was denied. Several Deputies of the French Parliament were put in jail and there was no safeguard against it. In America, before the law all the people are equal, but yet you know how depressed are the Negroes in that country. We have to prevent a repetition of that sort of thing in our country. In order to be able to do that, we must enable our own workers, our own peasants, our own ordinary masses to demand from the State necessary financial assistance to go to the Courts, the Supreme Court of the country and to seek its protection. Poor men, as you know, are not able to go to Court, and when they have to fight against the State it is impossible for them to think of it at all. Just as you provide for a poor man’s lawyer in criminal cases, so also if you were to make a similar provision for enforcement by the ordinary masses of the fundamental rights that we formulate, then there might be some safeguard.

The masses are the real minorities, and yet they are not asking for all these safeguards, and even when they ask for the safeguards they do not make it a condition precedent to constitutional progress. What is more, they care more for the country, for our own national progress and therefore, they not only say, let us go ahead, but they exhort us to go ahead. They stand by us, and I appeal to our own so-called religious minorities to take a lesson from these people. Whom are we supposed to represent? The ordinary masses of our country. And yet most of us do not belong to the masses themselves. We are of them, we wish to stand for them, but the masses themselves are not able to come up to the Constitutional Assembly. It may take some time; in the meanwhile, we are here as their trustees, as their champions, and we are trying our best to speak for them. While we are doing this, our friends, the Muslim Leaguers, wish the rest of the world to believe that we are trying to do them some harm therefore they cannot hope to come over here, they cannot be expected to come over here. I wish to tell them from this forum, it would be the greatest possible tragedy not only for the Muslim masses but also for the masses of the country in general, if the Muslim League were to follow this policy of non-co-operation, this policy of do-nothing. What more can the Indian National Congress be expected to do in order to conciliate them than what it has already done? Our friends, the Muslim Leaguers, instead of trying to come to us and negotiate with us, reason with us or argue before us—they have gone over to the Britisher. They have tried to gain one after another a number of concessions. Each one of these concessions has come down as a sort of black curtain in blotting out the vista of freedom and Swaraj that this country is aiming at; and in addition they have done enough to embitter the people of this country. In spite of all this the Indian National Congress has chosen to accept all these various safeguards and rights and various other things that they have been gaining from the British with the only hope, with the only intention, with the only appeal to our Muslim League friends, to come over here and cooperate with us in the shaping of the Constitution for our country. If they do not come, are we going to stop where we are? Certainly not. They ought to know, and other people also who are backing them ought to know, that the Indian National Congress cannot be stampeded in this fashion. We are making history, we have been making history for the last 25 years. Again and again, in spite of our constitutionalists who have been telling us, ‘for God’s sake do not go against the law, these things will not get us Swaraj, you negotiate with the British, work with the British’, we have resorted to saytagraha on many an occasion in order to safeguard the rights and privileges of our people. We have made progress—who can deny that? Could we have been in this Constituent Assembly if we had not been able to launch direct struggles? Could there have been even this possibility for the Muslim League to try and obstruct as they are doing now, if it had not been for the sacrifice and struggle that we have been carrying on all these years? We have reached a stage when it is impossible for British imperialism to prevent us from making progress. British imperialism goes to the pitiable plight of trying to arrest our progress—may be for a day, may be for a few minutes. But British Imperialism will not succeed and these allies of British Imperialism cannot succeed. What is more, our own masses will soon be in a position to set aside not only British imperialism but also their allies in this country and go ahead and help us to go ahead. What has been the position of the Muslim League itself? There was a time when Mr Jinnah used to say that independence was a sort of mirage, that it was absurd for India to claim independence for India. He himself said that direct action was an absurdity, and yet he has himself come to claim independence for India, he has declared himself in favour of independence. He has himself come to declare from the Muslim League rostrum the ‘Quit India’ slogan, though he would like to have it as ‘divide the country between us and quit India.’ Nevertheless, he followed in our own footsteps. He wants today two Constituent Assemblies, whereas not long ago he was not prepared to think of any Constituent Assembly at all. What does this show? I say, that if we go ahead, the Muslim Leaguers also are obliged to go ahead for the simple reason that the ordinary masses, whether Hindus or Muslims, to whichever community they belong, are impelling their political leaders, in spite of their own peculiar partisanship, to go ahead in the manner in which alone India can go ahead. Therefore, I appeal to our Muslim Leaguers, at least in the name of their own masses, to come into this House and co-operate with us, if they are not for their own vested interests, for their Nawabs, or for their Jagirdars.

Mr Jinnah and others have been claiming in recent past that they are also as democratic as the Indian National Congress. If they are democratic, let them think over the fact as to which of the communities contains the largest number of poor people. Among the Hindus a good percentage are not poor, but among Muslims, the rich people can be counted on your fingers. The poorest among our people are the Muslim masses. They need most urgently a free India without which there is no chance for the Tribal people or for the Harijans or for the Muslim Mazdoor or the Kisan, and, the longer Mr Jinnah and others prolong this agony of slavery, the longer they will be delaying the possibility of their own masses making any progress.

Lastly, I wish to appeal to this House to see to it that the necessary provisions are made in the Constitution proper in order to enable our people to enjoy the various rights indicated in this Resolution. Without such provisions this Resolution will have become useless. It will only be a sort of pious hope and nothing more. It is true that, when it comes to be incorporated in our text-books and our boys and girls read them in their lessons, it will do a lot of educational work. But that will not be enough. Similar work was done in America and yet the ordinary rights of the people were set at naught by the Government. Therefore we should take care to incorporate the necessary sanctions in the Constitution in order to safeguard the interests of the masses and to ensure to them the necessary opportunities which are needed to enable them to enjoy these rights.

Dr P.K. Sen (Bihar: General): Mr President, Sir, I rise to accord my heartfelt support to the Resolution. A great many speakers have spoken before me during this session as well as in the last and a great many aspects have already been discussed fully. I do not wish to go over those aspects again or repeat any of their observations. But I do feel that this Resolution, in all its different branches, is very very necessary before we undertake to it down and frame a constitution for an Independent India. It is also important that we should proclaim, as the Resolution does, India an independent Sovereign Republic.

As the Hon’ble Member, who, spoke first today observed, there are many who may be regarded as doubters, waverers and scoffers. It is necessary, therefore, that we should proclaim to the world our determination to carry out our undertaking and frame a constitution for an Independent Sovereign Republic—a Republic in which the ultimate power is vested in the people and all power and authority are derived from the people. There can be no doubt at all today that all sections of people are agreed on this point. Whether we speak of our friends of the Muslim League or of the Congress or of the different ‘minorities’, so-called, or of the Untouchables—a word that I hate—or the suppressed, depressed to oppressed people—indeed, all are our brothers who have been put under Schedule Castes classes. Take any of these sections of political opinion,—is there any doubt whatsoever today that their common objective is Independence? Even the British Government, which is now prepared to transfer power, has definitely declared the objective as being Independence and Freedom. Under these circumstances it is incumbent upon us to frame our Resolution in these terms.

I remember some of the words with which the Hon’ble Mover introduced this Resolution,—they are ringing in my ears. He said: ‘It is a resolve, an undertaking, a dedication...’ Yes, it is a dedication. We have just come to the threshold of our work—we have not as yet crossed the threshold. We are, as it were, pilgrims gathered together in the vestibule and on the point of crossing the threshold to the temple. Now is the time and the moment for a vow of dedication and self-consecration to the task which we have taken upon ourselves. A tremendous responsibility rests upon our shoulders and it is but meet and proper that, at this moment, before we have actually commenced the work, we should make a firm resolve in our mind to discharge our duty, as befits the worthy representatives, of framing a constitution for a free and independent sovereign republic.

There is another aspect of the matter which the Hon'ble Member touched upon and that I think is a very important one. What I have already spoken of is the subjective side of the Resolution, this is the objective side of it. We have to think not only of ourselves, but of those who are not here yet. Behind the ‘visible We’ are the ‘invisible We’—our friends of the Muslim League, and the representatives of the States are yet to be ascertained. Even when they are here, when this House is fully constituted and is full to capacity, the 400 million people whom we represent will not be here. Therefore, I repeat, in the work that lies before us, we have always to be intensely conscious that this ‘visible We’ is not all that constitutes the Constituent Assembly, but that it has the ‘invisible We’ behind it. Then only shall we be able to frame a constitution which will really confer upon this nation at large, true freedom, true right of living as human beings—call it fundamental rights, call it rights of minorities, or call it what you like. It is only when we realize that we are framing a constitution for an Independent Indian Republic that, as we get along with the work, these problems will gradually clear up and we shall see with a clearer vision further problems that await solution. In all the work we cannot help feeling every moment the presence with us in spirit, of Mahatma Gandhi, that lone but luminous figure who carries on his shoulders the sorrows and afflictions which spring from narrow-mindedness, envy, jealousy, suspicion and distrust, between man and man, and community and community; but who carries in his heart the hope that springs eternal from faith in the Province that shapes our ends. There can be no doubt that in this Constituent Assembly is visible the hand of providence that shapes the destinies of this country, as of others. Inspired by that conscious hope and trust, I have no doubt this Resolution will be passed unanimously with our heart-felt support.

Sri S. Nagappa (Madras: General): Mr Chairman, Sir, I have great pleasure in supporting the Resolution moved by our Hon'ble Vice-President of the Interim Government, Pandit Jawaharlal Nehru. This is a resolution, Sir, that gives wide scope for all the communities and classes of this country. Sir, some of friends who were speaking prior to me have been pressing some sorrow for the sections that are not present here. I think Sir, that we should not have any sorrow for the people who are not present. Really speaking, they do not deserve to be here because they are not Indians. They are more Arabs than Indians; they are more Persians than Indians; they are more Turks than Indians. That is why they look towards foreign countries than towards the independence of this country. If they were really interested in the independence of this country, they would have been present here in this august body and helped the country to be free. Now, Sir, I think those of my friends who felt sorrow for them, can also vacate and go out, if they like. We, the Harijans and Adibasis are the real sons of the soil, and we have every right to frame the Constitution of this country. Even the so-called Caste Hindus who are not real Indians can go, if they want. (Interruptions.) Sir, today we are asking the Britisher to quit. For what reason? Is he not a human being? Has he not a right to live in the country? We ask him to quit because he is a foreigner. So, Sir, we have also a right to ask the Aryan, the migrator to go. We have a right to ask the Mohammedan, the invader, to go out of this country. There is only one consideration. The Caste Hindus of this country do not have any other place to go. That is the only consideration that they deserve. Sir, now we are all Indians. Everyone of us must feel like that. With fellow feeling, we must all join together and help to see our country free as early as possible. None of us want to be slave to a third person or a second person. Everyone wants to be free. Now, Sir, this Resolution gives equal opportunities to all. Equal opportunities should not be in the statute book only. They must be translated into action. Every individual of this country must realize that he is the administrator of the country. He must be made to realize, he must be made to understand that he is the real ruler or this country.

Now, Sir, I need not dwell on the safeguards for the unfortunate children of the soil. Ever since we were defeated by the Aryans, we have been slaves of these people. We have been suffering, but we are prepared to suffer no more. We have realized our responsibilities. We know how to assert ourselves.

Now, Sir, much has been said by so many friends who spoke before me as regards the minorities. Well, Sir, I do not claim that we are a religious minority or a racial minority. I claim that we are a political minority. We are a minority because we were not recognized all these days and we were not given our due share in the administration of the country, but that cannot be forever. You know, Sir, what has been our position? This Resolution gives us a scope and a chance and an opportunity to be equal, to feel like equals and take our due share in the administration of the country.

Now, Sir, we are one-fifth of the population of the whole country. It is impossible for a democratic country to ignore one-fifth of its population. My friends who are outside this House, or who are not taking part in this august Assembly, it is for them to realize. Congress has gone too far in order to facilitate them. Even in accepting this Statement, I fear, Sir, we have been granting what all they have been asking. Our aim should not be simply because a particular section cries, we must be liberal and go on granting whatever they want. It looks as if you have been going on in order to placate a particular community or a section. You have been so tolerant, so liberal, even without caring for your own interest, you have been granting. Now, Sir, what I would request you is that you must be fair to all. If you give any weightage to any minority, that itself gives a scope and chance for other minorities to ask. At that rate I ask you is it possible for any majority to satisfy all such minorities? So I want you to be firm, to be strong, to be fair to all communities. Simply because one section asks, we should not go on granting. It has been said here—I am glad Panditji was kind enough to accept and include in the Resolution—safeguards shall be provided for minorities, Backward and Tribal Areas and Depressed and Backward Classes. This gives equal opportunity to all communities, irrespective of their races or religions. I do not understand, why a particular section should go on asking what is not due, and what is not fair. Simply because they ask, you have been granting. Now it gives an opportunity for the minorities to ask for more and more. What all is said is clear and the Resolution has been very carefully worded, and my only humble request will be to say that every word of it with all the spirit behind it, be translated into action. There is no use of simply passing a resolution and allowing it to be a resolution. The Resolution must find a place cent per cent in action. Only then it has the value of a resolution. It is said, 'Equality of status and of opportunity'. I must say, Sir, that equal opportunity means, one day or other, even a Harijan should be the Premier of India. That sort of opportunity must be there. Equal opportunity must be translated into action. That must be the motive. There is one more thing I would like to place before this Assembly, when I support this Resolution. The masses have been looking forward to this august body when they are shaping the destiny of 400 millions and I hope, Sir, every letter, every word, that has been included in this Resolution, will be translated fully into action.

Mr Jagat Narain Lal (Bihar: General): Mr President, Sir, I consider it a great privilege to be called upon to accord my support to this Resolution. It is in the fitness of things that this memorable Resolution should have been moved by Pandit Jawaharlal Nehru. For it was he, at whose instance the Madras Congress, in the year 1926, passed the Resolution for complete independence. It was under his Presidentship, that, in the year 1929, the Congress adopted the complete independence of India as its creed. Again speaking in 1934, Pandit Jawaharlal Nehru said ‘politically and nationally if it is granted, as it must be, that the people of India are to be the sole arbiters of India’s fate and must therefore have full freedom to draw up their constitution, it follows that this can only be done by means of a constituent assembly elected on the widest franchise. Those who believe in independence have no other choice.’ Therefore, Sir, this Resolution moved by Pandit Jawaharlal Nehru on this memorable occasion in the Constituent Assembly on behalf of this country has a particular value. I consider, Sir, this Resolution as a pledge and a solemn resolve on the part of each one of us sitting in this Assembly, and on the part of the country as a whole. Now since this Constituent Assembly has started its sittings and even before it started its sittings, we have noticed a certain amount of change in the mentality of the British Government. Well, we would like to say there have been several constitutions, evolved by Constituent Assemblies of different varieties in this century and in the previous centuries. It is for the British Government itself to choose what variety of Constituent Assembly it would like this Assembly to be and what variety of constitution it would like this Assembly to adopt. There is, for example, the instance of the United States of America, framing its constitution after the War of Independence, which was waged in the year 1774–75. That was a violent revolution, as we would like to call it. The Constitution that was framed after the War of Independence was one of those constitutions. Later on we find in the 19th century a number of constitutions being evolved by negotiation. In 1867 the Dominion of Canada became a Federation. It was through a peaceful negotiation that the Constitution of this Dominion was framed and accepted by the British Government. Again in 1900, the Australian Commonwealth was brought into being and that also by a constitution which was negotiated peacefully. We have another instance of the Union of South Africa. It became a Commonwealth in 1909 and that also through a constitution framed and accepted peacefully. The latest instance thereafter, is that of Ireland. In 1921 Ireland was asked to enter into a treaty with the British Government. That was after a guerilla warfare and after the Sinn Fein agitation, a prolonged agitation, and after the British Government had done all it could do, to bring about Ulster into being. The case of Ireland is the latest instance and is one which ought to be borne in mind by the British Government and by the present British Cabinet. The sores that are rankling in the minds of the Irishmen will remain fresh as ever and the result has been an alienation which has not yet ceased to exist. If India is to sit in this Constituent Assembly, and if India is to frame a constitution, I again repeat, it is for the British Government to decide whether that Constitution will be of the Irish model, whether that Constitution will be of the USA model or whether that Constitution will be evolved peacefully. Signs are that the British Government have not ceased to try the Ulster methods which they tried in Ireland and so many other countries. If they insist on pursuing those methods, the results will be of the Irish model. I will therefore repeat, I will therefore warn the British Government, that it will be better if it brought about all its methods of persuasion.
and diplomacy into making this Constituent Assembly a success, by its own efforts combined with that of ours.

Well, Sir, I do not like to say much more at this late stage. I want again to repeat that I treat this Resolution as a pledge and as a solemn resolve to bring an independent India into being and that resolve is backed by sanction. The sanction is our own will and our own determination and the will and determination of the entire country which has sent us here. I hope, Sir, when the time comes, as it will, we shall see this Constituent Assembly evolving a constitution for a free and independent India which will come into being peacefully or if not peacefully, by any other method which the British Government choose or we find it necessary to adopt. I have not much more to say, Sir; I support this Resolution, and I hope that at the end, the amendment which was moved by Dr Jayakar, which has no more purpose in being left to stand now, will be withdrawn when the time comes for it.

Shri Algurai Shastri (United Provinces: General): Mr President, I am here to support the Resolution moved by Pandit Jawaharlal Nehru, the beloved leader of our country. No Indian is more fortunate than those who have assembled in this House to frame the Constitution for a free and independent India. What more proud privilege can there be, for an Indian than to fashion the Constitution for his country in this House? Every Indian is eager to support the sentiments and words contained in the Resolution. The noble ideas and sentiments embodied in the Resolution have been the cherished desires of Indians for centuries. There was a day when our country was great, glorious and independent. For centuries India has been in bondage and the young men and women of this country and its old people have been struggling hard, with a burning desire to break the chains of slavery. At last the moment has come when we have assembled here today to declare our land free and independent as stated in the first para of this Resolution. Nothing can be more desirable today than the declaration of independence of our country. Here, we are not declaring India actually independent, but from a practical point of view, we announce that we are going to declare the land independent. It is our firm determination to declare it free and independent. It has been stated in the Resolution that the country, which we declare here independent, shall include all the territories unfortunately termed today as British India. British India is not India but India as a whole is India. I wish, not only the parts of India having at present British governance, but the territories, outside British India termed as Indian states, constituting separate units under paramountcy, should also be included in this free country and the Resolution declares so. The territories such as Pondicherry, Goa, Daman, and Diu, at present under foreign domination, also form parts of India. I wish these all together with Nepal, Bhutan and Sikkim, which constitute our frontier, should also be included in this free land. Such is the conception of this Resolution. All the human ideals of ages—equality, fraternity and brotherhood—are embodied in this Resolution. In the eighth ‘Mandal’ of the ‘Rig Veda’ is a hymn which says:

All human beings are equal. The King should have the same regard for his subject that a mother has for her sons.

I am glad that all such higher ideals, we have been taught for ages, are enunciated in the Resolution and therefore I am here to support it.

The Resolution visualizes a State where there is no dearth of food and cloth and distribution is equitable. It embodies scientific socialistic ideals when it says ‘to each according to his needs and from each according to his capacity’. All the ideals of a State conceived in the ‘Bhagwat’ are embodied in the Resolution. It is the sacred duty of a State to provide its people with all their necessities, says the ‘Bhagwat’:

Annadeh Samvibhagah Prajanam Yathahitah.

The Resolution affirms the equality of men. We wish to eliminate all class distinction existing at present. The behaviour of men with one another should be on the basis of equality. The Resolution affirms this equality and hence I support it. The Resolution does not visualize the creation of a State which will remain isolated from the world and indifferent to its good and bad. But it says that this great land, independent according to its ancient principles, will fulfil its aspirations for advancement and prosperity. Our country and all its resources shall be used for the good of the world and we will have our relations with the world on the basis of the fundamental principle of human welfare and equality. We shall try to live up to the high human ideals enunciated in the ‘Rig Veda’—Devahitam Yadayuh.

Our powerful, advanced and flourishing State shall not exist for its own welfare; rather it shall use all its resources for the welfare of the world. The Resolution places before us a very noble ideal. The most important feature of the Resolution is that it declares that the State we are going to create will have its complete independence of which it has been deprived. To preserve the independence thus regarded, we shall protect the State well. The determination embodied in the Resolution is consistent with the ancient high ideals enunciated in the ‘Rigveda’—Indrastwa Bhiraksatu.

No State, even having gained its independence, can survive and protect itself if it is weak in military power. This truth is accepted in the Resolution and hence I support it. Only the State which has the backing of the people can enjoy a sure existence. When the Resolution promises social and economic equality to all, it visualizes a purely democratic State with the people’s Government. In the Resolution we picture a State with power of legislation vested in the people and with no discrimination between the ruler and the ruled. According to the famous poet Kalidas, an ideal State, like a father, provides its people with protection, education and maintenance.

Only such a State can claim to be an ideal one where the present deplorable discrimination between the ruler and the ruled does not exist, where the people are not oppressed and exploited by the rulers. The people will imagine and desire a State which is based upon these high ideals of the ‘Rigveda’. The Resolution before the House visualizes such a State and hence I support it. This Resolution enables us to show to the world that the independence we conceive is not to serve selfish ends and to rule the people against their will. We find all the Vedic ideals embodied in the Resolution. The noble ideals of state-protection and maintenance of subjects, held high during the Muslim regime, beginning from the reign of Hazrat Umar to Bahadur Shah, are embodied in this Resolution. When Muhammad Bin Qasim had conquered and occupied Sind he sent a letter to the then Caliph asking for his directions as to how he should rule the conquered people. The letter from the Caliph in reply is an important document and a treasure in History. The Caliph’s directives, based on the ideals held by Hazrat Umar, said that he (Muhammad Bin Qasim) should treat the subjects with paternal feelings and protect their life, and property and places of worship. Humayun too, following these very ideals, taught his son Akbar to rule the people. In the Ain-e-Akbari by Akbar, where the relations between the ruler and the ruled are defined, we find nowhere that the people should be oppressed and deprived of their freedom. The former rulers acted on these ideals and we are here to revive them and the Resolution leads us to this noble task.
The Members from Madras follow us easily when we express ourselves in English, and the proceedings of the House also receive convenient publicity. But I thought I should here speak in Hindi. I hear the voices of the sons of Bahadur Shah, now lying in their graves, saying 'In what language are you expressing yourself? You are here to fulfil our desire cherished for centuries. Please express yourself in such a manner that we also may follow.' The spirits of Jayasi, Prithviraj and Sanyukta are eager to hear what we say in this House, they are eager to know what we are here for; they want to know your aspirations and ideals. We are here not to address the people of England but that of India. Numerous dynasties and empires are lying in the old tombs on all sides of Delhi. These tombs and the ashes therein ask us to tell them what we are here for. I want to tell them that we are here to go ahead in spite of all obstacles, with the ideals in defence for which the sons of Bahadur Shah laid down their lives, the Mutiny of 1857 was enacted and for which many old and young men and women of India have been sacrificing their lives for centuries. We are firm in our pious determination; nothing can daunt us; no power can bend us. The spirits of our ancestors resting in their graves are calling upon us to address them in their own language. This is their wish and this is why I have attempted to address you in Hindi.

The Resolution before you is acceptable from all points of view. Dr Jayakar had pleaded for its postponement and so far as the question of reconciliation is concerned we did so. Dr Ambedkar had also advised its postponement and agreeing to his pleas, we did postpone. But if anyone wants to stop us [by] his policy of obstructions, certainly we will not stop. The fight for freedom once begun, though baffled often, is ever won. We will march on and for the sake of reconciliation we will not give up the task we have undertaken. The waves of our ambitions and determination have risen and subsided; today they are immovable like a mountain and cannot be cowed down by the attacks of the British Imperialism.

Mr Shyama's amendment to this Resolution is a patch of hessian on this Kashmiri pashmina. His amendment and that of Dr Jayakar too, should be rejected and the Resolution, in its original form, should be passed.

Mr President: The meeting now adjourns till 11 a.m. tomorrow.

The Assembly adjourned till Eleven of the Clock, on Tuesday, the 21st January, 1947.

3. ‘Excluded Areas Must Go’

New Delhi, 19 Jan.—'The Congress stands for the abolition of Excluded and Partially Excluded areas. It wants one administration for the country', declared Acharya Kripalani, Congress President, in the course of his inaugural address at the All-India Excluded and Partially Excluded Areas Conference held here today.

One of the evils of British rule in India, Acharya Kripalani added, has been the attempt to fossilize barriers and classifications among the people. The creation of excluded and semi-excluded areas has been brought about in pursuance of the divide and rule policy, although the reasons advanced for that by the British are anthropological.

The Congress, he pointed out had made it clear in its Faizapur and Haripura sessions that it stood for the abolition of excluded and semi-excluded areas. What it wanted was one administration for the country. The demand for special recognition and special protection for a group of people was a demand for perpetuation of distinctions which in the long run would prove detrimental to the country.
He advised the delegates to have confidence in Congress leadership instead of demanding separate representation in the advisory committee to be set up by the Constituent Assembly. Division in small watertight compartments would prove injurious at a time when there was a move to merge these areas in provinces so as to evolve one constitution for the general Indian population.

President’s Plea

Mr Devendranath Samath, the president of the conference, also made a plea for the abolition of such classifications as Excluded and Partially Excluded Areas.

Such distinctions, he said, were introduced by the British Government with the ulterior motive of creating division and had not done any good to the people concerned. He hoped that the frame of the new constitution would bring these areas under the ordinary law of the land. He pleaded for adequate representation of Adibasis in the minorities committee of the Constituent Assembly.

He urged the Central and Provincial Governments to take adequate measures to uplift the tribal people economically, socially and politically.

Mr P. Kodandaramayya, chairman of the reception committee, said: ‘I appeal to the members of the Constituent Assembly in the name of humanity to treat the tribal people on the same footing as others and thereby avoid the creation of another minority and another perpetual problem. Civilization and culture can be real only when they are not withheld from any one for the mere accident of birth in an area or community.’

Mr A.N. Sinha, Finance Minister of Bihar, said that the Bihar Government were doing their bit for the uplift of Adibasis and had sanctioned a sum of Rs 5,00,000 for their welfare. He emphasized the need for the spirit of selfless service.

Mr Rohini Chaudhry, MLA (Central), appealed to Adibasis of other provinces to help their brethren in Assam.

The conference adopted a number of resolutions demanding representation of the association on the advisory committee, opposing compulsory grouping, condemning immigration from Bengal into Assam, requesting the Constituent Assembly to abolish the principle of exclusion of any area from normal administration, advising the Constituent Assembly not to divide into sections immediately after the formation of the advisory committee without discussing and finally accepting their recommendations. The conference expressed sympathy with the victims of riots in Hazara.—API

4. Discussions on Objectives Resolution

Extract from Debate in the Constituent Assembly, 21 January 1947

Sri K. Madhava Menon (Madras: General): Mr President, Sir I stand here to support the Resolution moved by Pandit Jawaharlal Nehru, I know, it does not require much more support from anybody, as very little opposition has been made to the proposition. It is absolutely necessary that we pass this Resolution without any further delay. As Sir Alladi pointed out in his speech, you may search the proceedings of any constituent assembly in vain to find that no such Resolution had been moved or passed before the other business of the Assembly began. We have already waited too long in this matter and I think we shall be failing in our duty if we delay it any further. We must realize that the whole country is looking towards us with hope, as to what we are going to do for them. The only objection, if I can call it an objection, is the amendment moved by Dr Jayakar. In principle, Dr Jayakar’s amendment does not differ much from the Resolution moved, except that Dr Jayakar wants us to wait, or if I may say so, give an opportunity for those who are absent here, to partake in the resolution. Dr Jayakar says that two of the partners are absent, one for reasons not known to us, the other being impossible for it to come here. It is fair that we should wait for them. He mentioned why not we wait till the 20th January, when we are meeting again. We have waited, Sir, as he wanted and we hope that he will have no reason to complain that his request has been disregarded by us.

The objection raised by Dr Jayakar that under the terms of 16 May Statement of the Cabinet Mission, we are precluded from passing a resolution like this at the preliminary meeting, is contradictory to his own resolution which says what the objects and aims of this Assembly should be. Dr Jayakar said that the fundamentals of the Constitution need not be mentioned here, and I do not think we have mentioned fundamentals of the Constitution here, but have only mentioned our objects and aims. He said—and I was rather surprised when he said it—that if the Muslim League will not come in, the States also will not come in, and Dr Jayakar mentioned or rather visualized, that if we passed this Resolution here before the Muslim League comes in, there will be a Hindustan, a Pakistan and a Rajasthan in this country. I felt that his imagination was running riot when he visualized the coming in of three ‘sthans’—Hindustan, Pakistan and Rajasthan. I am sure that no such contingency is going to come and no such contingency should frighten us from passing this Resolution. If we delay further on the ground that others are absent here, I am afraid we are only putting a premium on intransigence. I wish we will not do so but proceed with the resolution and pass it without further delay.

Mr B. Das (Orissa: General): Mr President, some of us were hesitating during the last session that this Resolution may be adjourned to a later date so that the absent ones can come; not that I was not whole-heartedly for the Resolution. As a Congressman and as an Indian, I concur whole-heartedly with the principles enunciated in the Resolution of Pandit Jawaharlal Nehru. Not that it was not enunciated before, but at the beginning of our constitution-framing career we wanted that an enunciation of our goal and objectives should be made in this House, in which all the members of this House should take part. It is my sorrow, however, that the Muslim League, some of whom have been our co-workers in public life, are absent. At that time, foolishly some of us thought that they will come now and participate in the declaration of our national objectives and rights and at the same time take a willing share of the joys of the coming dawn of freedom. But that is not to be. One cannot understand how the members of the Muslim League, who are our friends, intimate friends, intimate associates and intimate co-operators in our life-time for the last twenty-thirty years, how they can abstain from coming in at this stage.

I cannot understand what they want. It is said that they want two nations; they want Pakistan. Mahatma Gandhi, the other day has said, let them have the Pakistan Provinces or a Pakistan country whereby we will know what is the greatest ideal of the Muslim nation, whereby they can show that a Pakistan country is a better governed country than the Hindustan or the Panthistan that the Sikhs want. What are our Muslim friends afraid of, and why is it that they are not here? Sir, there are three parties concerned, the British, the Muslim League and the Congress. The British government are the stumbling block in our way. Even the declaration of His Majesty’s Government’s further clarification of the Statement of the 16 May, by their statement of 6th December, shown that the British are not helping India to achieve independence. What is it that is obstructing our Muslim friends? Sir, the Qaid-e-Azam has been my political guru at the beginning of my career in the Legislative Assembly. I still admire him as a friend. But I cannot understand him as a leader of the party. I do not understand what he wants. There are members in the Working Committee of the Muslim League who are my personal friends, and friends of many of the people who are here. I cannot understand how Abdul Matin Chaudhury or Nawab Ismail Khan or Raja Ghazanfar Ali Khan or Hussain Imam and others, cannot live with Hindus in Hindustan or in the Union of India as brothers. Unfortunately, I am sorry I find that most of the leaders of the Muslim League live in the so-called Hindustan. I have not yet found any Muslim Leaguer of the Pakistan Provinces of Bengal or Punjab who has got great political principles for the guidance of this country or the world, or has enunciated his principles. I am not here to point out the differences between the Congress and the Muslim League. I am here to appeal to the Muslim League from this forum that it is high time that they, who are our friends outside, should be friends in this House. If they differ from us on the point of Pakistan, let them give us their views. Let them tell us whether they want an independent Republic Pakistan or whether they want a Dominion Pakistan? What do they want? I want to appeal to my friends in the Muslim League to think of their old, old associations, the old neighbourly feelings and to come early to this House so that we can all take part in securing independence for India which is so dear to our hearts.

I have said nothing on the main Resolution because I agree with everything that is enunciated there. That has been our dream for these years. I conclude my speech again with an appeal to Mr Jinnah and my Muslim League friends to come and tell us where we are making a mistake, to tell the Hindus also where the Hindus are making a mistake and are not allowing Mr Jinnah to build up an independent nation. With that I conclude my remarks....

Rev Jerome D'Souza (Madras: General): Mr President, I wish to pay a warm and sincere tribute to the spirit which has animated this momentous Resolution of the Hon’ble Pandit Jawaharlal Nehru. Sir, it is the custom among all sections of our people to accept in an unquestioned manner the democratic creed as universally applicable to us. But I do not know. Sir, if people who make this verbal profession realize all the implications of it and are prepared to carry it out in every way in practical life to the extent to which such profession really does imply.

Sir, whatever may be the objections that may have been raised against this or that part of the Resolution, I take it as an adequate, as a careful, and as an entirely acceptable profession of the democratic creed, of the Government of the people, for the people, and by the people. I think, Sir, that if the spirit that animates it, continues to be applied to the details of the Constitution that this great Assembly will draw up, if it is applied in the daily administration of the Provinces and of the Centre, there will be no section of our people that will have reason to complain, and contentment is bound to follow.

Dr Ambedkar remarked in the course of his speech, that the ideological or the theoretical part of it contained an expression of opinion which is accepted by all, almost implying that it was something of a commonplace in political and journalistic thought. I am not sure, Sir, if that is quite true for any part of the world, and even if it were broadly true, there are occasions when these ordinarily accepted things need to be repeated and asserted solemnly and forcefully. It is said of a great European statesman, Talleyrand, that, when a certain sentiment was declared to be unnecessarily repeated, that ‘it went without saying’, he remarked that ‘it would go all the better for being repeated, once again’. I take it, Sir, that on this solemn occasion, this profession of our democratic belief is made in a solemn, public, and irrevocable manner. In this sense I believe that every section of our people will welcome the very carefully-weighed and poised manner in which these convictions have been expressed. No doubt, Sir, all this will require amplification, elucidation. Permit me, Sir, to draw the attention of this House to a double danger which, I think, it is necessary to be prepared against. On the one hand, in applying those principles of individual liberty, for which ample provision has been made in this preambulary declaration, it will be difficult to resist, I say it will be difficult to resist from the very motive of love of country and the desire for rapid improvement and progress in our land, the desire to do things more by force and regimentation, more by the authority and power of the Central State, then by agreement, than by persuasion. It is a temptation to which many great men and lovers of their country have succumbed. But in the manner in which provision will be made to prevent such suppression of individual liberties, I hope and trust, that our great country may give an example of a consistent adhesion to those principles of agreement and consensus of opinion, and not overweight the power of the State in a manner as one of the previous speakers said, that will reduce the individual to a mere robot. That is one danger, Sir.

The other danger, undoubtedly present, is one which affects us as members of a minority community. The danger would be not that the minorities would have any of their special rights or necessary safeguards overridden by any mistaken sense of jealousy or opposition or lack of fairness; I do not think that the great majority communities of India or any of their most honoured representatives would be guilty of all that unfair overriding of privileges and safeguards; but by a genuine, though mistaken love of country and desire for unanimity and homogeneity, which it is not possible to have and which perhaps is not even necessary, they may try to pass measures which will seriously wound and grieve the minorities or special groups. In the last session of this Assembly one speaker said, among things which were acceptable to every part of the House, used an expression in regard to minorities which I respectfully submit we could not possibly accept. It was said that no nation, no great people could prosper and survive with permanent minorities within, that, somehow or other, they have got to be ‘absorbed’, and he quoted the example of the United States as a country in which this process of absorption is taking place. I do understand, Sir, the sense in which this was said, namely, that there should be a certain degree of homogeneity and that there should be a common recognition of common interests and rights and that the State and the nation should be organized on the recognition of these common rights and interests. This is essential. But, Sir, ‘absorption’ in the sense of cultural or religious or any other absorption is something against which it is necessary for us to guard, and it is, I am sure, not the wish of the majority communities nor the sober reflecting opinion of this great house, that they should impose any thing on any minority, which would lead to such absorption. Sir, I wish the example of a country like Switzerland is borne in mind. Even in the United States, in spite of their common language and a universally accepted Constitution, linguistic minorities are permitted to develop the culture of their motherland, whether it be Germany or Italy or France. There remain still, in the great Commonwealth of Canada, two sections of people, Scottish and English on the one hand, and the ancient French community on the other, living in complete amity, following the customs and the spirit of their own motherlands and developing their own literature. One section of the Commonwealth of Canada finds it easy to co-operate and collaborate with the other sections and work for the glory and success of a country which is recognized to be a single nation. In Switzerland, three groups with three languages and with a difference of religion, sometimes sharply pronounced, are maintained in a confederation which has known how to defend itself against the onslaught of envious people and has defended itself in no uncertain manner through centuries. I am sure, Sir, that the strength of this land will be based upon the strength of individual members of the different communities. And they will not achieve their full strength unless they base themselves upon convictions and ideals which are their very own. Cultural autonomy for which I am pleading and which has been promised as far as it is not inconsistent with national strength, even though it may appear in some sense as opposed to national unity, is still consistent with it. Undoubtedly there is a way of exaggerating these cultural peculiarities. I am sure that quite apart from subscribing to different beliefs, it is possible for members of all communities, Hindu, Muslim, Christian and Parsi, to accept the common heritage of this great land and secure that degree of uniformity, that degree of common agreement, on the basis of which national unity can be built up. I know, Sir, speaking for my own community, the Christian community, that there have been times when our countrymen looked upon this community and religion as being unduly associated with a culture that was not Indian, unduly identified with what has been called Europeanizing ways, but I should like to assure this great Assembly that it is not necessary, that it has not always been the case, that again and again people of my persuasion, whether they came from another land or whether they were from this land, have acted in complete conformity with the finest traditions of this country. On the opening day, Sir, the esteemed Vice-Chancellor of the Benares University, Dr S. Radhakrishnan, referred to the first Englishman who had come to this land, the Jesuit Thomas Stevens, and said that after him there came merchants and conquerors and that now we see the end of that ‘invasion’. I should like to assure this House, Sir,—what I am sure, Sir S. Radhakrishnan knows—that the merchants, the traders and the conquerors had nothing to do with the Jesuit who preceded them. On the contrary, Sir, he came to India at a moment when there was no hospitality for him in his own land, from where he was banished under the threat of persecution. This great country offered him hospitality and he made this land his own, learnt its language and has written a book which Marathi scholars tell me is a classic, the ‘Purana’ of Thomas Stevens. It is in that spirit, Sir, that the adherents of that faith wish to come here and it is in that spirit that we wish to collaborate in the task of national reconstruction for the prosperity and the greatness of this land.

I should not like to take the time of the House much longer, but I cannot avoid saying something upon another point about which much has been said, but I hope to be able to say something about it, which may perhaps be a new point of view. Much has been said about the sovereignty of the people, about the possibility of that principle being inconsistent with the principle of monarchy, and about the dangers and difficulties which might arise therefrom. Sir, this doctrine of the sovereignty of the people is not a new doctrine. It is not a nineteenth century doctrine. The history of political thought in Europe shows that there was a struggle round about that doctrine in the sixteenth century when certain kings claimed the Divine Right of Government; and against them, it may interest this house to know, even conservative thinkers, thinkers who were monarchists, asserted the sovereignty of the people. St. Robert Billarmine and Suarez asserted this against James I of England, though they interpreted it in a different way from Rousseau, who in later times conceived that the power of the State came from the people by the pooling and the coalescing of all the rights of the people which they are imagined to surrender. But the State, Sir, is not a sort of undesirable excrescence resulting from the surrender of individual liberty. The State is a natural outcome of the nature of man who has to perfect himself in social and community life, with a necessary central authority. That authority comes, as Sir S. Radhakrishnan stated, from the moral law and that is the basis upon which the rights of individuals and of the State have to be maintained. That ultimate authority, Sir, some would prefer to express it as coming from Almighty God as the author of nature and of all moral law. I cannot help expressing a regret, Sir, that the name of Almighty God finds no place in this momentous declaration. I understand, Sir, the reasons which moved the Hon’ble framer and mover of this Resolution in not bringing in anything which may look like a religious profession, but you will permit me, Sir, to say before concluding my remarks, that if by some way in this momentous preambulatory declaration the name of Almighty God had been brought in, it would have been in conformity with the persuasion, with the convictions, with the spirit of this vast land of ours and its ancient civilization. Sir, although it has not been brought up here, I do believe that the State ultimately receives from Him that sanction and approbation which gives it a certain sacredness. I am not pleading here for a doctrine by which the State is made divine. But I do mean that the subjects of the State, when they accept that State and are citizens of it, must obey it conscientiously, must feel that it is their duty to accept the authority of the Government of their land. Sir, we believe in Providence; we believe that the unfolding of History with all its vicissitudes still reveals a Providential design. Even though His sacred name is not here, I sincerely believe that we have met here under the covert of His protection and His Grace which alone moves the hearts of men. We hope and pray that the deliberations that we have begun with the solemn and preambulatory declaration will be taken to their legitimate conclusion by the same grace and that the land for which we are labouring will rise again with new strength, with new prosperity, with new happiness.

Mr HJ. Khandekar (CP and Berar: General): Mr President, I am here to support the Resolution moved by the Hon’ble Pandit Jawaharlal Nehru. We are going to frame the Constitution for India today. The people of India and we sought for such an opportunity to frame it ourselves and I am glad the occasion has come now. When the Constitution for India is going to be framed by us, it should be drafted in our national language. It is our duty and in pursuance of this I am delivering my speech in Hindustani. I belong to a community which has been backward and depressed in India for many thousands of years. I am a Harijan and I shall place before you the voice of 90 millions of Harijans in India. The Harijan Community is accepting this Resolution with great pleasure for the sole reason that the Resolution embodies safeguards for all the minorities in India. Speaking against this Resolution and for Dr Jayakar’s amendment, my friend, Dr Ambedkar, said that India should remain united and have a strong central government. He was not happy and satisfied with his recent visit to England. I am very pleased by the speech he has delivered on his return to India and I hope he will stick to it. I hope, God grants him a little more good sense, he will give up the demand for separate electorates and also stop saying henceforth ‘I am not a Hindu’ which he has been telling up till now. I pray to God to give him good sense and I have hopes that He will.

If I describe to you the condition of Harijans, you will be moved. They have been and are still being subjected to endless oppressions and cruelties. We endured these cruelties with patience and never thought of abandoning our faith. We are Hindus, will remain Hindus and will secure our rights as Hindus. We will never say we are not Hindus. Undoubtedly we are Hindus and we will, as Hindus, fight the Hindus and secure our rights. We know that 90 per cent of the victims of the atrocities committed in Noakhali and East Bengal were Harijans. Their houses were burnt, their children were killed and women were molested. Above all, many thousands of Harijans had to submit to forcible conversion. If any community is given any weightage more than in proportion to its numerical strength, certainly Harijans will also fight for weightage according to their numerical strength. What was done to the community which is backward and down-trodden today? I remind you of the Poona Pact. I place before you the example of my own province. In Central Provinces where we constitute 25 per cent of the population and we are entitled to twenty-eight seats, we are given only twenty seats in pursuance of the Poona Pact. Where have our eight seats gone? In my province our Muslim brethren form four per cent of the population. On the basis of their numerical strength in the Province, they are entitled to get six seats only. But I am sorry the eight seats of Harijans were taken away from them and given to Muslim brethren and thus they got fourteen seats instead of six. Harijans cannot tolerate such injustice. They should be given representation according to this numerical strength. May be, your census records shows the number of Harijans in India as 40 or 50 millions but I can emphatically say that our population is never less than that of Muslims. We are ninety millions and we should get representation according to our numerical strength.

One thing is wanting in the Resolution, and, if the mover agrees, it can be modified. The Resolution promises safeguards and rights to all the minorities. But unfortunately there are 10 million people in India who, without any fault on their part, are described as criminal tribes from their very birth. Hundreds of thousands of men and women in India were declared as criminal tribes according to the current law. To deprive them of their rights they are declared so. No matter whether they are criminals or not, from their very birth they are made criminals.
Some provision to abolish this law must be embodied in this Resolution. I hope the mover will realize it and provide some safeguards for this Class in the Resolution.

The Congress has passed a resolution accepting the grouping clause in the Cabinet Mission Plan. Though a Congressman, I feel apprehension as to what would happen to the Depressed Classes in ‘B’ and ‘C’ groups. I have been thinking over it since the Congress accepted it. Though directly there is no Pakistan in Bengal today, still Harijans were subjected to great atrocities there. The members here, who have witnessed the happenings there, are greatly surprised.
From the newspapers it appears that to the extent of ninety per cent it was the Harijans who were subjected to cruelties there. I am afraid no untouchable will remain alive in regions where Pakistan is established after the acceptance of the grouping clause. The Harijans of those regions, where the establishment of Pakistan is dreamt of, will have to accept either forced conversion or death. They are weak and are likely to be subjected to various atrocities and even at present people commit atrocities on them. Every community is increasing its strength to achieve its political demand. A day will come when because of the grouping provision our numerical strength will be weakened and that of other communities will be strengthened. And with the growth of their strength, no Harijan will exist in their provinces. Therefore, when considering this Resolution we must provide special safeguards for the Harijans of those provinces, where they are in such plight. It is in view of this fact that Dr Ambedkar has pleaded for a strong central government. If in Provincial Legislatures the Harijans are not given representation according to their numerical strength, the fears which we feel in the case of Bengal, and to which I have been an eye witness, will continue to remain. If we are given full representation in the Central Legislature, all such fears will vanish. I support the Resolution whole-heartedly and hope that all the members in the House will do their best to restore the rights, of which our backward community has been deprived for thousands of years. Wherever the question of allotting seats arose, we were given one or two seats. This is happening in the case of local bodies in many provinces. Many times we demanded representation according to our numerical strength.
But laws have been enacted merely to the effect, that if no Harijan is elected, one should be selected and if this is not possible, a nomination should be made.

Even where the Harijans form more than fifty per cent of the population, there also only one member from them is selected or nominated. It shows that the attention of the people has not yet been drawn towards us. Therefore whenever occasion arises attempt should be made to secure us representation according to our numerical strength. And then alone we can feel that you are doing something for us. If you want to satisfy us, by giving one or two seats, that will not do. The Harijan community is awakened now; it is politically conscious of its rights, to secure which, it will throw in its full strength. With these words I conclude my speech and hope you will pay due consideration to our rights and will not let us remain in the position in which we have been so long. With this hope I support the Resolution....

Dr H.C. Mookherjee (Bengal: General): Mr President, so far as my own community is concerned, I have always tried to adhere to the principle contained in that English proverb ‘Little children should be seen and not heard’. On this particular occasion, I feel compelled to support the Resolution moved by Pandit Jawaharlal Nehru because I submit it is absolutely essential that the world should know that behind this Resolution we not only have the great Indian parties but also small, minute minorities, religious and social groups to one of which I belong. That is the reason why I am standing here. Those who have preceded me have amplified in much detail everything that can be said upon the Resolution in question. What is of special interest to me, is to be found in the 5th and 6th paragraphs of the Resolution.
These are the things which appeal to me, because I believe, that the leadership which has come hitherto from the Congress, will be retained by the Congress so long as it adheres to the principles laid down therein.

So far as other points are concerned, I am not immediately interested in them, but what strikes me with great grief, is the fact that difficulty should have arisen amongst ourselves and inside India. I shall not specify the different parties but it seems to me that so far as the difficulties of minorities, whether major or minor, are concerned, the difficulties are to be found as regards enjoyment of civic and political rights. These rights are fundamental and would be applicable to every social and religious group. So far as religious rights are concerned, we have freedom of worship. Every religion today is militant. Those days are gone when the Christian missionary, the Muslim maulvi or the Sikh guru could afford to make inroads upon the great Hindu majority community with impunity. Every religion is militant today and enjoys the power of converting people into its own fold. I do not see why we should be doubtful in this matter,—I am referring to the Christian group—about our rights in the matter of propaganda.

The Congress has been the spear-head of nationalism and so long as it looks to the progress of the country, I will not question it. It will not only gain the allegiance of the rest of India but also of the smallest of minorities including my own....

Mr S.H. Prater (Madras: General): Sir, in an earlier stage of the debate on this Resolution, a representative of my community supported an amendment of Dr Jayakar for the postponement of this Resolution. We now feel that such postponement is no longer valid or justifiable (hear, hear), and this House should proceed forthwith to accept and pass this Resolution.

This Resolution embodies what should be the objective of this Assembly—to create and establish a system of Government which will give India the status of an independent sovereign State. And in accepting this Resolution, this Assembly will be taking the first step in implementing this purpose, by declaring our will to vest India with complete control and authority in her domestic affairs, and to vest her with complete independence of action in the field of international relationship.

The attainment of this independence will depend upon our solving for ourselves the problem of self-government. The terms of this Resolution lay down the basis of this solution. It is a resolution of compromise. Its terms fall completely within the Cabinet Mission’s Proposals, which are designed to provide a via media between opposing claims of the Congress and the Muslim League. These proposals may be repugnant to this party or that. But the need of to-day is the need for men to recognize those truths which they most dislike and to sacrifice their several ideals to the common good. There are two truths which must be recognized, and those truths are embodied in the terms of this Resolution—one, that any constitution that we build up, must be based on provincial autonomy, and two, that there must be a union of all the autonomous States and Provinces. The history of India teaches that, from the time of the Mauryas down to the days of the British, India has remained a country of separate States, Kingdoms and Provinces with separate national identities, separate national cultures which engender and have always engendered strong local patriotism. It is not the communal differences of the hour, but it is these local patriotisms which have governed the political evolution of India, as we know it to-day. A strong unitary government, a confirmed policy of centralization which marked the earlier stages of British administration and rule, had to give way before these inexorable forces to decentralization, to the increasing devolution of power from the Centre to the provinces and to the increasing independence of provincial administration. Provincial autonomy came to us not as an extraneous proposition, it was directed by the peremptory need of a country, composed of various States and provinces, peopled by various races, whose cultural, economic and political needs could only be met by autonomous rule. The grant of provincial autonomy and residuary powers to the Province as envisaged in this Resolution meets this need. But if history teaches that provincial autonomy can be the only basis upon which we can build a new constitution, it equally proves that there must be a union of these provinces in a single State governed by a single central authority. Whenever such supreme power was absent to hold the balance between the various provinces, there was always struggle and strife, with its disastrous consequences to the country as a whole. It is only by a Union such as this Resolution envisages that we can secure mutual peace and common prosperity of the peoples of this country. It is only by such a Union that we can secure their integrity from foreign aggression. It is only by such a Union that the people of India can, as a group, become a dominant power in world politics. This Union, whatever the factors against it, will be established, because it arises from and is based on reality and truth. It is based on deep human needs. But if this Union of ours is not to be a mere geographical name, but a real union of the hearts and minds of men, it must be founded not on suspicion, not on the advantages that this political party or that may gain, but on a spirit of sympathy understanding and compromise which is the essence of true statesmanship.

And this brings me to the question of minorities. The Resolution advocates the fundamental rights of every citizen in this country. It also advocates the fullest protection to the minorities. This is a question which not only concerns the smaller minorities, it is a question which also concerns the major elements of the population, Hindus and Muslims, who may relapse into the position of minorities in various areas of the country. As such, the protection of minorities becomes the key to the framing of the whole Constitution, because if we are aiming at unity, such unity can only be achieved by measures which will give to the minorities in the Provinces and in the groups of Provinces the fullest protection for social, economic, religious and cultural needs.
Eventually, the whole question will depend upon the goodwill, sympathy and understanding of this Assembly. We are a sovereign body, but let us approach our task, not in the spirit of legislators moved by no emotion, but by a majority vote. Let us approach our task rather in the spirit of negotiators, who in every decision that we make seek to obtain the acceptance of those whom those decisions will most affect. Once we establish such a convention, I think our work will go smoothly. In this Assembly we have the means of reaching a common measure of agreement between all elements of this country. Let us by common effort, common endeavour, in a spirit of true compromise, endeavour to achieve the common good. (Cheers)....

Mr C.M. Poonacha (Coorg): Mr President, Sir, I wish to express myself whole-heartedly in support of the Resolution moved by the Hon’ble Pandit Jawaharlal Nehru. In doing so I have to draw the attention of the House to the discussions that have taken place outside this Assembly. There has been a sort of questioning of the competence of this Assembly so far as the passing of a resolution of this kind is concerned before addressing ourselves to the tasks ahead, I think, it is necessary for us to take up for consideration, a resolution setting out the objectives for which we are assembled here. For that purpose I do feel that our action in this respect is not contrary to what is already contained in the State Paper. We are by this Resolution, more or less, attempting to cross the t’s and dot the i’s of what is contained in the Statement of May 16, 1946. We are not doing anything beyond the limits of the framework of what is stated in the said State Paper.

So far as the other points are concerned, I would like to draw the attention of the House to the fact of the sovereign rights vesting with the people of India. Here seems to be some controversy going on as regards these sovereign rights, particularly in Indian States. They do not contest the fact that in British India sovereignty vests with the people of British India and when that is so, there can be no argument against the sovereignty of the people in the Indian States as well. It was a historical truism, Sir, that there are States with Rulers ruling over people, and also States administering rules without the Rules. But there cannot be Rulers without the people. Therefore, it conclusively proves that the sovereignty of the people is a recognized fact of human activities which is demonstrated not merely by a resolution of this type but from history which has proved all along that it is the people who own the State and who confer the administrative headship on Rulers and kings.

Much has been said, Sir, about minorities. Instead of claiming that we are a minority of so many millions or that we are a minority of so many crores, I would suggest that we should better consider about the many more millions that are yet to be born. We are not here purely for the purpose of drawing up a constitution for the present generation only. We are here for framing a constitution for the coming generations also. So, the task of framing a free-India constitution for ourselves, as well as for the coming generations, makes our duty all the more onerous. Therefore we will have to be more considerate, more responsible, more specific about our intentions. In doing so, it is within our competence, it is within our province, within our jurisdiction to set before us the objectives which we are working for. Not only to ourselves and to our poor millions, but also to the world, let us better state now, for what we stand and for what purpose we have assembled here. This Resolution clearly expresses our cherished intentions and, so, Sir, I whole-heartedly support this Resolution.

Shri Vishwambhar Dayal Tripathi (United Provinces: General): Mr President and friends: When we are going to frame the Constitution for our land, it is but natural that we should think on what basic principles our future constitution—the constitution for a free and independent India—should be framed. Therefore I support the Resolution on the fundamental principles of the Constitution moved by the Hon’ble Pandit Jawaharlal Nehru. I want to draw your attention to some of the important clauses of the Resolution. Besides other things, basic principles are embodied in paras, 4 and 5 of the Resolution. As far as the basic principles embodied in the above-mentioned paragraphs are concerned, I am in complete agreement with them. But I would like to tell you that these principles are enunciated not only in our constitution but they are accepted by almost all the countries in their respective Constitutions. But in spite of the embodiment of these basic principles in the Constitutions of various countries, and despite the declaration by their politicians that their Constitutions would function according to them, we find that these principles are never practiced. If you go through the Constitutions of England, France, America and Netherlands or peruse the declarations made by their politicians and administrators, you will find that these principles, in some way or other, are accepted by them also. But in spite of this we find that these empires do not practise them. Throughout Asia, Indo-China, Java, Burma and India, we find that the European Imperialisms do not care to work according to these principles, though they are present in their respective Constitutions. Therefore, it is essential for us to consider in what way we can put them in practice. This is an important desideratum for us.

As I have said before, I want to draw your special attention to three paragraphs. In the 4th paragraph it is stated that we will frame a constitution for a sovereign and independent India, wherein all powers and authority are derived from the people. So far as this principle is concerned, it is very sound and every one will welcome it. But those who are students of politics know how these principles were misused in many countries. One of my friends just referred to the Constitution of England and said how the same had been misused there. Many centuries ago, the renowned politician of England, Mr Hobbes, had established the principle that all powers of State are derived from the people. But the monarchs of England misused this principle. The monarchs indeed accepted that all powers and authorities are derived from the people, but at the same time they told the world that once the people delegated the powers and authorities to the rulers, those powers no more remained with the people. The evil consequence of this we find in the theory of the ‘Divine Right of Kings’ in history. Therefore, it is very essential, that when we say ‘all powers and authorities are derived from the people,’ we must also make it clear that the same shall remain always vested in the people. And for this reason I attempted to put in an amendment to this effect. But for many reasons, the amendment could not be put in. Therefore, when we draft the Constitution later on, we must think over it and embody this in our Constitution.

So far as the 5th and 6th paragraphs are concerned, the principles embodied in them are very attractive and desirable. In some way or other, they are present in the Constitutions of almost all the countries, but they are never practised. And, therefore, we must consider well as to how we should translate these principles into action, and, when drafting the Constitution, we should pay particular attention to it. It is stated here, that the Constitution which will be drawn up and the State which will be established on the basis of that Constitution, will guarantee social, economic and political justice to all the people. No doubt it sounds very good. But you know that the body, which is vested with power and authority, interprets the term ‘justice’ in its own way. If, in our country, the power and authority tomorrow passes on to the capitalists, they will interpret the term ‘social, economic and political justice’ in their own way. But, if, in reality the power and authority are vested in the people, their representative will interpret it correctly. Therefore, it is necessary that we embody in the Constitution some such safeguards.
that the body vested with the power and authority may not interpret these principles in their own arbitrary way. To achieve this and there is only one way and it is this. When we frame the Constitution, we should declare it beforehand that our Constitution shall not be framed, and the State created under that Constitution shall not be established on a capitalistic basis. If we do not do so now, the rulers may later on interpret these principles in their own arbitrary way and against the best interests of the people.

Much has been said before you about the Muslim League and Mr. Jinnah and most of it is correct. But I would like to tell you that if before drawing up the Constitution, you declare that our Constitution shall be drawn up on socialistic lines, undoubtedly many of our Muslim brethren will be gladly willing to cooperate with us.

All the minorities, whether Muslims or Harijans, have doubts and fears in their hearts as to how the rulers would interpret these principles after the Constitution is drawn up. Therefore, if we are to remove their doubts and fears, we should declare it now, that our Constitution shall be framed, and the government to be created under the Constitution shall be formed, on a socialistic and positively not on a capitalistic basis. We should make this clear. For this reason, I had put in an amendment and had suggested that the word ‘socialistic’ should be added before ‘India’ in the Resolution. Again, I would say that if we want the principle embodied in the Resolution to be put into practice, the only way to secure this end is to draw up the Constitution on a socialistic basis. The Hon’ble Pandit Jawaharlal Nehru, in his speech delivered in the beginning, referred to my amendment and said something. He clearly said that he wants to draw up the Constitution on socialistic lines later on and that he did not want any controversy to arise on the Resolution at this Stage. But I would submit with respect that there is no question of controversy. If really we mean to do some good to the people, if we want not only to remove the British rule but to build such a social and economic structure, whereby the people may get full opportunity for their advancement, it is very essential that we draw up our Constitution on socialistic lines. I think this will solve all the existing problems of minorities whether they be Muslims, Harijans or others. No doubt there are many among us who do not favour socialistic principles, but so far as the Congress is concerned, it has already accepted them. It declared in its election manifesto that it stands for the abolition of the zamindari system, and the nationalization of the key industries. Therefore, when the Congress has already accepted these principles, it becomes our duty to frame the Constitution on the basis of these very principles. Some may have objections to it, but I think ninety-nine or ninety-eight per cent of the people will have no objection at all. The public will be fully benefited when we accept socialistic ideals and draw up the Constitution on that basis.

I want to draw your attention to one more fundamental thing. When we are declaring our solemn resolve to establish an Independent Sovereign Republic State in our land we should also decide whether this Constituent Assembly is a sovereign body or not. If it has no sovereign rights, it cannot frame a constitution embodying sovereign rights. It has been said in the Resolution that this Constituent Assembly resolves to declare India an Independent Sovereign Republic. Under these circumstances, we should also declare by another resolution, that this Constituent Assembly is a sovereign body. The State Paper of May 16 has placed various limitations and restrictions on our functions. I need not go into details. All of you know it well. But I want to tell you one thing in this connection. We have assembled in this house, not because the Constituent Assembly owes its creation to the State Paper, but because it is the outcome of the sufferings and sacrifices of the country made during the last fifty or sixty years, and particularly during the last five or six years. The sufferings and sacrifices made by the country have compelled the British politicians to form this Assembly and to speak of the transference of power to you. I want to make it perfectly clear to you that we have assembled here, not as a result of the State Paper, but as a result of the great agitation the country made during last five or six years.

This Constituent Assembly is the result of the movement of 1942 when the Congress passed the ‘Quit India’ Resolution, it is the result of the heroic deeds of the Indian National Army, the exploits of which are before us; it is the result of the heroic deeds of our respected great revolutionary leader, Shri Subhash Chandra Bose, who showed how we can organize and fight the big powers for the liberation of our land. Therefore, it is totally wrong to attribute the existence of this Assembly to the State Paper. This Assembly is the outcome of the work done by our country inside and outside the land within the last five or six years. I want to make it clear that it has derived its power and authority from the people and not from the British Parliament.
Therefore, we should now declare that this Constituent Assembly is a Sovereign body. It has derived its power and authority from the people and not from the British Parliament and we are not prepared to accept any limitation that the British Parliament may unconstitutionally impose upon it. I hope, in order to translate the principles embodied in the Resolution into practice, we will adopt all such measures that may enable us to establish an independent State in our land. It is crystal clear that our Independent State shall be established on socialistic lines so that the poor people of our land may be fully benefited.

I do not want to take any more of your time and support the Resolution with these words...

5. Nehru’s Speech on the Objectives Resolution and Its Adoption
Extract from Constituent Assembly Proceedings, 22 January 1947

The Hon’ble Pandit Jawaharlal Nehru (United Provinces: General): *[English translation of Hindustani speech begins.] Mr President, six weeks have passed since I moved this Resolution.
I had thought then that the resolution would be discussed and passed within two or three days, but later the House decided to postpone it in order to give time to others to think over it. The decision to postpone an important Resolution like this was probably not to the linking of others like me, but I did not doubt that the decision was sound and proper. The anxiety and impatience in our hearts was not for the passage of the Resolution, which was simply a symbol, but to attain the high aims which were enshrined in it. It is also our intense desire to march on with all others and reach our goal with millions of Indians. Therefore, it was advisable to postpone the Resolution and to afford ample opportunity not only to this House but also to the country in general to think over it. The sense of all amendments and specially the amendment moved by Dr Jayakar was generally for postponement. I am grateful to Dr Jayakar for the withdrawal of his amendment and I thank the others also who have withdrawn their amendments. Many members have spoken on the Resolution. Their number may be thirty or forty or more. Almost all of them have supported it without any criticism. Some of them, of course, have drawn our attention to some particular matters. I am of opinion that if a plebiscite of the crores of people of India is taken, all of them will be found to stand for the Resolution; though there might be some who would lay more or less emphasis on some particular aspect of the Resolution.
The Resolution was meant to clothe in words the desire of crores of Indians and it was very carefully worded so as to avoid any strongly controversial issue. There is no need to say a great deal about this but with your permission, I would like to draw your attention to some points. One of the reasons for the postponement of the Resolution was that we wished that our brothers, who had not come here, should be in a position to decide to come in. They have had a full month to consider the matter but I regret that they have not yet decided to come.
However as I have already said at the outset, we will keep the door open for them and they will be welcomed up to the last moment, and we will give them and others, who have a right to come in, every opportunity for coming in. But it is clear that while the door remains open, our work cannot be held up. It has, therefore, become indispensable for us to proceed further and carry the resolution to its logical conclusion. I have hopes that even at this stage those, who are absent, would decide to come in.

Some of us, even though they are in agreement with this Resolution, were in favour of postponing some other business too so that the absentees might not find any obstacle in their way to come in. I am in sympathy with this suggestion but in spite of this I am at a loss to understand how this suggestion could be put forward. That is a question of waiting; not that of postponing the resolution. We have waited for six long weeks. This is no matter of weeks; ages have slipped by while we have been waiting. How long are we to wait now? Many of us who waited have since passed away and many are nearing the end of their lives. We have waited enough and now we cannot wait any longer. We are to further the work of the Assembly, speed up the pace and finish our work soon. You should bear in mind that this Assembly is not only to pass resolutions; I may point out that the Constitution, which we frame, is not an end by itself; but it would be only the basis for further work.

The first task of this Assembly is to free India through a new constitution to feed the starving people and cloth, the naked masses, and to give every Indian fullest opportunity to develop himself according to his capacity. This is certainly a great task. Look at India today. We are sitting here and there in despair in many places, and unrest in many cities. The atmosphere is surcharged with these quarrels and feuds which are called communal disturbances, and unfortunately we sometimes cannot avoid them. But at present the greatest and most important question in India is how to solve the problem of the poor and the starving. Wherever we turn, we are confronted with this problem. If we cannot solve this problem soon, all our paper constitutions will become useless and purposeless. Keeping this aspect in view, who could suggest to us to postpone and wait?

A point has been raised from one side that some ideas contained in the Resolution do not commend themselves to the Rulers of the States, because they conflict with the powers of the Princes. A suggestion has also been made to postpone the decision about the States in the absence of their representatives. It is a fact they are not present here but if we wait for them it is not possible for us to finish the work even at the end of the Constituent Assembly according to the plan. This is impossible. Our scheme was not that they should come in at the end. We invited them to come in at the beginning. If they come, they are welcome. Nobody is going to place any obstacles. If there is any hesitation, it is on their part only. A month ago you formed a Committee to get into touch with their representatives. We were always anxious to discuss with them although we did not get any opportunity for it. That is no fault of ours. We did not ask for time. We want to finish our work as early as possible. I am informed they complain of the following words contained in the Resolution.

’Sovereignty belongs to the people and rests with the people’
That is to say, the final decision should rest with the people of the States. They object to this. It is certainly a surprising objection. It may not be very surprising if those people who have lived in an atmosphere of mediaevalism do not give up their cherished illusions, but in the modern age how can a man believe for a moment in the divine and despotic rights of a human being? I fail to understand how any Indian, whether he belongs to a State or to any other part of the country, could dare utter, such things. It is scandalous now to put forward an idea which originated in the world hundreds of years ago and was buried deep in the earth long before our present age. However, I would respectfully tell them to desist from saying such things. They are putting wrong thing [sic] before the world and by doing so they are lowering their own status and weakening their own position. At least this Assembly is not prepared to damage its very foundation and, if it does so, it will shake the very basis of our whole constitution.

We claim in this Resolution to frame a free and democratic Indian Republic. A question may be asked what relation will that Republic bear to other countries of the world? What would be its relations with England, the British Commonwealth and other countries? This Resolution means that we are completely free and are not included in any group except the Union of Nations which is now being formed in the world. The truth is that the world has totally changed. The meanings of words too are changing. Today any man who can think a little, will come to the conclusion that the only way to remove the doubts and dangers from the world, is to unite all the nations and ask them to work together and help each other. The organization of the United Nations is not free from big gaps and fissures. Thousands of difficulties lie ahead and a great deal of suspicion exists between countries. I have already said that we are not thinking in terms of isolating ourselves from the world. We will work in complete cooperation with other countries. It is not an easy thing to work in cooperation with England or the British Commonwealth, and yet we are prepared to do so. We will forget our old quarrels, strive to achieve our complete independence and stretch our hands of friendship to other countries, but that friendship shall in no case mar or weaken our freedom.

This is not a resolution of war; it is simply to put our legitimate rights before the world; and in doing so if we are challenged, we will not hesitate in accepting that challenge. But after all, this is resolution of goodwill and compromise, among the people of India, whatever their community or religion and with the different countries of the world including England and the British Commonwealth of Nations. The Resolution claims to be on friendly terms with all and it has been put before you with that motive and intention. I hope you will accept it.

A friend has suggested that it would be advisable to move the Resolution just on the eve of the Independence Day which is due to come after four days only. But I will ask him if it is proper to delay a proper thing even for a moment? Not a moment’s postponement is advisable and we should finish our work as soon as possible.

This Resolution which has been put before you is in a new form and in a new shape, but I would like to tell you that it has a long trail of resolutions pledges and declarations including the world-famed resolutions of ‘Independence’ and ‘Quit India’ behind. It is high time to fulfil our pledges which we made from time to time. How are these pledges to be fulfilled? The right answer lies with you and I hope you will not only accept the Resolution but also fulfil it as you fulfil a solemn pledge.

One thing more I would like to tell you. We have been confronted and will again be confronted with various questions. Persons of various groups, communities, and interests would look at it from different points of view, and diverse questions and problems would be raised by them, but we should all bear in mind that we should not, on the eve of Independence, allow ourselves to be carried away by petty matters. If India goes down, all will go down; if India thrives, all will thrive and if India lives, all will live including the parties, communities and groups.

With your permission I would like to say something in English also. [English translation of Hindustani speech ends.]

Mr President, It was my proud privilege, Sir, six weeks ago, to move this Resolution before this Hon’ble House. I felt the weight and solemnity of that occasion. It was not a mere form of words that I placed before the House, carefully chosen as those words were. But those words and the Resolution represented something far more; they represented the depth of our being; they represented the agony and hopes of the nation coming at last to fruition. As I stood here on that occasion I felt the past crowding round me, and I felt also the future taking shape. We stood on the razor’s edge of the present, and as I was speaking, I was addressing not only this Hon’ble House, but the millions of India, who were vastly interested in our work. And because I felt that we were coming to the end of an age, I had a sense of our forbears watching this undertaking of ours and possibly blessing it, if we moved aright, and the future, of which we became trustees, became almost a living thing, taking shape and moving before our eyes. It was a great responsibility to be trustees of the future, and it was some responsibility also to be inheritors of the great past of ours. And between that great past and the great future which we envisage, we stood on the edge of the present and the weight of that occasion, I have no doubt, impressed itself upon this Hon’ble House.

So, I placed this Resolution before the House, and I had hoped that it could be passed in a day or two and we could start our other work immediately. But after a long debate this House decided to postpone further consideration of this Resolution. May I confess that I was a little disappointed because I was impatient that we should go forward? I felt that we were not true to the pledges that we had taken by lingering on the road. It was a bad beginning that we should postpone even such an important Resolution about objectives. Would that imply that our future work would go along slowly and be postponed from time to time? Nevertheless. I have no doubt, that the decision this House took in its wisdom in postponing this Resolution, was a right decision, because we have always balanced two factors, one, the urgent necessity in reaching our goal, and the other, that we should reach it in proper time and with as great a unanimity as possible. It was right, therefore, if I may say with all respect, that this House decided to adjourn consideration of this Motion and thus not only demonstrated before the world our earnest desire to have all those people here who have not so far come in here, but also to assure the country and every one else, how anxious we were to have the cooperation of all. Since then six weeks have passed, and during these weeks there has been plenty of opportunity for those, who wanted to come, to come. Unfortunately, they have not yet decided to come and they still hover in this state of indecision. I regret that, and all I can say is this, that we shall welcome them at any future time when they may wish to come. But it should be made clear without any possibility of misunderstanding that no work will be held up in future, whether any one comes or not. (Cheers) There has been waiting enough. Not only waiting six weeks, but many in this country have waited for years and years, and the country has waited for some generations now. How long are we to wait? And if we, some of us, who are more prosperous can afford to wait, what about the waiting of the hungry and the starving? This Resolution will not feed the hungry or the starving, but it brings a promise of many things—it brings the promise of freedom, it brings the promise of food and opportunity for all. Therefore, the sooner we set about it the better. So we waited for six weeks, and during these six weeks the country thought about it, pondered over it, and other countries also, and other people who are interested have thought about it. Now we have come back here to take up the further consideration of this Resolution. We have had a long debate and we stand on the verge of passing it. I am grateful to Dr. Jayakar and Mr. Sahaya for having withdrawn their amendments. Dr. Jayakar’s purpose was served by the postponing of this Resolution, and it appears now that there is no one in this House who does not accept fully this Resolution as it is. It may be, some would like it to be slightly differently worded or the emphasis placed more on this part or on that part. But taking it as a whole, it is a resolution which has already received the full assent of this House, and there is little doubt that it has received the full assent of the country. (Cheers.)

There have been some criticisms of it, notably, from some of the Princes. Their first criticism has been that such a Resolution should not be passed in the absence of the representatives of the States. In part I agree with that criticism, that is to say, I should have liked all the States being properly represented here, the whole of India—every part of India being properly represented here—when we pass this Resolution. But if they are not here it is not our fault. It is largely the fault of the Scheme under which we are functioning, and we have this choice before us. Are we to postpone our functioning because some people cannot be here? That would be a dreadful thing if we stopped not only this Resolution, but possibly so much else, because representatives of the States are not here. So far as we are concerned, they can come in at the earliest possible moment, we will welcome them if they send proper representatives of the States. So far as we are concerned, even during the last six weeks or a month, we have made some effort to get into touch with the Committee representing the States Rulers to find a way for their proper representation here. It is not our fault that there has been any delay. We are anxious to get every one in, whether it is the representatives of the Muslim League or the States or any one else. We shall continue to persevere in this endeavour so that this House may be as fully representative of the country as it is possible to be. So, we cannot postpone this Resolution or anything else because some people are not here.

Another point has been raised: the idea of the sovereignty of the people, which is enshrined in this Resolution, does not commend itself to certain rulers of Indian States. That is a surprising objection and, if I may say so, if that objection is raised in all seriousness by anybody, be he a Ruler or a Minister, it is enough to condemn the Indian States system of every Ruler or Minister that exists in India. It is a scandalous thing for any man to say, however highly placed he may be, that he is here by special divine dispensation to rule over human beings today. That is a thing which is an intolerable presumption on any man’s part, and it is a thing which this House will never allow and will repudiate if it is put before it. We have heard a lot about this Divine Right of Kings we had read a lot about of it in past histories and we had thought that we had heard the last of it and that it had been put an end to and buried deep down into the earth long ages ago. If any individual in India or elsewhere raises it today, he would be doing so without any relation to the present in India. So, I would suggest to such persons in all seriousness that, if they want to be respected or considered with any measure of friendliness, no such idea should be even hinted at, much less said. On this there is going to be no compromise. (Hear, hear).

But, as I made plain on the previous occasion when I spoke, this Resolution makes it clear that we are not interfering in the internal affairs of the States. I even said that we are not interfering with the system of monarchy in the States, if the people of the States so want it. I gave the example of the Irish Republic in the British Commonwealth and it is conceivable to me that within the Indian Republic, there might be monarchies if the people so desire. That is entirely for them to determine. This Resolution and, presumably, the Constitution that we make, will not interfere with that matter. Inevitably it will be necessary to bring about uniformity in the freedom of the various parts of India, because it is inconceivable to me that certain parts of India should have democratic freedom and certain others should be denied it. That cannot be. That will give rise to trouble, just as in the wide world today there is trouble because some countries are free and some are not. Much more trouble will there be if there is freedom in parts of India and lack of freedom in other parts of India.

But we are not laying down in this Resolution any strict system in regard to the governance of the Indian States. All that we say is this that they, or such of them, as are big enough to form unions or group themselves into small unions, will be autonomous units with a very large measure of freedom to do as they choose, subject no doubt to certain central functions in which they will co-operate with the Centre, in which they will be represented in the Centre and in which the Centre will have control. So that, in a sense, this Resolution does not interfere with the inner working of those Units. They will be autonomous and, as I have said, if those Units choose to have some kind of constitutional monarchy at their head, they would be welcome to do so. For my part, I am for a Republic in India as anywhere else. But whatever my views may be on that subject, it is not my desire to impose my will on others; whatever the views of this House may be on this subject, I imagine that it is not the desire of this House to impose its will in these matters.

So, the objection of the Ruler of an Indian State to this Resolution becomes an objection, in theory, to the theoretical implications and the practical implications of the doctrine of sovereignty of the people. To nothing else does any one object. That is an objection which cannot stand for an instant. We claim in this Resolution to frame a constitution for a Sovereign, Independent, Indian Republic—necessarily Republic. What else can we have in India? Whatever the States may have or may not have, it is impossible and inconceivable and undesirable to think in any other terms, but in terms of the Republic in India.

Now, what relation will that Republic bear to the other countries of the world, to England and to the British Commonwealth and the rest? For a long time past we have taken a pledge on Independence Day that India must sever her connection with Great Britain, because that connection had become an emblem of British domination. At no time have we thought in terms of isolating ourselves in this part of the world from other countries or of being hostile to countries which have dominated over us. On the eve of this great occasion, when we stand on the threshold of freedom we do not wish to carry a trail of hostility with us against any other country. We want to be friendly to all. We want to be friendly with the British people and the British Commonwealth of Nations.

But what I would like this House to consider is this: When these words and these labels are fast changing their meaning and in the world today there is no isolation, you cannot live apart from the others. You must co-operate or you must fight. There is no middle way. We wish for peace. We do not want to fight any nation if we can help it. The only possible real objective that we, in common with other nations, can have is the objective of co-operating in building up some kind of world structure, call it 'One World', call it what you like. The beginnings of this world structure have been laid down in the United Nations Organization. It is feeble yet; it has many defects; nevertheless, it is the beginning of the world structure. And India has pledged herself to cooperate in that work.

Now, if we think of that structure and our co-operation with other countries in achieving it, where does the question come of our being tied up with this Group of Nations or that Group? Indeed, the more groups and blocks are formed, the weaker will that great structure become.

Therefore, in order to strengthen that big structure, it is desirable for all countries not to insist, not to lay stress on separate groups and separate blocks. I know that there are such separate groups and blocks today and because they exist today, there is hostility between them, and there is even talk of war among them. I do not know what the future will bring to us, whether peace or war. We stand on the edge of a precipice and there are various forces which pull us on one side in favour of co-operation and peace, and on the other, push us towards the precipice of war and disintegration. I am not prophet enough to know what will happen, but I do know that those who desire peace must depurate separate blocks which necessarily become hostile to other blocks. Therefore India, in so far as it has a foreign policy, has declared that it wants to remain independent and free of all these blocks and that it wants to cooperate on equal terms with all countries. It is a difficult position because, when people are full of fear of each other, any person who tries to be neutral is suspected of sympathy—with the other party. We can see that in India and we can see that in the wider sphere of world politics. Recently an American statesman criticized India in words which show how lacking in knowledge and understanding even the statesmen of America are. Because we follow our own policy, this group of nations thinks that we are siding with the other and that group of nations thinks that we are siding with this. That is bound to happen. If we seek to be a free, independent, democratic republic, it is not to dissociate ourselves from other countries, but rather as a free nation to co-operate in the fullest measure with other countries for peace and freedom, to cooperate with Britain, with the British Commonwealth of Nations, with the United States of America, with the Soviet Union, and with all other countries, big and small. But real co-operation would only come between us and these other nations when we know that we are free to cooperate and are not imposed upon and forced to co-operate. So long as there is the slightest trace of compulsion, there can be no co-operation.

Therefore, I commend this Resolution to the House and I commend this Resolution, if I may say so, not only to this House but to the world at large so that it can be perfectly clear that it is a gesture of friendship to all, and, that behind it there lies no hostility. We have suffered enough in the past. We have struggled sufficiently, we may have to struggle again, but under the leadership of a very great personality we have sought always to think in terms of friendship and goodwill towards others, even those who opposed us. How far we have succeeded, we do not know, because we are weak human beings. Nevertheless, the impress of that message has found a place in the hearts of millions of people of this country, and even when we err and go astray, we cannot forget it. Some of us may be little men, some may be big, but whether we are small men or big, for the moment we represent a great cause and therefore something of the shadow of greatness falls upon us. Today in this Assembly we represent a mighty cause and this Resolution that I have placed before you gives some semblance of that cause. We shall pass this Resolution, and I hope that this Resolution will lead us to a constitution on the lines suggested by this Resolution. I trust that the Constitution itself will lead us to the real freedom that we have clamoured for and that real freedom in turn will bring food to our starving peoples, clothing for them, housing for them and all manner of opportunities of progress, that it will lead also to the freedom of the other countries of Asia, because in a sense, however unworthy we have become—let us recognize it—the leaders of the freedom movement of Asia, and whatever we do, we should think of ourselves in these larger terms. When some petty matter divides us and we have difficulties and conflicts amongst ourselves over these small matters, let us remember not only this Resolution, but this great responsibility that we shoulder, the responsibility of the freedom of 400 million people of India, the responsibility of the leadership of a large part of Asia, the responsibility of being some kind of guide to vast numbers of people all over the world. It is a tremendous responsibility. If we remember it, perhaps we may not bicker so much over this seat or that post, over some small gain for this group or that. The one thing that should be obvious to all of us is this that there is no group in India, no party, no religious community, which can prosper if India does not prosper. If India goes down, we go down, all of us, whether we have a few seats more or less, whether we get a slight advantage or we do not. But if it is well with India, if India lives as a vital free country, then it is well with all of us to whatever community or religion we might belong.

We shall frame the Constitution, and I hope it will be a good constitution, but does anyone in this House imagine that, when a free India emerges, it will be bound down by anything that even this House might lay down for it? A free India will see the bursting forth of the energy of a mighty nation. What it will do and what it will not, I do not know, [...] that it will not consent to be bound down by anything. Some people imagine that what we do now, may not be touched for 10 years or 20 years, if we do not do it today, we will not be able to do it later.
That seems to me a complete misapprehension. I am not placing before the House what I want done and what I do not want done, but I should like the House to consider that we are on the eve of revolutionary changes, revolutionary in every sense of the word, because when the spirit of a nation breaks its bonds, it functions in peculiar ways and it should function in strange ways. It may be that the Constitution, this House may frame, may not satisfy that free India. This House cannot bind down the next generation, or the people who will duly succeed us in this task. Therefore, let us not trouble ourselves too much about the petty details of what we do, those details will not survive for long, if they are achieved in conflict. What we achieve in unanimity, what we achieve by co-operation is likely to survive. What we gain here and there by conflict and by overbearing manners and by threats will not survive long. It will only leave a trail of bad blood. And so now I commend this Resolution to the House and may I read the last para of this Resolution? But one word more, Sir, before I read it. India is a great country, great in her resources, great in her man-power, great in her potential, in every way. I have little doubt that a Free India on every plane will play a big part on the world stage, even on the narrowest plane of material power, and I should like India to play that great part in that plane. Nevertheless today there is a conflict in the world between forces in different planes.
We hear a lot about the atom bomb and the various kinds of energy that it represents and in essence today there is a conflict in the world between two things, that atom bomb and what it represents and the spirit of humanity. I hope that while India will no doubt play a great part in all the material spheres, she will always lay stress on that spirit of humanity, and I have no doubt in my mind, that ultimately in this conflict, that is confronting the world, the human spirit will prevail over the atom bomb. May this Resolution bear fruit and may the time come when in the words of this Resolution, this ancient land attains its rightful and honoured place in the world and makes its full and willing contribution to the promotion of world peace and the welfare of mankind.

Mr President: The time has now arrived when you should give your solemn votes on this Resolution. Remembering the solemnity of the occasion and the greatness of the pledge and the promise which this Resolution contains, I hope every Member will stand up in his place when giving his vote in favour of it.
I will read the Resolution:

This Constituent Assembly declares its firm and solemn resolve to proclaim India as an Independent Sovereign Republic and to draw up for her future governance a Constitution:

(2) WHEREIN the territories that now comprise British India, the territories that now form the Indian States, and such other parts of India as are outside British India and the States as well as such other territories as are willing to be constituted into the Independent Sovereign India shall be a Union of them all; and

(3) WHEREIN the said territories, whether with their present boundaries or with such others as may be determined by the Constituent Assembly and thereafter according to law of the Constitution shall possess and retain the status of autonomous units, together with residuary powers, and exercise all powers and functions of government and administration, save and except such powers and functions as are vested in or assigned to the Union, or as are inherent or implied in the Union or resulting therefrom; and

(4) WHEREIN all power and authority of the Sovereign Independent India, its constituent parts and organs of government, are derived from the people; and

(5) WHEREIN shall be guaranteed and secured to all the people of India justice, social, economic, and political; equality of status, of opportunity, and before the law; freedom of thought, expression, belief, faith, worship, vocation, association and action, subject to law and public morality; and

(6) WHEREIN adequate safeguards shall be provided for minorities, backward and tribal areas, and depressed and other backward classes; and

(7) WHEREBY shall be maintained the integrity of the territory of the Republic and its sovereign rights on land, sea and air according to justice and the law of civilised nations; and

(8) this ancient land attain its rightful and honoured place in the world—and make its full and willing contribution to the promotion of world peace and the welfare of mankind.

I have got the Urdu translation also. Unfortunately I am not able to read it. I shall be glad if some other Member could read it for me.

(Shri Mohanlal Saksena then read the Urdu translation of the Resolution.)

Mr President: I will request Members now to stand in their places and vote in favour of this Resolution.

The Resolution was adopted, all members standing.

6. ‘Proceedings Leave No Chance for Compromise’

Quetta, Wednesday.—The following statement has been issued to the Press by Choudhri Mohammad Amin, Member, All-India Muslim League Council from Baluchistan:

‘The way in which the Constituent Assembly is proceeding with its work, clearly shows that the Congress has no desire that the Muslim League should get in.

‘Its President Dr Rajendra Prasad has tried in his statement before the House on 20 January, to prove the representative character of that Body.

‘According to him, with the exception of Muslim League, all other parties are fully represented and are taking part in the work. Knowing fully well the fact that the Muslim League represents the entire Muslim Nation after Congress, the only other major party in India is Muslim League, without whose co-operation their efforts cannot be crowned with success, Dr Rajendra Prasad in his statement, has tried to treat the Muslim League as if it was a part whose cooperation according to him was not very necessary.

'On the other side, Mr Gandhi is instigating Congress leaders in Assam, the Sikhs of the Punjab and Khan Brothers of the NWFP, in order to torpedo the Grouping Scheme by every means in his power.

'The Congressmen have never showed a spirit of real co-operation towards Muslims. Had they any genuine desire to do so, they should have like good brothers, postponed the work of the Constituent Assembly in order to give time to the Muslim League to review its previous resolution of boycotting the Constituent Assembly.

'The present state of affairs hardly shows anything encouraging so far as the Muslims are concerned. With a handful of Muslims, whose number could be counted on fingers the Congress is still clinging to the false idea that it represents the whole of India.

The speeches being made from day to day by top-ranking Congress leaders including Mr Gandhi and the way in which they are hurrying up with the work of the Constituent Assembly is leaving no chance of any peaceful settlement between the two major parties'.

7. Constitution of the Advisory Committee

Extract from the Constituent Assembly Proceedings, 24 January 1947

Election of the Advisory Committee

The Hon'ble Pandit Govind Ballabh Pant: Sir, I beg to leave to make the motion standing in my name which runs thus:

'This Assembly resolves that in pursuance of paragraph 20 of the Cabinet Mission's Statement of 16 May, 1946, an Advisory Committee be constituted as hereinafter set out:—

1. (a) The Advisory Committee shall consist of not more than 68 members who may include persons who are not members of the Assembly.
(b) (i) It shall consist initially of 52 members who shall be elected by the Assembly in accordance with the principle of proportional representation by means of the single transferable vote.
(ii) The Assembly may elect in such manner as the President may deem appropriate up to 7 members.
(c) The President may at any one time or at different times nominate members to the Committee not exceeding 9.

2. The Advisory Committee shall appoint Sub-Committees to prepare schemes for the Administration of the North-Western Tribal Areas, the North-Eastern Tribal Areas and the Excluded and Partially Excluded Areas. Each of such Sub-Committees may co-opt not more than 2 members from the particular tribal territory under its considerations for the time being, to assist it in its work in relation to that territory.

3. The Advisory Committee may appoint other Sub-Committees from time to time as it may deem necessary.
4. The Advisory Committee shall submit the final reports to the Union Constituent Assembly within three months and may submit interim reports from time to time.

5. Casual vacancies in the Advisory Committee shall be filled as soon as possible after they occur in the manner in which the seat in respect of which the vacancy had arisen was originally filled.

6. The President may make standing orders for the conduct of the proceedings of the Committee.

I have tried to give a factual narrative and analysis and a certain degree of elucidation of the Resolution that is under consideration. With the permission of Hon'ble Members and the President, I should like to make a few remarks of a general character. The question of minorities everywhere looms large in constitutional discussions. Many a constitution has foundered on this rock. A satisfactory solution of questions pertaining to minorities will ensure the health, vitality and strength of the free State of India that will come into existence as a result of our discussions here. The question of minorities cannot possibly be overrated. It has been used so far for creating strife, distrust and cleavage between the different sections of the Indian nation. Imperialism thrives on such strife. It is interested in fomenting such tendencies. So far, the minorities have been incited and have been influenced in a manner which has hampered the growth of cohesion and unity. But now it is necessary that a new chapter should start and we should all realize our responsibility. Unless the minorities are fully satisfied, we cannot make progress; we cannot even maintain peace in an undisturbed manner. So, all that can possibly be done should be done. We should have, in fact, proposed a Committee of this type, even if there had been no mention of it in the Statement of 16th May. If Hon'ble Members will refer to the Objectives Resolution which was passed unanimously by this House, they will find these words in Clauses (5) and (6):

Wherein shall be guaranteed and secured to all the people of India justice, social, economic, and political; equality of status, of opportunity, and before the law; freedom of thought, expression, belief, faith, worship, vocation, association and action, subject to law and public morality; and wherein adequate safeguards shall be provided for minorities, Backward and Tribal Areas, and Depressed and other Backward Classes.

So, the House has already accepted the fundamentals of this Resolution and it has done so unanimously. It is a matter which should hearten the minorities. The essence of these rights has already been conceded and conceded voluntarily and unanimously by all the Members of this House. I hope every effort will be made in this Advisory Committee to reach decisions that will fully satisfy the minorities. Hon'ble Members may be aware, and if they are not, I believe I will not be disclosing a secret when I tell them, that the entire strength of this Committee has been fixed in accordance with the wishes of one and each of every one of all the minorities in this House. It represents their complete agreement. We have subordinated every other consideration in order to secure contentment and satisfaction. The task of constitution making is a practical one and we should not be lost in the doctrinaire maze; we should look at problems from a realistic point of view and see that the decisions that we take are not only just, but are also regarded as just by those affected thereby. We trust that in this Committee every regard will be paid to the wishes of the different minorities and the decisions taken will be fully satisfactory to them.

In this connection, I should also like to remind the minorities of some of the historical developments of recent years. As Hon’ble Members may be aware, after the termination of the first World War, a number of States were set up, especially in Eastern Europe and provisions for the protection of minorities were incorporated in the Constitutions of these States such as Czechoslovakia, Austria, Bulgaria, Poland and others. Not only were such provisions incorporated in the Constitutions, but they formed part of solemn stipulations in the treaties entered into between the Associated and Allied powers, as they are called, and these new States that were then brought into existence. Guarantees were given by the Allied and Associated Powers to the minorities in these various States. Declarations were also made at International Conferences and by the League of Nations. They were assured by outside authorities and guarantees were given by treaties entered into by them with these Associated Powers. But, what was the result. No minority had been the victim of greater and more ruthless tyranny and oppression, atrocities and brutalities than the minorities that lived in these States and some of them have perhaps completely faded away and disappeared since. Let not the minorities look to any outside power for the protection of their rights. This will never help them. Let not the lesson of history be lost. It is a lesson which should be burnt deep in the hearts and minds of all minorities that they can find their protection only from the people in whose midst they live and it is on the establishment of mutual goodwill, mutual trust, cordiality and amity that the rights and interests not only of the majorities but also of the minorities depend. This lesson of history, I hope, will not be forgotten.

It is not for me to attempt any dissertation on the various aspects of minorities or fundamental rights. I cannot however refrain from referring to a morbid tendency which has gripped this country for the last many years. The individual citizen who is really the backbone of the State, the pivot, the cardinal centre of all social activity, and whose happiness and satisfaction should be the goal of every social mechanism, has been lost here in that indiscriminate body known as the community. We have even forgotten that a citizen exists as such. There is the unwholesome, and to some extent a degrading habit of thinking always in terms of communities and never in terms of citizens. (Cheers) But it is after all citizens that form communities and the individual as such is essentially the core of all mechanisms and means and devices that are adopted for securing progress and advancement. It is the welfare and happiness of the individual citizen which is the object of every sound administrator and statesman. So let us remember that it is the citizen that must count. It is the citizen that forms the base as well as the summit of the social pyramid and his importance, his dignity and his sanctity, should always be remembered. If you bear this in mind, I think we shall understand and appreciate the importance of the fundamental right. Because, on the proper appreciation of these rights has depended the progress of humanity. The Atlantic Charter with its Four Freedoms, the Charter of rights of men from the time of Paine and Wells to that of the Declaration made last year represent the noble advance in the history of human race. After all we must remember that the goal and objective of all human activity is a World State in which all citizens would possess the cosmopolitan outlook, would be equal in the eye of the law and would have full and ample opportunity for economic, social and political self-fulfilment. We find that in our own country we have to take particular care of the Depressed Classes, the Scheduled Castes and the Backward classes. We have to atone for our omissions—I won’t use the word commissions. We must do all we can to bring them up to the general level and it is a real necessity as much in our interest as in theirs that the gap should be bridged. The strength of the chain is measured by the weakest link of it and so until every link is fully revitalised, we will not have a healthy body politic. I hope this Advisory Committee will place before itself the ideals for which humanity has worked. It will try to forge such sanctions and such rights as will enable this Assembly not only to frame a constitution but to achieve the independence of India. We are here not only for a formal task but for a real one and that has to be fulfilled. Let us hope that this Advisory committee will bring concord and amity, goodwill and trust, in place of mutual strife, that occupies the political stage today and, that as a result of the deliberations of this Committee we will have prepared the ground for Independent India for which we live, for which many have died and for which alone life is worth living. (Loud Cheers.)

Mr President: Sardar Harnam Singh is going to second this.

Sardar Harnam Singh (Punjab: Sikh): Mr President, the Advisory Committee which has to be formed under the provisions of the Statement of 16 May is a very important Committee from many points of view. All of us know that it is the minorities problem in India that has held up the progress of this country for a number of years and a satisfactory solution of this problem, I believe, will lead to the prosperity of the country. We have laid down, in the Objectives Resolution that in the future Constitution of India, an adequate provision for the protection of all minorities has to be provided for. As far as the Congress is concerned, beginning with 1922 when the demand was made for a Constituent Assembly of India, several resolutions have been passed in which it has been laid down by the Congress that provisions for the protection of minorities have to be made to the satisfaction of the minorities concerned. Therefore I am glad that the Congress Party in this House has agreed to the constitution of this body which has commended itself to all members in the Constituent Assembly of India. As to what the ultimate solution of the communal problem proposed by this Advisory Committee may be nobody can say at this stage. But we all know that the whole of the communal problem is before this Minority Committee. The clauses for the protection of minorities which have to be framed by this Advisory Committee, have some relation to existing facts. The clauses for the protection of minorities pertain to the religious, cultural, economic, administrative and political spheres. Communities in India have heretofore laid stress on certain provisions in the Government of India Act, as provisions which may be retained for the proper protection of minorities. Whether the Advisory Committee would make its report on those lines it is not for me to say at this stage. Those provisions all of us know. We know that Anglo-Indians have got section 242 of the Government of India Act. Certain other communities have laid stress on the weightage provided to them. Other communities have insisted on the retention of separate electorates. Some of these provisions may have done mischief in years past, but I do believe that this Advisory Committee will consider the question of the protection of minorities from all these various points of view and, whatever is good in the larger interests of the country and also in the interests of the minorities, that will find a place in the report of this Advisory Committee.

Sir, for a proper understanding of this Advisory Committee and its functions we have to go into all that lengthy correspondence which passed between Maulana Abul Kalam Azad, Mr M.A. Jinnah and Lord Pethick Lawrence. In one of the letters that Maulana Abul Kalam Azad wrote to Pethick Lawrence he insisted that for a proper solution of the communal problem there must be consent of all the parties affected, and in fact, on the 12th May 1946 when the Congress formulated eight points as a basis for agreement, point No. 6 was that as far as the minority problem was concerned, the Congress stood for the consent of communities concerned for a satisfactory solution of the problem. Therefore I hope that when this Advisory Committee sits to initiate and formulate proposals for the protection of minorities and fundamental rights, the whole field would have been covered, and it would be covered in such a way that it would be fair to the larger as well as the smaller interests so that all communities—big or small—would feel satisfied with the recommendations of this Advisory Committee. With these few words, Sir, I second the Resolution moved by Pandit Govind Ballabh Pant.

Mr President: I find that in the Order Paper, notice has been given of several amendments.
I think the most convenient course would be to ask the amendments to be moved on each particular clause. Therefore, all those members who have got any amendment on any particular clause will move the amendment when I name the particular clause.

The first is clause 1 (a). Mr Munshi has given notice of an amendment.

Mr Damber Singh Gurung (Bengal: General): On a point of information, Sir, before any amendments are moved, may I know whether any time has been given for giving notice of amendments? This Resolution has been circulated only just now. Members have to be given some time.

Mr President: I understand this Resolution was circulated several days ago.

Mr Damber Singh Gurung: But this has been circulated here to the members just now. It may have been circulated several days ago in the party meeting.

Mr President: No, no. The Resolution which has been moved by Pandit Pant was circulated to Members several days ago.

Mr Damber Singh Gurung: My point is: now there is no Muslim League here. This thing was circulated in the party meeting.

Mr President: No. I think you are under a misunderstanding. I am referring to the Resolution which was moved by Pandit Govind Ballabh Pant. Notice of that Resolution was given to members several days ago. No other amendment has yet been moved...

Mr Damber Singh Gurung: But this Resolution was just given to the members.

Mr President: Here in the House? I am afraid you are referring to some other Resolution.
This one was circulated several days ago.

Mr K.M. Munshi (Bombay: General): Sir, I beg to move that in sub paragraph (a) of paragraph 1 of the Resolution, substitute the number ‘72’ for the number ‘68’. As already explained by Mr Govind Ballabh Pant, it is necessary to increase the number in order to accommodate the seats which are duly provided for in the other part of the Resolution. I therefore move this amendment.

Mr President: Is there any other amendment to clause 1?...Nothing else. I put Mr Munshi’s amendment to vote.

The amendment was adopted.

Mr President: Now, we go to the next one. I find Rev. Nichols-Roy has given notice of an amendment.

Mr President: Then we will go to (b) (i). Mr Santhanam has given notice of an amendment.

Sri K. Santhanam (Madras: General): I do not want to move it.
Mr President: Then Mr Munshi.

Mr K.M. Munshi: Mr President, Sir, I beg to move the following amendment to clause (b) (i). My amendment reads thus:

'That in sub-paragraph (b) (i) of Paragraph 1 of the motion for the words beginning with 52 members—the words are these: "52 members who shall be elected by the Assembly in accordance with the principle of proportional representation by means of a single transferable vote"—substitute: "The following members"
The names are given in the amendment. The clause will read like this: "It shall consist initially of the following members."

and then the names will follow, I will read the names, The different categories have already been placed before the House by the mover of the Resolution and I will read the names, indicating the nature of the seats.

Mr Jairamdas Daulatram from Sind,
The Hon’ble Mr Mehr Chand Khanna, NWFP,
Dr Gopi Chand Bhargava from the Punjab,
Bakshi Sir Tek Chand also from the Punjab,
Dr Profulla Chandra Ghosh from Bengal,
Mr Surendra Mohan Ghose from Bengal,
Dr Syam[a] Prasad Mookherjee from Bengal.

Then comes a group representing the Scheduled castes:
Sardar Prithvi Singh Azad,
Shri Dharam Prakash,
Mr H.J. Khandekar,
The Hon’ble Mr Jagjivan Ram
Mr P.R. Thakur,
Dr B.R. Ambedkar,
Shri V.I. Muniswami Pillai.

The next group of six names are those of Sikhs:
Sardar Jogendra Singh,
The Hon’ble Sardar Baldev Singh,
Sardar Pratap Singh,
Sardar Harnam Singh,
Sardar Ujjal Singh,
Sardar Kartar Singh.

The next four names are those of Indian Christians:
Dr H.C. Mookherjee,
Dr Alban D’Souza,
Shri Salve,
Shri Roche-Victoria.

The next three names are of Anglo-Indians:
Mr S.H. Prater,
Mr Frank Reginald Anthony,
Mr M.V.H. Collins.
The next three names are of Parsis:
Sir Homi Mody,
Mr M.R. Masani,
Mr R.K. Sidhwa.

Number 31, Shri Rup Nath Brahma represents the plains tribes of Assam.
Number 32, Khan Abdul Ghaffar Khan represents the North-Western tribal area. Two other members to represent that area have to be nominated, by the President.
Khan Abdul Samad Khan represents Baluchistan.

In Number 35, the name is wrongly spelt, it should be Shri Mayang Nokcha.
I do not know how to pronounce it. He represents the North-Eastern tribal areas. Then follow three names of persons who represent the Excluded and Partially Excluded areas:
Shri Phool Bhan Shaha,
Mr Devendra Nath Samanta,
Mr Jaipal Singh, representing the excluded areas in Bihar, and three others have to be nominated by the President.

Then come twelve general names:
Acharya J.B. Kripalani,
The Hon’ble Maulana Abul Kalam Azad,
The Hon’ble Sardar Vallabhbhai Patel,
The Hon’ble Shri C. Rajagopalachariar,
Rajkumari Amrit Kaur,
Shrimati Hansa Mehta,
The Hon’ble Pandit Govind Ballabh Pant,
The Hon’ble Srijut Gopinath Bardoloi,
The Hon’ble Shri Purushottamdas Tandon,
Sir Alladi Krishnaswami Ayyar,
Shri K.T. Shah and
Mr K.M. Munshi.
I move this amendment, Sir.

Mr President: Is there no other amendment? Mr Munshi, there is one other amendment in your name?

Mr K.M. Munshi: That does not arise now, Sir.

Mr President: There are several others; you don’t move them also?

Mr K.M. Munshi: No, Sir.

Mr President: There is another amendment, notice of which has been given by the Rev Nichols-Roy.

The Hon’ble Rev. J.J.M. Nichols-Roy: Sir, I wanted to add one or two more names, but I find that that will disturb the number which has already been passed in this House. So I shall not move my amendment.
Mr President: The Resolution has been moved, as also the amendments. The matter is now for discussion.

Rai Bahadur Syamanandan Sahaya (Bihar: General): Sir, I would like to make a submission with regard to the amendment. In the Rules that we have adopted, it is clearly laid down in Rule 46 (2)—that:

I submit, Sir, that this is a very salutary provision which aims to give general satisfaction to all sections of this House. In a House constituted as this one is, I think, it will be desirable if, this correct method of selecting members for committees is followed. I find that the amendment of Mr Munshi, however, gives definite names, and naturally, the names will have to be voted upon if other names are proposed. What would be the procedure for election, I ask? This is a matter, Sir, to which I will draw your special attention because it lays down for the future a precedent which might not be very helpful when we come to decide more delicate matters. As such I would appeal to you, and also I appeal to Mr Munshi to allow the original motion to be adopted and then to propose names and the names could be voted upon by the procedure laid down, namely, proportional representation by means of the single transferable vote. This is an important matter and I will not only draw your personal attention to the matter but also draw the attention of the whole House and every section of the House to it. It is a departure which, I think, is not a healthy departure and must not be acted upon by this House.

Mr Jaipal Singh (Bihar: General): Mr President, now that the names have been combined in the Resolution of Pandit Govind Ballabh Pant, I feel I must say a few words from the tribal point of view. I strongly resent the insinuation by Pandit Pant. He said that the Tribal Areas and minorities look to a foreign country.

The Hon’ble Pandit Govind Ballabh Pant: I never said so. Please do not put in my mouth words I never said.

Mr Jaipal Singh: We look to our own countrymen. We look to our own leaders to give us a fair and square deal. We have not gone abroad. We did not go to London for negotiations. We did not go to meet the Cabinet Mission for provisions for our rights. We look only to our own countrymen to give us a fair and equitable deal. For the last six thousand years we have been shabbily treated.

Mr Kiran Sankar Roy (Bengal: General): How many years?

Mr Jaipal Singh: Six thousand years, Mr Kiran Sankar Roy, that is the time you, Non-Adibasis, have been in this country.

Sir, the mover and the seconder have indicated how the disposition, the distribution has been made in this Advisory Committee. This is a matter of life and death for the tribal people in particular. I congratulate the Indian National Congress leaders; I congratulate also those minority communities who have been able to get more seats than are due to them numerically. That cannot be denied. Number for number, the Sikhs, the Christians, the Anglo-Indians and the Parsis have been given more than is their due. I do not grudge them all this; but, the fact remains that they have been given many more seats than is their due, whereas when we come to my people, the real and most ancient people of this country, the position is different. But I do not grumble. For my purpose, it would be quite enough to have Panditji only; but he is not a member. I would entrust the future of every tribal people in this country in the hands of Pandit Jawaharlal Nehru, and rather be not there myself. Let me assure you, that we are not dependent on numbers—the number votes that will be given in the Advisory Committee. We have been inarticulate. I led no deputation to Sardar Patel, or to you, Mr President, about our rights, about our claims and about our dues. I leave it to the good sense of the House and of the Advisory Committee, that, at long last, they will right the injuries of six thousand years. In another place, once when I said that a particular group of our Indian nation had been heavily weighted, my remarks were resented by that particular group. I tell you that it does not worry us at all if the Sikhs get 60 seats in this particular Advisory Committee or anywhere else. I congratulate them. We thank the Indian National Congress for saying that the minority question cannot be over-rated, as Pandit Govind Ballabh Pant said. But has it been over-rated as far as the tribals are concerned? Can it be honestly said that you have in any way over-rated their position? I am not pleading for anymore seats; I have not submitted any amendment, I am not moving any amendment, but I must draw the attention of this House and of this country, if I may say so, that here we are all on trial. Hitherto it has been very easy for us to say it is the British—it is the British who have kept you in a zoo by making for you Partially Excluded Areas and Excluded Areas. Are you behaving any differently? I ask this question. I ask the Advisory Committee. I find my own name in it. While I find my own name in it, I am bound to point out that there is no name of any tribal woman in the Advisory Committee. How has that been left out? There is no tribal woman member in Advisory Committee. That never occurred to the people who were responsible for the selection of members of the Committee. I am not saying that she should be included, but it is significant that the thing has not been seriously considered. Similarly, as I repeat, thirteen or whatever the figure is that has been fixed—I accept that, I do not say any more, but I do want to expose the ignorance that is exposed in the suggestion of this figure, or for that matter, in the nomination of the Tribal Areas members. Look at the disposition of the tribal population throughout India. I have no quarrel with the muddling that has been made in the census enumeration at every decennial reckoning. The latest figure is 254 lakhs, I accept that. Now in that we find that the largest tribal group in India are the Munda-speaking tribe. If you add up their 1941 figures, you will find that they are something like 43 lakhs. The next in magnitude are the Gonds. Now we have been given a Gond representative; I am glad there is one. The next come Bhils, 23 lakhs. No Bhil is on this Committee. Like that, we go on to Oraons, with 11 lakhs, there is no Oraon on this Committee. Mr President, time is valuable. Pandit Jawaharlal Nehru elsewhere said that every day we take it costs something like Rs 10,000. I think the life of 25 million tribals is worth more than Rs 10,000 a day. This is an opportunity where I must have my say, if you will permit me. I note also that, for some reason or other, there is no tribal member at all in the Fundamental Rights Committee.

The Hon’ble Pandit Govind Ballabh Pant: There is no separate Committee. There is only one Committee.

Mr Jaipal Singh: In the speech you have envisaged that some were going to be put in the Committee to deal with the fundamental rights of citizens.

The Hon’ble Pandit Govind Ballabh Pant: No. That depends on the Advisory Committee. It may form such Sub-Committees as it likes.
Mr Jaipal Singh: Very well. I accept that. As I say, there is no way to include every tribal group. There are altogether listed in India in the 1941 census 177 tribes. Obviously, it would be impossible to have 177 members. But whatever the number that has been allotted—I say I accept that, Mr President, but I am, in duty bound to my people, to point out to the House that we would have to deal with this tribal question, as Pandit Jawaharlal Nehru told us when speaking on the Independent Sovereign Republic Resolution,—that this problem would have to be dealt with imaginatively and emotionally. This House is on trial; let us see what happens.

The Hon'ble Pandit Govind Ballabh Pant: All will do well.

Mr President: There was some misunderstanding with regard to the other amendment on the Order Paper. I was under the impression that there was no other amendment. I find that there are some more amendments. All the other amendments may be moved.

Mr K.M. Munshi: To (b) or (c)?

Mr President: All the amendments to the whole motion.

Mr K.M. Munshi: The next amendment that stands in my name is this:

‘That sub-paragraph (b) (i) of paragraph 1 of the motion be deleted.’

That sub-paragraph runs as follows:

‘The Assembly may elect in such manner as the President may deem appropriate up to 7 members.’

As the House will see, provision has been made later for increasing the number of nominations by the President by 7, that is, to raise the number from 9 to 22. So I shall also move at the same time the amendment which stands in my name with reference to sub-paragraph (c) of paragraph 1 of the motion.

‘That in sub-paragraph (c) of paragraph 1 of the motion, the number “22” be substituted for the number “9” and the words “7 of whom shall be Muslims representing the Provinces of Madras, Bombay, the United Provinces, Bihar, the Central Provinces, Orissa and Assam be added.”’

The object is that there are what are called Hindu majority Provinces and Muslim minorities in these Provinces have to be elected on this Committee. That was the original idea, but as this preliminary sitting is going to be adjourned for the time being, if the Muslim League comes in, it may be difficult to convene a preliminary sitting again only for the purpose of electing seven members. Therefore, it is that I move this amendment. If the preliminary sitting is adjourned to April or any other date, and the Muslim League comes in, seven Muslim members representing the seven Hindu majority Provinces may be nominated by the President and may join this Committee. I submit that they could all be accepted by the House. So I move all the amendments at the same time.

Mr President: Is there any other amendment? Paragraph 2? None. Paragraph 3? None.

I understand that Sir N. Gopalaswami Ayyangar has got an amendment.

The Hon'ble Sir N. Gopalaswami Ayyangar (Madras: General): Mr President, under Rule 48 of the Rules of Procedure, every motion by which a Committee is to be set up shall state the quorum necessary to constitute a meeting of the Committee. This has not been done in the motion that has been moved. It is a mandatory provision and in order to supply the omission I request your permission under Rule 26 that I may be permitted to move this new amendment of which I have not given notice. The amendment is this:
After para 3 of the Resolution, the following shall be inserted as para 3(a) namely, ‘the quorum for the Committee and its sub-committees shall be one-third of the total number of members for the time being of the Committee or of the sub-committee concerned.’

Mr K.M. Munshi: I have to move an amendment to paragraph 4. Para 4 as it stands reads thus:

The change my amendment seeks to effect is this:
In paragraph 4, between the words ‘three months’ and the word ‘and’ add the words ‘from the date of this Resolution’. Then again, after the word ‘time’ substitute a comma for the fullstop and add the words ‘but shall submit an interim report on Fundamental Rights within six weeks and an interim report on minority rights within ten weeks of such date.’

Sir, Clause 4 as amended will run thus:
The Advisory Committee shall submit the final report to the Union Constituent Assembly within three months from the date of this Resolution and may submit interim reports from time to time, but shall submit an interim report on Fundamental Rights within six weeks and an interim report on minority rights within ten weeks of such date.

My next amendment, Sir, is to paragraph 5. It is this:

‘In paragraph 5 of the motion, for the words beginning with “in the manner” up to the end of the paragraph, the words “by nomination by the President” be substituted.’

Paragraph 5 as originally drafted reads:
Casual vacancies in the Advisory Committee shall be filled as soon as possible after they occur in the manner in which the seat in respect of which the vacancy had arisen was originally filled.

The object of this amendment is to provide for a certain contingency. When this preliminary sitting of the Assembly is adjourned, the Committee is going to function. If, in the meantime, there is any vacancy, it will be impossible to fill it up till the next meeting of the Constituent Assembly. Therefore it is better to give this power to the President so that in case of a vacancy arising, he can appoint a member to fill up that vacancy.

Sir, these are the amendments that I have to move.

Mr F.R. Anthony (Bengal: General): Mr President, Sir, I had absolutely no intention of entering this discussion but unfortunately, a remark of a previous speaker, which included the Anglo-Indians among those to whom, he alleged, over-representation had been given, has brought me to my feet. I have always been reluctant, although a communal leader, to pursue communal hares and I am even more reluctant to enter into any unseemly communal dog-fights. But I think there is some misunderstanding on the part of some members of the House about the State Paper and about the real intention of the authors of that Paper. Sir, if it was felt that there was no need for an Advisory Committee on Minorities I would subscribe to it. But so long as you have a committee on minorities, so long as other minorities are insisting on their rights, alleged or real, then, certain minorities, particularly the smaller minorities have, in self-defence to ask for certain representation. I agree with what Mr Jaipal Singh said, namely, that most of the minorities would gladly allow their interests to be taken care of by a leader of the stature of Pandit Nehru. I would the first to say: ‘Leave it in his hands’. But, unfortunately, these matters are not being decided at such a high level. All persons in this country are not of that stature. Unfortunately there is a tendency today for communalism to become even more intransigent and clamant than it has been in the past and I wish this obsession on numerical proportions to be slightly effaced.

Sir, we are dealing with a specific State Paper. We are dealing with paragraph 20 of the Cabinet Mission’s Statement. The intention in paragraph 20 was set out in detail in Sir Stafford Cripps’ official explanation. He was not concerned, the Cabinet Mission was not concerned with numerical proportions. This question of numerical proportion has become rather a favourite slogan in this country. Sir Stafford specifically mentioned that this Advisory Committee had been set up in order to give an opportunity not to the minorities but to the smaller minorities of influencing the provisions concerning the minorities. He specifically mentioned that it was their intention that representation should be given particularly to the Indian Christians, to the Anglo-Indians and to the Tribal Areas; and although we have, for the sake of amity and a friendly atmosphere, accepted the representation that was granted to the minorities, it was made clear that perhaps the real intention of the Cabinet Mission had not been implemented in the allotment of seats that was made, at any rate, to my community.

I want to disabuse the House of any feeling that my minority has been over-represented. It was the obvious intention of the Cabinet Mission to give the smaller minorities that have been specified—the Indian Christians, the Anglo-Indians and the Tribal Areas—an opportunity of influencing minority decisions through this Advisory Committee. No other smaller minorities have been mentioned. The point whether the intention was implemented in introducing other minorities, I am not going to labour at this stage. But the Cabinet Mission obviously had something at the back of their minds when they made this provision. They realized that certain minorities, although numerically small, had vital interests to be protected in the general political structure and their sole purpose in setting up this Advisory Committee was to give the minorities particularly these three minorities that they have specified, an opportunity of influencing minority decisions.

Mr Damber Singh Gurung: Mr Chairman, Sir, in the list of names of the Advisory Committee proposed by Mr K.M. Munshi, I do not find any name of a Gorkha representative here. I do not want to refer to the terms of clause 20 of the Cabinet Mission’s statement of 16 May, but I must pointedly draw the attention of the House to the Resolution on Objectives moved by Pandit Jawaharlal Nehru and passed by this House a few days ago, Paragraph 6 of that Resolution says,—

It is the function of the Advisory Committee to give advice to the Constituent Assembly as to the manner in which the safeguards for the minorities, backward and tribal peoples are to be provided. Presumably, in the Advisory Committee there must be representatives of all these classes of people. Now, Sir, if there is no Gorkha on the Advisory Committee, who will speak for them and how their interests and rights be safeguarded? It is a fact that the Gorkhas form a distinct minority group and no one can deny the fact that they are the most backward people in India. If Gorkhas, as such, are not represented they have a right to be represented here as people living in the Excluded Areas and Partially Excluded Areas, because Darjeeling District, where there are more than 3 lakhs of Gorkhas, is a Partially Excluded Area; and even as tribals because the Gorkhas have been classed as tribals in the Census Report of 1941 in Bengal. If the Gorkhas are not represented in the only body that has been provided for devising means to safeguard in the interests of oppressed and backward peoples, I, as a Gorkha, do not see any advantage in my being a member of the Constituent Assembly. The other day President Kripalani told me that the Gorkhas would fight with their swords. I quite agree. The Gorkhas fought with their swords for the rulers of India, but now the Gorkhas have decided to fight for the freedom of India and will fight for free India, but at the same time I must appeal to the House that their case also must be considered, as they are very backward educationally and economically and as the Advisory Committee is the only Committee where all these things can be brought up and discussed. I appeal to the House to consider this point.

Mr K.M. Munshi: Sir, may I reply as the mover of the amendment?

Mr President: (To Sri K. Santhanam) Do you want to speak?

Sri K. Santhanam: Sir, I wish to make two points with reference to this Resolution. I am anxious that this Advisory Committee should not expand its scope of work to an undue extent. It should not try to encroach upon the functions of the whole Assembly or the Sections. For instance, if it goes into such matters as joint versus separate electorates or the quantum of representation, I think it will make the work of this Assembly very difficult. I do not want to expatiate on the point and make the Committee’s work difficult but I simply leave it for their consideration.

The second point I wish to mention is about the way in which we have to deal with the report. Ordinarily the report is to be presented to the House, but if we wait for the presentation of the report till this Assembly meets, then we shall have to wait 10 or 15 days for its consideration. It will mean a waste of time of the House. So I suggest that you take the permission of the House to circulate the report as soon as it is received from the Committee so that, when we assemble, all of us may come really prepared and the time of the House may not be wasted. Otherwise there may be legitimate ground for complaint, as it is not sufficient to give one day’s, two days’ or three days’ notice. We must have at least a fortnight’s notice. If you wait for the report to be presented to the House and then wait for fifteen days you know the expense, the confusion and the difficulty.

So I make these two suggestions for your consideration.

Rai Bahadur Syamanandan Sahaya: I want to raise a point of order. The motion as amended by Mr Munshi does not lay down any method by which subsequent elections to this Committee will be made because the original provision that elections will be conducted in accordance with the principle of proportional representation by means of the single transferable vote has been dropped by the amendment of Mr Munshi. That being so, if one or two names are suggested in addition to the names already suggested by Mr Munshi, what will be the method adopted for election? This amendment of Mr Munshi might circumvent the procedure laid down under the Rules of Procedure. I hope you will not permit it to happen. I would therefore like to have your decision as to what will be the method by which election will be made in case one or two names are also suggested apart from the names already suggested in the amended resolution.

Mr K.M. Munshi: With regard to the point of order, Rule 46 makes perfectly clear that it would be competent for this House to alter the method of election. This is how the Rule runs:

The members of every such committee shall, unless the motion by which the committee is set up otherwise provides, be elected according to the principle of proportional representation by means of the single transferable vote.
Therefore, Sir, it will be seen there is no point of order.

Rai Bahadur Syamanandan Sahaya: I only want to say that the procedure outlined in Rule 46(2) could have been met if Mr Santhanam had moved his amendment by which he wanted to substitute the words 'by ordinary distributive vote' in place of the words in the original motion. Mr Santhanam, not having moved that amendment, there is no procedure laid down. Therefore, Rule 46(2) does not apply.

Mr President: In my opinion, clause (2) of Rule 46 makes it quite clear that the amendment which has been moved by Mr Munshi is in order.

Srimati Dakshayani Velayudan (Madras: General): Mr President, I wish to bring to the notice of this House that there is provision for 7 members to represent the Hindus in the Muslim provinces. Sir, I find that no Harijan's name is included among the Hindus. We, Harijans, consider ourselves one with the Hindu community and we have every right to represent the Hindus in the Muslim Provinces. We have every right to represent the Hindus in Bengal or the Hindus in Sind or in the Punjab. Somebody remarked now that there are already 7 members of the Harijans in the list. That does not mean that the Harijans have no right to represent the Hindus in the Muslim majority provinces. So I simply wanted to bring to the notice of this House that they should not go with the impression that the Harijans here have come only to represent the Harijans of India. We claim that we belong to the Hindu fold. It is the duty of the Caste Hindus to see that the promises that they made should be put into practice by including a Harijan in the list, to represent the Hindus in the Muslim majority provinces. But nobody should be under the impression that I came to speak in this manner here in order that my name may go into the list. I have no desire of that sort, because I do not want to represent those provinces, but there are Harijans, who have come from the Muslim majority Provinces, who have every right to represent the Hindus in their Provinces. So I hope that this House will take into consideration that my opinion is not against the fundamental principle that we are expected to follow.

Sri Lakshminarayan Sahu (Orissa: General): Mr President, Sir, I stand here to inform the House that Orissa has been neglected in this suggestion of Mr K.M. Munshi. We always feel that because we are a docile people, we are always neglected. Now the claim for inclusion of names from Orissa is so great that I hope that this House will accept it. In the first place about two-thirds of Orissa are Partially Excluded and Excluded Areas, and yet though there are 13 names given by Mr K.M. Munshi, there is no name from Orissa. Again there is another point for consideration by the House. According to Mr Munshi's list, there is no Hindu from Orissa and yet one representation will be given to a Muslim. That is really unfair. The majority party there goes unrepresented, whereas we give representation to a minority. I hope that this House will pay its best consideration to this question. I should go in for the Hon'ble Pandit Govind Ballabh Pant's Resolution but as you said that Mr Munshi's motion was in order, I do not want to refute it, but I still feel, as Rai Bahadur Syamanandan Sahaya has pointed out, that in such a matter which is very important, we should adopt the Procedure of single transferable vote. That will solve the question to the satisfaction of all.

Mr Jairam Das Daulatram (Sind: General): I want to say as briefly as I can that, looking to the importance of this Committee and the delicate issues with which it will have to deal, it would not be proper by any discussion here to attempt to restrict the scope of its work. There are members on it representing minorities and majorities, from practically every part of the country, and they should, I think, in terms of all that has been said both in the Statement of 16th May and elsewhere, be left free to discuss and to decide as to what are adequate provisions or clauses for the protection of minorities. Since the matter is such that a fuller discussion on the point here would raise more and more controversy, I shall confine myself to these remarks only for I expect that the Advisory Committee will look at the matter both from the minority point of view, and the general point of view and try to reconcile the requirements of the minorities with the needs of the national sentiment of the country, as a whole.

Sri S. Nagappa (Madras: General): Mr President, Sir, now, I just want to bring to the notice of this House that out of these 50 members some communities particularly have been given over-representation. If it is equal to all communities as it is said, seven for Hindus, seven for Muslims and seven for Scheduled Classes, I do not know on what basis these figures were drawn up. For instance, if you say there are seven Muslim Provinces that are in a majority, so the Hindus of that province ought to be safeguarded and again because there are seven Hindu Provinces where they are in a majority, the seven Muslims must be there in the Committee to safeguard their interests, it is a good thing. But what about the Harijans. They are in a minority in almost every province. Moreover, if you take the population of these Provinces, then all the Hindus put together in the Muslim majority Provinces, they are not as many as Harijans, and the same thing with the Hindus. And now, Sir, the Parsis is a new minority community that has been brought. That community was not seeking to be a minority community all these days. All of a sudden in this Minority Advisory Committee this particular community has been classified as a minority community. I do not know, Sir, what protection this Parsi community especially seeks? It is well placed in society, economically and educationally. What are the particular safeguards this particular community wants? So also the Anglo-Indian community. Their numbers are very few, but their representation on the Committee is too great. I would suggest it would have been fair if the representation for the Depressed Classes had been 11 instead of 7. Now, if anything cannot be done at this stage, I would request all the Members that are now elected to see that they should not go there in order to champion the cause of a particular community. They must feel one and see that they work for the benefit of all the communities for the homogeneity of all communities and for the prosperity of all the communities. With this motive, they must see that particularly such communities which are not represented properly according to their numbers must be safeguarded. Now only a few days ago we have passed a Resolution declaring our objects and our motives in framing this Constitution. We must stick to the spirit and see that every community got its proper place, though for instance out of 50 only 7 Harijans are there. They are only about one-seventh of the present members. They might fight for their community interests and yet they are in a minority. Their voice may not be heard. So I appeal to all Members who are elected in spite of their majority, to understand the Harijans properly, and if what they want is reasonable, to satisfy if not their complete demand, at least the minimum of the demands put forward by them. With this hope I congratulate the Members that have been elected, and hope they will see that they do full justice especially to such communities as have been suffering for ages, and that what they deserve is given.

The Hon’ble Rev. J.J.M. Nichols-Roy: Sir, the number of members that have been listed here are 50. I wanted to add two more to this number. But after a discussion with Mr Munshi, I decided not to disturb the number that has already been listed here. But, Sir, I want to say this: the minorities in Assam are many. The Tribal Areas there also are very different from the tribal Areas in other parts of India. Each Tribal area has its own ways and methods of living and culture which would need to be represented in a Committee like this. But I find in paragraph 2 that the Sub-Committees which will be appointed by the Advisory Committee can co-opt some members. This probably will solve the difficulty. I read here:

The Advisory Committee shall appoint sub-committees to prepare schemes for the administration of the North-Western Tribal Areas, the North-Eastern Tribal Areas and the Excluded and partially Excluded Area. Each of such subcommittees may co-opt not more than 2 members from the particular tribal territory under its consideration for the time being, to assist in its work in relation to that territory.

This no doubt, will help the Tribal Areas to get representation and to tell the Advisory Committee what their desire is. In view of this, Sir, I think that the Resolution as presented before the House is quite satisfactory.

I should like to add one more point. I would have liked very much if another Indian Christian had been added to this list. I find that Orissa has not been represented at all.

An Hon'ble Member: What about Andhra?

The Hon'ble Rev. J.J.M. Nichols-Roy: I would like very much one Christian from Orissa be represented. The President may consider the question of Orissa in regard to representation from the Christian community there. That would add only one more member to the four Indian Christian Members who have been listed here. With this request, Sir, I believe that this Resolution is acceptable to the House and it is quite satisfactory as far as it goes. Some of the minorities which have not been represented at all may be given representation by nomination by the President and by co-option by the Sub-Committees.

Mr B. Das (Orissa: General): Sir, the atmosphere this morning in this House and the atmosphere in New Delhi these three or four days reminds me of the atmosphere in 1930–31. In the light of my past experiences I think that the minorities have been given more weightage than before. Murmurs will always be there. It is very very unfortunate that the minority communities do not demand mere justice, equity and fairplay but claim safeguards and weightages under the third party domination. The minority problems should not and must not overshadow the main issue—that of Independence of India.

One thing was stressed by previous speakers—namely, that the majority Hindu provinces have not found representation for their majority community in the Advisory Committee. I am one with them and I demand such representation for the majority Hindu population of Orissa. Orissa must participate in the discussions to enable her to assess those undue burdens that she may have to shoulder for her minority communities.

The Advisory Committee will very likely come to a dead-lock later. I do not anticipate its decisions and I am not a member of that Advisory Committee. But the minorities will still demand safeguards, economic advantages and reservations and weightages to an All-India pattern. All India patterns and decisions may work disaster to a poor province like Orissa, if minimum obligatory expenditure on minority communities be laid down. And yet, a minimum amount of money must have to be spent for the Scheduled Castes and for the Tribal people. The minimum standard in Bihar before separation from Orissa is the maximum standard of Orissa today. Rupees two and annas eight or something like that is the per capita income in Orissa; in other provinces the per capita income goes up to Rs 20 or more. I am not merely pleading here that a Hindu representative from Orissa should be there in the Advisory Committee.
I visualize that the provinces will have residuary powers in an Independent India. Do my colleagues here appreciate that handicaps may be fashioned on minor provinces and stupendous difficulties—administrative and financial—may be imposed on poorer provinces under the cry of safeguards and weightages? It may even break the administrations.

The Advisory Committee should be wide enough to have representatives of Hindus from the Hindu majority provinces, so that it can know the financial and economic position of those provinces. We will have to stoutly oppose any decision of people in the Advisory Committee who do not understand our economic and financial situation in Orissa and we will not accept any safeguards, economic or otherwise, and any undue burdens and handicaps.

Mr Satyanarayan Sinha: I move that the question be now put.

Mr B.K. Sidhwa (CP & Berar: General): May I say a few words, Sir?

Mr President: Closure has been moved. The motion is: that closure be applied.

The motion was adopted.

Mr President: Mr Pant, it was your Resolution. Do you accept the amendments?

The Hon’ble Pandit Govind Ballabh Pant: Sir, I accept the amendments moved by Mr Munshi. On the whole the reception that has been accorded to my Resolution has exceeded my expectations. It is a delicate matter, especially where the question of nomination of individuals comes in. There are many embarrassing aspects of such problems which cannot be easily got over, and which cannot be tackled at any rate in an altogether impersonal manner. So, I would not have been surprised if there had been more vigorous criticism than that displayed by Mr Jaipal Singh when he spoke. I saw that he was chafing and the vehemence of his utterances seemed to me to compensate for the poverty of his ideas. I did not make any suggestion whatsoever against the tribal people. I believe that they have not received that attention and active service at our hands to which they were entitled. I think we owe them a duty and we should do all we can to raise their general level. There is absolutely no issue between him and me. When I suggested that it is unwise to look to any external authority for the protection of the rights of the minorities, I had no particular individual, group or section in mind.

I wanted to utter a word of warning on a subject which is of considerable importance and which often arouses consuming passion. That was my only apology for referring to the developments that had taken place in recent years and I believe that those experiences of Poland, Bulgaria, Czechoslovakia, Austria and other Eastern European States are worthy of being borne in mind in these times when we are going to frame our own Constitution. It was suggested that the election should have been held according to the principle of proportional representation. It had in fact been held according to that principle. As I indicated at the outset in the course of my opening speech, the members of every group had been virtually elected by their own communities and comrades within each and belonging to each Group. We wanted to have the seal of approval of this entire Assembly as the Advisory Committee will be dealing with very great problems and we wanted to give every member of the Committee that sense of confidence which the approval of the membership of the Committee by the entire House is bound to create and convey. So it was to create a sound moral foundation for this Committee that this method was devised but as I said, the elections were unanimous. All members of this House also, barring very few who were not there, agreed to these names but before the names were put before the general body individually, the members of each group had by themselves selected their representatives. I do not see how any method more satisfactory could possibly have been devised. It augurs well for the deliberations of this Advisory Committee that its personnel should have been selected not only by the different groups that it was intended to represent but also by every member and by all the members of this House. That gives them a position which I think they would covet and they would appreciate. Sir, some omissions from certain Provinces have been mentioned. Well, I readily admit that many more members could have been profitably added to this Committee. We have here talent and public spirit represented in abundance, and everyone who could be added, would have made very useful contribution. But there are practical limitations in matters of this type and you have to see that the structure does not break down by virtue of its weight, even of too many good people. There should be some limitations even as regards excellence in order that men may move, in order that even defects may be tolerated; otherwise if you were to look for a Utopia or for the establishment of Plato's Republic, you will never be able to do anything practical. So it is only the hard realities of the situation which have constrained us to limit this figure to something about 70 and even that is apparently a number big enough for serious deliberation. So it is not because we do not appreciate all that has been said, not because we would not like to have the assistance of the other Hon'ble Members in this House but because this Committee would not stand the strain of heavier weight that we had to restrict the number. There need not be any misgiving in any quarter on that account. After all the decisions in such Committees are not ordinarily taken by vote. Everyone is expected to appreciate the point of view of other colleagues of his. There should be a spirit of accommodation and give and take. So we look forward to unanimity in the decisions and not to majority voting in a Committee of this type. I admit that it is possible for the Hon'ble Members to argue that the numbers allotted to different groups are not strictly in accordance with their population. In matters of this type you cannot have a yard-stick for measuring millions of people and their interests, and would it have made any difference, if there had been two more of the Scheduled Castes or even one less of the Anglo-Indians? I do not think. One worthy representative like Dr Ambedkar or like Mr Anthony can, I think, do, as much as half-a-dozen or more. It is not go much number as calibre and the spirit which inspires the members which ought to count in matters of this character. Let me hope that there will be no occasion for any regret when this Committee begins to function and that all will join together in congratulating this Committee when it has completed its labours.

Mr President: Pandit Pant, you have not said anything regarding the amendment moved by Sir Gopalaswamy Ayyangar.

The Hon’ble Pandit Govind Ballabh Pant: I accept that amendment.

Mr President: The Resolution has been moved and after that the amendments have been moved and accepted by the Mover. Therefore the amended Resolution will now read thus:

This Assembly resolves that in pursuance of paragraph 20 of the Cabinet Mission's Statement of 16 May, 1946, an Advisory Committee be constituted as hereinafter set out:

1. (a) The Advisory Committee shall consist of not more than 72 members who may include persons who are not members of the Assembly.

(b) It shall consist initially of the following members

1. Shri Jairamdas Daulatram.
2. The Hon’ble Shri Meherchand Khanna.
3. Dr Gopi Chand Bhargava.
4. Bakshi Sir Tek Chand.
5. Dr Profulla Chandra Ghosh.
7. Dr Syama Prashad Mookerjee.
8. Shri Prithvi Singh Azad.
9. Shri Dharam Prakash.
10. Shri H.J. Khandekar.
11. The Hon’ble Shri Jagjivan Ram.
12. Shri P.R. Thakur.
14. Shri V.I. Muniswami Pillai.
15. Sardar Jogendra Singh.
17. Sardar Pratap Singh.
21. Dr H.C. Mookherjee.
22. Dr Alban D’Souza.
23. Shri Salve.
24. Shri Roche-Victoria.
25. Mr S.H. Prater.
26. Mr Frank Reginald Anthony.
27. Mr M.V.H. Collins.
28. Sir Homi Mody.
29. Shri M.R. Masani.
30. Shri R.K. Sidhwa.
31. Shri Rup Nath Brahma.
32. Khan Abdul Gaffar Khan.
33. Khan Abdul Samad Khan.
35. Shri Mayang Mokcha.
36. Shri Phool Bhan Shaha.
37. Shri Devendra Nath Samanta.
38. Shri Jaipal Singh.
40. The Hon’ble Maulana Abul Kalam Azad.
41. The Hon’ble Sardar J. Vallabhbhai Patel.
42. The Hon’ble Sri C. Rajagopalachariar.
43. Rajkumari Amrit Kaur.
44. Shrimati Hansa Mehta.
45. The Hon’ble Pandit Govind Ballabh Pant.
46. The Hon’ble Sriju Gopinath Bardoloi.
47. The Hon’ble Shri Purushottamdas Tandon.
49. Shri K.T. Shah.
50. Shri K.M. Munshi.

(c) The President may at any time or at different times nominate members to the Committee not exceeding 22, 7 of whom shall be Muslims representing the Provinces of Madras, Bombay, the United Provinces, Bihar, the Central Provinces, Orissa and Assam.

2. The Advisory Committee shall appoint Sub-Committees to prepare schemes for the administration of the North-Western tribal areas, the North-Eastern tribal areas and the excluded and partially excluded areas. Each of such Sub-Committees may co-opt more than 2 members from the particular tribal territory under its consideration for the time being, to assist it in its work in relation to that territory.

3. The Advisory Committee may appoint other Sub-Committees from time to time as it may deem necessary.

3-A. The quorum for the Committee or any of its Sub-Committees shall be one-third of the total number of members for the time being of the Committee or of the Sub-Committee concerned.

4. The Advisory Committee shall submit the final report to the Union Constituent Assembly within three months from the date of this Resolution and may submit interim reports from time to time, but shall submit an interim report on Fundamental Rights within six weeks and an interim report on minority rights within ten weeks of such date.

5. Casual vacancies in the Advisory Committee shall be filled as soon as possible after they occur by nomination by the President.

6. The President may make standing orders for the conduct of the proceedings of the Committee.

I shall now put the Resolution as amended, to vote.

8. Constitution of the Committee on Subjects Assigned to the Union Centre

Extract from Constituent Assembly Proceedings, 25 January 1947

The Hon'ble Sri C. Rajagopalachariar (Madras: General): I beg to move the Resolution standing in my name, which reads as follows:

Whereas In paragraph 15(i) of the Cabinet Delegation's Statement of 16 May, the subjects assigned to the Union Centre are generally and compendiously indicated under four broad categories,

And Whereas an understanding of the scope of these subjects is necessary for the purpose of framing the Union and other Constitutions, of avoiding as far as possible overlapping and conflicts between the provisions in the Constitution relating to the Union and those in the Constitutions referred to in clause (v) of paragraph 19 of the Statement, and of bringing all the said Constitutions into line with each other.

And Whereas it is necessary to draw up lists of matters included in and inter-connected with the subjects assigned to the Union before the framing of the Constitutions referred to in clause (v) of paragraph 19 of the Statement is taken up for consideration;
This Assembly resolves—

(a) that a committee consisting initially of twelve members, elected according to the principle of promotional representation by means of the single transferable vote, be constituted to examine the above matters and to report to the Assembly not later than the 15th of April, 1947, and

(b) that the President may add ten more persons to the committee, and that the selection of all or any of these ten additional members be made at such time and in such manner as the President may determine.

Sir, I might take the matter a little in advance and mention that there are three amendments that are going to be proposed to this motion of mine, and those amendments deal with subsidiary matters, Mr Munshi and Mr Satyanarayan Sinha will move them in due course and I propose to accept them. So, in order to make the matter easier to understand I shall read the Resolution as it will stand when these amendments are accepted. The first part of the Resolution, that is, the preamble, stand as before, but the operative part would read like this:

‘This Assembly resolves—

(a) that a committee consisting of the following members:
1. The Hon’ble Pandit Jawaharlal Nehru....’

Mr C.E. Gibbon (CP and Berar: General): On a point of order. Sir, Until such time as the amendments are officially moved and the mover of the Resolution accepts them, how could he incorporate them in the original Resolution?

Mr President: He has not incorporated any part of the amendment. He is only reading it out.

Mr C.E. Gibbon: He is accepting it before it is moved.

Mr President: He said he proposes to accept it.

The Hon’ble Sri C. Rajagopalachariar: I have read the Resolution as it stands in the Paper and I have referred to the amendments circulated and I think it would save time if I explained to the members in advance that I propose to accept those amendments, and in order that the matter may be clearly understood, I am reading it. If permitted, I shall go on.

Mr President: Yes.

The Hon’ble Sri C. Rajagopalachariar: The operative part would read like this:

‘This Assembly resolves—

(a) that a committee consisting initially of the following members:
1. The Hon’ble Pandit Jawaharlal Nehru
2. Mr Sarat Chandra Bose
3. Dr Pattabhi Sitaramayya
4. The Hon’ble Pandit Govind Ballabh Pant
5. Mr Jairam Das Daulatram
6. Sri Biswanath Das
7. The Hon’ble Sir N. Gopalaswami Ayyangar
8. Bakshi Sir Tek Chand
9. Diwan Bahadur Sir Alladi Krishnaswami Ayyar
66 Towards Freedom: 1947

10. Mr D.P. Khaitan
11. Mr M.R. Masani
12. Mr K.M. Munshi.

be constituted to examine the above matters and to report to the Assembly not later than the 15th of April, 1947.

(b) that the President may add ten more persons to the committee, and that the selection of all or any of these ten additional members be made at such time and in such manner as the President may determine,

c) that the quorum for the Committee shall be one-third of the total number of members for the time being of the Committee, and

d) that casual vacancies in the committee be filled as soon as possible after they occur by nomination by the President from among the members of the Assembly’.

Sir, the object of the Resolution is to help this Assembly in framing the Constitution so as not to leave for the future any overlapping or conflicts that might occur if various proceedings took place without correlation in different Sections of the Assembly or otherwise. I may be permitted, therefore, to explain exactly what the possibilities are which we wish to avoid.

This Assembly, Sir, has been entrusted with a very serious task, perhaps more onerous than any Constituent Assembly in the world has had to deal with. The number of differences that have to be settled are enormous; the population that has to be satisfied is enormous; and the problems that are before the Assembly are as difficult as any which any other Assembly has had before it. The British Government’s Statement has put things in a fairly clear way, but not quite as clearly as we would desire it. If we examine the British Government’s Statement, on which this Assembly’s programme is based, we will find few matters settled clearly.

No. 1—it is decided that we are to frame a constitution for a united India.

No. 2—we have to frame a constitution where the Centre is given the power over Defence, Communications and Foreign Affairs and also powers necessary to raise the finances required for the above subjects.

And then thirdly another principle has been laid down that the residuary powers, that is to say, all powers which have not been transferred to the Central Government, should remain in the Provinces. Then fourthly, a subsidiary point is laid down also, that such powers as the Provinces agree to transfer to any Groups they may form would go to the Groups. All subjects other than the Union subjects and all residuary powers should vest in the Provinces. The States will retain all subjects and powers other than those ceded to the Union. This is (3) and (4) of Clause 15 of the State. It is further laid down that there will be a ten-year revision of this Constitution and the initiative for that revision is vested in the Provinces. These are the broad principles laid down in Clause 15:

But let us examine this a little more closely. We find in sub-clause (1) that:

Now, what are powers, unless we mean the power actually to enforce the law as prescribed for raising the finances and that would include, Sir, the power collection and probably also the power of securing the services of a proper judiciary wherever required. No provision has been put down for this purpose. Again, if we examine Clause 19 which gives the procedure for carrying out the principles set out in clause 15, we find, strangely enough, a lacuna. In sub-clause (v) of clause 19 it is stated that the Sections shall proceed to settle Provincial Constitutions and then they shall also decide whether any Group Constitution shall be set up, and if so what provincial subjects the group shall deal. Then the representatives of the Sections and the Indian States shall re-assemble for the purpose of settling the Union Constitution. Now, there is no provision as to how and when the Group Constitution shall be settled. Beyond stating that whether any Group Constitution shall be set up may be decided in the Sections and also that the Sections shall set out the provincial subjects with which the groups should deal there is no provision for settling the Group Constitution itself.

Then, again, if we examine the provisions as to the Advisory Committee on Minorities, we find this. The Advisory Committee shall report to the Union Constituent Assembly upon the list of fundamental rights, clauses for protecting minorities and a scheme for the administration of Tribal and Excluded Areas and it should advise whether these rights, should be incorporated in the Provincial, the Group or the Union Constitutions. Now, it follows logically that when the Advisory Committee has reported to the Union Assembly, the Union Assembly should have the power to see whether it should be incorporated in the Provincial or in the Group or in the Union Constitutions. If the Provincial and Group constitutions should be settled beforehand, and at a later sitting of the Union Assembly, they decide that it should be incorporated in the Provincial or Group Constitutions, what is the procedure to be followed? Therefore, there is a great deal of correlation to be done before we can carry out the intentions of the Cabinet Mission’s Statements, or the Resolutions of this Assembly. If we interpret the programme laid down in clause 19 literally and assume that what is asked to be done at the various sittings should be the only things done at this stage and nothing else, we will be landed in a great deal of difficulty at the end in carrying out the explicit intentions of the Cabinet Mission’s Statement. Considering all these matters, it has been found necessary, we have found it necessary, Sir, to make this motion for the appointment of a committee which shall do the required thinking on these matters and report to this House before we end the preliminary session so that we may frame our programme of future work.

This Assembly has to consider, as I said before, very serious matters, and we will have to do a great deal of thinking. We cannot do our work on the assumption that we are here only to register previously arrived decisions, opinions and programmes. We have to do a lot of substantial thinking in this Constituent Assembly; and in the nature of things, therefore, we require the assistance of a select Committee to consider and advise us on the difficulties that may arise in the course of our work. It is with that object that this Committee has been proposed. It is not with the object of undermining the essential intentions of the Cabinet Mission’s Statement or anything of that kind. It is to help us to think out our difficulties and to find solutions for those difficulties.

Sir, if I may venture to put it that way, it is not only a matter of culture or good-breeding, but it is statesmanship to think of those who are absent, to think of other people than ourselves, when we deal with any matter. That is why in proposing every motion, Hon’ble Members have dealt with the intentions and purposes of those who are not yet present in this Assembly. We find a great many possibilities of misunderstanding and we try to anticipate those difficulties and remove possibilities of misunderstanding as far as we can. In this connection I would mention, therefore, that those who are absent should not misunderstand the purpose of this Committee that I am proposing. The Muslim League policy has been to secure a separate, sovereign State of their own. Now, this Constituent Assembly has taken up its task on the basis of the Cabinet Mission’s Statement and if one thing is more clearly decided in His Majesty’s Government's Statement than anything else, it is this, that there shall be only one sovereign state in India. It has been decided clearly beyond all possibility of doubt that a division of India into two sovereign states is not to be thought of in this connection. That explains many of the things that we are doing and will remove many of the misunderstandings that are likely to arise. If I may put it that way, the League has gone the wrong way for securing their objective. If they had only restricted their claims to what legitimately should be asked in pursuance of their policy, possibly they might have achieved their object and they would not have been in the present difficulty. Let me put it frankly. The greatest difficulty for the Muslim League now is that they have to join this Assembly and thereby, once for all and beyond doubt, accept the single sovereign State of India. That is why we find it difficult to come in, and that is why these postponements. That is why the League fixes its date always after the meetings that the other major parties have programmed for their consultations. That is why we find to-day, even after the last adjournment, the League has been unable to make up its mind and join us. Let us understand the difficulties of the other side. If the League comes in, they come in on the express understanding that India shall be only one sovereign State, abandoning their separatist policy. This is difficult for them to do at once. Let us realize these difficulties of the Muslim League Members in the way of their coming and joining us at this stage. Let me think it over. Let us give them ample time to come. But that does not mean that we stop our work, that we stop thinking, that we stop doing anything whatsoever, until they make up their minds. That would lead to indefinite postponement. Hence, Sir, I have no hesitation in recommending this Resolution that we should appoint this Committee of twelve members as proposed, so that they may think out all the difficulties and advise us so that we may frame a constitution for India which will create no difficulties for those who have to work it, and which will be a stable, strong constitution for the Centre with stable and strong constitutions for the provinces, to work under the Centre and in the single State that is being contemplated. Therefore, Sir, I move that this Resolution be accepted by the House. As I said before, there are two amendments. One is to replace the election by proportional representation, by twelve members definitely named to the House; and the other is to provide for quorum and another is to provide for casual vacancies. I commend the Resolution with these amendments.

Mr President: Mr Munshi can move his amendment.

Mr Satyanarayanan Sinha: May I be permitted to move it?

Mr President: Yes.

Mr Satyanarayanan Sinha: Sir, I beg to move the amendments which stand in the name of Mr Munshi, as permitted by you:

'That is clause (a) of the motion, for the words beginning with "twelve members" and ending with "the single transferable vote", the following be substituted:

"the following members:
1. The Hon'ble Pandit Jawaharlal Nehru
2. Mr Sarat Chandra Bose
3. Dr Pattabhi Sitaramayya
4. The Hon'ble Pandit Govind Ballabh Pant
5. Mr Jairam Das Daulatram
6. Sri Biswanath Das
7. The Hon'ble Sir N. Gopalaswami Ayyangar
8. Bakshi Sir Tek Chand
9. Diwan Bahadur Sir Alladi Krishnaswami Ayyar
10. Mr D.P. Khaitan
11. Mr M.R. Masani, and
12. Mr K.M. Munshi.'

If you will permit me, Sir, I will move the other amendment also.

Mr C.E. Gibbon: Sir, on another point of order. When Mr Munshi, who has given notice of these amendments is not present in the House, can anybody else move them in his absence?

Mr President: I suppose any one else can move them if permitted by the Chair.

Mr Satyanarayanan Sinha: The second amendment which is in the name of Mr Munshi and which I move is as follows:

"That the word "and" at the end of clause (a) be deleted and at the end of clause (b) the full stop be changed into a comma and the following be added:
and (c) that casual vacancies in the committee be filled as soon as possible after they occur by nomination by the President from among the members of the Assembly.'

"That the word "and" at the end of clause (a) be deleted and at the end of clause (b) the full stop be changed into a comma and the following be added as a new paragraph:

Mr P.R. Thakur (Bengal: General): This is an important Resolution and this Committee which is going to be appointed will consider the subjects that will be reserved to the Centre. My Hon'ble friend, Mr Rajagopalachariar, did not say anything about the maintenance of peace throughout the country and the prevention of famines. These two things are essential and I say so, because we, Bengalis, are the worst sufferers; we had recently communal rioting in Bengal and there was also famine. We asked for help from the Local Government but the Government was not able to give it, and we could not make any appeal to the Centre. Another thing is that when the Interim Government was formed, His Excellency the Viceroy said that this Government would not interfere with Provincial Governments. If the Centre cannot interfere in cases where there is communal disturbance or there is famine, then we will have to consider what will happen to the people of those Provinces. I hope the Committee will take this into serious consideration so that steps may be taken to maintain peace throughout the country and also to prevent famines. Another thing that I want to bring to the notice of the Congress High Command through this Assembly is this. Somehow or other there is a feeling that this High Command is not sympathetic towards the people of Bengal: they want to have independence at the cost of Bengal. I hope this Committee will consider this aspect seriously so that Bengal may not be affected in future either by famine or by communal disturbances.

Mr Jaipal Singh (Bihar: General): Mr President, this is a very imposing list and I personally have no quarrel. I know the names are of eminent men that have been proposed by Mr Satyanarayan Sinha, but I do feel some concern, now that explanation has been given by Mr Rajagopalachariar that under (b) the President may add ten more persons to the Committee. That implies that he is leaving room for our absent friends. Had he pointed out that the President would have discretion to nominate members from parties or groups that has been left out in the twelve names that had already been proposed, I would not have anything to say. Looking at the list, it seems to me that the plan is not for unity but for uniformity. I would have liked to see, for instance, the names of persons like Dr Jayakar, Dr Ambedkar and Dr Deshmukh in the list.
The Hon’ble Sri C. Rajagopalachariar: Will you, Mr President, request the speaker to come closer to the microphone and speak? I am unable to hear him.

Mr Jaipal Singh: When I shouted yesterday, Pandit Govind Ballabh Pant thought I was being too vehement, and I said to myself I would be a little mellow this morning. But, for the benefit of Mr Rajagopalachariar, I shall shout despite what Pandit Govind Ballabh Pant may feel. I will raise my voice for Mr Rajagopalachariar’s benefit.

Mr President: It is not so much shouting that is required as speaking in front of the microphone.

Mr Jaipal Singh: If there were microphones all around, then I need not come near the microphone, but look at members on all sides, I submit that, when Mr Rajagopalachariar said that the ten members that the President would nominate subsequently were reserved for our absentee friends, I was concerned that no room had been left to accommodate sections, groups and parties who were not among the twelve people named herein. I know that as far as the fate of my own people is concerned, the temper of this House seems to be, as it has been in the past, that they should be permanently excluded from all the good things of life. This is a very important thing. That is the impression I get, although that may not be true. Less important committees may give us a fair deal—I do not know, but I see no reason why here also some tribal representation could not have been given. I am not moving an amendment, I am only expressing my opinion when I say that I would like to have seen persons of the eminence of Dr Jayakar, Dr Ambedkar and Dr Deshmukh on this Committee. I do think that they can render as good service as the twelve members who are named here. I am not moving an amendment, but I am bound to say that I am surprised that Tribal Areas are completely left out of the picture; so are our eminent men whose names I have already mentioned.

Sardar Harnam Singh (Punjab: Sikh): I do not propose to make a speech on this Resolution. But I do want to say that this is not a committee on which communal representation or tribal representation is very, very necessary. This Committee, as the Resolution states, is simply formed for the purpose of understanding the scope of the Union subjects. It is not a committee even for defining the scope of the Union subjects. Therefore, I put before the House that no member of this House should insist on communal or tribal representation. The best men of this House must come on this Committee to make a report to the House as to the compass and scope of the Union subjects, and when that report will be before the House, we will be in a position to make any suggestions that we may like.

Prof. N.G. Ranga (Madras: General): Mr President I wish to suggest that Dr Ambedkar’s name should be included in this list, and I appeal to one of the members whose names are suggested to offer to withdraw in his favour.

The Hon’ble Sri C. Rajagopalachariar: Sir, I would beg of the House to look at it rather from the point of view which Shri Harnam Singh put before the House than from any other point of view. After all, if you once more read these names, you will find among them men who are absolutely non-party men, who have given their time to considerations of issues and drafting difficulties and people who may more or less be described as experts in the art of bringing laws into existence. Clause (b) provides that the President may add ten more persons to the Committee. Now, the President is not invested with this authority for nothing. He is invested with this power to make up for defects. The President will consider the position when the Muslim League members, who are now absent, come in. We will know then how the position stands. It is not intended really that the President should exercise this nomination power in an arbitrary manner. He is going to get the opinion of the Muslim League members when they join and get them to elect their representatives and they will come in.

There is another absent element, the States. The President will consider who will best represent the States in this particular task and take them in and, if there is room, I have no doubt the President will add other eminent constitutionalists who are in the House, some of whose names have been mentioned and then the Committee will be a strong Committee. Relying upon this, I ask the House to accept the Resolution as it stands, with the amendments proposed.

Mr President: I have now to put this Resolution to the vote of the House. Is it necessary to read out the Resolution once again? (Hon’ble members: No, no.)

An Hon’ble Member: What about Mr Ranga’s amendment?

Mr President: Mr Ranga did not move any amendment. He only made a suggestion. I will now put the Resolution, as amended, to vote,

The Resolution, as amended, was adopted.

9. Representations of Harijans of Sind in the Constituent Assembly

Sind: Inflammatory Propaganda

Even though we form 17 per cent of the total population of the Hindus of Sind, we have had no representation on the Sind Assembly and on other local bodies of Sind, except Karachi, during all these past ten years of Sind provincial autonomy. Strange as it may seem, no concrete and persistent efforts have been made by those in authority and by those who adorned the Assembly benches by the help of the votes of these Harijans and on behalf of them, to safeguard and secure these fundamental democratic rights to these people. The result is that they are, today nowhere directly represented by the Harijans themselves, as the Harijans of other provinces are....

10. Sardar Patel Clarifies Basis of Representation in the Constituent Assembly

Letter from Vallabhbhai Patel to J.V. Gohil, 13 February 1947

New Delhi

Dear Friend,

I have received your letter of the 10th instant along with a copy of your memorandum to the President of the Constituent Assembly.

The whole scheme of the Constituent Assembly is based on representation on a population basis. In the Government of India Act now in force, no recognition is given to the Scheduled
Towards Freedom: 1947

Castes in Sind, nor is there any such provision for them in the Poona Pact which formed part of the Act subsequently. The elections to the Constituent Assembly have been made in accordance with the document of 16 May, and no alteration can be made by anybody in the matter. Your grievances can be represented by the representatives of the Scheduled Castes in other provinces who are in a fairly large number in the Constituent Assembly. You may, therefore, prepare your memorandum and send it on to those representatives, or to the secretary of the Minority Committee.

Yours sincerely,

Vallabhbhai Patel

To,
Acharya J.P. Kripalani,
Congress President
New Delhi

Sir,

I understand from press report that the first meeting of the Advisory Committee on fundamental rights, the protection of minorities and the administration of tribal and excluded areas will take place on the 27th instant in the Council House, New Delhi. But I extremely regret to point out that no accredited representative of the Chittagong Hill Tracts has been invited to represent the case of these frontier tracts in the Advisory Committee. However I take the liberty of placing before you for your kind perusal as well as for communicating the Advisory Committee, the demands of the people of the Chittagong Hill Tracts regarding the oncoming constitutional changes of this area as embodied in the resolutions passed on 14.2.47 in the Working Committee of the Chittagong Hill Tracts Hillmen Association.

As President of the Chittagong Hill Tracts Hillmen Association, I am forwarding you the true copies of the following authentic documents of this Association:

1. Telegram to HE Lord Wavell
2. Do Hon’ble Pandit Nehru.
3. Resolutions of the meeting of the Working Committee passed on 14.2.47.
I earnestly hope, as President of the All India Congress Committee as well as a member of the Advisory Committee, you would be kind enough to consider the problem minutely. We the hill people of these frontier tracts have great confidence in the leadership of the Indian National Congress.

I beg to be favoured with a reply.

I have the honour to be,

Sir,

Your most obedient servant.

True copies of the resolutions paused on 14.2.47 in the Working Committee of the Chittagong Hill Tracts Hillmen Association:

1. Resolved that it is the inalienable right of the people of the Chittagong Hill Tracts to frame their own constitution without any compulsion, imposition, hindrance or any interference from outside as these tracts being tribal areas (according to the Hon’ble Pandit Nehru’s definition of tribal areas as embodied in his letter of the 6th August 1946, New Delhi, addressed to the President of the Naga Hills National Council) ‘are neither part of British India, nor of Burma, nor of an Indian State, nor of any foreign power.’

2. Resolved that the Hon’ble Pandit Nehru’s momentous resolution wherein adequate safeguards shall be provided for minorities, backward and tribal areas and depressed and other classes passed in the Constituent Assembly on the 22nd January 1947, should be the guiding principle of the Advisory Committee while dealing with the complicated problems of the Chittagong Hill Tracts and the people shall consider the above part of the resolution of the Constituent Assembly as one of the most important clauses of their Magna Charta.

3. Resolved that the Chittagong Hill Tracts should enjoy equal democratic rights and privileges on the same footing with other parts of India along with their existing three tribal chiefs.

4. Resolved that the existing three Circles under the three tribal Chiefs including the reserved Forests be constituted as three constitutional States (Rajajukta Prajatantra) and in a group should have integration with the Union as an autonomous unit having relation as protectorate placing the following subjects (besides the union subjects) to the Centre.
   Centre (vide para. 4 of the announcement of the Cabinet Mission and the Viceroy, New Delhi, 16 May, 1946):
   (A) Administration of higher justice.
   (B) Higher and foreign education.

5. Resolved that if the revenue collected from these tracts is inadequate the Union Government should grant subsidy for raising the standard of living of the people as well as the time of emergency.

6. Resolved that this frontier area should be allowed one representative in the Executive Council of the Union Government to look after the interests of this singular area.

7. Resolved that this Association strongly protests the idea of unification of the Chittagong Hill Tracts with Bengal in any circumstances, in view of the fact that the hill people’s customary laws, prescriptive rights, religion and their very existence will be endangered since Bengal is communal as well as a deficit province.

8. Resolved that the Advisory Committee on the fundamental rights of citizens, minorities, tribal and excluded areas should fully discuss the accredited representatives of the Chittagong Hill Tracts before any constitutional changes are being recommended to the Constituent Assembly and the Advisory Committee should co-opt one member.
from this Association and one from the constitutional tribal Chiefs as accredited representatives of these tracts.

9. Resolved that the above resolutions be forwarded to the 19th Chiefs Conference...

12. ‘Advisory Committee on Minorities: Five Sub-Committees Appointed’

_The Tribune, 1 March 1947_

New Delhi—At a meeting of the Advisory Committee of the Constituent Assembly on Fundamental Rights, Minorities and Excluded and Tribal Areas held yesterday at the Council hall, five sub-committees were appointed to deal with various subjects.

Following are the names of the members of the various sub-committees:

1. FUNDAMENTAL RIGHTS SUB COMMITTEE: Acharya J.B. Kripalani (President), Mr M.R. Masani Professor K.T. Shah, Rajkumari Amrit Kaur, L. Krishna Swamy Aiyar, Mr K.M. Munshi, Sardar Harnam Singh, Maulana Abul Kalam Azad, Dr B.R. Ambedkar, Mr Jairamdas Daulatram.

2. NORTH-EAST FRONTIER TRIBAL AREAS AND ASSAM EXCLUDED AND PARTIALLY EXCLUDED AREAS SUB-COMMITTEE: The Hon’ble Sriyut Gopinath Bardoloi (President), Rev. J.J.M. Nichols Roy, Mr Rup Nath Brahma, Mr Mayangnokcha: Mr A.V. Thakkar.

3. NORTH-WEST FRONTIER TRIBAL AREAS SUB-COMMITTEE: Khan Abdul Ghaffar Khan, Khan Abdul Samad Khan, Mr Mehr Chand Khanna.

4. EXCLUDED AND PARTIALLY EXCLUDED AREAS SUB-COMMITTEE (except those in Assam): Mr A.V. Thakkar, Mr Jaipal Singh, Mr Devinder Nath Samanta, Mr Phool Bhan Shaha, Mr Jagjivan Ram, Dr Profulla Chandra Ghosh, Mr Raj Krishna Bose.

5. MINORITIES COMMITTEE: Mr Jagjivan Ram, Maulana Abul Kalam Azad, Dr B.R. Ambedkar, Sardar Jagendra Singh, Dr S.P. Mukherjee, Sardar Ujjal Singh, Sardar Harnam Singh, Bakshi Sir Tek Chand, Dr Gopi Chand Bhargava, Sir H.J. Khandekar, Mr P.R. Thakur, Sir Homi Mody, Dr H.C. Mookherjee; Shri P.K. Salve, Mr S.H. Prater, Mr F.R. Anthony, The Hon’ble Shri C. Ragagopalachariar, Rajkumari Amrit Kaur, Shri Jairamdas Daulatram, Mr R.K. Sidhwa, Mr Rup Nath Brahma, Mr M. Rutnaswamy, Mr M.V.H. Collins, Mr K.M. Munshi, Dr Alban D’Souza and the Hon’ble Pt Govind Ballabh Pant.

13. Questions about the Framing of a New Constitution

Letter from Constitutional Adviser to All Members of the Central and Provincial Legislatures, 17 March 1947

Home Political Department (Internal) [hereafter Home Poll (I)], File No. 83/47, NAI.

No. CA./18/Cons/47.

Constituent Assembly of India.

New Delhi

Sir,

In order to facilitate the work of framing a new Constitution before June, 1948, it is considered desirable to issue a questionnaire, bearing on the salient features of the Constitution, to all the members of the various Provincial Legislatures and of the Central Legislature and to invite their individual views thereon.

2. Such a questionnaire is annexed to this letter. The questionnaire is divided into five parts, and in each part are set out a certain number of questions bearing on its subject-matter. Brief explanatory notes have been inserted under each question.

3. The questionnaire, as will be noticed, deals only with the Constitution of the Centre. But most of the questions will apply, mutatis mutandis, to the provincial sphere also. You are therefore requested to give your answers both in regard to the Union Constitution and in regard to the Provincial Constitutions.

4. Your answers may kindly be sent so as to reach this office as early as possible and in any case before 10 April, 1947, as the matter is very urgent.

5. It is considered unnecessary to frame any questionnaire regarding Group Constitutions until the Sections have decided to set up such Constitutions.

I have the honour to be,

Sir,

Your most obedient servant,

B.N. Rau

Constitutional Adviser.

Constitutional Assembly of India.

Questionnaire

A. Head of the Indian Union

1. What should be the designation of the Head of the Indian Union?

Note: In this and the following notes reference has been made to the constitutions of various countries. But it must be remembered that the United Kingdom and Ireland are not Federations and even South Africa is not a true Federation.

USA
Switzerland
Ireland
Canada
Australia
South Africa

President.

The local Executive Head is the Governor General on behalf of His Majesty.

The local Executive Head is the Governor General.

B. Executive

12. What should be the nature and type of the Union Executive? Should it be of the British type (Parliamentary) or the American type (Non-parliamentary) or the Swiss type (mixed) or any other type?

Note: From the point of view of practical administration this is perhaps the most important question in the framing of the new Constitution. There are, as indicated in the questionnaire, three main types of Executives. In the British type, the Executive is responsible to the Legislature and has to resign on loss of confidence of the Legislature. In the American type, the Executive is not responsible to the Legislature; each derives its authority from the people direct and is not responsible to the other. In the Swiss type, the Executive is elected by the Legislature for a term of 4 years (which is also the life of the Legislature) and no question of resignation during the term arises. In the Irish Free State Constitution of 1922, we find a fourth type: there was a ministry of the British type plus certain additional Ministers appointed rather on the Swiss plan—that is to say, they were nominated by the Dail on the recommendation of a special committee, they held office for the term of the Dail, and were responsible only to the Dail. The British type is the one with which we are most familiar in India and its features are well-known. The main features of the Swiss type are (1) It gives all sections a chance of being represented in the Executive, the election being by proportional representation (2) it enables the Ministry to concentrate on the real problems of the country for a fixed term of 4 years without being distracted by motions of no-confidence (3) it ensures a substantial degree of responsibility to the Legislature inasmuch as the Executive is not only elected by the Legislature but is also subject to its directions. The Irish Free State type had a short life and has been abandoned in the new Irish Constitution, which has adopted the British type.

UK and the Dominions

By convention the Executive (Cabinet) is responsible to the Legislature and retains office so long as it enjoys the confidence of the Legislature.

USA

The President is the head of the Federal Executive with a Cabinet of 10 heads of departments called Secretaries appointed by him, subject to the nominal approval of the Senate and answerable only to him. Executive not responsible to the Legislature. Non-parliamentary.

Switzerland

The Federal Council of 7 members elected by the Legislature (by proportional representation) once in 4 years. They are eligible for re-election. Not more than one is elected from the same canton. A mixture of Parliamentary and Non-Parliamentary.

Ireland

Ireland has put into statutory form what in UK is based on convention. The Government consists of 7 to 15 members appointed by the President. One of them acts as Prime Minister, and another as Deputy Prime Minister. Responsible to Dail Eireann, though the Ministers may be chosen from both the houses, at most two from the Senate. Parliamentary.

Legislature

20. Should the Union Legislature have a single Chamber or two Chambers?

Note: Second Chambers are set up for various reasons: for example, to represent special interests or classes as in Ireland; as a check on hasty and ill-conceived legislation of the lower House as in France; to provide equal representation to the different Constituent Units of a federation as in USA. It may provide for a continuous term of office, only a portion of the members retiring at regular interval as in USA, and the old French Constitution. This secures the representation of past as well as current opinion and helps in maintaining continuity in public policy.

There is a growing opposition to the Second Chamber for various reasons, namely, (1) it may tend to be reactionary, over-conservative and check urgently-needed but radical reforms,
(2) it may be instrumental in delaying legislation, (3) it tends to be undemocratic since it is very difficult to constitute a truly democratic Second Chamber on a different basis from the lower Chamber, (4) it is expensive to the country, and politically-backward countries also lack able statesmen to man a Second Chamber properly.

26. Should there be a separate chain of courts to administer Union Laws?

Note: In USA, there is a separate chain of Federal Courts, but not in Canada, Australia or Switzerland.

USA

Under the constitution the judicial power of the United States is vested in a Supreme Court, and in such inferior courts as the Congress may from time to time ordain and establish. There are, at present, two sets of inferior federal courts, namely, the Federal District Courts and the Circuit Courts of Appeal. The country is divided into 83 districts, each State constituting at least one district. From the Federal Courts of these districts there is an appeal to Circuit Courts, which are ten in number. There are also two special courts, namely, the Court of Claims and the Court of Customs Appeals. In certain cases, however, the State courts may be, and are, permitted, in the exercise of the jurisdiction vested in them by the Constitution or laws of their respective States, to deal with causes which are within the federal judicial power. But their jurisdiction in such cases may be qualified by the right of the defendant to have the cause removed before trial into a Federal Court, or after trial the case may be taken by appeal to the Federal Supreme Court.

Australia

The judicial power of the Commonwealth is vested in a Federal Supreme Court, called the High Court of Australia, and ‘in such other federal courts as the Parliament creates, and in such other courts as it invests with federal jurisdiction’. The parliament is also empowered to make laws investing any court of a State with federal jurisdiction. Thus, the constitution has left to the discretion of the Parliament the determination of the degree to which the agency of the State courts is to be utilized for the administration of federal laws. Under the Judiciary Act of 1903, as amended from time to time, the several courts of the States are vested with federal jurisdiction in matters not within the exclusive jurisdiction of the High Court, and there is a right of appeal from these courts to the High Court.

Canada

Under the constitution the Canadian Parliament is empowered to establish a General Court of Appeal for Canada and other courts for the better administration of the laws of Canada. In the exercise of these powers, the Canadian Parliament has set up a Supreme Court of Appeal and an Exchequer Court. In other respects, the administration of justice, including the constitution, maintenance and organization of civil and criminal courts and civil procedure is a Provincial subject while criminal law and procedure are assigned to the Federation. It may be noted that the Constitution vests the Governor-General with power to appoint the Judges of the superior, district, and country courts of each province, subject to certain exceptions.

14. Memorandum on Minorities by Rajkumari Amrit Kaur

20 March 1947.

I VENTURE TO SUBMIT this short memorandum as a citizen of India. I hold that every question in connection with the framing of a just and righteous constitution for our country should be looked upon, by and large, from the point of view of a citizen. If this standpoint is fundamentally correct it follows that the primary duty of the committee appointed to look into the problem of minorities is to suggest such ways and means as will help to eradicate the evil of separatism rather than expedients or palliatives which might, in the long run, only contribute to its perpetuation.

There is no gainsaying the fact that foreign domination has been one of the main causes, if not the main cause, of creating internal dissensions between the two major communities. But now that the foreign power is definitely leaving, it behoves us more than ever before to turn the search light inwards. Such means as the British employed, for example, separate electorates, must be in the realm of offices, honour, and other things, side by side with an ignorant and impoverished populace, may not only not be tolerated by us but their continuance must be made impossible in the future. At the same time, it cannot be denied that whatever seeds of dissension were sown by the foreign rulers, the soil that nourished them and has allowed them to assume the menacing aspect they now bear is ours. The greater fault therefore is ours.

Personally I regret that the question of minorities was not made a part of the work of the committee appointed to draft fundamental rights. If the latter are broad-based and if suitable provision is made therein for the machinery to enforce them, they should really give to the individual as well to the community to which he belongs all the protection he or it needs. Freedom in all spheres of life, consistent with the moral law, protection of life and property, perfect equality before the law and in society, unadulterated justice and, above all, full, free and equal opportunities for education and service are all that human beings and communities need for both individual and social growth. I am more than ever convinced that in the stand taken by the majority of educated women in the matter of refusal to ask for any special privileges for themselves in any sphere of life is wholly correct. Women may be said technically to be the largest single minority in India. Not only have custom and usage dealt harshly with us, but even the law has militated and still continues to militate against us. But we do not and must never look upon ourselves as anything but an integral part of the whole, nor must we claim any privileges. Equality before the law and in society and equal opportunities for education and service are all we claim as human beings, and I believe that human beings and I believe that in the proper fulfillment of our duties as citizens—and duties must go hand in hand with rights—lies our best safeguard.

Although a member of a small and financially poor community, I appeal to its members to eschew privileges. Such an attitude would be wholly in keeping with the spirit of the teachings of Jesus Christ. A community that can boast the highest percentage in comparison with any other in the sphere of education among women and which is unhampered by such social injustices as exist elsewhere in the forms of purdah, polygamy, untouchability and laws of inheritance cannot or should not be afraid to rely for its progress mainly on opportunities for service in a state where human rights are fully guaranteed. Privileges and safeguards really weaken those that demand them. They are a definite bar to unity, without which there is no peace, as also to efficiency without which the standards of good governance are lowered. Axiomatically there is no reason why the interests of any individual or community should not be safe in the hands of a good person or persons, irrespective of their personal religion.

Joint electorates will help to a large extent to create this confidence and must be embodied in the Constitution.

Rather than say for how long any safeguards are necessary I would plead with the minorities to say that the necessity for safeguards should only be considered after a period of, say, five or seven years, if their trust in the majority communities has, in this interval, been proved to be wholly unjustified.

Trust in the goodness of men is the best way of invoking generosity in them. I am, therefore, of opinion that no minority should demand any safeguards but should be brave enough to rely solely on the goodwill of the majority and its own inherent moral strength. Nevertheless it is up to the majority communities to inspire the necessary confidence in the minorities as to enable them to adopt this attitude. The larger responsibility is really theirs. No constitution, however carefully worded and framed can guarantee the absence of strife if there is no good-will among the parties concerned. The ideal of men living happily and at peace with each other definitely implies the rule of reason instead of passion. Bitterness, prejudice and dissension are negative and destructive, but they exist in our land today. Clemency, compassion and consideration are positive virtues without which there can be no human understanding and, therefore, no hope of building up solidarity and unity.

It is a big tragedy that the task of framing a constitution has come to us at a time when hatred and mistrust dominate the minds of men. But we may not forget that underneath man’s brutish passions, in spite of greed and ignorance, he is a reasoning being. Passions rage and flame and destroy, as they are doing today, but they will also exhaust themselves, and man does inherently prefer to live in keeping with the dignity of a human being rather than follow the law of the jungle.

While consistently holding that safeguards for minorities are wholly undesirable, I nevertheless fear that the appeal for a non-demand of all such will today be a lone cry. Having regard to the tense atmosphere in which we live and having said that it is up to the majority communities to inspire the necessary confidence in the minorities; I venture to submit a few suggestions for their consideration. These suggestions naturally carry no legal knowledge or authority but are only in the nature of a way of approach to the solution of this vexed question.
Would it not be wise for the majority communities to consider the solution of the problem mainly in terms of division of responsibility and power? Division of territory and/or exchange of populations do not really go to the root of the matter. In the long run these expedients might even serve to separate rather than unite. It should, however, be possible to banish fear, restore confidence and generate goodwill by the sharing of power, on a population basis, both at the Centre and in the Provinces. For example, important and not so important portfolios may in turn be held by members of the different communities according as their population and importance at the Centre and in a particular province merit.

While the Legislative Assembly is elected on a system of joint electorates there could be a Senate or Board of Members elected by the different communities in which no community can have more than one vote. This body could veto by a majority any measure which it felt was not for the general good. At the same time, no one community should be allowed to stand in the way of other communities wishing to carry out projects, the veto in that case applying only to the community concerned.

As to what are or are not communal questions there might be a tribunal constituted at the Centre to decide the issue.

The Senate or Board or some other body may be appointed to see that the members of all communities have a reasonable chance given them in all services beginning from the lowest sphere to the highest. But in order to ensure maximum efficiency it should be a sine qua non that promotion shall be only and strictly on the basis of integrity and merit. I place integrity advisedly before merit because high standards of public morality must be maintained if the State is to be a great moral agency.

To this end, I am quite certain that in drawing up a code of fundamental rights there should also be drawn up a code of duties of citizens. Rights should really follow duties, a wise axiom which is lost sight of in the maze of fear and suspicion in which today we live and move and have our being.
Chapter 2. Political Developments in Early 1947

1. Congress Socialist Party and Hindu Mahasabha Oppose 6 December Statement

Letter from Wavell to Pethick-Lawrence, 1 January 1947

PRIVATE AND SECRET THE VICEROY’S HOUSE, NEW DELHI

1. I had a quick trip back and got here on Monday evening. As a result, I had a full day with Colville who went to Bombay on Christmas day.

2. The Constituent Assembly has adjourned to meet again on the 20th January for a ten-day session. Nehru’s resolution was not pressed to a division in the end, but has been left over in the hopes that the Muslim League may be into the Assembly by then. I think it is probably true that there is certain realization now coming over some of the Congress leaders that they cannot drive ahead and frame a constitution for India unless they can take along with them the Muslim League and the Princes. The rank and file of the Constituent Assembly members are unwilling to accept this; but forceful speeches by Jayakar and by Ambedkar had the result of postponing a decision both on Nehru’s resolution and on the important Procedural Sub-Committee’s report.

3. There is at the moment a struggle going on in the Congress between the centre party who want to get His Majesty’s Government’s statement of 6th December accepted without qualification, as against the left-wing and extreme right-wing who both want to reject it. I do not think that there is any real chance of a clear-cut decision in favour of acceptance.

Jai Prakash Narain has lately been making most objectionable speeches (I enclose a statement he made a couple of days ago to a press conference in Delhi), and I intend to take this up with Nehru and Patel. It is an impossible position for a member of the Working Committee of the Congress, which now forms the major party in the Government, to talk like this; and he should either be expelled or be curbed. The Hindu Mahasabha has also no wish to compromise with the Muslims, and a number of their speeches in the Constituent Assembly were completely communal. The Mahasabha has just concluded a militant annual session in the United Provinces.

4. I have been resuming my usual interviews with members of the Cabinet, but it is clear that most of them are not at present really interested in administering the country. Politics has become such an obsession, and takes up so much of their time that nothing is being done in many departments. This is probably inevitable, however unfortunate it may be, but is making the few members who do take an interest in their work very restive. Bhabha, for example complained to me that all his business friends told him that the Government was not functioning properly, and that administrative decisions were not being taken. He was very unhappy about the position, and, I believe, would be quite glad to get out of the Government.

5. One of the matters on which I intend to speak to Nehru when I see him today is the need of a Cabinet Sub-Committee to recommend appointments to India’s diplomatic posts abroad. These are now of considerable importance, and their number is steadily increasing. So far, Nehru has tried to retain in his own hands the authority to recommend, and this is obviously undesirable. He has just come up with a most unsuitable proposal for India’s Agent in Ceylon, a man who was one of Subhas Chandra Bose’s chief assistants in Singapore during the war.

6. You will remember that I discussed with you the need of strengthening the UK High Commissioner’s staff in India for various purposes. Shone has shown me the despatch which he has sent to the Cabinet Offices on this subject, asking for authority to recruit 15 persons from the Secretary of State’s Services in India. I entirely agree with his desire to expand immediately, and I think it is an obvious solution that he should be able to take over some members of the Services now in India. I hope you will be able to help him in getting what he wants.

With best wishes for the New Year.

2. ‘Gandhiji Supports Assam’s Stand’

_National Herald,_ 1 January 1947.

Srirampur, 29 Dec.—‘If you don’t commit suicide nobody can kill you,’ said Mahatma Gandhi to Mr Gopinath Bardoloi, Premier of Assam, who had an interview with Gandhiji today in connection with the question of Assam’s going into sections.

Mr Bardoloi, accompanied by Mrs Baidyanath Mukerji, Supply Minister, Mr Siddhinath Sharma, secretary of the Assam Congress and Mr Mahendra Mohan Chaudhury, Secretary of the Assam Congress Parliamentary Party, arrived in Srirampur from Chaumuhani shortly after midday and had discussion with Gandhiji for about two hours. Acharya Kripalani, Congress President and Mr Shankarrao Deo were also present during the latter part of discussion.

Later, the leaders of Assam had an interview with Pandit Nehru.

Mr Bardoloi told the Associated Press of India that they had discussion about the general political situation in the country with particular reference to Assam’s going into sections. Mr Bardoloi added that Gandhiji had approved the stand taken by the Assam Congress Committee. They must be given the right to frame their constitution. Mr Bardoloi said.

Mr Bardoloi and other Assam Congress leaders left for Chaumuhani later in the afternoon en route to Assam.—API
3. 6 December Statement Not an Easy Path to Pakistan

Excerpts from a Letter from Pethick-Lawrence to Wavell, 2 January 1947

INDIA OFFICE

I think it is time that I resumed my series of weekly letters to you, although I have little of much significance to tell you on this occasion. This may be due partly to the fact that Christmas brought to us here, as I hope it did to you, a very welcome even if only a partial relaxation of the strain of the past few weeks, and partly to the continued presence of Abell who, I presume, is keeping you in touch, so far as is possible, with developments in regard to the vital matters at present under consideration here.

2. As he may have told you, the result of our deliberations with you after the departure of the Indian Representatives was brought by the Prime Minister before the Cabinet on Tuesday last (31st December). The upshot of the discussion was that the Cabinet wished the Statement to be redrafted and its implications further considered.

3. Officials of the Cabinet Office and this Office have since been hard at work on the modification of the terms of the Statement in the light of the Cabinet’s views and Abell has taken part in their deliberations. A revised draft is to be considered by the India and Burma Committee tomorrow (Friday) with a view to its coming before the Cabinet again on Tuesday next....

9. I hope that Jinnah does not interpret our Statement of 6th December to mean that if he only sits back and does nothing he will get his Pakistan. It may also be interpreted to mean a Provincial autonomy which would be far less to his liking. I agree with you that Pakistan is a quite unworkable proposition....

4. Nehru Moves Resolution for Acceptance of HMG’s 6 December Statement

*Nehru’s Speech at the AICC Meeting Held at New Delhi, 5 January 1947

Friends and Comrades, I am now going to bring before you a resolution recommending acceptance of the British Government’s statement of 6 December. It is a resolution drafted before Mahatma Gandhi at Comilla and passed by the Working Committee. I know there is controversy over the matter. Still I would request you to consider the resolution in the light of the present circumstances and accept it. This is the resolution I move for your consideration and acceptance....

Friends, it is a simple, straightforward resolution. There is no sign of weakness in it; if there was the least suspicion of weakness, I would not have brought it before you or commended it to your acceptance.

The main question before us is how to keep the Constituent Assembly alive and extract from it the greatest possible good for the country. By accepting the statement of 6 December, we would leave the door open for the League to enter and put forward their point of view. If we do not accept that statement it will give an opportunity to the British Government to change... or withdraw their earlier statement of 16 May, with the result that the Constituent Assembly may be changed radically.

Obstacles have been put in the path of the Constituent Assembly in the past. We have overcome them and we should do everything in our power hereafter to prevent attempts to sabotage this great weapon which we can use to our advantage.

In my speech at Meerut I had referred to the crisis towards which I felt inside the Interim Government the Congress Ministries were fast moving. The attitude of the British Government was adversely affecting the work of the Interim Government. Those statements and the fears I had expressed then are now coming true. At the time of my earlier speech the British Government could not have claimed success in impeding our work but now the British Government are in a position to make that claim and substantiate it. The British Government's actions have created complications. A grave situation has been created and the resolution before the House which has been prepared with great care and deliberation is a simple, straightforward one meant to meet that situation.

The House is to decide whether to accept the statement of 6 December or not. This question has proved to be a headache. We are not in the habit of accepting things thrust upon us against our will. We were sorely tempted to accept the challenge contained in this statement and answer it with all the force at our command. But we realized the danger of allowing our emotions to overpower us.

Many forces have lined up against us. We should advance cautiously to meet and overcome those forces and it is this consideration that has prompted the Working Committee to bring the resolution before the House.

The resolution accepts the statement. Some may feel that this is a confession of weakness. I deny that our fight has taken on a new form with the meeting of the Constituent Assembly and our aim should be to see that the Assembly is not postponed or shelved. It has not yet begun to function in fullness but I hope that when it meets after a fortnight it will begin to function as it should.

The significant point about the Assembly is not whether it is sovereign or not, but that it cannot be dissolved by the British Government except by the use of force. When the British Government choose to use force in that way, then it will be time for us to decide how to face it. The primary point to bear in mind is that the Constituent Assembly has begun to function since 9 December and though it is not the Assembly of our ideals, yet it can be utilized as a weapon to achieve our independence. Therefore, it becomes absolutely essential and important to prevent attempts to postpone or shelve it. It has life in it and is capable of taking us far on the road to independence.

Our opponents have failed in their effort to shelve it, and so have adopted the alternative of putting obstacles in its way and have issued the statement of 6 December. Since 1919 we have been depending entirely on our strength and have looked to the people of India and not to the British Government to achieve our objective.

We have no desire to add to the number of enemies ranged against us at this critical stage of our fight. Our enemies rely entirely on the British Government and the British Government rely on them to do mischief in India. But even the combination of the two has not the strength to fight us face to face. And so they resort to subterfuges and create obstacles in our way.

The Muslim League desired that the Constituent Assembly should not continue and that the country should revert to the order of things that prevailed eight or nine months ago. If that desire materialises we shall meet that situation as we think best. But all our energies should now be bent on going ahead with the Constituent Assembly with strength and firmness. It is possible that we may have to fight on a different front and we should be prepared for that too. By passing this resolution we will show to the world that we do not intend to work behind closed doors. And in order to demonstrate our desire to keep the doors open, we do many unpleasant things and postpone many decisions which we would like to take without delay. We do not want to give an opportunity to anyone to say that we have broken the British plan.
Towards Freedom: 1947

It is true that Assam has a mandate to oppose sections and groups and Assam can fight if it wants. But I would like to remind you that battles are won not by the personal courage of one or two but by the cooperation of many thousands and by the mobilization and right use of resources. At the present time our object should be to outmanoeuvre our opponents. The time may come when Assam will have to fight; that fight will not be single-handed but will be waged with the whole of India behind them.

In conclusion, again I refer to my statement at Meerut that I did not know how long I and my colleagues would continue in the Interim Government. I still do not know how long we shall remain there. People have been talking of the final fight for independence. I feel, however, that that fight is even now in progress. Possibly that fight will have to be intensified in the near future but the present situation is such as to call for restraint of language and calm deliberation before action. Jai Hind.

5. Congress Accepts HMG’s Statement of 6 December 1946
Statement by All India Congress Committee, 5 January 1947
AICC Papers, File No. G-30/1946, Item 5, NMML.

The AICC having considered the events that have taken place in the country since the Meerut Session of the Congress in November last, the statement issued by the British Government on 6 December, 1946, and the statement of the Working Committee of 22 December, 1946, advises Congressmen as follows:

1. The AICC endorses the statement of the Working Committee of 22 December, 1946, and expresses its agreement with the views contained therein.

2. While the Congress has always been agreeable to making a reference to the Federal Court on the question of interpretation in dispute, such a reference has become purposeless and undesirable owing to recent announcements made on behalf of the British Government. A reference could only be made on an agreed basis, the parties concerned agreeing to abide by the decision given.

3. The AICC is firmly of opinion that the constitution for a free and independent India should be framed by the people of India on the basis of as wide an agreement as possible. There must be no interference whatsoever by any external authority, and no compulsion of any province or part of a province by another province. The AICC realizes and appreciates the difficulties placed in the way of some provinces, notably Assam and the NWFP and the Sikhs in the Punjab, by the British Cabinet’s scheme of 16 May, 1946, and more especially by the interpretation put upon it by the British Government in their statement of 6 December, 1946. The Congress cannot be a party to any such compulsion or imposition against the will of the people concerned, a principle which the British Government have themselves recognized.

4. The AICC is anxious that the Constituent Assembly should proceed with the work of framing a constitution for free India with the goodwill of all parties concerned and, with a view to removing the difficulties that have arisen owing to varying interpretations, agree to advise action in accordance with the interpretation of the British Government in regard to the procedure to be followed in the sections. It must be clearly understood, however, that this must not involve any compulsion of a province and that the rights of the Sikhs in the Punjab should not be jeopardised. In the event of any attempt at such compulsion, a province or part of a province has the right to take such action as may be deemed necessary in order to give effect to the wishes of the people concerned. The future course of action will depend upon the developments that take place and the AICC therefore directs the Working Committee to advise upon it, whenever circumstances so require, keeping in view the basic principle of provincial autonomy.

6. ‘Surrender of Rights of the Constituent Assembly: Bose’

CALCUTTA. 4 Jan. Mr Sarat Chandra Bose, who owing to illness is unable to attend the Congress Working Committee meeting, has telegraphed to the Congress President requesting the AICC to reject the British Government interpretation of 6 December of paragraph 19(v) of the Cabinet Mission’s statement of 16 May.

‘Acceptance of the British Government’s interpretation would mean an ignoble surrender of rights of the Constituent Assembly and end of provincial autonomy.’ Mr Bose asserted.—API

7. ‘Acceptance of 6 December Statement Recommended: Nehru’s Resolution before AICC’
   The Hindustan Times, 6 January 1947.

NEW DELHI, Sunday—The All-India Congress Committee debated for six hours today the Working Committee’s resolution moved by Pandit Nehru advising acceptance of the British Government’s interpretation regarding procedure for the meeting of the Sections of the Constituent Assembly. Twenty-one members participated in the debate a majority of them either opposed the resolution or proposed amendments to it. Further debate was adjourned until 9 a.m. tomorrow.

The resolution makes it clear that acceptance of the procedure in the Sections ‘must not involve any compulsion of a province and that the rights of the Sikhs in the Punjab should not be jeopardized.’ It adds that ‘in the event of any attempt at such compulsion a province or a part of a province has the right to take such action as may be deemed necessary in order to give effect to the wishes of the people concerned.’

Acharya Kripalani in his opening remarks and Pandit Nehru in moving the resolution made it clear that they were accepting the interpretation not because they had any faith in the good intentions of the British Government or of the Muslim League, but because they did not wish to provide an excuse for their opponents to wreck the plan of the Constituent Assembly on the pretext that the Congress had not accepted the State Paper of 16 May. It was, they added, a demonstration of the strength and not of the weakness of the Congress.

The proceedings began punctually at 3 p.m. in the Constitution Club hall with Acharya Kripalani in the Chair. A dais had been put up in the Hall and only the President and the General Secretaries sat on it. A picture of the ‘Architect of the Nation,’ Mahatma Gandhi and the Tri-colour provided attractive back ground to the dais.

From the point of view of the people of Delhi the venue of the meeting in New Delhi was disappointing but it proved an ideal setting for a business session. Some hundreds of people were able, however, to listen to the speech as they were relayed outside the Hall. Only the arrangements for the Press left much to be desired.

Aung San Present

All the seats reserved for the members of the AICC were occupied, although only half the Committee strength was present. Apparently more were not expected at such a short notice especially as many of them had only recently left Delhi after attending the session of the Constituent Assembly. Among the distinguished visitors were U. Aung San, Mr G.M. Syed, Mr Abdul Majid Sindhi and Mr Talpar. Acharya Kripalani was garlanded by Mr Asaf Ali on behalf of the Delhi Provincial Congress Committee.

Opening the proceedings, the president made an objective report on the happenings since the Congress session at Meerut, but it was in his typical style—blunt, half humorous and half cynical. He amused the audience by having an occasional joke at the expense of Congressmen as a whole when he called them ‘ahimsa wadis’ and ‘satyawadis’ who were ‘very polite and overconsiderate to others’. This, he said particularly in reference to the way they accepted Mr Attlee’s invitation for talks in London and added his personal regret that their representative had done so.

Acharya Kripalani’s theme was that the Britishers could not change their habits and they had produced another hat-trick in the form of the Statement of 6 December. He characterized that so-called interpretation ‘a big change’ and reminded the House that Gandhiji had his doubts about British intentions, but had allowed the Working Committee to act according to its light. Following that the light had come up against a wall and the meeting today had been called to remove that obstacle.

The President ‘made equally devastating references to the Muslim League which he said was acting under the Viceroy’s protection and which was fighting the British Government’s battle.’ He added amidst cheers: ‘The British Government is very fortunate. Its battles are always fought by other people. It happened in the two world wars; is happening in India.’

Finally Acharya Kripalani said the issue before them was how to act in a way that their own interest might not be jeopardized and that they might be able to take advantage of the machinery of the Constituent Assembly. He concluded: ‘No one can undermine the principle of provincial autonomy but let us not cry before we are hurt.’

Pandit Nehru moved the resolution on behalf of the Working Committee. He mentioned that they had given every anxious and deep thought and had consulted their elders (meaning Mahatma Gandhi). The main theme of his speech was that the Constituent Assembly would be a powerful weapon in their struggle for independence and that it should be saved being wrecked. He asked the Houses to accept the British Government’s latest interpretation not because of any faith in the good intentions of the Government or of the League. In fact they could presume only evil intentions in regard to both.

The Muslim League did not want withdrawal of British power and was building its case on British support, continued Pandit Nehru, but the Congress genuinely wanted India’s freedom; they were opening the doors of the Constitution Assembly for the League and would welcome their co-operation. They had postponed decisions on important matters in the Constituent Assembly in the same spirit. It was not a sign of their weakness but of their strength. He did not wish the British Government or the League to accuse the Congress of having wrecked the Scheme of 16 May. But the British Government had in their own Statement of 6 December accepted the principle of ‘no imposition and no compulsion.’ He therefore appealed to Assam, the Frontier and the Sikhs to take a reasonable view. The representatives of Assam were free to carry out the mandate of their people. He would wish them to do so. But the question was at what stage. He would not like Assam to isolate itself by premature action. The present occasion demanded that the enemies should be out manoeuvred, and the resolution would help them to do that.

The debate was lively. Since the movers of amendments got priority a majority of those who spoke opposed the resolution. Only three speakers gave unqualified support to the resolution. They were Mr Shankar Rao Deo, Mr Hifzul Rahman and Pandit G.B. Pant.

The opposition was led by Mr Purushottamdas Tandon who in a forceful speech contended that acceptance of the Statement of 6 December was inconsistent with the fundamental principles of provincial autonomy. The socialist view was put forward by Dr Ram Manohar Lohia who pleaded that only a revolutionary struggle would bring about freedom.

Among the numerous amendments the one that attracted attention was that put forth by Mr R.K. Sidhwa for an addendum to the resolution stating that the Constituent Assembly alone shall decide any future dispute regarding interpretation of the Statement of 16 May. Pandit Nehru raised objection to the amendment, but President Kripalani held it in order declaring that since the British Government’s Statement of 6 December had suggested that future disputes be referred to the Federal Court it was open to the AICC to suggest that the Constituent Assembly shall be the final arbiter.

Mr Abdur Samad Khan, leader of Baluchistan, moved that Baluchistan and Sind be added along with Assam and NWFP in the resolution. His contention was that these two provinces would resist any attempt to settle their constitution in a Group. Even if the Congress did not back them the people of Baluchistan would not agree to any one drawing up their constitution except the people of the province.

The general trend of the speeches opposing the resolution was that the British Government was insincere and that the Muslim League was merely acting as the tool of British imperialism.

The debate will be concluded tomorrow and it is expected that the Working Committee’s resolution will be passed by a comfortable majority. It is possible that one or two amendments will be accepted.

8. Nehru’s Comments on the Grouping Plan
Speech at the AICC Meeting in New Delhi, 6 January 1947

I agree with most of what Mr Jayaprakash Narayan has said except with regard to the conclusions drawn by him. The resolution has been drawn up after serious thought, but I would not dogmatize about the results that would flow from the acceptance of this resolution. It might cause harm; there is always this possibility.

Congress is strong enough to wipe the slate clean and start afresh. But I am at the same time grieved to see signs of internal organizational weakness. The strength of the Congress has so long rested on the fact that though Congressmen debated and deliberated and sometimes differed over issues, once a decision was reached, all accepted it loyalty and followed it unwaveringly. Things are different now. I agree that one way of curing internal weakness and reestablishing unity is to launch a struggle, but I am not in favour of starting a major struggle merely in order to maintain structural or organizational unity.

Mr Jayaprakash Narayan has disputed the idea that the British are quitting. But my belief that they are quitting is based not on the desire of the British but on the compulsion of events which is forcing and hastening their departure. One of the main pillars on which the British Government rests in India is the Civil Service and that Civil Service is disappearing before our eyes. But the problem now is not merely to get rid of the foreign power but to prepare a concrete picture of what should take its place. This is the objective which the resolution before the House is intended to achieve.

I advise Assam to make a positive and constructive approach, and assure that the resolution will give it strength. I am quite alive to the dangers that confront Assam, but I would commend the resolution to its acceptance because it is in the interests of the province to do so.

Dr Lohia has dealt at length with the Naga Hills. It is true that we can help the people of those hills, but I refuse to accept the proposition that the battle of Indian independence should be fought on the Naga Hills. I appeal for a more positive and fuller approach to the problem.

Regarding Mr Jayaprakash Narayan’s criticism of the AICC on the ground that it always approves the Working Committee’s decisions, I may say this is not a matter for surprise. The Working Committee after all represents the mind of the AICC and so long as it enjoys the confidence of the AICC its decisions or proposals must naturally be acceptable to the AICC. Personally I will like nothing better than that the Working Committee be changed every time a fresh lead is required to meet a new situation. I declare that the Congress is not going to commit itself at the present moment to any reference to the Federal Court or to any authority.

I am glad of this opportunity to refer to this paragraph. It is a paragraph which is likely to mislead people. It says as a fact that the Congress have agreed already to it. Exactly when the Congress agreed to this or in what form is not clear. What has happened in the past few months is that on many occasions when any question or dispute arose we have often said generally—and we said so at Simla—that we are prepared to refer any specific matter of dispute to an impartial arbitrator whether it is the International Hague Court or any court of justice. Once or twice we also said that if there is difficulty about interpretation, we are prepared to refer it to some authority like the Federal Court. These were general statements we made, and normally speaking we agree to abide by them. But the way in which it has been put in this statement, as if a formal statement was made to us and we agreed, is completely wrong.

Apart from this, in view of recent developments and the statement of 6 December, which produces a new situation, I am not prepared to admit for an instant that we have agreed to any future procedure about references. Whatever the future brings we shall have to consider it. I should like to make it perfectly clear that we are giving no assurance about any references in regard to any other matters to the Federal Court. We find that everything we say is being twisted and distorted and brought against us in the future. We are not going to commit ourselves at the present moment to any reference to the Federal Court or to any other authority. We shall decide—or the Constituent Assembly shall decide—as we think best in the circumstances.

I accept Mr Abdus Samad Khan's amendment for the inclusion of Baluchistan in NWFP and Sikhs in the Punjab mentioned in the paragraph 3 of the resolution expressing appreciation of the difficulties placed in the way of provinces by the British Cabinet Scheme of 16 May. I oppose other amendments.

9. Bardoloi's Proposal That Assam Frame Her Own Constitution

Extract from a Letter from A. Clow to Wavell, 6 January 1947

GOVERNMENT HOUSE, SHILLONG

2. Bardoloi had a long talk with me on his return from the Conference with Gandhi, Nehru, (whom I met at Allahabad) and others. We talked mainly of the objections to Assam going into the Bengal–Assam Section of the Constituent Assembly. He said that:

(1) he recognized the need for economic arrangements with Bengal.
(2) his main objection was that Assam would have a constitution framed by Bengal;
(3) she would not then be able to vote herself out of the group;
(4) Assam ought therefore [to] have liberty to frame her own constitution and then reach agreement with Bengal.

3. I told him that I could not conceive of a constitution being framed which would prevent the people of Assam, if they so wanted, from voting themselves out; but he disagreed. He was, as always, rather nebulous in expression but I inferred that he was apprehensive that the various sections of the population would get separate representation. As Bourne said in his letter of 15th June, the opposition comes mainly from the Caste Hindus of the Assam Valley. At present the Caste Hindus of the province, although they are not only about a third of population, and particularly those of the Assam Valley, dominate the Government and the Legislature. The hill tribes are mostly unrepresented because so many live in the excluded areas. Those in other areas have 4 seats, but 2 of these are in Shillong where the large non-tribal population had a decisive influence. In the plains, the Ahom League lost every seat it held, because the Ahoms are everywhere outnumbered, and they have been pressing for separate representation for some time. The other plains tribes have only 4 special seats.

4. But in Section C, the principle of separate representation might be carried much further, for the Muslims are strongly for it. If the tribal peoples as a whole got separate representation and the Scheduled Castes were free to elect their own representatives, the situation would be greatly altered. It is possible that then Bardoloi’s forecast might prove justified, and indeed the whole hold of the Caste Hindus would be precarious, if not at an end. If this reading of the objectors’ fears is correct (and it is shared by some others who are well-informed) it goes far to explain Gandhi’s attitude. The possible separation of the Scheduled Castes alone would make him intransigent. If the Muslim League enters the Constituent Assembly, I would hazard a guess that the question of separate representation will be one of the main battlegrounds.
10. Deliberation on AICC Resolution
J.P. Narayan’s Speech at AICC Meeting

This resolution represents one more step forward on the slippery path of compromise, the end of which will be ultimate acceptance of even Pakistan, just as a leader of Rajaji’s eminence proposed we could do some years ago. I feel distressed sometimes by the way the AICC invariably sets its seal of approval on every decision of the Working Committee and I feel it may be a good thing if I resigned from the AICC also. If ever there was a time to disagree with the Working Committee it is now.

My speech may sound like a threat, but that is not my intention. I realize that our party is a small minority in the AICC and the majority can afford to disregard its views altogether. We have accepted your decisions till now, but the time may come when we shall have to part company.

There are only two ways open to us. We can carry on with the Constituent Assembly and do only such things as are approved by the League, the British and the princes. That can be one course. It will be a course dear to the heart of men like Dr M.R. Jayakar and Pandit H.N. Kunzru. If we take that road then we can regard every issue as a side issue. The second course is to act in the Assembly as if it is a sovereign body and frame a real revolutionary constitution and then ask for complete transfer of power to those elected under that constitution. It may be that the Constituent Assembly will not be allowed to take this course which is the only honourable one.

The Congress was strong enough to come to grips with the British Government, but the Congress instead of using its strength entered into compromises which only enlarged India’s internal trouble. We agreed to the Congress joining the Constituent Assembly and Pandit Nehru’s resolution moved on it gave a new hope, but that hope has disappeared after the way the League and Lord Wavell have conspired together. I do not know how anyone can hope for any advance towards freedom as a result of the Constituent Assembly’s work. It was a great mistake to have allowed the League to join the Interim Government without insisting on assurance of cooperation by it.

We are told that the British are quitting India. I saw no sign of it in my recent tour in the Punjab and in Kashmir. I see no sign of it in the way the League has been brought into the Interim Government. The Congress is supposed to be helping the British to pack their bedding, but it looks as if the British during their 200 years in India have collected so much that the bedding takes years to pack (Laughter).

11. ‘AICC Accepts 6 December Statement; Kripalani’s Appeal for Co-operation’

NEW DELHI, 6 Jan.—The AICC today passed the Working Committee’s resolution advising acceptance of HMG’s 6 December statement by 99 votes to 52. The main amendment for rejection of the statement, which was moved by Mr Purushottamdas Tandon, was lost, 54 voting for the amendment and 102 against.

Pandit Jawaharlal Nehru, the mover of the Working Committee resolution accepted Mr Abdus Sama’s amendment for the addition of Baluchistan to the phrase ‘N-WFP and the Sikhs in the Punjab’ mentioned in paragraph 3 of the resolution. All other amendments were either withdrawn or negatived.

In his presidential remarks, Acharya Kripalani congratulated the house for accepting the resolution prepared for it by the Working Committee. He pleaded for cooperation between the A-ICC and the Working Committee. The session concluded at 12.45 p.m.

Britain May Give More Trouble

Acharya Kripalani said that as this was an emergency meeting of the AICC none of the official resolutions of which some members had given notice could be taken up.

Dr Choitram Gidwani had asked, Acharya Kripalani said that the Working Committee should give an assurance that no more interpretations would be forthcoming from the British Government or would be acceptable to the Congress. ‘So far as the British Government is concerned, I may tell you this is not the end of trouble. Throughout the career of the Constituent Assembly there will be trouble. And the British Government will always put spokes in the wheel of progress. Imperialisms die hard. Home polices may change but imperial policies do not change, whatever the form of Government. As I said in my presidential address at Meerut, one would have thought that democracy and empire were poles apart but we have imperial democracies. Today, though Britain has a socialist Government, it has a socialist imperialism too. And so is France which is seeking to repress the urge to freedom of our neighbour in Indo-China. There is no “ism” whether it be socialism or communism, that is immune from the danger of imperialism.’

Not Stationary Body

‘Therefore, so far as the British Government are concerned, you must be prepared for hindrances in your way and these hindrances will have to be overcome. So far as the allies of British imperialism are concerned, chiefly the Muslim League, you must also understand that troubles will arises at every stage. I am not quite sure that the “very modest and moderate resolution.”According to our radical friends, that we have passed today will bring in the League. It may not come. But what the Working Committee has done is the right thing under the circumstances as conceived by it.

‘So far as assurances from the Working Committee are concerned. I am afraid such assurances cannot be given because the Working Committee are concerned. I am afraid such assurances cannot be given because the Working Committee is not a stationary body. It is periodically changing not only its personnel but individuals are also periodically changing in their outlook on national and international affairs.

‘Some of us learn by years and experience and some of us do not. Sometimes with growing years our intelligence and out spirit and enthusiasm degenerate. So there is neither any guarantee from the British Government nor from the Muslim League nor even from the Working Committee. I would therefore request you, who are the chosen of the people, to be on your guard. As Jawaharlalji said, there should be some co-operation and co-ordination between the Working Committee and the AICC: Otherwise the business of the house cannot proceed smoothly. If we are unworthy of your trust, it is up to you to cashier us and find out a new working committee for yourself. There is nothing wrong in that. We are your nominees and servants and the nation’s servants. You can always call us to account and I hope that we shall always be ready to justify ourselves.
Towards Freedom: 1947

‘The only guarantee for the nation against trouble from the British Government and opposition from the Muslim League and betrayal by its leadership is that you ask the nation and help the nation to keep the powder dry. As Jawaharalji again said, we have to perfect our organization and make it the vehicle of our will to freedom, our sacrifices for the country, our unity and discipline then I say there are many dangers. Then I say that you will be betrayed by quarters which you do not even imagine today. I say further that even if by the accident of international situation or other world forces you get your freedom, that freedom will not be worth a day’s purchase.’

The Congress President went on: ‘I had thought that Shri Jayaprakashji, realizing the critical condition in which we are would talk in terms of greater unity and of putting our shoulders to the wheel together. Instead of that, he has told us that he will get away from the caste system that he and his party have helped to build in the Congress. It was bad enough that there should be this political caste system. It stands in our way. One can be radical without forming a party. But I think it will be worse if one tries to get out from this caste system of parties that has been built up. I repeat what I said once before: our differences are few.’

Constructive Activity

‘The common points that we have are many—whether we are socialist or plain Congressmen, I would not say non-socialists because plain Congressmen, I am sure, are also socialist but there are brands and brands of socialism and one brand has appropriated to itself the name of socialism in the Congress. The differences between ordinary Congressmen and socialists are very few and our common points are more than 99 per cent. Therefore, why should we spin our political yarn so fine that it may break? Look to the agreements that exist among us and ignore the disagreements. Let us look to the common task that we have to perform and not to differing ideologies. When people work, ideologies fall into the back ground because the difficulties of the work surround them and they have to solve problems from day to day.’

The perfection of the Congress organization could come only through constructive activity. It was not necessary that constructive activity should be confined merely to the items that had been accepted by the Congress. ‘You can devise for yourselves and for the Congress a new set of items but some work you have got to do.’

Acharya Kripalani referred to a report that violence was used recently during some elections in Allahabad and gave a warning that he would not hesitate to take disciplinary action if he found in any province that the rules of the democratic game were violated by violence, impersonation or by any other methods.—API

12. ‘India: Congress League Deadlock Broken’

Daily Worker, 7 January 1947.

By 99 votes to 52 the All-India Congress Committee yesterday approved acceptance of the British Government’s statement on grouping of provinces.

This breaks the deadlock which had existed between Congress and the Moslem League and makes possible some sort of agreement between the two in discussing India’s constitution with Britain.

Britain’s statement of 6 December interprets the provincial grouping clauses in Britain’s plan for India as meaning that provinces must group into three sections for constitution making purposes, and can opt out afterward if they wish.
The Moslem League accepted this, but the Congress interpretation was that provinces should be free to opt out first. Since Congress holds the majority in the Legislative Assembly, the League withdrew its members in protest.

The new resolution shows the strength of Congress support for Pandit Nehru, Vice-President of the Interim Government.

An amendment demanding rejection of the British statement was defeated by 102 to 54.

Army for Freedom

Sardar Baldev Singh, Sikh Defence Member in the Indian Interim Government appealing to young men to join the armed forces at a meeting yesterday, said that these forces would not be used to suppress India's freedom. If necessary, they might be employed to achieve it.

The armed forces of India were now 'truly national,' he added.

13. League's Entry into a Coalition Impossible in Sind

D.O. No. 15/FR.

... 4. I put out one or two feelers about a Coalition Government but at the moment that is clearly out of the question. Before the dissolution when the League were weak and the Congress strong, the League was willing to form such a Government, but the Congress always refused. Now the position is reversed and if the League had offered a coalition the Congress would almost certainly have accepted, unless the High Command had objected. The League's present attitude is due partly, I think, to the fact that they think that they can get along without the Congress and partly to the great increase in bitterness brought about by events in Bihar and the UP. Now they say that they will not agree to a coalition in Sind unless Coalition Governments are formed in the Congress Provinces as well. This was also Jinnah's line when I saw him.

5. I am afraid that the All India Congress Committee's resolution has done little good. Even Khuhro and Ghulam Hussain, who have all along been hopeful that the League would enter the Constituent Assembly, seem now to consider that impossible. For one thing, the resolution is so oblique that they fear a trap and for another, the tone of the speeches, which were anything but friendly. I do not know anything definite about Jinnah's attitude, but one or two people who had seen him think it unlikely that he will accept. I have just got Your Excellency's telegram about the meeting of the League's Working Committee. I will do what I can, but am not very hopeful. I may have some influence with these people as far as Sind affairs are concerned, but this is an all-India matter....

14. League Entry into the Constituent Assembly and the Notion of Pakistan

Letter from J F. Burrows to Wavell, 8 January 1947

Public Record Office (hereafter PRO), CAB 134/344, Acc. No. 4042, NAI.

Khwaja Nazimuddin asked to see me to discuss the constitutional position in the light of the latest AICC decision and as I make a practice of seeing him on such subjects because I believe he wields a certain influence over Jinnah, generally on the side of moderation and good sense, I had a long talk with him last night.

He began by saying that Jinnah had come back to India very pleased at the results of the London conversations but that he still entertained great doubts about the intentions of Congress, doubts which had not been resolved by recent statements of Nehru and Bardoloi. (I gather that Nazimuddin has not yet had Jinnah’s reactions to the AICC decision to accept HMG’s pronouncement of the 6th December.)

Giving me his own views he made the following points. He started from the position that if after the Muslim League entered the Constituent Assembly the Secretary of State’s Services were wound up and if the Constituent Assembly were to carry on its deliberations for 18 months or two years without framing an agreed constitution, the Muslim League would by then be in a position in which they could carry on successfully neither an active nor a passive movement. He asked why HMG had decided or were proposing to wind up the Secretary of State’s Services before a constitution for India had been framed and accepted, thereby ‘removing the protection of an impartial authority’. He went on to emphasize the services the Muslims had rendered to the British during the 1942 upheaval (to my suggestion that their attitude had been at best one of benevolent neutrality he pointed to the part Muslim-controlled Ministries in Bengal and the Punjab had played in suppressing the movement) and expressed grave doubts about the desirability of entering the Constituent Assembly especially in view of the fact that the Rules Committee of that body had (he said) already decided that the chairmen of Sections should be appointed by the Constituent Assembly itself. He pointed out that the effect of such a rule might be that the Muslims might in certain circumstances be deprived of all protection from the Chair even where they were in a majority. (This reading of the rules seems to be a misconception. I had not seen the rules when I met Nazimuddin but my attention has since been drawn to rule 10 which does not seem to bear the interpretation I understood him to place on it. He has since admitted to me that it is so).

In reply I said that the Muslim League were now at the cross roads. I recalled that I had already given him some advice about joining the Interim Government (vide my letter to you of the 15th July acknowledged in your D.O. No. 592/58 of the 19th July 1946) and that advice had subsequently proved well founded. I did not want them to make the same mistake as regards entering the Constituent Assembly as they had made with regard to the Interim Government. I went on to say that in my opinion Pakistan was an untenable proposition. From this stage the conversation became exceedingly frank assuming that it was an untenable proposition to have one Pakistan—it would have to be two or three Pakistans—I asked him how he viewed the acceptance of the limited objective provided for in the Cabinet Plan. I reminded him that the League had previously had the opportunity under the Cripps Plan of having a greater and a fuller Pakistan than was offered under the present plan as under the Cripps Plan the Muslim Provinces could have opted out of the proposed Union of India and then remained either within or without the British Commonwealth of Nations, whereas under the present plan their connection with the British Commonwealth of Nations would follow the decision of the proposed Union of India. They had not acquiesced in the Cripps Plan when it was before them and their position had since steadily worsened. If they now rejected the Constituent Assembly, I felt confident that, in view of the fact that the Congress had accepted (even with some woolly phraseology) the Cabinet Plan as explained in HMG’s most recent statement and this acceptance had been flashed round the world, if the Muslim League, after that, did not now enter the Constituent Assembly, world opinion would feel, and the actual position would be, that the Muslim League would have to make the next move. They could not stand still. They would have to be prepared to embark upon either an active or a passive movement. If active, it meant civil war and they were in no position to wage a civil war. At most they could engineer sporadic outbursts of communal rioting but communal outbreaks would lead them nowhere. A successful war to achieve Pakistan was not within the power of the Muslims. A passive movement would inevitably lead to an active movement for I did not believe any such movement could long remain passive. I therefore urged him not to be so woolly minded as the League had shown themselves at Bombay—there were no more titles to renounce—but to agree to join the Constituent Assembly in the light of the declarations of the Cabinet Delegation on the 16th May and of His Majesty’s Government on the 6th December.

Nazimuddin seemed rather shaken and only advanced by way of reply the question what in my opinion would be the reaction of HMG if the Muslim League subsequently announced that they desired to have Pakistan within the British Commonwealth of Nations. I replied that the Pakistan envisaged by the Muslim League was not a practical possibility in any case and that, though such a declaration might embarrass HMG in my opinion HMG would find great difficulty in accepting that declaration in place of the Cabinet Mission’s Plan for a Constituent Assembly.

I impressed upon Nazimuddin the advisability of the Muslim League’s entering the Constituent Assembly before the 20th January. To this he made the significant reply that it was not possible for them to enter by the 20th January: they could not enter before April.

I am convinced that Nazimuddin will use his influence on the side of reason as regards entry into the Constituent Assembly.

15. Patel’s Discussion with Bengal Members of Congress Committee on AICC Resolution

India Office Records (hereafter IOR), R/3/1/128, Acc. No. 3447, NAI.

The majority (of the AICC representatives from Bengal joining the AICC meeting at Delhi on the 5th and 6th January) reached Delhi on the afternoon of the 4th and on the evening of the same date three Bengal members saw Sardar Vallabhbhai Patel. He was running a temperature at the time and did not attend the AICC meeting on the 5th and 6th. Mr Patel most anxiously asked the three Bengal members what the attitude of all Bengal members would be towards the official resolution, the substance of which he described to them. The Bengal members wanted to know if the acceptance of HMG’s statement of 6 December would encroach upon the sovereignty of the Constituent Assembly. Mr Patel said that the Constituent Assembly was not a sovereign body as it had many limitations and it must work through the limited scope of the Cabinet delegation’s statement of 16 May. It is only to give the people of India some confidence in themselves that the Congress is giving out that it is a sovereign body. When the Congress accepted the 16 May formula of the Cabinet delegation in its entirety it was implicit in that acceptance that they would accept everything in the shape of 6 December statement of the British Prime Minister. The Constituent Assembly cannot function when one of its effective limbs is not there. It is therefore incumbent that the Muslim League members must be brought in and with their help a Constitution should be framed. Refusal to accept the 6 December Statement would lead to a state of war with the British Govt. and the Congress is not ready for that. Any fight with the British Govt. must nowadays lead to a fight with the Muslims and this must be avoided at any cost.

One of the three Bengal members asked if this climb-down on the part of the Congress would make the Muslim League join the Constituent Assembly, if the Congress would not lose its prestige with the people of India and abroad and why should Assam be let down unceremoniously when Pandit Nehru gave that Province high hopes. Mr Patel said that this was definitely a climb-down on the part of the Congress; but for the good of the people of India principles have sometimes to be swallowed for the sake of expediency. In a political game compromises have be made, and in India the Congress prestige will not suffer more than it has already suffered by entering the Interim Government. Entering the Interim Govt is not the goal of the Congress but it is a stage in the achievement of independence. If it is found that the assumption of office is standing in the way of the realization of its goal, the Congress will walk out of office and begin starting a fight. Surely the whole of India cannot be plunged into a civil way [sic] for the sake of Assam. The Congress viewpoint is that it has got a loop hole in the stone wall of British sovereignty in India. This loop hole is the Cabinet delegation’s statement of 16 May. By taking advantage of it, it now wants to get rid of the British, their influence and administration. When the British had gone and ceased to play any part in the political game of this country, it will not be difficult for the Congress to come to really friendly terms with the Muslim League, leaders will find none other to support them.

One of the Bengali members asked why Mr Gandhi then advised Assam to keep aloof from grouping. Mr Patel did not give any reply to this but said that the official Congress resolution to be moved on the 5th at the AICC meeting was discussed by Pandit Nehru with Gandhi in Noakhali, drafted by Pandit Nehru and was finally approved by Gandhi.

II. The Bengali delegates then saw Pandit Jawaharlal Nehru who enquired who were opposing the resolution. He was told that the F.B. and the ‘Socialists’ would oppose it. Pandit Nehru flared up at the word ‘Socialist’ and said ‘Am I not Socialist?’ He said that it was he who had created the Congress Socialist Party, it was he who made Jai Prakash Narain find his feet in politics and it was he who had taken him in the Congress Working Committee. Now Jai Prakash Narain resigned from the Working Committee and perhaps he has done well. Pandit Nehru was told that Sarat Bose might also reply but Pandit Nehru made no comments. Pandit Nehru was told that Bengal Congress men would vote for the resolution but it baffled Bengal Congressmen’s understanding when they found that it was Pandit Nehru who was letting down Assam when previously he had given high hopes to the leaders of that province. Pandit Nehru gave a curt reply saying that Assam could not hold up the progress of the rest of India and support to Assam would mean refusal to accept the British Prime Minister’s statement of 6 December, and letting loose forces of chaos and civil war. He was asked why then the resolution gave a direction saying that a province or a part of a province might not be compelled to join a group. Pandit Nehru replied that this was a pious wish and did not mutilate the 16 May statement.
16. A Reluctant Muslim League Might Enter the Constituent Assembly
Extracts from a Letter from Pethick-Lawrence to Wavell, 9 January 1947

PRIVATE AND SECRET

... 2. The All-India Congress Committee’s Resolution goes, I suppose, as far as could be expected to meet the Muslims, and I am glad to read that Jinnah is calling his Working Committee together to consider it. Both sides have in my opinion genuine cause to distrust the other and both have left-wings in order to placate whom they have to use words which inflame inter-communal tension and make agreement more difficult.

3. It looks to me as if we should rightly judge this Resolution as marking a genuine step by the Right-Wing elements of Congress to meet the Muslim point of view. I have no doubt that this is in large measure due to the moderating effect of responsibility and to our announcement of 6th December and our conversations with Nehru in London, and your estimate that the Congress would accept a firm declaration by us of our intention has certainly been justified. I fear, however, that we may be faced with considerable delay by Jinnah followed at best by a grudging entry of the Muslim League into the Constituent Assembly. Even when we get to that point the Constituent Assembly may only become an arena of communal warfare without any common constructive intention. If that happens it will be very difficult for the Right-Wing elements in Congress to maintain working relations with the Muslims against Left-Wing pressure, and they may be forced against their own judgment into courses which will result in a communal flare up....

17. Persisting Doubts over Muslim League Entry into Constituent Assembly
Extract from a Letter from Wavell to A. Nye, 10 January 1947

... Many thanks for your letter of 2nd January. The AICC did not accept HMG’s statement of 6th December without a great deal of talk. The left wing very strongly opposed it, and I understand that Nehru’s resolution, which had been drafted by the Working Committee, was only passed in the end by the Working Committee treating it practically as a vote of confidence in themselves. It is interesting that your Premier should have told you that Gandhi had helped to induce the Congress High Command to accept the statement of 6th December, for my information is that he was against acceptance, and that the Working Committee had the courage to act against his advice.

I hope that Jinnah will let the Muslim League come into the Constituent Assembly. Liaquat Ali Khan whom I saw on Tuesday thinks that the AICC’s resolution is so qualified an acceptance as not to be an acceptance at all, and seemed doubtful whether the Muslim League could regard it as sufficient assurance on which to enter the Constituent Assembly. Suhrawardy, whom I also saw on Tuesday, feels that the Muslim League should now join the Constituent Assembly and says he will use his influence to this end.
18. Sikhs Demand Support for Communal Veto regarding Constitution Making Resolution Passed by the Working Committee of the Pratinidhi Panthic Board, 11 January 1947

AICC Papers, File No. G-17 (KW-I)/1946, NMML.

The Working Committee of the Pratinidhi Panthic Board has given due and careful consideration to the resolution of the AICC dated 5.1.47 on the statement of His Majesty’s Government dated 6th December, 1946. It notes with deep pain and anguish that the position of the Sikhs has been seriously worsened by the aforesaid resolution. The Committee warns the Panth of the dangers that are looming ahead and has also decided to call an extraordinary meeting of the General Committee on 26th January, 1947, 11 a.m. in S. Teja Singh Hall, Amritsar to consider the extremely critical situation created. It also calls upon the Congress to implement the assurances held out to the Sikhs by supporting the Sikh demand for communal veto regarding constitution making.

19. ‘No Real Acceptance of 6 Dec Statement by Congress: Suhrawardy Criticizes HMG’s Attitude’

Premier H.S. Suhrawardy of Bengal declared in New Delhi on Friday that His Majesty’s Government should inform the Congress that the 6 January Resolution adopted by the All-India Congress Committee ‘pretends’ to accept the British Government’s 6 December Statement ‘but does not in fact do so.’

‘It should not be left by HMG to the Muslim League to pick holes in the resolution of the Congress,’ the Bengal premier said in an interview.

‘It seems to me that HMG and others here like the Viceroy, have taken the attitude that the Congress has accepted and “you had better go in’”, to the Constituent Assembly, he added, Mr Suhrawardy has met with the Viceroy during his stay in Delhi.

Mr Suhrawardy declined to express an opinion about whether the League would accept the Congress resolution, commenting that ‘it is solely a question of whether Qaed-e-Azam Jinnah is prepared to take the risk of dissident provinces misbehaving.’

Although saying that the resolution of 6 January ‘does not betray any animus against the League,’ Mr Suhrawardy said that if the speeches urging adoption of the resolution reflected ‘the real mind of the Congress, and not blowing of hot air, it is not hopeful’ that the League will regard it as sufficient to warrant participation in the Constituent Assembly due to reconvene on 20 January.

The speeches at the AICC session of 5–6 January indicated that ‘the Congress considers the League its enemy and an agent of British Imperialism,’ the Premier continued, ‘and if that is what the Congress really believes, there is really no hope.’

Whether the League is in the Constituent Assembly or out of it, Mr Suhrawardy said, ‘The whole thing depends on how the Congress proposes to utilize its majority.

‘Suppose the Congress is unfriendly and proposes to use its majority to ride roughshod over all demands of the Muslim League. Then, I think, it is a far better proposition that the Muslim League should remain outside the Constituent Assembly and let the Congress have their own way. It won’t create any internal situation.'
‘If the League enters the Constituent Assembly and it were constantly defeated by the Congress and it were made patent that the Congress proposed to utilize its majority to suppress or defeat all League resolution; then in that case a serious internal situation might not be avoided and there would be a tussle which would have repercussions outside.’ He did not enlarge what the outside repercussions would be.—APA.

20. “‘Assam Will Decide for Herself What to Do’—Gopinath Bordoloi’ Report in _Axomiya_ (Weekly) (All _Axomiya_ extracts translated from Assamese by Lakhimi Datta), 11 January 1947.

Assam now will function alone in accordance with the advice of AICC. AICC now has given freedom to the provinces/states to work on their own. So, if Assam is forcibly included in Bengal, then Assam will have to decide for herself her future course of action. We are ready to sit in the ‘Sakha Parishad’, but what Muslim League has demanded from the union centre, Assam has also demanded the same. If Muslim League has feared that increase in members in the Central Union is a threat to the minority; then Assam has greater fear from its inclusion in Bengal.

21. Tayabullah on the Grouping Option for Assam

Md Tayabullah, President, Assam Pradesh Congress Committee, after meeting Congress Working Committee and All India Congress Committee representatives in Delhi. He criticized the joint British–League conspiracy of the ‘Grouping Plan’ to weaken the Indian National Congress by it. He opined, ‘Congress is determined to have an independent India and take part in a suitable administrative system. It will achieve it despite several obstacles. If Congress directly rejected the 6th December plan, then it would have benefited Jinnah and the British would have appreciated it. But now Indian National Congress has opened the door of the government to the Muslim League and if the latter does not join it, then Indian National Congress would accordingly do its job alone’.

Tayabullah also said that Assam never accepts an administrative machinery designed by others. No one can forcibly include Assam with other provinces. At any cost, Assam will not sacrifice its demands of provincial autonomy and self-government and self-determination.

22. ‘Delhi AICC Session Reviewed: Another Step Down the Road to Surrender’
Extracts from a Report from _People’s Age_, 12 January 1947.

The All-India Congress Committee has passed the Working Committee’s resolution accepting the 6 December Statement of the British Government.

In the first open skirmish between the Congress and imperialism since the acceptance of Cabinet Mission’s Plan, the Congress leadership retreated and bowed down to the imperialist will. For the 6 December Statement was a clear challenge to everything that the Congress leadership had said about the Constituent Assembly and the Cabinet Mission’s Plan.
The Statement bluntly denied the sovereignty of the Constituent Assembly making it quite clear that the final word lay with His Majesty’s Government.

Further by stating that a constitution framed by a Constituent Assembly in which a large section of the Indian population is not represented will not be enforced. It encouraged the obstructionist tactics of the League leaders and commanded the Congress to bring the League into the Assembly.

Thirdly, the Statement definitely stated, what was perhaps already contained in the 16 May declaration—that the sections will frame constitution for the Province, that decisions will be taken by a simple majority vote of representatives and not by Province, and that the grouping procedure was compulsory.

It once again gave the League leadership the whiphand, enabling it to use the section as a pressure against the All-India Constituent Assembly and pursue the game of partition to the farthest limit.

The London Statement had thus removed all equivocation and cleared the ring for a showdown between the Congress and the League while retaining the initiative in the hands of imperialism.

Retreat before Attack

The All-India Congress Committee, under the leadership of the Working Committee, has not only not accepted the challenge, but decided to beat a retreat before this imperialist insolence. The resolution put before the AICC is much milder than the 22 December statement of the Working Committee and accepts the London Award.

On the question of sovereignty it only makes mild protest saying:

‘The AICC is firmly of opinion that the constitution of a free and independent India should be framed by the people of India on the basis of as wide an agreement as possible. There must be no external interference whatever by an external authority....’

Barring this bald statement, it says nothing against British insolence.

On the question of groupings, the resolution accepts the London Award and agrees to ‘advise action in accordance with the interpretation of the British Government in regard to the procedure to be followed in the sections.’

Thus it will advise the North West Frontier Province, Assam, and others, to join the respective sections.

In these sections, the League representatives who are committed to Pakistan irrespective of the wishes of the people have the majority. They will do their utmost to compel the Union of Assam with Bengal or the grouping together of Sind, the Punjab, the NWF Province and Baluchistan.

How does the AICC resolution propose to protect the freedom and self determination of these Provinces and guard them against the menace of compulsory grouping held in the London Award and the Cabinet Mission’s Plan?

Rights of Provinces

Not by appealing to the people of the Province concerned not to compel each other; nor by demanding a plebiscite of the adult population; but by indirect begging for these Provinces and people the same concession or veto that has been promised to the League under the 6 December Statement:
The Congress cannot be a party to any compulsion or imposition against the will of the people concerned, a principle which the British Government have themselves recognized.

This refers to the guarantee given to the League that no constitution will be enforced on unwilling parts and is a plea that similar guarantee should be extended to the Provinces minorities in sections.

In the event of any attempt at such compulsion, a Province or part of a Province has the right to take such action as may be deemed necessary in order to give effect to the wishes of the people concerned.

Faith in Manoeuvring

This veiled demand for veto in section instead of fighting the sections outright—will unleash full blast Congress–League conflict and war at every step in the all-India as well as sectional Constituent Assemblies, leaving the initiative in the hands of imperialism.

From where comes this utter blindness? From a pathetic faith in the Constituent Assembly, in the imperialist plan, from the exigencies of a policy which seeks to avoid battle with imperialism at all costs.

The Working Committee leaders no longer parade the Constituent Assembly as a sovereign body; they are no longer able to do it in face of the London Award and the proceedings of the first session of the Assembly. But they still want to parade it as a big instrument of liberation; as a big lever for winning freedom and what not....

A Bankrupt Outlook

Much worse and far more dangerous than his illusion was the bankrupt outlook of the leadership towards the Muslim League. Barring Sjt Shankar Rao Deo, every leader, Right and Left, conveniently forgot that the League does not consist only of Mr Jinnah or his lieutenants, but includes lakhs of down-trodden Muslims who are as anti-imperialist as anybody else.

Ignoring this basic fact, Acharya Kripalani described the League as an ally of British imperialism. Pandit Nehru indirectly referred to the League as an enemy of the Congress.

The national leadership refuses to learn by experience. It has not yet learnt anything by its latest discomfiture at the hands of imperialism. Otherwise it would have been clear to it that imperialism was exploiting a fatal weakness in the national armour—the alienation of millions of Muslims from the national struggle and the Congress. Identifying the League with imperialism is a dishonest way of escaping the question.

23. Assam’s Fear of Muslim League Majority Unfounded: Wavell

IOR, R/3/1/131, Acc. No. 3449, NAI.

... 2. The fears of Assam that the Muslim League might abuse their majority in Section C and reduce the Caste Hindus to a position of permanent subordination in the province are well known here, and have been one of the main difficulties in the way of the Congress acceptance of HMG’s Statement of 6th December. The answer of course is that no constitution which was strongly opposed by the Hindus of Assam (and presumably therefore also of Bengal) would in fact work; and also the knowledge that the Congress have a secure majority in the Union Assembly at the Centre and are therefore in a position to redress the balance is bound to make the Muslim League careful in the use of its majority, which is at the best very precarious in Section C. The AICC resolution of acceptance was about as good as could be expected, but the speeches at the session were unfortunately not such as are likely to induce a feeling of friendliness on the part of the Muslims.

24. Differences within the Congress on the Issue of Grouping

Regarding the execution of the Cabinet Mission Plan and the decisions taken by AICC, tremendous opposition was emerging in the province. In fact, within the provincial Congress also, differences occurred. Leaders like Fakr-ud-Din Ali Ahmad, Gopinath Bordoloi, Mahendra Mohan Choudhuri criticized the Congress decision. On the other hand Md Tayabullah did not see any problem in the AICC proposal.

In Nagaon district, District Congress president Haldhar Bhuyan criticized the decision of the AICC to group Assam with Bengal and opined that Assam will resist it till the last minute. He stated that AICC decision did not respect Gandhiji’s opinion who advised Assam not to join the Bengal Province.

In Surma Valley also, there was intense opposition to the decision. It was opined that the interests of Surma Valley are identical with that of Assam valley. The people of Sylhet never intend to join Bengal and constitute a single entity.

25. Composite Character of Assam Province

Extract from a Letter from A. Clow to Wavell, 19 January 1947

GOVERNMENT HOUSE, SHILLONG

... 3. Political interest was concentrated on the proceedings of the AICC, particularly with reference to the provincial position. The provincial representatives there were fairly frank in indicating that their fear was one of separate electorates for the groups that make up our population. Mukerjee, the Supply Minister, is reported to have said:

‘There were so many groups in Assam—hill tribes, people from the plains, Ahoms, and so on—and if they all got separate electorates, there would be no hope for the people of Assam to achieve unity in future and opting out of the Group would be out of the question. The unity which existed at present would cease to exist.’

The statement is a tacit admission of Saadulla’s claim that a plebiscite in Assam would record a vote in favour of grouping. Bardoloi also in a statement after the AICC decision has affirmed that ‘the people of Assam are determined to see that the unity and integrity of Assam are not broken.’ But the unity of Assam is an aspiration and not a fact. And there is, in my view, more likelihood of attaining it if the composite character of the province is recognized than if it is ignored.

4. The decision of AICC has put the Assamese Congressmen in a dilemma, and some would like to break away from the orthodox fold. The Assam Provincial Congress Committee has passed a resolution affirming the ‘inalienable right’ of a province to frame its own constitution, and adhering to the mandate originally given by the Legislative Assembly. I have no particulars of the discussion, but believe that despite this decision and the present clamour, the Assam representatives may possibly enter the Section. This Congress Committee does not include the Surma Valley Congressmen who come under the Bengal Committee; most of them want to enter the Section, but are not venturing to say much about it for fear of a break-up of the party here. The decision of the Muslim League may affect the Hindu outlook here.

26. ‘AICC Must Compel Assam Congress to Accept Grouping to Win League’s Cooperation’

Calcutta, Saturday—‘The All India Congress must either compel its provincial body in Assam to submit to the decision of the AICC or face the fact that they have not accepted the statement of 6 December’, said Khwaja Nazimuddin, former Premier of Bengal and a member of the Muslim League Working Committee, in an interview here today.

Khwaja Nazimuddin, who was commenting on yesterday’s resolution of the Assam Provincial Congress Committee said that if the Congress had really accepted the statement of 6 December and the Assam Provincial Congress committee was not prepared to submit to that decision, they must disaffiliate the Assam PCC. There could be no two opinions on that point, he declared.

Khwaja Nazimuddin said: ‘The deal has been made with the Congress and people of Assam or anybody else do not come in at all. Either the AICC represents the people of Assam or they do not. The Congress as a party is supposed to have accepted the 6 December statement and yet the provincial Congress of Assam is not prepared to recognize the decision of the AICC. ‘How can these two things be reconciled and how can the Congress say that they have accepted the 6 December statement in its entirely? Supposing the Muslim League Working Committee and the Council had arrived at a decision, is it possible for a Provincial Muslim League to say that their decision is not binding on them.’

Khwaja Nazimuddin said that he could not anticipate what decision the Muslim League Working Committee and the Council would take but their attitude, he said, would surely depend upon what the Congress was going to do in regard to the decision of the Assam Provincial Congress.

Khwaja Nazimuddin is leaving here by air on 28 January to attend the Muslim League Working Committee.—API

27. Jinnah Questions Congress Acceptance of HMG Statement

Record of Interview between M.A. Jinnah and the Under-Secretary of State for India, 21 January 1947

IOR, R/3/1/130, Acc. No. 3448, NAI.

Our talk was mainly concerned with the Congress Resolution accepting HMG’s interpretation with regard to the voting in the Sections. Jinnah maintained that the Resolution did not constitute an acceptance. He stressed the use in the Resolution of the word ‘advise’. He approached it as if it were a legal agreement between two parties. He would not agree when I suggested a resolution should not be examined on such a basis. He also considered the reference in the Resolution about submitting other differences to the Federal Court as evidence of non-acceptance.

He also made the point that reference to 'part of a Province' and to the Sikhs was further evidence of non-acceptance.

He considers that Gandhi’s advice to Assam not to go into the Section was evidence of non-acceptance.

Referring to the Constituent Assembly he argued that its proceedings were invalid as one of the parties to the contract, namely, the Muslim League, were absent. He accused HMG of policy of drift and said responsibility would be entirely theirs for what might transpire. They should be firm and end the present farce of the Constituent Assembly.

Although he was very restrained in manner he was very critical of Congress. He considers that it is impossible to co-operate with them.

I formed the definite impression that the passing of the Congress Resolution has not influenced him in the slightest degree, and that consequently he will not advise this Council at its meeting on the 29th to enter the Constituent Assembly on this ground.

As regards the services; at the end of the talk he said that so far as the Muslim Provinces were concerned, they would wish to retain their officials, but that he would agree to a measure of compensation being paid to those who wished to go. He said that such provinces would not in any circumstances join the proposed All-India administrative services.

28. League Entry into Constituent Assembly Imperative for Success

Extract from a Letter from Wavell to Pethick-Lawrence, 22 January 1947

PRIVATE AND SECRET

THE VICE ROY’S HOUSE,
NEW DELHI

There are still no clear indications of the lead which Jinnah is likely to give the Muslim League Working Committee at its meeting in Karachi next week. There is, I believe, a solid body of opinion which favours entry by the League representatives into the Constituent Assembly, although I entirely agree with your analysis that the Constituent Assembly might thereafter become an arena of communal warfare, which would put the Congress Right-Wing in an increasingly difficult position. In spite of evidence to the contrary (for example, the INA proposals about which I have telegraphed to you) there is no doubt that the Congress High Command are becoming sobered by responsibility, and by having to face awkward and embarrassing situations—such as the recent action which has been taken against the communists. Sooner or later the High Command will have to face up to its own Left-Wing and other revolutionary influences, and each time it makes a tentative move to do so it is forced into a more realistic appreciation of what government of a great country really means.

2. The same kind of difficulties are facing the Congress in the short session of the Constituent Assembly which is now going on. It is not yet certain whether they will pass Nehru’s resolution about the Sovereign Republican State, or postpone it further. (I have just heard that they have done so, which is likely to increase the difficulties both of the Muslim League and of the Princes.) Patel is in many ways the most realistic of the Congress leaders, and recognizes the need to get the Muslim League in if the Constituent Assembly is to be a success....
29. Congress Must Take a Clear Stand

Speech by Narendra Dev as Reported in National Herald, 26 January 1947

The 26th of January is again with us. The Congress Working Committee has issued a modified draft of the Independence Pledge omitting the ‘Quit India’ clause. Probably the Working Committee feels that this clause will be out of place just now. Is not the Congress engaged in negotiating transfer of power? How can it talk in terms of Quit India at the present moment? Besides, if, we are to go by the declarations of some of the prominent members of the Working Committee, the British have made up their mind to go. Indeed this is what British officials, civil as well as military, have been saying to Indians for sometime past. This, according to them makes the reference to Quit India out of place. And yet the Working Committee is asking the people to take this old pledge again. Why cannot the Congress make it possible for the country to declare Independence on the 26th of January 1947? There is that resolution on Objectives moved by Pandit Jawaharlal Nehru in the Constituent Assembly. Why cannot the Congress ask the people to confirm this declaration on the 26th of January and take a pledge to implement it in accordance with the plan of action put forward by the Congress? Why cannot the Congress proceed to enforce it by fixing a limit within which Britain must withdraw completely and ask for the date when the British Army will leave Indian shores?

A Suggestion

This suggestion should not be taken lightly when a responsible British paper like the New Statesman and Nation can in all seriousness make such a proposal. I do not see why our leaders should hesitate in making such a demand. Their hesitancy in making such a demand can lead only to one conclusion that they are cocksure that the British are of their own accord contemplating such a step in the near future. But are our leaders so sure that the British are prepared to quit immediately? Or do they not see the necessity of such action or are they afraid to force the pace lest the golden link they are trying to forge should break?

No Quitting Yet

The declarations of our leaders point to the former conclusion and their actions indicate the latter. Politically conscious sections in India or for that matter, abroad, do not believe that British imperialists have suffered a sudden attack of high moral idealism which compels them to get out of India or wind up their widely-flung empire as early as possible. There is no evidence to support such a contemplation while there is plenty of it to support the view that British imperialists are trying to hold on to their empire as best they can. The imperialist mentality is still there, only imperialism has changed its technique under altered circumstances. Here and there they may look like withdrawing. But they are offering to recede only as far as they are forced to and as far as they feel is essential in order to be able to retain control of the next.

Third-Rate Power

That things have become difficult for Britain and its empire is true. This last war has reduced England to the position of a third-rate power. Britain today can neither defend its empire nor refloat itself economically without the help of the United States. Its weight in world politics has considerably been reduced. It has lost its old commercial and financial supremacy. The volume of its export trade is diminishing and it is losing its own markets. Many members of the British Commonwealth are making rapid studies in the field of industry and are increasing their production. Iran being the world’s broker England has become a debtor country. Its foreign investments have largely vanished. Many members of the Commonwealth are no longer interested in the defence of the empire. They are much more interested in regional defence and are for this purpose gravitating towards the USA. These dominions are, therefore, setting up interests which come into conflict with those of the mother country and there is a tendency to weaken the empire from within. The result is that the British Empire is losing its old solidarity and is not as united today as it used to be.

Again, everywhere in the East revolutionary and national consciousness of the people has been heightened and powerful freedom movements are shaking the foundations of British imperialism.

Defence Problem

Britain’s defence is becoming a difficult proposition. It is not possible to defend the British Isles from the new weapons of warfare like the atom bomb, the rocket and the aircraft and as England has so far been the beast of the empire all the defences of the empire have so far been concentrated in England itself. For the safety of England and her empire it has now become imperative for her to change her military strategy. The new proposal is to establish military bases in Africa and to disperse industries in the continent of Africa. Moreover, a common defence is being thought of in alliance with the United States.

Two Blocs

Again a new antagonism is developing all the world over. The world is being divided into two blocs—the Anglo-American bloc and the Soviet bloc. The unlimited expansion of the U.S. has made it the world’s greatest military power. The prosperous capitalism and the military strength of the U.S. are today the mainstay of British prosperity and political supremacy. It is true that American capitalism has a large base at home and near about for expansion and exploitation and has so far not assumed the form of an aggressive imperialism farther away from its base. It, therefore, does not seriously come into conflict with British imperial interests and a sort of partnership seems practicable. That is not the case with the other great power of the world today, namely, Soviet Russia. So the British Empire and Soviet Russia came into conflict in Europe, Iran and elsewhere. This handicaps British imperialism in its attempts at domination and exploitation of Asia and Africa.

British Labour

Again at home, British capitalism itself is being subjugated more and more by the rising power of the people of Britain. The Labour Party also is not having an easy time. Those who voted Labour are getting more and more disappointed. The younger members of the party are getting restless and becoming more and more ideal [sic]. The opposition to some of the policies of the Labour Government is growing. The controversy on foreign policy in which 82 members abstained from voting is symptomatic. It clearly shows that Mr Bevin’s foreign policy is being more and more disapproved of and dependence on America is not being relished.

It is not clear to many why the Labour Government which claims to represent the British working class should become a tool of America and entangle itself in the meshes of American imperialism. The alliance of a socialist Government with American imperialism which forebodes to be the greatest danger of the world seems strange to some who also realized that if the Labour Government remains true to its socialist policies and election pledges it will have to come into conflict with imperialist America. In no case do the workers of England want to become responsible for a war with Russia. They want to remain friendly with America but do not want to involve themselves in its quarrels with Soviet Russia.

Besides the question of foreign policy there are domestic matters on which a difference of opinion is growing between the leadership and the rank and file. The policy of nationalization is not being speeded up and the housing problem is becoming acute. For all these reasons a doubt has been raised in the minds of earnest and serious men whether the Government will push its programme of socialism or will follow a policy of drift and accommodation to vested interests.

New Imperialism

These various factors have forced Britain to drastically revise its policy in the East. It has become impossible for it to govern its colonies and dependencies in the old way. A new kind of imperialism has been forced upon her which gives the impression of withdrawing politically, of trying political appeasement with subject countries in return for economic and military advantages. But there is only as much attempt at political appeasement as is justified by circumstances and the advantages to be got. So there is no desire to get out of Sudan, Palestine, Burma, Ceylon and India completely. On the other hand, consistent and persistent attempts are in progress to manipulate and gerrymander things in such a way as to neutralise, handicap or moderate the rebellious nationalism of the dependent countries and thus salvage as much of the British Empire as possible. The separatist movements are being encouraged in India, the Sudan and elsewhere with a view to weaken nationalism. British rulers do not trust the resurgent, progressive and democratic forces and they are everywhere using reactionary bearers as their tools to block the path of progress. They are most anxious that the new power that may emerge in India should be both friendly and conservative for their minds are so constituted that they cannot trust a genuine democratic party which is not dominated by capitalists and other vested interests.

So that what is happening in India today is part of the new imperialist plan of getting things done without show of force as far as possible by appeasing the nationalist parties and trying to draw them into partnership with British imperialism. The Muslim League and the Princes are being used for this purpose and an attempt is being made to weigh things against Indian nationalism in such a way and to such an extent as to overpower it, to neutralise it or at least to underrate its militancy and destroy its striking capacity. It is creating new difficulties in our way just to demoralize us and to produce a situation in which it may be called upon to arbitrate between contending parties.

The way to meet this menace is to prepare for struggle and a final showdown. Even while we negotiate, we must keep our powder dry. Like Aung San ‘we may hope for the best but we should prepare for the worst’. The British are not going in the sense in which we want them to go. They are preparing a new strategy on all fronts for effective recovery. In this they have the fullest support of the United States. They will see to it that their vital interests in the new set up are maintained intact. It is becoming more and more obvious that they will have to be driven out if we want to build a united and democratic India. We must prepare for that.

Dawn, 26 January 1947.

‘The AICC of 6 January has completely negatived the principle of decision by simple majority vote in Sections by insisting on a vote for province or a part of a province clearly meaning NWFP and Assam.’ says Mr Liaquat Ali Khan, General Secretary, All India Muslim League, in a statement from New Delhi on Saturday.

The full text of the statement is as follows:

‘There has lately been considerable propaganda from a certain quarter to the effect that the Congress by the resolution of the AICC on 6 January has accepted the British Government’s interpretation, contained in their statement of 6 December of those fundamental principles and points of procedure regarding which Congress had put forward its own interpretations and in accord with the Cabinet Mission’s statement of 16 May.

‘The Muslim League is ... being accused of intransigence for not having rescinded its decision on July 1946 and for not participating in the Constituent Assembly when it reassembled on 20 January.

In the Constituent Assembly itself, Congress is taking decisions unilaterally on issues of far reaching constitutional importance although at this stage it was authorized by the Statement of 16 May to settle preliminaries.

‘Threats have also been uttered on the floor of the Assembly that Congress would proceed with the work of constitution-making although ... Muslims of British India may continue to remain unrepresented on that body.

‘The Working Committee of the All-India Muslim League is meeting in a few days and will undoubtedly express its considered opinion on the developments which have taken place since the British Government’s Statement of 6 December, following the London talks.

‘Meanwhile, I would like to point out that the AICC resolution of 6 January has completely negatived the principles of decisions by simple majority vote in the Sections by insisting on a veto for “a province or a part of a province” (clearly meaning NWFP and Assam) in Section B and C, and to the small minority of Sikhs in Section B.

‘In the course of his speech at the AICC, Pandit Jawaharlal Nehru has also categorically denied that Congress had agreed in the past or would agree in the future to a reference to Federal Court of other questions of interpretation, by either side, as they arose from time to time.

‘If the Congress still maintains that it has accepted the Cabinet Mission’s Plan as again interpreted by the British Government’s Statement of 6 December, I would ask it to answer the following questions publicly and in unambiguous terms:

Does the Congress agree that the Sections sitting as a whole and by simple majority vote shall decide whether there are to be Groups and also settle the Group Constitutions.

Does the Congress accept that the Constitutions of the provinces shall be settled by the Sections concerned sitting as a whole and taking decisions by simple majority vote?

Does the Congress agree that Section C will settle the Constitutions of the Province of Assam by simple majority vote, that a new legislature for the Province of Assam shall be elected according to the Constitution so settled, and the Assam will exercise its right of remaining in the Group or opting out by a vote of that new Legislature?

Does Congress recognize the right of Section B to settle the Constitution of the North-West Frontier Province by a simple majority vote of the Section as a whole and that a new legislature for the NWFP shall be elected under the Constitution so settled, this new legislature alone being competent to decide whether the Province is to remain in Group B or opt out?

Does Congress agree that Section B sitting as a whole and by simple majority vote, shall settle the Constitution for the Punjab and the Group Constitution, if there is any, affecting all communities concerned, including the Sikhs, and that such a constitution for the Punjab and for the Group shall be final, subject to the approval of Parliament in terms laid down by the Cabinet Mission in their Statement of 25 May, regarding safeguards for minorities and that the Sikhs as a community shall have no right of veto?

Does the Congress agree that either side shall have the right to refer other questions of interpretation to the Federal Court and that its decisions shall be accepted by both sides?

‘If the Congress has really accepted the British Government’s Statement of December 6 it should have no difficulty in answering these questions in an honest and straightforward manner and without juggling with words.’

31. The Future of Assam

Extract from a Letter from M.K. Gandhi to Mahomed Tayabulla, 26 January 1947

KAZIRKHIL, RAMGANJ PS, NOAKHALI DISTT,

I cannot understand the panic on the part of the Assamese. Panic unhinges man, much more so when it seizes a large number of people. The Resolution passed by the AICC, if it is correctly reported in the papers, gives enough, if not clear, guidance to Assam for it will not compel Assam to act against the declared wish of the people, declared through the Legislative Assembly.

Naturally, Assam has to watch the future developments and act as occasion requires. It would be unwise to take any precipitate action. Whatever action is taken must always be taken so as not to impair the autonomous character of the constitution of Assam. There need be no confusion in anybody’s mind.

32. ‘HMG’s Interpretation Accepted in Full: Maulana Azad Clarifies Congress Stand’

The Hindustan Times, 27 January 1947

Requested to clarify further the Congress position on Grouping in view of doubts entertained in certain circles, Maulana Abul Kalam Azad said, that such doubts were unfounded and unfortunate and that the Congress had accepted HMG’s 6 December statement in full.

Explaining his view Maulana Azad said: ‘The Cabinet Mission’s statement of 16 May laid down that after the preliminary meeting of the Constituent Assembly, it would divide into three Sections. These sections would decide whether there would be Grouping or not. Even if it was decided to form a Group and a constitution framed for it, provinces would have the right to opt out of the Group after the first elections held under the new constitution.

‘The question then arose as to how the Section would arrive at a decision on the point. The Congress held that the representatives of a province within the Section could act as a unit and decide whether the province should enter into the Group or not. The League and the Cabinet Mission, on the other hand, held that decision within the Section would be by a simple majority of votes and the province would exercise the right of opting out only after the first elections.

Assam’s Fear

‘This made Assam nervous as Bengal has a majority in section C. Assam fears that Bengal might so frame the constitution of Assam as to make her right of opting out at a later stage a dead letter. Both the Secretary of State for India and Sir Stafford Cripps in their statements to Parliament made it perfectly clear that this right of provinces to opt out must not be tampered with and any attempt to frame a provincial constitution which prejudices such right of the provinces would be against the letter and spirit of the State Paper of 16 May. The Congress had in its resolution of 6 January, accepted the British Government’s interpretation of the State Paper expounded in the statement of 6 December and thus agreed that decision in the Section will be by a simple majority.

The Crucial Point

‘The manner in which the work in the section is carried out has therefore, now become the most crucial issue. The proceedings in the Sections can be carried out in one of two alternative ways. It is possible that Bengal which has a majority in Section C may use its majority in order to frame the constitution for Assam in a manner which would in fact, though not in theory destroy the right of the majority in the province to opt out at a later stage. The other method of working in the Section would be to refrain from any such interference with the constitution of Assam. In that case, Assam would be able to exercise its right to opting out at the appropriate time if a group constitution was framed by the majority and if Assam so desired.

‘Everything now depends on how the representatives of Bengal act in the Section. If the first of the methods, mentioned above, is to be followed, Assam’s apprehensions would be fully justified and nobody can blame them if her representatives walk out of the Section. If, however, Bengal’s representatives adopt the second method no problems will arise.

‘The question does not arise in Section B in the same form or with the same intensity. If, however, the Punjab uses its majority to frame a Group constitution against the wishes of the other provinces, the NWFP and Sind will be able to exercise their right of opting out if they so desire at the appropriate time.

‘The above analysis makes it perfectly clear that the Congress has accepted in full the British Government’s statement of 6 December, and the League can now have no excuse for remaining away from the Constituent Assembly.

‘My own opinion on the question of Grouping is well known. I have always held and made it perfectly clear to the Cabinet Mission that the idea of Grouping is artificial and the Groups will have no real functions to perform. Subjects which can and demand to be dealt with jointly have already been referred to the Union while subjects which remain in the provinces are of a nature that cannot be jointly administered. Every province has its own problems of education, health and rural development and conditions differ so much from province to province that no province is willing to give up its right to decide these questions itself.

Provincial Integrity

‘Communal passions may now blind people to the fact, but when Sections start their work, the smaller provinces are bound to insist on the maintenance of their provincial integrity. This however, is my personal opinion. The Congress has now decided that it is for the Sections to decide this question and if the Sections so desire there is no hindrance to the framing of a Group constitution subject to the province’s right of opting out.

‘I earnestly hope that the League Working Committee will in their sitting on 29 January consider the present situation in the country calmly and dispassionately and come to the decision that the resolution of the League Council for withdrawing from the Constituent Assembly be rescinded.’

33. ‘The New Trap’

Mr Liaquat Ali Khan has put many questions to be answered by the Congress. They are all in the nature of leading questions suggesting that the Congress has not really accepted the statement of the British Government of 6 December. Without professing to answer these questions directly, Maulana Azad has issued a statement which gives a clear analysis of the Congress position which should satisfy any one who might have legitimate doubts. But Mr Liaquat Ali Khan’s object is not to clear existing doubts but to raise new ones. He has resorted to the familiar trick of raising a fresh controversy to replace the old ones which have become meaningless. He knows that controversy is the politician’s breath of life and that if he could successfully entangle the Congress leaders in a new dispute, the League would be able to obtain some fresh concession.

It is essential that no one should fall into this trap. Indeed, no one except the Constituent Assembly has got any right to express an authoritative opinion on the Cabinet Mission statement of 16 May or the interpretation of any of its clauses. As the dispute about Groups and Sections had arisen before the Constituent Assembly began its work, there was some justification for the Congress Working Committee and the AICC to take upon themselves the responsibility of settling the controversy, but now the Constituent Assembly is in full swing and has the sole and exclusive jurisdiction over the matters referred to by Mr Liaquat Ali Khan. If the leaders of the Muslim League want authoritative answers to these or any other points concerning the future constitution or the work of the Constitution Assembly; there is nothing to prevent them from taking their places in that Assembly and putting those questions. So long as they are not prepared to do this, they have not established their bona fides and are not entitled to any replies. One might even go further and say that the questions themselves are altogether jejune. It is the business of each Section to decide, subject to the rules of the Assembly as a whole as to how it will do its work. As the Muslim League is in a majority in Section B and C, the onus of applying the provisions of the statement in those Sections will be on its shoulders. How the representatives of Assam or of NWFP or the Sikhs will behave will be dependent upon the manner in which the majority in these Sections deals with them. It is not a matter on which the Congress can possibly give any undertaking even if it were inclined to do so. If one wanted to put counter questions, one may ask the League whether it has absolutely and unconditionally abandoned Pakistan in view of the categorical declaration of the Cabinet Mission regarding that issue. One may also ask whether the Muslim League would accept every decision arrived at by a simple majority in Section A or the Union Constituent Assembly except in the few cases for which a double majority has been provided for in that statement? It would be futile to ask such questions of the League or to expect any answers. The country will be satisfied if the League enters the Constituent Assembly and participates in constitution-making in terms of the Cabinet Mission plan. More cannot be asked of it nor is the League entitled to ask more from the Congress or any other section of the Constituent Assembly. The simple truth seems to be that the Muslim League wants to continue in the Interim Government without participating in the Constituent Assembly. If Mr Liaquat Ali Khan’s questions provide any clue, the League wishes to raise a new dispute about acceptance and provide some sort of excuse for the Viceroy and the British government to delay the implementation of their declaration that only those who accept the proposals relating to constitution-making are entitled to be in the Interim Government. It may also be that as Maulana Azad has suggested, influential sections within the League have realized ‘that the idea of Grouping is artificial and the Groups will have no real functions to perform.’ If it is so, Grouping will become another demand like Pakistan which the League does not hope for or desire seriously to achieve, but is a convenient means to spite and obstruct the Congress. The best way to deal with such tactics is to leave the League alone and refuse to be drawn into these futile controversies. If the Constituent Assembly goes about its work with quiet confidence, the growing pressure of Muslim opinion will force the leaders of the League to give up their present tactics and play their part in the most important constructive work before the country, namely the drafting of a constitution which will secure for India her independence and to all her peoples freedom, social security and full opportunity for material, intellectual and spiritual progress.

34. ‘Everything Depends on the Political Situation’: Viceroy’s Opinion on Constituent Assembly and Its Working

Extracts from a Letter from Wavell to Pethick-Lawrence, 29 January 1947

PRIVATE AND SECRET

The Viceroy’s House, New Delhi.

Thank you for your letter of 16th January. The Muslim League in its various manifestations has been one of my main concerns this week. I am not certain yet what the outcome in the Punjab is going to be, but you are being kept informed of the details, and, as always in India, the changes and developments are rapid. Khizar realizes that he has made a miscalculation of the strength of Muslim League feeling, and has withdrawn the bans which the Provincial Government imposed on the Muslim National Guard and the RSSS. Khizar was actually in Delhi when the announcement was made, and anticipated no trouble when I saw him the day before the ban was announced. The League leaders in the Punjab now think they have got him on the run and will try to secure the downfall of his Government. We may perhaps be in for serious trouble in the Punjab, to add to our other difficulties.

2. The League’s Working Committee begins its session in Karachi today. It is difficult to get any definite indication of what is likely to happen, as most of the local leaders are unwilling to commit themselves in the absence of Jinnah. It is no use speculating about the result, which you will know before you receive this letter. My own feeling is that the League will accept grudgingly and with reservations, but to a sufficient extent to enable their representatives to take part in the work of the Constituent Assembly. But events in the Punjab may have a fatal effect on the decision.

3. You will have been relieved that Amery has called off his visit, although I do not think that there need have been cause for anxiety if he had come. Much has happened since he demitted office, and although he would have been approached by interests which might seek the support of the Conservative Party, I do not think that he personally would have had an unduly hostile reception, or would have done anything to mar the present relationship between Britain and India.

5. The Constituent Assembly finished its deliberations rather earlier than had been expected, after passing Nehru’s resolutions and setting up certain committees. The wording of the resolution is not such as is likely to attract the Princes, who have a committee meeting in Delhi at the moment to consider lines on which they are to deal with the Negotiating Committee next week. The States have included in their sub-committee some very astute Ministers, and I would expect that they will keep the Constituent Assembly members in play until the Muslim League attitude is finally decided. Further than that, however, I do not think that the Princes are going to commit themselves at this time. The Muslim League and its press have made a grievance of the fact that the Constituent Assembly has gone ahead with these sub-committees, but I think that they realize that not much actual work is possible in present circumstances. Certainly, it will be a grave mistake for the sub-committee on tribal areas to attempt to meet the representatives of the North-West Frontier Province tribes before it has been strengthened by the inclusion of Muslim League Members.

7. By and large, only routine matters of administration are now being disposed of: everything depends on a political solution. I impressed on Liaquat yesterday how necessary it was for the Muslim League to join in the work of the Constituent Assembly, and took the line that the reservations in the AICC resolution were only in effect a statement of the obvious. Liaquat Ali and Azad have been issuing statement and counter-statement in the press on this topic without of course getting any further. Personal relations between the Members of the Cabinet seem quite cordial on the surface although there is little sign of official co-operation and I am told that social contacts are now lacking. I was pleasantly surprised at the reasonableness of the discussions in the Cabinet meeting on Monday last and the speed with which we got through our business.

9. The Congress, in spite of their opposition to compensation, have shown signs lately of realizing the value of your Services. Members of the Working Committee have approached both Hutchings and Abell, and no doubt others, to stay on after the transfer of power. It is, however, clear that the offer of the same conditions of service is not quite as good as it sounds. Patel has informed the ICS Central Association that all that will be guaranteed is the time-scale. As you know, all the important selection posts are well above the time-scale; which is only the basic rate of pay and the minimum given to any member of the Service. I have told Abell to clear up this point.

10. I noticed in a report the other day that the Congress Government in Bombay had decided that the only way to deal with the Communists was to resort to detention without trial. They may well be right, but it is a strange volte face from their old attitude to such executive measures; and it may come as a shock to you if they should resort to such ‘imperialistic’ methods.
35. Muslim League Stand at Karachi Session

Resolution Passed by the Working Committee Meeting of AIML, 31 January 1947

League withdraws acceptance of Cabinet Plan

The decision of the All-India Congress Committee (See p. 114) to accept the British Government's interpretation of the Grouping clauses did not make the path smooth for the Constituent Assembly, though that was the one object that actuated the Congress Executive in making a recommendation to which it must have known there would be considerable opposition. The newspapers that reflected the views of the Muslim League however with characteristic immoderation denounced the Congress resolution.

The Working Committee of the All India Muslim League at its meeting held at Karachi on the 31st January 1947, in a three-thousand word resolution on the constitutional question held that the Congress 'as a major contracting party has not accepted the Statement of 16th May 1946, as clarified by the Statement of His Majesty’s Government of 6th December, 1946, and feels that no useful purpose will be served by summoning a meeting of the Council of the All-India Muslim League to reconsider its decision whereby it had withdrawn the acceptance of the Cabinet Mission’s plan of 16th May, 1946.'

The Working Committee characterizes the AICC resolution as 'no more than a dishonest trick and jugglery of words by which the Congress has again attempted to deceive the British Government, the Muslim League and public opinion.'

It maintains that the Constituent Assembly, in which only the Congress Party is represented, has taken decisions on principles and procedure exceeding the limitations imposed by the statement of 19 May on Assembly’s functions and powers at the preliminary stage which impinge upon the powers and functions of the sections. By these acts the Congress has already converted that ‘truncated Assembly into a rump and something totally different from what the Cabinet Mission had provided for.’

The Working Committee calls upon His Majesty’s Government to declare that the constitutional plan formulated by the Cabinet Mission has failed because the Congress have not accepted the Statement of 16 May, nor have the Sikhs nor the Scheduled Castes. The Working Committee is of the opinion that the elections to and the summoning of the Constituent Assembly were ab initio void, invalid and illegal and continuation of the Constituent Assembly and its proceedings and decisions are ultra vires, invalid and illegal and it should be forthwith dissolved.

TEXT OF RESOLUTION

The following is the text of the resolution:

The Working Committee of the All India Muslim League have given careful consideration to the Statement issued by His Majesty’s Government on 6 December, 1946, the resolution passed thereafter by the Congress Working Committee on 22 December, 1946, and by the AICC on 6 January, 1947, the speeches delivered by responsible leaders of the Congress at the AICC session referred to above, and the proceedings of the Constituent Assembly during its two sessions so far held; and record their views as follows:

By their Statement of 6 December, His Majesty’s Government admitted that the interpretation which the Muslim League had always put on Paragraphs 19 (5) and 19 (8) of the Cabinet Mission’s Statement of 16 May was the correct one and accorded with the intention of the Cabinet Mission and His Majesty’s Government. By that Statement it was also proved that the Congress, on the other hand, had ‘put forward a different view’ and therefore had not accepted what his Majesty’s Government themselves described as ‘this fundamental point’ namely, that decision in the sections, including questions relating to the settling of the constitutions of the provinces included in each group, ‘should in the absence of agreement to the contrary, be taken by a simple majority vote of the representatives in the Sections.’ His Majesty’s Government, furthermore, added that ‘this Statement as interpreted must therefore be considered an essential part of the scheme of 16 May for enabling the Indian people to formulate a constitution which His Majesty’s Government would be prepared to submit to Parliament’. Accordingly, in their Statement of 6 December, they urged the Congress to accept ‘this re-affirmation of the intention of the Cabinet or in the alternative to refer the point to the Federal Court at a very early date.’

CONGRESS AND HMG’S STATEMENT OF 6 DECEMBER

In their Statement of 6 December, His Majesty’s Government also affirmed that the Congress had agreed that other questions of interpretation of the Statement of 16 May which might arise might be referred by either side to the Federal Court whose decisions should be accepted, and on the assumption that the Congress had agreed to this procedure, His Majesty’s Government asked the Muslim League also to agree to it in order to ensure that the procedure both in the Union Constituent Assembly and in the Sections may accord with the Cabinet Mission’s Plan.

Thirdly, His Majesty’s Government, in the last paragraph of their Statement of 6 December, reiterated the fact that ‘there has never been any prospect of success for the Constituent Assembly except upon the basis of the agreed procedure’ and they repeated the assurance: ‘Should the Constituent Assembly in which a large section of the Indian population had not been represented, His Majesty’s Government would not, of course, contemplate—as the Congress have stated they would not contemplate—forcing such a constitution upon any unwilling parts of the country.’ The meaning and the application of this assurance were further clarified by Sir Stafford Cripps in his speech in the House of Commons on 12 December, 1946, when he said, ‘But the Government also had to envisage the possibility in the clause in the final paragraph of the Statement.’ This was perhaps a statement of the obvious—that if the Muslim League could not be persuaded to come into the Constituent Assembly, then parts of the country where they were in a majority could not be held to be bound by the results.

The situation created by the issue of this Statement by His Majesty’s Government was that the onus of taking the next step fell on the Congress and they were called upon:

1. To accept honestly and unequivocally the correct interpretation of Paragraphs 19(5) and 19(8) of the Cabinet Mission’s Statement of 16 May, which interpretation had been already accepted by the Muslim league, or to refer the point to the Federal Court;

2. To re-affirm that they accepted the procedure for the settling of other questions of interpretation that might arise, so that the decision should accord with the basic and fundamental principles of the Scheme of 16 May, 1946, namely, that either side could refer such questions to the Federal Court whose decisions would be binding on all concerned; and

3. To postpone the session of the Constituent Assembly which had been called for the 9th December, 1946 pending settlement of the dispute over fundamental points of principle and procedure which had been brought to the fore by the Statement of 6 December and the correct interpretation of which the Congress had not accepted, as was made clear in that statement, there being no prospect of success for the Constituent Assembly without such agreement particularly on the part of the Congress.

The Working Committee of the All-India Muslim League regret to note that the Congress have reacted to the situation created by the Statement of 6 December in a manner which shows that they are determined to adhere to their own views and interpretation of fundamental provisions in the Cabinet Mission’s Statement of 16 May, which militate against clearly expressed intentions and interpretations of the authors of that Statement as well as of His Majesty’s Government as a whole and which destroy the very basis on which the constitutional plan set forth in that Statement had been drawn up.

By their resolution on 22 December, the Congress Working Committee rejected the suggestion that the point in dispute should be referred to the Federal Court if the Congress did not accept ‘this re-affirmation of the intention of the Cabinet Mission’, and that Committee decided to convene a meeting of the All-India Congress Committee for the purpose of giving a decision on the issues by the Statement of 6 December. The Working Committee of the Congress, however, in their resolution indulged in an attack on the British Government for their renewed interpretation and clarification, which had called the Congress bluff, and on the Muslim League for no other fault except that its stand had been at last vindicated.

AICC RESOLUTION CRITICIZED

The AICC, by its resolution passed on 6 January, purported ‘to agree to advise action in accordance with the interpretation of the Government in regard to the procedure to be followed in the Sections’, about which there never was any doubt in the minds of any sane and honest person, but it immediately added the following qualifying clauses: ‘It must be clearly understood however that this must not involve any compulsion on a Province and that the rights of Sikhs in the Punjab should not be jeopardized. In the event of any attempt at such compulsion, a province or a part of a province has the right to take such action as may be deemed necessary in order to give effect to the wishes of the people concerned. The future course of action will depend upon the developments that take place and the AICC therefore directs the Working Committee to advise upon it, whenever circumstances so require, keeping in view the basic principle of provincial autonomy.’

These qualifying clauses in the considered opinion of the Working Committee of the All-India Muslim League confer the right of veto within the Section on a ‘Province’, and what is more abused, on ‘a part of a Province’ as well as on the Sikhs in the Punjab, and therefore, they completely nullify the advice or the so-called ‘acceptance’ by the Congress of the 6 December Statement, and this AICC resolution is no more than a dishonest trick and jugglery of words by Muslim League and public opinion in general.

The question at issue was very simple one. What was required was a straight and honest answer and not these evasions, equivocations and camouflage from one of the two major contracting parties to the questions whether the Congress honestly and sincerely agreed to the proposals of 16 May, as clarified by His Majesty’s Government on 6 December 1946, and whether they were prepared to honourably abide by them and carry out the letter and spirit of the proposals which were put before the two major parties by the British Government who were merely acting as mediators, as unfortunately the two major parties had failed to come to any agreement at Simla and Conference at Simla had broken down.

QUESTION OF REFERENCE TO FEDERAL COURT

Of the second point in HMG’s Statement of 6 December namely, the procedure whereby either side could refer other questions of interpretation to the Federal Court, the resolution of the AICC makes no mention but the mover of the resolution, Pandit Jawaharlal Nehru, on being questioned on the second day of the AICC’s deliberations as to whether the Congress had agreed to this procedure, categorically answered in the negative and declared: ‘Apart from this, in view of the recent development and the Statement of 6 December, which produces a new situation, I am not prepared to admit for an instant that we have agreed to any future procedure about references. Whatever the future brings we shall have to consider it. I should like to make it perfectly clear that we are giving no assurance about any references in regard to any other matters to the Federal Court. We are not going to commit ourselves at the present moment to any reference to the Federal Court or to any other authority. We shall decide—or the Constituent Assembly shall decide—as we think best in the circumstances.’

With regard to the third point, namely that ‘if a constitution comes to be framed by a Constituent Assembly in which a large section of the Indian population had not been represented’, such constitution would not be forced upon any ‘unwilling parts of the country’, the AICC resolution in Paragraph 3, completely distorts the meaning and application of this principle and makes this an excuse to instigate a section of the population of Assam, the North-West Frontier Provinces, the Sikhs and even Baluchistan, to revolt against the decision that might be taken by the relevant Sections sitting as a whole and by simple majority vote. In the opinion of the Working Committee of the All-India Muslim League the subsequent decision of the Assam Provincial Congress not to abide by the procedure laid down for Sections and its reiteration that ‘the constitution for Assam shall be framed by her own representatives only’ is a direct result of this instigation and is a step taken by Assam Congressmen in collusion with the All-India leaders of the Congress.

PROCEEDINGS OF CONSTITUENT ASSEMBLY OBJECTED TO

The Constituent Assembly met on 9 December and subsequent dates and thereafter on 20 January and subsequent dates and has already taken decisions of vital character so far as it is known to the public, and as some of the sittings were held in camera it is very difficult to get correct information as to what other resolutions it had passed or what decisions it has already taken. It has passed a resolution known as the Independent Sovereign Republic Resolution laying down the objectives. It is not only a proclamation of India as an Independent Sovereign Republic but it lays down fundamentals of the constitution as was admitted by Pandit Jawaharlal Nehru, the mover of the resolution. It is a very vital resolution. It lays down the essentials of the next constitution: several things which are mentioned there are fundamentals of the constitution. It speaks of a Republic of ‘Union’, functions and powers vested in the ‘Union’ or as are inherent or implied in the Union and resulting therefrom, and talks of present boundaries, states and present authorities, the residuary powers, powers being derived from the people, minority rights and fundamental rights. These are undoubtedly fundamentals of the constitution as they are beyond the limit of the powers and the terms of the Cabinet Mission’s Scheme of 16 May, and the resolution is therefore illegal, ultra vires and not competent to the Constituent Assembly to adopt.
Towards Freedom: 1947

Next it has appointed several committees and has proceeded to elect the Advisory Committee, referred to in Paragraph 20 of the Statement of the Cabinet Mission and the Viceroy on the rights of citizens, minorities, tribal and excluded areas. Further, it has appointed a Steering Committee and various other committees and as some of the decisions have been taken in camera it is very difficult to say what resolutions it has passed or decisions have been taken. It has also passed the ‘Rule of Procedure’ and assumed control of Sections by means of these rules for which there is no warrant or justification particularly Rule 63, which runs as follows:

63 (1) The Assembly shall before finally setting the Union constitution give an opportunity to the several Provinces and States through their legislatures to formulate, within such time as it may fix, their views upon the resolutions of the Assembly outlining the main features of the constitutions or if the Assembly so decides, upon the preliminary draft of the constitution. (2) Before the constitution of any Province is finally settled or the decision to set up to a Group constitution for the Section in which the province is included is finally taken, an opportunity shall be given to the Province concerned through its legislature to formulate with such time as may be fixed for the purpose, its views (A) upon the resolution outlining the main features of the constitution or if the majority of the representatives of the Province in the Assembly so desire upon the preliminary draft of such constitution and (B) upon the preliminary decision of the Section concerned as to whether a Group constitution shall be set up for the Provinces included in the Section and, if so, with what Provincial subject the Group should deal.

And lastly, it has appointed a Committee to define the scope of the Union subjects whereas the position was made quite clear immediately after the Statement of May 16 was issued by the Secretary of State of India in his broadcast and by Sir Stafford Cripps at his Press Conference where he read out an explanatory statement. Both of them stated in the clearest possible terms to the time and manner in which the Group constitutions were to be framed by the Sections concerned before the Union constitution was taken up. The Secretary of State said: ‘After a preliminary meeting in common, these representatives of the Provinces will divide themselves up into three Sections. These Sections will decide upon Provincial and Group matters. Subsequently they will re-unite to decide upon the constitution of the Union’. Sir Stafford Cripps at his Press Conference said: ‘So the three Sections will formulate the Provincial and Group constitutions and when that is done they work together with the States’ representatives to make the Union constitution. That is the final phase.’ And the Union is strictly confined to three subjects.

It is clear from the above that the Constituent Assembly in which only the Congress Party is represented has taken decisions on principles and procedure some of which exceed the limitation imposed by the Statement of 16 May on the Constituent Assembly’s functions and powers at the preliminary stage and which further impinge upon the powers and functions of the Sections. By taking these decisions in the Constituent Assembly and by appointing a packed committee consisting of individuals chosen by the Congress, the Congress has already converted that truncated Assembly into a rump and something totally different from what the Cabinet Mission’s Statement had provided for.

HMG ASKED TO ABANDON PLAN

In view of these facts and circumstances the Working Committee of the All-India Muslim League are definitely of the opinion that the Congress by rejecting this final appeal of His Majesty’s Government to accept the correct interpretation of fundamental procedure of the Cabinet
Mission's Statement of May 16, and by having already by the resolution and decisions taken in two sessions, converted the Constituent Assembly into a body of its own conception, has destroyed all fundamentals of the Statement of 16 May and every possibility of compromise on the basis of the Cabinet Mission's constitutional plan. The Working Committee accordingly calls upon His Majesty's Government to declare that the constitutional plan formulated by the Cabinet Mission as announced on 16 May, has failed because the Congress after all these months of efforts have not accepted the Statement of 16 May, 1946 nor have the Sikhs nor the Scheduled Castes.

The proposal of May 16 could only be given effect to and carried out if the two major parties agreed to accept them. The Congress had not and have not accepted and do not accept them although the Muslim League had accepted by their resolution the Statement of 16 May, 1946 as far back as June 1946. But in view of the fact that the Congress refused to accept the proposals in toto and unequivocally, the Muslim League had to withdraw its acceptance on 29 July, 1946.

CONSTITUENT ASSEMBLY SHOULD BE DISSOLVED

The Working Committee of the All-India Muslim League are therefore, emphatically of the opinion that the election to and thereafter the summoning of the Constituent Assembly, in spite of strong protest and most emphatic objections on the part of the Muslim League, was ab initio void, invalid and illegal as not only the major parties had not accepted the Statement but even the Sikhs and the Scheduled Castes had also not done so and that the continuation of the Constituent Assembly and its proceedings and decisions are ultra vires, invalid and illegal and it should be forthwith dissolved.

In view of these facts and circumstances the Working Committee are clearly of opinion that as the Congress, as a major contracting party has not accepted the Statement of 16 May, as clarified by HMG's Statement of 6 December, no useful purpose will be served by summoning a meeting of the Council of the All-India Muslim League to reconsider its decision of 29 July 1946 and whereby it had withdrawn the acceptance of the Cabinet Mission's Plan of 16 May 1946.

36. 'League's Secret Pact with Reactionaries'

Extracts from a Report from The Hindustan Times, 2 February 1947.

New Delhi, Saturday—A feeling more of pity than of anger marks the reaction in the various quarters in the capital to the resolution passed by the Working Committee of the Muslim League. Everyone here is agreed that the Constituent Assembly must go ahead with its task. There can be no turning back at this stage.

There is universal condemnation of the language used in the League resolution describing the AICC resolution as 'nothing more than a dishonest trick and jugglery of words' and calling the Constituent Assembly representing at least 80 per cent of the people of India, 'a rump.'

That the League should have descended so openly to the language of political gangsterism is considered indicative of impotent rage its leaders have worked themselves up to as a result of their policy of intransigence....
What about Britain?

Much of course, depends on how the British Government react to Mr Jinnah’s latest move. Had any doubts been felt by London as to the correctness of the Congress position it would not have hesitated to say so by now. But then the Cabinet Delegation profusely complimented Congress leaders for the resolution they passed accepting the State Paper of May 16 and later changed their views to accommodate Mr Jinnah.

Considerable amusement has been caused among prominent members of the Constituent Assembly who are at present in Delhi and among its officials by two statements in the League resolution. It is made to appear that the so-called in camera proceeding transacted some important business of which no one is aware. The fact is that the Constituent Assembly held no in camera sittings. It merely converted the House into a Committee for detailed consideration of certain business of a technical character in which the general public was not interested but even that business was later confirmed at an open sitting.

The other matter for amusement is the serious manner in which the League has tried to make Rule 63 of the Rules of Procedure look as constituting a breach of the State Paper of 16 May. The said rule merely mentions that an opportunity may be given to several provinces and States to express their views on the proposed constitution. This is like any ordinary legislature making provisions in its rules for electing public opinion. Even if this rule had not been there it would have been possible for the Sections and the Union Assembly to call for expression of opinion by the legislators of the provinces and the States.

The League resolution also betrays secret alliance between reactionary elements by generally lining up with the resolution passed at a recent meeting of the Indian Rulers and their Ministers. It is now clear that the ‘advice’ which the Nawab of Bhopal mentioned as having been received by him regarding the ‘ultra vires’ character of certain proceedings of the Constituent Assembly was tendered to him by persons who certainly included Mr Jinnah.

Some interest has been created by a statement in the League’s resolution that the British Government was merely acting as mediator between the two major parties. This is intended to help British propaganda that the ‘third’ party is not possible for the present political situation in the country. Probably Mr Jinnah expects some reciprocal gesture from London or the Viceroy’s House for this friendly act.

Fascist Methods

The fascist character of the League is particularly brought out by the Working Committee’s refusal to call another meeting of the League’s All-India Council. Unlike the Congress the League executive refuses to give a chance to the larger body to pronounce on so vital a matter as the resolution of the AICC.

Political quarters await with interest the reaction of the British Government to the League’s flagrant repudiation of the Cabinet Mission scheme, Mr Jinnah’s trouble is that he has sold the idea of Pakistan and cannot now confess to his misguided followers that he cannot deliver the goods. But how long can the present basis of the Interim Government last and when would the League members of the Interim Government be asked to quit? This question and the possible repercussions of the League’s resolution were the main points this afternoon at a tea party the leader of the Interim Government and the Minister for External Affairs, Pandit Jawaharlal Nehru gave at his residence to meet the Diplomats and Consular Representatives in Delhi.
37. HMG Upholds Congress Acceptance of Cabinet Mission’s Plan
Telegram from Wavell to Pethick-Lawrence, 4 February 1947
IOR, R/3/1/130, Acc. No. 3448, NAI.

My immediately preceding telegram. Following is outline of proposed statement. Begins—HMG have considered the resolution of the Working Committee of the Muslim League dated the 31st January.

In this resolution the Working Committee have decided not to modify their previous decision by which they withdrew acceptance of the Cabinet Mission’s plan of the 16th May 1946. The Working Committee claim that the Congress party have not accepted the statements made by the Cabinet Mission on the 16th May 1946 and by HMG on the 6th December 1946, that the Constituent Assembly which met on the 9th December is not the body contemplated by the Cabinet Mission, and that therefore the Constituent Assembly should be dissolved.

In the view of HMG the Congress by their statement of 6th January 1947 have accepted the Cabinet Mission’s plan. HMG cannot contemplate seeking a new approach to the whole Indian problem, and they consider that the work of the Constituent Assembly should proceed. They sincerely hope however that the Muslim League will reconsider their attitude and agree to take part in the Constituent Assembly on the basis of the Cabinet Mission’s plan and of the statement of the 16th May, the 25th May and the 6th December. Ends.

38. Government Raises Eyebrows on Assembly Sub-committee for Tribes
Letter from Hugh Weightman to G.E.B. Abell, 5 February 1947
IOR, R/3/1/131, Acc. No. 3449, NAI.

Dear George,

I promised to make some enquiries about the matter of a Sub-Committee for the Tribal Areas of the North-East Frontier and here is the somewhat astonishing result.

2. First of all it is apparently contemplated that two Sub-Committees should visit Assam, one to deal with the areas which are constitutionally tribal (in actual fact the Konyak area of the Naga Hills only) and the other two deal with the Excluded and Partially Excluded Areas. Which Sub-Committee will deal with the people of the Sadiya and Balipara Frontier Tracts, which though de jure Excluded Areas are de facto Tribal Areas, remains to be seen. We thus have the happy prospect of seeing one body of distinguished statesmen trying to get into Konyak country and another body of distinguished gentry meeting the Angamis, Semas and other Nagas at Kohima or Mokokchung or some other place. The second body incidentally will be full of ideas about Gonds, Bhils and such like who have as much in common with the Nagas ethnologically, psychologically, geographically and in any other sense one can think of as an Eskimo has with a Fuzzy from Timbuktoo. I will do my best to get Nehru to see some sense on this but fear that he will tell me that it is a decision of a large committee which cannot now be altered.

3. Secondly, these two Sub-Committees cheerfully propose to coopt a couple of local folk wherever they go. Quite how they will interpret this remains to be seen but I would not put it past them to coopt a couple of Khasis and hang on to them for their discussions with the Nagas, Luseis, Mishmis, Daflas. However I gather that there is a chance that the peripatetic Sub-Committee will discard the two local chaps when they leave the area of any particular tribe and pick up another couple when they go on to the next tribe. No one seems to know quite how these local boys are to be selected.

4. The whole thing is mere folly. We had taken the trouble to provide the Constituent Assembly Secretariat with a factual memorandum and Iengar tells me that that was duly passed around, but it seems to have been completely ignored. However, I will go to work on Nehru again.

Yours
Hugh

39. Secretary of State’s Reservations about Congress Acceptance

Memorandum by the Secretary of State for India on Indian Policy, 6 February 1947
PRO, CAB 134/344, Acc No. 4042, NAI.

I circulate for the consideration of my colleagues two draft telegrams to the Viceroy, replying further to his telegram 219-S and 220-S to which an interim reply was sent after the meeting of the Committee on Wednesday. These telegrams should issue on Friday evening at latest since the Parliamentary Question to which they refer has to be answered on Monday.

2. Congress have come a considerable way to meet our point of view but for the reasons given in the first draft telegram I feel convinced that we should not, as the Viceroy proposes, make a public statement that we consider that Congress have accepted the Mission’s Proposals. I am surprised that the Viceroy, after our experience of the previous Congress acceptance subject to reservations, should not be more cautious. Apart from the reservations in the Congress Resolution of 6th January, which are certainly less conspicuous than before, certain provisions have been made in the Rules of Procedure adopted by the Constituent Assembly. These are explained in IB (47) 14. These Rules go a long way to ensure that the Congress objectives are secured by removing all matters affecting minority protection from the purview of the Sections, and these matters can be reasonably held to include the composition of the Provincial Legislatures (and especially the vital question of separate electorates) by which the option whether to remain in a Group will be taken.

3. Further, we must be careful that we do not become committed in advance, to fulfil in respect of a Constituent Assembly in which the League, and possibly also the States, are not represented the undertakings given in respect of the Constituent Assembly proposed by the Cabinet Mission. In the Statement of 25th May (Cmd.6835 page 3) we said:

The authority and functions of the Constituent Assembly and the procedure which it is intended to follow are clear from the Cabinet Delegation’s Statement. Once the Constituent Assembly is formed and working on this basis there is no intention of interfering with its discretion or questioning its decisions. When the Constituent Assembly has completed its labours, HMG will recommend to Parliament such action as may be necessary for the cession of sovereignty to the Indian people .... subject only to two matters .... adequate provision for protection of minorities and willingness to conclude a Treaty....

4. We may well find ourselves presented with a constitution for the whole of India made by a Constituent Assembly in which the Muslim League and the States have not been represented. The Congress will say that the Constituent Assembly has been formed and has functioned upon the basis proposed by the Mission, and is the representative instrument of the Indian people to which sovereignty should be transferred. The last paragraph of the Statement of 6th December, however, stated that we should not contemplate forcing such a constitution on unwilling parts of the country. It is therefore, essential to maintain the position that a Constituent Assembly from which the League is absent is not one ‘formed and working on the basis of’ the Cabinet Mission’s plan.

5. I therefore consider that we should avoid any statement of the kind the Viceroy proposes and give a stalling reply to the Question in Parliament on Monday, as proposed in the second draft telegram. But I think the Committee should consider, early next week, whether we should now issue a Statement on the lines of that prepared while the Viceroy was here (CP(47) 1) and I have included in the telegram a request for the Viceroy’s view on this proposal.

40. ‘Gandhiji’s Advice to Muslim League’

The Hindustan Times, 6 February 1947

SADHURKHIL (Noakhali) 4 Feb.–Addressing the prayer gathering here yesterday Mahatma Gandhi referred to the Karachi resolution of the All-India Muslim League on the Constituent Assembly and said that he would plead with the Muslim League that they should go to the Assembly and state their case and influence the proceedings.

As regards the British Government he said that they were bound to act according to the State Paper, and he hoped that they would not forfeit all credit for honest dealing with India.

Gandhiji thought that the League did not mean what it said when it characterized the Congress resolution to be dishonest. He pleaded that there should be no imputation of dishonesty by one to the other. It was not good, he thought, for great organizations to regard one another as enemies. That practice would not lead them to independence.

If the elections and proceedings were illegal, the legality should be challenged in a court of law. Otherwise, he said, the charge had no meaning. If they did not wish to recognize the courts as, Gandhiji said, he did in 1920 and later then the talk of illegality should cease.

Gandhiji said that he would plead with the League that they should go to the Assembly and state their case and influence the proceedings. But if they did not he would advise them to test the sincerity of the Assembly and see how it dealt with the Muslim problem. It was due to themselves and the rest of the country unless they wanted to rely upon the law of the sword which Gandhiji was sure, they did not wish to do.

Assembly Representative

Then the League had said he continued, that the Assembly represented only the Caste Hindus. Surely there were in the Assembly Scheduled Castes, Christians, Parsis, Anglo Indians and all those who considered themselves sons of India. Dr Ambedkar was good enough to attend the Assembly not to mention other large number of the Scheduled Castes. The Sikhs too were still there. It was open to the League to put up their fight within the Assembly.

As to the British Government who the League contended should dismiss the Assembly, Gandhiji remarked that he entertained the hope, though he admitted it was somewhat shaken, that they would honestly carry to the end the voluntary document. He submitted that the British Government was bound to act according to the State Paper even if a few provinces chose to establish their independence in accordance with the Paper, Gandhiji hoped that the British would not forfeit all credit for honest dealing with India.

Concluding he said, that whilst he felt obliged to refer to League politics he would warn the audience against inferring that Hindus and Muslims were to regard each other as enemies.—API

41. ‘League Decision on Constituent Assembly Was Only Alternative to Selfish Attitude of Congress—Latifur Rahman’

Dawn, 6 February 1947

‘Muslim League is very anxious to contribute its share in the constitution making of this vast sub-continent but most unfortunately the major political party’s behaviour is every day receding the prospect of any settlement between the two nations of India,’ says Mr Latifur Rehman MLA, President, All-India Momin Conference in a statement from New Delhi.

‘If the Congress sincerely desires the freedom of the country’, he continued, ‘there is still time left that it should honestly come forward and gain the confidence of the Muslim India which has been completely shaken off by the recent happenings, specially the Bihar riots.

‘The decisions taken by the Working Committee of the All-India Muslim League have been arrived at after every careful and deep deliberations lasting for days together. The gravity of the situation in the country and all pros and cons were duly taken note of. The decision about the Constituent Assembly was the only alternative left to the Muslim League owing to the most selfish and sophisticated attitude adopted by the Congress all along.’

Regarding the Punjab, he expressed his deep sense of satisfaction and pride on the very discipline and peaceful sacrifice by the Musalmans of the Punjab, he was sure that the rising tide of the Muslim determination to undo the ban on civil liberties will very soon reach the point when it will be impossible for the Punjab Government to check it any longer.

GOAL NEARER

He said, he was glad that things in India were shaping so rapidly that the attainment of our goal of free Islam in free India seems to be becoming much nearer than was ever expected, and undoubtedly the Bihar riots and the Punjab situation are one of them.

Regarding the situation prevailing in Bihar, he told that wherever he went and whomsoever he met, Indians or Europeans, the first question put to him was regarding the horrible brutalities perpetrated by the overwhelming majority on unaware and defenceless Muslim minority of Bihar. He found deep sympathy for the sincere desire to help the sufferers.

He had long consultations with the members of the Sind Government and all concerned and he was glad to say that Sind Government were planning to give all possible help to Bihar Muslim refugees but as the problem involved is a complicated one and requires serious planning and time; he advises the Bihar Muslims not to go there in a hurry but must consult the Provincial Relief Committee and the Muslim League before taking any steps to avoid any future difficulty anywhere.

Mr Latifur Rehman is leaving Delhi for Bihar on 5 February—OPI
42. League Interpretation of Congress Statement

Letter from Liaquat Ali Khan to Wavell, 8 February 1947
IOR, R/3/1/130, Acc. No. 3448, NAI.

FINANCIAL MEMBER OF COUNCIL,
8-B HARDINGE AVENUE, NEW DELHI.

Dear Lord Wavell,

With reference to my interview with you on Thursday when you informed me that the 9 non-League Members of the Executive Council had written to you asking that five of us who represent the Muslim League in the Government should resign because the Working Committee of the All-India Muslim League by its Karachi resolution had declined to convene a meeting of the All-India League Council for the purpose of rescinding its Bombay resolution of 29 July whereby the earlier acceptance of the Cabinet Mission’s plan was withdrawn, I consider it necessary to place on record the reactions of my other four colleagues of the Muslim League bloc and myself.

You will recall that immediately after the publication of the Cabinet Mission’s Statement of 16 May the Congress put forward certain interpretations of their own particularly with regard to paragraphs 15, 19(V) and 19(VIII) of that Statement, which interpretations were prima facie untenable and inconsistent with the letter and spirit of the Cabinet Mission’s Statement. The Cabinet Mission who were then in this country took cognizance of these misinterpretations put by the Congress on fundamental points of principle and procedure, and within nine days of the publication of their first Statement they issued another Statement on 25 May in which they made it quite clear that the interpretations which the Congress had put forward did not accord with the intentions of the Cabinet Mission.

It was in view of these specific provisions in the Cabinet Mission’s Plan regarding Groups and Sections as clarified and interpreted by the Cabinet Mission on the 25th of May and the belief that the Plan will be worked out in letter and spirit by all the Parties with goodwill and sincerity that the Council of the All-India Muslim League decided to accept that Plan by its resolution of 6 June. The Congress Working Committee however passed a resolution on 25 June in which it still adhered to its own interpretations and professed to ‘accept’ the Statement of 16 May subject to its right to proceed on the basis of these wrong interpretations. The same wrong interpretations were repeated by Congress leaders in their speeches at the meeting of the All-India Congress Committee at Bombay in the first week of July, 1946, and thereafter innumerable statements were made by them which proved that the so-called acceptance of the statement of 16 May by the Congress was no acceptance at all.

By this time the Muslim League was convinced that the Congress was pursuing a dishonest course and that it was determined to use its brute majority in the Constituent Assembly to alter the Cabinet Mission’s Plan according to its own interpretations and not implement it on the basis laid down by the Cabinet Mission themselves and clarified by them in their Statement of 25 May. Accordingly Mr Jinnah and myself issued public statements drawing the attention of His Majesty’s Government to continued Congress insistence on misinterpreting fundamental provisions of the State Paper to their own advantage and we asked HMG to take cognizance of these Congress declarations and to set matters right. Shortly afterwards a debate on India was held in both Houses of Parliament but in course of their speeches in the House of Lords and in the House of Commons respectively Lord Pethick-Lawrence and Sir Stafford Cripps, far from giving any assurance and making any declaration that they would prevent Congress from acting contrary to the correct interpretation of the State Paper as given by the Cabinet Mission themselves and as accepted by the Muslim League, on the contrary, made statements which encouraged the Congress in thinking that the British Government were powerless to intervene and that the Congress could twist and distort the Statement of 16 May to suit its own purpose.

Accordingly, the Council of the All-India Muslim League when it met at Bombay on 27–29 July last year had no alternative but to withdraw its acceptance and to decline to come into Constituent Assembly where not the agreed plan of 16 May but a plan basically different from it was going to be pursued by the sheer weight of Hindu majority.

That this view of the Muslim League was correct and its decision of 29 July was justified was proved beyond any shadow of doubt during the London discussions in the first week of December when the Prime Minister and the members of the Cabinet Mission were brought face to face with realities and had to issue their Statement of 6 December in which they admitted that while the Muslim League’s interpretation accorded with their own, the Congress had put forward a different view, and they urged the Congress to accept the correct interpretation or refer the matter to the Federal Court.

You will also recall that both Mr Jinnah and myself in our discussions with the Cabinet Mission and yourself in London urged the necessity of providing for some sort of an umpire for the settlement of disputes on other questions of interpretation which might arise from time to time in the course of the proceedings of the Constituent Assembly and the Sections. The Cabinet Mission and you recognized the necessity for such a provision and accordingly the Statement of 6 December contained the following paragraph:

> It is, however, feared that other questions of interpretation of the Statement of 16 May may arise and His Majesty’s Government hope that if the Council of the Muslim League are able to agree to participate, they will also agree, as has the Congress, that the Federal Court should be asked to decide matters of interpretation that may be referred to them by either side and will accept such a decision, so that the procedure, both in the Union Constituent Assembly and in the Sections, may accord with the Cabinet Mission Plan.

I would now like to draw your attention to the subsequent decisions of the Congress and statements by some of the foremost Congress leaders, notably Pandit Jawaharlal Nehru, with regard to (1) the correct interpretation of paragraphs 19(V) and 19(VIII) of the 16 May Statement, and (2) the provision that other questions of interpretation shall be referred to the Federal Court.

By its resolution of 22 December the Congress Working Committee declined to refer the question of interpretation of what HMG’s 6 December Statement described as ‘the fundamental point’, to the Federal Court, and the Working Committee decided to summon the All-India Congress Committee for the purpose of considering the matter. The AICC thereafter passed a resolution purporting to agree to advise action in accordance with the interpretation of the British Government in regard to the procedure to be followed in the Sections but at the same time laying down such conditions, reservation and qualifications which totally nullify the effect of the advice. In the view of the Muslim League this resolution of the Congress is in no way different in effect from the Congress resolution of 25 June, rather it makes the position worse in so far as it confers a right of veto not only on a province but also on a part of a Province and the Sikhs. The Muslim League is convinced, as must be any honest and impartial person, that the Congress has not accepted the Cabinet Mission’s Statement of 16 May as interpreted by their Statement of 25 May and as further interpreted by His Majesty's Government's Statement of 6 December. The resolutions passed, the rules framed and certain decisions taken so far by the so-called Constituent Assembly prove that the Congress has already violated some of the fundamentals of the Cabinet Mission's Plan. It clearly indicates that the Congress had never intended nor does it intend to abide by the terms of the Mission's Plan.

With regard to reference of other questions of interpretation to the Federal Court, no mention was made in the resolution of the Congress but Pandit Nehru, in course of his speech at the AICC on 6 January made it quite clear that Congress definitely and categorically rejects the procedure laid down in the 6 December Statement and declared that it was for the Constituent Assembly alone to give interpretation of the State Paper of 16 May.

Following these decisions by the Congress Working Committee and the AICC there was considerable controversy as to whether Congress had really accepted the 6 December Statement or not. Accordingly, several days before the Working Committee of the Muslim League was due to meet at Karachi, I issued a statement to the Press putting the following categorical questions and suggested that on behalf of the Congress clear-cut answers to these questions might be given through the public Press to resolve doubts....

Although most of the top ranking Congress Leaders were then in Delhi, no reply was given on behalf of the Congress.

The position, therefore, is that while the Muslim League originally accepted the Cabinet Mission's Statement of 16 May in letter and in spirit and in its correct interpretation, but was subsequently compelled to withdraw its acceptance, Congress at no time accepted that Statement and does not now accept it. It is clear from HMG's Statement of 6 December 1946 that up to that time the Congress had not accepted some of the essentials and fundamentals of the Cabinet Mission's Plan. They urged the Congress to accept the reaffirmation of the intentions of the Cabinet Mission with regard to those fundamental points. The Congress has not only not done so by its resolution of 6 January 1947, but on the contrary has made the matter worse by going back on the agreement to accept the decision of the Federal Court on other questions of interpretation of the Statement of 16 May. The question of reconsideration by the Muslim League of its July resolution does not arise so long as the Congress does not unequivocally accept HMG's Statement of 6 December, 1946.

In the result, therefore, if the basis of the participation in the Interim Government were acceptance of the Statement of 16 May, then the Congress which has not accepted it and the Sikhs who have definitely rejected it have no greater right to have their representatives or nominees in the Government that the Muslim League has.

In the circumstances it is extremely presumptuous on the part of the 9 non-League members of the Executive Council to demand that their Muslim League Colleagues should resign.

I am herewith enclosing a copy of the Karachi resolution passed by the Working Committee of the Muslim League which deals with the matter in greater detail and which may be regarded as a part of this communication. I hope you will be good enough to convey to HMG the text of this letter and the enclosed resolution so that they may have full material before them to understand the real position.

Yours Sincerely
Liaquat Ali Khan

43. ‘League’s Blackmail to Enforce Undemocratic Features of British Plan—Report by G. Adhikari’

Extracts from a Report from People’s Age, 9 February 1947.

The decision of the Working Committee of the All-India Muslim League, not to enter the Constituent Assembly but to demand its immediate dissolution, brings to a head the conflict inside the freedom-front between the Congress and League. Things are speeding towards a decisive show-down between the two organizations, thanks to the wily manoeuvres of imperialism.

What threatened to develop into a conflict between the Government and the Congress on the eve of the London Conference has been successfully turned into a prelude to another and a bitter round of fratricidal fight—which, whatever its outcome, will leave the whip hand with imperialism.

The vicious logic of the present development leaves only two unenviable alternatives: Either the show-down results in the Congress agreeing to accept in toto the undemocratic provision of the Imperialist Plan, namely, compulsory grouping of provinces and a weak centre, which is what the League is demanding.

In that case the League would come into the Constituent Assembly and the constitution which the latter would frame would be ratified by imperialism.

But that constitution would be one which would ensure the permanence of British domination through the retention of the Princes and through the perpetuation of Hindu–Muslim conflict.

Or, in the alternative, the show-down results in a permanent breach between the Congress and the League; the Congress continues in the Constituent Assembly and frames an all-India constitution while the League remains out and continues fratricidal struggles against the Congress.

In that case, imperialism would not ratify the Congress sponsored constitution but give a new award based on partition of India and ensuring British domination and slavery for both the parts.

But this is not how the Congress and League leading circles are looking at the outcome of the recent decision of the League Working Committee....

WHERE DOES IT LEAD?

The Congress leadership is thus looking forward to a full scale show-down with the Muslim League as inescapable and necessary.

Pursuing the bankrupt policy of collaboration with imperialism on the basis of its Plan, the Congress leadership is walking straight into another round of fratricidal war—planned by imperialism—which will lead not to independence and power to the Indian people, but to arbitrary partition and slavery to a divided India.

The Muslim League leadership has pompously declared that is has finally rejected the British Cabinet Plan; that it is demanding the dissolution of the present Constituent Assembly; and that it is fighting Anglo–Hindu imperialist conspiracy against the Muslim and for the freedom of the Muslim and the independence of India.

The vast mass of anti-imperialist Muslims who follow the League and believe in these protestations, are being led not into the common front for winning independence, but into a fratricidal war against the Congress, in the name of fighting Anglo-Hindu conspiracy, thus to split and sabotage the common struggle for freedom.

WHY LEAGUE REJECTS

The fact of the matter is that the Muslim League leadership rejects the Plan and demands the dissolution of the Constituent Assembly not because it objects to the reactionary features of the Plan or to the non-sovereign character of the Assembly.

On the contrary, its opposition and non-cooperation are a sort of a threat and blackmail to ensure all the more rigorously the enforcement of the reactionary features of the Plan, to ensure that the Constituent Assembly does not act in a sovereign manner but strictly in accordance with the restrictions and rules implicit in the British Plan.

Now it is well-known that the British Plan had rejected the Muslim League demand for setting up sovereign independent State in the Muslim majority zones in the North-West and the North-East.

But it went on to show hypocritical concern for the fear of the Muslims that they would be oppressed in a united India.

As a solution, the Plan proposed the formation of sub-States in the two groups of Province in the two Muslim-majority zones in the North-West and the North-East.

The Muslim League leadership clutched at this idea as the 'seed of Pakistan', and insisted that the decision to form group States must be taken by a simple majority of the delegates in the Sections, thus overriding the right of the Provinces in the groups to decide for themselves.

This undemocratic demand was granted by the London Award of 6 December which is now a part of the Plan.

The imperialists have made grouping the crux of their Plan, not because they wanted to save the masses of the common Muslims from the supposed Hindu domination but because they wanted to perpetuate Hindu-Muslim conflict by encouraging the Muslim League leadership to persist in its communal disruptive policies.

The Muslim League leadership cheats its mass following among the Muslims when it tells them that the Cabinet Mission Plan, in as much as it concedes the principles of compulsory grouping is a plan which guarantees freedom to the Muslims.

For, it does not tell them that under it the oppressive autocratic rule of the Princes over 100 million States people is guaranteed and not the freedom of the people and their democratic rights....

IS THIS FREEDOM?

Patriotic Muslims, who follow the Muslim League seeing in it an organization fighting for the freedom of the country and the well-being and freedom of the Muslims; anti-imperialist Muslims, who are prepared to face lathi-charges and bullets at its behest, as they are doing in the Punjab in fighting for civil liberties, must coolly consider the meaning of these demands, which their leadership is placing before the British Government.

• Have these demands anything in common with the demand for the independence of the country and the freedom and equality for the Muslims and their well-being for which the League leaders claim to fight? Nothing at all.
• How can a joint acceptance of the Imperialist Plan based on the retention of Princely autocracy which oppresses Hindus and Muslims alike, lead to independence?
• How can the joint acceptance of the Imperialist Plan based on compulsory grouping which perpetuates Hindu-Muslim conflict and thus disrupts the joint struggle of Hindu and Muslim masses for land, bread and freedom, ever lead to the freedom and well-being of the Muslims?

• Can a leadership which turns to the imperialist oppressor with the demand to divide the country, be ever said to be fighting for the freedom of the peoples?

In the last few weeks the communal tension was showing signs of subsiding. Muslim and Hindu masses were jointly participating in great common struggles, like the Tebhaga movement in Bengal, common strike struggles as in Cawnpore and Calcutta.

In Punjab, in a struggle for civil liberties precipitated by the provocative action of White bureaucrats against the Muslim National Guards, the following of the Muslim League had shown political wisdom and strength in keeping the movement non-communal and foiling the efforts of riot-mongers and provocateurs.

But this new move of the League leadership is bound to precipitate Congress–League and Hindu–Muslim conflict in an intensified form.

The League Executive has not only called for the dissolution of the Assembly but has also passed a number of other resolutions raising grievances to denounce a number of Congress Ministers in Muslim minority Provinces.

In a general resolution the League Executive has denounced the Government and officials of the Congress-governed Provinces for their failure to protect the life and property of Muslims, urged upon the Governors to use their special powers to afford protection to Muslims, and has finally called upon the Muslims to resist ‘oppression and injustice of the tyrannical majority.’

There is a resolution condemning the mass evictions of Muslim peasants from grazing reserves of Assam, another criticizing the imposing of collective fines and taking of hostages from the tribes in the NWF tribal area.

There is still another resolution condemning Bihar Ministry for failing to afford adequate shelter and security to Muslim refugees who escaped from the fearful communal carnage of Monghyr.

A further resolution called for disciplined non-violent dignified and non-communal fight of the Muslims in the Punjab for civil liberties.

Many of the grievances raised may be justified but the manner in which they are raised, namely, as Muslim grievances as against Congress Ministries, is bound to lead to a greater communal tension.

We have already pointed out what the Congress counterstrategy to the League’s move to boycott the Constituent Assembly is going to be. The Congress would continue to work it and frame the constitution taking care to follow as closely as possible the imperialist imposed restrictions on constitution-making. They thus hope to get the British Government to ratify the constitution and impose it upon the whole of India.

In the meanwhile, it would seek to put down any resistance of [sic] struggle launched by the League, by the use of Government repression.

It will be rousing its own following against the Muslim League by denouncing the ‘Anglo-Muslim Conspiracy’.

BREAK WITH THE PLAN

But it will never be able to win the Muslim masses or turn them away from the reactionary policy of their leadership as long as it itself collaborates with the British Imperialist Plan, hoping to turn it against the League leadership. As long as it does so will the League leaders be able to keep their mass following in the orbit of their reactionary policy by denouncing before them the ‘Anglo-Hindu Conspiracy’.

Thus both the policies—the Congress policy of compromise and of failure to win the Muslim masses and the League’s policy of diverting the anti-imperialist urge of the Muslim masses into anti-Congress hatred—only lead to sharpening of the Congress-League and Hindu-Muslim conflict, leaving the initiative entirely in imperialist hands....

44. ‘Gandhiji’s Faith in Cabinet Mission’s “Bona Fides”’

Extracts from a Report from The Hindustan Times, 12 February 1947.

VIJOYNAGAR (Noakhali), 11 Feb.—Mahatma Gandhi said in his prayer speech here today that he would not accuse the Cabinet Mission of double-dealing. He was replying to a question suggesting that the double-faced policy of the Cabinet Mission was at the root of the present troubles between the Congress and the League and ultimately between the Hindus and Muslims.

The Cabinet Mission, Gandhiji said, had honestly suggested a solution which in their opinion was fair.

The beauty of the State Paper was that it contained no compulsion. Naturally, after acceptance, the clauses became obligatory on the accepting parties, but any party could refuse acceptance. Thus, if Assam in the east and Baluchistan in the west rejected grouping, no power on earth could compel them under the Cabinet Mission’s Paper.

Lastly, said Gandhiji assuming that the Cabinet Mission’s plan was a trap why should the Congress and the League fall into the trap?...

45. ‘India and HMG’

Editorial from The Hindustan Times, 13 February 1947.

There has been a great deal of speculation as to the attitude of the British Government towards the Muslim League Working Committee’s Karachi resolution. There have been reports suggesting that the British Government may make a new statement and that a Cabinet Minister may be sent to India to start fresh negotiations. All these tend to create an atmosphere of uncertainty and apprehension regarding immediate developments in the Indian political situation. There is no doubt that the present impasse is due to two capital blunders—one made by Lord Wavell and the other by the British Government. Lord Wavell should have reduced to black and white his understanding with Mr Jinnah that the Muslim League would participate in the Constituent Assembly before he took the League representatives into the Interim Government. We have no doubt that Lord Wavell was all the time under the impression that Mr Jinnah had accepted the condition specifically stated in Para 9 of the Viceroy’s letter of 4 October, namely, that ‘since the basis of participation in the Cabinet is of course, acceptance of the statement of the 16th May, I assume that the League Council will meet at a very early date to reconsider its Bombay resolution.’ Before the Congress members of the Interim Government agreed to the inclusion of Muslim League nominees, they called upon the Viceroy to state definitely whether the Muslim League had accepted the long-term plan, and Lord Wavell wrote to Pandit Nehru on 23 October: ‘I have made it clear to Mr Jinnah, whom I have seen today, that the Muslim League’s entry into the Interim Government is conditional on the acceptance of the scheme of the Cabinet delegation contained in the statement of 16 May and explained in the statement of 25 May and that he must call his council at an early date to agree to this.'

When it turned out that either Lord Wavell had misunderstood Mr Jinnah or the latter had let down the Viceroy, a second blunder was committed to cover up the first. Instead of telling the Muslim League that it should fulfil the other part of its undertaking or quit the Interim Government, the British Government called a conference in London to discuss an entirely irrelevant issue. Whatever the Congress view about the voting in the Sections might be, there was nothing to prevent the Muslim League group in the Constituent Assembly from asserting its own view and even enforcing it in the Sections in which it had a majority. When the Constituent Assembly elections were ordered and the members were elected according to the Cabinet Mission's plan of 16 May, the views of individuals and political parties regarding the interpretation of the plan ceased to be of importance. The Assembly itself became seized of the entire issue. Disregarding this obvious position the British Government issued the statement of 6 December giving a ruling regarding voting in Sections. Even this was accepted by the All-India Congress Committee on 6 January. In spite of this, the Muslim League has sought to raise a new dispute as to whether the Congress has accepted the statement of 6 December completely. It is argued without any justification that this statement, which amounted merely to an expression of opinion and an appeal, has become an integral part of the Cabinet Mission's plan of 16 May.

This farcical dispute relating to acceptance must end. The Constituent Assembly has come into existence and is functioning. Those who participate in it, what ever their views, must be deemed to have accepted the long-term plan and those who boycott the Assembly plainly have not done so. This is the only test valid in the circumstances. The League would be perfectly entitled to take its own view on any issue that may arise in the Constituent Assembly or in the Sections. But they cannot stay out and claim some merit because they once accepted the scheme and later rejected it for some reasons. We do not see what the British Government can do except to ask the League to participate in the Constituent Assembly or quit the Interim Government. All the present manoeuvres of its members have the single objective of enabling the Muslim League to stay in the Interim Government without participating in the Constituent Assembly. It would be an intolerable situation if the Central Government in India should be paralysed by the presence of a hostile section deliberately opposed to and resolved to wreck the long-term plan for the implementation of which the Interim Government has been formed. Any attempt by the British Government to interfere with the work of the Constituent Assembly or put further pressure on the Congress whether by deputing a Cabinet Minister to visit this country or by any other means will cause the gravest misunderstanding. A third blunder will not rectify the two blunders which have caused unnecessary and dangerous complications. The Constituent Assembly is the only hope for peaceful transfer of power. To the extent that the British Government strengthen its hands and discourage the wreckers, they will be fulfilling the pledge embodied in the statement of 16 May.
The two burning questions of the day are firstly, the resolution passed at Karachi by the Working Committee of the Muslim League, and secondly: the reaction of the Princely order in regard to the resolution passed by the Constituent Assembly on its own objectives, the establishment by the said order of a Negotiating Committee, and its readiness to enter the Constituent Assembly only on the fulfilment of certain terms and conditions which it has laid down in this behalf.

The Karachi resolution of the Muslim League Working Committee, abnormally lengthy as it is, makes really an interesting reading. The resolution asserts that the Congress has not in reality accepted the final appeal of His Majesty's Government, has thrown overboard the very fundamentals of the Cabinet Mission's Plan, and has converted the Constituent Assembly into a body of its own conception. The resolution has characterized the Assembly's objectives, particularly that of the establishment of a Republic here, as illegal and ultra vires, as it went beyond the scope of the Cabinet Mission Plan. It has declared that in such circumstances no compromise was possible, and it has finally asked the British Government to declare the Plan of 16th May, 1946 as null and void.

Regarding the Karachi resolution as it is and between its lines, it indicates a clear intention on the League's part to leave the Constituent Assembly severely alone, and if possible, even to torpedo it from outside, and to resort to direct action for the attainment of its political objectives. Some of the front-rank League leaders have even gone to the length of referring to Mughal Empire and thereby inflaming the Muslim mass mind and firing it with the aspirations to establish a Muslim Raj not only in the North-Western and North-Eastern parts, but over all the parts of India. The outbursts that have uptill now taken place in different parts of India and are even now taking place are but symptomatic of the nature of the direct action threatened.

In such a circumstance, it is the duty of the people of India, more in the interests of the Moslems themselves than of the other communities, to appreciate this danger in its proper perspective, to mobilize and consolidate all national resources, and to make the dreamers of the Muslim Raj realize that they are living in but a fool's paradise. I may caution my Muslim brethren that whatever the past history of India may be, if in the twentieth century they sow the wind, they will have nothing else but a whirlwind to reap. The atrocities committed so far would have assuredly been nipped in the bud, if the Central and Provincial Government had been only a little more vigilant and assertive in the maintenance of public peace and tranquility. Even now the destructive elements in the society can be crushed out of existence with due care and circumspection.

As regards the Indian States, the questions relating to paramountcy and Divine Right of Kings are more academical than real in nature. It has now come to be an accepted canon of modern political thought that all sovereignty vests in the people. We see as a fact throughout the whole world that the one-man rule is fast giving place to popular sovereignty and that the on-rush of new ideas and ideals is sweeping away before itself the already crumbling thrones and Kingships. It is, therefore, the psychological time for the Indian Princely Order to rise to the occasion, to join the Constituent Assembly by giving adequate representation thereon to their own people, and to introduce responsible government in their own States as speedily as possible, after reserving such dynastic and personal rights and privileges as would prove more a help than hindrance thereto. Herein lies their tradition and their salvation as well. The Congress should also realize that it is bad strategy to fight on two fronts.

According to the Cabinet Mission Plan the Constituent Assembly consists of 292 members from British India and 93 for the Indian States. Out of 292 the Moslems are awarded only 78 representatives, that is to say, only about one-fourth of the representation for British India and about one-fifth of the total representation for British India and Indian States. In Section A the Moslems are only 20 in total of 187 members, in Section B they are 22 in a total of 35, and in Section C there is a neck-to-neck competition, in that they are only 36 in a total of 70. In face of these figures, there is every reason for the Constituent Assembly to proceed with the work of framing the Constitution not only for Section A, but for Section B and C as well.

Here a question arises, to wit, whether the Muslim League, in view of its Karachi Resolution, is entitled to retain its seats on the Interim Government. In fairness it must be said that it is not so entitled, as the Interim Government and the Constituent Assembly are but integral parts of the Cabinet Mission’s Plan as a whole, and the League’s boycott of the Constituent Assembly makes it incumbent upon it to vacate its seats on the Interim Government. If the League refuses to do so, it is upto His Majesty’s Government to compel it to this course of action.

It is clear as daylight that the Cabinet Mission Proposals are a cross between the right principles of a political constitution and the fantastic demands of the Muslim League, and as such, it is doubtful as to whether the Constituent Assembly will ultimately give birth to a living babe of a political constitution or to a mere abortion thereof. It will be no surprise if it does the latter.

The Hindu Mahasabha, therefore warned the Congress in June last not to accept the Proposals unless they are satisfactorily modified in certain essential particulars. It is really inexplicable as to why the Congress displayed almost indecent haste in accepting it. Surely the heavens would not have fallen if the Congress had delayed the acceptance and thereby forced the Cabinet Mission to make saner and fairer proposals.

The Hindu Mahasabha is of the opinion that when and if the Constituent Assembly is deemed to be a sovereign body, it is entitled to frame a constitution for India not necessarily within the framework of the Cabinet Mission Plan, but on purely nationalistic and democratic lines in such a manner as to render justice to all and injustices to none.

With this object in view the Working Committee of the Hindu Mahasabha has only recently appointed a Committee to lay down the outlines of a constitution which will be broad-based on the principles of equity, justice and fair play to all the communities and interests as also on such principles as will transform India into a strong and puissant nation to play her proper role in the comity of nations of the world by holding the scales even between the West and the East.

Political

1. Reactions have crystallized regarding the decision of the Working Committee of the All-India Muslim League taken at Karachi, asserting that the Congress had not accepted the Statement of the British Government, dated the 6th December, and demanding the withdrawal of the India Plan by the British Government. As already foreshadowed, the Muslim Leaguers here endorsed the view taken by the Working Committee. Only from Dacca comes the report that there was disappointment in the Dacca and Faridpur districts and a feeling of perplexibility in Mymensingh at the decision that was taken. In the Chittagong Division the decision had already been anticipated and any reactions that there might have been were overshadowed by indignation at the declaration of the Punjab Muslim National Guard as an unlawful association and the arrest of the Punjab Muslim League leaders.

2. The reactions to this step were reported to be mild in character. In West Bengal a few feeble demonstrations took place in three or four places; in the Presidency Division meetings were held in all the districts in protest against the action taken; in North Bengal the staging of hartals and other small demonstrations were reported from five districts fully supported by Muslim Leaguers; in Dacca, too meetings were held and hartals declared in many parts of the Division but they were all peaceful. Only in Chittagong did feelings run high and on the date when reports of the arrests were received all Muslim shops in Chittagong remained closed, courts were picketed and most of the officers and other staff were prevented from attending office. Hartals and processions took place in Noakhali and Tippera on subsequent dates.

3. The action taken by the Muslim League though not unexpected, has undoubtedly caused disappointment to the Hindus whose general reaction has been one of frustration coupled with a determination to proceed with the framing of a constitution and a feeling that the Muslim League should have no further part in the Interim Government.

48. Interpretations of 6 December Statement: Nehru and Wavell

Telegram from G.E.B. Abell to Ronald Harris, 1 March 1947

IOR, R/3/1/130, Acc. No. 3448, NAI.

IMPORTANT

NEW DELHI

No. 386-S. Your 2813 of 28th February. Interview with Nehru on 21st February. Viceroy’s recollection is that Nehru’s argument was on lines that HMG has recognized that large bodies cannot be compelled into a constitution against their will, and that it was only logical that large minorities inside a Province, for example, the Hindus in Bengal and the Sikhs and Hindus in the Punjab could also not be compelled into an unacceptable constitution. There was some argument on the interpretation of ‘parts of the country’ in the last paragraph of the Statement of 6 December. Nehru argued that ‘parts of the country’ could mean ‘parts of a Province.’ Viceroy said that that was certainly not the intention of HMG and did not override the original statement in which existing Provinces were treated as a whole. Viceroy added that if the statement of the AICC was merely meant to emphasize the obvious truth that, any Constitution, Provincial, Group or Central, could only be formed with the consent of the great majority of the people, Congress should say so; but that if it implied that a part of a Province could secede during the process of constitution-making, this was entirely inconsistent with the acceptance of the Mission’s Plan. Viceroy added that it was up to the Congress to make their intentions clear to the League. Viceroy does not remember any definite arguments about the Rules of Procedure.
Chapter 3. Functioning of the Interim Government

1. Disagreements of Nehru with the Muslim League and HMG

Wavell’s Record of Interview with Jawaharlal Nehru, 1 January 1947

1. Nehru proposes that Azad should take the portfolio of Education, Dr Matthai Railways and Rajagopalachari go back to Industries and Supplies. He did not take at all kindly to the suggestion that he should discuss the redistribution with Liaquat Ali. I said that I would think the matter over.

2. Nehru also did not react very favourably to the proposal for a Sub-Committee to recommend names for posts abroad. This part of the discussion ended in my saying that I could not agree to recommend to His Majesty’s Government his proposal for the Indian Agent-General in Ceylon (Ragavan?).

3. Nehru then attacked the Muslim League members of the Government on the usual lines, for non-co-operation. He instanced Liaquat’s proposal to reopen the question of the salt tax and a decision recently taken by the Finance Department about the value of the rupee, without consulting the Cabinet.

   Nehru then worked himself up into a denunciation of His Majesty’s Government; he said the decision taken in London had not been fair to Congress; that His Majesty’s Government’s stock in India was down to zero so far as Congress was concerned; and that if they had done nothing for the last three or four months (that is, if they had given a full liberty of action to Congress), things would have been much better. I said that His Majesty’s Government were doing their best to try and keep a united India, and Nehru burst out that he would sooner India was divided into a hundred parts than that they should in any way abandon their principles and give in to the Muslim League.

   I kept emphasizing the point that they could not possibly get an agreed constitution for India without Muslim co-operation, and it was essential from their point of view that Congress should get the Muslim League into the Constituent Assembly, that the only way of doing so was to accept His Majesty’s Government’s statement of 6th December.

4. I then spoke about the speeches of Jai Prakash Narain, and said that it is an impossible position for a member of the Congress Working Committee to make such speeches. Did Congress approve them and if not what were they going to do about it? Nehru said that Congress did not approve his speeches, which were irresponsible and that he had resigned from Congress; but that his speeches did represent a very great and growing feeling of resentment against His Majesty’s Government.
5. I then asked about the meeting of the Constituent Assembly on 20th January and the proposed programme. It was, I gathered simply to clear up the business postponed from the original meeting, that is, the resolution about a Republic and the various Committees.

6. I mentioned the question of a lump sum grant to the Afridis. His attitude was that the money would be much better spent on schools and hospitals, but that he would consider it.

Nehru’s attitude generally was inclined to be one of rather sullen resentment that His Majesty’s Government had changed their attitude of unqualified support to Congress, he said that the whole attitude of the Muslim League was based on their knowledge that His Majesty’s Government would support them to the end. I merely said that the Muslim League took entirely the opposite view and thought that His Majesty’s Government had given unqualified support to Congress.

2. American Chargé Reiterates League’s Continued Disagreement with Congress

Letter from Pethick-Lawrence to Clement Attlee, 1 January 1947

Prime Minister,

I think that you should be made aware of the gist of a recent talk between Mr Lewis Jones of the U.S. Embassy and a member of my staff. Mr Jones produced a copy of a telegram from New Delhi to Washington reporting to the State Department what had passed in a recent interview between the American Chargé and Mr Liaquat. The latter professed that he saw no present prospect of the League making any further conciliatory move. Its original acceptance of the Cabinet Mission’s plan and joining of the Interim Government was as far as it could be expected to go in the light of subsequent developments. Mr Liaquat asserted that the numbers killed in Bihar were 30,000 in addition to 60,000 persons dispossessed. He said that Mr Nehru’s refusal to agree to the constitution of Provincial Coalition Governments demonstrated his unfriendly attitude and there appeared to be no alternative to Pakistan for Muslims.

The British had made mistakes in (1) accepting at its face value the Congress’ response to the statement of 16th May and (2) forming an Interim Executive of Congress only. Mr Liaquat had told Ministers in London that if they intended to quit India in a year or more they would be well advised to go now and leave Muslims to look after themselves rather than lend Congress meantime the strength that Office gives them to consolidate against Muslims. Mr Liaquat had been unable to extract from his interviews in London any indication of a policy on the part of HMG in the face of present developments.

The American Chargé concluded that it was vain to expect from the League any gesture towards Congress which would bridge the gap, in other words that his demarche had failed.

I am sending copies of this minute to the President of the Board of Trade and the Minister of Defence.

PETHICK-LAWRENCE
REVERED BAPU,

I have received your letter. I indeed felt deeply pained over it. But you have written to me on the basis of complaints and reports that were made to you against me. Complaints therein are not only false but some of them are beyond my imagination.

The charge that I am lured by office is totally unfounded. Jawahar hurls threats to leave office off and on and I have objected to it as it lowers prestige of the Congress and casts a damaging effect on the Services. We must first decide finally if we have to relinquish power. But by issuing empty threats we have lost our prestige with the Viceroy and such threats now make no effect upon him. It was no bluff on my part when on his asking me to give up my portfolio, I at once decided to resign and it served the purpose. What good is to me in sticking to office? I am a bedridden man and I will be happy indeed if I could extricate myself from it. It, therefore, passes my comprehension why at all should you give credence to it.

That I speak insultingly of the League is an accusation which even any League leader has not made against me.

That I make my speeches with a view to please or satiate peoples' feelings is like a news to me. On the contrary, it is my habit to speak out unsavoury truths to people in the plainest manner. During the days of RIN Mutiny, I spoke to people in most unpalatable terms and quite a many felt hurt.

My utterance to the effect that 'a sword will be met by a sword' has been torn off from a long sentence of mine and a complaint thereof has been made to you.

All these accusations must have been dinned into your ears by Mridula for she has made it her pastime to heap abuses upon me. She is indulging in a nauseating propaganda that I want to get rid of Jawahar and also found a new Party. She has spoken in this manner at several places. She is not in the least reconcilable to any other view as divergent from that of Jawaharlal.

If there are any alienations in the Working Committee, it is not a new thing. They have been there since long. On the contrary, as we see it today, most of us are working as a team.

If these complaints have been made to you by any of my colleagues, I would certainly like to know about it. For none of them spoke of these complaints to me.

You wrote to me about Col Gill. I had agreed to his going there with an understanding that he should keep you fully informed about his work there and he should also carry it on with your approval and advice. He was asked to work there only if you would so permit him. Otherwise, I had asked him not to proceed with it. He was also instructed not to enlist more than 100 men from his Mission for the whole area. In all, only 40 persons, to my knowledge, have reached there. He also wrote to me that you have blessed him and approved of his plan of work. I have taken upon me to meet their expenses. I am not, to that end, drawing money from the Birlas. They are trying to get rid of you from there. But I would prefer not to comment upon it.

Hope you are keeping well.

4. Removal of British Personnel from India a Grave Concern

Extract from Wavell’s Record of Conversation with Liaquat Ali Khan, 7 January 1947

7. I spoke to him about the Congress Resolution, accepting His Majesty’s Government’s statement of 6th December. I said that I very much hoped that it would now be possible for the Muslim League to call their Council and to come into the Constituent Assembly; it would be very hard to defend their action if they did not, and it would create a very bad impression in the UK and elsewhere. He said that it was not really a true acceptance and that Congress did not mean to be honest about it, he instanced the many speeches made against acceptance and the refusal of Congress to refer anything to the Federal Court. I said that there was much wild speaking and would continue to be so, but that I was quite sure that the only right tactics for the League was to come into the Constituent Assembly and state their case, if they found it impossible to get fair treatment they could of course reconsider their position. He said that he wished to go and see Mr Jinnah, who is still ill at Karachi at an early date.

8. He then went on to talk about non-financial matters. His first point was that appointments abroad should not be made on party lines; and he particularly instanced the appointment of Asaf Ali in which he was not consulted. He said that if the appointment was to be a Congress nominee he would much sooner that it had been a Hindu und [sic] not a Muslim.

I suggested a small committee of himself, Nehru and Matthai to consider these appointments. His reaction was that it would always be a majority decision and that Matthai would always vote with Congress. I said that the opinion of all three members would be recorded and that I should not necessarily accept the majority decision. He said he would have preferred two Congress and two League representatives on the Committee so that although they would never agree there would be no majority decision and I should get the suggestions of both parties. I said I thought that Matthai would often take an independent view and that these things should not be settled on purely party lines.

9. His last point was to express very great concern at the removal of British personnel from the Services and the Army, particularly the latter. He said that this meant turning the Army over entirely to Hindus. This led him to express the view that we were unfair in putting the Congress party into power in all departments; that we ought to restore our authority and rule India for a further period of years, until the parties agreed. I explained the difficulties of this and that we could not break our pledges to give India self-government at an early date. He said that it would be very wrong to leave India to chaos in this way; but that if we were going to do it we should leave ‘fair chaos for both parties’, and not remain to establish the Hindus in power.

The interview had lasted for an hour and quarter, and he said that he would not keep me any longer but that there were several other things he wished to talk to me about, especially the way the Information and Broadcasting was at present being run on purely party lines. I told him that he could always ask for a special interview at any time.
5. Officials Suggest Muslim League Join Constituent Assembly

Minutes by Mr Scott and Wavell, 8 January 1947

He [V.P. Menon] should be asked his ideas of what should be done if the Muslim League does not join the Constituent Assembly. The recent resolution of the AICC was carried against opposition from the right-wing Hindu Mahasabha and the left-wing socialists, led by J.P. Narain. The position of the Congress Centre (Patel, Nehru, Rajendra Prasad, etc) is continuously under criticism from these two flanks, and it will have to show results if it is to maintain itself. This can presumably only be done by demanding that the Muslim League enter the Constituent Assembly or leave the Government.

I.D. SCOTT

8. 1. 1947

V.P.M. has rather become the mouthpiece of Patel. He was quite interesting on the dissensions in Congress and the decline of the Administration, and thinks that Congress will be hard put to it to hold their own with the Left Wing.

He thinks Muslim League ought now to come into C.A. and may do so, but is doubtful whether any result will emerge.

6. Muslim League’s Dilemma

Extract from a Letter from Wavell to Pethick-Lawrence, 14 January 1947

PRIVATE AND SECRET

THE VICEROY’S HOUSE, NEW DELHI

Thank you for your letter of 2nd January. I have passed on your commendation of the handling of the Rajkot affair to the Political Department.

2. I have telegraphed to you separately about Amery’s visit. While I would have preferred in some ways that he did not come, I have no reason to object.

3. I was interested in the account of Liaquat Ali’s interview with the American Chargé d’Affaires. Liaquat has told me the same sort of thing, and in fact said that if we did intend to leave India to chaos, he hoped that it would be ‘chaos fair for both parties’, and that we would not remain to establish the Hindus in power. (I am reminded of the prayer of the American hunter who encountered a bear on a narrow path: ‘O Lord, help me if you can; but if you can’t, for heaven’s sake don’t you help that bear.’) I have impressed on him that the right thing for the League to do is to join the Constituent Assembly and state their case. If they found it impossible to get fair treatment, they could then reconsider their position. No one of the Muslim leaders, however, is willing to commit himself definitely in the absence of a lead from Jinnah; and as the Working Committee of the League has been called for 29th and 30th January in Karachi, we shall not know for another two or three weeks what they intend. I left him in no doubt that failure to come into the Constituent Assembly would forfeit most of the sympathy which the Muslim League now has in the outside world.
4. Burrows has reported to me a similar conversation which he had with Nazimuddin, in which he (Burrows) indulged in a considerable amount of plain speaking, and said in effect that the Muslim League were now at the cross roads, and would either have to enter the Constituent Assembly or go into opposition, either active or passive: in either of these latter cases their movement would be finished. Nazimuddin is a sensible person, and I have no doubt will use his influence in the right direction when the Working Committee meets. I saw Suhrawardy recently and put the issue plainly to him.

5. Until a decision is reached, politics and administration will remain in a state of suspended animation. Cabinet discussions tend to break on party lines on the slightest provocation, and there is no real co-operation. Neither party is willing to share the patronage of its departments, and both are zealous to keep to themselves the power of decision in important matters. I have had to ask Patel to discuss with me the Hindi-Urdu language controversy in which the All-India Radio has been involved for a long time. He was on the point of issuing a Press note announcing his decision, without consulting either me or his colleagues or even the Provinces which are to be affected by it. I have no doubt that if the Muslim League do not decide to come into the Constituent Assembly, and the chances of their coming in are not great, I shall be faced with a demand from the Congress for the removal of the Muslim League representatives from the Interim Government.

6. The A-ICC resolution was carried in the face of strong opposition from the right-wing and the left-wing, and caused the old guard of the Congress some apprehension. Sarat Chandra Bose has resigned from the Working Committee as a protest, and is toying with the idea of taking up the cause of the INA.

7. I have heard no more at present of Baldev Singh’s proposal for the release of the convicted INA men, which the Commander-in-Chief is quite clear could not be tolerated; and that any further concessions to the INA will be most dangerous. I entirely agree. There is, however, a resolution on this subject due for discussion in the Central Assembly early next month, and it will therefore have to come up in Cabinet for a decision as to Government’s policy in the debate....

7. Adverse Effects of League’s Non-cooperation

He began by tracing the various developments that led up to the formation of the present Interim Government. He stated that the Muslim League had made it evident, both before and subsequent to their entering the Interim Government, that they were quite [?]not prepared to co-operate on the basis of Cabinet responsibility. This was having a most adverse effect upon the machinery of Government; indeed it could be said that in effect there was no government at all at the Centre. He did not know how long this could continue, especially as there were so many problems which had to be dealt with and on which Provincial Governments required guidance from the Centre. He was under very strong pressure from the Left Wing of the Congress, who were holding the Interim Government responsible for the failure to pursue an active policy on all these matters. He was doubtful if this could continue indefinitely. He thought it essential that the Muslim League should be fairly faced up with the need to co-operate with their Congress colleagues in dealing with these immediate problems. He and his Congress colleagues were fully prepared to accept responsibility in proper conditions. He thought also that now that the Congress had passed their resolution in the face of considerable opposition from many of their supporters, that Jinnah should reciprocate, and suggested that he should be told that membership of the Executive Council must be accompanied by entry into the Constituent Assembly. He was not optimistic even if Jinnah did enter the Constituent Assembly, but was prepared to await developments.

With regard to the States, he expressed dissatisfaction with the present position. He alleged that the negotiating committee to represent the Princes was being arranged in the Political Department and at their diktat, in association, of course, with the Nawab of Bhopal. He stated that he had evidence that this was causing even dissatisfaction amongst the Princes. He also referred to the fact that there were very few representative bodies in the States, but had little to say in reply when I pointed out that time would hardly permit of reforms in this direction in view of the fact that the work of the Constituent Assembly had already begun. He was critical, however, of what he called the interference of the Political Department, and expressed the hope that steps would be taken to prevent them interfering.

8. Muslim League Unwilling to Enter Constituent Assembly

Letter from Sudhir Ghosh to Stafford Cripps, 19 January 1947
Sudhir Ghosh Papers, Correspondence with Sir Stafford Cripps, NMML.

9 Windsor Place, New Delhi

My dear Sir Stafford,

I write this letter to make a suggestion to you and I hope that you may feel able to do something about it.

As you know, the Congress people decided to postpone discussion of the main business of the preliminary session of the Constituent Assembly till the 20th January because they wanted the Muslim League to take their full share in these discussions. They called the AICC and accepted the British interpretation of the 16 May State Paper. I know many people in England will say that it is qualified acceptance. The little qualification in the Congress resolution was a repetition of the British declaration of 6 December that they do not contemplate forcing upon any unwilling part of the country a constitution it does not agree to. So far as the fundamental point of grouping is concerned the Congress have definitely accepted the British interpretation. The Cabinet Mission made a declaration that they would get together a Government representative of those who accepted the British plan of constitution making as set out in the 16 May statement. The Congress accepted the plan (presumably the British Government agreed that they had accepted it in its entirety when they were asked to form a Government) and they came into the Government. The Muslim League too, according to the Viceroy, accepted the plan and came into the Government. After having got into the Government they said they never accepted the 16 May statement. The Viceroy and HMG were then faced with the unpleasant necessity of having to ask the Muslim League either to accept the plan or to go out of the government. We realize that HMG did not feel able to do this because they felt that there was something in Mr Jinnah’s grievance that he was not satisfied about the Congress attitude towards the fundamental point about the grouping of provinces. Now that that point has been settled Mr Jinnah cannot possibly produce any excuse for not making a decision as to whether or not he accepts the 16 May plan. He could easily have called his Working Committee and Council and made a decision before the meeting of the Constituent Assembly tomorrow. But it is obvious that he has deliberately postponed a decision until after the Constituent Assembly session. This is not sheer cussedness; there is a well thought out purpose behind it. Mr Jinnah’s plan evidently is not to participate in the deliberations of the Constituent Assembly of India as a whole; he wants to wait till the Assembly divides itself into Sections and then he will enter into B and C Sections and treat them as independent Constituent Assemblies and will proceed to frame constitutions for the North-west and North-east of India. When those constitutions are made he would probably be willing to enter into negotiations with the Constituent Assembly of India about the formation of an Indian Union. He wants to destroy Provincial autonomy and he also wants the Centre to be very weak and not in a position to exercise any real authority over India as a whole. He therefore will not participate in the deliberations of the Constituent Assembly as a whole. The Only way to get him into the Constituent Assembly is for you to tell him that the Muslim League must accept the 16 May statement, as amended and interpreted now, and take part in constitution making immediately; if they want long time to consider this matter and make a decision there is no objection to it, but in that case they must withdraw their five men from the government and they can return to the Government if and when the Muslim League accept the condition precedent to entering into the Government.

I feel that if you will discuss this point with the Secretary of State he will see the justice of this suggestion and apart from seeing the justice of it he may agree that such a step would bring the Muslims (who are most anxious to remain in the Government) into the Constituent Assembly of India.

I am sending this letter to you through Mr Henderson. I hope you will write a line to say that you got the letter and considered this suggestion.

I send my love to Lady Cripps and to yourself.

9. Matters of Appointments and Budget

Extracts from Wavell’s Record of Interview with Liaquat Ali Khan, 27 January 1947

Secret

1. He leaves for the meeting at Karachi tomorrow, expects to be back on the 31st.
2. I spoke to him about the importance of the Muslim League coming into the Constituent Assembly on the lines of DPSV’s brief, pointing out that the resolution of the All-India Congress Committee was sufficient to enable the Muslim League to join, and that it was as good as could be expected in the circumstances....
3. I mentioned the matter of the appointment of Judges to the Allahabad High Court. He said that these appointments should not be made on political grounds, and intimated that the recent one of Sapru had been a political appointment.
5. He agreed with my proposals about the Budget, but asked whether he should put his proposals to me first and then subsequently to the others. I said that I would leave it to him but that possibly he might first discuss them with me and then we could have a discussion together with the others. He said that it must be clear to Nehru that he must not consult other members of his party.
6. We then had a long argument on the proposed Cabinet Committees on Appointments. Liaquat continued to indicate his dislike of the proposed procedure. His chief point really was that the League had hoped to get away with certain appointments abroad on the recommendation of the Commerce Member, without going to Cabinet, in the same way as Nehru had managed to secure the appointments of Asaf Ali and Menon. I pointed out the constitutional position, that is, that the appointments were made by the Governor-General-in-Council and not in his own discretion; and that though I had previously always made the appointments in consultation with the Member concerned, I had always mentioned them in the Council, and that it would have been open to members of the Council to challenge my decision and require it to be taken in Council. I admitted that I had been ‘bounced’ over the appointment of Asaf Ali. Liaquat’s chief fear seemed to be that nationalist Muslims would be appointed, who would voice abroad the Congress point of view but would be regarded as representing the Muslims.

7. He then raised the point whether Hussein Imam could attend the forthcoming meeting of the Working Committee at Karachi. I said that as his appointment to be President of Council of State had not yet been announced, this did not seem to be objectionable.

10. Cabinet Committees to Decide upon Higher Appointments

Extracts from a Letter from Jawaharlal Nehru to Wavell, 31 January 1947

New Delhi

Dear Lord Wavell,

I have been giving careful consideration to the proposal that Cabinet committees might be appointed to consider and decide upon higher appointments in India as well as abroad. I have consulted some of my colleagues also on this subject....

3. Our general policy has to be laid down by the Cabinet as a whole and we have already stated in our instruments of instructions to some of our representatives abroad that they must steer clear of any party or communal lines. It would be exceedingly unfortunate if any of our representatives functioned abroad as communal propagandists. Of course the persons selected may and often will belong to particular parties. But they must be such as can rise above the party level and function as national representatives.

4. Thus far the External Affairs Department and the Commonwealth Relations Department have appointed four persons to relatively important posts abroad. The latest appointment is that of a senior member of the Foreign Service, Mr K.P.S. Menon, who is going to China as our Ambassador. The other three are, as it so happens, all Muslims—Mr Asaf Ali, Ambassador in Washington; Dr Rauf as our Representative in Rangoon; and Mr [M.R.A.] Baig as our Consul in Goa. In choosing these three persons I did not think at all as to whether they were Hindus or Muslims, but tried to find the fittest man for the place. It so happened that the three persons chosen were all Muslims, one of them being a colleague of ours in the Cabinet and the two others being persons unconnected with any party or political activity. Some criticism was made about my appointments, to the effect that I was choosing Muslims only and neglecting Hindus and others. I did not pay much attention to this criticism because I was satisfied that on merits the choice was good. But, of course, I cannot ignore, in existing circumstances, the fact that a certain balance has to be aimed at.

5. It seems to me that it will be [particularly] unfortunate if names are discussed in committees or in the Cabinet. This would be undesirable in the case of servicemen and it would be much more so in the case of men or women who are non-officials and who have been connected with the public life of the country. The initiative for an appointment in any of our departments should come from the department itself. If any person is thrust on a department against the wishes of that department, this will inevitably lead to a lack of co-operation and possibly to some conflict.

6. In my letter of 23 January I suggested that there should be further elucidation of the proposal you have made. There appeared to me to be a difference in your proposal and that put forward by Sardar Patel. Sardar Patel’s idea was that the Appointments Committee should have in effect final authority to make a decision. Your proposal refers to a committee to advise you on appointments. If it is a question of advice and recommendation, there is no reason whatever why there should be a committee. The only point of having a committee is to give it authority to appoint. The committee would in effect function on behalf of the Cabinet and approval by you would be purely formal. This point has to be made clear. While I dislike very much the idea of appointments committees to be set up and thus starting a practice which is unknown in other countries and which may well lead to complications, I realize that in the abnormal conditions prevailing at present some way out has to be found. Perhaps the formation of such committees would be the lesser evil. I cannot say definitely now as there is a lack of the spirit of co-operation amongst the Members of the Cabinet and far too great a desire to emphasize purely communal issues and appointments based on communal considerations. With this background it is not unlikely that some persons so appointed might function far more as representatives of a communal party than of the nation and government as a whole. This danger has to be avoided. Any arrangement now would have to be temporary and experimental so that we may know exactly whether it works satisfactorily or not. In case it does not prove satisfactory, it will have to be put an end to.

7. Keeping all these considerations in view, I am prepared to accept the principle of having Cabinet committees for appointments, both for service in India and abroad. But it should be clearly understood that these committees are not merely recommendatory and advisory. They must decide finally. In the case of important appointments, if there is any dispute, the matter might be referred to the Cabinet itself. The initiative for proposing any name or names should come from the department concerned.

8. This arrangement would be provisional and might be reviewed later.

9. If this principle is agreed to and accepted, the question of names for the committee can be considered later.

Yours sincerely,

Jawaharlal Nehru
11. Nehru Responds to League’s Resolution at Karachi

Telegram from Wavell to Pethick-Lawrence, 1 February 1947
IOR, R/3/1/120, Acc. No. 3438, NAI.

MOST IMMEDIATE

No. 203-S. I saw Nehru for half an hour this evening. I told him how much I regretted the League decision which seemed to leave no loophole. A final breach between Congress and League would have serious effects on the country. There could be no question of HMG dissolving the Constituent Assembly or reversing their policy but obviously a Constituent Assembly without the League and possibly without the States could not make an acceptable Constitution for India as a whole.

2. As to the Central Government I said that Congress were in position to demand the resignation of the Muslim League members, but whether we should be able to carry on the administration of the country more effectively with the League in active opposition than with them in the Government was a matter for careful consideration. The crisis had come at an awkward time with the budget session of the Assembly just beginning. I asked Nehru whether he had had time to consider the matter with his colleagues and had any views to put forward.

3. Nehru said that the work of the Constituent Assembly would go on but that obviously they could not force a constitution on a reluctant Province. He thought that they would probably draw up a model outline Constitution for a Province and then send it round to Provinces for discussion by the Provincial Assembly. They would discuss with States Negotiating Committee on 8th February and see how far the States were prepared to cooperate with the Constituent Assembly. The meetings of the various Committees had been postponed till the end of February in the hope of Muslim League and States joining.

4. As to the Cabinet, the matter required careful consideration. It was not merely that the League had to join the Constituent Assembly, but that until the Bombay resolution was withdrawn they were committed to a policy of direct action, that is, of active opposition to the Government of which they at present formed part.

5. Nehru was subdued and seemed to realize the difficulties and dangers of the position and the need for careful consideration. I asked him to let me have his considered views as early as possible.

6. I will see Liaquat as soon as he returns to Delhi.

7. Since this was written I have received your 1503. Full text of League resolution was telegraphed to you this morning.

12. Congress Faces ‘Difficulties’

Letter from Vallabhbhai Patel to M.K. Gandhi, 1 February 1947

New Delhi

REVERED BAPU,
Received your letter dated 24th.

League is now on warpath. Let us see what happens. It appears that kings are not going to behave well. Here many a times your advice is needed, but what can be done? We are doing what we think proper, but difficulties are mounting.
Food and cloths are in scarcity. Communists and League people are creating difficulties, and socialists also have joined them in making things difficult. It won’t be surprising if Sarad babu also chooses to go on a wrong way. Difficulties are mounting from all sides, and we are pulling on.

May God save us.
Your health might be good.

13. Muslim League and Congress Shy of Direct Communal Confrontation

Extract from a Letter from Wavell to Hugh Dow, 3 February 1947
IOR, R/3/1/130, Acc. No. 3448, NAI.

4. The Muslim League resolution at Karachi demanding the dissolution of the Constituent Assembly went much further than I had expected. If the Congress insist on the Muslim League representatives being dismissed from the Interim Government, it will be difficult for me to refuse, on the other hand they would probably be ill-advised to suggest it, and they do not seem yet to have made up their mind on the subject. I cannot tell you how the position is likely to develop. The only healthy sign at present is that both parties are fighting shy of direct stimulation of communal warfare. The utterances from Karachi about the Punjab situation have been more moderate than one might have expected. Whether Khizar will be able to maintain his position during the Budget session of the Punjab Assembly after the fracas with the Muslim League remains to be seen.

14. Congress Demands Resignation of Muslim League Members from the Interim Government Letter from Congress Members of Interim Government to Wavell, 5 February 1947

Dear Lord Wavell,

In the interview Jawaharlal Nehru had with you last Saturday you discussed the resolution of the Muslim League Working Committee, passed the day before at Karachi. The situation that has been created by the decision of the Muslim League is a grave one and you suggested that we should acquaint you with our considered view in the matter.

2. We have given careful thought to this. We are clearly of opinion that as a consequence of the Muslim League decision it is no longer possible for Members of the Muslim League to continue in the Interim Government. For them to continue to do so would mean an abandonment of the Cabinet Delegation’s Scheme of 16 May, 1946.

3. You will remember that prior to the inclusion of the nominees of the Muslim League in the Interim Government we had repeatedly laid emphasis on the necessity of their accepting the long-term plan of the Cabinet Mission. You told us that this was a prerequisite to their joining the Government.

4. Immediately after entering the Government our colleagues of the Muslim League made it clear that they would not join the Constituent Assembly and that they did not consider the Interim Government as a Cabinet or even as a Coalition. In spite of these difficulties, however, we have continued to function, though rather precariously, in the hope that the Muslim League would after some time accept the full Scheme and enter the Constituent Assembly.

5. This hope has now finally gone and we have to face an open defiance of the whole Cabinet Mission’s Scheme, and indeed the demand is for a scrapping of the Scheme. The resolution of the Muslim League, which has now been reaffirmed, is not merely for non-participation in the Constituent Assembly but for a total rejection of the Scheme and for a programme of direct action.

6. It seems impossible to us that this policy and programme can proceed side by side with membership of the Interim Government. The two are incompatible. If the Cabinet Mission’s Scheme is to be worked out, as we think it must be, then those who reject it cannot continue as Members of the Interim Government. There is no other alternative.

7. Any changes in the Interim Government at this stage, and during the Budget Session of the Central Assembly, may lead to administrative and other difficulties. We are convinced, however, that to attempt to avoid or delay these changes would result in far graver and more harmful consequences.

Yours sincerely,

15. League’s Stance on Interim Government and Cabinet Mission Plan
PRO, CAB 134/344, Acc. No. 4042, NAI.

With reference to my interview with you on Thursday when you informed me that the 9 non-League members of the Executive Council had written to you asking that five of us who represent the Muslim League in the Government should resign because the Working Committee of the All India Muslim League by its Karachi resolution had declined to convene a meeting of the All-India League Council for the purpose of rescinding its Bombay resolution of 29 July whereby the earlier acceptance of the Cabinet Mission’s plan was withdrawn. I consider it necessary to place on record the reactions of my other four colleagues of the Muslim League bloc and myself.

You will recall that immediately after the publication of the Cabinet Mission’s Statement of 16 May the Congress put forward certain interpretations of their own particularly with regard to paragraphs 15, 19 (V) and 19 (VIII) of that Statement, which interpretations were prima facie untenable and inconsistent with the letter and spirit of the Cabinet Mission’s Statement. The Cabinet Mission who were then in this country took cognizance of these misinterpretations put by the Congress on fundamental points of principle and procedure, and within nine days of the publication of their first Statement they issued another Statement on 25 May in which they made it quite clear that the interpretations which the Congress had put forward did not accord with the intentions of the Cabinet Mission.

It was in view of these specific provisions in the Cabinet Mission’s Plan regarding Groups and Sections as clarified and interpreted by the Cabinet Mission on the 25th of May and the belief that the Plan will be worked out in letter and spirit by all the Parties with goodwill and sincerity that the Council of the All-India Muslim League decided to accept that Plan by its resolution of 6 June. The Congress Working Committee however passed a resolution on 25 June in which it still adhered to its own interpretations and professed to ‘accept’ the Statement of 16 May subject to its right to proceed on the basis of these wrong interpretations. The same wrong interpretations were repeated by Congress leaders in their speeches at the meeting of the All-India Congress Committee at Bombay in the first week of July, 1946, and thereafter innumerable statements were made by them which proved that the so-called acceptance of the Statement of 16 May by the Congress was no acceptance of all.

By this time the Muslim League was convinced that the Congress was pursuing a dishonest course and that it was determined to use its brute majority in the Constituent Assembly to alter the Cabinet Mission’s Plan according to its own interpretation and not implement it on the basis laid down by the Cabinet Mission themselves and clarified by them in their Statement of 25 May. Accordingly Mr Jinnah and myself issued public statements drawing the attention of His Majesty’s Government to continued Congress insistence on misinterpreting fundamental provisions of the State Paper to their own advantage and we asked HMG to take cognizance of these Congress declarations and to set matters right. Shortly afterwards a debate on India was held in both Houses of Parliament but in course of their speeches in the House of Lords and in the House of Commons respectively Lord Pethick-Lawrence and Sir Stafford Cripps, far from giving any assurance and making any declaration that they would prevent Congress from acting contrary to the correct interpretation of the State Paper as given by the Cabinet Mission themselves and as accepted by the Muslim League, on the contrary, made statements which encouraged the Congress in thinking that the British Government were powerless to intervene and that the Congress could twist and distort the Statement of 16 May to suit its own purpose.

Accordingly, the Council of the All-India Muslim League when it met at Bombay on 27-29 July last year had no alternative but to withdraw its acceptance and to decline to come into Constituent Assembly where not the agreed plan of 16 May but a plan basically different from it was going to be pursued by the sheer weight of Hindu majority.

That this view of the Muslim League was correct and its decision of 29 July was justified was proved beyond any shadow of doubt during the London discussions in the first week of December when the Prime Minister and the members of the Cabinet Mission were brought face to face with realities and had to issue their Statement of 6 December in which they admitted that while the Muslim League’s interpretation accorded with their own, the Congress had put forward a different view, and they urged the Congress to accept the correct interpretation or refer the matter to the Federal Court.

You will also recall that both Mr Jinnah and myself in our discussions with the Cabinet Mission and yourself in London urged the necessity of providing for some sort of an umpire for the settlement of disputes on other questions of interpretation which might arise from time to time in the course of the proceedings of the Constituent Assembly and the Sections. The Cabinet Mission and you recognized the necessity for such a provision and accordingly the Statement of 6 December contained the following paragraph:
It is, however, feared that other questions of interpretation of the Statement of 16 May may arise and His Majesty's Government hope that if the Council of the Muslim League are able to agree to participate, they will also agree, as has the Congress, that the Federal Court should be asked to decide matters of interpretation that may be referred to them by either side and will accept such a decision, so that the procedure, both in the Union Constituent Assembly and in the Sections, may accord with the Cabinet Mission Plan.

I would now like to draw your attention to the subsequent decisions of the Congress and statements by some of the foremost Congress leaders, notably Pandit Jawaharlal Nehru, with regard to (1) the correct interpretation of paragraphs 19 (V) and 19 (VIII) of the 16 May Statement, and (2) the provision that other questions of interpretation shall be referred to the Federal Court.

By its resolution of 22 December the Congress Working Committee declined to refer the question of interpretation of what HMG's 6 December Statement described as the fundamental point, to the Federal Court, and the Working Committee decided to summon the All-India Congress Committee for the purpose of considering the matter. The AICC thereafter passed a resolution purporting to agree to advise action in accordance with the interpretation of the British Government in regard to the procedure to be followed in Sections but at the same time laying down such conditions, reservation and qualifications which totally nullify the effect of the advice. In the view of the Muslim League this resolution of the Congress is in no way different in effect from the Congress resolution of 25 June, rather it makes the position worse in so far as it confers a right of veto not only on a Province but also on a part of a Province and the Sikhs. The Muslim League is convinced, as must be any honest and impartial person, that the Congress has not accepted the Cabinet Mission's Statement of 16 May as interpreted by their Statement of 25 May and as further interpreted by His Majesty’s Government’s Statement of 6 December. The resolutions passed, the rules framed and certain decisions taken so far by the so-called Constituent Assembly prove that the Congress has already violated some of the fundamentals of the Cabinet Mission’s Plan. It clearly indicates that Congress had never intended nor does it intend to abide by the terms of the Mission’s Plan.

With regard to reference of other questions of interpretation to the Federal Court, no mention was made in the resolution of the Congress but Pandit Nehru, in course of his speech at the AICC on 6 January made it quite clear that Congress definitely and categorically rejects the procedure laid down in the 6 December Statement and declared that it for the Constituent Assembly alone to give interpretation of the State Paper of 16 May.

Following these decisions by the Congress Working Committee and the AICC there was considerable controversy as to whether Congress had really accepted the 6 December Statement or not. Accordingly, several days before the Working Committee of the Muslim League was due to meet at Karachi, I issued a statement to the Press putting the following categorical questions and suggested that on behalf of the Congress clear-cut answers to these questions might be given through the public Press to resolve doubts:

(1) Does the Congress agree that the Sections sitting as a whole and by simple majority vote shall decide whether there are to be Groups and also settle the Group Constitutions?

(2) Does the Congress accept that the Constitutions of the provinces shall be settled by the Sections concerned sitting as a whole and taking decisions by simple majority votes?
(3) Does the Congress agree that Section (C) will settle the Constitution for the Province of Assam by simple majority votes, that a new Legislature for the Province of Assam shall be elected according to the Constitution so settled, and that Assam will exercise its rights of remaining in the Group or opting out by a vote of that new Legislature?

(4) Does Congress recognize the right of Section (B) to settle the Constitution of the NWF Province by a simple majority vote of the Section as a whole and that a new legislature for the NWF Province shall be elected under the Constitution so settled this new legislature alone being competent to decide whether the province is to remain in Group (B) or opt out?

(5) Does Congress agree that Section (B) sitting as a whole and by simple majority vote shall settle the Constitution for the Punjab and the Group Constitution, if there is any, effecting all communities concerned, including the Sikhs and that such a Constitution for the Punjab and for the Group shall be final subject to the approval of parliament in terms laid down by the Cabinet Mission in their Statement of 25 May regarding safeguards for minorities and that the Sikhs as a community shall have no right of veto?

(6) Does the Congress agree that either side shall have the right to refer other questions of interpretation to the Federal Court and that its decisions shall be accepted by both sides?

Although most of the top ranking Congress Leaders were then in Delhi, no reply was given on behalf of the Congress.

The position, therefore, is that while the Muslim League originally accepted the Cabinet Mission’s Statement of 16 May in letter and in spirit and in its correct interpretation but was subsequently compelled to withdraw its acceptance, Congress at no time accepted that Statement and does not now accept it. It is clear from HMG’s Statement of 6 December that up to that time the Congress had not accepted some of the essentials and fundamentals of the Cabinet Mission’s Plan. They urged the Congress to accept the re-affirmation of the intentions of the Cabinet Mission with regard to those fundamental points. The Congress has not only not done so by its resolution of 6 January 1947, but on the contrary has made the matter worse by going back on the agreement to accept the decision of the Federal Court on other questions of interpretation of the Statement of 16 May. The question of reconsideration by the Muslim League of its July resolution does not arise so long as the Congress does not unequivocally accept HMG’s Statement of 6 December, 1946.

In the result, therefore, if the basis of the participation in the Interim Government were acceptance of the Statement of 16 May, then the Congress which has not accepted it and the Sikhs who have definitely rejected it have no greater right to have their representatives or nominees in the Government than the Muslim League has.

In the circumstances it is extremely presumptuous on the part of the 9 non-League members of the Executive Council to demand that their Muslim League Colleagues should resign.

I am herewith enclosing a copy of the Karachi resolution passed by the Working Committee of the Muslim League which deals with the matter in greater detail and which may be regarded as a part of this communication. I hope you will be good enough to convey to HMG the text of this letter and the enclosed resolution so that they may have full material before them to understand the real position.
16. Possibility of League Coming into Constituent Assembly

Telegram from Pethick-Lawrence to Wavell, 8 February 1947

TOP SECRET

My colleagues and I have considered further your telegrams 219-S and 220-S of 4th February and also your telegram 228-S, 229-S and 235-S.

2. While we recognize that Congress agreed to Muslim League entering Interim Government on the basis that League would reconsider their Bombay resolution and that you gave assurances to Nehru in your letter of 23rd October to that effect, we feel strongly that we should not take precipitate action on the request to remove League members from Government. If you are pressed for an answer you should say that you referred their letter at once to HMG who must have reasonable time to consider such an important matter. We think that what Liaquat said to you reported in your 235-S may mean that there is still a faint possibility of League coming into Constituent Assembly but position may be clear on receipt of his letter.

3. We feel that before we give our reply to letter in your telegram 229-S we should issue Statement drafted while you were here revised text of which was brought out to you by Abell. We should propose to do so in Parliament at a very early date. We think that this announcement may have considerable effect on situation. After it has been made we should reply to request for removal of League from the Government by saying that we wish to give time for the parties to consider this Statement before we take a decision.

4. We shall telegraph to you separately some minor amendments to wording of Draft Statement. We have, however, reconsidered wording of paragraph 10 and now propose that it should read as follows in order to avoid possible controversy as to the position under this paragraph read with the last paragraph of our Statement of 6th December. As it is now drafted Congress might claim that constitution had been worked out in accordance with proposals made by Cabinet Mission even though Muslim League and possibly the States had not been represented in Constituent Assembly. Revised text Begins. After months of hard work by the Cabinet Mission a great measure of agreement was obtained as to the method by which a constitution should be worked out. This was embodied in their statements of May last. HMG there agreed to recommend to Parliament a constitution worked out, in accordance with the proposals made therein, by a fully representative Constituent Assembly. But if such a constitution has not been worked out by a fully representative Assembly before the time mentioned in paragraph 7 of this Statement His Majesty’s Government will have to consider etc.’ (as in present Text). Ends.

5. We are opposed to making Statement on lines proposed in your 220-S. Although Congress may be said to have accepted Mission’s proposals to greater extent than Muslim League, we certainly do not think we should commit ourselves publicly at the present moment to position that we regard Congress as having unequivocally accepted proposals of Mission.

For your own information there are parts of Congress Resolution that certainly require clarification.
17. Nehru’s Plea to Gandhi to Return to Delhi
Letter from Jawaharlal Nehru to M.K. Gandhi, 10 February 1947

New Delhi

Dear Bapu,

This morning I sent you a letter by post. But as Sudhir is going I am sending this note with him.

I have received your letter on February 6th.

I cannot venture to criticize your decision to stay on in East Bengal. But I have an overwhelming feeling that vital decisions are being made and will be made in Delhi, affecting the whole of our future as well as of course the present, and your presence at such a moment is necessary. We are drifting everywhere and sometimes I doubt if we are drifting in the right direction. We live in a state of perpetual crisis and have no real grip of the situation.

As you know, we have informed the Viceroy that in view of the Muslim League resolution passed at Karachi, the League Members cannot continue in the Government. There is really no answer to our charge and demand and the Viceroy realizes it. He is awaiting instructions from London. Whatever these may be, our troubles will no doubt continue. What I am worried most about is the rapidly deteriorating economic and labour situation. Also the state of the Congress organization. Those of us who are in Government have given and can give no time at all to Congress work. We are losing touch with our people. I have been unable to go even to Allahabad for a day for months.

The question of the Princes and States entering the Constituent Assembly worked out ultimately a little better than we expected. But of course there are still many hurdles ahead.

Love,

Yours,

Jawaharlal

18. ‘Congress Patience Exhausted: League Must Be In or Out’
The Hindustan Times, 13 February 1947.

New Delhi, Wednesday—While every sympathy is felt for the British Government battling with the coal crisis, Congress quarters here strongly feel that Britain must without delay break her silence over the League’s Karachi resolution. It is said that there is no scope for further negotiations and indeed that the patience of the Congress and the minorities has been exhausted.

The suggestion emanating from London in favour of another mission by a Cabinet Minister has therefore, caused resentment. The issue is now clear-cut and the British Government must face it squarely. By its Karachi resolution the Muslim League has unequivocally rejected the Cabinet Mission’s plan. On the other hand, the Congress and the minorities have accepted it. Since the British Government wish the transfer of power to be peaceful, it is for them to demand of the League either to join the Constituent Assembly or to quit the Interim Government. Should the British Government not do so or attempt to evade the issue, a grave crisis will be precipitated.
The present state of affairs is not conducive to efficient administration or to the planning and execution of the social and economic measures so vital to the well-being of the nation. The Interim Government must either govern as a united team or be purged of the discordant element. The continuous and unreasoning opposition of the League Party in the Central Assembly to the Government calls for early action.

19. ‘Impropriety of Muslim League Members’
Letter from Vallabhbhai Patel to Wavell, 14 February 1947
_SPC_, Vol. IV, pp. 6–8.

Dear Lord Wavell,

You will recall that some time ago I wrote to you regarding the impropriety of Muslim League Members of the Central Government issuing public statements criticizing the conduct of the Punjab Government in grossly disparaging terms. You then replied to me that you had spoken to the Finance Member about it. I expected that things would improve, but instead I notice in today’s Dawn that the Finance Member himself has issued a statement which not only offends in the above-mentioned respect, but seeks to draw, from the happenings in the Punjab, a portent of what might be achieved on an all-India scale. Things have been made worse by a clear hint that matters might take a violent turn.

2. I also enclose a cutting from the Free Press Journal (dated 7-2-'47) of Mr Ghazanfar Ali Khan’s speech at Lahore. I would particularly invite attention to the following passage:

Mohammed Bin Kassim and Mahmud of Ghazni invaded India with armies composed of only a few thousands, and yet were able to overpower lakhs of Hindus; God willing, a few lakhs of Muslims will yet overwhelm crores of Hindus.

The parallel drawn is significant, particularly in regard to Ghazni’s invasion, which consisted of repeated raids on India in which Hindus were killed in thousands and temples were destroyed.

3. I am sure you will not regard with equanimity such utterances of your two colleagues of the Cabinet. A more flagrant breach of the rules of responsibility incumbent on Members of the Central Government would be difficult to find. Instances like this only serve to strengthen our conviction that a corporate body like the Central Government has ceased to exist and that the sooner the present state of affairs is put an end to, the better.

Yours sincerely,
Vallabhbhai Patel

His Excellency Viscount Wavell

ENCLOSURE

Lahore (By Mail)

‘Mohammed Bin Kassim and Mahmud of Ghazni invaded India with armies composed of only a few thousands, and yet were able to overpower lakhs of Hindus; God willing, a few lakhs of Muslims will yet overwhelm crores of Hindus,’ said Mr Ghazanfar Ali Khan, Health Member, Interim Government, speaking at a meeting at Idgah Maidan on Saturday last.

He added, the Muslims would achieve Pakistan and also bring liberation to the Hindus who had been slaves for several decades.
Mr Liaquat Ali Khan also attended the meeting.

Referring to the Punjab situation, Mr Ghazanfar Ali Khan declared that the Punjab League movement was not directed against any particular community, but was launched to regain civil liberties which had been suppressed by the Unionist Government in order to crush its opponent, the Muslim League. He also attacked the Sikh community, which, he said, was always exploited by the British, the Hindus and the Congress by turns.

Referring to the Constituent Assembly, he said the League had been the first to accept the Cabinet Mission’s Plan and extend its hand of co-operation to the Congress, but the latter failed to appreciate the League’s action. It was scandalous to call the present Assembly at Delhi a Constituent Assembly, he said; it was purely a Hindu-dominated body, and its proceedings would not be binding on all.

He would not advise the Muslims to win their rights by means of civil war, but he said they should be prepared for all eventualities.

Mr Liaquat Ali Khan, addressing the meeting earlier, said that the problems of India could not be solved unless the claims of the Muslims for Pakistan were conceded.

Referring to the resolution passed by the Working Committee reiterating its decision not to participate in the Constituent Assembly, Mr Liaquat Ali Khan said that if the Assembly work was carried through irrespective of whether the League co-operated or not, the Constituent Assembly decisions would meet with the fate of the former Motilal Nehru Report [on constitutional reforms].

The Finance Member accused the Congress of avoiding an honourable settlement with the League. The Congress, he said, was out to achieve Akhand Hindustan, by a revolution if necessary. The revolution would sweep away the Muslims of India unless they stood united and were prepared for all contingencies.

He advised the Muslims in the country to follow strictly the tenets of Koran which did not permit aggression against the weak.

Speaking about the problems of Sindh itself, both the League members of the Interim Government stressed that it should be the primary aim of the League Ministry to educate the masses and work for their economic betterment.

Besides attacking the Constituent Assembly, the League leaders also condemned the Congress ministry in India for failing to protect the interests of the Muslim minorities. The recent Bihar happenings were recalled in this connection.

20. ‘Major Tasks before the Interim Government’

Extract from a Note by Rajendra Prasad Forwarded to Jawaharlal Nehru, 18 February 1947

The major tasks, which await immediate solution at the hands of the Interim Government are:

To proceed with utmost expedition to frame (a) a pattern of a Provincial Constitution, and (b) a pattern of the all-India Union Constitution which will provide all the legitimate safeguards for the minorities, be in accordance with the popular aspirations and be acceptable to the largest number of Provinces and parts of Provinces which will have to be partitioned as separate units; and to get these constitutions accepted by a unanimous vote of the Provincial Legislatures concerned;

(2) To formulate a sound and a firm economic policy for the transition period designed to maximise production of essential consumer goods with increasing efficiency and lower costs and not only to hold the worsening inflationary situation but to bring down the price-cost level to reasonable levels with a view to affording relief to the man in the street; and

(3) To strengthen and to adapt the existing administrative machinery so that it will be capable of discharging efficiently the positive tasks which the Government are undertaking and also be in a position to meet the heavy calls which will be made upon it after June 1948.

2. The importance of No. (1) and No. (2) tasks are fully realized by the public and by the politicians although the efforts made to secure these tasks are yet too feeble. The vital importance of the strength and the efficiency of the administrative machinery to the real policies and the purposes of Government has not, however, received the consideration that it deserves. The administrative machinery designed under British rule was, in the main, intended to perform efficiently the negative functions of Government of maintaining law and order internally and externally, and, for that purpose, a comparatively small machinery with very rigid and sound administrative traditions had been built up. The nature of Government is rapidly changing. From the conception of a police state, Government is rapidly becoming a public-service-corporation state and, as in the United Kingdom, so in India, Government have found it necessary to augment the bureaucratic machinery to discharge the positive functions in the field of agriculture and general economic development. The administrative machinery of the future must not only be sufficient to carry out with firmness and efficiency the elementary, yet vital, task of maintaining law and order and public security, but, it must also be geared up to the task of carrying out the positive functions which Government are undertaking. The seriousness of the administrative problem and the vital importance of solving the administrative problem within the shortest possible time would be realized if the present facts of the situation are taken into account.

3. The administrative machinery under British rule was a comparatively small one. The normal cadre of the ICS in many Provinces is inadequate in relation to requirements and it is true to say that many large areas such as Bengal, Bihar, Assam, Orissa, are under-administered. This administrative machinery was intended, as mentioned before, to maintain law and order and to collect revenue. As a result of the additional tasks such as food control, cloth control, agriculture and industrial development undertaken by the Government during the war and the post-war years, even the normal cadres in Provinces have been greatly depleted by the demands of the Central Government and the Provincial Secretariats for senior civil servants with the result that the district administration, which has to bear the brunt of the burden of Government’s essential functions such as law and order or development, has greatly suffered in strength and it is found difficult to get senior men of the right type for discharging these vital functions. Apart from this, it is clear as daylight that a further inroad will be made upon the depleted administrative strength with the disappearance of the non-Indian element from the superior services. The problem of administrative machinery and its strength must be viewed in the perspective that, from June 1948 onwards, India will be free not only from foreign domination but free from the foreign element in all the branches of its services. At the same time, for the next two years, India will be passing through the birth pangs of the new era of freedom which is taking shape. It is, therefore, of paramount importance that efforts should be made without the least possible delay to strengthen the administrative machinery and to place it in a position in which all the calls that might be made upon it in the sphere of law and order, food control, agriculture and industrial development, relief and rehabilitation, will and could be discharged with efficiency and speed. In the ultimate analysis, the contents of freedom and the purposes of the state are translated to the common man and woman in the factory or the field by the actions, the activities, the vigour and the character of the district administrator who is the symbol of Government's authority to them. Attention, therefore, must be concentrated on strengthening the district administration, both in its law and order and in its development aspect and experienced men must be found to man the district administration so that it could cope with the tasks that will confront it in the next two years.

4. What are the steps which the Interim Government have taken to ensure that the administrative machinery will not only not break down but will be strong, adequate and efficient to deal with every emergency situation that might arise after June 1948, so that Government could perform its elementary duty of governing? So far as is known, the only steps that have been taken are the constitution of the new administrative services from the war service candidates. Having regard to the stake involved in the situation, it is ever so essential that no time should be lost in strengthening the administrative machinery during the next 14 months by (i) supplementary measures to augment the administrative machinery and (ii) by enunciating and firmly implementing a policy designed to maintain sound, healthy and proper administrative traditions. As regards the first, it would be worthwhile drawing attention to an important source which does not appear to have been taken into account by Government. It is appreciated that for the Heads of the district administration, civil servants with experience of district work must be found. Similarly, it is appreciated that for senior posts in the secretariat of a Government, civil servants with experience of district work also should be found.

5. Apart from the question of strengthening the administrative machinery, the problem of maintaining and improving sound administrative traditions is of equal importance. It is realized that the district administrator of today is not the ruler of the people but is essentially a servant of the people carrying out the orders of Government who themselves are the first servants of the people. While this basic fact has to be recognized, there is a general complaint that under the responsible Governments now working in Provinces there is too much interference with the discretion of individual administrative officer from the Ministers, which not only lowers the prestige of the officer but also greatly weakens the efficiency of the administration. There can be no doubt that the Ministry is responsible for laying down the policy. There can be no doubt that the Ministry must supervise the actions of the public servants with a view to ensuring that the policy is being carried out according to its spirit. But, it is essential, if the fair name, the efficiency and the integrity of the popular Governments is to be maintained, that (a) intelligible, fair and impartial procedure should be followed in regard to the making of all appointments, and (b) once a policy is agreed upon, the public servants who are expected to carry it out should have the assurance that Government will fully support them in carrying out that policy and they would not be victimized to please the political supporters of the Ministry.

6. Stories of weakening of the administration, depletion of cadres, interference, corruption and inefficiency are a common tale in a large number of Provinces in India today. This is a serious threat to the administrative efficiency and to the capacity of the Government to govern, to maintain law and order and public security and to carry out their objectives of development policy in the critical years to come. The problem of administrative strength, administrative efficiency and administrative traditions is on a par with the problem of constitution-making and of sound economic and developmental policies. This, however, has not received the attention that it deserves and unless steps are taken to build up and strengthen adequate administrative machinery and traditions before June 1948, there is a danger that a vacuum might be created in which the very foundation of the state will be at peril.

21. Discussions regarding League’s Position in Interim Government

Extract from the Record of Wavell’s Interview with Jawaharlal Nehru, 21 February 1947

I spoke to Nehru...and emphasized the necessity of getting the Muslim League into the Constituent Assembly. I mentioned the points in the AICC resolution of 6th January which seemed to need some explanation if the Muslim League was to be persuaded to join the Constituent Assembly.

2. We then had a discussion on the points in the AICC resolution and in the Rules of Procedure referred to in Secretary of State’s telegram. Nehru sought to justify them as not inconsistent with the Mission plan; and professed the desire of himself and his colleagues to get the Muslim League into the Constituent Assembly. He spoke of the possible partition of the Punjab and Bengal, if agreement was not reached. I emphasized to him especially the necessity to maintain the integrity of the Indian army, which might be affected if there was an open breach between the Congress and the League.

3. He described the statement of His Majesty’s Government as a courageous document, which would have far-reaching effects. But he went on to speak of its lack of definition on many points, in paragraphs 10, 11 and 12. I explained to him the reason why His Majesty’s Government could not at present be more definite and what was in their minds.

4. He then spoke of the Muslim League Members remaining in the Central Government. He said that it depended on (a) whether the Muslim League joined the Constituent Assembly, and (b) what the position of the Central Government would be during the interim period. He presumed from paragraph 11 of His Majesty’s Government’s statement that there would be progressive development of the powers of the central Government during the interim period. He said that the Congress would not press for an immediate answer to the request about the Muslim League remaining in the Central Government; but that the issue would have to be faced in the near future.

5. Nehru said that a meeting of the Congress Working Committee had been fixed for 5th March before the issue of His Majesty’s Government’s statement. He thought that there was no necessity to advance the date and that the statement could be considered by the Working Committee at that meeting.

Nehru was obviously impressed by the statement and conscious of the responsibility thrown on the Congress. The interview lasted for an hour.

Viceroy’s recollection is that Nehru’s argument was on lines that HMG has recognized that large bodies cannot be compelled into a constitution against their will, and that it was only logical that large minorities inside a province, for example, the Hindus in Bengal and the Sikhs and Hindus in the Punjab could also not be compelled into an unacceptable constitution. There was some argument on the interpretation of ‘parts of the country’ in the last paragraph of the statement of 6th December. Nehru argued that ‘parts of the country’ could mean ‘parts of a province.’ Viceroy said that, that was certainly not the intention of HMG and did not override the original statement in which existing provinces were treated as a whole. Viceroy added that if the statement of the AICC was merely meant to emphasize the obvious truth that any constitution, provincial, group or central, could only be formed with the consent of the great majority of the people, Congress should say so; but that if it implied that a part of a province could secede during the process of constitution making, this was entirely inconsistent with the acceptance of the Mission’s plan. Viceroy added that it was up to the Congress to make their intentions clear to the League. Viceroy does not remember any definite arguments about the Rules of Procedure.

22. Viceroy Reflects on Political Situation in India

Extract from Wavell’s Letter to King George VI, 24 February 1947

THE VICEROY’S HOUSE, NEW DELHI

Your Majesty,

This will be the last of the periodical letters I shall write Your Majesty as your Viceroy, since the change of your representative in India takes place almost at once. In it I will try to bring the political situation up to date, and to give a short summary of what I have attempted during the 3 ½ years that I have been Viceroy.

Since I saw Your Majesty during my visit to London last December, the political situation has hinged on the declaration made by Your Majesty’s Government on 6th December. The statement itself was, I am sure, a valuable and salutary one; but it should in my view have been made many months earlier.

It came as something of a shock to the Congress that the Government should have at last decided to insist on its own interpretation of the Mission’s plan of 16th May. It was soon obvious that the two factions inside the Congress were sharply divided about accepting or rejecting the new statement. Those actually within the Government—the Old Guard of the Congress—were generally for acceptance; while the Left Wing, led by such as Jai Prakash Narain and Sarat Chandra Bose, were for challenging Your Majesty’s Government by a flat refusal to accept any interpretation of their intentions from them. That inveterate enemy of the British, old man Gandhi, from his village meanderings in East Bengal, where he rather reminds me of a submarine re-charging its batteries on the surface well away from any hostile craft, fired a long-range torpedo at the Declaration; but some skilful helm work at Delhi, by Vallabhbhai Patel in particular, caused it to miss its mark. The chagrin of the old snake vented itself, I am told, in a venomous letter to Patel. The All-India Congress Committee met at Delhi in the first week in January, and after considerable and often heated argument put out what they termed an acceptance of the Statement of 6th December. Unfortunately it was far from being an unequivocal acceptance and was qualified in such a way as still to leave doubt as to the bona fides of the acceptors. I believe that Nehru and Co. had considerable difficulty in carrying it at all, and might perhaps have been unable to do so without the qualifications; though my own judgment would be that if they had had the political courage to stand out for unqualified acceptance they would have won through. As it was, their attempted appeasement of the extremists was hardly successful, since both Jai Prakash Narain and Sarat Chandra Bose resigned from the Congress Working Committee (though I believe the resignation of the former was not accepted—he is a personal friend of Nehru). Nehru also contributed a characteristic outburst against both the Muslim League and British good faith which did not improve the atmosphere.
Thus it took just a month in this land of political irresolution and procrastination for one of the major parties to decide on indecision. It then remained for the Muslim League to announce whether it was now prepared to rescind the Bombay Resolution and to join the Constituent Assembly.

Jinnah was even more dilatory than the Congress. He lingered in London, he conferred in Cairo—where I am told he made a poor impression on those of the Arab League whose sympathy he tried to enlist—and retired to bed in Karachi.

It was not till the end of January that the League Working Committee met; and decided to maintain their former attitude of non-co-operation in the work of the Constituent Assembly. It was, I think, an unwise and short-sighted decision; but the Congress had been equally unwise and short-sighted in providing all the excuses for the League attitude. Not only had their acceptance of the Statement of 6th December been equivocal; but the conduct of business in the Constituent Assembly, which met on 9th December and again on 20th January, had been unnecessarily provocative, especially Nehru’s premature resolution in favour of a Republic. Gandhi too was mixing politics with prayers and chicanery with piety in his usual sanctimonious but cryptic fashion.

The League’s resolution seems to me to be based largely on the naval theory of ‘A Fleet in Being’. So long as they remain in the sheltering harbours or narrow waters of Sind, Bengal and the Punjab, and do not risk the superior broadsides of the Congress in the open seas of the Constituent Assembly at Delhi, they feel that they still have a chance of securing a Pakistan of some sort. It is the submarines and the mines of the Congress subtlety in debate that they fear more than open conflict.

The Congress members of the Cabinet after a few days deliberation sent in a demand for the resignation of the League members from the Cabinet, on the grounds that their entry into the Government had been conditional on their coming into the Constituent Assembly; and that it is impossible for a Government to have in it representatives of a Party whose official programme is opposition to the policy of the Government. The League have countered with a statement that the Congress itself is off-side since it has never genuinely accepted the Mission’s Plan.

I have referred the claims of both Parties to Your Majesty’s Government for adjudication. Meanwhile Cabinet meetings here go on quite smoothly and even good-humouredly. The League team, except for Liaquat, is not an impressive one. I have formed a very good opinion of Liaquat, who has a great fund of imperturbable commonsense and a gift of clear statement. I wish I had had to deal with him instead of Jinnah as the League leader. The others are not the equals of the Congress members in debate. Chundrigar, Commerce Member, is earnest and has the forensic ability of a lawyer arguing a case, but lawyer-like he wraps himself in unnecessary detail, and he is quite without humour. Nishtar, from the North-West Frontier Province, Member for Communications, has about the same moderate degree of ability as Chundrigar, is almost equally wordy, but is less seriously minded and has a sense of humour. Ghazanfar Ali, from the Punjab, Member for Health, is a political buccaneer, rather disreputable, rather noisy, but with a very definite personality and humour. He was inclined to be the ‘enfant terrible’ of the Cabinet, raising the communal issue on all occasions, but I think he has a hint from Liaquat, since he has lately been quiet or has stayed away. Mandal, the League’s Scheduled Caste nominee, is Law Member... He is usually traveling the country to attend Scheduled Caste political meetings; when he does come to the Cabinet he is silent or silly.

There has been one change on the Congress side—Maulana Azad has replaced Asaf Ali, appointed Ambassador in Washington, and has taken over the Education portfolio. Azad is a charming old gentleman, a great Arabic scholar and a sincere patriot, one of the most attractive characters in Indian politics. He knows English quite well but will not speak it. His infrequent contributions to debate have to be translated. His influence is always for moderation, but his influence is, alas, not very great. Nor is he, I think, an administrator.

Asaf Ali, who is now in Washington, is a little cock-sparrow who would like to be a peacock. I am told that he spent some time after his appointment designing himself a diplomatic uniform with much gold lace and finery, and was very crestfallen when Nehru said that uniforms were unbefitting to disciples of Gandhian simplicity. Nehru, by the way, succeeded in putting a fast one across me over Asaf Ali’s appointment. He mentioned it to me as a possibility, and I made no comment, as I supposed he would put it up to me with other, and perhaps more suitable, names. But he apparently told the External Affairs Department that I had agreed, and had the name wired home for Your Majesty’s approval without further reference. He did not even consult his colleagues, some of whom were furious.

The policy of the Princes towards participation in the Constituent Assembly has been intricate. But on the whole they have managed to form a fairly united front, and seem to be satisfied with the result of the first round between their Negotiating Committee—composed partly of Princes, partly of Diwans and containing some very able men—and the corresponding Committee of the Assembly; though both sides give varying accounts and interpretations of what actually happened. It probably amounted to little more than preliminary sparring. The second round, on 1st March, may be more lively. Meanwhile, the Congress have been reconnoitring the Princes’ position for soft spots in which to make a breach, and think they have found one in His Highness of Baroda, who has again withdrawn to the country houses and racing stables of England, leaving apparently instructions with his Diwan to deal direct with the Assembly, independently of his fellow Princes.

So much for the general political situation. There are certain other matters, all connected with politics, which seem to need mention.

The first concerns the obsequies of the Secretary of State’s Services—Indian Civil Service and Indian Police. They are so obviously moribund in their present form that the Indian political leaders have demanded that a date for the funeral should be fixed, promising that they will rise like phoenixes as true servants of India instead of a foreign Power. But the phoenixes have demanded compensation for their pyrotechnical performance, which was not specified, they claim, in their original charter. Arthur Henderson has recently paid a visit to Delhi to discuss this question with my Government, but without success. I do not wish to be disrespectful to one of Your Majesty’s Ministers, but it was obvious that he did not carry guns enough to meet the quite formidable arguments on the Indian side, and that he really stood no better chance than a 10-gun brig would have had against a ship of the line. There is a lot of force in the Indian case against their liability for compensation; and Patel, the Member in charge, shoots straight.

In the UK Mission on the Sterling balances it was perhaps the reverse. Sir Wilfred Eady was so stoutly armed and put up so good a case that the Indian negotiators, on the Departmental level, have run for shelter under the guns of the Ministry. There will have to be a further conference on a higher level.

The last current issue I need mention is the state of affairs in the Punjab, which is causing considerable anxiety. The position of the Government, the only Provincial Coalition Ministry, has been unstable ever since the last election; and the largest single party, the Muslim League, have had strong hopes of ousting it, though they could not form a stable Ministry themselves. A month ago the Premier, Khizar, an attractive but not a very strong character nor always wise, decided to ban two institutions which are really political 'private armies', the Rashtriya Swayam Sewak Sangh (Hindu) and the Muslim League Guards. In theory he was quite right, these bodies are a menace to peace; but his judgment of the results proved at fault. He expected no trouble, but the League reacted so strongly to the suppression of their Guards that he withdrew the ban. The League seeing a chance to discredit and possibly overthrow the Ministry, continued the agitation, directed now against an Ordinance issued some time before giving the Ministry drastic powers to maintain order. The situation is dangerous, since the Hindus and Sikhs are getting restive, the rival communities are not unequally balanced, and trouble in the Punjab is likely to take violent forms.

An effort is being made to arrive at a compromise. As usual face-saving is one of the main considerations.

So much for current politics. Since I received the Prime Minister’s intimation of recall, I have looked back on the three and a half years during which I have tried to guide Indian policy. The following paragraphs give the ideas which lay behind my actions, and may possibly be of interest to Your Majesty....

My efforts since I returned from England have been directed to the following objects, so far as internal security is concerned:

(a) That we should have as good and detailed a plan as possible for the protection and withdrawal of our nationals in an emergency;
(b) that we should try to prevent British troops being used for the suppression of one party in the interests of another, and that we should not become involved in communal or labour disturbances if we can avoid it; and
(c) that we should for as long as possible maintain the stability and integrity of the Indian Army, which is at the present time perhaps the brightest part of the Indian outlook.

The Cabinet at home has now taken a definite decision to declare that our control of India will be ended by the middle of 1948; and I hope that they have given my successor, whose name I was delighted to hear, either a definite plan for the withdrawal, or a free hand....

I have spent some 13 years of my life in India; 2 1/2 years as a child, 5 years a subaltern, and nearly 6 years as Commander-in-Chief and as Viceroy. My five years as a subaltern were some of the best of my life; and my six years as Commander-in-Chief and Viceroy the most interesting, but also the most exacting. I should have liked to see the end of the drama of British rule in India; but since the Government have thought it advisable to make a change, they could certainly not have made a better choice. I am now busy packing up, at shorter notice, I suppose, than any previous Viceroy has had.

May I be permitted in conclusion to offer Your Majesty my humble thanks for all the kindness and consideration you have shown to me during my tenure of this high office; and for the great honour you have done me in conferring on me the dignity of an Earldom.

I hope that Your Majesties are enjoying the tour in South Africa, but it sounds exacting:

I have the honour to be,

Sir,

Your Majesty’s humble and devoted servant,

WAVERLEY
23. Congress Invites Muslim League for Discussions

Extract from a Letter from Jawaharlal Nehru to Liaquat Ali Khan, 9 March 1947

My dear Nawabzada,

2. Whatever our individual views might be in regard to these matters, it is obvious now that the time has come for a practical appreciation of events and speedy decision. The British are fading out of the picture and the burden of this decision must rest on all of us here. It seems desirable that we should face this situation squarely and not speak to each other from a distance. Whether we can come to an agreement or not, I do not know. But even if we fail, some solutions of the problem will be forthcoming because the time has come for them and they can no longer be delayed. In the ultimate analysis there may be two or three courses open to each one of us and we shall have to choose.

3. During the last three days the Congress Working Committee have given earnest consideration to the present situation and have passed a number of resolutions. I am enclosing a copy of three of them for your information. This will give you some idea of how our minds have been working. We have tried hard to find a way out of the present tangle and have made certain suggestions which avoid any compulsion on any group.

4. It is no longer good enough for any of us to criticize the other from a distance. Hence my suggestion that you and I might meet to discuss these matters. I am not thinking so much of any long discussions in regard to details but rather a consideration of the broad aspects of the problem.

5. You will notice that the Congress Working Committee has passed a resolution inviting representatives of the Muslim League to meet Congress representatives. This invitation will no doubt be conveyed formally to the General Secretary of the Muslim League. My own approach to you is entirely informal and apart from that formal approach.

Yours sincerely,

Jawaharlal Nehru

24. Deadlock in the Interim Government

Extract from a Letter from V.K. Krishna Menon to Louis Mountbatten, 13 March 1947

My dear Lord Louis Mountbatten,

I enclose the last page of my notes, which was inadvertently left out of the copy I gave you.

As I told you, there are a number of matters to be included in it if the basic idea appears to be of any use. If you need me, I shall be glad to see you again before I leave. Your A.D.C. apparently knows how to get in touch with me. I recognize the importance of hastening slowly, but it appears that in India things will not rest as they are. There is a grave threat of famine also, which may add to complications, but at the same time makes effective central authority essential.

INDIA HOUSE, ALDWYCH, LONDON, W.C.2,
I was glad to see you and to have had our talk. Perhaps you will let me know sometime what you think of what I have said.

Yours sincerely,
V.K. KRISHNA MENON

...Section II. ‘The crisis in the Government.

(1) The decision of the Congress to force the issue of a genuine coalition or the dismissal of the League members is still suspense for the moment, pending (a) the arrival of the new Viceroy and (b) the slight hopes of response from the League to a further approach.

(2) The resolving of the crisis, in my view, rests basically on the relation of the Ministry to the Viceroy—that is, British power.

The assumption of a new role by the Viceroy quite obviously (not merely willy nilly) is essential to a change for the better in the present situation.

(3) The Attlee declaration, apart from all other causes, makes it both logical and incumbent on the British side that its power (as distinct from its influence) should not only rapidly diminish (to vanishing point in 1948) but that immediately there should be a change in this relationship whereby the entire onus of administration is in the hands of the Interim Government.

It is the failure on the part of Lord Wavell to accept this position, and his unfortunate excursion in the contrary direction since the middle of last September, that is largely responsible for the present crisis.

(4) When the Viceroy assumes this new role (analogous to that of the King in England or the Governor General of a Dominion) certain consequences follow:

(a) Leadership (as distinct from multiple leadership) emerges in the Government.

(b) If the Government contains Moslem Leaguers, they will either tend to merge into a genuine coalition or be reduced to impotence.

(c) If the League is in opposition within the Government or a constitutional opposition outside, the Congress, which has the leadership, will be forced at every step into behaving as though it were a partner in a genuine Coalition.

(d) If on the other hand the League (or indeed any group) are in unconstitutional opposition, relying on violence and anarchy, there would be a Central Government strong and resolute enough to deal with the situation.

(5) (i) The result of the step thus suggested is to bring right into the forefront the main long term issue both in the way of (a) the future constitution and unity of India, (b) the authority for taking over, and

(ii) to render the problem of I(4), Indo-British relations, capable of approach by the British side in more practical terms and in a friendly atmosphere.

(6) Failing the assumption of this new role by the Viceroy, a crisis of some kind or another will be precipitated within the first few weeks of his arrival. This is inevitable, and if this happens I(2), I(3) and I(4) become far more complicated, and the economic, political and administrative situation in India will approach disaster.

(7) A strong Government, capable of enforcing its authority centrally and of co-operating with the Provinces, is indispensable for dealing with the economic situation which in the next 12 months threatens to be disastrous (famine included).
In the new situation, the role of the Viceroy is by no means a negative one. His influence would be very potent and his assistance sought. His role would be historic and would make the regime not one of surrender and abdication, but one of a new leadership.

Section III. Taking over.

In July 1948 it is obvious there must be machinery for taking over. This machinery may well be
(a) that which is established under a new constitution by a Constituent Assembly with or without Moslem League participation; or
(b) the Interim Government (under Dominion conditions) or
(c) the de facto repositories of power and power relationships: or
(d) some machinery arbitrarily decided by the outgoing authority.

I do not propose to deal with the question of what constitution may emerge by one process or another.

The immediate problem is what has to be done for obtaining comparatively stable conditions for (a), (b), (c) and (d) above, or some combination of these.

In hard reality this poses the question, what about the Moslem League and, in a lesser way, the Princes, and what solution or way out can be found by the Viceroy using his great influence as contemplated in II above?

What I propose here is intended as a realistic approach rather than a crystallized formula, and I think aloud in this way.

Recognize, if the League so desires it, its claim for ‘Moslem homelands’—Pakistans.

This recognition is possible only on the basis that the homelands are to be limited to those areas where at present the Moslem population is predominant, and where the League holds an appreciable majority of elected seats.

In other words, it is impossible to think in terms of homelands on the basis of British provinces. This is not a question of whittling down Pakistan or driving a bargain on it, but of seeking the only method which would enable a Pakistan to be created at all.

Therefore I propose the following:

(a) A Western Pakistan in the North-West, to include the Moslem majority districts of the Punjab together with the Moslem districts of Sind, with an approach to the sea at Karachi, irrespective of the composition of the population on this boundary. Any attempt to provide a homeland which is boxed in on all four sides is an unfair offer from the League point of view.

The port of Karachi, irrespective of its predominant non-Moslem population and all-India importance, to be included in Western Pakistan, thus giving the League a first-class sea and air port and a great city.

The remainder of the Punjab to be constituted into a separate province of all-India.

The question of the remainder of Sind has to be thought out.

(b) Eastern Pakistan in the North-East, to include the districts of Eastern Bengal which are predominantly Moslem, and certain areas of Assam, thus partitioning Bengal (shades of Curzon!)

The problems here are (i) the comparatively strong opposition in Bengal to partition and (ii) Calcutta.
I believe that partition is the price that will have to be paid for any stability in Bengal.

With regard to Calcutta, any solution which hands over Calcutta to Pakistan will be unstable and impractical. The reasons are well known.

On the other hand, the League has to be given a port on the East, and the solution is that as part of the compromise settlement India should build a large-sized city and port in Chittagong, that is, provide the money for it however many millions it may cost.

(c) \textit{Question of powers and status.} The Pakistans shall be styled as autonomous states, and not provinces. They should have all the attributes of statehood except foreign relations and defence. These two cannot in any event, before 1948 be made available to any Pakistan, because any new state created would have no foreign relations by that time even if it succeeds in getting recognition, except with the co-operation of the rest of India. This is therefore a problem of the future, and is dealt with further below.

Defence is equally not capable of being vested in any Pakistan at the time of its creation. Even if it were, it would confer little power on Pakistans, as the heavier defence of all-India would reduce the defence power of the Pakistans to impotence.

On the other hand it is proposed that the Pakistans as here contemplated should have vaster powers than for the groups under the Cabinet plan. Therefore they should be given not merely the title of autonomous states, but all the competence except the two mentioned above, that is to say all tariffs, currency, control of communications, including posts and railways, flag, external trade, control of resources and independent heads of states. They should also be accorded the right to secede from India and establish themselves as independent states when they are in a position to obtain foreign recognition and to build up their defences sufficiently effectively for the independent protection of their homelands. This right of secession must be genuinely conceded, irrespective of whether it will be used. All these rights and functions can obviously be made amenable to any agreements of give and take with India.

(d) The Pakistans would, as different from the provinces, maintain a High Commissioner or Agent General, or some such functionary of the semi-ambassadorial level at New Delhi, who would be the link on the problems of defence and foreign relations and be a general liaison in the neighbourly relations contemplated. Obviously no taxation will be levied in the Pakistans, except by their own Governments. They would make an agreed contribution annually to the Government of India in respect of defence and foreign policy, which shall not be varied except with consent.

(e) The inclusion of areas other than those mentioned here need not in principle be ruled out. For example, if the League is able to make terms with the rest of the Punjab and bring such areas into its Pakistan, it should be permitted, but such consent must be a matter of plebiscite in which at least 75 per cent of the population votes in favour of such incorporation.

(f) It should be pointed out here that in this arrangement the Pakistans receive a far higher status of independence and considerably more powers and functions than the present provinces claimed for Pakistan would receive if power were handed over in July 1948 on the basis then likely to exist in the absence of any agreement of this kind. For provinces, in spite of autonomy, have much less power than contemplated for the Pakistan as herein....

25. Ghosh Meets Leaders in London
Letter from Sudhir Ghosh to Vallabhbhai Patel, 14 March 1947
Sudhir Ghosh Papers, File No. 23, NMML.

My dear Sardar,

I am sorry that I have been so long in writing to you. But I wanted to wait till I was sure that I knew the mind of people at this end. I have now seen all the three people concerned about Indian affairs, namely, Cripps, Attlee and Pethick-Lawrence, and I am now in a position to give you an appraisal of the situation.

I will first tell you about Cripps who is the pivot in the set-up here in so far as India is concerned. I saw him within a few hours of my arrival here on the 3rd March and I battled with him for two long hours after dinner till 11 o'clock. When his mind is riveted on a particular line of thinking he just cannot see the difficulties of other people and their points of view. I told him that when the 20th February statement was issued Panditji picked out only the positive parts of it and said something which was above politics and gave it a warm welcome, but there were things in the statement which were extremely vague and obscure and had increased the difficulties of the Congress Leaders in their dealings with the States and the Muslim League. He very emphatically said that if the States imagined that the British government would be prepared to negotiate with them directly and they were likely to get a little more from the British than from the Indian Constituent Assembly then they are a lot of lunatics. I pointed out to him that there was no inducement at all in the statement either to the Muslim League or to the Indian States to be more co-operative; on the other hand the indication that the British government would be prepared to hand over power to the Provincial governments in the event of the Indians failing to agree among themselves has naturally given the Muslims the impression that if they sat quiet and non-co-operated till June 1948 then the Muslim majority provinces of Bengal, the Punjab and Sind would be automatically separated from the rest of India and they would be in a position to work out some kind of Pakistan. I mentioned to him that even if the British government was prepared to hand over power in that very untidy manner to the Provinces and to the States it would not be possible for them to hand over the whole of Bengal and the whole of the Punjab to the Muslim League; for there was already a strong movement in Bengal amongst the Hindus for the partition of the province and that the same demand would be made by the Sikhs and the Hindus in Eastern Punjab. He made it perfectly clear that the British government would never agree to any partitioning of provinces before they leave; they feel that it is none of their business and if the Indians wish to revise provincial boundaries it is for them to arrange it amongst themselves. 'The process cannot go on ad infinitum; you must stop somewhere and the province is the limit. It is absurd to talk about handling over power to parts of provinces', he remarked. He however went onto say that he was sure that Mr Jinnah and his colleagues were furiously thinking whether their insistence on Pakistan was going to lead them anywhere; the Pakistan they are likely to get would be very different from what they wanted and it may not be worth their while. I said I hoped that it would be possible for him and his colleagues to say something in the course of the debate in the House of Commons which would make it obvious that the British government was not going to do anything to encourage disruption in India. He laughed and said ‘what you really want, my dear Sudhir, is that we should be partial to the Congress and enable them to coerce the Muslim League. This we cannot do. We are determined to be impartial. Congress must win the co-operation of the Muslims.’ I explained to him that there was no question of anybody wanting the British government to be partial to the Congress. We fully realize that the majority party has to win the co-operation of the minority party and all that was suggested was that nothing should be said which put a premium on non-co-operation. He however does not see the point and, as you now know, they all stuck to the line of what they consider ‘impartiality.’ On the evening of the debate Lord Pethick-Lawrence called a meeting of the Labour MPs and explained to them the importance of everybody being absolutely impartial in their speeches; he sincerely believes that any impression given to the Muslim League that Labour Government is in any way aligning itself with the Indian majority would spoil the chances of an agreement.

I asked Sir Stafford what he exactly meant when he said that Congress must win the co-operation of the Muslim League and what he had in his mind came out. It is clear to me that Cripps and his colleagues have always fostered a grievance in their minds against the Congress leaders that they trifled with the British plan as set out in the statement of 16th May. They are all convinced that the origin of our present serious difficulties in India was the public statement made by Panditji in July last at Bombay when he said, according to them, that Congress acceptance of the British plan meant no commitment on the part of Congress and that Congress was free to do what they liked with the British plan. This is a sore point with them and they just cannot get over it. All of them—particularly Cripps—have a deep feeling about it. They think that this one event changed the whole course of our affairs. It is no use arguing with them about it. Then I asked him if he would plainly tell what they now wanted Congress to do. What they really want (and here Cripps, Attlee and Pethick-Lawrence are all united) is that Congress must now by way of a supreme effort remove the doubts and suspicions in the Muslim mind, tell the world quite bluntly and in detail what they really mean when they say they accepted the British interpretation of the Cabinet Mission’s plan as set out in the statement of 6th December you will remember that some time ago Liaquat Ali asked in a public statement a number of detailed questions as to what the Congress meant by accepting the British interpretation. Cripps thinks Liaquat Ali did it clumsily but what the British government really want is a detailed answer by Congress to these questions in a dignified form. If Congress is prepared to do this before the arrival of the new Viceroy the British government would be in a position to do the rest.

I have carefully examined what Attlee, Cripps and Pethick-Lawrence had to say to me. They do not believe that it will be necessary for them to transfer power in bits in an untidy manner; nor are they interested to do so. They think that the intelligent mind of Mr Jinnah will soon realize that the Pakistan he is likely to get is not worth anything; if on top of this realization in Mr Jinnah’s mind Congress is in a position to say in detail what is meant by acceptance of the British interpretation of the plan, then it will be possible for them to give Mountbatten such instructions and directives as would enable him to get the Muslim League into the Constituent Assembly.

I also raised the question of their agreeing to treat the Interim Government as a Dominion Government and I discussed the brief draft showing how the present government can be converted into a Dominion Government which V.P. Menon gave me when I left. Cripps rejected the proposition. Pethick-Lawrence is examining it carefully. I am afraid they will never agree to treat the Government as a Dominion Government and to treat Panditji as _de facto_ Prime Minister. Their argument is that they are going in July 1948 and that India is going to be fully independent after this brief period and, in view of that, why should the British take the responsibility of handing over power to the Indian majority? If they treat the Government as a Dominion Government it means handing over real and full power to the Congress and Indian majority; this they are not prepared to do. The Muslim League has always resisted it and the British Government think that this would be unjust to the Muslims and they would be wrong in doing it. In any case it is not their business, they feel, to make any temporary arrangement for the period between now and June 1948. But if Congress is prepared to accept the British interpretation of the 16th May statement in detail, as desired by the British government it will be possible for the British government to give such advice to the new Viceroy as will enable him to make the Interim Government a real Cabinet and a team that works. This does not mean that they will be prepared to ask Panditji to form a government as they did last August. They were particularly cautious about discussing the directives they are giving to the new Viceroy. But it is not impossible that the new Viceroy will ask for the resignation of all the members of the Government and then re-form the government; when the Muslims are invited to rejoin the government they do so on the understanding that the government is to function as a Cabinet and not two lots of people who work against each other. The Viceroy is to remain his own Prime Minister but they believe that the relations between the Viceroy and Panditji is bound to be so crucial that they think it highly unlikely that there will be any difficulty at any time. As far as I can understand their mind they will give the new Viceroy a large measure of freedom to make his own decision in this matter.

I pointed out to Cripps that acceptance of the British interpretation in the way they want really means that Assam must be handed over to Bengal and the Bengalis should be left free to do what they like with the Constitution of Assam. Their answer is that the right thing to do is not to assume that the Bengal representatives in section C are a gang of tricksters and to leave it to them to do justice or injustice to Assam. What happens if injustice is done is a thing to be decided at the time and it is essential not to talk in advance about what will happen in the event of Bengal representatives doing injustice to Assam. Here they blame Bapu for all the difficulties that have arisen.

What I have said above will give you some indication of what is to be expected from the new Viceroy. If a policy of unqualified friendship is pursued by our people there is nothing to be lost and a great deal may be gained. I will write again.

My life here is a continuous series of interviews. My coming here seems to have aroused a great deal of interest and I have been spending most of my time seeing a steady stream of visitors. I have also established contacts with most of the newspaper editors. You may have seen the recent Leader in the ‘Times’ which was rather helpful. I shall soon be able to get together my little office and take over the work from Joyce. I have had a long talk with Joyce, and spoke to the Secretary of State about it when I saw him.

Love from us,

SUDHIR
Chapter 4. The Last Viceroy

1. British Foreign Minister Urges Viceroy’s Recall

Letter from Ernest Bevin to Clement Attlee, 1 January 1947

PRIVATE AND CONFIDENTIAL

Prime Minister

I must express my strong views with regard to India, as I mentioned to you this morning. I have examined this problem in relation to Egypt, Palestine, the Middle East, and all the Arab States and Persia, and I cannot help feeling that the defeatist attitude adopted both by the Cabinet and by Field-Marshal Wavell is just completely letting us down. I do not believe that, with leadership, the Indian Army is in the bad way that people suggest. I can quite understand that with a mind like Wavell’s the demoralization of the whole of the Army and the Police must be inevitable and I would strongly recommend that he be recalled and that you find somebody with courage who, even if he were the last man left there would come out with dignity and uphold the British Empire and Commonwealth.

2. Further, I cannot help feeling that the President of the Board of Trade is so pro-Congress that a balanced judgment is not being brought to bear on the importance of the Moslem world, while, on the other hand, probably, the Minister of Defence is too pro-Moslem. I listened to yesterday’s discussion and frankly, I was despondent and did not think that the facts justified the pessimism that seemed to pervade the whole Cabinet. I am against fixing a date. I am willing to support a declaration, as we have done, that we are ready to hand India over as a going concern to established governments. I do not mind, even, using the plural in this sense, if Nehru and Jinnah are not going to agree, but the qualification should be that they can preserve law and order. I cannot get it out of my head that there must be millions of Indians who, as a result of the murder incidents in the last few months, would welcome a strong and courageous lead so as to preserve their safety. Personally, I do not think it depends on the number of British troops there, but it is the complete lack of leadership in the Indian Army which I believe will cause the disaster that will overtake the British Empire. In fact, you cannot read the telegrams from Egypt and the Middle East nowadays without realizing that not only is India going, but Malay, Ceylon and the Middle East is going with it, with a tremendous repercussion on the African territories. I do beg of you to take a stronger line and not give way to this awful pessimism. When I saw Wavell and Alexander on the 21st December, I was filled with dismay.

3. Now, as regards administering the country under Section 93; with an army of over 30,000 in India I cannot be persuaded that, if such a situation arose, we could not find the men from the Indian Army and at home to administer Section 93. What would happen if the Congress withdrew? The people of the Provinces would want government, and stable government. They would be just terrified at the idea of no government. The Indian Army itself would not know what to do. Therefore, if we were able to move into Germany and other occupied countries and find administrators among the young men from the Services, as we had to do, why can’t we find them from the Forces in India and at home? Secondly, continued searching for men with reputations leads us, I believe, into a morass. Try someone untried and it is remarkable how they will rise to the occasion.

4. Therefore, my view is that while we issue a declaration that it is our determination to clear out of India and to hand the responsibilities to Indians we should declare that it is our determination to hand it over as a going concern and to place the responsibility squarely on their shoulders of failure in that respect. I would impress you with this fact. As Foreign Secretary, I can offer nothing to any foreign country, neither credit, nor coal, nor goods. I am expected to make bricks without straw—to use that old proverbial phase. And on top of that, within the British Empire, we knuckle under at the first blow and yet we are expected to preserve the position. It cannot be done and I beg of you in all sincerity, even if it does involve a certain risk, to take it, and I believe the world will respect us.

5. Now as regard the United States: I sent you a report from America which was handed to me by Byrnes. I have not had a reply but why cannot we use the United States to put pressure on Nehru and on Jinnah? Why not bring the whole of our diplomatic power to bear at this stage to make the Indian politicians realize that it is not merely Great Britain they are facing but a very much wider area. It would be especially useful if they could be made to say that Great Britain is taking a magnanimous attitude and I believe the United States can be honest in such a way to bring a tremendous amount of pressure to bear on the Indian politicians. We appear to be trying nothing except to scuttle out of it, without dignity or plan, and I am convinced that if you do that our Party in this country, as a leading Party in this new world settlement, will lose and lose irrevocably when the public become aware of the policy of the Cabinet at this moment.

ERNEST BEVIN

2. Appointment of the New Viceroy

Letter from Louis Mountbatten to Clement Attlee, 3 January 1947

DESPATCHES AND RECORDS OFFICE, SOUTH EAST ASIA COMMAND, 7 RICHMOND TERRACE,
WHITEHALL, S.W.1

My dear Prime Minister,

I have thought over very earnestly all that you said to me on the 1st January.

I absolutely understand why it is not possible to secure an open invitation from the Indian Parties. But Sir Stafford Cripps tells me that he is prepared, if you concur, to inform the principal Party leaders in person, shortly before my appointment is announced, that it is my earnest hope that they will welcome it and will give me their support—or, at the very least, that they have no personal objections.
It makes all the difference to me to know that you propose to make a statement in the House, terminating the British ‘Raj’ on a definite and specified date; or earlier than this date, if the Indian Parties can agree to a constitution and form a Government before this. I feel very strongly that I could not have gone out there with confidence, if it had been possible to construe my arrival as a perpetuation, at this moment, of the viceregal system, or of our imposing our nominee to arbitrate in their affairs.

I am not really sure, however, what HM Government wish me to try and achieve in India and I do not feel I can undertake to carry out your wishes until I have seen the written directive which HM Government propose to give to the new Viceroy, as well as the actual text of the statement in the House. But I am writing this letter on the assumption that I shall feel capable of trying to comply with your directive.

I deeply appreciate your offer to give me every assistance in forming my new staff. I told Sir Stafford, when he came to see me yesterday, how honoured and touched I was that he should have offered to come to India with me, but I made it clear to him that I felt the presence of a man of his prestige and experience could not fail to reduce me to a mere figure head in the eyes of the people he would be negotiating with; and that I felt this was not the impression that either he or you would wish the appointment of a new Viceroy to create. On the other hand, I did not wish to lose the help of his unrivalled knowledge; and I made a proposal to him which I hope you will allow me to place before you verbally.

Since you approved my choice of General Ismay as my Chief of Staff I have asked him; and I know you will be delighted to hear that he is prepared to give up his well earned rest in Australia, and to come and help me if I am appointed to the post.

I feel it is essential that I should be allowed to fly home as often as I feel it really necessary to do so (say, every 3 or 4 months) for personal discussions with you and the Secretary of State; and that General Ismay should also come home from time to time.

I am very grateful to you for suggesting that I should be left on the Active Flag List of the Royal Navy so that my future employment in the service would not be prejudiced; and I would ask you to be so kind as to make it clear, in the announcement of my appointment (should it materialize) that I am on loan for this short period.

I hope I do not need to assure you that if I go, it will be with a complete realization of the difficulties and of the importance of achieving the task which I am so honoured that you should be proposing to give me. Although it would be our intention to observe the Protocol necessary to uphold the position of Viceroy and Vicereine, my wife and I would wish to visit Indian Leaders, and representative British and Indian people, in their own homes and unaccompanied by staff; and to make ourselves easier of access than the existing protocol appears to have made possible.

Yours very sincerely,
MOUNTBATTEN

3. Cabinet Considers Future Policy towards India

Minutes of a Meeting of the Cabinet India and Burma Committee, 3 January 1947

At the meeting on 31st December, 1946, the Cabinet had considered a draft statement annexed to CP (46) 456 regarding the future policy of His Majesty’s Government towards India. They had agreed, that the draft should be recast on broader lines.
The Committee now had before them a revised draft (IB (47) 1) prepared in the light of the Cabinet discussion. They considered the draft in detail and a number of amendments were made.

In the course of the discussion the following points were made:

(a) During the series of the Committee’s meetings which had been attended by the Viceroy, it had emerged from the discussions that during the process of our withdrawal from India, even though it was not possible to carry out to the full the provision of the Government of India Act, 1935, the constitutional framework must be preserved until the final handing over of power. The Viceroy should have a clear understanding that this was the Committee’s view.

The Committee had, however, reached no clear decision on the question whether, within the constitutional framework, the first step should be as complete a withdrawal as possible from the Southern Provinces or whether the process of withdrawal should go on pari passu over the whole of India.

The Committee had first inclined to the former course. In favour of this it was recalled that the Viceroy was most anxious to relieve himself from the embarrassing situation in which he found himself at present whereby he was virtually bound to act at the dictation of the Congress leaders if they threatened that the Ministries in the Congress Provinces would resign, since he was quite unable to provide himself for the administration of the Provinces under Section 93 of the Government of India Act.

It was, however, now argued first that this threat must, in fact, remain so long as the present constitutional framework was maintained and, secondly, that the Southern Provinces were precisely those in which the threat was least likely to be employed.

As our withdrawal could not, in any case, be complete if the constitutional framework was to be maintained, would not the wiser course be to carry it out pari passu over all parts of India so that we were left with a gradually decreasing skeleton administration spread over the whole country?

No definite decision was reached on this point but Ministers agreed that it was one on which it might be necessary to give the Viceroy a clearer indication of the views of His Majesty’s Government.

(b) In this connection they considered that it was wrong to press too far the analogy of a military withdrawal. The operation now to be begun was not so much a military as a political operation of great delicacy. It must be regarded not as a withdrawal under pressure from the enemy but as a voluntary transfer of power to a democratic government. To an ever increasing degree the Viceroy would assume the position of a constitutional ruler and he and the British officials would act in conformity with the policy of that Government.

(c) Ministers discussed whether it would be possible to include in the statement a positive assurance to present and former member of the Secretary of State’s Services that they would receive the pensions which they had earned and would be given compensation for the interruption of their career. They agreed that it would not be possible at this stage to go beyond a general statement to the effect that His Majesty’s Government would negotiate with the successor authorities in regard to matters arising out of the transfer of power.

At the same time it was the Committee’s strong opinion that there was a moral obligation on his Majesty’s Government to ensure fair treatment for the Services and that in the last resort, if adequate provision was not made for them from Indian funds, it must be made from United Kingdom funds. But it would be inexpedient to make any public statement to this effect at the moment, as it might prejudice the discussions which the Parliamentary Under Secretary of State for India was about to undertake with the Government of India.

(d) As soon as the draft statement had been approved by the Cabinet, the Prime Minister should send a personal message to Dominion Prime Ministers informing them of the course of action which His Majesty’s Government intended to pursue.

The Committee:

Took note that the Prime Minister would arrange for the draft statement as amended during discussion to be laid before the Cabinet for their approval.

Cabinet Office, S.W.1.

4. Preparations for Departure as Viceroy of India

Letter from Louis Mountbatten to King George VI, 4 January 1947

My dear Bertie,

You will have heard I was recalled after only a week-end in Switzerland. I had a meeting with the PM and Stafford Cripps on my arrival who pointed out that it was not feasible to comply with the conditions I gave in my letter of 20th and that as it was now more urgent than ever that I should go out, would I accept under any other conditions.

They offered me ‘carte blanche’ and said I could take anyone out on my staff I liked. Sir Stafford ‘bouleversed’ me by offering to come out himself on my staff if I’d accept and the PM agreed! That was a swift one because if I do have to go I don’t want to be hamstrung by bringing out a third version of the Cripps offer!!

After over an hour we broke up and the next day Stafford came round to see me and again assured me of his desire to place his services at my disposal—so I had a brain-wave and said ‘I’ll accept your offer on one condition and that is that you take the appointment which I consider would help me most’—He fell for that and agreed—then I said ‘I’d like [you] to go to the India Office and thus be my rear-link with HMG’. He was a bit staggered but finally agreed, subject to the PM.

I then sat down and wrote the PM a letter (a copy of which I enclose) and when I next saw him and Stafford I asked the PM to put him at the India Office and he said he’d give this request favourable consideration.

Meanwhile, as he said I could have any team I liked I dashed round and asked Pug Ismay and Eric Mieville to chuck everything and come with me to start the last Chukka in India—12 goals down! Both agreed at once though one has to chuck a 4 months holiday in Australia and the other one his new job.

With a team and a spirit like that we’re half way home—I only await the directive and announcement before giving a final answer. Actually the PM has offered that the Under Secretary for India Arthur Henderson, who is now out there, should give my message to the leaders and I’ve accepted.

They wanted me to meet Wavell at Karachi but I said ‘no—I must meet him at home—because if he produces new difficulties to me and explains in what way he is dissatisfied with HMG’s attitude then I’ll have no chance of talking this over with you. Besides if you want him to resign nicely you must ask him in person—otherwise he’ll say “I won’t resign—go ahead and sack me!”

So Wavell is to be sent for and I suppose Edwina and I’ll go out early in February. I’m insisting on my own York like in SEAC and like Harry has....

Ever your dutiful, affectionate and harassed

DICKIE

5. Announcement of a Time Limit

Letter from Clement Attlee to Wavell, 8 January 1947

TOP SECRET

My dear Viceroy,

Thank you for your letter and good wishes for the New Year. I am glad that the York facilitated your return journey. I have been waiting to reply to you until after the Cabinet but this was delayed owing to the pressure of other urgent business. We had also to have two meetings.

Before you left you wrote me a letter in which you set down a number of points on which you desired my personal assurance. These points had been the subject of discussion with you at the India Committee and you were acquainted with the recommendations to be submitted to the Cabinet and of the extent to which they covered these points.

I informed you in my reply that the recommendations would be brought before the Cabinet. This has now been done.

While there was agreement that in the event of the Moslem League failing to enter the Constituent Assembly it would be desirable to announce a time limit for the continuance of British rule in India, it was considered that it would not be advisable to fix a day. While it was considered that plans might be made for that event and that troops might be moved, there was strong confirmation for the view expressed by the India Committee that the proposal for the abandonment of all responsibility for the four Southern provinces was unacceptable.

The Cabinet did not approve of the approach to the problem on the basis of a military evacuation. It was considered that a different approach was required—namely, that of close co-operation with the Indian Governments at the Centre and in the Provinces in order to work out with them plans for handing over the Government in India, as a going concern. There was a feeling that withdrawal by stages was an encouragement to fragmentation.

I am afraid that this will be a disappointment to you and in the circumstances I think it would be desirable that you should come over here again as soon as possible in order that we may review the situation.

Yours sincerely,

C.R.A.
6. Wavell’s Assessment of the Indian Political Situation
Letter from Wavell to Clement Attlee, 17 January 1947

VICEROY'S CAMP, INDIA

My dear Prime Minister,

I have received your letter of the 8th January. I am very sorry that the Cabinet have not been able to give me a more definite policy. You have heard and considered my views, and I will not repeat the arguments that I have already laid before you. I must, however, put it on record that in my opinion the Cabinet’s decision, or lack of decision, increases the risk to our nationals in India, and is likely to diminish the chances of a settlement between the two parties.

As to the ‘different approach’ which you recommend, I have always tried to give the freest possible hand to my Government at the Centre; and the Governors in the Provinces have cooperated with their ministries to the extent of making their Special Responsibilities almost a dead letter. But the two main parties are perpetually at loggerheads, and complete cooperation with one party tends to drive the other into extreme courses. If the Governors and I are compelled to acquiesce in everything that the major party proposes, not only are we unable to fulfil those responsibilities to Parliament which the Cabinet are so anxious to retain, but also by our powerlessness we encourage that party to excess and the other, in desperation, to ‘direct action’.

Although the immediate situation here looks a little better, and though I am doing all I can to make the League take a reasonable line, the communal bitterness is such that optimism is quite unjustified. It seems most unlikely on present form that an agreed Constitution on the Mission’s plan can be framed.

There is one matter on which—quite apart from whether the Muslim League enter the Constituent Assembly or not—His Majesty’s Government must make up its mind in the very near future; and that is the date on which the Secretary of State’s Services in India will be wound up, and the terms of compensation which will be offered. This decision is necessary in order to keep the Services together for the period that remains; also, to refuse the united demand of the parties and of the Provincial Governments to fix a date would be quite contrary to the Cabinet’s general policy of close cooperation. I hope therefore that this decision will be made in the near future.

All I can do at present is to draw up plans against the possibility of an emergency withdrawal, so as to provide, so far as may be, against the dangers that would attend it. I have arranged with the Commander-in-Chief to form a joint Civil and Military Planning Committee for this purpose.

I shall also consider the arrangements necessary for an orderly transfer of power and withdrawal of our forces in the event of a peaceful transition being possible. Arrangements for this eventuality would of course be fully discussed with the Interim Government, and if necessary with Provincial Governments, but such consultation clearly cannot take place yet; there must first be either a statement in Parliament about the time limit, or the prospect of a satisfactory result from the Constituent Assembly.

I am not clear from your letter what time limit you have in mind if you make a statement. For the purposes of planning it is important that I should know what you and the Cabinet intend; I should be grateful for an early reply on this point. I do not think that there would be any advantage in my coming home again in the near future. My return would cause much speculation and might result in political negotiations being still further complicated and delayed by the idea that HMG was contemplating some further proposal. The decisions of the Muslim League whether to join the Constituent Assembly or not, and of the Princes whether or not to negotiate with the Constituent Assembly, are not likely to be reached until some time in February. Discussions between us before these decisions could, I think, have little purpose, since I have nothing fresh to put before you. It will therefore be better to wait till these decisions are known, and perhaps until after the budget session of the Assembly here. The situation will then be clearer and my Planning Committee will have had time to make detailed proposals.

I suggest therefore that I might return in March or April for further discussions, unless some serious crisis occurs meanwhile. If all is well, I should like to take a month or two’s leave at home after the discussions, since I have had no rest for a long time.

Yours sincerely,

WAVELL

7. Political Situation in India

Letter from G.E.B. Abell to Ronald Harris Forwarding a Note by N.P.A. Smith, Director of Intelligence Bureau, 24 January 1947

My dear Ronald,

HE thinks the Secretary of State may be interested in the enclosed note on the situation in India by Smith, the Director of the Intelligence Bureau.

British Angle

1. The game so far has been well played, in that (a) both Congress, and the League have been brought into the Central Government; (b) the Indian problem has been thereby thrust into its appropriate plane of communalism (c) some kind of an opportunity for orderly evacuation now presents itself through the existence at the Centre of a government to which power can be transferred.

2. I fear there is a tendency, now that we are temporarily in relatively untroubled waters—from the purely British angle—to forget that a storm will sooner or later again arise, and to move much too slowly in shedding our responsibilities. The fullest advantage should be taken of our present breathing space. In my view, the Secretary of State’s control over civil officers should be abrogated at the earliest possible moment. This is only fair to the officers and has the political advantage that a decisive gesture of this kind will help to keep the problem on its correct communal plane.
3. The Quit India policy has now the general acceptance of almost all British officers. In the Congress Provinces, this acceptance is accompanied by a realization of its complete inevitability and a general support of the line so far taken by HMG. In the non-Congress Provinces, and particularly in the Punjab, civil officers are apt to criticize bitterly HMG’s policy and the moves made by HE. This difference of outlook arises from difference of political circumstances. The Punjab is inclined to regard the rest of official India as defeatist and much of the rest of India regards the Punjab as living in a dead or dying past.

4. Grave communal disorder must not disturb us into action which would reintroduce anti-British agitation. The latter may produce an inordinately dangerous situation and leads us nowhere. The former is a natural, if ghastly, process tending in its own way to the solution of the Indian problem.

The Indian Angle

What is likely to eventuate? Very difficult to answer. My own views are:

(a) Whatever the position a few years ago, communal antagonism has now reached such a point of bitterness that it is difficult to see how Hindus and Muslims can jointly work the future. This antagonism may lessen, but the cleavage and the difference of culture is so marked as to make healthy cooperation unlikely.

(b) It is clear that India, with its strongly fissiparous tendencies, can only continue to exist through a strong Centre.

(c) It is equally clear that this strong Centre will not be conceded by the Muslims, and is probably unattainable.

(d) The weak Centre of the present target carries within itself the seeds of disruption. It is difficult to foresee a joint policy in foreign affairs, and consequently in defence and finance.

(e) Indian leadership is so inept that there is little prospect of these inherent difficulties being overcome.

(f) I have little faith therefore in a successful outcome, in the long view, of the attempt to maintain a unified India. As I have said for some months, Pakistan is likely to flow from Congressstan (the acceptance of office by Congress).

(g) I do not think Pakistan will advantage the Indian Muslim, who is likely to be squeezed and embarrassed by stronger forces East and West of him; but if he is determined to have it, he will get it.

(h) If Congress were wise, they would either attempt to dissolve by a psychological approach the psychological mistrust which exists or they would establish a strong Centre for areas of Hindu preponderance and to the exclusion of the N-West. But I doubt if Congress is wise enough to do either of these things.

(i) Even if a strong Hindu Centre were established it is doubtful whether it could maintain itself for long in the face of a left-wing attack based on conditions rife for trouble, in labour, the peasantry, linguistic and provincial jealousies, and other things. Jai Prakash Narain and his ill-assorted horde threaten the future. Congress might conceivably handle them and the Communists with sufficient firmness, but they have not much time to spare, and with Nehru in the Cabinet, I doubt their capacity or even willingness.
(j) In brief, I am pessimistic and fear, first, Hindu-Muslim separation, and secondly, some measure of Balkanization. The threat of the extreme Left-Wing may serve to bring present Hindu-Muslim leadership closer together, but this remains to be seen.

(k) If pessimistic, I am also philosophical about all this. If we cannot control natural forces, we must accept them, keeping our eyes steadily on reasonable British interest.

(l) The psychological approach which I would commend to Congress would have to be one of great generosity—an offer, if necessary, of one over parity. I suggested this to Sardar Patel and told him, moreover, that any attempt to force the Muslims would result, through the disintegration of the police and Army, in the loss of NW India. His reply was that, if I thought that generosity would placate the Muslim Oliver Twist, I did not understand either the Muslim mind or the situation. With which sentiment I am tempted to agree.

8. Attlee Justifies Wavell’s Dismissal
Letter from Clement Attlee to Wavell, 31 January 1947

PRIVATE AND PERSONAL

I have your letter of the 19th in reply to mine of the 8th. It is clear from what you say with regard to Government policy that there is a wide divergence of view as to the course which should be followed during the interim period. I had hoped that it would have been possible for you to have returned here during January to discuss the situation which has arisen.

I am very conscious of the heavy burden which you have carried and of the great services which you have rendered during this difficult period. I know that you undertook this task from a high sense of duty.

You were, I understand, informed that your appointment was a war appointment and that while the usual term for a Viceroy is five years, this might not apply. I think that three years was mentioned. This has now expired. I know, of course, that prior to your appointment as Viceroy you had had the heavy strain of high commands in war and, as you say in your letter, you have had no rest. I appreciate that you desire a month or two’s leave at home;

But the Indian problem is entering on a new phase, which will be very exacting and may be prolonged. The next few months are of great importance.

In view of all these circumstances and of the fact that it is specially necessary that the Viceroy should be in full agreement with the policy of His Majesty’s Government, I think that you may agree that the time has come to make a change in the Viceroyalty.

I recall that you expressed your readiness to retire in the event of disagreement on policy and this would seem to me to be the appropriate course to follow.

An announcement should be made with as little delay as possible in order to allow time for the appointment of your successor and for him to take over at the end of February or early in March. The normal announcement about your successor would be prefaced with the statement ‘Field-Marshal the Viscount Wavell who accepted the Viceroyalty as a war appointment is now retiring’. I have not looked into details, but if as a result you are denied any leave of absence which you would normally have had, you may be sure that you will not suffer financially.
I should like to submit your name to His Majesty for the dignity of an Earldom in recognition of the self-sacrificing and loyal service which you have displayed in your long and distinguished career in India both to the Indian people and to this Country and the Commonwealth.

9. ‘Wavell’s Warnings to Quit’
   Note on Policy from Wavell to Pethick-Lawrence, 3 February 1947
   PRO, CAB 134/344, Acc. No. 4042, NAI.

The Viceroy House,
New Delhi

Dear Pethick Lawrence,

I forward herewith a copy of a note on policy by my Joint Planning Committee.

Since His Majesty’s Government has refused to accept the proposal for a phased withdrawal by territorial stages, this Committee has now proposed a phased withdrawal by what may be termed ‘gubernatorial stages’. This process is as a matter of fact already inevitable, unless there is a complete reversal of policy, and has already gone far. What is proposed by the Committee is simply to give a date limit for the various stages.

2. We are in fact on the horns of a dilemma. Our object is peaceful transfer of power with as little disturbance as possible. On the other hand, our power to influence events is rapidly diminishing, and the prospects of agreement between the main parities and of the production of an acceptable constitution seem to be receding with almost equal rapidity. I can see no prospect of a constitution being formed by the end of 1948. Should we then announce a date for our final departure or not?

3. The arguments for and against are nicely balanced thus:

For such an announcement

(a) We have no longer any real power to control events, and to retain responsibility without power is useless, undignified, and dangerous.

(b) The main Parties will never come to an agreement if a Third party is there to whom either or both can appeal; without us they will be forced to come to a modus vivendi.

(c) If we stay, we may become involved in a situation like that of Palestine, when we can neither emerge with credit nor stay with safety.

(d) The longer we stay, the more power we are bound to place in the hands of the majority party, the Hindus, to the detriment of the Minorities, and probably of the States.

Logically therefore it would seem to the advantage of all parties—Hindus, Muslims, States, ourselves—that we should leave at an early date and let them settle their disputes without our intervention.

Against such an announcement

The arguments are almost purely psychological. We still have very considerable influence and prestige with Indians; and whatever they may say in favour of our immediate withdrawal many of them do still look to us for help and advice and we do still command their confidence in great measure. Further, it goes against the grain to leave India to confusion if there is still any chance of our preventing it by remaining. In the eyes of our own people and of the world we may also seem to be renouncing a duty ‘one task more declined, one more footpath untrod’.

It really comes to this, should we take the risk of being forced to withdraw in danger and ignominy, or stop on without power in the hope of still being able to help India to her destiny.

4. The choice of a line of action is not easy. I agree with most of what the Committee has put forward, but I do not think they have made quite clear their idea in recommending a date for the withdrawal of British troops without at the same time announcing a date for the final transfer of power. This would be contrary to the policy of His Majesty’s Government given in their telegram 1308 of 28.1.47. But the idea of the Committee was that while the withdrawal of the troops would be equivalent to a transfer of power, it should not be announced as such, in order that there should still be a Constitution in force, that of 1935, though the only symbols of it would be the Governor-General and the Governors, as in a Dominion, and even these might be Indians.

5. For the moment the only advice I can offer to His Majesty’s Government is to take a decision about the Secretary of State’s Services as early as possible.

A little later in the year His Majesty’s Government must take a definite decision about the final transfer of power, since I consider at least one year’s notice must be given. I think that if His Majesty’s Government take a decision at once about the winding up of the Secretary of State’s Services, they can perhaps afford to wait till say June to make a definite decision on the date of withdrawal of British troops. By that time the effect of the Services decision will be known and the general development of the political situation will be apparent.

But by June at the latest His Majesty’s Government must definitely decide how much longer they will retain responsibility for India.

6. The note was written before the League passed their Karachi resolution, but that does not affect the general thesis or the plan.

Yours sincerely,

WAVELL

Rt Hon The Lord Pethick Lawrence, PC

Note by

JOINT PLANNING COMMITTEE

(Reference para. 5 of the Directive)

31.1.1947

(As finally amended)

In some ways the general situation may for the moment appear more satisfactory than it was during most of 1946, since the Muslim League, which last Autumn threatened direct action and revolution, is now a partner with the Congress in the Interim Government. But that is only a superficial view. The coalition in the Interim Government is little more than a façade; its members have no common policy and seldom meet except at formal cabinet meetings. The Central Government has been Balkanised and is becoming daily more ineffective. Much essential business is held up because an inter-departmental policy is needed and none can be agreed. Even if a policy is arrived at, the authority of the Centre vis-à-vis the Province (even the Congress Provinces) is weakening. This is true for instance of the vital fields of food and textile controls.
2. In the Provinces the administration continues to run down. The Police are, in many provinces, demoralized and this is largely due to Ministerial ineptitude. An outstanding example is Bihar. Private armies are tolerated by the Ministries. Communists and Left Wing Congressmen are allowed to carry on revolutionary and subversive propaganda. Labour is very restless, largely because of communist influence, and strikes in essential industries threaten the whole economy of the country. All such unrest is fomented and exploited for political ends.

3. These are grave symptoms but the greatest danger as always is communalism. In spite of the ‘Coalition’ at the Centre, Hindu–Muslim feeling is perhaps more bitter than it has ever been and even the most optimistic doubt whether there is any real prospect of Hindus and Muslims living amicably together.

4. The general outlook in fact is gloomy, but there is for the moment no strong anti-British agitation and with the two major parties in the Interim Government there is something of a breathing space. It may be short-lived, and cannot justify inaction. Waiting on events will be fatal. India can now only solve her problems for herself, and will be hampered in solving them unless positive steps are taken for an early completion of the transfer of power.

5. There is no sign of the Constituent Assembly producing a constitution by the end of 1948. It is probable that we shall have to hand over before a new constitution is framed, and we must have a plan for the purpose.

6. How can the final transfer of power be effected? It is not ordinarily appreciated how much power has already been transferred. Popular governments are in effective control both at the Centre and in the Provinces. The unmistakable indications that HMG will transfer their authority altogether within a short while have made it a matter of common prudence for ‘loyal’ Indians whether official or non-official to make their peace with the political parties. In fact the process of transfer of power has gone so far that it is inevitable that it should continue and its pace will increase with the rapid Indianization of the officer ranks for the fighting services.

7. But however much power may already have been transferred, it is most important that the final stage should not be so sudden as to threaten India’s stability. There should also be adequate warning about HMG intentions. It would not be fair to the Interim Government or to the Provincial Government suddenly to move all British troops out of the country without previous warning. In order to make the planning of the future Indian Armed Forces possible HMG’s intentions need to be made clear a year in advance.

8. It would also be unfair not to give adequate warning to the States, who have been told that paramountcy will be retained throughout the interim period. They anticipated at present that the period may be prolonged. If it is to be short they will have little time in which to make, in consultation with the Central Government, the new arrangement necessary to ensure the maintenance of essential services and to obviate the disintegration which must result without such arrangements from the independence which the lapse of paramountcy will thrust upon them.

9. Adequate warning is necessary for two other reasons. British businesses in India must be given a chance to decide their policy, and there must be time to arrange a programme of additional shipping so that those British men, women and children who will leave the country, either temporarily or permanently, can be provided with passages. From our enquires it is clear that an announcement about the withdrawal of British troops would lead to a much larger demand for passages, and there will be demands from Indians as well as Europeans.

10. Thus the transfer of power must be phased, and the outline of the programme must be known well in advance. To meet these requirements the viceroy proposed that HMG should decide on a definite programme of phased transfer of territory to Indian control and that the first stage (withdrawal of British troops and civil servants from the South of India) should be announced and carried out at an early date. This scheme had the advantages of retaining a measure of power for the Governor General but HMG considered it impracticable and rejected it.

11. Can there not be a phased transfer of authority instead of a phased transfer of territory? The most important features of such a policy would be as follows:

(1) There would be gradual adoption of the convention that India is treated as a Dominion.
(2) Similarly the convention would be allowed to grow up that the Governor General and Governors act on advice.
N.B. These two processes have gone a long way already.
(3) Consistently with this general policy it is necessary to meet at once the demand of the parties for the winding up of the Secretary of State’s services. If, however, the Central Government and the Provincial Ministries so desired British officials who wish to go could be compulsorily retained in service until say March 1948, with the object of preventing administrative dislocation.
(4) The officer ranks of the Indian Army are already being rapidly Indianized, more rapidly Indianised than is generally appreciated.
(5) Paramountcy in relation to the Indian States will gradually lapse, and there will be a gradual return, to them of the rights surrendered to the Paramount Power. A policy on these lines has already been outlined to Residents by the Political Adviser.
(6) It would be announced in July 1947 that British troops will be withdrawn in the last quarter of the calendar year 1948. This would give the Interim Government time to plan and would give fair warning to the British population. British troops would not however be reduced below the figure of roughly 20,000, which they will reach in January, 1948, until the final withdrawal.

12. A gradual process of this sort would reduce greatly the administrative difficulties attending the transfer of power. The objection so far has been the fear of ‘handling over to the Congress’ without safeguards being secured for the Minorities. But (a) we are now left with no alternative, and (b) the announcement that British troops are to be withdrawn will make it clear that they will not be used to support a Hindu Raj.

13. We attach great importance to the early winding up of the Secretary of State’s Services. This would mark a decisive stage in the gradual transfer of power. The Secretary of State’s control is already an anachronism, and attempts to protect the services, while often ineffective, cause unnecessary friction with the Ministers.

14. The early withdrawal of British troops is also an essential part of the policy. Whatever our desire to ensure peace and stability we cannot make British troops available indefinitely to perform internal security duties, and support in power what may be a party or a communal government.

15. On the withdrawal of the Britain troops the final transfer of power would in fact have taken place, and it would presumably be necessary for the Indian Government to legislate so as to introduce an oath of allegiance to India (instead of the King) for Indian personnel of the armed forces. If India remained for the time being a Dominion, British officers of the Indian Armed Forces could be retained as Commanders provided certain necessary conditions were incorporated in an agreement with the Government of India. If, however, India did not remain in the Commonwealth or failed to execute an agreement, British personnel would be limited to the role of advisers in the Indian Armed Forces, and even in that capacity could only serve if there was a treaty which provided inter alia for direct access to and protection by HM Ambassador in India.

16. The rough programme would be as follows:

<thead>
<tr>
<th>Date Range</th>
<th>Event Description</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>April to May, 1947</td>
<td>Secretary of State’s services wound up</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>July, 1947</td>
<td>Announcement that British troops would be withdrawn in the last quarter of the calendar year 1948.</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>September, 1947 to April, 1948</td>
<td>Regular programme of extra shipping to provide transport for those who wish to leave India.</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>31st March, 1948</td>
<td>Release of those S/S officials who have been compulsorily retained in service at the request of the Indian Government (of Paragraph 10 (3)).</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Last quarter of Calendar year, 1948</td>
<td>Departure of British troops.</td>
</tr>
</tbody>

N.B. There is much to be said for giving the Interim Government the longest possible notice (in confidence) about the intention to announce in July, 1947 that British troops will be withdrawn at the end of 1948. This will be likely to earn the goodwill of the Interim Government. On the other hand if the information leaked out it would be necessary to make a public announcement and in order to prevent a large demand for passages to the United Kingdom during the hot weather it is considered desirable that the public announcement should not be earlier than July, 1947.

17. The underlying principle of this policy would be to throw an increasing weight of responsibility on the parties and especially on the Congress as the majority party at the Centre. Since an increasing measure of power would also be transferred it may be that neither party could afford to resign and leave the other in undisputed possession of such great authority. His Majesty’s Government’s action in announcing the departure of British troops towards the end of 1948 could not legitimately be criticized as hasty since the Congress have asserted that they anticipated being able to frame a new constitution within two years of the inception of the Constituent Assembly.

18. Whatever we do there is a very grave risk that owing either to revolution or to creeping paralysis of the administration the country may lapse into confusion. But the policy we advocate apart from being apparently almost inevitable, provides the maximum amount of continuity, gives a chance of maintaining the integrity of the Indian Armed Forces and of securing a friendly and stable successor Government, and steadies the process of transfer of power.

19. Though there would be an announcement that British troops will be withdrawn in the last quarter of the calendar year 1948 there would be no date on which in the absence of a new constitution the old constitution would cease to function. If after the withdrawal of British troops the Indian Government in power wished the Governor General, Commander-in-Chief and Governors to continue in office and gave reasonable assurances, no doubt His Majesty’s Government would be prepared to consider the matter. Otherwise it would be desired to appoint Indians to these posts in consultation with the Governments concerned and let them take over about the same time as the withdrawal of British troops. It is just possible that if India continued for a time under the present constitution she might ultimately find herself persuaded to remain in the Commonwealth rather than become independent.

20. We cannot advise what Parliament action is necessary to get authority for this policy, but the only points that must inevitably be announced are the winding up of the Secretary of State's services and the withdrawal of British troops. From the Indian point of view there are great advantages in avoiding a spectacular debate in Parliament. The transfer should be carried out as quietly as possible and the existing constitution should be allowed to run on until another is substituted. The Act of 1935 is by no means ideal for such a purpose, but it can be adapted by convention. The control of the Secretary of State will for instance disappear. If the Government of India holds together and can put through the necessary legislation it may do so, but it is more likely that an attempt will be made to carry on with the constitution more or less as it stands until another is passed. In any case there should be no deliberate destruction by us of the façade of the continuing Government of India.

10. Wavell's Reaction to His Dismissal

Letter from Wavell to Clement Attlee, 5 February 1947

My dear Prime Minister,

I have received your letter of 31 January, in which you inform me of your intention to advise His Majesty to terminate my appointment as Viceroy in a few weeks time.

As you say, my appointment was a war one and no fixed term of office was given me. I think you are in error about a term of three years ever having been mentioned; but the point is immaterial, since the three year term passed several months ago without your giving any indication of wishing to make a change.

You are causing me to be removed because of what you term a wide divergence of policy. The divergence, as I see it, is between my wanting a definite policy for the Interim period and HMG refusing to give me one. I will not at this time enter into further argument on this.

I do not of course question your decision to make a change. I have no desire except to serve the State to the best of my ability; obviously I cannot continue to do so if I have not the confidence of the Government in power.

I think, however, that I am entitled to observe that so summary a dismissal of His Majesty's representative in India is hardly in keeping with the dignity of the appointment. It has been usual to give a retiring Viceroy six months' notice of his replacement. I may recall to you that I wrote to you six months ago, at the beginning of August last, suggesting that you might now wish to replace the soldier by a politician, but that you gave no indication of any desire to make a change. Whether my conduct of my office since then has deserved dismissal at a few weeks notice is for others to judge.

You can hardly have failed to appreciate the inconvenience and expense which you are causing to me and to the whole of my large personal staff by directing me to leave at such short notice; and I hope that I shall be given at least till the second week in March, to avoid the indignity, as well as the inconvenience of a scuttle. I note what you say about any entitlement of mine to leave. I too have not looked into details on this matter, but will do so and will communicate with the Secretary of State. I hope that the expense and dislocation unexpectedly caused to my personal staff will be recognized and considered.

It is desirable for official and personal reasons that I should know the name of my successor, who has presumably been selected, as early as possible. You will of course give advance notice of date and terms of announcement.

I thank you for what you say about my services, and will gladly accept your proposal to submit my name for the dignity of an Earldom.

Yours sincerely,

WAVELL

Constitutional Position
(Previous Reference: C.M. (47)4th Conclusions, Minute 1)

THE PRIME MINISTER recalled that at their meeting on 8th January the Cabinet had agreed to defer for the time being the issue of the proposed statement of policy declaring the Government’s intention to transfer power in India in the course of 1948. He had been keeping a close watch on the development of the constitutional position in India, in consultation with members of the India and Burma Committee; and they were satisfied that the time had now come to make a final effort, by the issue of this statement, to compel the two political parties in India to face the realities of the situation and collaborate in framing a new constitution. They therefore recommended that the statement should be issued in the course of the following week.

Various changes of wording had been made in the draft statement which had previously been considered by the Cabinet (CP (47)1). These were of minor importance only. There was, however, one change of substance which required the approval of the Cabinet, namely, that the date to be given for the transfer of power in India should be ‘June 1948’ rather than ‘the middle of 1948’. He was satisfied that the statement would not be fully effective unless a definite date were given.

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR INDIA said that, while he concurred in this recommendation, he thought it right to warn the Cabinet that it might not be possible for the transfer of power to be effected smoothly by June, 1948. Even though the work of the Constituent Assembly proceeded without further delay, it might well be that by June, 1948 there would be no Central Government to which power could be transferred.

It was the view of the Cabinet that this consideration did not outweigh the advantages, for the purposes of the present statement, of specifying a definite date. It would do no harm if in the event the date had to be postponed because the Indians themselves were not ready to accept the transfer of power.

The Cabinet:

(1) Agreed that the proposed statement of policy should indicate the Government’s intention to transfer power in India in June, 1948.
(2) Authorized the Prime Minister to arrange for the statement to be made in both Houses of Parliament in the course of the following week.

12. Preparing to Announce Departure

Extract from a Note by J.F. Burrows, 14 February 1947

1. I understand that the contingencies for which planning is required are:
   A. An announcement by HMG that they intend to withdraw their power in India within a time limit irrespective of a constitutional agreement:
   B. A situation of widespread disorder and confusion.

2. I consider that in Bengal there would in all probability be no period of grace or at best only a very brief breathing space between the situation caused by 'A' and situation 'B'—if such an announcement were made now, with the Muslim League out of the Constituent Assembly and threatened with expulsion from the Interim Government. In present conditions an announcement of the kind contemplated would precipitate a crisis and disorders which would probably be both communal and anti-British, and there would be little chance of an orderly withdrawal of Europeans from Bengal. (I should, however, not be opposed to such an announcement if the Muslim League were participating in the Constituent Assembly and the Interim Government).

3. I have to visualize three possible situations if there is a break-down in the Cabinet Plan for the framing of a new constitution and the handing over in orderly fashion of control in India:
   (i) the Muslims in revolt;
   (ii) the Hindus in revolt;
   (iii) both Muslims and Hindus in revolt against HMG and the established regime.

   Before dealing with these separately I should explain that, following on their sweeping election successes in 1945 and with the recent adhesion of even Fazul Huq’s handful of dissident Muslim MLAs and several desertions to the Ministry from the Congress Scheduled Castes, the Muslim League command an absolute majority in the Bengal Legislature and, so long as they hold together, there is no possibility of any alternative Ministry unless the League agree to and support a coalition. If I am forced to dismiss my predominantly Muslim League Ministry or if that Ministry resign or are called out, they can make the constitutional functioning of any other Ministry impossible. In this context I must again emphasize that I neither have the officers, nor would circumstances allow of it if I had them, to administer the province under Section 93 in the teeth of active Muslim League opposition. The Imperial Services are depleted, disheartened and apprehensive. The Provincial Services cannot be expected to reproduce their old loyalty to a regime that is passing away before their eyes and are, indeed, already thinking on communal lines. The announcement of a date for our withdrawal, without the prospect of any regime, reasonably representative of both major communities, being ready to take our place, would sharpen the communal cleavage and bring about an immediate alignment on a communal basis. The Police—still largely a non-Muslim force, especially in the Armed Branch where the hillman can no longer (since the Calcutta riots especially) be implicitly relied on as free from pro-Hindu bias vis-à-vis the inhabitants of the plains—would rapidly disintegrate into its communal elements and would have to be written off very largely if not completely as an instrument of impartial administration. I therefore no longer have the machinery with which to run a Section 93 administration in the face of opposition. So long, then, as the League Parliamentary group hold together—as I think in present circumstances they will—I have no other course open save the alternatives of working with them or dispensing with any form of administration under the 1935 Act and governing so much of the Province as I can under something like Martial Law. This administration could be neither extensive nor long-lived.

In situation (i), with the Muslims of Bengal in revolt against HMG and/or a Congress-controlled Centre, I should immediately lose control of the whole of East and most of North Bengal: and, as the Hindus of Bengal could not form an alternative Ministry, even in alliance with the European Group and other non-Muslim elements, I should have no reason to hope for any active support from that community and the administrative break-down elsewhere in the Province might soon be nearly as complete as from the first it would be in East Bengal.

In situation (ii), with the Hindus in revolt, South-West Bengal would largely go out of control (as parts of it did in 1942) and road and rail communications with Provinces to the West and South-West would almost certainly be closed except to armoured columns. Hindu revolt would evoke a Muslim reaction if, I still had a League Ministry in office and my present Ministry’s control of their followers outside the Legislature is already shaky and does not inspire me with confidence that they would be able to control any popular movement (for example, an anti-Hindu or an anti-Landlord movement) initiated by the Muslim masses. (The tail would undoubtedly wag the dog).

If situation (iii) should arise—active revolt by both Muslims and Hindus—and it is the declared aim of the Communists and of some of the more extreme elements (including more than one student organization) in both the major communities to bring it about, I do not believe they would act in concert for long or avoid relapsing into communal conflict; but the situation would be precarious for the Europeans at the outset and I could obviously only aim at extricating the Europeans in the districts before all movement became impossible and they were mopped up, and then holding a part of Calcutta till evacuation by ship or flying boat became possible. Even so, to do anything effective for the Europeans scattered through the districts, I should have to move quickly and I should need aircraft.

4. In short:

If Muslims were in revolt, it would involve the immediate abandonment of East Bengal and much of North Bengal and the evacuation of the Europeans of Chittagong by sea or air.

If the Hindus were in revolt—and for this purpose I make little distinction between Congress, Mahasabha, Forward Bloc and the rest—we should lose control of considerable areas of West Bengal, including our lines of communication with Northern, Central and Southern India, and might expect sporadic outbreaks of terrorism in the towns of East and North Bengal.
Abandonment of either area (East and North Bengal or, parts of West Bengal) would be followed by massacres there on a scale that would shock the world. If in East Bengal, Gandhi would be one of the first victims.

The Communists are actively fishing in all our troubled waters and would give the disorders both an agrarian and an anti-British colour—the latter would not be difficult in the tea gardens of North Bengal or the industrial areas along the Hooghli, in West Bengal and at Narayanganj (Dacca).

Famine, on a disastrous scale, would accompany such disorders and would help to direct feeling against Europeans, whose houses would be attacked in the belief that they held food. This would lead at once to a general looting of unprotected European property.

5. In such circumstances I feel fairly confident that I could generally ensure the lives (though not the property) of the Europeans and Anglo-Indians in Calcutta and of those whom we could evacuate to Calcutta, assuming that I could count on the present number of British troops and certain A.F. (I) units that we have taken into account in our plans. The British element in the Calcutta Police is fairly strong.

6. I consider, therefore, that my first action in the event of an announcement of a date for withdrawal of British power (if made in present circumstances) would be to have the troops ‘standing to’ and prepare for a concentration of outlying Europeans at very short notice as soon as hostile reactions began to show themselves. The areas to be cleared would depend on the nature and source of the hostile reactions. I should require aircraft for this concentration....

13. Indian Policy Statement to Secure Adoption of Cabinet Committee’s Plan

Telegram from Clement Attlee to King George VI, 14 February 1947

PERSONAL AND TOP SECRET

EPOCH 20. Mr Attlee with his humble duty to The King.

India. The next three following telegrams contain:

(a) A formal submission regarding the Viceroyalty;

(b) The final text of the Statement on Policy which Mr Attlee is proposing to make in the House of Commons on Thursday, 20th February.

(c) An addition to the Statement on Policy dealing with the Viceroyalty, which Mr Attlee will make at the same time.

(2) The Statement on Policy referred to in (b) above has been communicated to Your Majesty’s Dominion Prime Ministers.

(3) Your Majesty will see that this Statement states that it is the definite intention of His Majesty’s Government to effect the transference of power in India by a date not later than June 1948.

(4) Your Majesty should know that the Viceroy advised that the general Statement on Indian Policy should not be made until a reply had been sent to Nehru’s letter of 5th February, in which Congress said that it was no longer possible for members of the Moslem League to continue in the Interim Government. After most careful consideration Mr Attlee has reached the conclusion that the right course is not to send a definite reply to this letter from Nehru, but merely an interim message to the effect that an important Statement would be made in a few days. Mr Attlee feels sure that the best remaining hope of securing the ultimate adoption of the Cabinet Committee’s plan is to try to bring the Congress and the Moslem League together in the Constituent Assembly after they have studied the general terms of policy.

14. Punjab Governor Comments on Draft Statement

A Note by Evan Jenkins, 16 February 1947
IOR, R/3/1/130, Acc. No. 3448, NAI.

PSV has shown me the draft of HMG’s proposed statement on Indian policy.

2. The essential points in this document appear to be the following:

(1) HMG will transfer power in India to Indian hands not later than the middle of 1948. (paragraph 7).

(2) If no constitution has been worked out by a fully representative Constituent Assembly before the middle of 1948, HMG will have to consider to whom the powers of the Central Government in British India should be handed over. The possibilities mentioned are:
   - (a) some form of Central Government;
   - (b) the Provincial Governments;
   - (c) an unnamed recipient, whose selection ‘may seem most reasonable and in the best interests of the Indian people.’ (para. 10).

(3) The process of transfer between the date on which the statement is made and the middle of 1948 will be gradual, and will probably involve relaxations of the provisions of the Government of India Act, 1935. Legislation will be introduced to give effect to the final transfer. (para. 11).

(4) The relations between the Crown and the Indian States will undergo no fundamental change until the final transfer of power, though some treaties may require adjustment. (para. 12). (The meaning of this passage relating to Indian States is very doubtful).

(5) There will be negotiations between HMG and the ‘successor authorities’ in regard to matters arising out of the transfer of power. (para. 13).

(6) Facilities are to be given for the evacuation from India of European families (para. 14).

3 The first thing that strikes me about the document is its astonishing vagueness. The only definite statement in it is that the British are to relinquish all power in India by 30th June 1948. Their successors may be a Central Government formed under a new constitution; or ‘some form of Central Government’; or the existing Provincial Governments; or a quantum quid whose nature is not even broadly described. The process is to be gradual, but as there is no known terminus ad quem it is not clear how it can be consistent. The States are given a breathing space until 30th June 1948, after which they are apparently to fend for themselves. In the meantime HMG are to negotiate with unknown successor authorities; and the European community are invited to send their families home 'for the time being'—an unconvincing euphemism.

4. The document is presumably intended to bring the Congress and the Muslim League up against reality and to force them to cooperate with one another. In my judgment it will have the diametrically opposite effect. If the British, as now appears, are leaving within seventeen months and are prepared to hand over power to those exercising de facto authority at the Centre or in the Provinces when the time comes, what incentive is there for the contending parties to get together? Few Indian politicians want an amicable settlement, except on their own terms, and the tendency will unquestionably be for all parties to seize as much power as they can—if necessary by force.

5. My particular concern is with the Punjab. Here, the struggle for power has already begun. There are three parties—the Muslim League representing the great majority of the Muslims, whose avowed aim is undiluted Muslim rule; the Panthic Sikhs who will resist undiluted Muslim rule a outrance, and Congress who, like the Muslim League, are part of an all-India organization, but would provincially side with the Sikhs. No one community can rule Punjab with its present boundaries except by conquest, and the only peaceful alternatives are (a) a Government formed by a coalition of all parties or by a non-communal party; or (b) a partition. If the Punjab were dealt with in isolation it might be possible to persuade the parties to take one or the other of these alternatives on the understanding that in due course the all-parties or non-communal Government would take over from the British, or that the Governments of the new partitioned states would do so. But the statement makes it impossible for the Punjab to take a line of its own, and even encourages the Muslim League and the Congress to set off all-India interests against provincial interests. The Muslim League in the Punjab will be encouraged by the Muslim League High Command to avoid a compromise, so as to increase the High Command's bargaining power in the Muslim minority Provinces; and the Punjab Congress will be expected to work (so far as is possible) for a de facto Central Government dominated by Hindus. In the Punjab, the statement as it stands may lead to an explosion of great violence. The statement will be regarded as the prelude to the final communal showdown, and the disturbances—if any—resulting from it might be of the gravest description. For example, the Sikhs might well attempt to seize the Central Punjab, including Lahore and to establish a provisional Government of their own.

6. In the situation contemplated HMG would still be responsible for the maintenance of law and order—my 'special responsibility' for the prevention of a grave menace to the peace or tranquillity of the Punjab would remain. I am not sure what object there would be in using Police or Troops to suppress a mass movement which, ex hypothesi, will be legitimate from 1st July 1948, or what the attitude of the Police and Troops would be to the suppression of such a movement. During the relatively minor disturbances now in progress there has, to my knowledge, been some uneasiness in the services as to the distinction between law and order and party or communal politics; and I think it unlikely that the services will hold. Prima facie the attitude of Punjabi troops would be very doubtful.

7. It is necessary to add a word about British personnel. The statement means not only the end of the Secretary of State's services—which was coming anyhow—but the entire elimination of the British, except perhaps for a very small number of men with odd ideas. I do not see how officials whose original contracts (in the broad sense) are being ended can be forced to serve on as men without hope, in conditions which will certainly involve great personal risk.
People will take risks in a good cause, but not in a faction fight which is none of their business. Without our British personnel we could not, even now, maintain order in the Punjab.

8. The decision of HMG to leave India by a stated date is a ‘break-down’ decision, involving the abandonment of all we have worked for many years. It is a very dangerous decision, amounting to an invitation to the warring parties to make real war upon one another. It is an impossible decision unless the authorities who are to receive power in 1948 are clearly defined now, and are assisted to prepare themselves for their task. If the Punjab were told that Central Constitution making had been abandoned; that routine Central administration of the subjects reserved to the Centre under the Mission’s plan would be entrusted to officials; and that the Punjab must prepare itself to inherit all other powers from the British; we might get away with it. But even then our chance would be slender.

15. Wavell’s Appeal to Reconsider Proposed Course of Action

Extract from a Telegram from Wavell to Pethick-Lawrence, 17 February 1947

MOST IMMEDIATE

No. 298-S. My telegrams Nos. 291-S and 296-S

2. I think the appreciations by Burrows and Jenkins may be unduly pessimistic. They do not take full account of the possibility that the leaders of the Congress and League may as the result of the Statement make a determined effort to reach agreement of some sort.

3. Also I am sure that HMG must adopt a definite policy soon, and whenever the announcement is made there are bound to be objections and grave anxieties.

4. Nevertheless I cannot recommend HMG to disregard the views of the Governors. Even if the party leaders try to come to terms they may be unable to control their followers in the Punjab and Bengal, and the difficulty which Jenkins mentions of persuading the Services and Police to take action may be a serious one.

5. I therefore beg HMG most earnestly to reconsider their proposed course of action. I urge most strongly that the announcement to be made now should not include the date of withdrawal. It should contain something on lines of my telegram 270-S and if possible a decision on the Services. It is these two points which are the immediate issues in Indian politics, and an announcement which says nothing on them would create confusion and may precipitate a crisis....

After further discussion, the Prime Minister said that the issue was one which the Cabinet must be asked to decide on the following day. In the meantime, he would ascertain the opinion of the new Viceroy on the proposals put forward by the Secretary of State for Dominion Affairs.

16. New Statement of Policy May Destabilize Indian Armed Forces

No. 299–S. My telegram No. 298-S of today. Commander-in-Chief feels that the effect of the proposed announcement is likely to be detrimental to the stability of the Indian Armed Forces and may result in widespread indiscipline and communal trouble. He feels that the authority of the British officers which is the most binding element will be greatly weakened. He bases this opinion on the completely indefinite nature of the proposals for the handing over of responsibility for the government of the country, which he thinks will increase the present uncertainty and encourage the forces of disorder.

17. Drafting 20th February Statement
Extracts from Minutes of Cabinet Meeting, 18 February 1947

....The Cabinet:

(1) Reaffirmed their decision that the proposed statement of policy on India should indicate the Government’s intention to transfer power in India by June, 1948.

(2) Agreed that the statement of policy (incorporating the amendment noted in paragraph (a) above) should be made in both Houses of Parliament on 20th February; and took note that the Prime Minister would arrange for the appointment of the new Viceroy to be announced in the same statement.

(3) Took note that the Prime Minister would communicate the text of the proposed statement, before it was made, to the Leaders of the opposition Parties.

(4) Authorized the Secretary of State for India to take unobtrusive steps to ensure that increased shipping facilities were available for Europeans wishing to leave India over the next few months.

18. Apprehensions regarding Effects of Policy Statement in India Telegram from Clement Attlee to Alan Lascelles, 19 February 1947

EPOCH 29. Following for Lascelles from Prime Minister.

We have just received from the Viceroy a number of disturbing telegrams about the proposed declaration of policy regarding the transfer of power in India. As you will remember, the essential feature of the plan originally submitted to us by the Viceroy was that we should announce a definite date for the transfer of power, and one of the arguments in favour of this course which was strongly emphasized by the Viceroy was that we should not in any event be able to administer India efficiently after 31st March, 1948, because of the run-down of the European Services and the tendency of Indians in these Services to look to the political parties rather than to the Government. If the original proposals of the Viceroy had been accepted we should already have announced some time ago our intention to transfer power by 31st March, 1948. After prolonged discussion here a somewhat different plan was evolved; but this retained the essential feature of specifying a definite date; and the Cabinet had taken a firm decision that we should issue on Thursday next, 20th February, a statement of policy, including the declaration of our intention to transfer power in India by June, 1948, that is, three months later than the date originally proposed by the Viceroy.

The Viceroy has now represented that a declaration of our intention to transfer power on a specified date may give rise to a serious situation in India. Instead of driving the two parties together it may encourage in each a tendency to seize what power it can, communal feeling may be inflamed and disorder may break out. The Viceroy has consulted the Commander-in-Chief and the Governors of Bengal, Punjab and United Provinces and they all take a pessimistic view of the effect of such a declaration in India. In these circumstances the Viceroy now recommends that we should not make any declaration of our intention to leave India by a specified date. He has submitted an alternative plan, but this was entirely impracticable from the constitutional and Parliamentary angle.

This volte-face by the Viceroy has placed the Government in a very difficult position, especially as he previously advised us that the Commander-in-Chief, the Governors and his officials were all in favour of a declaration specifying a definite date for the transfer of power. It was, as you know, on this basis that the new Viceroy agreed to undertake the difficult task of supervising the transfer; and I have verified that he would be unwilling to proceed to India if it were now decided that no definite term should be set in advance for the transfer of power. Moreover, the main object of making this declaration has always been to force the two parties in India to face realities and collaborate together in the framing of a new Constitution; and Ministers still feel convinced that for this purpose it is essential to name a definite date by which His Majesty’s Government intend to hand over power in India. A declaration without a date would not convince the Indian politicians that we genuinely intend to hand over in the relatively near future and we should be suspected, as earlier Governments have been, of making communal differences an excuse for continuing British rule in India.

The Cabinet feel that a heavy responsibility rests on them in making this declaration in face of the latest advice from responsible men on the spot. They have also had to take account of the views expressed by Field Marshal Smuts, who believes that we should retain control in India until the communal differences have been resolved and a unitary Government established. After long and anxious consideration, however, the Cabinet have reached the conclusion that these last-minute representations cannot outweigh the solid reasons which led them to decide upon the course outlined in the proposed statement of policy and to arrange for the appointment of a new Viceroy charged with the specific duty of arranging for the transfer of power within a defined period. They have, therefore, decided to go forward with the policy previously approved and a declaration in substantially the terms of the draft in EPOCH 23 will be made in both Houses of Parliament on Thursday, 20th February.
19. Military Implications of the Statement of Policy
Letter from Group Captain D.C. Stapleton to A.V. Alexander, 19 February 1947

Minister.

The Chiefs of Staff feel some anxiety concerning the proposed announcement of Indian policy about which you spoke to them this morning.

2. As the Chiefs of Staff understand it, it has been decided to issue a statement tomorrow, Thursday, 20 February, making it clear that it is our definite intention to transfer power in India into responsible Indian hands by a date not later than June 1948; there are apparently serious doubts in the minds of at least one of the Provincial Governors as to the effect this announcement will have; and the Viceroy himself questions the advisability of making this statement at this particular moment.

3. The Chiefs of Staff have not seen the proposed statement of all the telegrams which have passed between the Government and the Viceroy on the subject, nor are they aware of the views of the Commander-in-Chief, India. They cannot, therefore, offer the Government advice on its military implications, which may be serious.

4. In view of the anxieties of the authorities referred to above, however, the Chiefs of Staff do recommend strongly that His Majesty’s Government should, before making the statement, make it quite certain that the Commandeer-in-Chief in India is ready to meet such implications as the issue of the statement may involve.

5. The Chiefs of Staff hope that, in explaining their position to the Prime Minister, you will also feel able to suggest that the Viceroy be consulted at once on the point in paragraph 4 above.

D.C. STAPLETON

20. Agenda for Mountbatten
Letter from Clement Attlee to Louis Mountbatten, 18 March 1947
Mountbatten Papers, File No. 116, NMML.

My dear Mountbatten

The Statement which was issued at the time of the announcement of your appointment sets out the policy of the Government and the principles in accordance with which the transfer of power to Indian hands should be effected.

My colleagues of the Cabinet Mission and I have discussed with you the general lines of your approach to the problems which will confront you in India. It will, I think, be useful to you to have on record the salient points which you should have in mind in dealing with the situation. I have, therefore, set them down there.

It is the definite objective of His Majesty’s Government to obtain a unitary Government for British India and the Indian States, if possible within the British Commonwealth, through the medium of a Constituent Assembly, set up and run in accordance with the Cabinet Mission’s plan, and you should do the utmost in your power to persuade all Parties to work together to this end, and advise His Majesty’s Government, in the light of developments, as to the steps that will have to be taken.

Since, however, this plan can only become operative in respect of British India by agreement between the major Parties, there can be no question of compelling either major Party to accept it.

If by 1 October you consider that there is no prospect of reaching a settlement on the basis of a unitary government for British India, either with or without the co-operation of the Indian States, you should report to His Majesty’s Government on the steps which you consider should be taken for the handing over of power on the due date.

It is, of course, important that the Indian States should adjust their relations with the authorities to whom it is intended to hand over power in British India; but as was explicitly stated by the Cabinet Mission, His Majesty’s Government do not intend to hand over their power and obligations under paramountcy to any successor Government. It is not intended to bring paramountcy as a system to a conclusion earlier than the date of the final transfer of power, but you are authorized, at such time as you think appropriate, to enter into negotiations with individual States for adjusting their relations with the Crown.

You will do your best to persuade the rulers of any Indian States in which political progress has been slow to progress rapidly towards some form of more democratic government in their States. You will also aid and assist the States in coming to fair and just arrangements with the leaders of British India as to their future relationships.

The date fixed for the transfer of power is a flexible one to within one month; but you should aim at 1 June, 1948, as the effective date for the transfer of power.

In your relations with the Interim Government you will be guided by the general terms of the Viceroy’s letter of 30 May, 1946, to the President of the Congress Party, and of the statement made by the Secretary of State for India in the House of Lords on 13 March, 1947. These statements made it clear that, while the Interim Government would not have the same powers as a Dominion Government, His Majesty’s Government would treat the Interim Government with the same consultation and consideration as a Dominion Government, and give it the greatest possible freedom in the day to day exercise of the administration of the country.

It is essential that there should be the fullest co-operation with the Indian leaders in all steps that are taken as to the withdrawal of British power so that the process may go forward as smoothly as possible.

The keynote of your administration should therefore be the closest co-operation with the Indians and you should make it clear to the whole of the Secretary of State’s Services that this is so, and that it is their duty to their countries to work to this end.

You should take every opportunity of stressing the importance of ensuring that the transfer of power is effected with full regard to the defence requirements of India. In the first place you will impress upon the Indian leaders the great importance of avoiding any breach in the continuity of the Indian Army and of maintaining the organization of defence on an all India basis. Secondly you will point out the need for continued collaboration in the security of the Indian Ocean area for which provision might be made in an agreement between the two countries. At a suitable date His Majesty’s Government would be ready to send military and other experts to India to assist in discussing the terms of such an agreement.

You will no doubt inform Provincial Governors of the substance of this letter.

Yours sincerely

C. Attlee
21. ‘Dismissal’

...After Cabinet I had a talk with Matthai, about the most level-headed of all my Ministers. He did not see much daylight ahead, agreed that the Congress was very short-sighted in its policy, but said that the chief trouble was personal antagonisms—Nehru versus Liaquat, Patel versus Nehru, Gandhi versus Jinnah. He had no good solution for the present situation, said that Great Britain and India were very closely tied by commercial interest, but that a stable and united India was necessary for this interest to operate, and that he did not see how this could be evolved.

Britter, the Times Correspondent, was my next visitor, a sensible and competent observer. He took a gloomy view of the political situation, thought that the Congress completely lacked any spirit of compromise or generosity, and that their internal dissensions were acute. He said that there was still mistrust of our intentions, that the Services were completely disgruntled and only anxious to go, and that to fix a definite date for our departure was probably the best thing we could do....

6 January

I saw C-in-C this morning. Chief subjects of discussion were the proposal put forward that INA convicts should be released, this we agreed must be resisted; the release of a large number of Junior British officers from the IA and their replacement by Indian officers, which seems inevitable but will obviously weaken the IA, and tend to make it more susceptible to communal influence; the visit of Aung San; and Defence Member’s proposal to bring before the Cabinet a recommendation that all British troops should be withdrawn as soon as shipping could be made available, C-in-C had not been consulted on this.

AICC seem to have passed a resolution accepting HMG’s statement of 6 December, but as usual with many reservations; and I rather doubt whether it will be enough to bring in the Muslim League.

7 January

I busied myself with consideration of the Breakdown Plan most of the forenoon, and then had 1 1/4 hours with Liaquat Ali Khan. We had a good deal of discussion about his estimate of the Budget deficit and other financial matters. I then spoke to him about the Congress Resolution, accepting HMG’s statement of 6th December and said I very much hoped the Muslim League would now call their Council and come into the Constitution Assembly. He said that it was not a true acceptance by Congress and that they did not really mean to be honest about it; and that we ought to restore our authority and rule India for a further period of years, until the parties agreed. I pointed out that we could not break our pledges to give India self-government at an early date. He said that it would be very wrong to leave India to chaos in this way; but that if we were going to do it we should ‘leave fair chaos for both parties’, and not remain to establish the Hindus in power.

In the afternoon I saw Rajagopalachari. As usual, he knew nothing very much about the work of his Education Department, but was interesting about affairs in general. He admitted that it might have been better had the Congress acceptance of the Statement of 6 December been quite unequivocal, but stressed their difficulties with their followers, and said that it was only Nehru’s personal efforts which had secured acceptance at all. We discussed Assam’s attitude, which he agreed was unnecessarily apprehensive and unrealistic. Finally he mentioned Burma and said rather surprisingly that Burma’s political leaders suggested gang leaders to him rather than statesmen—this was in reference to Aung San’s visit—and that it was a pity that Burma had ever been separated from India.

Later I saw C-in-C about two proposals by Defence Member—one about withdrawal of British troops, the other about release of INA convicts. Congress are apparently alarmed at Sarat Chandra Bose’s assuming leadership of the INA under the mantle of his deceased brother, and think they can appease him by release of the INA convicts (sentenced for murder of cruelty) and restoration of their pay to all of them. The next step would be of course to demand their reinstatement in the Army. I said I should resist any demand for concession to INA.

8 January

Cabinet this morning lasted two and a half hours. It was quite amicable and sensible on the whole. The first item was the Report on the RIN Mutiny, which was accepted with some discussion. The next item on the Coal Report went through peacefully, though Nehru raised the matter of thorium and uranium in Travancore, which might, I thought, have provoked some awkwardness. Proposals for the protection of coated abrasives, whatever they are, and hurricane lanterns, a peculiarly Indian product, presented no difficulty. Liaquat then embarked on a statement in reply to some remarks by Nehru at a previous Cabinet meeting. I was apprehensive that this might provoke a communal riot, but all went well. Liaquat’s statement was moderate and sensible; and he and Nehru almost, but not quite, purred at one another.

After lunch I had 45 minutes with Suhrawardy, the Bengal Premier whom I dislike. He was sulky, shifty and unattractive as usual. After a little talk on the Damodar Valley project, which was the ostensible reason for his visit to Delhi, he embarked on his normal hymn of hate against the Hindus, with reference to Bihar; Calcutta and East Bengal had of course been gentlemanly differences of opinion, in his view, compared with the Hindu retaliation in Bihar. He complained that we were strengthening the hands of the Hindus against the Muslims; and drew a most gloomy picture of Bengal after our departure, with Darjeeling annexed by Nepal or Sikkim, or others. I gave him my usual line, that Hindus and Muslims had got to live together in India on some terms and that the sooner they got together to settle them, the better, etc. S. ended by admitting that HMG’s statement of 6 December was fair, and that he would recommend to Jinnah that the League should enter the C.A. Jinnah was calling his Working Committee at Karachi for 19 January.

George Abell telegraphed to say that the Cabinet at home has gone back completely and refuses to have anything to do with the Breakdown Plan, so he is returning at once, I thought they well might run out after I had left, they seem quite unable to face an awkward decision.

January 9

A very busy and rather tiresome day. It began with Baldev Singh coming at 10.30 a.m. about the INA. He said that Sarat Chandra Bose was holding an INA meeting in Calcutta on 23 Jan; and that a Resolution would be moved in the Assembly early in February demanding the release of all INA prisoners under sentence;—there are about ten or a dozen, all convicted of murder or cruelty—the payment of INA men of their pay for the time that they were fighting us; and that this was certain to be followed by a demand for their reinstatement in the Army. I naturally reacted very strongly and told him that such action would make it impossible for British officers to continue to serve and would destroy the INA. He promised to put this to the political leaders, but did not seem very hopeful that they would agree, as they seemed anxious to appease the INA. I then wrote to C-in-C, to see whether he was prepared to stand firm, and arranged to discuss it with him this evening.

After lunch I saw V.P. Menon, who has become rather the mouthpiece of Vallabhai Patel, I fancy. He said he thought the League ought to go into CA but was not hopeful of an agreed Constitution being evolved. He said that Congress leaders were losing popularity and that there were serious internal troubles in Congress and great fear of the Left Wing; and that the danger of labour difficulties was acute. Patel is very annoyed at Nehru for making the appointment of Asaf Ali without consulting his colleagues. Menon also said that Gandhi had proposed a most mischievous resolution about HMG’s statement of 6 December, but that Patel had opposed him strongly and was unpopular with G. at present.

Menon was very perturbed at the decline of the Administration—Ministers too busy with politics to pay much attention to their Department; he outlined the chief dangers as Food distribution breaking down, lack of Textiles, Labour troubles, and slowness of the Development plan. I think he was echoing Patel. Finally, he described an interview with Aung San, which had shown that young tough’s complete ignorance of financial, constitutional and economic questions.

At 6.30 p.m, I saw C-in-C about the INA problem. He told me that, after consultation with his senior officers, he was determined to stand, up to the point of resignation, on the first issue, the release of the prisoners. We shall have a first-class row with Congress, I expect, but I think we shall get away with it....

Sunday, 12 January
.... I had a letter from the PM, telling me that the Cabinet had rejected my plans. The letter was cold, ungracious and indefinite, the letter of a small man. It proposed that I should go home in the near future for further discussions, but I cannot see any value in doing so and shall reply to that effect. It is possible that the idea is to get me home and force my resignation.

13 January
I agreed with the C-in-C to produce a directive on which combined civil and military staff would prepare a plan for a breakdown.

Nehru was due for an interview but did not turn up, an increasingly common habit on the part of my Ministers....

20 January
Most of my day was taken up over an impending crisis about the INA which has been on the horizon for some time. Baldev Singh put up a summary for Cabinet recommending release of all INA men, convicted for brutality or murder, and restoration of pay for the period during which they were serving our enemies. He wanted it taken in Cabinet at once, in order that these concessions might be announced before 23 January, when Sarat Chandra Bose is holding a meeting at Calcutta to assume the mantle of his brother as leader of the INA.

I saw C-in-C at 10.30 a.m. and found he was still firm on the matter, he said he was determined to resign sooner that acquiesce in the proposals about the INA.

So, I wrote a note on Baldev’s summary for Cabinet and told George to draft a telegram to S. of S. to warn him of the approaching crisis. I believe myself that if we all stand firm—HMG, C-in-C, myself—my Cabinet will not force the issue and they may even be encouraged to stand up to the Left Wing—J.P. Narain and Bose.
Ghazanfar Ali was my visitor in the afternoon. He is the worst representative of the League in the Cabinet (except Mandal)—intensely communal and rather stupid. He seemed completely hazy about Pakistan and its implications, and admitted that he did not understand the economy of it. I find him rather a trial, inside and outside the Cabinet.

Arthur Henderson dined, he is off tomorrow, having made no progress at all in his Mission, but having perhaps learnt a little about India.

21 January
Ian Scott had some political gossip out riding this morning. Menon, who is now very much in Patel’s pocket, claims to have seen a letter from Gandhi to Patel, abusing him for supporting acceptance of HMG’s statement of 6 December, which G. had wished to reject. I have always regarded G. as our most inveterate, malignant and rather hypocritical enemy. Ian also had a story of an interview between Sultan Ahmed and Nehru, in which S.A. had intimated that the passing of N.’s Republic Resolution in the C.A. might make it difficult for the Princes to negotiate. According to the story, N. had blown up into one of his outbursts and said he did not care a damn for the Princes, to which S.A. had replied that the princes did not care a damn for him.

I spent some of the morning over a telegram to the S. of S. to warn him of the INA Crisis.

Azad came after lunch. He had one or two small matters on his Department; then spoke of the relations between the communities and advocated improvement in social contacts between the Members of the Cabinet. He is in favour of Coalition Governments in all Provinces, but says that it is no use to approach the subject unless the atmosphere at the Centre improves. I asked him about Nehru’s Republic Resolution and he thinks it will be passed, though he sees the danger of doing so, and has advised against it, I gather.

Earlier Arthur Henderson had come to say goodbye. He had breakfasted with Nehru, who was very worried, he said, over the possibility of serious labour troubles and apprehended a railway and coal strike. N. made the usual complaint of non-cooperation on the part of the League members of the Cabinet. Henderson said he would recommend to Cabinet that the sooner the S. of S. Services were wound up the better.

Three-hour meeting of Cabinet 4–7 p.m. The matter of a Press Ordinance for the Commissioner Provinces, that is, Delhi for all practical purposes, took nearly one and a half hours, though it had been twice before Cabinet already. The Muslim League is convinced that it is simply a device of Patel’s to muzzle Dawn, and they may have some reason for apprehension. I think, however, that the stand they have made may protect them to some extent.

The rest of the proceedings were less controversial, though the communal element obtruded itself. The League members do not show up well in Cabinet discussions, except Liaquat, who always talks good sense. Chundrigar is slow and dull, Nishtar loquacious and not very clever, Ghazanfar always communal and pugnacious. Congress can always make dialectical rings round them and appear reasonable and moderate....

Thursday, 23rd January
Interview with Khizar who, if his heart was really in it, would be the best leader of the Muslims in India, but he does not like politics and would prefer to be out of it all.

Mandal who succeeded him is the poorest Member I have ever had in the Government, and I find great difficulty in understanding his English.
I had a telegram from S. of S. to say that HMG would support me over the INA question, which was quite a pleasant surprise. I also had a telegram suggesting that I should go home again for discussions, which seems quite unnecessary.

I discussed with C-in-C at 6 p.m. the line to take at the conference which has been arranged tomorrow with Nehru, Liaquat and Baldev on the INA question.

Thursday, 30th January
Day began with Hutchings who is just off to London on food matters. We are all right for rice for the moment but very short of wheat. On the general situation, H. said he thought there was a section of Congress, and Gandhi himself, who did not really want a peaceful hand over but to claim that they had ejected the British by force; perhaps there is something in this.

1 February
The Muslim League Resolution seems to shut the door completely on their participation in the Constituent Assembly and creates a difficult and perhaps an ugly situation. I decided to send for Nehru and discuss it with him this evening.

I saw Vallabhai Patel, who was more silent and restrained than usual, and obviously did not wish to discuss the political situation, though I gave him an opening. We spoke of the Bihar Government’s reluctance to reserve places in the Provincial service for ex-service men, on which Patel promised to help; and a number of other matters. He was friendly and sensible.

In the evening I saw Nehru for half an hour. I said that the League resolution created a very difficult situation, both for the Constituent Assembly and the Central Government. There was of course no question of HMG going back on their policy or dissolving the C.A.; but it was obvious that the C.A. without the League and possibly without the States could not make an acceptable constitution for the whole of India. As to the Central Government, the Congress was in a position to force the resignation of the Muslim League members, but they would be well advised to consider the matter very carefully; since the Muslim League inactive opposition might make the administration of the country even more difficult than now. The crisis had come at an unfortunate time, just as the Budget session of the Assembly was beginning. Nehru was subdued and obviously realized the seriousness of the position. He said that the C.A. would go on, but obviously could not force a constitution on unwilling provinces. He hoped that the States, or at least a proportion of them, would join the C.A. As to the Cabinet, the matter would require serious consideration. Apart from the fact that the League had not joined the C.A., the policy of the Party, unless the Bombay decision last July were withdrawn, was direct action, that is, active opposition to the Government of which they at present formed part. He would consult his colleagues and give me his views.

In the evening I got one of the S. of S. panic-stricken cables, deploiring any initiative on my part in seeing Nehru. Too late, anyhow, and it would not have influenced me, I think, even if it had come earlier.

6 February
As I had expected I had a letter this morning signed by all the Congress members of my Cabinet demanding the resignation of the Muslim League members. I wired it to HMG, it crossed a telegram from S. of S. asking me to ‘gain time’ if the Congress did put forward such a demand. But they will not be able to put off a decision for long, and I do not see quite how the Congress demand can be resisted.
V.P. Menon, whom I saw this afternoon, usually so optimistic, was gloomy about the position and thinks that the partition of India is now inevitable. He says the League reckon on this, and expect to capture the Punjab Government soon.

8 February
Cabinet meeting again went quite smoothly. The main item was the strength of the post-war Indian Army. It became clear that India could afford not much more than half the annual amount that Defence Department had originally asked for. At the end of an hour's discussion I undertook to draw up a draft directive to the Defence Department to make plans for a smaller Army. We then considered the formal statement of the Budget figures, showing a deficit of 60 to 80 crores. Finally we passed the draft Air Agreement with the Dutch.

This morning I drew up the draft directive for the Defence Department and later discussed it with the C-in-C. We also spoke of the proposal to release the INA convicts on which he still remains firm; and plans for an emergency withdrawal of Europeans. I told him of the PM's letter and my removal, since he was off on a week's tour and I did not want him to learn of it by a Press announcement; he seemed very upset.

I had a telegram from HMG in the evening, with reference to the Congress request for the removal of the League members from the Government. As usual, it was indefinite, but HMG apparently contemplates making an early statement about the termination of our rule....

11 February
I had nearly an hour with Nehru. I threw a fly over him on the matter of trying to get the League into the Constituent Assembly and keeping them in the government, but he did not rise. He seemed subdued.

Later Baldev came. His chief point was on the release of the INA convicts. The Resolution comes up in the Assembly on the 18th and he wanted the matter taken in Cabinet. I said I should have to over-rule the Cabinet, if they decided on release, and he said he would consult his colleagues. He then discussed the political situation and said that Jinnah did not want a settlement. He had had discussions with him in London but had got nowhere, and Jinnah offered no assurances to the Sikhs even if they supported Pakistan....

13 February
In the afternoon I had a talk with Matthai, who is always sensible and interesting. He deplored the leadership both of Gandhi and of Jinnah, but like all other moderates in India seemed to accept them as inevitable evils, whose influence could not be opposed.

In the evening I saw Nazimuddin about the Punjab situation, at the request of Evan Jenkins in a telegram. N. was moderate and quite willing for compromise, if the Punjab Government would make concessions over political meetings and processions. I like honest fat little Nazimuddin and wish Jinnah had put him in the Government. He told me something of the Karachi meeting, I think he may have been for joining the C.A. himself.

A longish telegram from the PM, to say that they propose to make an announcement next week on India and include the change of Viceroy; and that Dickie Mountbatten had been appointed. An unexpected appointment but a clever one from their point of view; and Dickie's personality may perhaps accomplish what I have failed to do.

14 February
Of my visitors, the first were two representatives of a big British business firm, and left on me the impression that British business-men in India have not moved with the times; their chief plea was that they should still have, after the transfer of power, their own settlements, their own clubs and should in fact keep themselves to themselves.

After lunch I saw Jagjivan Ram, who was comparatively optimistic on the Labour troubles; but pessimistic on the political situation. He said that a fresh effort by HMG was required, and that the departure of the League from the Interim Government was no solution (why then did he sign the Congress letter demanding it? These Indians have no political courage).

Big dinner party in evening in Banqueting Hall, the last I shall hold there....

17 February
I sent a telegram to HMG urging them to postpone their main announcement, and merely to announce on Thursday my replacement, their views on the differences between Congress and League, making a last effort to bring them together into the C.A. (though I do not think it will succeed), and if possible some decision about the Services. I said that I thought it was only fair on my successor to let him have a week or two to study the situation before the final date was announced; and on me that I should not have the responsibility in my final weeks of office of carrying out a policy which I thought misjudged and ill-timed.

I saw C-in-C again, at his normal interview, and he produced a gloomy view of the results of the announcement the gist of which I cabled home.

Patel was pleasant, and we discussed a variety of matters; the slowness of HMG in dealing with the question of the Services; the situation in the Punjab; Pakistan, he was quite prepared to let the Muslims have the Western Punjab, and Sind and NWFP if they wished to join, and eastern Bengal; the question of language on the AIR; the enquiries into the Calcutta and Bihar riots, he agreed with me that these enquiries were too late and too long and that any enquiry should be immediate and short.

In the evening I discussed the Budget proposals with Liaquat, Nehru and Matthai; all went well, the meeting was amicable and the proposals were accepted.

18 February
One of my visitors was Hutchings, just back from London who had had interview with S. of S. and PM. He regarded P-L as completely useless and dithering, and could get no sense or decision out of him over shipping or the services. The whole attitude of the Cabinet to India was conditioned, as I found last December, not by any consideration of what was good or expedient in India, but by what they could put across in Parliament. Also they were thinking not about India abut about coal, electricity and Palestine.

19 February
HMG telegraphed adhering to their announcement; and also sent a long telegram of self-justification and accusation of myself as inconsistent, to which I think I can make an effective reply....

I spent the afternoon working on papers. Cabinet meeting in the evening lasted two and a quarter hours, but was very friendly. There was one very contentious item, the amalgamation of the External Affairs and Commonwealth Relations Departments, and the transfer of the High Commissioner in London from the Commerce to the External Affairs Department, but I managed to skate round the really contentious part—very skillfully, George Abell said. The other items—tariffs on bicycles and woodscrews, regulation of dentists, note by Nehru on Scientific Manpower, Land Requisition went almost hilariously. They are curious people, these Indians.
Late in the evening I was told that there had been leakage in London and the Press obviously had had the text of the Statement and the name of my successor.

Thursday, 20th February....

In the evening I had short interviews with Nehru and Liaquat and handed them HMG’s statement. Liaquat seemed to be genuinely sorry that I was going, and Nehru was polite....

23 February

I had quite a cordial telegram from the PM in reply to one I had sent deprecating any party controversy over my removal. I have had nice letters from Rajagopalachari, Azad and Nehru about my work.

26 February

Baldev Singh had no knowledge of Sikh reactions to HMG’s statement, since he had been away, but said that the rift between Sikhs and Muslim League was wider than ever. He was perturbed at the idea of all British officers leaving I.A. in a year’s time. He said nothing about the INA resolution, I am told that it has been postponed till April; I thought we should get away with it if we stood firm.

Cabinet meeting this evening. One would certainly never imagine from the atmosphere of friendly discussion that each side was demanding the withdrawal of the other; nor that they were likely to initiate a civil war.

27 February

Rajendra Prasad thought it was blowing up for another food crisis; and unfortunately at the same time our control over the Provinces and the Provinces’ control over procurement and distribution is weakening, owing to the general preference for politics over administration.

In the afternoon I had three-quarters of an hour with Dr Matthai, practically all on the general political situation and Indian mentality. He does not think that the Muslim League will come in, mainly because of Jinnah’s personality and of the Congress arrogance in 1937–39, which persuaded the Muslims that they would never get a fair deal. He said that the Hindu did not naturally lack generosity, but that the Congress was swayed by the ‘Gujarati mentality’ of the leaders, that is, that of a trader driving a hard bargain.

28 February

From an exchange of telegrams with London I learn that Mountbatten may arrive in Delhi on 22 March and that I shall leave next day. M-B has also wired that he will keep on the whole of the Personal Staff at any rate for the next three months.

We had a Cabinet meeting at 10.30 a.m. to hear the Budget proposals. They went down quite well. Rajagopalachari was rather talkative, but otherwise there was not much question. George says the Budget is a clever one, in that it drives a wedge between Congress and their rich merchant supporters, like Birla, while Congress cannot object to its provisions; but I doubt whether Liaquat had any deliberate intention of doing this, I think he took the advice of his officials, which I think was sound.

I saw Liaquat for a few minutes after the meeting, about the date for M-B’s arrival. He said the League would certainly not have taken a decision by then, that Jinnah was sick man and would not be in Delhi before the middle of the month at the latest.

After lunch I talked with Jagjivan Ram, whom I like and think the most sensible of the Scheduled Castes I have met. He said that HMG’s Statement threw the S.C. to the mercy of the Majority Communities; that they would miss British protection and British justice and would have preferred that we should remain for another 10 years or so; but admitted the difficulties....

10 March
After a quiet Sunday I had a fairly busy day. I saw C-in-C, who was rather depressed about the Indian Army.

I then said goodbye to J.P. Srivastava, he always had rather more character and guts than most of my Executive Council, though I fancy his business methods may have been shrewd rather than scrupulous.

Then I saw Nehru, who was quite friendly. He agreed that the Cabinet Mission Plan was the best solution if it could be carried through; and that the only real alternative was the partition of the Punjab and Bengal. He was quite sober and realistic in what he said, but did not seem really hopeful of a settlement with the League. When I said that I hoped my successor would succeed where I had failed, in bringing the two Parties together, he said that failures and successes were only relative and that some failures were greater than successes....

12 March
Council (I beg its pardon, Cabinet) went quite smoothly and in a friendly atmosphere.

Meanwhile things go badly in the Punjab.

Hutchings came to say goodbye. He was gloomy about the Food situation, as there seems to be a world shortage, and the harvests in India do not promise too well, as the wheat in Central India has been ruined by rust. We had a long general talk. He does not think that many of the Services will stop in India after June 1948. He agrees with many of the better men in the Services that the Compensation claim is wrong but that Government should find employment for the Indian Services. He says that in England all the employees on Railways and others are asking for compensation on being nationalised. We discussed Indian mentality and character, Hindu and Muslim and the future of India. Hutchings is one of the ablest ICS men I have had under me.

After lunch Evan Jenkins who had been to Rohtak, came in. He was as calm and clear as usual, but took a serious view of the Punjab situation. The cities are more or less under control but the trouble in rural areas is spreading and is of course more difficult to check. He has no idea of what casualties yet are, but there may be a total of 1000 killed in the whole Province. The trouble in getting any settlement is that both the Congress and Muslim League are controlled from outside, from Delhi and Bombay; while the Sikhs, who are in a position to negotiate on the spot, are disunited and poorly led, Master Tara Singh is stupid and emotional. The local Muslim League leaders are poor: Mamdot is hopelessly stupid and Firoz Khan Noon is trusted by no one and cuts no ice. Khizar’s resignation was prompted largely by the Statement of 20 February.

Evan wants an extra brigade of troops from the South. He is rather afraid of the trouble taking an anti-European turn, and thinks it possible that we may be forced to evacuate the Punjab before the rest of India—just the reverse of what my plan proposed. I told him of Nehru’s proposal to visit the Punjab, which he did not like but said could not be prevented: Baldev’s visit had done more harm than good.

At 3.30 p.m. Nehru came in and we had about 40 minutes talk. N. began by recrimination against the methods of the Muslim League; Evan pointed out that they had used exactly the technique practiced by the Congress in their agitations of 1921 and 1930. He also said that the trouble at Amritsar had been started by non-Muslims. Nehru showed signs of working up for one of his outbursts but the unruffled calm and incontrovertible statements of Evan kept him in check. No Conclusion was reached, but N. gave the programme of his visit. He said nothing about going to Peshawar, and I hoped he had abandoned this idea, but I gathered later in the evening that he still might go there.

In the evening Burrows arrived, he had come up to say goodbye, a little reproachful that I had not gone to Calcutta. He was gloomy about prospects in Bengal, did not think that there was much hope of its holding together, unless he could get a Coalition Ministry in the next six months, and he saw little chance of that. He said that Suhrwardy was a very frightened man, that he was almost the only Indian politician he knew capable of taking a long view, but that he was a cad and untrustworthy. Burrows liked what he had seen of Liaquat. We had some discussion of all-India politics and agreed that the personalities of Gandhi and Jinnah had been the determining factors in preventing a solution of the Indian problem. He was very relieved that G. had left Bengal, it had taken 20 of his best police to protect him; and he was sarcastic over an American correspondent’s article headed ‘Gandhi walks alone’!

Burrows is a really sterling character, the best type of Englishman we breed; and I think he was genuinely sorry at my departure.

14 March
I sent a message to Nehru asking him not to go to Peshawar and he agreed though protestingly. I think this will relieve Olaf Caroe’s mind.

15 March
The President of the Council of State, Hossain Imam, came ostensibly to say goodbye, but occupied 15 minutes by a hymn of hate against Congress, especially on the score of lack of generosity to Muslims; this is of course true and is where Congress have shown such shortsightedness, they could have appeased the Muslims without really giving away anything essential for the good of India or their cause, but they have the mentality of the small lawyer who will hold on to the smallest point of his argument and, of the bania who will not give up one anna of his bargain.

Spens, Chief Justice, came to say goodbye and we had a long talk. He says that the Calcutta Enquiry will show that there was Hindu incitement and a sudden and concerted attack without provocation on the Muslims in the north of Calcutta; that the Ministry will come out of it all right; that there was delay in bringing in the military owing to faulty information; and that Bucher and the military were magnificent when called in.

Claude Auchinleck came for his last official interview. He certainly regrets the change. He says he can get no decisions from Baldev Singh who is always away on political tours and anyway is afraid to give decisions by himself.

Then came Patel. We discussed the appointment of a DIB, vice Smith Patel wants to put in an Indian ICS man on the grounds that there is no Indian policeman good enough (actually there is a good Muslim but Patel will not have him and he will not serve under Patel). I said that it would be bad for police morale if the plum appointment in the IP went to an outsider. P. took the usual communal line about the Punjab and accused the officials and police, who are mainly Muslim, of bias. He had written to me advocating martial law, but I explained to him the disadvantages. We then got on to the Budget against which he declaimed very hotly; it has obviously got Birla and ‘Big Business’, with whom P. works closely, very much on the raw, and they are using every means to get it amended. P. wants the whole Budget taken again in Cabinet, I said we must wait now for the Select Committee’s report. Patel was very friendly at the finish and we have always dealt on frank terms and have respected one another. He is entirely communal and has no sense of compromise or generosity towards Moslems, but he is more of a man than most of these Hindu politicians.

The vanguard of Mountbatten’s large staff turned up.

I fell behind all the time today and never got abreast of the work. There was a continual succession of files and visitors.

I had a long talk with Liaquat mainly about the Budget. He said that it would have been perfectly easy for Nehru to come and see him if the Congress wished to propose any modifications in the Budget. The fact was that Big business, headed by Birla and Dalmia, had got at the Congress High Command; and that instead of coming to him direct they had intrigued behind his back in the Select Committee. Actually he had now carried his proposals through the Select Committee with some modifications of the Business Profits Tax.

I have always liked Liaquat and thought him full of common sense, but he has no use for Hindus. Still if he had been in Jinnah’s place I think we could have got a solution.

Azad spent most of his interview after lunch about the records of the Political Department. Congress have an idea that we are destroying all inconvenient or compromising files about the States and our relations with them, and want to try and have a finger in the matter....

In the evening I saw Matthai, the ablest and most impartial of my Ministers. We talked mainly of the Budget, I think he really approves the proposals and realizes the difficulties Congress is in, if they back Birla and Co, but he had to put across the party line of modification of the proposals. On the question of British withdrawal he was gloomy on the future prospects of India, but said our real mistakes began 40 years ago, especially with Curzon’s bureaucratic centralization and worship of efficiency, instead of putting Indian gradually into the saddle and accepting a lower standard of efficiency.

I had one of Nehru’s rather intemperate letters on my request to him not to go to Peshawar; it ended with a demand for the resignation of the Governor. I sent a soothing reply and said nothing about his demand with regard to the Governor.

Cabinet meeting in the evening began with the INA case. I saved discussion on it by saying that I assumed that Cabinet supported the demand for the release of the prisoners; and when they assented I announced my intention to over-rule my Cabinet for the first time in my Viceroyalty, at what will probably be my last Cabinet meeting. Only Mandal tried to start an argument on the merits of the case, and I stopped him. Nehru said that my decision would have serious consequences but on the whole they took it quite well. After that we got through quite a lot of business.

A day of farewells and packing. Two Nepalese generals came to give me a farewell message from the Maharaja of Nepal.
Then Mandal gave me a half-hour discourse on the disabilities of the Scheduled Castes, their regret that the British are going and their fears for the future. It was all on the usual lines; but Mandal spoke with obvious sincerity and showed up better than at previous interviews when I have found him tiresome. I think part of his trouble is that his command of English is poor. And he is not clever.

Little V.P. came in the afternoon. He has always been an admirer of mine, I think, and regrets my going. Always an optimist, he thinks the budget dispute will be settled by Liaquat giving way. He gets this from Patel, I expect.

In the evening a farewell party for the staff, about 300, I don’t think I have ever properly realized the size of the Vice-regal household. Then Mavlankar, President of the Legislative Assembly, and his wife came in to say goodbye, quite a gesture I think from a very confirmed Congress man.

Finally a farewell dinner-party to the Cabinet, which went quite well. Nehru was quite genial and talkative; he is apt sometimes to be silent and aloof at these gatherings. I gathered from Liaquat that compromise on the Budget is possible.

22 March
My last day. A good turn-out for the last morning ride from HauzKhas, 12 of the Personal Staff, Felicity and the Policemen.

Ismay, Mieville and some of M-B’s staff turned up for lunch and I had about an hour with Pug Ismay and Mieville after lunch. They do not seem really to know very much about it or to have any very new or definite policy.

Then came the ceremonial arrival of the M-B’s, the Bodyguard in full dress looked well and he was very pleased with them.

I talked with Dickie M-B from about 4.30 p.m. to 7 p.m. He began by telling me that the PM had sent for him and asked him to take on the job either before or at the time I left England last December. So that Attlee’s assurances at that time and subsequent letters were completely insincere. He said that Attlee had been quite moved by my telegram assuring him that I had no intention to make trouble for the Government and was well disposed.

He then talked of the INA, having in mind apparently to reduce the sentences of those serving sentences for brutality as ‘part of a political gesture’. He also proposed to write to Gandhi and Jinnah to ask them to come and see him, one more Viceroy, I suppose, who hopes to reconcile these intractable personalities. He seems to have succeeded in getting compensation for the Services, thanks partly, I think, to my cables to him not to come out without settling this.

He also talked of his hope of getting India to accept some form of Dominion status.

At 7.15 p.m. I saw Liaquat about the Budget crisis. He was prepared to consider the compromise I suggested, but only to prevent my success or from the embarrassment of a contentious Cabinet meeting at once, and provided Congress agreed to support all other Budget proposals, otherwise he would fight out the battle in the Assembly and ‘I am on a strong wicket’, as I think he is. We parted on very friendly terms. I like Liaquat and have a high opinion of him.

We dined alone with the Mountbattens. After dinner Pug Ismay, Mieville and George Abell came in and we talked politics for about an hour and a half.
27 March (Claridges Hotel)
The departure ceremony from Delhi on 23rd went of all right. The M-B’s contrary to precedent came to the airfield to see us off, which was friendly. On arriving at Karachi, I paid a short visit to the 2nd Bn., (Black Watch) and we then flew on and got to Habbaniyeh at 11.30 p.m. and stayed at the A.O.C.’s house. Next day we flew on to Rome, arriving about 4 p.m. local time.
Next day (25th), we spent most of the morning at the Vatican, mainly in the Sistine Chapel, and took off at 11.45 a.m. We got to North-holt at about 4 p.m. P-L, A.V. Alexander met me from the Government, Cripps sent the excuse of pressing business. At Joyce’s pressing request I said a few innocuous words to the press, very haltingly. We then went off to Claridges where the Government had booked us a suite for 10 days.

The only thing I have to record from the India angle in the next few days is a talk with one of my staff. He said that there had been a leak from P.S.V.’s office; that George Abell’s Indian stenographer, whom he trusted absolutely though I had once or twice questioned the advisability of trusting any Indian with really secret stuff, had been passing copies of George’s letters out to Congress; that Nehru had brought some home and showed them to Cripps as evidence that my staff was at heart biased against Congress; and that this was largely responsible for my dismissal. Now if there is any truth in this, it does show an amazing mentality on the part of the Cabinet Ministers concerned. Instead of warning P.S.V. or myself of the leakage; and, if they considered that the letters which were produced showed disloyalty to HMG’s policy on the part of P.S.V., or myself, confronting us with them and asking for an explanation, they allow the leakage of secret correspondence to go on or at least fail to warn us—and make arrangements to replace me more or less at Nehru’s bidding. ‘Politics is a dishonest business’, R.A.B. Butler said to me in 1943. It certainly does change the ethical code of men who would,
I suppose regard themselves normally as men of honesty and principle. I am glad that I have finished with politics.

28 March
I went round to Downing Street this morning by request to meet the India Committee—PM, Cripps, Alexander, P-L, Listowel, Addison. They questioned me for about 40 minutes in a rather routine and perfunctory fashion, as if they knew all the answers already. Towards the end the
S. of S. said: ‘Is there any general advice you can give us on how to proceed?’ I said that I had given them advice and that they had not liked it, that they had presumably given my successor full instructions, and that anything that I was likely to say could hardly have any influence. For what it was worth, however, I could only recommend them to make a last effort to bring the Parties together, and if that failed, as it seemed likely to do, to start on detailed arrangements for the partition of India, so as to avoid confusion when we leave, and in the hope that there may be some last-minute arrangement about Defence and others. Shortly afterwards the PM said: ‘Well, thank you, that is all, I think’, and bowed me out without one single word of thanks or commendation. He is a singularly ungracious person. I had no desire for an insincere little speech and was glad to be spared it, but it was not a good exhibition of manners.

31 March
I think I had better close this record of my time in India at this point. I had a talk on India with Bobbety Cranborne today, and he said that it was a great pity that HMG had not taken my advice and consulted the Opposition of Indian affairs. The Lords had always found it almost impossible to extract information about India from P-L, who was vague or evasive in his replies. This was one of the reasons why they had intended to press the debate in the Lords to a division. It was the speech of Halifax that had led them to re-consider the decision.

R.A.B. Butler said that my final broadcast had created great impression, and was simple and dignified.

I dined with Monty, who talked mainly about forthcoming Conference, Spearhead.

I am not going to attempt any summary here of my Viceroyalty. My last letter to the King was something in the nature of that. Whether I shall ever have the time or inclination to go through all these journals again and comment on them, I am rather doubtful. I think I have always been honest in the entries and have tried to represent accurately the events, discussions and impressions of the time. Perhaps they may be of interest to my family, or to some future historian many years hence. It has been interesting to write them down though rather a burden at times....
Chapter 5. Statement of 20 February 1947 and Its Aftermath

1. Declaration on Indian Policy

   Text of His Majesty’s Government’s Statement, 20 February 1947

   1. It has long been the policy of successive British Governments to work towards the realization of self-government in India. In pursuance of this policy an increasing measure of responsibility has been devolved on Indians and to-day the civil administration and the Indian Armed Forces rely to a very large extent on Indian civilians and officers. In the constitutional field the Acts of 1919 and 1935 passed by the British Parliament each represented a substantial transfer of political power. In 1940 the Coalition Government recognized the principle that Indians should themselves frame a new constitution for a fully autonomous India, and in the offer of 1942 they invited them to set up a Constituent Assembly for this purpose as soon as the war was over.

   2. His Majesty’s Government believe this policy to have been right and in accordance with sound democratic principles. Since they came into office, they have done their utmost to carry it forward to its fulfilment. The declaration of the Prime Minister of 15th March last which met with general approval in Parliament and the country, made it clear that it was for the Indian people themselves to choose their future status and constitution and that in the opinion of His Majesty’s Government the time had come for responsibility for the Government of India to pass into Indian hands.

   3. The Cabinet Mission which was sent to India last year spent over three months in consultation with Indian leaders in order to help them to agree upon a method for determining the future constitution of India, so that the transfer of power might be smoothly and rapidly effected. It was only when it seemed clear that without some initiative from the Cabinet Mission agreement was unlikely to be reached that they put forward proposals themselves.

   4. These proposals, made public in May last, envisaged that the future constitution of India should be settled by a Constituent Assembly composed, in the manner suggested therein, of representatives of all communities and interests in British India and of the Indian States.

   5. Since the return of the Mission an Interim Government has been set up at the Centre composed of the political leaders of the major communities exercising wide powers within the existing constitution. In all the Provinces Indian Governments responsible to Legislatures are in office.
6. It is with great regret that His Majesty’s Government find that there are still differences among Indian Parties which are preventing the Constituent Assembly from functioning as it was intended that it should. It is of the essence of the plan that the Assembly should be fully representative.

7. His Majesty’s Government desire to hand over their responsibility to authorities established by a constitution approved by all parties in India in accordance with the Cabinet Mission’s plan, but unfortunately there is at present no clear prospect that such a constitution and such authorities will emerge. The present state of uncertainty is fraught with danger and cannot be indefinitely prolonged. His Majesty’s Government wish to make it clear that it is their definite intention to take the necessary steps to effect the transference of power into responsible Indian hands by a date not later than June 1948.

8. This great sub-continent now containing over 400 million people has for the last century enjoyed peace and security as a part of the British Commonwealth and Empire. Continued peace and security are more than ever necessary to-day if the full possibilities of economic development are to be realized and a higher standard of life attained by the Indian people.

9. His Majesty’s Government are anxious to hand over their responsibilities to a Government which, resting on the sure foundation of the support of the people, is capable of maintaining peace and administering India with justice and efficiency. It is therefore essential that all parties should sink their differences in order that they may be ready to shoulder the great responsibilities which will come upon them next year.

10. After months of hard work by the Cabinet Mission a great measure of agreement was obtained as to the method by which a constitution should be worked out. This was embodied in their statements of May last. His Majesty’s Government there agreed to recommend to Parliament a constitution worked out, in accordance with the proposals made therein, by a fully representative Constituent Assembly. But if it should appear that such a constitution will not have been worked out by a fully representative Assembly before the time mentioned in paragraph 7, His Majesty’s Government will have to consider to whom the powers of the Central Government in British India should be handed over, on the due date, whether as a whole to some form of central Government for British India or in some areas to the existing Provincial Governments, or in such other way as may seem most reasonable and in the best interests of the Indian people.

11. Although the final transfer of authority may not take place until June 1948, preparatory measures must be put in hand in advance. It is important that the efficiency of the civil administration should be maintained and that the defence of India should be fully provided for. But inevitably, as the process of transfer proceeds, it will become progressively more difficult to carry out to the letter all the provisions of the Government of India Act, 1935. Legislation will be introduced in due course to give effect to the final transfer of power.

12. In regard to the Indian States, as was explicitly stated by the Cabinet Mission, His Majesty’s Government do not intend to hand over their powers and obligations under paramountcy to any Government of British India. It is not intended to bring paramountcy, as a system, to a conclusion earlier than the date of the final transfer.
of power, but it is contemplated that for the intervening period the relations of the Crown with individual States may be adjusted by agreement.

13. His Majesty's Government will negotiate agreements in regard to matters arising out of the transfer of power with the representatives of those to whom they propose to transfer power.

14. His Majesty’s Government believe that British commercial and industrial interests in India can look forward to a fair field for their enterprise under the new conditions. The commercial connection between India and the United Kingdom has been long and friendly, and will continue to be to their mutual advantage.

15. His Majesty’s Government cannot conclude this statement without expressing on behalf of the people of this country their goodwill and good wishes towards the people of India as they go forward to this final stage in their achievement of self-government. It will be the wish of everyone in these islands that, notwithstanding constitutional changes, the association of the British and Indian peoples should not be brought to an end; and they will wish to continue to do all that is in their power to further the well-being of India.

2. ‘Attlee Threatens India with Partition’

A GRAVE threat of multiple partition for India was the central feature of a major statement of Government policy by Mr Attlee in the House of Commons yesterday. It was accompanied by the news that Viceroy is to be changed. Lord Wavell is going in March and Lord Mountbatten will take over. It was followed by a spectacular ‘row’ between Mr Attlee and Mr Churchill, who was trying to get the Premier to give reasons for Wavell’s removal. At the end of the uproar, Mr Attlee and Mr Churchill left the Chamber amicably together.

TRANSFER OF POWER

Mr Attlee’s announcement proclaimed that the Government intended to take the necessary steps to ‘effect the transference of power into responsible Indian hands by a date not later than June, 1948.’

Then followed the passages of his statement which defined what this, practically speaking meant. The Government said Mr Attlee, had ‘agreed to recommend to Parliament a Constitution worked out by a fully representative Constitutive Assembly.

‘But if it should appear that such a Constitution would not have been worked out by a fully representative Assembly before the time mentioned [June, 1948], His Majesty’s Government will have to consider to whom the powers of the central Government in British India should be handed over on the due date.’

They would consider, said Mr Attlee, whether these powers should be handed ‘as a whole to some form of central government for British India or in some areas to the existing provincial governments or in such other way as may seem most reasonable in the best interests of the Indian people.’

PRINCES REMAIN

Mr Attlee declared the Government had no intention of ‘handing over India to chaos.’ As for the Indian States, he repeated the well-known fact that ‘His Majesty’s Government do not intend to hand over their powers and obligations under paramountcy to any Government of British India.

‘The relations of the Crown with the individual States may be adjusted by agreements.’
Mr Gallacher (Com. West File) succeeded in asking above the uproar which followed the statement whether any Labour or trade union leader had been considered for the Viceroy’s position when a change became necessary.

‘DIVIDE AND RULE’ STILL THE POLICY

The Government’s policy statement foreshadows policy of ‘divide and rule’ carried to the limit.

Mr Attlee makes it clear that when he talks of transfer of ‘power’ to ‘responsible Indian hands’ he does not mean transfer of full power to a central Indian Government. On the contrary, he underlined in his statement the probability that ‘power’ will be transferred piecemeal, some to a central Government, some to ‘existing Provincial Governments.’

This, there seems little doubt, means that certain Provincial Governments would in fact be raised to a status equal—in terms of ‘power’—with the Central Government.

REBUFF TO CONGRESS

This type of ‘patchwork partition’ clearly increases the significance of the already familiar determination to preserve the powers of the Princes and of the British Governments in relation to them.

The announcement is a direct rebuff to Congress and will certainly increase the hopes of Moslem ‘separatism’.

It is generally believed that the removal of Lord Wavell and his replacement by Lord Mountbatten—who is regarded as expert in the workings of ‘the new imperialism’—is due to the belief that Lord Wavell was politically too closely implicated with the Congress.

He is stated to have made certain verbal commitments which must now be thrown over making it impossible for him to maintain his position.

3. Nehru Denies Any Role in Change of Viceroyalty

Nehru’s Statement to the Press, 22 February 1947

A news agency report published on Saturday morning purporting to emanate from a source close to me is unjust both to Lord Wavell and to me. Regarding our reactions to Prime Minister Attlee’s statement, my colleagues and I will no doubt express our views. What has been stated in the news agency report is likely to mislead opinion. What I am concerned about specially, however, are the references to Lord Wavell and to Lord Mountbatten. There have been differences of opinion during the past months, but I have never doubted Lord Wavell’s sincerity and desire to serve India’s interests. He has carried a heavy burden and has worked hard. I have a high regard for him and I shall be sorry in many ways to part with him.

I met Lord Mountbatten during my brief visit to Singapore last year and he was very courteous to me. I met him once again as he was passing through Delhi to discuss certain matters relating to the transport of paddy from Java to India. These are the only two meetings I have had with him so far.
I regret that unauthorized and often incorrect speculations should be made at a time when we have to face a new situation which requires the fullest consideration.

1 The appointment of Lord Mountbatten as the new Viceroy of India was announced on 20 February 1947, simultaneously with the statement on Indian policy. A report of the Associated Press of America, published on 22 February, accredited a source close to Nehru with holding the view that the change in Viceroyalty was ‘a move to placate Pandit Nehru, who has long been known to regard Lord Wavell as an obstruction to a settlement with the Muslim League’. The report also said that Mountbatten and Nehru had become personal friends during the latter’s visit to Singapore in March 1946.

4. ‘Nehru Welcomes HMG’s Statement: “A Wise and Courageous Decision”’

The Hindustan Times, 23 February 1947.

HOPE OF PEACEFUL TRANSITION

Pandit Jawaharlal Nehru, Vice-President of the Interim Government, in a statement, issued on Saturday night commends the British Government’s White Paper on India as ‘a wise and courageous one’ and says that the work of the Constituent Assembly must now be carried on with greater speed.

Pandit Nehru adds: ‘In this great work we invite afresh all those who have kept aloof and we ask all to be partners in this joint and historic undertaking, casting aside fear and suspicion, which ill become a great people on the eve of freedom.’

The following is the text of Pandit Nehru’s statement:

The statement made by Prime Minister, Mr Clement Attlee, in the House of Commons on 20th February, in regard to Indian policy has received and is receiving the earnest attention of all those who are vitally interested in bringing the present transitional period to a satisfactory conclusion.

The statement is obscure in some places and requires careful consideration. The outstanding feature of it, however, is the decision of the British Government to transfer power to Indian hands not later than June 1948. It has further been stated that preparatory measures must be put in hand in advance. This is important, as only thus can be secured a rapid and effective transference of power within this period.

My colleagues and I are giving the fullest thought to this statement, and early next month the Congress Working Committee will meet and give its considered views on the new situation that has arisen.

‘CHALLENGE TO ALL’

I should like to say, however, even at this stage that the decision of the British Government is a wise and courageous one. The clear and definite declaration that the final transference of power will take place by a date not later than June 1948 not only removes all misconception and suspicion, but also brings reality and a certain dynamic quality to the present situation in India. That decision will undoubtedly have far-reaching consequences and puts a burden and responsibility on all concerned.

It is a challenge to all of us and we shall try to meet it bravely in the spirit of that challenge. I trust that we shall all endeavour to get out of the ruts and end the internal conflicts that have frustrated our efforts and delayed our advance and accept this burden and responsibility keeping only the independence and advancement of India in view.

CONSTITUENT ASSEMBLY’S TASK

The work of the Constituent Assembly must now be carried on with greater speed so that the new and independent India may take shape and be clothed with a constitution worthy of her and bringing relief and opportunity to all her children. In this great work we invite afresh all those who have kept aloof and we ask all to be partners in this joint and historic undertaking casting aside fear and suspicion, which ill become a great people on the eve of freedom.

The Constituent Assembly, however constituted, can only proceed with its work on a voluntary basis. There can be no compulsion, except the compulsion of events, which none can ignore. The moment British rule goes, the responsibility for the governance of India must inevitably rest on her people and their representatives alone. They will have to shoulder that responsibility. Why then should we not accept this responsibility now and work together to find integrated solutions of our problems? No external authority is going to hinder us in future.

The British Government on behalf of their people have expressed their good-will and good wishes to the people of India. We have had a long past of conflict and ill-will. But we earnestly hope that this past is over. We look forward to a peaceful and co-operative transition and to the establishment of close and friendly relations with the British people for the mutual advantage of both countries and for the advancement of the cause of peace and freedom all over the world.

Pandit Jawaharlal Nehru’s statement, which was issued in consultation with Congress colleagues in the Cabinet, was received with keen interest in Muslim League circles. While the official League reply to it will be given by the League Working Committee when it meets, an unofficial League view available on Saturday night considered Pandit Nehru’s appeal as helpful in spirit, but vague in content. The Muslim League, according to an exponent of this viewpoint, has always been willing to come to a peaceful settlement on the basis of independence to each of the two major nations.

‘Pandit Nehru’s references to the present Constituent Assembly, however, must be regarded as inconsistent with his expressed desire for Muslim co-operation. The new situation created by the Statement of 20th February calls for an altogether new approach and a method different to that represented by the present Constituent Assembly. That new approach must be on the basis of two sovereign States coming together for all common purposes by voluntary agreement. The moment Congress accepts this principle the entire situation will change and all bitterness will disappear’, said a Muslim League spokesman.—API

5. Implications of HMG’s Statement

Extract from a Letter from Jawaharlal Nehru to M.K. Gandhi, 24 February 1947

New Delhi

Dear Bapu,

... You must have seen my statement on the new declaration made by the British Government. That statement was considered carefully by all our colleagues in the Interim Government minus, of course, the Muslim Leaguers. We wanted very much to consult Kripalani before a statement was issued and he was to have come here. But then he fell ill at Allahabad. We felt that something should be said soon both for India and abroad. Attlee’s statement contains much that is indefinite and likely to give trouble. But I am convinced that it is in the final analysis a brave and definite statement. It meets our oft-repeated demand for quitting India. It may not be exactly as we would have liked it. But the real thing is that they have finally decided and announced that they are quitting. Whatever their motives might be, they cannot go back on this and everything that happens from now onwards must be governed by it.

The present position is that if the Muslim League comes into the Constituent Assembly, which is very unlikely, then the Cabinet Mission’s Statement of 16th May applies. Otherwise the limitations of that Statement go and the Constituent Assembly functions really as a sovereign body without sections and groups and a limited Centre. But there is one limitation: that its decisions will apply only to the parts represented in it. More or less this was what you said when we met last. This may result in the Indian Union being first established for the whole of India except Bengal, the Punjab and Sind. Of course the Union constitution will apply to or rather be open to all; but these provinces may not choose to adhere to it. If so the second question that arises is that those parts of Bengal and Punjab which are fully represented in the Constituent Assembly (Western Bengal and Southern Punjab) should be parts of the Union. That means a partition of Punjab and Bengal. It is unlikely that Jinnah or the Muslim League will agree to this truncated Pakistan which can never succeed economically or otherwise. They will thus have to make a choice ultimately between this and joining the Indian Union possibly on special terms. In other words the position of Bengal and Punjab in such an event approximates to that of an Indian State.

Matters will move swiftly now or at any rate after Mountbatten comes. We do not yet know what special directive has been given to Mountbatten by the British Cabinet. Logically this should be to function as a constitutional head only and to allow the Government to act as a Dominion Government. That would mean the Government having a leader. This again would bring matters with the Muslim League to a head.

The Working Committee is meeting on the 5th March and we shall take no other step till then. Our general outlook at present is to approach privately some of the Muslim League leaders and try to induce them to come into the Constituent Assembly. If they refuse to come in, then the question of their remaining in the Interim Government has to be faced afresh. For the moment we are not pressing for their resignation as this would, of course, put an end to all talk of cooperation. But anyhow this matter should be settled one way or the other in the course of the next month.

We have to go ahead now rapidly with the Constituent Assembly. We shall try to work to a time-table which means finishing the constitution-making by the end of the year.

Your advice at this critical moment would help us greatly. But you are too far away for consultation and you refuse to move out of East Bengal. Still if you could convey to us your ideas on the subject, we would be very grateful.

As I have already written to you, the Asian Conference begins on the 23rd March and will last for at least ten days. We are having a very distinguished and representative gathering then from almost all the countries of Asia. If you do not come to it your absence will be keenly felt by all.

Yours,

Jawaharlal
6. Gandhi’s Reading of 20th February Statement
Letter from M.K. Gandhi to Jawaharlal Nehru, 24 February 1947

KAZIRKHIL, RAMGANJ P.S., NOAKHALI DT.

CHI JAWAHARLAL,

Today being silence day I am writing this. But it will be typed for your easy reading.
I have read Attlee’s speech. Lest I might embarrass you by an untoward word or phrase I am not saying anything just now.

Evidently I had anticipated practically the whole of it in my speeches here, that is, if I am interpreting the speech correctly. My interpretation is this:

Independence will be recognized of those parts which desired it and will do without British protection.
The British will remain where they are wanted.
This may lead to Pakistan for those provinces or portions which may want it. No one will be forced one way or the other. The Congress provinces if they are wise will get what they want.

Much will depend upon what the Constituent Assembly will do and what you as the Interim Government are able to do.
If the British Government are and are able to remain sincere the declaration is good. Otherwise it is dangerous.

Now about Sardar Niranjan Singh Gill. He has been to Bihar and has produced a report which somewhat reflects upon the Sinha Ministry. You should see him and his report. It has gone to Suhrawardy and Sinha under my advice. He and Sardar Jiwan Singh have not hit it off. The whole thing is bad. INA seems to have split up. Probably you know all this.

In view of the above report I might have to go to Bihar. God knows. You may show this to friends.

Hope you are well.

Blessings from
BAPU

7. ‘The Last Chance’

Calling the latest British decision ‘a challenge to all of us’, Pandit Nehru promises: ‘We shall try to meet it bravely in the spirit of that challenge’. But the vagueness of the platitudes with which he proceeds to invite the Muslims (without mentioning them) ‘to be partners in this joint and historic undertaking, casting aside fear and suspicion’ justifies little hope that Congress intends anything but the bravery of words. Nor does his obdurate refusal to read in the 20 February Statement the obituary of the Constituent Assembly indicate a correction of the Congress’s angle of perverted vision. And yet the situation created by the British declaration does provide one more—and the last—chance to India’s largest political party to shed its complexes and communal narrowness, its own fear and suspicion, and to rise to that height of statesmanship of which in the past it has proved incapable because of its reliance on a British verdict in favour of Akhand Hindustan. But manoeuvring for advantage and jockeying for position has become second nature with Hindu leadership, so that even now when Britain makes it plainly known that she is no longer interested in these inner complexities of the Indian scene, the second most important personality in the Congress cannot restrain his genius for misinterpretation of plainly spoken British words.

The Muslim position needs no re-stating. Eight months ago they gave practical proof of their desire for a peaceful settlement and agreed to a big sacrifice. They accepted the Cabinet Mission’s Plan for limited Pakistan superimposed with a limited Union Centre. Almost immediately began Congress manoeuvres to destroy the basis of the first and strengthen the scope and powers of the second. The history of that Congress intrigue of interpretations requires no recapitulation. That scheme is dead and cannot be revived. The machinery it set up for a purpose no longer valid is likewise obsolete. The concession that the Muslims once made elicited from the Hindus not responsive trust but a renewed barrage to bear down vital Muslim positions. The Muslim gesture of goodwill was met with intrigue and ill will. The experiment has failed, the concessions stands irrevocably withdrawn. Not again will the Muslim nation gamble with its fate.

But the door to an honourable understanding on a new and more realistic basis still stands invitingly open. The British Statement should spur the Congress towards it more than the Muslim League. What Pandit Nehru describes as ‘obscure’ is not so obscure after all. If the zero hour finds the Congress still cutting capers on its high horse, both horse and rider will find the ambit of their gambolling reduced to much narrower limits than the dreamland of Akhand Hindustan. The illusion of a united India may take time in fading, but fade it must on the morrow of next year’s June. When the dawn of freedom comes its dear light will not shine only on the tri-colour to gladden Hindu hearts. The crescent-spangled green of Muslim independence will vie with it in the glory of equal sovereignty. How many banners will proclaim the rebirth of kingdoms from the palace-tops of Their Highnesses is at present incalculable.

That is the certainty, whether Congress likes it or not. Whatever the shape of it may be, Pakistan awaits the Muslims’ taking, and take it they will. Still Muslims would far rather take over their inheritance by mutual agreement, if that were possible. And why should it not be possible? Pandit Nehru wants Muslims to cast aside fear and suspicion. If 20 million Muslims are prepared to throw in their lot with some 120 million Hindus in Hindustan, why cannot 30 million Hindus throw in their lot with but 60 million Muslims in Pakistan? Who is being afraid and suspicious? There is no question of domination of one by the other; at least Muslims do not desire it in Pakistan. All that they want is that theirs shall be the leadership in progress whose benefits will be shared by all alike without favour and without discrimination. They do not grudge the Hindus the same leadership in Hindustan. Nor are Muslims averse to a pooling of resources for the purposes of joint progress and joint enterprise in spheres that admit of common endeavour. On that basis alone can there be a new approach, if only Congress will abandon its dream of Hindu domination. The last chance to make that new approach is still there. It is for the Congress to decide whether to take it or to burn the few remaining boats. It is doubtful if the trade unions, which in the recent past have often been at loggerheads with the employers, would be able to face the unpleasant necessity with which the Government’s survey has confronted them. The attitude of their undisciplined followers may even threaten the leadership of the trade unions if the latter is inclined to accept the Government policy as the dictates of fate. The Socialists may find it very difficult to prevail upon the workers to abandon all their demands because it is difficult to reverse the effect of their own propaganda among the workers, which has been carried on for decades and which promised a ‘Socialist utopia’.

8. ‘Majority of MPs in Favour of HMG’s Policy’

LONDON, Saturday.—The Labour Cabinet’s decisions on India, including an announcement of the date (June 1948) when the British will quit, are expected to have the support of a vast majority of Government’s parliamentary strength of nearly 400 members in the House of Commons debate during the week after the next.

The Liberal Party, whose handful of representatives nevertheless represent several million votes in the country, may also back the Government.

The Conservative Opposition has not yet disclosed whether it intends to drive the Government to a vote. They will make their chief target of criticism the Government’s decision to put a date on British departure. The change of the Viceroy may be another debating point.

It is the British Government’s practice to inform Opposition leaders of its intention to take fateful decisions and there is a belief that this practice was followed in the present instance.
Consequently, political observers are puzzled at Mr Churchill’s insistence on Thursday that the Prime Minister Mr Clement Attlee should state publicly the reasons which led to Viceroy Lord Wavell’s retirement.

Most acutely distressed by the announcement of the quit date include Sir John Anderson, a former Governor of Bengal, who apparently thinks the securing of agreement and transfer of power impossible in 15 months.

A curtain raiser to the Commons’ debate will be the India debate in the House of Lords on Tuesday, which Conservative Peers, who vastly outnumber Labour, have set down as an amendment dissociating themselves from the Government’s decision. A debate of high quality is expected as the Peers include many statesmen with experience of India’s political affairs.

9. Nehru Explains His Press Statement
Letter from Jawaharlal Nehru to Wavell, 24 February 1947

Dear Lord Wavell,

You must have seen a statement I have issued giving my reaction to Mr Attlee’s statement in the House of Commons on 20th February. Normally I would have waited till the meeting of the Congress Working Committee. But I thought that a clear declaration at this stage was desirable and helpful.

2. I have deliberately not referred in my statement to many matters which are by no means clear. I wanted to emphasize the dominant feature of Mr Attlee’s statement from which other consequences naturally flow. These other matters will have to be considered so that there might be no misunderstanding in the future.

3. In the course of our conversation on 21st evening you communicated to me a message on behalf of HMG. This referred to the joint Letter we had sent to you pointing out that the
The continuance of the Muslim League members in the Interim Government was incompatible with the British Cabinet's plan or with any effective functioning of the Government. You stated that HMG had postponed a reply to it in view of the developments that had taken place, further that while the resolution passed by the All India Congress Committee on 5th January accepted the British Government’s statement of 6th December, there were some points in it which seemed to take away somewhat from that full acceptance. It was also pointed out that some rules made by the Constituent Assembly were also inconsistent with the provisions of the Cabinet Delegation’s scheme and appeared to encroach on the powers of the Sections and Groups.

4. I pointed out to you then that there was some misapprehension about this matter and in effect there was no such variance. If you so wish it I can consider any particular points in detail though I hardly think that this is necessary in view of the statement made by Mr Attlee on 20th February. I might however draw your attention to the fact that this criticism of the All-India Congress Committee’s resolution and the rules of the Constituent Assembly has come more than six weeks after they were passed. It is easy to criticize complicated sets of rules or a long resolution. But I am quite sure that the objections raised have no force whatever. We had stated quite clearly in the resolution and subsequently that we had accepted the statement of 6th December. It is easy enough to remove doubts if there is an intention to understand and to cooperate. But it is not possible to do so if the intention is just to find fault and in no event to cooperate. We have tried in the past to meet all legitimate objections and criticisms so as to gain the cooperation of all in the work of the Constituent Assembly. We shall continue to do so because obviously it is desirable to have that cooperation.

5. We sent to you our joint letter asking for the resignation of the Muslim League members in the Cabinet because it had become impossible in the interest of good government and progress to have a Central Government which was divided and in which one group functioned as an opposition both in governmental activities and in the country. This was contrary to the Cabinet Delegation’s scheme and it had a disruptive influence on the administration. We have seen the extraordinary spectacle of members of the Central Government leading and encouraging ‘Direct Action’ and disobedience still continuing openly and something similar is now being attempted in the Frontier Province. It is difficult for me to conceive of any Central Government whose members function in this way. It is obvious that this matter requires urgent decision. Attlee’s statement throws no light upon it.

6. Nevertheless I told you in the course of our interview that I would not press for an immediate answer to our joint letter because we were anxious, in view of the new situation that had arisen not to bar the door to joint and cooperative working. Mr Attlee’s statement in some ways over-rides the Cabinet Mission’s plan. As I understand it, it means this: If the Muslim League comes into the Constituent Assembly, then the scheme of 16th May will continue to apply. If the League still refuses to come in, then others consequences follow.

7. This will have to be cleared up in the near future to enable us to proceed rapidly with the work of constitution-making. We shall try our utmost to gain the cooperation of the Muslim League on the basis of the Cabinet Mission’s scheme of 16th May. If however, we fail, we shall have to proceed on the other lines indicated or flowing from Mr Attlee’s statement. Whether the Interim Government can remain as it is or has to change will also depend on the developments indicated above. It is clear that that the present position cannot be maintained.

Yours sincerely
Jawaharlal Nehru
10. Initial Reactions to HMG’s Statement

Telegram from G.E.B. Abell to Ronald Harris, 25 February 1947

MOST IMMEDIATE

CONFIDENTIAL

NEW DELHI

No. 352-S. Your telegram No. 2517 of 22nd February. Reaction to statement of policy. Full press comment and other reaction have been sent you by telegram.

2. A lead has been given by Nehru in describing the new policy as a wise and courageous one. This summarizes most of the nationalist press comment. The fixing of a date is welcomed, and is admitted to prove the sincerity of His Majesty’s Government. There has as yet been little examination of the detail of the plan of transfer. A leading article in yesterday’s Hindustan Times points out with regard to States that although the paramountcy of Britain may lapse, the future Indian Union is bound to evolve its own paramountcy rights which are inherent in the geographical and economic relations of States with the rest of India. There has been comment on the vagueness of paragraph 10 of the statement. Congress comment generally stresses the hand-over to a Central Government, and is beginning to claim further powers for the Central Government in anticipation. Statement is held by Congress press to strengthen position of Constituent Assembly. Nehru’s letter telegraphed today shows that Congress will do their best to reach settlement with League but will expect His Majesty’s Government to agree to a new method of framing a constitution if they fail.

3. Gandhi has yet made no comment.

4. Jinnah has declared that ‘the Muslim League will not yield an inch in their demand for Pakistan’ and is reported to have said that the Constituent Assembly was dead, and other Muslim leaders are insisting that the new approach must be on the basis of two sovereign States. Some Muslim perturbation has been expressed that if the British align themselves openly with the Congress till they withdraw, civil war will become a distinct possibility. Muslim press comment generally stresses possibility of power being handed over to existing Provincial Governments. The date is welcomed, though much more guardedly than in Congress comment.

5. Governors have reported reactions in their Provinces as generally on the above lines, but waiting for a lead from the All-India party leaders. Assam comment is qualified by the peculiar position of the Province in Section B, and holds that the new statement is not likely to result in a settlement or an improvement in the position. It is recognized generally in the country that the statement is a challenge to Indian leaders, and the consequences of failure to reach a settlement will be serious. There has been no outburst anywhere, and left-wing Communist comment is negligible. Several Governors report that it is too early to assess clearly the reactions to the statement.

6. Bhopal’s immediate reactions have been telegraphed on the 22nd, and Secretary of State has seen his public statement which is more helpful and which invites the States to make their full contribution.

7. Viceroy’s impression is that while the statement has had a good reception generally, the two major parties interpret it on contradictory lines.

8. No definite hardening of opinion is likely until after the meetings of the Working Committees of the two main parties; the Congress meeting is fixed for the first week of March, and the Muslim League is at present expected to be a fortnight later. Viceroy has asked Jinnah to see him soon.

11. New Basis of Agreement between Congress and League

Letter from Sudhindra Nath Ghosh to J.B. Kripalani, President, INC, Allahabad, 25 February 1947

AICC Papers, File No. G-11/1946, NMML.

35 Amherst Street
Calcutta

To
The President,
The Indian National Congress,
Allahabad

Sir,

The intention to carry on the task of constitution making with a greater is likely to fail without the League’s co-operation. You may please note that—

1. As soon as the Assembly divides into sections and the minority (Congress members in Section B and C) draws up a constitution within a short time, the League must choose to join the above Section at a later stage only to break up that constitution by its majority note. This is absolutely certain and there is no remedy if Cabinet Mission’s Award is to be strictly followed.

2. If a new basis of agreement is to be found, a purely Indian Round Table Conference with the States, the League and the Congress with the elimination of British middle men should be convened and the deliberation completed before the next sitting of the Constituent Assembly.

3. In order to facilitate the success of this conference it is extremely important to set up coalition ministry within the next two or three weeks in all the provinces at least in Bihar, the Punjab and Bengal. The Congress will lose nothing thereby, but on the contrary, will be able, if it likes to have a friendly contact with Muslim masses in villages through the medium of these coalitions, this contact being otherwise impossible after the riots and British separatist declaration.

4. If, inspite of coalition, there be no agreement in the Round Table Conference, the Constituent Assembly has to meet charged with the task of a speedy delivery of the constitution for the whole of India and separately for the provinces. The Assembly must refuse to break up into Sections as may easily be done unanimously or by an overwhelming majority.

Although this will be a clear departure from the original Award, the British government, in view of their latest statement, will not be able to break up the Assembly. But the Congress has to declare itself free, its earlier resolution on 6.1.47 after a fixed date before which the Round Table Conference may be ended. Finally the Congress along with the States have to ask the nation to support the Constitution where Muslim opinion will have the greatest importance.
5. The constitution for Bengal, the Punjab and Sindh cannot be left out, for in that case there will be no meaning of a Union Constitution to NWFP and Assam which will be geographically isolated.

6. There is more than one clear hint in the White Paper that the final transference of power will be preceded by a general election. The Muslim League in already preparing the ground for this, in its own way through Civil Disobedience in the Punjab and NWFP—that in the latter strangely synchronizing with Mr Attlee’s declaration on 20.2.47. Either through coalition ministries or otherwise, the Congress should immediately set up machineries everywhere for Muslim contacts in villages, particularly of the Muslim majority provinces. These contacts should not necessarily be opposed to Pakistan but definitely anti-imperialistic rather than anti-Hindu.

7. Nothing in the next meeting of the Congress on 5.3.47 should remove possibilities of a stable League—Congress truce.

Sincerely yours
Sudhindra Nath Ghosh

12. Impact of HMG’s Statement

Extracts from a Letter from Jawaharlal Nehru to V.K. Krishna Menon, 27 February 1947

New Delhi

My dear Krishna,

... 3. Whatever the virtues or sins of Attlee’s statement might be, it has shaken up people here and forced them to think furiously. The Princes are meeting here in large numbers and again there is an attempt on the part of Bhopal and his supporters to sabotage the Constituent Assembly insofar as they can do it. They have been encouraged by Attlee’s references to the States and probably imagine that they can get better terms by standing out of the Constituent Assembly. On the other hand some other Princes object to this. We are meeting them day after tomorrow and are likely to have a fairly lively conference. Bhopal, the cleverest of them, wants to help the Muslim League as far as possible. C.P. Ramaswami Aiyar continues to play an intricate and double game and generally gives trouble. Behind them all is the Political Department intriguing and trying to put a spanner into everything.

4. The Muslim League is mum and Jinnah has chosen this moment for a little cruise in the Arabian Sea. I doubt very much if they will come into the Constituent Assembly. They imagine that they can exercise much more pressure from outside....

Yours affectionately,
Jawaharlal

13. ‘Not British Withdrawal but Continued Domination through Divide and Rule’

People’s Age, 2 March 1947.

The following statement has been issued to the Press by R. Palme Dutt, well-known Communist leader of Great Britain:
Wavell's dismissal and his replacement by Mountbatten and the new statement of policy for India reflect the further deepening crisis in India and the bankruptcy of the Cabinet Mission Plan. The new statement of policy is the most reactionary document yet issued by the British Government since the opening of the Cabinet Mission's negotiations.

This document has been widely preserved as if it were a great step forward setting a date for British withdrawal from India in June 1948. In point of fact it has nothing to do with the British withdrawing from India—what the document really lays down is something very different.

It makes it absolutely and finally clear that the Constituent Assembly will not be recognized as valid unless it contains both the Congress and the Muslim League.

It further makes it definitely clear that any constitution which may be drawn up will only be ratified by the British Parliament on the condition that it conforms completely with the requirement imposed by the Cabinet Mission Plan and is accepted by both the Congress and the League.

Thus, this question which was left without an explicit answer in the Parliamentary debates following the London Conference (when Mr Alexander was pressed thrice to state whether the British Government regarded the present Constituent Assembly to be valid or not and to be declared thrice his refusal to answer yes or no)—this question has now been explicitly answered in the negative.

It is made clear that the Constituent Assembly is in no sense whatsoever sovereign but entirely subject to Parliament and the British Government and that its decisions are not valid unless agreed to by the Congress and the League.

Intensifies Congress—League Differences

The obvious effect of this is not solving the antagonism between the Congress and the League but intensifying it, placing a premium on the League stand of irreconcilable opposition, since the British Government guarantees that such opposition if firmly maintained will be successful.

Even the London Times editorial has noted that the effect of the document will not diminish but inflame and intensify political and communal antagonism.

What is new in the document are the definite steps now proposed to be taken in the event the deadlock continues, which in fact this document does everything possible to continue as a consequence of its provisions.

The White Paper makes it absolutely clear that in the event of the continuance of the deadlock between the Congress and the League, the British Government after a period of 15 months will impose its own solution, that is, it will impose a British-made constitution taking the line of partition.

Further the language of the statement indicates a preparation for that British Award taking the line of partition.

In respect to British India it is laid down that the British Government will decide if a single Central Government or separate Provincial States or State based on grouping of Provinces, is to be set up.

In regard to the Princes it is emphasized that Britain retains paramountcy rights in her own hands independently of any Indian Government, and that any future relations between Britain and the Princes will be decided by Britain.

Here it is important to note that the official announcement of the appointment of Mountbatten declares, firstly, that he is appointed the Viceroy and Governor General of India, and, secondly, that he is also appointed as the representative of the British Crown in its dealings with Indian States.
Thereby it is implied that even if the formal position of the Viceroy and the Governor-General were to be modified, the status for Mountbatten in India as the representative for the Crown in its relations with the Princes will remain.

Should Open Eyes of Indian Patriots

Thus, the general character of the scheme continues to the extreme point the policy of divide and rule, to be the basis for continued domination over India.

The terms of the declaration should open the eyes of serious Indian patriots to the real character of the policy which Britain is pursuing in India, and the consequent dangerous entanglement of the Indian political organizations in the Cabinet Mission Plan.

The greater the entanglement, the more open and ruthless the British declaration of their intention to impose unilateral decisions on the constitutional future of India.

It should further be noted that the appointment of Mountbatten (renowned for his active military record in South East Asia) is accompanied by the appointment of Genera Ismay to be his Chief Adviser. Ismay was Churchill’s former Chief-of-Staff.

This throws a sharp light on the concentration of military preparations for the period now opening in India.

It is more than ever clear that the path forward for Indian freedom lies through development of a united Indian national front breaking completely with subservience to the British imposed Plan and leading the way to establish a constitution on the basis of the wishes of the Indian people.

14. Moonje Comments on the Indian Policy Statement

Letter from B.S. Moonje to Ashutosh Lahiry, 4 March 1947
B.S. Moonje Papers, Subject File No. 74, NMML.

Kotah

My dear Ashubabu,

I have received your notice of the meeting of the Working committee to be held in New Delhi on the 8th and 9th of March. But I am very sorry that I will not be able to attend it. On those very days I have an appointment in Bombay long ago fixed.

My suggestions for whatever worth they may be, in respect of the resolution which will be adopted on Mr Attlee’s recent announcement, are:

We must offer thanks to Mr Atlee’s and his Labour government for making a definite announcement that they will hand over power to Indian hands latest by June 1948.

We must deplore that the announcement has been so worded as to encourage fissiparous tendencies. Already Dr Abdul Latif of Hyderabad has announced that as soon as the powers are handed over, Nizam of Hyderabad will declare himself as the His majesty the King of Hyderabad.

The Finance Minister of Bengal has made a statement in the Bengal Legislative Assembly that Independent Bengal would be economically a stable state.

Sind has already begun in the similar move and the Provincial Muslim League of Sind has adopted a resolution of forming Muslim National Home Guards 10,000 strong and has requested the Muslim League Government of the Province to equip them with arms.
The Coalition Ministry of Sir Khizr Hyat Khan has a suddenly resigned leaving the field free to the Muslim League to do as it pleases in the Punjab.

Similar tendencies are very markedly noticeable in the NW Frontier Province.

The Hindu Mahasabha must warn the Congress of the dangers of such moves by the Muslim League and to meet the possibility of such danger soon taking shape and action, should prepare the country for effective counter-moves with the objective of maintaining the integrity of India as one State and one Nation, laying streets on the re-organization of police force and Army so that in their composition, the Hindus may not be less than 75 per cent and the Moslems not more than 25 per cent.

Hindu Mahasabha should take active steps in organizing its own Home Guards in self-defence and announcing its hope that Congress will now see the advisibility of organizing common Hindu front for which the Hindu Mahasabha will offer its whole-hearted co-operation as the Mussulmans have not organized a common Moslem Front practically throughout India.

I trust Dr Mookherjee and Mr N.C. Chatterjee will attend the meeting. I am very sorry that I will be unable to attend it. If for any reason, the meeting were to prolong beyond the 12th March I will certainly attend.

You may show this letter to Mr Bhopatkar.

Yours sincerely,
Dr B.S. Moonje

15. Congress Stand on the 20 February Statement

PRIME MINISTER ATTLEE’S DECLARATION OF FEBRUARY 20, 1947

The Working Committee welcome the declaration made on behalf of the British Government of their definite intention to transfer power finally by a date not later than June 1948 and to take steps to that end in advance.

The transfer of power, in order to be smooth, should be preceded by the recognition in practice of the Interim Government as a Dominion Government with effective control over the services and administration, and the Viceroy and Governor-General functioning as the constitutional head of the Government. The Central Government must necessarily function as a Cabinet with full authority and responsibility. Any other arrangement is incompatible with good Government and is peculiarly dangerous during a transitional period full of political and economic crises.

The Congress has already expressed its acceptance of the British Cabinet Mission’s scheme of 16th May, 1946, and has further accepted the interpretations put upon it by the British Cabinet on 6 December, 1946. In accordance therewith, the Constituent Assembly has been functioning and has appointed various Committees to carry on its work. It has become all the more essential now to expedite this work so that the Constitution for an Indian Union and its constituent units should be finally prepared and given effect to well within the stated period to facilitate the final transfer of power.

The Working Committee welcome the decision of a number of States to join the Constituent Assembly and trust that all the States and their peoples will be effectively represented in this task of making a Constitution for an Indian Union. The Committee invite afresh the representatives of the Muslim League, who have been elected to the Constituent Assembly, to join in this historic undertaking.

The work of the Constituent Assembly is essentially voluntary. The Working Committee have frequently stated that there can or should be no compulsion in the making of a Constitution for India. It is the fear of compulsion or coercion that has given rise to distrust and suspicion and conflict. If this fear goes, as it must, it will be easy to determine India’s future so as to safeguard the rights of all communities and given equal opportunities to all. It has been made clear that the constitution framed by the Constituent Assembly will apply only to those areas which accept it. It must also be understood that any province or part of a province which accepts the Constitution and desires to join the Union cannot be prevented from doing so. Thus there must be no compulsion either way, and the people will themselves decide their future. This peaceful and co-operative method is the only way to make democratic decisions with the maximum of consent.

In this hour when final decisions have to be taken, and the future of India has to be shaped by Indian minds and hands, the Working Committee earnestly calls upon all parties and groups, and all Indians generally, to discard violent and coercive methods, and cooperate peacefully and democratically in the making of a constitution. The time for decision has come and no one can stop it or stand by and remain unaffected. The end of an era is at hand and new age will soon begin. Let this dawn of the new age be ushered in bravely, leaving hates and discords in the dead past.

INVITATION TO MUSLIM LEAGUE TO MEET CONGRESS REPRESENTATIVES

In view of new developments which are leading to a swift transfer of power in India, it has become incumbent on the people of India to prepare themselves jointly and cooperatively for this change, so that this may be effected peacefully and to the advantage of all. The Working Committee, therefore, invite the All India Muslim League to nominate representatives to meet representatives of the Congress in order to consider the situation that has arisen and to devise means to meet it.

The Working Committee will keep in close touch with the representatives of the Sikhs and other groups concerned, with a view to cooperating with them in the steps that may have to be taken and in safeguarding their interests.

16. ‘Heated India Debate: MP Demands Withdrawal of Troops’

Daily Worker, 7 March 1947.

A demand for a categorical assurance that no British troops would remain in India at the request of a puppet government after the transfer of power was made in the Commons last night by Mr Piratin (Com., Mile End).

His pointed questions on Indian policy several times brought Mr Alexander, Minister of Defence, to his feet in reply—but he did not give the assurance Mr Piratin demanded.
The debate was opened by Mr Churchill with a lurid denunciation of the Government’s policy deploring ‘the clattering of the British Empire’ and referring to Lord Mountbatten’s task as ‘operation scuttle.’

Mr Piratin urged the Government not to be influenced by this tub-thumping speech in which there was nothing constructive. He opposed the Conservative amendment as a manoeuvre to delay the settlement of the Indian problem. He would like to give his support to the Government’s policy, but he could not do so until he had some further information.

The White Paper said that power would be handed over to a Constituent Assembly; or if there was not one to a central government or to existing provincial governments, or in some other way still undecided.

MAXIMUM FRICTION

This placed a premium on obstruction. It was an open invitation to reactionary sectional interests, notably Princes’ States to withhold co-operation and create the maximum of interval friction:

Then, he asked, were British troops to be withdrawn, in June 1948, or later? Mr Alexander intervened to say the troops would be withdrawn at the time of the handing over of power.

Why, then, asked Mr Piratin, did the White Paper say it was important that the defence of India should be provided for—that meant provided for by us after the transfer of power.

He would like an unequivocal statement from the Government that there would be no British troops stationed in India whether invited by a stooge government or uninvited.

MINISTER INTERRUPTS

Mr Alexander intervened again, saying that this was an extraordinary proposition. He knew of Mr Piratin’s keen interest in the Russian ideology.

Mr Piratin observed that Mr Alexander had referred to the Soviet Union and not to Transjordania or Irak, where troops were stationed at the request of a puppet government.

Mr Alexander: ‘Why not?’

Mr Piratin: ‘Is it our intention to have puppet government which would then invite British troops to be stationed there?’

It would be easier to get the co-operation of Moslems with the Hindus if the Government made a categorical statement that responsibility should be vested in he Constituent Assembly as now established.

That would ensure that individuals and organizations sincerely desirous of a happy solution would take their full part.

Earlier Mr Alexander had replied to the violent attack from Mr Churchill.

He made a strong plea to the Conservative Party not to oppose the Government’s policy but to follow Earl Halifax.

PRAISED TORY

At the beginning of his speech, Mr Alexander said that he wished that the debate could have gone on the same non-party lines as previous Indian debates. Later, he showered praises on Sir Walter Smiles (Cons., County Down) for having announced his support of the Government, and said that the aim of Mr Churchill’s speech was to unite the Tory Party on India. It would have been very much better if the Tory Party had had second thoughts as they had in the House. of Lords last week. The attitude of that former Viceroy Earl Halifax on this matter was more likely to lead to peace, concord and cooperation in India than Mr Churchill’s speech.

COALITION POLICY

For the most part Mr Alexander sought to prove that the Government’s policy was not a departure from the principles agreed by the coalition Government.

With regard to the future of defence, after June 1948, the Government would be glad, in the course of the Treaty they hoped to make, to co-operate with India, subject only to the limitations imposed by U.N. Mr Churchill made particularly lurid threats when he spoke. He revealed that it was not he but Mr Attlee who ordered the arrest of the Congress leaders in 1942, and charged the Government with having broken away from the agreement which had so-long subsisted between the Labour and Conservative parties.

The ‘cardinal mistake’ was to entrust the Government to Mr Nehru, which had led to great degeneration and demoralization in the Indian Government machinery and to the slaughter of 30000 to 40,000 people.

Communism was growing so fast that it had been found necessary to raid and suppress Communist establishments. The broad tolerance shown to Communists here had not been shown by the Government of India.

The time limit of 14 months for the transfer of power had extinguished Indian unity. It would be used to prepare for civil war, and the result would be fragmentation of India.

Asserting that there were three or four times as many troops in Palestine as India, he declared that it would be a world crime stripping us of our reputation and staining our name, to allow one-fifth of the world’s population to fall in chaos.

Taking up a suggestion made by Mr Zilliacus (Lab., Gateshead), he asked if it was right to lay little Palestine before U.N. What conceivable reason could be found for not following the same course for the sub-continent of India.

17. League–Congress Negotiations for Future Constitution of India

Letter from Aga Khan to M.A. Jinnah, 9 March 1947

PERSONAL

My dear Quaid-i-Azam,

I have waited till I heard of your return to Delhi before writing this. The Nawab Ruler of Bhopal kindly came with me and I went to see Gandhiji with my long-cherished hope of bringing him as the uncrowned king of the H[indus] and you as the uncrowned king of the M[uslims] together and that you two should come to terms as to a future agreed Constitution for India. With goodwill and common sense a Hindustan–Pakistan Con[ federation] or alliance or Dual Realms, call it what you like should be not only possible but not difficult. Well! Gandhiji feels that for any progress to be made in the matter of negotiations on the subject you would naturally like to meet a person with credentials to speak for and on behalf of the Congress. He had, he said, no such credentials. The only person who in his opinion could speak with such authority would be the President of the Congress whoever he may be at the time of the talks, ‘even an Englishman’, as Gandhiji said. If it meets with your approval the question of methods and ways and means to arrange contact is not likely to present much difficulty and I may suggest the name of a neutral [person] of the highest rank such as will leave no question of who first moved in the matter, Hindu or Muslim, to arise. In great confidence I may suggest to you for your personal approval HH the N[awab] of B[hopal]. If you approve of the idea, you may give HH your approval. I fully understand that only you are entitled to speak for the Muslims of India according to all canons of historical precedent.

All my sincere friendship,

AGA KHAN

PS. Of course if you don’t like it the whole thing drops.

A.K.

18. UP Governor’s Assessment of the Political Situation

Extract from a Letter from Wylie to Wavell, 9 March 1947
IOR, L/P&J/10/78, Acc. No. 3651, NAI.

SECRET

... 12. While I have been drafting this letter the Congress Working Committee have been in session and I have now the text of their two main resolutions—on HMG’s statement of 20th February and on the Punjab disturbances in front of me. I had better give you some background here. I may be over-timorous but I do not like the present situation. At the moment in the UP it is seeming fair, but it is full of dangerous possibilities. At the risk of being considered a panic monger therefore, I have formed a small committee of senior European officers who meet me fairly frequently when we try to consider what, if anything, we should do. My line with them hitherto has been this:

(a) the chances of a Central Government competent to speak for all India being in existence in June 1948 are dubious.
(b) Any attempt by HMG to hand over Central Government functions to the whole of the Punjab or to the whole of Bengal will lead to civil war in those Provinces.
(c) it is most unsafe to gamble on any unpleasant developments which may be coming being postponed till the clock strikes 12 on the night of 30th June 1948.
(d) there is now little prospect of acceptable employment being available for European officers after June 1948.
(e) if these gloomy prognostications have any sense in them at all—even 5 per cent of sense—then European officers should be advised to send their families to England as soon as possible.

In order not to invite a panic I have suggested that for the moment advice as at (e) be given only if advice on the point is asked for, but I have added that when the Congress Working Committee and the Muslim League Working Committee have spoken we shall know better how the probabilities stand. The Congress Working Committee have now spoken and I shall presently have to decide whether we are to volunteer advice to get European families out of the country or whether we are to stick to our present line. Frankly I see nothing in the two main resolutions passed by the Congress Working Committee which is in the least likely to heal the present breach between the communities. The tone of the main solution—that on situation created by HMG's statement of 20th February—is not conciliatory. It is packed too with bland assumptions which cut at the root of the whole business:

(a) that the interim Government is fit to become a Dominion Government for the whole of India.
(b) that the making of a constitution for an Indian Union is as easy as falling off a log.
(c) that the supreme difficulties of the party situation can be met by a two line sentence inviting the Muslim League to a discussion and
(d) that for parts of Provinces to secede and go over to the Indian Union is the simplest thing in the world.

But when this resolution is read with the resolution about the Punjab, things are made much worse. The only way out 'which involves the least amount of compulsion' is 'a division of the Punjab into two Provinces, so that the predominantly Muslim part may be separated from the predominantly non-Muslim parts.' To my own disquiet I actually agree with this dictum, for you will remember that I have held from the beginning that you will never settle the Indian problem without a redrawing of existing administrative boundaries. That however is far from saying that a reference at this moment to the carving up of the Punjab is the best way to procure a settlement between the Congress and Muslim League inside the short space of 15 months that is left to us. I still take a gloomy view therefore of the possibility of an all India settlement, however ramshackle, being achieved by June 1948. I suppose however that before I give stringent advice about precautionary measures here, I had better wait for the Muslim League's reply to these two Congress pronouncements. That when it comes it will be helpful I do not venture to hope. As you know, I have no faith in these long-range pronouncements, which is why I advocated Jinnah and Nehru being taken personally into our confidence before the statement of 20th February was issued. That way I thought that there was a 25 per cent chance of this statement achieving its purpose. I hope I may be wrong but I would not put the chances as high as 25 per cent now.

19. Congress Resolutions Explained
Letter from Jawaharlal Nehru to Wavell, 9 March 1947

During the last three days the Congress Working Committee has anxiously considered the situation in the country and more specially the announcement made by Mr Attlee on 20th February. They have passed some resolutions and I am enclosing three of these for your information. I hope you will be good enough to send them to His Majesty's Government.

2. You will notice that the Working Committee have welcomed Mr Attlee's statement. We have purposely not gone into any details because the major decisions mentioned in it govern the situation. There are many matters which are not clear. Presumably light will be thrown upon them later on. For the present we did not think it necessary to draw special attention to any of these matters. It is clear, however, that an early decision will be required in regard to our future work in the Interim Government.
3. It is our intention, as you will observe from one of the resolutions sent, to approach the Muslim League for a joint meeting to consider the situation. We want to do everything in our power to get the League representatives into the Constituent Assembly, so that all of us might function in terms of the Cabinet Mission's statement of 16th May, 1946.

4. If unfortunately this is not possible, then we shall try to lay down a course of action which avoids friction and conflict. It is with this object in view that we have sought a meeting with the League and have also suggested the division of the Punjab into two parts. This principle would, of course, apply to Bengal also.

5. This proposal that we are making is not pleasant for us to contemplate, but such a course is preferable to an attempt by either party to impose its will upon the other. Recent events in the Punjab have demonstrated, if such demonstration was necessary, that it is not possible to coerce the non-Muslim minority in the Province, just as it is not possible or desirable to coerce the others. We have suggested a way out which we consider fair to all parties.

6. In this connection I should like to remove a misapprehension. Sir Stafford Cripps, in his speech in the House of Commons, has said that 'we could not accept the forcing of unwilling Provinces into a united Indian Government if they have not been represented in the making of the constitution. To that principle which has the assent of the Congress, we understand, we adhere...'. Reference has been made here to 'Provinces'. There appears to be some confusion about the use of the word 'Province' in this connection. The word used in the British Government's statement of 6th December, 1946, was 'areas', and when Congress assent is referred to it can only have reference to areas. Indeed Sir Stafford Cripps himself refers to areas also in the course of his speech.

7. This distinction is important as both in Bengal and Punjab there are very large non-Muslim minorities. In the event of Bengal or Punjab, as Provinces, deciding by a bare majority not to adhere to a Union, the question immediately arises about Western Bengal and Eastern Punjab which are predominantly non-Muslim areas and which have no intention whatever of separating themselves from the Indian Union.

8. It is in order to get over all these difficulties that we have suggested a partition of the Punjab and the same principle applies to Bengal. If the Muslim League accepts the British Cabinet's scheme of 16th May and co-operates in the Constituent Assembly, then this question does not arise in this form. But even so it is worth considering whether Bengal and Punjab should not both be divided into smaller Provinces. In the event of the Muslim League not accepting the Cabinet Delegation's scheme and not coming into the Constituent Assembly, the division of Bengal and Punjab becomes inevitable.

20. Attempts to Reach Agreement between Congress and League

_The Hindustan Times, 10 March 1947_

(A) 'CONGRESS & LEAGUE EXECUTIVES MAY CONFER'

NEW DELHI, Sunday—The Congress Working Committee's resolution on Premier Attlee's statement of 20 February has created a good effect in political quarters.

Although the Muslim League leaders are not prepared to commit themselves without knowing how Mr Jinnah will react to the situation they have said in private conversations that the hand of friendship extended by the Congress Working Committee should be grasped. They believe that if the Working Committees of the two parties held a frank discussion it should be possible to come to a final agreement either on the basis of the Cabinet Missions’s plan or on a new plan. They recognize that the issue of the partition of the Punjab and of Bengal will have to be faced, especially after the murder and devastation now raging in those provinces.

A meeting between the Working Committees of the two parties is not however regarded likely before the fourth week of March. By then the new Viceroy will also have arrived and he will be able to give an indication of the directive he has been given in regard to his role during the next 14 months.

(B) LEAGUE LEADER SEES NO NEW SITUATION IN CONGRESS OFFER

BOMBAY, 9 March—Mr I.I. Chundrigar, Commerce Minister of the Government of India and a member of the Working Committee of the All India Muslim League, who left for New Delhi by air today, in an interview said; ‘Personally, I think there is no occasion for the Working Committee of the All-India Muslim League to meet specially to consider what is described as the latest Congress offer to the Muslim League.’

He added: ‘The Congress offer for negotiations is made with a loaded pistol. The Congress Working Committee has invited the representatives of the Muslim League to meet the representatives of the Congress for negotiations. At the same time Congress has made its position quite clear in another part of the resolution that the Central Government must necessarily function as a Cabinet with full authority and responsibility.’

No New Situation

‘The Congress also wants the Constituent Assembly contemplated under the Cabinet’s Mission’s Plan, which is not now representing the 10 crores of Mussalmans of India to continue its work. I do not therefore; think that any new situation has arisen for the Working Committee and the Council of the All-India Muslim League to consider the so-called latest Congress offer to the Muslim League.’

Mr Chundrigar said that as long as the Congress did not accept Pakistan as the basis for starting negotiations with Muslim League, the Congress invitation to the Muslim League for any settlement was futile.—API

21. ‘Lost Opportunity’

Dawn, 10 March 1947

Writing three days ago under the caption ‘Last opportunity’ we urged the Congress to get out of its communal ruts and face realities courageously by making a new approach to the Muslim league on the basis of separate sovereignty for the respective homelands of Muslims and Hindus. We expressed the hope that once agreement had been reached on this fundamental principle it might be possible to evolve common ground for cooperation between the two sovereign states in a limited sphere for the common good of both. We regret to say that the resolution released by the Congress Working Committee on Saturday largely belie these hopes and prove the truth of the adage that the leopard cannot change its spots. The leaders of Hindu India it would appear have lost their last opportunity. In saying this we are not forgetful of ‘invitation’ which the Congress has extended to the Muslim League ‘to nominate representatives for discussion with the representatives of the Congress in order to consider the situation that has arisen and to devise means to meet it'. But this invitation cannot be regarded in isolation from the views expressed and demands made by the Congress Working Committee in the same breath. Some of these demands are entirely new and betray the Congress characteristic hostility towards the Muslims. An analysis of the resolution passed will amply bear this out.

First, the Congress still harps on the Constituent Assembly talks in terms of an Indian union, and asks ‘afresh’ the representatives of the Muslim League to join the Constituent Assembly to cooperate ‘in this historic undertaking’ of expediting the work of framing the Constitution for the Union ‘and its constituent units’ within the stated period, namely, before June 1948. Secondly, the Congress repeats what has been proved to be untrue, that it has accepted the Cabinet Mission’s Scheme of 16 May and the interpretation put upon it by the British Cabinet on 6 December, this is a renewed attempt to put the Muslim League in the wrong. Thirdly, Congress plays with the words ‘no compulsion’, and tearing the principle out of the context in which it was embodied in the British Statement of 6 December, uses it for the purpose of instigating a ‘province or part of a province’ to break away from its natural place in the Muslim majority areas and to join the so-called Union. Fourthly, the Congress refers in slighting terms to leaders of the Muslim League in the Punjab describes them as agitators characterizes the recent peaceful movement in the Punjab as an attempt ‘to coerce and break popular Ministry’, challenges the Muslim League’s natural and legitimate claim to assume leadership in provincial Parliamentary politics justifies the undemocratic attitude of Sikhs and Hindus in refusing their cooperation to the League in the provincial administration, and finally records its tacit approval of the ‘increased and widespread violence’ let loose in the Punjab by opponents of the Muslim League. Fifthly, the Congress advocates the partition of the Punjab into two provinces purely on communal lines and admittedly on the ground that considerable sections of Sikhs and Hindus should be prevented from accepting the position of minority in a Muslim majority province. Sixthly, the Congress demands that power should be transferred immediately and before the date prescribed by HMG to the Interim Government by raising its status and enlarging its powers to those of a dominion Government.

Those who can formulate such demands and express such views even at this eleventh hour cannot be credited with bona fide intentions. The talk of a Union Centre and of ‘no compulsion’ in the same breath lacks even the semblance of good faith. The very conception of an Indian Union in the existing circumstances when large areas of the country are averse to joining any such Union includes an obvious element of coercion and compulsion. But while Congress aims at the compulsion of these areas which are Muslim and which have recognized boundaries, it cannot tolerate the so called compulsion of indeterminate bits and patches of territory inhabited by a majority of non-Muslims and having no recognized territorial entity to continue to May where they are. Then again on the one hand, the Congress says it has accepted the Cabinet Mission’s Scheme as interpreted on 6 December, and on the other hand, it wants Punjab to be partitioned, a demand which makes nonsense of the 16 May Scheme. That Scheme takes provinces as a whole and as they exist, and divides them into three groups. Apart from this the latest move of the Congress to split the Punjab into two is mischievous and furnishes fresh proof of the uncompromisingly anti-Muslim attitude of its leaders.

The demand for the elevation of the Interim Government and Dominion Status is nothing short of making the British to transfer power here and now, even before the state of period has elapsed.

It is no secret that ever since the Muslim League entered the Government, the Congress has been ruthlessly abusing its majority in the so-called Cabinet to ride roughshod over the views of the Muslim League bloc. This attitude has been lately intensified and by the exercise of its brute majority Congress has taken one decision after another to injure Muslim interests over a wide field of administration. To ask that the virtual sovereign powers such as belong to a Dominion Government should be handed over to this kind of a ‘Cabinet’ is not only begging the whole question of India’s constitutional future, wanting Britain to compel the Muslims to surrender themselves to the untender mercies of their sworn enemies.

The British declaration of 20 February as elaborated in behalf of HMG in course of subsequent Parliamentary Debates, provides for the simultaneous transfer of power at the given date to certain provinces or ‘combine Government’ for such provinces, in case of continued non-agreement between the major parties. If within the next few weeks such frail hopes of an agreement as HMG entertain are finally dissipated, arrangements will have to be taken in hand without further delay of all the assets of the present Central Government for the purpose of allotting their respective shares to each province or combination of provinces to which power is to be separately transferred. The present Interim Government or any Central Government in existence during the transition period cannot be entrusted with that task. It can continue to exist only on the care-taker basis merely carrying on the day to day administration. Such a Government’s powers would call for drastic curtailment rather than enhancement, if separate transfer of power to different authorities is to be achieved with equity and fairness. We would go further that an absolutely impartial body like a Royal Commission can alone discharge that stupendous task in the appropriate manner. This attempt of the Congress to establish Akhand Hindustan through the back door by securing immediate transfer of power to an Interim Government packed with its majority is a wicked manoeuvre will be resisted by Muslim India by every means in its power. Besides it is not even sustainable under the Law which in this particular context is the Government of India Act of 1919.

In these circumstances we do not see what good can result from any discussions that may take place between the representatives of the Muslim League and the Congress in pursuance of the Congress Working Committee’s ‘invitation’.

But that, of course, is for the League High Command to decide. We ourselves see little merit in this pale gesture by the Congress, which has proved by its Working Committee’s latest decision that it still remains wedded to its exploded Akhand Hindustan ideology.

22. Arrangements for Transfer of Power: Proposal Brought by Sudhir Ghosh

Note by Secretary of State for India, 12 March 1947
PRO, CAB 134/344, Acc No. 4042, NAI.

Proposals brought by Mr Sudhir Ghosh
Note by the Secretary of State for India

I think my colleagues will be interested to see the suggestions by a member of the Interim Government of India embodied in the document at Annex I which was given to me semi-officially by Mr Sudhir Ghosh together with the comments thereon prepared in my department (Annex II)

India Office, S.W.1.
DOCUMENT HANDED TO THE SECRETARY OF STATE BY MR SUDHIR GHOSH ON 10TH MARCH, 1947

There is growing realization after the announcement of the 20th February, that it may not be possible to have a constitution acceptable to all the parties framed before June 1948. The practical needs of the situation might be met by an approach to the problem of parting with power by Great Britain different from the one contemplated on the basis of the State Paper. Under the State Paper it is contemplated that the whole of the present constitutional structure will be broken up and a new one created by Indians themselves meeting in a Constituent Assembly. Now that a date has been fixed for the final transfer of power from British hands, we have to consider whether the present constitutional structure under the 1935 Act cannot be adapted to the new plan. A rough outline is as follows:

1. Parliament should as soon as possible enact a short Bill enabling HM in Council to make suitable amendments to the Government of India Act 1935 to further the object contemplated in the Statement of the 20th February.

2. These provisions will be the minimum necessary to secure that full powers will be granted to the Central Government, that the control of Whitehall will no longer be exercised and that the Central Government acts in responsibility to a duly elected Legislature.

3. There should be provision specifying the ratio of Muslims in the Executive Council, expressed either as a ratio to Caste Hindu or to the whole Council.

4. The Constituent Assembly will be the Central Legislature and the present Legislature will cease to function.

5. Legislation affecting exclusively Muslims will require a double majority.

6. So far as the States are concerned, provision will be made the accession of States on the Subjects of Defence, External Affairs and Communications on terms to be negotiated between the States and the Central Government. It any States do not accede before June 1948, the functions of Paramountcy insofar as they affect these 3 subjects will be transfer to the Central Government: and the remainder of Paramountcy will revert to the States.

7. India will be recognized as a Dominion by an amendment of the Statute of Westminster.

8. Emphasis should be laid that his Constitution is only provisional and that it open to Indian to replace it by a Constitution framed by themselves.

9. In the provinces the special responsibilities of the Governors will disappear and those functions in which they now act in their discretion will become functions on which they will be aided and assisted by the Ministries.

10. European representation in the Provincial Legislatures should go. But this does not necessarily mean that any special representation they might get, for instance, in Commerce and Industry constituencies will disappear.

11. A provision should be included in the Provincial Constitution that if 2 or more Provinces desire that they should jointly work for the economic or social uplift of particular regions and work out schemes in this behalf, HM in Council implement such schemes after consultation with the Central Government.
NOTE ON PROPOSALS HANDED TO THE
SECRETARY OF STATE BY MR SUDHIR GHOSH

These proposals amount to the transfer of full power during the interim period without any concession to the Muslim League point of view. It is however, an interesting feature of them that they contemplate the grant of full Dominion Status to India, in the interim period, under an amended version of the existing constitution and further contemplate that this constitution would continue after June 1948, because a new constitution could not be framed by that time to achieve complete independence as a part of the Commonwealth, and might remain in that position for a substantial period.

2. The only safeguards proposed for the Muslims in the proposed interim constitution are:

   (a) A fixed ratio of Muslims in the Executive Council. (This could, of course, be fulfilled by the appointment of non-League Muslims).

   (b) A majority of Muslim votes in the Legislature would be required for legislation ‘affecting exclusively Muslims’. (This is much more restrictive than the Cabinet Mission’s formula which required a double majority for matters which raise a major communal issue. Legislation affecting exclusively Muslims would only be such matters as the amendment of personal law relating to Muslims).

Moreover, the proposals give to the Congress a Central Legislature (the Constituent Assembly) in which the Hindus have an overwhelming majority based on strict population proportion while the existing Provincial Legislature are, of course, weighted in favour of minorities and, in practice, this is much more advantageous to the Hindus and Sikhs than to the Muslims because the Hindu and Sikhs minorities are a larger proportion of the population of Bengal and the Punjab than the Muslims are in any Hindu Province. The Centre would retain the present wide field of central functions, and there would be no devolution of authority from the Central such as is necessary if there is to be any prospect of the Muslims being satisfied.

The proposal contemplates that any states which do not accede to the proposed interim constitution before June, 1948, would become subject to Paramountcy control of the Central Government in respect of Foreign Affairs, Defence and Communications.

The proposals are thus flatly contrary to the recent Statements of Policy made by HMG, since they amount to putting the Muslim areas under a Central constitution dominated by the Hindu with authority over the whole of the present central field, whereas HMG have said that, if a constitution has been framed by a Constituent Assembly in which the Muslim League are not represented, they would not contemplate forcing such a constitution upon any unwilling parts of the country and will have to consider to whom the power of the Central Government should be handed over on the due date, whether as a whole to some form of Central Government or to the existing Provincial Governments, or in such other way as may seem most reasonable and in the best interests of the Indian people. The proposal in regard to the States is also contrary to the statement that Paramountcy will not be transferred to any Indian Government.

The proposal curiously omit any reference to the Viceroy’s position except the statement that the provisions to be made by Order-in-Council should be the minimum necessary to secure that full powers will be granted to the Central Government. This obviously means as the Congress Working Committee has recently stated, that the Viceroy should become a constitutional monarch. A crucial point which is not mentioned is whether the intention is that the discretionary powers of the Viceroy to control a Governor in the exercise of his special powers should be exercised by the Central Government. Properly speaking, the proposals should not imply that, because paragraph 9 proposes that the discretionary and individual judgment functions of Governors will be exercised on advice. But it seems likely that if there were a breakdown of the Provincial constitution, the Central Government would consider itself entitled to control the Provincial situation.

Item 11 of these proposals is curious and it is not clear what it is intended to provide for. Since the proposals as a whole are intended to eliminate British control, it is odd that it should be proposed that Orders-in-Council should be used to implement schemes agreed upon between Provinces for the economic or social up-lift of particular regions. The Central legislature under Section 103 of the Act has power to legislate within the Provincial Legislative List in respect of two or more Provinces if resolutions requesting it to do so have been passed by all the Chambers of the Legislatures of the Provinces concerned. Unless, therefore, constitutional changes are contemplated, paragraph 11 of the proposals seems to be unnecessary. It may be that this provision is intended to provide for the splitting up of Provinces in order to deal with the communal problem in the Punjab and Bengal. If, however, it is intended to give satisfaction to the Muslims as regards the devolution of power from the Centre to the Muslim areas, it is obviously inadequate.

23. League Working Committee to Meet Soon
Letter from Liaquat Ali Khan to M.A. Jinnah, 13 March 1947
GUL-I-RAANA, HARDINGE AVENUE, NEW DELHI

My dear Mr Jinnah,

I am sorry I have not written to you for some time. Mumtaz will tell you something of the troubles that I have been facing here, inside the Government. But it is alright [sic]. I have got the Congress fellows in a tight corner and I am going to fight to the last ditch. Don't worry about it. It means a great strain but the cause is too great to think of these, little matters. One comes to this world only once and one must do his [sic] duty irrespective of what it costs him. I have sent you the keys which you wanted. I hope you have received them. When are you coming to Delhi? I think you should come here as soon as the new Viceroy arrives: It is necessary in my view that you should be available in Delhi as soon as the new Viceroy arrives on the 22nd of this month. Lord Wavell is going away on the 23rd. I think we should call a meeting of the Working Committee early in April. In view of the recent serious developments, I think, a meeting of the Working Committee at an early date is called for. Things are happening all over and the Working Committee should, I think, meet. Your presence here is also necessary because as soon as the new Viceroy arrives, I am sure there will be a number of matters in which your advice and guidance will be necessary.

I got a letter from the Secretary of the Congress sending me the copies of the resolution passed by the Congress Working Committee, and requesting that the Muslim League should appoint a Committee to confer with the Committee that may be appointed by the Congress as resolved by the Congress Working Committee. I have replied saying that the letter will be placed before the meeting of the Working Committee of the Muslim League when it meets next.
You must have read in the papers about the movement in the NWFP. They will need some financial help. I just want to know if Pir Sahib of Manki Sharif can help them financially. He wants to know. You know what I mean. You can send me a message saying just yes or no.

There are difficult times ahead. May God help us and may He give you health and strength to guide us. I hope you are feeling fit.

With our kindest regards to both of you and love from children.

Yours sincerely,
LIAQUAT

24. Muslim Unity Essential for Creation of Pakistan
Message from M.A. Jinnah on Pakistan Day, 22 March 1947

BOMBAY

It was on the 23rd of March 1940 that the All India Muslim League laid down definitely the establishment of Pakistan as the goal of Muslim India. This is the seventh year of our struggle for the realization of that goal.

Every year the Muslim League has forged ahead and gone from strength to strength. Muslim India has stood its tests and trials with wonderful solidarity; Pakistan has been getting nearer and nearer and we are fast reaching in our approach and the realization of it.

The present conditions in India are far from peaceful and everywhere there is terrific tension and unrest. We must, therefore, observe this day strictly in a peaceful manner and in complete co-operation with the authorities and maintain law and order. I urge upon the Musalmans all over India not to insist on taking out processions, or even upon holding public meetings, but every Musalman, wherever he or she is, should observe this day and reaffirm our resolve and determination to achieve our goal of Pakistan.

Pakistan is the only practical solution of India’s constitutional problem; Pakistan alone will lead to stable and secure governments in Hindustan and Pakistan and Pakistan alone will guarantee real progress, welfare and happiness of all the peoples inhabiting this vast sub-continent. Pakistan means freedom and independence for Hindu India and Muslim India in their respective homelands where they are predominant. One India is an impossibility. For it can and will only mean the establishment of Hindu Raj—and for Musalmans, merely transfer from British domination to the Hindu Caste Imperialism. A Constitution and Government attempting to function as an All India Central Government, reducing 100 million Muslims to an all-India minority can never succeed but only lead to terrific disasters, for it will mean the rule of one nation with its perpetual and brute majority over another nation of 100 million people.

The only common ground and basis of a settlement is Pakistan, and I do hope that we may yet find a peaceful and amicable solution on that basis.

But one thing is most essential. At this critical moment in the history of Muslim India, we must stand absolutely united, come what may; and let us be ready to carry on our grim struggle and face all dangers and eventualities that may beset our path for the realization of our goal of Pakistan.
Towards Freedom: 1947

1. Once more, most earnestly appeal to every Muslim at this moment that he should rally round the banner of the Muslim League—the only authoritative representative organization of Muslim India. We must, for the moment at least, bury the hatchet and whatever domestic differences there may be, we can solve them and settle them ourselves, but on the fundamental issue, I am happy to say that there is no difference of opinion and the Musalmans to a man stand firm for the establishment of Pakistan.

25. Provincial Governments Can Inherit Power if Disagreement Continues at the Centre

Letter from G.H. Hidayatullah to M.A. Jinnah, 22 March 1947

SIND SECRETARIAT, KARACHI

Dear Quaid-i-Azam,

You are aware of the last declaration of His Majesty’s Government made in the House of Commons on the 20th February 1947. In that the British Government have made it clear in paragraph 10 that if it should appear that a Constitution approved by the fully representative Constituent Assembly is not possible, His Majesty’s Government will have to consider to whom the powers of the Central Government in British India should be handed over: whether as a whole to some form of Central Government in British India or in some areas to the existing Provincial Governments or in such other way as may seem reasonable and in the best interests of the Indian people.

2. Cripps Offer in 1942, vide para (c) (i) of the declaration, also contemplates that in certain circumstances His Majesty’s Government will transfer power to, and enter into treaties with, individual Provinces which would frame their own Constitution.

3. It is very clear from the existing relations between the Congress and the Muslim League that a Constitution framed by a fully representative Constituent Assembly will not be framed [sic]; and, therefore, transfer of power as a whole to some form of Central Government in British India is not possible. In that case, transfer of power may, in some areas, be made to the existing Provincial Governments.

4. This declaration of His Majesty’s Government and the Cripps Offer, therefore, make it incumbent upon this Provincial Government to be ready to receive powers in case the British Government decide to do so.

5. In paragraph 11 of the declaration of 20th February 1947, they again make it clear that although the final transfer of authority may not take place until June 1948, preparatory measures must be taken in hand in advance. This [Sind] Government must, therefore, take preparatory measures in hand so as to be able to receive the final transference of powers in June 1948 should the British Government decide to do so.

6. In consequence, therefore, my Government have decided to set up a Committee of eight people, consisting of six Muslims and two non-Muslims, to be elected respectively by Muslim and non-Muslim Members of the Sind Legislative Assembly, by the method of proportional representation by a single transferable vote, with the necessary secretariat and office staff, to advise on the action to be taken from time to time to enable the Government of Sind to take over powers from, and enter into a treaty with, His Majesty’s Government, and to make arrangements with other Provinces or parts of India by treaty, Union or otherwise, if and when these questions arise. We propose, for this purpose, to move a Resolution on behalf of this Government in the Sind Legislative Assembly, calling upon the Muslim and non-Muslim Members of the House to elect the members of the above-mentioned Committee.

7. In view of the declaration of His Majesty’s Government referred to above, this Government is legally and constitutionally entitled to appoint such a Committee, and it will have the necessary sanction behind it also. The draft Resolution proposed to be moved in the House is attached herewith.

8. The Committee so appointed will have powers to frame a Constitution for the future government of the Province of Sind and also to draft a Constitution for the Union of Provinces or parts of India, should it become possible for the province of Sind to unite with other Provinces or parts of India, for the purpose of administration of common subjects as a single Union or Centre.

9. A provision could also be made for entering into a treaty with His Majesty’s Government or other parts of India should such a necessity arise. But we have not drafted the Resolution in those explicit terms and have chosen to use the language as embodied in the draft Resolution for the simple reason that such a decision may come directly in conflict with the powers of the present Constituent Assembly to frame a Constitution for India as well as for Groups and Provinces. We have, therefore, said in the Resolution that the Committee would ‘advise on the action to be taken from time to time to enable the Government of Sind to take over power’ and other things.

10. It is thus clear that should there be no compromise between the Congress and the Muslim League, and the Congress goes on with the present Constituent Assembly in utter disregard of the Muslim League, the Muslim League will have to set up a Constitution-making body, through its Government in Sind, with all the legal sanctions behind it. The Committee set up by the Government of Sind could be used as a foundation or a starting off place for framing a Constitution for the Western India Pakistan areas.

11. The Sind Legislative Assembly is in session at present and I very much like that we could move this Resolution in the present session; but I realize that, this being a matter of fundamental importance to the whole of Pakistan area in general, and to the future of the Province of Sind in Pakistan in particular, it would be necessary to obtain a decision of the Working Committee of the All India Muslim League whether we should move this Resolution. The Working Committee may also consider the language of the draft Resolution. I would therefore request you to place this matter as early as possible before the Working Committee of the All India Muslim League and to get me the necessary direction to move this Resolution in the Sind Legislative Assembly.

12. A similar step could then be taken in Bengal as well.

13. As this is a matter of utmost importance to whole of the Pakistan area in general, and to the future of the Province of Sind in Pakistan in particular, I would request you to invite two persons from Sind, in addition to the Members of the Working Committee of the All India Muslim League, to take part in the deliberations. I think you would ask me and the Premier of Bengal to be better present; but I request that from Sind you may kindly invite Hon’ble Mr Abdus Sattar Pirzada also to attend the meeting of the Working Committee along with us since the whole idea incorporated in this letter has originally been conceived and developed by him.
14. The present session of the Sind Legislative Assembly is to conclude by the end of this month, but should the Working Committee decide to authorize us to move this Resolution, a fresh session of the Assembly would be called forthwith for this purpose.

Yours sincerely,
GHULAM HUSSAIN HIDAYATULLAH

Enclosure

DRAFT OF THE RESOLUTION

This House takes note of HM’s Government’s announcement of 20th February 1947 and of the Draft Declaration discussed by Sir Stafford Cripps with Indian leaders in March 1942, both of which contemplate that, in certain circumstances, HMG will transfer power to, and enter into treaties with, individual Provinces, which will frame their own constitutions, and in consequence resolves as follows:

That a committee consisting of six Muslims and two non-Muslims, to be elected respectively by the Muslim and non-Muslim Members of this House by the method of proportionate representation by the single transferable vote, be appointed along with the necessary Secretariat and office staff, to advise on the action to be taken from time to time to enable the Government of Sind to take over power from and enter into a treaty with HMG and to make arrangements with other provinces or parts of India by treaty, Union or otherwise, if and when these questions arise.
Chapter 6. Communalism: General

1. ‘Gandhiji’s Tour Plans Ready’

_National Herald, 1 January 1947._

SRIRAMPUR, 31 Dec.—Plans are now ready for Gandhiji’s village-to-village walking tour and the details of the tour are being fixed by Mr Satish Chandra Das Gupta.

The United Press of India understands that during his proposed tour, Gandhiji is likely to visit 30 villages which were affected in the recent disturbances.

Gandhiji wants to visit one village daily, spending the night wherever he gets shelter.

_He told one of his companions: ‘I am prepared to sleep on the way and under the tree if I do not get any shelter in any house during my tour.’_

Prior to his departure for Delhi, Acharya Kripalani said to the United Press representative: ‘Gandhiji’s tour is a fateful tour. It will be a trial of his faith in truth and non-violence. It is significant that he attaches greater importance to his work in East Bengal that what is happening in Delhi and London. I hope that Bapu will succeed in his objective of bringing Hindu–Muslim unity not only in East Bengal but also in the rest of India.’

2. ‘Muslims Greet Gandhiji during Tour’

_National Herald, 5 January 1947._

CHANDIPUR (Noakhali), 3 Jan.—Mahatma Gandhi held his prayer meeting yesterday in front of his new residence at 4:30 in the afternoon. After prayer he walked one mile and a half and visited the village Changirgaon where one of his followers is staying and working for peace. On his way Gandhiji met a few Muslims and talked with them. They greeted him and invited him to their houses. Gandhiji accepted their invitation and asked them to fix a day for his prayer. In the conversation it was also decided that the Muslims should read ‘miladsharif’ after his prayer.

After a while Mahatma Gandhi saw how his followers were working at Changirgaon.

This morning Gandhiji met some other Muslims during his walk. In the afternoon he will visit a nearby village and also a place named Tamaltala where he will hold his next evening prayer.

Gandhiji yesterday walked about six miles, three miles in the morning and three miles in the afternoon. He stood the strain well.

‘After the journey I slept quite well last night,’ said Mahatma Gandhi when he was asked how he slept.
In the morning, Gandhiji visited ten devastated huts and houses, three of which belonged to Namasudra.

As Gandhiji goes to the countryside, men, women and children, Muslims and Hindus, come out of their huts and look at him. An old man of 78 with a bamboo stick, marches in brisk pace and whoever comes his way almost always gets an immediate smiling response. Gandhiji stops and chats with the villagers and already both Hindus and Muslims have started regarding him as their friend. Gandhiji is likely to walk both in the morning and in the evening. In the morning, Gandhiji will walk to the next village and in the evening he will walk and go to the nearby villages.

There he wants to meet people specially the Muslims. By dusk, Gandhiji will return to his cottage and in the morning he will again walk to a new village.—API

3. Strengthen Provincial Units

Circular Letter from General Secretary of All India Hindu Mahasabha, 5 January 1947

AIHM Papers, File No. C-165, NMML.

ALL INDIA HINDU MAHASABHA
READING ROAD, NEW DELHI

Circular Letter No. I

Dear Sir,

Under instruction from the President, I call the attention of all Provincial Hindu Sabhas particularly to two resolutions passed at the Gorakhpur Session, namely, one relating to Hindustan National Guards or Hindustan Rashtra Sena and the other relating to Malviya Hindu Sangathan Fund and request you to take immediate steps to implement these two resolutions.

As regards Hindustan National Guard a Provincial Guard should be established with its branches all over the province and arrangements should be made to drill them into regular soldiers and to train them in all the arts of offence and defence with different kinds of weapons if possible. In this respect the importance, of all the qualities which go to make up a good soldier should be instilled into their minds so that they will be in a position to tackle any situation as a well disciplined corps of National Guards.

As regards the second it need hardly be stated that unless the Head Office is put in possession of sufficiently large fund it will not be possible for it to chalk out lines of the defence of Hindus on a nation-wide scale as it desires to do. The Gorakhpur resolution lays down that out of the total collections made in a province 75 per cent will be utilized by the Head Office. Initially, however, the entire amount collected in a province shall be sent in full to the Head Office in Delhi and the amount due to the Provincial Sabha will subsequently be sent back. In order to make the All India Hindu Mahasabha machinery move with speed and effect, it is necessary that the provinces should start work of collection forthwith.

In order to achieve the above object it will be necessary on the part of the Provincial Hindu Sabha to carry on vigorous and sustained propaganda throughout the provinces on a well organized and well defined plan. It is desirable that the Provincial Hindu Sabha will requisition the services of eminent capable men in their provinces to undertake this work and by the end of March 1947, will be in a position to render satisfactory account of the establishment of the province branch of the Hindustan National Guard and the collection of the Malviya Hindu Sangathan Fund.

While doing the propaganda work emphasis should be laid more on the necessity of these two matters in view of the dangers that face the Hindus and the general ideology of Hindu Mahasabha than on matters of secondary importance. The propagandists should be furnished with notes containing the points which they should urge in their speeches. There should be uniformity of propaganda in the provinces concerned. Earnest efforts should be made to enlist the sympathies and active cooperation and help of all such elements as stand for the Hindu Mahasabha ideology.

The Provincial Hindu Sabhas should appoint study circles which would supply all necessary information as regards the question that are exercising the public mind at present or would do so in future.

In conclusion I must urge that unless and until the Provincial Hindu Sabhas and all their branches take a serious view of the situation and are determined to tackle it satisfactorily it will not be possible for the Head Office to make any headway in the implementation of the Gorakhpur resolution regarding the programme of the work.

Yours faithfully,
Ashutosh Lahiry
GENERAL SECRETARY

4. Pakistan Cannot Be Achieved through Civil War
M.K. Gandhi’s Interview to a Muslim Visitor, 12 January 1947

The visitor had asked which of the two alternatives for a solution of the present situation in India would be preferable—Pakistan or civil war. Gandhiji is reported to have said that he would approach the problem differently. Neither of the two suggested solutions would be good. It was wrong to think that Pakistan could be achieved through civil war....

2. The answers to Question starred D-3 are:

(a) there have been 48 deaths in the Punjab owing to communal riots in the period from 2-9-46 to date.
(b) Hindu victims total 25 and Muslim victims 23;
(c) 48 in the Punjab;
(d) the instructions to the Police and to troops employed in aid of the Civil power are that whatever volume of fire may have to be ordered, it should be employed with the maximum of effect; and
(e) no bombs have been dropped on riotous mobs.

In regard to the answer against (a), it is suggested that the Government of India might consider whether it would not be better to refuse to divulge information as to the number of casualties incurred by each community, since to do so is likely to inflame communal passions, and it is probable that there will be a spate of supplementary questions.

3. The answer to Question starred D-5(a) is that matters connected with the rehabilitation and compensation of the victims of the riots which have occurred since 2-9-46 are being dealt with as and when recommendations are received from District officers.

Extract from a Letter from Jawaharlal Nehru to M.K. Gandhi, 30 January 1947

New Delhi

Dear Bapu,

Thank you for your letter of January 26th.

...I am quite sure that your visit to and tour in Noakhali District has great significance and importance. It is not for me to suggest to you to go against your own inclination. You are the best judge. What I had ventured to put to you however, and would like to repeat, is that conditions all over India to some extent are very unsatisfactory. There is a certain disruptive tendency at work which affects our work in every direction. The whole Congress organization is suffering from it and we, who are in the Government, have no time at all to give to any work except the immediate problems which confront us. It is difficult to write much in a letter. But I want you to realize that there is in some ways a progressive deterioration in the situation and I feel very unhappy about it. I would not mind so much any number of what I would call external problems however difficult they might be. But when our own approach is not quite clear and there are different viewpoints and pulls, then it becomes even more difficult to deal with any problems.

I know what we must learn to rely upon ourselves and not run to you for help on every occasion. But we have got into this bad habit and we do often feel that if you had been easier of access our difficulties would have been less.

I am worried about Bihar. I made it quite clear to some of the Ministers there that they must ask for a Commission of Inquiry or appoint it themselves even if the Bengal Government got out of it. I thought they had agreed, but nothing has been done since. I do not know the reason for this, and I am writing to Sri Babu about it.

I have a feeling, for which I have no proof whatever, that there is no strong desire for an inquiry. The Bihar Government anyhow moves slowly. The Government has done a great deal in giving relief and yet it has not done it in the right way and hence the psychological results achieved have not been great. There is a sense of fear and apprehension among the Muslim population. Badshah Khan passed through Delhi the other day and I met him. I did not have time to talk to him about Bihar, but I understand that he is not at all happy at what he found there.

I have found both in Bihar and elsewhere very little regret or remorse among the Hindus for what happened there. There is a feeling almost of justification. Among the Muslims there is definitely a fear, whether justified or not, that there might be further attacks on them.

In Hazara in the NWFP some horrible things were done, though, of course, in point of extent and numbers there is no comparison whatever with Bihar. In quality or lack of it there is little to choose, in my mind, between Noakhali, Bihar, Meerut District and Hazara. They all represent utter degradation and depravity....
7. Twenty-seventh Session of the All India Hindu Mahasabha

Extract from the Resolutions Passed at Gorakhpur, c. January 1947
Ashutosh Lahiry Papers, Pamphlet, Serial No. 26, NMML.

Gorakhpur Session

The 27th session of the All India Hindu Mahasabha held at Gorakhpur on the 27th, 28th, 29th and 30th December, 1946 under the Presidentship of Shree L.B. Bhopatkar was unique in many respects. It is for the first time in the history of the Hindu Mahasabha that the session was held for four days. The number of delegates and visitors present at the session beat all previous records—over four thousand delegates attended, Bihar alone contributing about one thousand. Not less than one lakh of persons attended each day—Malaviyanagar in a part of which a full size bust of Pandit Madan Mohan Malaviyaji was erected attracted a huge crowd and the beautiful bust was the cynosure of all eyes.

The Presidential Procession, with its imposing array of elephants and horses, wending its way round the city’s dusty maze of lanes, thoroughfares and bazars created a most impressive spectacle. And the whole of Gorakhpur turned out either to participate in, or to witness it.

The Pandal itself was very beautifully decorated. The President was seated on a golden throne which had two miniature lions on either side. Richly embroidered red velvet was spread on it, and overhead was a canopy which was supported on silver poles. The throne with the canopy and the poles made the show at once brilliant and magnificent.

The session itself was remarkable for its tremendous outburst of emotion. The speeches on the Noakhali resolution evoked a most touching scene. Almost the whole house was in tears. The resolution on Bihar happenings so deeply stirred the audience that one of them ran up to the dais and painted the forehead of one of the speakers with his own blood, as a mark of appreciation of the heroic deeds of Bihar. A gold ring donated by a Bengal delegate was put to auction and was sold at rupees three thousand. A deer skin presented by a Sanyasi fetched the fancy price of rupees ten thousand. These were enough indications of the very high pitch to which emotions were roused. The highlight of the session was the formulation of a constructive programme embodied in a resolution on the 4th day with a view to canalise the energies of the vast concourse of the assembled, Hindus into a fruitful channel. The initiation of the Hindusthan National Guard and the inauguration of the Malaviya Hindu Sangathan Fund were the two most important planks in this constructive programme.

The Hindu Mahasabha has now emerged greatly strengthened, with the popular backing of the Hindu masses, and Gorakhpur has given a fitting reply to Jinnah’s challenge to Hindu life, culture and civilization.

RESOLUTION NO. II

NOAKHALI TRAGEDY

The shocking events which took place in the district of Noakhali began on the 10th October and ultimately covered an area of about 250 sq miles in the Sub-division of Chandpur in the district of Tipperah and in four police stations in the district of Noakhali, Begumganj, Ramganj, Raipur and Lakhipur. They followed the Great Calcutta Killing which was the consequence of the 'Direct Action' declared by the Muslim League. The calculated brutalities were instigated and planned by the League and the same were enacted with the connivance and encouragement of the local authorities. The brutalities went on unchecked in East Bengal for days resulting in the riotous and armed mobs murdering prominent Hindu leaders like Rajendra Lal Ray, President, Noakhali District Hindu Mahasabha and in the massacre of the adult male population of a number of families in the disturbed area. Organized hooliganism resulted in the looting and burning of thousands of Hindu houses, the callous destruction of Hindu properties worth crores of rupees and the forcible mass conversion of about one hundred thousand people and the sufferers included thousands of Hindus belonging to scheduled castes.

The tragic feature of this outburst of wanton brutality was the outrage on women, mass conversion and abduction and forcible marriages.

The interior of the affected areas, specially in the district of Noakhali, was made inaccessible for days and the surviving Hindus who had been forcibly converted were marooned and were not allowed to come out of their villages except with permit of the local League leaders and they were subjected to assaults and humiliating treatment.

This carnage and outburst of hooliganism were due to the communal policy adopted by the Muslim League Ministry in Bengal.

The price which thousands of innocent people had to pay to the hooligans for their lives was the sacrifice of their religion and substantial sums of money were extorted as subscriptions for the Muslim League and as conversion fees for the Moulavis. Not one single Hindu temple or ‘Devasthan’ escaped desecration in the affected area and the mass attackers and looters knew that however brutally they would behave they would enjoy complete immunity.

The Governor of Bengal as well as the local officials were warned of the intending catastrophe but they took no steps and most of the officers who had connived are still continuing in office inspite of the protests of the public.

The task of rehabilitation or repatriation of the thousands of Refugees from Noakhali and Tipperah has been rendered almost impossible due to the fact that murderers, abductors and looters and perpetrators of these outrages have not been punished and some of them are still going about in the villages in a defiant mood.

The calamity which has befallen Noakhali is likely to spread to other areas in the Hindu minority districts in Bengal. The Hindu Mahasabha deplores that the Governor-General of India and the Governor of Bengal who had special responsibilities for the protection of the minority community failed miserably to discharge their obligations. The Mahasabha also deplores that no action was taken by the Interim Government in order to protect the minority community in the districts of Tipperah and Noakhali, although some prominent members of the same Government took conspicuous part in taking drastic action against the Hindus in Bihar and in giving protection to the Muslim minority in that Province.

There has been a welcome sign of new consciousness among the Hindus throughout Hindustan but this consciousness must be transmuted into constructive work for the preservation and emancipation of the Nation. In order to prevent the recurrence of such outrages and brutalities and in view of the failure and apathy on the part of the Government to discharge their primary duty of maintaining law and order, this All-India Hindu Mahasabha declares that the Muslim League Ministry has forfeited its right to carry on the administration of Bengal and that the following steps should be taken to prevent mass persecution and torture of the Hindus:

(a) that in order to inspire confidence among the Hindus in Hindu minority districts there should be settlements of Hindus of those districts in convenient localities at the expense of the Government;

(b) that suitable arrangements should be made for the security of such Hindu settlements and the maintenance of the economic and cultural life of the people in such settlements;

(c) that full compensation should be given to Hindus in the affected areas in Bengal and punitive taxes should be imposed on the aggressive community;

(d) that a Hindu Militia or National Guard be formed for organizing the defence of Hindus so as to make them repel all aggression and to secure the protection of their culture and religion;

(e) that every Hindu woman should carry a dagger and should learn the art of self-defence;

(f) that although it is a matter of satisfaction that thousands of Hindus who were forcibly converted have been rescued and most of the women who were forcibly abducted and married have been recovered and they have been treated as Hindus and honourably accepted by their relations, strong efforts should be made for the rescue of those girls who have not yet been recovered;

(g) that Hindu society must purge itself of all disabilities and discriminations imposed on any caste or section and intensify true sangathan or consolidation of all classes and sections of the Hindus.

(h) that a Committee consisting of five persons to be nominated by the President, be appointed to carry out the constructive suggestions made above and to report to the Working Committee within three months.

RESOLUTION NO. III

FRONTIER DEPRADATIONS

This Session of the All India Hindu Mahasabha strongly condemns the depredations including loot, arson and murder of innocent Hindus including women and children of Hazara District by the Trans-Border raiders assisted by local ruffians. It conveys its whole-hearted sympathy to the victims of these outrages and their families. While placing on record its deep appreciation of the sympathy and help extended by some good hearted persons to their Hindu neighbours, this Session urges upon the Frontier Government the imperative necessity of putting an immediate stop to the campaign of bitter communal hatred carried on by the agents of the Muslim League in the length and breadth of Frontier Province and the Tribal area, which has led to these outrages and the Mahasabha also calls upon the Central Government to take such steps as may put an end for ever to the raids so frequently committed by the tribesmen into British India. The Mahasabha also expects that adequate relief will be given to the sufferers and necessary steps will be taken by the Frontier Government to restore peace and confidence in the areas concerned to enable the Hindus to return to their homes.

The Mahasabha also appreciates the action of the Kashmere Durbar in allowing the Hindu refugees from the Hazara District to take shelter in Jammu and Kashmere States and affording them necessary facilities.

RESOLUTION NO. IV

KIRPAN

This Session of the All India Hindu Mahasabha strongly condemns the ban imposed by the Muslim League Government of Bengal on the carrying of Kirpans by the Sikhs, which is their rightful religious symbol. It is a direct encroachment on the religious rights of a minority community and a challenge to them. This ban has deeply wounded the feelings of the Sikhs of the whole of India and this Session requests the Bengal Government to withdraw the ban.

RESOLUTION NO. V

BIHAR DISTURBANCES

The All India Hindu Mahasabha repudiates the statements made that the Hindu masses of Bihar instead of giving protection to their minority neighbours have taken advantage of their majority position in committing all kind of aggressions on their Muslim neighbours such as loot, arson and murder and they have thus disgraced the name of the Hindus. The fact is that though agitated over reports of Moslem atrocities on the Hindu men, women, and children in Bengal and particularly in Noakhali they maintained their innate patience and peace of mind, and did not rise up to strike until they repeatedly received grave provocations and challenges from Muslim Leaguers presumably in accordance with their Direct Action plan, such as killing of cows, molestation of young women, desecration of idols, arson, loot and firing.

The Mahasabha disapproves the policy of appeasement of Muslims by the Government of Bihar which allowed Muslims from outside to complicate the situation, unduly favoured the Muslims in the matter of giving relief from public exchequer as if they were the State guests, made discrimination in granting licences for firearms, making arrests and granting bails and permitted unauthorized occupation of Government and Municipal land and building. The Hindu Mahasabha warns the Government against the dangers of the latest move of the Muslim League to create Muslim corridor between Bengal and the Punjab by transference of population in and outside Bihar.
The Hindu Mahasabha condemns the unwarranted firing by the Military and Police which was encouraged by leaders like Pt Jawahar Lal Nehru and was indiscriminate and aggressive in places, such as Nagarnausa, as well as atrocities committed on Hindus in some villages by the Military which was composed mostly of Muslims.

In the interest of the peace of the country as a whole and in justice to all, the Hindu Mahasabha appeals to the Government of Bihar to unconditionally release the Hindus who are innocent, see to it that they are not harassed, rehabilitate and fully compensate such of them as have suffered and make the path easy for the restoration of peace and good-will among the people.

The Hindu Mahasabha pays its tribute to all Hindus of Bihar who have acted courageously and shown bravery in self-defence.

RESOLUTION NO. VII

CONSTITUTION OF FREE HINDUSTHAN

(1) This Session of the All India Hindu Mahasabha re-affirms the resolution passed at the Bilaspur Session which is based on the cardinal principle of democracy namely One man one vote, and joint electorate.

(2) The basic features of the constitution of Free Hindustan for which the Hindu Mahasabha always stood and still stands are:
   (a) Strong and paramount centre;
   (b) Constitutional right of the centre to supervise and intervene in the Provinces in case of emergencies;
   (c) Safeguards for the protection of minorities, their religion and culture;
   (d) Provinces must not be vested with residuary powers;

(3) The tragic experiences of Noakhali and other places have demonstrated beyond doubt that that the stand of the Hindu Mahasabha is correct and is essential in the interest of the country.
The Hindu Mahasabha reiterates the decision arrived at Delhi by its All India Committee on 16th June, 1946 with regard to the Cabinet Mission Scheme pointing out the vital changes essential to make it acceptable to the Hindus, namely:

(a) Though in name unity and integrity of India have been accepted in practice the same has been whittled down;

(b) The complicated machinery which seeks to set up a three-decker constitution and which would place the Hindus of Punjab, Bengal, Assam, Sind, NWFP as well as Sikh community at the mercy of Pakistanists.

(c) The Hindu Mahasabha is opposed to parity and the Central Executive must be based on the population ratio,

The Hindu Mahasabha condemns the recent interpretation of 6th December 1946 of His Majesty’s Government by which Jinnah’s demands of compulsory grouping as sine qua non of Pakistan is being conceded and the country is sought to be plunged in further civil strife and discord.

The British Cabinet has gone back on its previous declaration that the minority will not be allowed to veto the progress of the majority. It has now announced that any constitution framed by the Constituent Assembly will not be imposed on any unwilling part of the country and at the same time compelled the people of Assam, Punjab, Frontier, and Bengal to submit to compulsory grouping against their will.

The Hindu Mahasabha administers a note of warning that if the Congress accepts the recent interpretation by His Majesty’s Government in order to placate the League it would be betrayal of the interests of the millions of masses of Hindustan who would never submit to it.

While appreciating the general tenour of Pt Jawahar Lal Resolution in respect of the objectives of the Constituent Assembly which are on the general lines of the Hindu Mahasabha ideal as embodied in the Bilaspur Resolution, the Hindu Mahasabha takes strong exception to conceding Residuary Powers to the Provinces and hold that by so doing the Provinces will be made virtually independent. The Mahasabha, therefore, puts on record its strong opposition to it.

The Hindu Mahasabha declares that Hindu India will not accept any Constitution which will be based on the basis of trunketed Centre and virtual independence of the Provinces on which basis the Congress is attempting to frame the future constitution of India.

The Hindu Mahasabha warns all sections of the people from whom sovereignty is derived and sanction to frame a constitution is obtained that they should realize the dangers ahead.

The Hindu Mahasabha calls upon all Hindu Sabhas throughout India to mobilize public opinion effectively so that it may be impossible for the Constituent Assembly to frame a Constitution which will install Pakistan in any shape or form.

CONSTRUCTIVE PROGRAMME

In view of the political developments that have recently taken place resulting in outbursts of Muslim aggression and fanaticism in several parts of India, it is imperative that the Hindus should organize themselves on the following lines, namely:

(1) To start a Hindu National Army styled as Hindusthan National Guards or Hindusthan Rastra Sena. The All India Working Committee do organize the same and the Provincial Sabhas do take necessary action under the directions of the All India Working Committee and to train them in the arts of self-defence,

(2) To take all possible steps to make the Hindus more Hindu-minded and militant,

(3) To start common prayer on some fixed day in a week,

(4) To start rescue homes and orphanages for the helpless Hindus,

(5) To make the Hindus economically self-reliant by supporting the Hindu traders, artisans, workers and peasants and industrialists,

(6) To relax the rigour of caste system as far as possible,

(7) For the above purpose to start immediately a fund called the ‘Malaviya Hindu Sangathan Fund’ in each Province, providing the Working Committee with 25 per cent of the collections made by the Provincial Hindu Sabhas and retaining 75 per cent for their work in their Provinces.

RESOLUTION NO. XI

MUSLIM NATIVE STATES

This Session of the All India Hindu Mahasabha views with pain the continuance of the many irritating restrictions imposed on the culture and religious observances and the language of the Hindus in the States of Hyderabad, Bhopal, Junagarh and Bhawalpur. The Mahasabha condemns the attempt now being made to introduce in those States political reforms in which Moslem subjects are being given undue weightage or parity with Hindus though they happen to be in small minority.

RESOLUTION NO. XIII
HINDU STATES
The Hindu Mahasabha notes with regret and resentment that in the name of Responsible Government and with the object of introducing it in the States, trouble is being created in the Hindu States particularly, and practically excluding all Muslim States such as Hyderabad, Bhopal, Rampur and others, leading eventually even to subversive activities in Kashmere and Travancore and notes with satisfaction that such activities have been so far put down by their respective Hindu Rulers. The Hindu Mahasabha offers them its hearty congratulations and assures them of its support in their fight against the pro-Muslim tendency of the Congress.

... RESOLUTION NO. XV
EAST ASIATIC CONFERENCE
The Hindu Mahasabha calls upon the Hindus to create and organize a Pan-Hindu front by pooling all the cultural and religious sympathies and affinities in East Asiatic countries and resolves to organize for the purpose an East Asiatic Conference composed of Buddhists and Hindus and other similar sects residing in Nepal, Burma, Siam, China and Japan. The Hindu Mahasabha calls upon the Working Committee to take steps for organizing such a Conference.

RESOLUTION NO. XVI
AMENDMENT TO HINDU UNIVERSITY ACT.
Having regard to the fact that there is an attempt in Muslim majority Provinces to Islamise education and to deprive schools founded and run by Hindus, of necessary facilities, the Central Legislature be requested to amend the Hindu Universities Act in such a way that the Benares Hindu University may be given unfettered power to affiliate Hindu schools and Colleges and hold examinations locally in the Hindu minority Provinces.

RESOLUTION NO. XVII
SHUDDHI
In view of the fact that there are millions of Hindus converted to other faiths who are anxious to come to the fold of Hinduism, the faith of their fore-fathers, this Session of the Hindu Mahasabha resolves that the movement of Shuddhi be intensified and each Provincial Sabha do submit quarterly report to the All India Working Committee regarding the progress made in implementing this Resolution.

RESOLUTION NO. XVIII

ASSAM

The All India Hindu Mahasabha stands by Assam in her bold and fearless refusal to be forced into Pakistan and to be forced into compulsory grouping with Bengal against her will. All sections of Nationalists should support the demand of the people of Assam and help her by all legitimate means.

(From the Chair.)

RESOLUTION NO. XIX

The Hindu Mahasabha strongly protests against the grave injustice being done to Hindus in Congress governed Provinces as well as in other Provinces in respect of Public Services. It earnestly urges upon the Governments concerned, particularly in Congress governed Provinces that numerical strength of communities as well as qualifications should be kept in view in making appointments and serious disparities in existing personnel should be rectified as early, as possible.

(From the Chair.)

RESOLUTION NO. XX

This meeting of the All India Hindu Mahasabha records that in as much as Hindus of Sind have no confidence in the Muslim League Ministry of that Province and as Hindus have suffered greatly under the Muslim League regime and as Governor of Sind has failed to protect the Economic, Cultural and Political rights of Hindus who are in minority, Sind be re-annexed to the Province of Bombay.

This meeting strongly protests against the attempts made by the Muslim League Ministry of Sind in inviting Moslems of other Provinces to reside in Sind, in order to convert it into a complete Pakistan Province.

RESOLUTION NO. XXI

AGRA AND OUDH AMALGAMATION

In the opinion of the All India Hindu Mahasabha it is not desirable to continue the artificial division of U. P. into two Provinces of Agra and Oudh any more, wherefore the two Provincial Sabhas of Agra and Oudh are hereby amalgamated into one U. P. Provincial Hindu Sabha with its Head Office at Lucknow....

Resolved further that Sjt Bhopatkar, President, All India Hindu Mahasabha, Dr S.P. Mukherjee and Dr Moonje are authorized to appoint an Adhoc Committee to work as U.P. Provincial Hindu Sabha for the current year 1946–47.

8. All-India Muslim League Session at Karachi.

Text of the Resolution Passed by the Working Committee, 2 February 1947
Home Poll (I), File No. 33/7/47, NAI.

KARACHI NO. EIGHT

(First Resolution) (General)

The Working Committee of the All India Muslim League have noted with dismay and indignation that the Governments and officials of Congress governed provinces have not only failed to protect the life and property of Mussalmans in these provinces as is evidenced by the continued daily stabbings of the Mussalmans of the city of Bombay and Ahmedabad for over five months and the massacre of the Mussalmans at Garhmukteshwar and in the Kolaba district of Bombay Province and oppression and harassment of Mussalmans at other places in UP, CP & Madras, but have also been undermining their economic interests in the distribution of daily necessities of life, which have come under the direct control of provincial governments. Mussalmans are deliberately insulted and oppressed in these provinces and treated as suspects. Here is wanton interference in their religious observances on one pretext or another. A systematic attempt is being made to crush the spirit of Mussalmans by subjecting them to innumerable hardships and sufferings.

Working Committee call upon the Governments concerned to take immediate steps to put an end to lawlessness and organized attacks on the Mussalmans and devise means of providing effective protection to their person and property and safeguarding their legitimate, religious, political, economic and social interests. The Working Committee further urge upon the Governors of the said provinces to safeguard the interests of the Muslim minorities, which is incumbent upon them by virtue of the powers vested in them for discharging their special responsibilities under the Government of India Act 1935, under which the Congress governments have come into power.

The Working Committee of the All India Muslim League express their deep sense of pride on the courage, fortitude and endurance shown by the Mussalmans in the provinces in which they are in a minority in not only patiently and cheerfully suffering loss of life and property but the injustice and harassment by the majority in many other ways affecting their interests. The Working Committee are confident that the Mussalmans in these provinces will continue to stand firm and united in resisting oppression and injustice at the hands of the tyrannical majority for the freedom of Muslim India. The Working Committee further deplores the loss of life, injuries caused to persons, and destruction of property and deeply sympathizes with the sufferers. The Muslim League will do all in their power to help them in every way possible.—API.
9. Resolution Passed at the Working Committee Meeting of the All India Hindu Mahasabha in New Delhi.

Press Advice from the Associated Press of India, 10 February 1947
Home Poll (I), File No. 33/7/47, NAI.

The working committee of the all India Hindu Mahasabha which concluded its deliberations here today passed a resolution resenting 'the attempt now being made by the Bengal Muslim league ministry to settle in Bengal Muslims from Bihar and other provinces with the definite political objectives of increasing the Muslim population strength in the Muslim minority districts of western Bengal. Already one lac and fifty thousand of such Muslims had already been settled in Bengal and that Pakistanization of western Bengal is being carried on with a definite plan and with the help of the state funds at the disposal of the Bengal ministry.'

The committee 'requests the government of India to inquire into the situation to ascertain the amount of funds so far spent by Bengal ministry and take steps for preventing the utilization of public funds in furtherance of such communal objectives.'

Resolutions on communal situation in Bihar, Bombay and U.P. were also passed by the committee. Resolution on Bombay riots expresses the committee's regret at the 'inadequate measures adopted by the Bombay government to cope up with the acts of stabbings and acid throwings continued at Bombay and Ahmedabad for the last several months thereby indicating its inability to keep public peace and order at the respective centres of trade and commerce.'

The committee charged the U.P. Govt. with failure to check riots and said, 'the communal riots have been and are going on in the united provinces for the last eight or nine months, as a result of which Hindus inspite of their being in a majority have been the sufferers both in life and property. In the opinion of the committee the only reason of these riots continuing for such a long time is that, in that province Muslims though a minority of sixteen percent, hold a brutal monopoly of service in the police department as they hold seventy-six percent of the police services, besides the minister in charge of the police department is a Muslim, as a result of which the Muslims get various direct and indirect support and encouragement from the police.'

The committee called upon the U.P. Govt. 'to stop further recruitment of Muslims in the police services and the recently started home guards till such time as the number of Hindus attains the ratio according to their population in the province.'—API 10.2.47, 8 p.m.
10. Appeal for Action against Communal Propaganda
Letter from K. Subraya Pai to the President, Indian National Congress, 20 February 1947

To,
The President
Indian National Congress
AICC Office,
Allahabad.

Respected Sir,

Will you kindly give cognisance to the feelings of a Nationalist (Hindu) Indian, as expressed by me in the enclosed appeal to the Leaders of the ‘RSS Sangh’ and the Hindu Youth and Public in general?

The undersigned claims to have no Status in the Public Life nor has he any claims for Service or Sacrifice because of the humble position he is in up till now. But as he has burning desire to see the advent of a Socialist Indian Republic acceptable to all sections and shades of opinion in this Ancient Land, he is most sincerely extending sympathy and moral support to every move of the Congress and its Leadership.

The undersigned feels it his duty to bring to your notice, the slow but steady growth of the RSS activities and its manoeuvrings among the Hindu Youth and Public by instilling into their minds the necessity of Organization of the Hindus by which they contemplate the establishment of ‘Hindu-Raj’ of their dreams, which in all intents is based on the suppression of the minorities either by persuasion or by force. If this growth is allowed to be continued by the inactivity of the Congress and its Leaders, I am afraid the country will soon turn Fanatical, which will in the long run, threatening the very existence of the Congress Ideal of Unity among Hindus and non-Hindus and the establishment of a Democratic and Socialist Indian State. I hope the Congress, which underwent so many tribulations and privations, for the achievement of the genuine aspirations of Indians, will not sit idle at this juncture and leave the country to drift towards disunity, blood-shed and internecine warfare among the different sections of its people.

Anxiously watching for your and the Working Committee’s proper lead to all the right thinking Indians and also expecting your vigorous counter-propaganda in this direction,

I remain,
Very sincerely yours,
K. Subraya Pai
AN APPEAL
BY A NATIONALIST HINDU
THE LEADERS, RANK AND FILE OF THE RASTRIYA SWAYAM SEVAK SANGH
AND ALSO TO THE INTELLIGENTIA OF THE HINDU YOUTH AND PUBLIC IN GENERAL

On this auspicious day of ‘Shivaratri’, the day of awakening to the religious reformer and founder of the ‘Arya Samaj’—Swami Dayananda Saraswati and the fourth Death Anniversary of the Ideal Woman of India—Mrs Kasturba Gandhi. I am pained to address to you the following lines for your kind consideration.

1. It is deplorable to note that the ‘RSS Sangh’ and the Hindu Mahasabha while claiming to promote cultural, social and religious upliftment amongst the innumerable castes and sub-castes of the Hindu-fold, have in reality done no such service nor can they boast of any achievement in that direction. In the opinion of all Nationalist Hindu their approach has not been made on the proper lines for the following reasons, namely:
   (a) They have not promoted freedom of worship in all caste-ridden Hindu Temples and even today a population of over 60 to 70 millions of the backward oppressed section of the Hindus are denied this privilege for no fault of theirs but merely on the consideration of their birth. Both these organizations have also not done any concrete work for the removal of the curse of untouchability still existing between the Upper classes and the so called Backward or Scheduled Castes of the Hindus.
   (b) Neither the ‘RSS Sangh’ nor the ‘Hindu Mahasabha’ enjoy the confidence and support of the vast majority of the Hindus, because their very organizations being composed of Vested Interests and privileged and wealthy classes of the Hindus, they have no broad-based policy either for contact with the masses or for the upliftment of those less-fortunate, backward, illiterate masses of the Hindus. According to their preaching it is to be gathered that they believe in the establishment of a ‘Hindu Raj’ for the whole of India wherein they contemplate persecution and slavery not only for the non-Hindus but also for those Hindus who believe in the establishment of a Democratic and Socialist Indian State, promising equality of rights for all irrespective of caste or creed.

2. It must be well remembered that days of ‘Imperialist Designs’ have been a dream of the past and people everywhere, both in Asia and Africa have developed a sense of Mass Consciousness about the right of the masses to live a life of ease and comfort, so much so, you find unrest today not only in India, Burma, Indo-China, Indonesia (Dutch East Indies) and the Arab States of Egypt and Palestine, but in far off South and East Africa as well. You witness today as to who has won the 2nd World War. It is only Soviet Russia who has succeeded in outwitting the Imperialist Anglo Americans, who have been helpless all these 2 years, after the cessation of hostilities, in checking the spread of Communism in Finland, Rumania, Bulgaria, Austria, Hungary, Italy, France and Greater part of Germany. Coming to the East, there is growth of communism in Iran, China, India, Burma, Indonesia, Indo-China and others, where their growth has developed in varying degrees. In China, the Imperialist Kuomintang Government is fighting a bitter war with the Chinese Communists and it is to be seen as to who would come out successful.
Thus it is a foregone conclusion that the unnumbered, illiterate, starving and oppressed millions of India look to the advent of a Socialist or Workers-Raj rather than supporting organizations with ‘Imperialist Designs’ as they realize fully well that the latter offer no better treatment or status than the one already forced upon them by the British Imperialist Administration of India.

3. Therefore your approach should be made to the Masses of India, who are the backbone of this Indian Nation and who constitute the vast majority of Indians, struggling for food, drink and better living conditions. If you have failed to do so, as is evident from your activities since the past 2 or 3 decades, and if the same policy is pursued still further, you will lose every hold on the small percentage of the Ignorant Hindu Masses who have been promised happier and better life in the supposed ‘Hindu Raj’ that is yet to take its birth, if circumstances permit.

The late Swami Vivekananda and Mahatma Gandhi have rightly said that the best way a man could please God is through service to the poor and oppressed humanity and it is further emphasized that God can reveal himself to the common man only in the shape of Bread. If your Organizations do not promise any of these aids, belated though they may be, to the vast majority of the Hindu Masses, what else on earth can satisfy them? Even the appearance of God before a starving or suffering man would not be pleasing to that wretched soul. Then how will you lure them with the promise of a ‘Hindu Raj’ in these days of hardship and suffering to the Hindu Masses of India.

If you Hindu brethren believe in the Prophesy of the Modern Sage Swami Vivekananda who won laurels for the religion of India (Hinduism) at the Parliament of Religions held in Chicago in the year 1893, I shall quote the same for your serious consideration. Thus spoke he in one of his addresses to the Aristocratic class (Brahman), Kshatriyas an/or Vaishyas): ‘You the upper classes of India, you are Mummies 10,000 years old. You vanish from the soil of India and let new India arise from the cottages of the peasant, the fisherman, the cobbler and the sweeper’. He had also prophesied that the end of the rule by ‘Vaishyas’ all over the world was already in sight (his utterance in the year 1897) and that it would be the turn of the ‘Shoodras’ or the working class to take up the reigns of government all over the world.

Thus, you will see that there is no scope for an Imperialist organization like the ‘RSS Sangh’ or the ‘Muslim National Guards’ to establish their cherished Kingdoms of ‘Hindustan’ and ‘Pakistan’ respectively...if either of the two organizations should succeed in establishing it, it will be for a very short duration, like the Germany of 1933–1945 with its ever growing war of Aggression, which finally collapsed and now lying under the heel of the Anglo-American–French–Russian Control Councils.

In this connection, may I quote the words of Mahatma Gandhi which appeared in his short but impressive letter addressed to Herr Hitler a few days before his Declaration of War against Poland. These are his words:

‘What is won by the Sword, will be lost by the Sword’ and so it has happened for both the Western and Eastern Aggressors, Germany and Japan. Today, Fate seems to be very cruel to these 2 nations as their position today is more humiliating than that of the people of India.

I hope and pray to God almighty that no such calamity may befall on the people of India, whether they be Hindus or Mussalmans and that he may bring Reason and Forbearance to the Fanatical Organizations of both the communities, resulting in the Dawn of a Free, Independent and Socialist Republic of India acceptable to all classes and shades of opinion inhabiting this Ancient Land, which can still take Pride in giving birth to almost all the saints and philosophers of the world from times immemorial, that is, from the time of the Vedas down to the Present Age.

Let New India of our Dreams succeed in guiding the other Nations of the World through Her Religion of Mutual toleration, Love and Unity in Diversity, thus opening a New Era in this world of Turmoil and Animosity against one another among the Human Beings!!!

This is my solemn Prayer to the God Almighty and I hope that you will also subscribe to it.

11. Moonje Exhorts Hindus to Retaliate against Muslim Aggression

Summary of Dr Moonje's Speech at Bombay, 9 March 1947
B.S. Moonje Papers, S. No. 110, NMML.

Mr Attlee, Prime Minister of England has made a statement which appears to me in compliance with the statements and requests made by mostly by the Congress leaders to the effect that if the British were to announce their determination to quit India and were to fix a date by which time they would quit India, then the third party, that is, the British being thus eliminated the Moslems would come to settlement with the Hindus and thus as anticipated by Mahatma Gandhi, a Hindu-Moslem Unity would be brought about.

Though we are thankful for such a statement we cannot be blind to the mischief implicit in it and the mischief lies in the fact that Mr Attlee statement provides for the transfer of the British power to a Government or Governments at the British Governments discretion instead of making a straight and frank statement that the power will be transferred to the Interim Central Government as provided and established according to the British Cabinet Mission’s plan. This mischief has proved a direct incentive to Moslem hooliganism as is now rampant in Punjab and North-West Frontier Province. Whatever be the intentions of the British Government, fight has been forced on the Hindus in spite of their peaceful temperament. Therefore, it is a duty of the Hindus now to be prepared to fight the Mussulmans with all the weapons which are available and are in use against them by the Mussulmans. Without such a fight Hindus will not be able to win and protect their honour, religion and culture.

If the majority community of the Moslem in the North-West Frontier Province and the Punjab have thought it wise to rise against the minority community, that is, the Hindus and the Sikhs, then should it not be the incumbent duty of the majority community of, say, UP, Bihar, CP, Bombay and Madras to retaliate so that they may check the aggression on the Hindus in the Punjab and North-West Frontier Province?

Forcible conversion seems to be the chief weapon of moral aggression of the Mussulmans as in Bengal. Should not the Hindus also pay them back in their own coin?

Now as regards the Congress resolution approving of the partition of Punjab, the question is who will actually execute the partition? Who will decide as to how the province is to be partitioned? If the Moslems were not to agree, and I am sure, they will never agree, have the Central Interim Government of the Congress power and courage to give effect to their proposal of partitioning the province? Some of the Muslim League leaders appear to be in favour of such a partition, but doubt is entertained of their honesty. And it has been openly said in the press that it is a crafty move to divide the Sikhs from the Hindus. Thus if it is not a feasible proposition, what advantage has been gained by making committance beforehand? Will such a committal be not used against them to their detriment?

Thus taking all these facts together, the only conclusion that appears to be practicable is that the Hindus should prepare to give a grim fight to the Mussulmans because it is not now a communal problem, but a war between the Moslems and the Hindus. It is wrong to describe it as a Civil War because Mr Jinnah has taken care to reiterate that the Moslems have nothing in common with the Hindus and that everything Moslem is in conflict with everything Hindu.

12. ‘Gandhiji Deeply Distressed’

The Hindustan Times, 10 March 1947.

Mahatma Gandhi contemplates to undertake a fast unto death if he does not find a change of heart among the Hindus in Bihar, it is learnt in New Delhi.

A positive hint to this effect is reported to have been given to the members of the Congress High Command.

Gandhiji, it is reported, continues to feel very much distressed over the recent happenings in Noakhali, Tipperah and Bihar.

‘If India chooses to drift towards the path of violence and if Hindus and Muslims want to fight among themselves and cut each other’s throats any time when India is on the threshold of freedom, then I don’t want to be a party to live to see that chaotic India. I would pray to God to take me away from this world.’

This is Gandhiji’s oft-repeated observation to many persons who contacted him during the last fortnight.

Another reply by Gandhiji to a query put to him on the eve of his departure for Bihar from Chandpur is considered very significant. Gandhiji, replying to a query whether he would be returning to Noakhali from Bihar, is reported to have said that if he was alive he would again come to Noakhali to finish his ‘Do or Die’ mission.

When a Press message regarding Gandhiji’s contemplated fast was read out to him in his Patna Camp for confirmation, Gandhiji burst out into a laughter and said, ‘Of course, there is a little bit of truth in it.’

Gandhiji further said that at present he had no intention of fasting, but circumstances might arise of which he had no knowledge, which might compel him to undertake a fast.—UPI

Sind Secretariat, Karachi, 19th March 1947

1. Political.—There is no doubt about it, the events in the Punjab are considered by Sind to be very near home. In Karachi itself, between the 7th and the 13th there was a distinct atmosphere of panic. It all centred round the alleged intention of the Sikhs to hold an Anti-Pakistan Day. On the 10th it was clear that a very ugly intensification of rumour was getting hold. Both the Chief Secretary and the District Magistrate were approached by prominent citizens with stories of demonstrations to be staged or of a zero hour fixed for attack. No-one professed to believe these highly coloured stories; on the other hand, no-one was prepared to take the responsibility for discrediting these rumours. People preferred to take the easy way out and just 'pass it on'. This is of course exactly how rumour grows. So far Sind’s luck has held again, and no serious incidents of communal nature have occurred. The incidents in Multan of course have a special interest for Sind, particularly Sukkur District, and it was at one time feared that refugees from Multan might spread panic in Sukkur District, particularly in the Rohri Sub-division. In the meantime there have been certain troop movements, which while not asked for by the Provincial Government, have been made after consultation with and consent of His Excellency the Governor. These movements may, therefore, be considered as purely precautionary. A great deal will depend on whether order can finally be restored in the Punjab. If trouble is avoided, it will not be for want of trying on the part of certain mischief-makers on both sides. There has been evidence of an organized whispering campaign.

Bihar refugees have not yet become a major problem. There are reported to be some five to six hundreds of these in Karachi; the number may have been increased. But it is necessary to discourage any belief that the Province can absorb an unlimited number of such refugees. While it is impossible to ignore the political complexion of this problem, it must be Government’s first aim to obtain a clear appreciation of its economic aspects.

The question of various private armies has been considered by Government and it has been decided that at present no extra-ordinary measures are called for. But the District Magistrates have been informed that Government consider the present tendencies of the Rashtriya Swayam Sewak Sangh and the Rashtriya Sewa Dal constitute a menace, and that a strict watch should be kept on the situation, with particular reference to the collection and storing of arms....
Chapter 7. Civil Disobedience Movements by the Muslim League

A. Punjab

1. Patel Criticizes League Leaders Involved in the Punjab Campaign Letter from Vallabhbhai Patel to Wavell, 26 January 1947
   SPC, Vol. IV, pp. 4–5.

   Dear Lord Wavell,

   The comments of some of my colleagues of the Muslim League on the situation in the Punjab, caused by an open defiance, by some members of the League, of legal orders promulgated by lawful authority, have in my view transgressed the bounds of propriety and discretion, the observance of which was incumbent on them as Members of Government.

   2. I do not think it is either fair or proper that Members of the Central Government should indulge in open criticism of any lawful action taken by the Provincial Government in the discharge of their responsibility. Provincial Governments have right to expect the co-operation of the Central Government in their difficult task of maintaining law and order. That, apart from withholding it, any of us should attribute motives or make comments which would encourage defiance to lawful orders or render their task more difficult is a negation of that accommodation between the Central and Provincial Governments, which is essential if we are to avoid an open conflict between the Centre and the provinces.

   3. I feel that there is still time to prevent this dangerous tendency from becoming further accentuated and stop matters from passing from unfair criticism to open encouragement to defiance. I would, therefore, suggest for Your Excellency’s consideration that the impropriety of the action of the Members concerned may be impressed upon them and they may be informed that consistently with their duties and obligations as Members of Government, they should refrain from any comments or criticism which would be likely to embarrass the Government of the Punjab in its present difficulties. Of course, if they wish to continue in their course, the only honourable course for them is to resign.

   Yours sincerely,
   Vallabhbhai Patel
2. Punjab Governor's Assessment of League Leaders' Arrest

Extracts from a Letter from Evan Jenkins to Wavell, 26 January 1947

NO. 642.

I have just drafted a reply to the Secretary of State's telegram of yesterday about the arrest of the Muslim League leaders in Lahore and connected matters. This reply will be repeated to Your Excellency, but I think I had better let you have a fuller account of what has happened....

After 7 p.m. the Home Secretary went to the Civil Lines Police Station to see the arrested leaders. He found them bitter and angry and determined to out Khizar at all costs. An aggressive crowd assembled outside this Police Station, and at one time it seemed that we were in for a difficult night. The Senior Superintendent of Police was, however, able to disperse this crowd by a severe lathi charge. He has a comparatively small Force at his immediate disposal, and gentler methods were impossible. I am informed that several members of this crowd were more or less seriously injured, and some of them have been admitted to hospitals; but no fatal casualties have been reported.

The night of 24–25th January from 11 p.m. was quiet.

7. The leaders arrested on 24th January were remanded to judicial custody and lodged in Jail early on the morning of 25th. The Muslim League leaders seemed uncertain about their next move. The Muslim League MLAs present in Lahore met at 11 a.m. at the Assembly Chamber (this was a Party meeting which had been arranged some time ago). Crowds collected outside the Chamber on two occasions, and had to be dispersed. There were also various processions and demonstrations, including one, headed by seven of the Muslim League MLAs, who compelled the police to arrest them. There were at least two demonstrations by women, and a few women were arrested.

In the early afternoon some of the Muslim League MLAs still at large called a 'mammoth meeting' at the Mochi Gate at 4 p.m. The Police dealt with this meeting, but ten more or less prominent persons including eight Muslim League MLAs had to be arrested. A Company of the Inniskillings was moved into the Kotwali during the afternoon.

Tear smoke was freely used on 25th. On both days the Police were handled with great skill and restraint, and I do not think that any demonstrator was at all seriously hurt, except some of those taking part in the demonstration outside the Civil Lines Police Station on 24th.

8. Khizar returned from Delhi after 5 p.m. on 25th, and I held a conference at Government House with him, Qizilbash, the Home Secretary, the Inspector-General of Police, and the Deputy Inspector-General of Police, CID, at 6 p.m. I reviewed the situation for Khizar, and pointed out to him that it had a law and order side and a political side. It was easier to send people to jail than to get them out of jail in a co-operative frame of mind; and I realized that whatever we might be able to do to see him through, he had to watch his political flanks and to consider how far he could go without making his own position impossible (I put these points to him objectively, as the Inspector-General of Police asked me to ascertain if I could, what Khizar's final position would be. There would be little object in bold decisions if he did not intend to stick to them.) Khizar took the situation quite calmly. He said he had never intended to make any arrests, and that nothing was further from his thoughts than to attack the Muslim League as a party. He had not supposed that the Muslim League would take him on on what he thought a relatively unimportant issue and not a particularly good casus belli from the Muslim League point of view. The arrests had been forced on him, and he could not as Premier yield to threats. He was therefore determined to carry on as long as he could. He did not want to fill the jails, and action should, as far as possible, be confined to the organizers of the revolt against authority. We then decided to modify the notification under the Punjab Public Safety Ordinance specifying the uniform, emblems, and other things of the Muslim League National Guards so as to omit the reference to the flag—the description of the flag might, as it stands, be taken as banning the ordinary flag of Islam. We also drafted a press communiqué, and settled the outline of instructions to districts. District Officers are being told not to take any action as long as their districts remain quiet, but to act without hesitation against threatened or actual defiance of the law. In doing so they are to use the Ordinance or the ordinary law as may seem best, but the Ordinance may be preferable in most cases and will certainly have to be used for preventing [?preventive] arrests.

9. So far no serious repercussions have been reported from districts other than Lahore, but the Muslim League MLAs not arrested have returned to their constituencies with instructions to organize defiance. Ghazanfar Ali, who was here when the trouble started and left yesterday evening for Sind, has made a nuisance of himself and intends to stimulate not only provincial, but all-India interest in Khizar’s alleged frontal attack on the Muslim League. It would be a great help if Your Excellency could keep him and his Muslim League colleagues employed at Delhi until we see how things go.

10. Khizar is undoubtedly in a difficult position, both administratively and politically; but I am not convinced that the Muslim League are as strong as they believe. They have various difficulties of their own, and an organized revolt against authority is easier to start than to maintain. We can only wait and see what happens during the next few days. Khizar’s best hope is probably to win a victory on the law and order side and then to be very conciliatory, but he is undoubtedly in for a most unpleasant time.

11. I wish to make it quite clear to Your Excellency and to the Secretary of State that I take full responsibility for what has happened. The suggestion for action came from me, and although I put no pressure on Khizar, he consulted me at all stages, and I approved his decision. For your own information, I have reason to think that Khizar did not consult his colleagues in the Cabinet other than Qizilbash. He is apt to keep law and order matters very much to himself and the Governor....

3. ‘National Guards Are an Integral Part of the League—Liaquat Ali Khan’

27 January 1947

‘It is a complete travesty of truth to describe the [Muslim] League National Guards as a private army, and this is only an excuse for the indefensible conduct of the Ministry which is clearly out to suppress the Muslim League in the Punjab,’ says Mr Liaquat Ali Khan, General Secretary, All India Muslim League in a statement from New Delhi on Saturday [25 January].

‘I have now seen fuller reports of the Punjab Government’s action against the Muslim League National Guards in the province and that Government’s communiqué purporting to explain the action.
'The Muslim League has no private army,' continues Mr Liaquat Ali Khan. 'The National Guard are an integral part of the Muslim League Organization and an attack on it is an attack on the Muslim League as such. The Punjab Government’s apologia that their action is not directed against the League will deceive no one.

'Since the National Guards came into existence in 1938 they have not once been guilty of violence or lawlessness. Their activities have been confined to inculcating discipline among Muslims, maintaining order at public meetings and processions, and carrying out relief work in times of distress. During the war, the National Guards played an important part in assisting the Civil authority in affording relief to the evacuees from Burma. During the Bengal Famine they carried out extensive relief operations; and during the recent Bihar massacres they did exemplary humanitarian work.

'The fact is that the present Punjab Ministry, which is essentially Hindu in character and which continues in office with the support of a handful of Muslim quislings, is an unnatural form of Government for the Punjab where Muslims form a majority in the population.

'The recent by-election in Dera Ghazi Khan, in which the Muslim League won a remarkable victory in spite of every [sic] conceivable odds and obstacles put by the authorities in the way of the League candidate, has once again demonstrated Muslim Punjab’s lack of confidence in the present Ministry which is now making a desperate bid to overawe and suppress the Muslim League by these repressive measures.

'Its present action in outlawing the National Guards and arresting respected and responsible leaders of the Punjab Muslims marks the culmination of a long chain of oppression and persecution of Muslim Leaguers throughout the province since the Ministry came into office.

'The Punjab Ministry has thrown a challenge to the Muslim League Organization not only in the Punjab but throughout India, and it alone must bear the responsibility for the consequences of its insane action.'

4. 'Rashtriya Sangh Cherishes No Ill-will towards Anyone:
It Is Neither a Communal Body Nor a “Private” Army'

LAHORE, 23 Jan.—A statement, having the full approval of the former Prant Sang-Chalak of the Rashtriya Swayam Sewak Sangh, Punjab, Rai Bahadur Badri Das, refuting the charge against the organization being a ‘Private Army’ indulging in any communal activities, has been issued today by the former Provincial Secretary of the Sangh, Mr Dharamvir....

Rai Bahadur Badri Das says:

Mr Dharamvir has shown me the statement he has issued to the press in connection with the recent orders of the Punjab Government declaring the Rashtriya Swayam Sewak Sangh to be an unlawful body. The members and the sympathizers of the Sangh will certainly obey the orders and I have no doubt will not defy it in any manner whatsoever.

I have known of all the activities of the Sangh and have no hesitation in endorsing Mr Dharamvir’s statement to the effect that the Sangh has none of the activities attributed to it by the Government communiqué, nor has the Sangh, as I know it, ever cherished any ill-will towards anyone.

I hope the Government will be pleased to reconsider their decision regarding the RS Sangh.
Mr Dharam Vir's Statement

The following is the statement issued by Mr Dharam Vir, former Provincial Secretary of the Rashtriya Swayam Sewak Sangh:

The order of the Punjab Government banning the Rashtriya Swayam Sewak Sangh comes as a surprise to us and the sympathizers of the movement. The Sangh is purely a cultural, social and moral association for disseminating feelings of brotherhood and amity amongst the Hindus. There is nothing militant in its aims and its programmes and methods of work have no military character. It has not even a semblance of a body which can be called a militia, a private army or anything approaching these. It pursues a harmless programme of physical exercises as a means of bringing the boys and youths together. It has scrupulously avoided political colouring and has never indulged in anti-Government activity of any kind. Nor has it ever taken part in any communal movement. It is non-communal in the sense that it does not entertain any hostile feelings against any community in the country. Its principal aim is purely educative. It has only been exercising the right which every community possesses to better its condition and follow its cultural traditions...It is an all-India body and no Provincial Government has during this last 22 years found it harmful to the public peace....

Mischievous Propaganda

As a matter of fact a great deal of mischievous and provocative propaganda has been carried on by some newspapers against the Sangh. The Sangh refrained from taking notice of the mischievous writings in conformity with its avowed policy of avoiding controversy leading to friction. It was hoped that the writers in the Muslim press would sooner or later discover their mistake.

But the authorities appeared to persist in their belief based entirely on false and imaginary reports and statements....

Cancel the Order

It is hoped that the authorities will take these facts into consideration and cancel the order banning the Rashtriya Swayam Sewak Sangh.

I appeal to the public not to be excited or be swept away by emotions and all of us must remain disciplined and peaceful and give one more proof of our determination to abide by the law, inspite of the fact that it is based on misunderstanding and injustice.

5. ‘League Leaders’ Arrests in Punjab: Jinnah Shocked’

KARACHI, 26 Jan.—Mr M.A. Jinnah, President of the All India Muslim League, has issued the following statement to the press:

I am shocked to read the report in the press of the decision of the Punjab Government to declare the Muslim National Guards organization unlawful under the guise of and plea that the Government cannot allow private armies. There is not an iota of truth in it that the Muslim National Guards are based on the idea of racing up a private army and this has been fully explained by Mr Liaquat Ali Khan in his statement issued yesterday. No complaint was made, or warning given, by the Punjab Government to the executive of the National Guards, the Provincial Muslim League or the All India Muslim League, nor has the Muslim National Civil Disobedience Movements by the Muslim League

Guards organization been shown to have done anything or attempting to do anything that was unlawful....

'It is not clear whether this policy and action taken by the Punjab Government is by the ministry, or the Governor, or both. The Premier of the Punjab, who was in Delhi discussing with the Viceroy the question of a military academy for Punjab, when asked what he had to say about this action on the part of the Punjab Government to my astonishment, said that he had nothing to say until he returned to Lahore. Evidently, the decision was taken in his absence and without his knowledge and I hope the Premier will explain his position without any further delay with regard to this matter.

'The repercussions of this one more mad and inimical action against the Muslim League on the part of the Punjab Government will be terrific all over Muslim India and I appeal to the Viceroy to immediately intervene and save the situation which otherwise may take a very serious turn for which the entire responsibility will rest with the Viceroy and HMG.

'The Working Committee of the All India Muslim League, which is meeting in Karachi on the 29th of January, will consider the whole matter and decide upon what course of action should be adopted to meet this uncalled for aggression and unwarranted policy of the Punjab Government at this most critical time when already there is so much trouble and unrest all over India.'—API.

6. 'League Leaders Released: Punjab Govt’s Decision'

LAHORE, 26 Jan.—The Punjab Government decided tonight to withdraw cases against and passed orders for the release of the first batch of eight Muslim League leaders, including Mr Iftikhar Hussain Khan of Mamdot, Mr Firoze Khan Noon, Sardar Shaukat Hyat Khan, Mian Mumtaz Daultana, Begum Shah Nawaz, Mian Iftikhar-ud-Din and Begum Kamal-ud-Din, who were arrested on Friday last, it was officially announced to-night.

Premier’s Statement

...The Punjab Premier, Malik Khizar Hayat Khan Tiwana, has issued the following statement:

I was away from Lahore on 24th January when the offices of the RSSS and the Muslim League National Guards were searched and demonstrations by the Muslim League began in Lahore city. Since my return on 25th January, I have studied the situation and wish to make the position of the Punjab Government clear.

During the last year the communal situation in the Punjab has given cause for grave anxiety. The decision to declare the RSSS and the MLNG unlawful associations was taken solely in the interests of communal peace, and the Punjab Government assumed that their action would have the support or acquiescence of all law-abiding citizens.

I find, however, that the declaration in respect of the MLNG has been interpreted by the Muslim League as an attack upon them as a political party. Nothing was farther from the thoughts of my Government than any such attack and I wish to do everything I can to remove any misunderstanding....

7. ‘Procession of One Lakh Muslims Marches through Lahore Streets’

LAHORE, Monday.—The Muslim League civil disobedience campaign took a new turn today when the seven League leaders who were released from the Central Jail yesterday again defied the ban and addressed a gathering of one lakh Muslims outside the Mochi Gate to show their determination to fight the present unrepresentative quisling Ministry with all their resources.

Later the crowd was led by the League leaders including Khan of Mamdot and Malik Feroz Khan Noon in a mile-long procession which passed through the Circular Road and dispersed peacefully outside the Yakki Gate.

The police did not interfere, nor did they disperse the meeting or arrest the leaders.

According to an information received in the Punjab Muslim League office, more than one thousand persons were arrested on Monday all over the Punjab for defying the ban.

The League leaders have planned to take out another procession tomorrow which will start from Delhi Gate and terminate at Punjab Civil Secretariat.

As the time for the meeting approached, a huge crowd gathered and wave after wave of Muslim volunteers and Muslim League National Guards poured into Mochi Gate Square carrying banners and flags and shouting slogans....

MOCHI GATE MEETING

Mian Iftikhar-ud-Din, MLA, addressing the meeting said: ‘We shall carry on our struggle all over the Punjab until all restrictions on civil liberties of the people are withdrawn by the Government. We have come here to tell you that if you further carry on your fight with the same determination and patience we shall not only achieve victory in the Punjab but we shall bring the realization of our goal of Pakistan much nearer.’

Mian Iftikhar-ud-Din warned that mischief-mongers would try their best to turn their movement into an inter-communal strife and thereby direct the energies of the Muslims into wrong channels. ‘It was our duty now to guard scrupulously against this move.’

Sardar Shaukat Hyat Khan, Deputy Leader of the Muslim League Assembly Party, in the course of his speech said: ‘I have come to you today not to damp your strong sentiments but to demand the maximum of sacrifice from you. During the last three days you have put up a very courageous fight against the forces which are out to crush the Punjab Muslims.

‘I assure you that if you carry on your struggle with a grim determination you will shortly succeed in uprooting the quisling Ministry in the Punjab, and restoring civil liberties in the Punjab,’ he added.

Mian Mumtaz Daultana, member of the All-India Muslim League Committee of Action said that they were thrown out of jail and they wanted to go back at the earliest opportunity. ‘We shall fight till the people of the Punjab had fully regained their civil liberties.’

He appealed to the people to keep it as a purely political movement and should not be drifted into an inter-communal conflict....

Khan Iftikhar Hussain Khan of Mamdot presided.

Two hundred butchers of Lahore took out a procession today in Mazang, a suburb of Lahore in defiance of the prohibitory order. The police accompanied the procession but did not take any action.

The processionists dispersed after crossing the half a mile long bazar of Mazang.—APA and API.
8. ‘Punjab League Leaders Re-arrested: Ban on Muslim League National Guards Lifted’

LAHORE, Tuesday.—THE POLICE ARRESTED AT MID-NIGHT ALL TOP-RANKING LEADERS. ARRESTED LEADERS INCLUDE KHAN OF MAMDOT, MALIK FEROZ KHAN NOON, MR MUMTAZ DAULTANA, MIAN IFTIKHARUDDIN, SARDAR SHAUKAT HYAT KHAN, BEGAM SHAH NAWAZ, MR GHULAMUDDIN KASURI, PROFESSOR ABDUL WAHEED, MIAN NOORULLAH AND MIAN AMIRUDDIN.

THEY HAVE BEEN TAKEN TO THE CHARING CROSS POLICE STATION. MR JINNAH HAS BEEN INFORMED.

An earlier message from the same correspondent said: The Punjab League won the first round of its battle against the Congress–Khizr Fascist regime when the Punjab Premier made a statement to the Press this afternoon withdrawing the ban on the Muslim League National Guards.

Following the lifting of the ban the Punjab League announced that the struggle will be continued till the ban on processions and public meetings is lifted. In pursuance of that decision Sardar Shaukat Hyat Khan, Begum Shah Nawaz, Begum Noon, Miss Zahida Hyat and Mian Amiruddin courted arrest. But they were taken out of Lahore and then let off at different places.

The Punjab Muslim Press has decided to suspend publication for 15 days from Thursday next. This decision was taken by Nawa-i-Waqt, Zamindar, Ehsan and Eastern Times following an order by the Punjab Government directing the papers not to publish anything concerned with or bearing on the agitation against the Punjab Public Safety Ordinance....

9. ‘Punjab Govt Removes Ban’

LAHORE, 28 Jan.—The order declaring the Rashtriya Swayam Sewak Sangh and the Muslim National Guards to be unlawful associations under the Criminal Law Amendment Act was withdrawn by the Punjab Government today....

In the course of his statement the Premier says—

‘In my statement of 26th January I endeavoured, on behalf of my colleagues and myself, to make it clear that in declaring the Rashtriya Swayam Sewak Sangh and Muslim League National Guards unlawful associations the Punjab Government was not attacking any political party. The declarations were part of the Punjab Government’s policy for the maintenance of communal peace. There has been considerable uneasiness both among Muslims and non-Muslims over the alleged collection of arms by private volunteer bodies, and I expected that the declarations would be accepted in the same spirit as other emergency measures which have been necessary during the past difficult months, and have undoubtedly saved the Punjab from communal disorder.

‘Unfortunately an impression persists that the Punjab Government did intend to attack the Muslim League as a party. The Punjab Government is determined to remove this impression in the interests of communal peace, and has accordingly decided to withdraw the declarations against the RSSS and MLNG. The Punjab Government is prepared to take the risk involved in order to set all doubts finally at rest.'
'But in the present state of communal feeling, no government can agree to the general withdrawal of emergency restrictions particularly those on processions and meetings and the Punjab Government intends to maintain and enforce such restrictions as it considers essential. Persons who break the law will be adequately dealt with.

'I appeal to the members of all communities to support the Punjab Government in maintaining order and communal peace....'

10. ‘Ashraf’s Tribute to Punjab Women’
Dawn, 29 January 1947.

DR M. ASHRAF, Communist leader, in an interview with me, said that the Punjab Government’s action against the Muslim National Guards was a conspiracy of the bureaucracy to further sharpen the Congress-League differences.

He said: ‘But I must congratulate the elements who saw the danger of the inter-communal strife and raised the question of the civil liberties.’

Dr Ashraf said that the ban on the RSS was only formal and the Punjab Government made no serious efforts to search the Sangh headquarters.

Referring to the seizure of the steel helmets and the bogey that the National Guards was a private army, he said: ‘It is mean and malicious propaganda. Possession of the steel helmets, which were bought from the Government of India’s Disposals Directorate, cannot make an organization an army. Steel helmets are not armoured cars.’

Dr Ashraf said that it was significant that the decision to ban the National Guards was taken at the meeting called by the Governor where neither the Ministers nor the Chief Secretary, Mr Akhtar Hussain was invited.

He paid glowing tributes to the ‘undying heroism and courage of the Muslim women who faced tear-gas and other dangers with a stout heart.’

11. Governor’s Report on the League Agitation
Extract from a Letter from Evan Jenkins to Wavell, 29 January 1947

Secret
No. 643

Government House, Lahore

Dear Lord Wavell,

Since I wrote to Your Excellency on 26th January about the Muslim League agitation, I have sent you several rather scrappy telegrams. I had now better continue the story in a second letter.

2. There were demonstrations of the usual kind in Lahore and elsewhere on 26th January. At a conference in the afternoon the Premier began to outline the policy which he and his colleagues later approved. He said he thought that the Muslim League meant to take him on if not on the question of the Muslim League National Guards, then on some other question. A deliberate attempt to overthrow his Government by unconstitutional means would be a matter of law and order and constitutional principle, and would have to be handled with the firmness shown against the Congress agitation in 1942. He certainly did not want a head-on conflict with the League and must give the leaders every opportunity of reconsidering their position.
He decided to issue a conciliatory statement... He discussed at some length the advantages and disadvantages of withdrawing the prosecutions against the eight leaders, and said he was definitely of opinion that withdrawal, though it might do little good, would gain some credit for Government among moderate Muslims and among members of the services.

3. The eight leaders were released on the night of 26–27th January. The two women, Begum Shah Nawaz and Begum Kamal-ud-Din, left jail with every appearance of pleasure, but the men made a fuss and left under protest. I understand that they reached their homes at about midnight.

4. On 27th January there was a further conference on the situation at 10 a.m. It was reported that the released leaders were meeting at the Muslim League office and intended to hold a big meeting at the Mochi Gate of Lahore city in the afternoon. There were reports of disturbances from several other districts. I suggested that there might be advantage in a direct contact with Mamdot. As the Premier and his colleagues are not on speaking terms with the Muslim League leaders, it was agreed that I should send for Mamdot and have a frank talk with him. The Premier said that I might inform Mamdot that the Punjab Government would consider withdrawing simultaneously the ban on the Muslim League National Guards and the ban on the Sangh. He could not agree to the withdrawal of the Punjab Public Safety Ordinance, 1946. (Incidentally this is an Ordinance made by me under Section 89 of the Government of India Act, 1935, and not an Ordinance made on advice from the Ministers.) I was not to commit myself with Mamdot, but to discuss his attitude with the Premier after I had seen him. I saw Mamdot at about 12.15 p.m., and append a copy of a note I recorded immediately after the interview. Mamdot was quite amiable, but it was clear that he and his colleagues in the Muslim League were extending their demands a good deal beyond the removal of the ban on the Muslim League National Guards.

5. My interview with Mamdot had no appreciable effect. In order that he might get the fullest possible advantage from the release of the leaders, the Premier agreed to allow the meeting at the Mochi Gate announced for the afternoon....

7. The Premier’s statement announcing the withdrawal of the bans was issued at about 1.15 p.m. News of it reached the Muslim League leaders early in the afternoon, but they carried on with their plans and announced at their meeting that the removal of the ban on the Muslim League National Guards was neither here nor there. The ban was not a particularly important matter and what they were really after was to get rid of restrictions under the Ordinance and to overthrow the coalition Ministry. I have not seen full reports of the speeches or of a statement issued during the afternoon by the Muslim League leaders, but there is no doubt about their general tenor. The afternoon was disturbed and a good many leaders and others were arrested and dumped at some little distance from Lahore....

10. The Premier seems confident that the situation can be controlled. He says that having got the question of the ban on the Muslim League National Guards out of the way it is a straight fight on the law and order and constitutional issues. The Muslim League contend that they were done out of office after the General Election, that they cannot stand the present Ministry, and that it must be outed by a show of force. They do not seem to have considered where these contentions land them. Past civil disobedience movements have usually been against irremovable Executives and could be represented as the only means open to their organizers of ventilating, and obtaining redress for, genuine grievances; but the present movement is against a Ministry constituted under the Government of India Act, 1935, and strikes at the roots of democratic Government. In fact if the Muslim League succeeded, they would make their own position impossible, for they would have created a precedent very easy for the non-Muslims of the Punjab to follow, and the non-Muslims are cleverer at this sort of agitation than the Muslims. I can hardly think that our Muslim League leaders consulted their High Command before manoeuvring themselves into such an unsatisfactory position.

11. There is definite evidence that educated people, including some members of the Muslim League, think the agitation ill-timed and silly. The restrictions under the Ordinance are admittedly severe; their justification is that they have undoubtedly saved the Punjab from communal disorder during a very difficult time. Moreover, all communities, and particularly the Muslims, have taken full advantage of the exemption granted to religious meetings, and the Muslims have probably done as much political speaking during the past few months as is good for them. Some of the soreness to which the agitation is due arises from the imposition, under Section 144 of the Code of Criminal Procedure, of a local ban on meetings and processions in the Dera Ghazi Khan district during a recent bye-election. As Your Excellency knows, I thought this ban unnecessary, but was unable to bring the Premier round to my view.

12. The Premier is now committed to a considerable repressive operation. I cannot say yet how things will go, but he has a reasonable chance of holding his own. At the early stages he did everything possible to conciliate his opponents, and he decided to take them on only when it was clear there was no practicable alternative.

13. I am sending copies of this letter to Wylie, Caroe and Mudie, and I am also enclosing a spare copy in case Your Excellency wishes to send one to the Secretary of State.

Yours sincerely,

E.M. JENKINS

NOTE BY JENKINS

27th January, 1947

I saw the Nawab of Mamdot this morning. I said that I had sent for him because I did not wish the Punjab to drift into a very dangerous situation owing to misunderstandings and lack of personal contact. I could assure him that the declaration of the RSS and the MLNG as unlawful associations was not aimed at the Muslim League. The decision to make the declaration was taken by Government; I was myself a party to it and entirely approved it....

3. In conclusion I told the Nawab once more that nobody wanted a violent struggle in the Punjab and that the only thought in the minds of those responsible for law and order was to keep the peace and to steer the Punjab through this very difficult period; but I must repeat that no Government could tolerate a deliberate and unconstitutional attack on its authority. Such an attack would not be a party issue, but an issue of constitutional principle. I asked him to believe that there was no desire to suppress the Muslim League or to hold its members in custody. But if the leaders stimulated defiance, Government would have to act quickly and firmly. The Nawab said he quite understood my position. Our interview then ended.

E.M.J.
12. ‘Punjab Action Committee’s Call’

LAHORE, [28 Jan]: The following statement has been issued to the press by the Committee of Action of the Punjab Provincial Muslim League including the leaders who were arrested on 24th January.

On account of the recent sudden development precipitated by the Punjab Government’s order banning the Muslim National Guards, there is liable to be some confusion in the minds of the public about the real motives which have compelled the Punjab Provincial Muslim League to embark on a general Civil Disobedience Movement throughout the province... Therefore, we find it necessary to acquaint our people with the background and the occasion of our decision.

As the public is very well aware, the past general elections in the Punjab were held under circumstances of indescribable oppression, when the entire coercive machinery of the Government was prostituted and perverted to harass, victimise and suppress the Muslim League. Methods of violence and illegal interference were employed which have no parallel outside the darkest chapters of the Fascist gangsterism.

After the elections when all the satanic resources of the Glancy-Khizar axis had failed to stem the triumphant progress of the aroused Muslim people, the Governor of the province imposed upon the Punjab, a Government headed by a handful of professional disrupters and discredited traitors, who at the hands of the people had suffered a defeat hardly equalled in political history.

This Government, composed almost exclusively of non-Muslims and headed by half a dozen Muslim traitors who had been expressly repudiated by the electorate, was forced by the most undemocratic methods and through the vilest intrigue on a province which was predominantly Muslim, and which was regarded by the Muslims throughout India as the cornerstone of their future freedom and Pakistan.

Immediately after the formation of the Government, the first action of this clique of traitors was to impose Section 144 in almost all the towns of the province, thus choking all political life and making the normal functioning of every bonafide political party impossible. This was naturally no loss to the Unionist ramp which had never had the slightest relationship with the people and which having secured a handful of seats in the last elections through the obliging pencil of the polling officers, wished for... so much as to be protected from... public expression, opinion... the Congress... of the present unpopular Government by launching a general non-co-operation movement at an early date, and the order banning the Muslim National Guards was only an occasion which precipitated an action already ripe for execution.

Therefore, there is no truth whatever in the suggestion made in certain usually misinformed quarters that the present step of the Punjab Provincial Muslim League was taken in haste. On the other hand, if anything, we owe an apology to the expectant masses of the Punjab for the delay in giving the orders for the fight and thus forcing them to submit to this brutal suppression of their liberties for so long....

ALL-OUT STRUGGLE

In view of the above circumstances, it is our decision that we shall continue our present all-out non-violent mass struggle against the reactionary Punjab regime until the normal functioning of all legitimate and peaceful popular organizations and parties is secured.
Towards Freedom: 1947

We need not emphasize that our struggle will remain non-violent and non-communal, and no better proof of this can be given than the gallant and heroic manner in which the Muslim masses have behaved during the last three or four days, despite ruthless police repression and provocation from many quarters.

We warn our people that the key to our success lies in continuing to resist all provocation towards communal outbreaks, despite the efforts of agents provocateurs and by proving to the world the manifest political and democratic nature of our struggle.

As the majority community in this province and as the architects of Pakistan it falls upon us to prove to our minorities the reality of the security and mutual harmony we promise them in Pakistan, and to invite them today to join us in a struggle which is a common democratic fight against a common oppression.

Lastly we congratulate the Muslims of the Punjab on the wonderful spirit they have displayed and salute them in the name of Islam, to the high traditions of which they have gloriously and nobly lived up.

Our message to them is: ‘Stand firm, and go forward in the front rank of this non-violent struggle, offering yourself for arrest in the largest possible numbers for the vindication of our honour and our freedom and for the achievement of our Pakistan.’

13. ‘Punjab Campaign Spreads Far and Wide’

_Dawn_, 2 February 1947.

LAHORE, [1 Feb.]: In spite of the Goebbelsian lies by the Punjab Ministry in misrepresenting the intent and scope of Punjab people’s non-communal and non-violent struggle for civil liberties and in spite of prefabricated ‘Communiqués’ designed to mislead world public opinion regarding its progress, the League Civil Disobedience Campaign, on its 9th day, has spread far and wide in the Punjab.

In Gujerat two Muslim League MLAs, Mr Jahan Khan Bhusal and Nawabzada Asghar Ali Khan, courted arrest with 60 League National Guards riding on horse back. The horses were also placed under arrest. The processionists numbering several thousands peacefully dispersed. Nawabzada Asghar Ali Khan is the son of late Nawab Sir Fazal Ali who was regarded as one of the pillars of the British rule in India. The remaining three MLAs of Gujerat have already been arrested.

Thousands of villagers are trekking their way to Gujerat to court arrest. Today’s biggest news is the arrest of the Leghari, Chief of Dera Ghazi Khan, which place is described by the Government to be ‘quiet’. Nawab Mohd Khan Leghari, President of Dera Ghazi Khan Muslim League, son of Nawab Hafiz Mohammad Khan Leghari, Chaudhri Mazhar Ahmed Tumandar, Mr Ata Mohammad Khan Bolzar, MLA, Sardar Bahadur Khan Treshek, MLA, Fayaz Mohammad Zaildar and Akhwand Abdul Karim, MLA, were arrested after they led a huge procession through the city of Dera Ghazi Khan.

Nawab Sir Jamal Khan Leghari, who will court arrest in Lahore on Monday, is the biggest landlord of the Punjab.

The first martyr of the Punjab who fell to police lathi blows belongs to Simla. He died as the result of a lathi charge by the police. Simla observed complete hartal.

All leaders and League workers of the Lahore District Muslim League were arrested at Kasur on Friday. Among them is Sardar Mohammad Husain, MLA.
Reports from Jullundur show that all League prisoners have gone on hunger-strike as protest against ill-treatment by the authorities. The situation in Jullundur is extremely tense. The people refuse to call off the hartal.

11 persons of Nankana Saheb who have been sentenced to 2 1/2 years’ rigorous imprisonment each under the Public Safety Ordinance passed through Lahore on their way to Rawalpindi Jail. They were hand-cuffed and fettered.

The Muslim League flag with crescent and star flew over the gates of the Government House this afternoon, the heroine of the drama was Zahida Hayat, daughter of the late Sir Sikander Hyat Khan. Along with Begum Mumtaz Daultana, she led a thousand-strong procession of Muslim women who carried children on their arms and marched towards Government House.

Amidst vociferous shouts of ‘Down with Khizr Ministry’, Zahida Hayat planted the League flag on Government House gate. It fluttered there for a while and was eventually removed by a police constable.

On the way the women’s procession passed the house of Minister Qizilbash and demonstrated for some time. The doors of the Qizilbash household were bolted and barred.

The main meeting outside Mochi Gate was again attended today by a crowd of about one lakh of persons and was addressed by Choudhry Abdul Kabir, Secretary, Lahore City Muslim League. He advised people to carry on the struggle peacefully and non-communally till the victory was won.

The audience converted itself into a huge procession, passed through Delhi Gate and Dabbi Bazaar and then as it progressed towards The Mall and reached Queen’s Statue. Volleys of tear-gas bombs were fired at it.

Sixty persons were arrested earlier in the day. Sixty students were also arrested, among them being Mr Bashir Ahmed, President of the Pakistan Ambulance Corps, 7 Khaksars also courted arrest.

In Multan Syed Ali Husain Gardezi, Syed Vilayet Hussain Gardezi, Mr Abdur Razaq, Bar-at-Law, and Mian Abdullah, one of the biggest landlords of the Northern Punjab, Syed Nabi Shah Gilani, MLA and Nawabzada Mohd Islam led a procession estimated to be one lakh strong.

Malik Shaukat Ali, Advocate, member of the Lahore Corporation, has been nominated Acting Vice-President by Mr Khalil Ahmed, the Acting President of the Provincial League.

14. ‘Punjab Ministry’s Fascist Methods’

_Dawn_, 2 February 1947.

...The following is the full text of the resolution on the Punjab situation adopted by the Working Committee of the All-India Muslim League released to the Press:

‘The Working Committee of the All-India Muslim League have noted with grave concern the serious situation developing in the Punjab where thousands of Muslims, men and women, are courting arrest every day all over the province as a protest against the suppression of their political rights and civil liberties and against continued provocations offered to them by the Provincial Ministry.

‘One of these provocations, which deeply stirred the feelings of Muslims in the Punjab and outside, was the order promulgated by the Punjab Government on 24 January and since withdrawn declaring the Muslim National Guards an unlawful association.'
The Committee strongly condemns this order which amounted to a biggest and most high-handed attempt to suppress the activities of the Muslim League in the Punjab.

The National Guards is a body of volunteers organized by the Muslim League to assist in peaceful and legitimate political and social work. The National Guards functions under the Muslim League's discipline and control and forms part of the Muslim League organization.

The Working Committee congratulates the Punjab Muslim League organization on having successfully resisted this insulting order and secured its withdrawal.

The Committee, however, cannot overlook the fact that the mere withdrawal of this order makes no improvement in the general conditions prevailing in the Punjab and involving, on the one hand, persistent and widespread persecution of the Muslims for political reasons by the Ministry and, on the other hand, almost total denial to them of those constitutional methods of self-expression and criticism of the Government by the Opposition, which are the essential bases of democracy.

The present Ministry which is a fundamentally unrepresentative and unpopular one and which is a creation of combination of groups hostile to the Muslim League which is the largest Party and the Muslims in the Punjab generally, in its fear of free public opinion and democratic principles and in order to maintain itself in office in defiance of the wishes and rights of the politically awakened majority in the Punjab has been resorting with growing recklessness to the Fascist methods of gagging public opinion, suppressing normal civil and constitutional liberties of the people and persecuting its political opponents.

For a long time now the Provincial Legislature has practically ceased to function except for the purpose of hurried voting on budget once in a year, the Opposition being given absolutely no opportunity of bringing forward non-official proposals in the House.

A ban on public meetings under Section 144 of the CrPC practically throughout the province has long been a normal feature of the administration.

A so-called Public Safety Ordinance, which reduces civil liberties and the liberty of the Press to a farce, has been promulgated on a false pretext.

The act that the powers vested in the Government and its officials, under this Ordinance, are actually being used to put down an agitation for the restoration of civil liberties in the province has thoroughly exposed the falsehood of the pretext for promulgating it.

It is significant that the Muslims are the principal sufferers from all these bans and restrictions on fundamental civil rights and normal political activity, because the other communities can influence the administration through their chosen representatives in the Ministry.

At the same time the Ministry has been carrying on a widespread campaign of persecution, coercion and intimidation against workers and supporters of the Muslim League with the object of disrupting and breaking up the political solidarity of Muslims.

Its war upon the united political front of Muslims in the Punjab has imposed untold suffering on numerous Muslims, particularly in the rural areas of the province. Thousands have been and are being even refused any ration of controlled commodities, like sugar and kerosene oil, and otherwise persecuted because they are members or supporters of the Muslim League. Muslim public servants from gazetted officers down to clerks and petty village officials, who refuse to act as the tools of the ministers in their political war upon the Muslim League, are being harassed, humiliated and removed from positions of responsibility.

Keeping in view the situation thus created in the Punjab, the committee have no doubt that the responsibility for the present serious developments in the Punjab rests solely on those who have practically blocked every channel of constitutional political activity for Muslims and made it impossible for them to exercise their ordinary civil rights or to hold and express freely their political opinions, thereby reducing democracy in the Punjab to mockery.

‘The Working Committee express their whole-hearted sympathy for Muslims of the Punjab in their sufferings and trials. It is the Committee’s considered opinion and earnest advise to Muslims that they should maintain a perfectly non-violent, disciplined, firm and dignified attitude in their protest against repression and coercion and the suppression of democratic freedom in their province.

‘The Working Committee wish to make it absolutely clear that the objectives of the Punjab Muslim Leagues present movement are confined to securing the restoration of normal civil liberties in that province and involve no inter-communal issue at all.

‘The committee warn Muslims as well as Non-Muslims to be on their guard against attempts which may be made out of mischievous motives or because of misapprehensions, to give the present situation in the Punjab a colour of inter-communal strife or to import irrelevant communal controversies into it and feel confident that no community will lend itself to be dragged into this conflict by the machinations of those who want to discredit the Muslim League.

‘The Working Committee most earnestly urge and call upon the Punjab Government to forthwith withdraw all restrictive measures on political activities and not to misuse the special powers conferred by the Punjab Public Safety Ordinance, 1946 and release all those who have been imprisoned arrested or detained in this connection.’—API

15. Governor Rejects Alleged Abuse of Punjab Public Safety Ordinance

Extract from a Letter from Evan Jenkins to Wavell, 3 February 1947

GOVERNMENT HOUSE, LAHORE
NO. 647.

3. On 1st February I had a long talk with General Messervy, who looked in on me on his return journey from Delhi to Rawalpindi. I also had a talk with Khizar, and suggested that he should now begin to consider his long term position. I pointed out that he could neither keep the Muslim League leaders in detention indefinitely, nor let them out unconditionally in order that they might continue the agitation. Khizar said that he would think the matter over, but until he was clear about the attitude of the Muslim League High Command and probable developments at the Centre, he could make no plans. He added rather oddly that Qizilbash was anxious to go to London in connection with a Privy Council case, and that he himself would like to spend the summer abroad. I told him that I doubted if this would be feasible.

***

8. The resolution by the Muslim League High Command on the Punjab situation was published in the newspapers this morning, and does not strike me as very impressive. The Muslim League have certain grievances, but the Punjab Public Safety Ordinance, 1946 was certainly not directed against the League and was not used against them before this agitation began. In fact not a single Muslim League MLA had been arrested or interfered with in any way—the Ordinance was my doing, and I was able to see that it was not abused. The statement does not mention at all the threats of the Punjab leaders to oust the coalition Ministry by a show of force, which is Khizar’s real casus belli. I fear that the League have made it very difficult for themselves to form a Government and have greatly advanced the case for the partition of the Punjab. The agitation cannot fail to be communal, since the Congress and the Sikhs are involved in the attack on the Premier. However, it is possible that the League will in the end be more conciliatory to the other communities, though as a party they are very sadly lacking in brains and political sense.

16. ‘Delhi Muslims Observe Punjab Day’

A MAMMOTH public meeting attended by about 50,000 people and a huge half-a-mile procession, were the features of the Punjab Day which was observed with great enthusiasm by the Delhi Muslims on Sunday.

A batch of the burqa-clad Muslim women also joined the procession added greatly to the solemnity of the demonstration. The demonstrators carried effigies of Khizr Hyat which were burnt in the Chandni Chowk....

Hundreds of people crowded the balconies and lustily cheered the demonstrators. The demonstrators behaved in a disciplined manner and avoided slogans which might hurt the feelings of the non-Muslims.

Earlier a largely attended public meeting was held under the auspices of the Delhi Provincial Muslim League.

Maulana Zafar Ali Khan, presiding over the meeting...said that 24 January was a memorable date in the history of the revolutionary struggle for Indian independence. ‘A great struggle has started there which has shown the country the way to achieve freedom,’ he said.

Maulana Zafar Ali Khan criticized the Punjab Ministry for the treatment meted out to the Punjab political leaders and the label of Communal detenus was put on them....

Mr Kazmi, Secretary of the Lucknow District Muslim League, appealed to the Hindus to join the Muslim struggle for civil liberties launched in the Punjab. He said that the struggle was not aimed at communal domination. Its purpose was to smash the citadels of British imperialism in the Punjab and to prepare the way for the overthrow of the imperialism in the country.

Mr Kazmi said: ‘Muslims are against communal riots not because they are afraid of Section 144 but because they believe in the establishment of a sovereign independent Pakistan where minorities will enjoy the greatest security and freedom...’.

17. ‘Women Tear-Gassed inside Police Van’

LAHORE: A brutal and barbarous attempt to suffocate eleven arrested women in a closed police van, 12 miles out of Lahore, was the highlight of Khizr Administration’s ruthless repression on the 11th day of the civil disobedience movement.

The heroines of the occasion were none else than Begum Feroze Khan Noon and 10 other women who had been arrested before the Civil Secretariat and removed by the police in a van to be ‘dumped’.

Late in the evening, Begum Noon, severely burnt on face and neck, gave me this almost incredible account of what had happened. She said the police wanted them to get out on the deserted road 12 miles from Lahore; they asked to be taken to jail.
A police constable then threw a tear-gas bomb inside the van and closed the door. 'I rushed to the door to open it,' the Begum continued, 'Begum Shaukat Hayat and Begum Daultana, who were following in a car, came to our rescue. Meanwhile 4 girls got suffocated and fainted. I was burnt on neck and face. The clothes of other girls caught fire. In the confusion every one of us got hurt.'

'But this is not going to debar us from doing our duty,' concluded the wife of the now-jailed former Defence Member of the Viceroy's Executive Council, with a glint in her eyes. 'Insha Allah we shall march on till the Punjab Government are forced to withdraw all restrictions on free speech, free press and normal political activities.'

18. Baldev Singh's Reflections on Muslim League Campaign

Letter from Baldev Singh to Wavell, 6 February 1947

During my recent visit to the Punjab in connection with the celebration of Kangaw Day by the 2/2 Punjab Regiment, I met the Punjab Governor and the Premier and discussed with them the unfortunate situation arising out of the defiance of Public Safety Ordinance by the Muslim League. There is no doubt in my mind that the Punjab Government was perfectly justified in imposing ban on the Rashtriya Seva Sangh and the Muslim League National Guard Organizations. If there was any doubt as regards the latter, the discovery of hundreds of steel helmets from their premises during search, should certainly arouse grave doubts of their peaceful intentions. Deliberate misinterpretation of the step by the Muslim League that it was an attack on the League itself made the Punjab Government lift the ban and this was done primarily in order that the League might not make this an excuse to stay out of the Constituent Assembly.

One should have thought that this gesture by the Punjab Government would end the League's agitation. Defiance of Law continues and now there is little doubt that this is being done in order to disrupt the Coalition Ministry. The League having tried and miserably failed in defeating it by Constitutional methods, seems now to be out to coerce it by rousing fanatical elements. Their leaders of course pretend to show as if this move is non-communal. It is nothing of the kind for the simple reason that the very people have in the past preached the most rabid communalism known in recent times. Some of us in fact have reason to fear that in reality the followers are being drilled against non-Muslims and that a widespread anti-Hindu and anti-Sikh movement is in the offing. The Sikhs particularly are greatly agitated over what is happening, for it is clear to them that if the present Ministry were to be hustled out by such terrorist tactics the League would succeed in capturing power in the Punjab without any regard to the interests of the minorities, particularly Sikhs. Once in power, they will obviously be in a position to organize their communal bodies like the Guards to overawe non-Muslims and dictate their terms—an eventuality which the Sikhs cannot contemplate without the gravest fears.

I am satisfied that the Punjab Government is doing its best to arrest lawlessness which has burst out. Their task is delicate in view of the fanatic and rabid communal ideology which has been consistently preached in the Punjab since the last General Elections. And they deserve all the help they need. My object in writing this to Your Excellency is to say that a subversive and dangerous movement of this type should not be supported by those leaders of the Muslim League who are in seats of power in the Interim Government. The Muslim masses—and indeed others—cannot understand why they should submit to the Orders of a Provincial Government when Members of Central Government openly advocate defiance thereof. The situation is fraught with peril to all concerned and the time has come when the League representatives in the Interim Government should realize their responsibility. I have myself exercised the greatest restraint but Your Excellency will realize that when my colleagues can support their co-religionists, my community would very naturally expect me to do likewise and my silence might well be misconstrued in the present distressing situation.

I hope Your Excellency would give serious thought to the situation and take steps to see that the Punjab Government is not embarrassed any more by Members of the Interim Government.

19. Hindu-Sikh Responses to League Agitation

Telegram from Evan Jenkins to Wavell, 12 February 1947

IMMEDIATE

No. 69-G. Punjab situation. Hindus and Sikhs will not stand Muslim agitation much longer. Gopi Chand Bhargava has written personally to Premier saying that if he does not suppress agitation with all resources at his disposal Hindus must act on their own. Tara Singh has issued statement to Press to effect that Sikhs are in grave danger and must revive their ‘Army’ immediately under his command. Demonstrations are not however to be made until he gives the word. Premier is dealing personally with Gopi Chand and we are suppressing Tara Singh’s statement. But we can only delay active non-Muslim intervention which in my judgment is now almost certain. Lahri Singh who saw me this morning said that Hindus could not be kept quiet for long.

2. Muslim League have anticipated all this and will allege that non-Muslim opposition is engineered by Premier and his colleagues, which is untrue. I think non-Muslims would have kept out for some time at least but for rowdiness of demonstrators in Lahore on 10th February. They are now practically convinced that civil liberties issue is bogus and that object of Punjab Muslim League is to seize power for Muslim Community. Once this conviction is general nothing can avert a grave communal disturbance.

3. Premier is in indirect touch with Nazimuddin who is, I understand, in Delhi. If agitation is called off he is prepared to review bans now in force under Ordinance and to remove a good many of them. But he cannot yield too much or non-Muslim agitation will be stimulated.

4. I do not wish to prejudice Premier’s negotiations, but it might help if you could tell Liaquat or Nazimuddin of the extremely grave communal possibilities. On a long view the Punjab Muslims have already done themselves incalculable harm by their disregard of the very large non-Muslim minorities.

20. Report from Punjab Province

Extract from the Fortnightly Report for Punjab for the Second Half of January 1947, 12 February 1947

Confidential.

POLITICAL.—There has been considerable unrest in the Province since the 24th of January on which day the Punjab Government declared the Rashtriya Swayam Sevak Sangh and the Muslim League National Guards to be unlawful associations under the Criminal Law (Amendment) Act of 1908. The Punjab Government took this action because, in the present state of communal fecling, private communal armies are a danger to peace, and, although the Punjab Public Safety Ordinance controlled the open activities of these bodies, their continued existence and surreptitious perseverance were reacting in a manner which was damaging to the public nerve in a marked degree. Government was satisfied that the action it had determined to take was overdue and was encouraged to hope that it would have public support by reason of the large volume of complaint which had been voiced over a protracted period by both the Hindu and Muslim communities. The declaration of the two organizations to be unlawful was followed by searches of offices and premises, which are usual in such circumstances. The action taken passed without incident in all places except Lahore where leaders of the Muslim League obstructed the Police and were arrested. This was followed by deliberate and instigated defiance of control orders in force under the provisions of the Punjab Public Safety Ordinance and further arrests were made.

The League leaders who were arrested made it clear that they interpreted the declaration in respect of Muslim League National Guards as an attack upon the Muslim League as a political party. As nothing was further from the thoughts of Government than any such attack, the decision was taken to release them so that they could reconsider their position in the light of Government's assurances that it had sought no political advantage by this action it had taken. In consequence, they were released on the 27th of January and on that and on the following day they made it clear by their conduct and in their public pronouncements that their attitude was unchanged and that continued large scale defiance of law was their determination. They also made it clear that in their demands they coupled the cancellation of the declaration making the Muslim League National Guards unlawful with the withdrawal of the orders which were in force under the Punjab Public Safety Ordinance, prohibiting meetings and processions in certain places.

Unfortunately, due to the attitude of the League leaders and their misleading propaganda, the impression persisted amongst Muslims that the League had been attacked as a party. In its determination to remove this wrong belief and in its readiness to go to the fullest possible extent in order to do so, Government decided to withdraw the declaration against the Rashtriya Swayam Sewak Sangh and the Muslim League National Guards and to take the risk involved in doing so, in order to set all doubts finally at rest. With the pronouncement of this decision it was also made known that in the present state of communal tension Government was not prepared to agree to the general withdrawal of emergency restrictions, particularly those on demonstrations and meetings and intended to maintain all restrictions considered essential and to deal adequately with those who broke the law.

The reception given by the Muslim League leaders to this further pronouncement was as unsatisfactory as their...conduct throughout had been, and in the statement they issued and in their speeches they made it clear that they attached little importance to the ban which had been lifted and that their real object was to overthrow the Punjab coalition Ministry by show of force. In these circumstances, in the interests of democratic principles and of communal peace, it was clear that the threat was one which must be met. The League leaders were rearrested and committed to jail.

The rearrests took place in the early morning of the 29th of January. The 29th, the 30th and the 31st were days of wide-spread demonstrations and agitation in some cases in company with violence. One Superintendent of Police was seriously injured while other Police officers did not emerge unscathed. On the other side too there were casualties and in Simla one man died from the injuries he received. On the whole, however, there was no general resort to violence, and no loss of control by the forces of Government. Since the first days of intense excitement the situation has slowly improved, helped by a policy which removes the leaders and organizers and by the fact that the ground Government conceded largely removed any semblance of a grievance of a kind which would keep Muslim feeling at a pitch prepared and ready to disregard all consequences. In the absence of outside interference, therefore, and provided disorder does not turn to communalism, there is some reason for hoping that the situation will not worsen.

The reactions of other political parties to the Muslim League agitation have varied. The Sikhs, through their leader, Master Tara Singh, have roundly condemned a course of action which they say has the supremacy of one community over the others as its objective, and they have voiced strong support for the action Government has taken. The Congress has also—and naturally—identified itself with Government. Other Hindu parties have maintained discrete silence while being grimly amused at the Rashtriya Swayam Sewak Sangh’s reinstatement in legality as an incidental result of the League’s action. Of the Muslim parties only the Khaksars have attempted to make a joint cause with the League and their advances were repulsed because their sincerity was held in grave doubt.

In respect of politics on an all-India level little comment of value can be made mainly because provincial interest has been largely absorbed by provincial happenings. The Sikhs, however, have found some satisfaction in the representation given to them on the Minorities Advisory committee, and, possibly because of this, have been encouraged to voice their other demands with a growing determination to secure them or go their own way. Congress has found little to grumble about, and much to applaud, in the proceedings of the Constituent Assembly and most Hindus are pleased with signs which they accept and interpret as proof of the abandonment of a policy of appeasement to the Muslim League. Towards the end of the fortnight any expectation which had existed earlier and any hope that the Muslim League would change its attitude had vanished. Further indication of the League’s intentions are now awaited, particularly by the Muslims who are as prepared as ever to obey its dictates.

21. ‘Tremendous Upsurge in Punjab against Tiwana’s Anti-civil Laws’

LAHORE, Wednesday.—SARGODHA—Punjab Premier’s home-district—experienced a severe lathi charge on Wednesday when more than 20 persons were seriously injured. The police baton failed to break the indomitable spirit of people of Sargodha.

Authentic information reaching from that district shows that the Punjab Premier has utilized the Muslim League campaign to punish those who had opposed him during the last elections.

Arrests of Kh Shamsher Ali, Mian Abdul Aziz, Ch Faiz Ahmed, Khan Mohammed Khan of Sahiwal, Mian Qadir Baksh, Quraishi Mohammed Abdullah, Ch Abdul Hameed and Fateh Mohammed Sial were made under Tiwana’s revenge code rather than Ordinance rule.

A batch of Aligarh students was arrested at Sargodha and they were taken 20 miles into the country, and dumped. As a protest against this brutal treatment, students of Government College, Sargodha, went on strike. They took out a large procession which was joined by thousands of villagers.
Secret consultations are reported to have been going on between the Punjab Premier and Sardar Baldev Singh at the former’s residence in Lahore Cantonment on Wednesday. The reporters who got a scent of the Defence Member’s arrival tried their level best to contact him but he eluded them like a slippery eel.

TIWANA–BALDEV MEETINGS

One tangible result of the Defence Member’s frequent confabulation with the Punjab Premier is the highly unreasonable and even provocative statement by Master Tara Singh on the Punjab campaign. It is not a mere coincidence that the arrival of Sardar Baldev Singh invariably almost always evoked the spiteful outbursts from the veteran Akali leader against the Muslim League.

While on the one hand the Punjab Government’s repressive policy is in full swing against Muslims, on the other hand they are withdrawing ban piecemeal on public meetings and carrying out of processions in various districts ‘according to plan’. I understand that the ban on public meeting and processions will be withdrawn in Rawalpindi district....

22. ‘Punjab Congress Appeals for Peace’

Extract from a Report from The Tribune, 13 February 1947.

LAHORE. 12 Feb.: As earnest appeal to all the people in Punjab. Hindus, Muslims, Sikhs and others irrespective of their party affiliation, to maintain discipline, to show tolerance and forbearance in their dealings with each other and refrain from doing anything, even in face of provocation, which might lead to a breach of public peace, was made by the Working Committee of the Punjab Provincial Congress Committee in a resolution which the Committee adopted at its meeting held yesterday, at the Bradlaugh Hall. The appeal was made ‘in view of the tense situation prevailing in the province’.

Dr S.D. Kitchlew presided at the meeting, which continued for four hours....

23. ‘Punjab Campaign Is an Indication of What League Can Do on an All-India Scale—Liaquat Ali Khan’

Dawn, 14 February 1947.

Mr Liaquat Ali Khan, Finance Minister in India’s Interim Government said on Thursday that the Muslim League civil disobedience campaign against Punjab Provincial Ministry and its ban on meetings and processions—the first of its kind ever launched by the Muslim League—‘show that our people are ready to make any sacrifice come what may.’

Mr Liaquat Ali Khan, who is also the Secretary of the All-India Muslim League, said in an interview that the Muslim League’s Punjab campaign was unplanned and unprepared although the coalition ministry had ‘harassed people who voted against it’ in many ways including distribution of rationed goods.

Hundreds upon hundreds of Muslims have defied the Ministry’s ban for 20 consecutive days since the Muslim League National Guards was declared illegal—an order later rescinded and seven top-ranking leaders were arrested for obstructing the police during their raid on the offices of the Muslim League National Guards.
Mr Liaquat Ali Khan said that Punjab demonstrations which spread rapidly throughout the province were an indication of what the Muslim League could do on an All-India scale if it became necessary although ‘I couldn’t guarantee that it would remain always non-violent.’

He also pointed out that League leaders of the Punjab, many of whom renounced British titles last year, were the first to rush out and offer themselves for arrest and said he expected that it would be generally true if a general movement began.

The Finance Minister praised Punjab Muslims for maintaining discipline and avoiding involvement in communal or Hindu–Muslim disturbance and said that the Punjab Government was at present ‘paralysed.’

‘This is something new in India’, he added. ‘Muslim League has never done anything before by unconstitutional means.’

Muslim Leaguers were at present excluded from the Punjab Coalition Ministry although Mr Liaquat Ali Khan pointed out that they represent the largest community in the province and form the largest single party in the Legislature. Congress, Sikhs and few non-League Muslims form ministry.

Mr Liaquat Ali Khan concluded that he expected the provincial ministry to fall as a result of League’s campaign, adding ‘how long the Government will go on and how long the people will go on, I cannot say. But I have confidence in the people.’—APA

24. Report from Punjab Province

Extract from the Punjab Fortnightly Report for the First Half of February 1947, 19 February 1947

Home Poll (I), File No.18/2/1947, NAI.

POLITICAL.—The agitation which the Muslim League commenced on the 24th of January has continued until the time of drafting this report. It has affected all districts in the Province in a varying degree, and in places there have been situations of some seriousness. On the whole, however, although the campaign is one of deliberate disobedience and defiance of law conducted with a definite, undemocratic political motive it has been carried on with less provocation than might have been expected, and with much exhortation to avoid the pitfalls of communalism. Because of this, and helped by marked restraint by Government’s forces, exercised commendably throughout a trying time, tempers have not become frayed to the dangerous extent which could so easily have happened and the agitation has shown signs of developing a routine character, which although it destroys respect for law which is regularly and blatantly being defied, at least reduces the likelihood of the disorders quickly assuming proportions which would be difficult to control without the use of drastic force. At the same time with mass agitation going on, and with extremists among the organizers and the crowds the possibility of unwanted developments is always present and the chances of the situation worsening have to be accepted. So far there has been no sign that Muslim League leaders at large or in jail have been persuaded to a sense of responsibility or to reasonableness. In the circumstances the early restoration of the Province to its normal life cannot confidently be expected.

While the happenings which have been taking place in the Punjab have caused some quickening of Muslim feeling in other provinces, there has been very little active intervention in the agitation by persons from outside ... Some volunteers from Delhi have taken part in processions in Lahore and elsewhere, and some from Sind have been noticed in Multan. Their presence has hardly been felt, however, and so far they have not increased provincial difficulties... from various League leaders, including members of the Executive Council, have been clothed in more importance. Among those who came was Khwaja Nazim-ud-Din, ex-Premier of Bengal, accompanied by two others who lack his prominence, and his presence in Lahore resulted in increased activity. The situation, however, quickly reassumed its normal proportions on his departure.

The response given by the Muslims to the agitation is not whole-hearted, and this applies particularly to the middle classes. Some believe that the community would have been better served if the ban making the Rashtriya Swayam Sewak Sangh unlawful had remained. Others continue to recoil from action which carries such grave responsibility. At the same time there is no obvious readiness on any Muslim side to voice open condemnation of the League. The Khaksar group is the only Muslim organization outside the League which has attempted to give the League support and its advances have been rebuffed. Among Hindus and Sikhs resentment to the agitation is growing and, particularly in the case of the latter, in an ominous degree. On the 12th February, in the second statement he has issued against... agitation since it started, Master Tara Singh declared that it was communal in its essentials and had as its purpose the domination of the Punjab by Muslims. He called on the Sikhs to prepare themselves to face the Muslim League onslaught towards this and to reorganize the ‘Akal Fauj’, the Sikh volunteer organization whose prowess in the Punjab has not been forgotten. There is but little doubt that the Sikhs, gravely disturbed as they are by events in Bengal, the Frontier and in the Punjab, will respond in the degree their leaders require to orders of this kind.

In Provincial politics, apart from what has already been discussed there is little of interest to recount, except that the Provincial Congress is facing a domestic crisis of some importance. A vote of no-confidence has been tabled against those who exercise provincial control and the two parties to the dispute are engaged in canvassing all the support they can. It is not possible to say yet with any assurance of being right which group will emerge successful. The result, if there is no compromise, may have repercussions outside the Congress in the Punjab and, it has been hinted, may affect relations in the all-India Congress command.

Provincial affairs have absorbed much of the attention and interest which would have been given otherwise to the political situation at the Centre. Nevertheless the understanding that the Congress members of the Interim Government have delivered an ultimatum to Britain has created great public anxiety and misgiving. The majority of politically minded Hindus is solidly behind Congress however in a mood of frustrated determination and Muslims are pleased with what they accept as the proof of League power. Of the three communities the Sikhs are undoubtedly the most perturbed at the shape political events are taking. Their apprehensions that the Centre will not be able to withstand the demand for Pakistan and the Muslim League agitation have drawn them further from the League, making any understanding between the two now unlikely, and have driven them more to the thought of a separate Sikh–Hindu State made up of the Punjab districts where Muslims are in a minority and the Sikh States. The Panthic Prithinidhi Board considered this matter when it met on the 30th of January and set up a sub-committee to examine it in full detail. In their public speeches certain of the Sikh leaders are now saying that they can expect nothing from Congress which has consistently refused to give them more than paper assurances. Their demand for a State of their own will, therefore, be made in the Constituent Assembly and if need be they will defeat the Pakistan plan with their own resources.
Towards Freedom: 1947

So far as extremist groups go the central developments have increased their confidence in their view that with or without Congress leading them another movement is inevitable. None of them, including the Congress Socialist Group is, however, particularly active in preparing for mass action....

25. Discussion with Khwaja Nazimuddin about League’s Position in Punjab

Extract from a Letter from S.E. Abbott to G.E.B. Abell Forwarding a Note by Evan Jenkins, 19 February 1947

[Dear Abell,]

I am desired by His Excellency to forward two copies of a note recorded by him after an interview with Khwaja Nazim-ud-Din yesterday, as this may be of some interest to His Excellency the Viceroy. The Premier does not favour the idea of legislation to replace the present Punjab Public Safety Ordinance, as he considers that his own followers might insist on emasculating any Bill on the lines of the present Ordinance that might be put before the Assembly. This may or may not be the true reason, and, as you know, he has an aversion from introducing any legislative measure in the present circumstances. At the moment therefore somewhat desultory negotiations for terminating the present agitation are proceeding purely on the short-term basis of the removal of certain bans as indicated in the paper attached to the note.

[Enclosure]

NOTE BY JENKINS

18th February, 1947

I saw Khwaja Nazim-ud-Din at 10 a.m. today. I handed him a copy of the following table showing the communal distribution of the population of the Punjab.

<table>

<tr>
<th>Divisions</th>
<th>Muslims</th>
<th>Others</th>

I said that from this table it was quite clear that no one community could rule the Punjab except by conquest.... Excluding the possibility of civil war and conquest, there were only two long-term alternatives—(a) a united Punjab not under Muslim domination, but under Muslim leadership, and (b) a partition into two or possibly three small States. Up to the death of Sir Sikander Hyat Khan in 1942, the Muslim leaders of the Punjab—particularly Sir Fazl-i-Husain—had always assumed alternative (a) to be the right one. They had had a considerable measure of success.... If the Muslim League had chosen to build upon the Unionist idea, the Punjab could have been a model of ‘Pakistan in action’ with the Muslims in a very strong position and the non-Muslim minorities co-operating freely and contentedly with them. I did not know why the Unionist idea had been abandoned.... The Muslim League had fought the General Election of 1946 on extreme communal lines, and had given the impression to the non-Muslim minorities that they intended to establish undiluted Muslim domination. Having done so, they would presumably give the non-Muslim minorities such share as they thought proper in the administration. I believed that this policy was absolutely wrong and that the Muslim League aim was impossible of achievement. In fact I thought the Punjab Muslims had placed themselves in a position of extreme embarrassment and danger. The non-Muslim minorities regarded the Muslim League with hatred and fear, and the Sikhs would certainly demand a partition. If they did demand a partition, the Muslims might find themselves relegated to a petty Muslim State, which would include little of the industry and an inferior share of the power resources of the Punjab as it now stands.

Continuing I said that the present agitation illustrated my point. The Muslim League might succeed in dislodging the present Ministry, but if they did so, what would they do next? Mamdot might win over a few of the Scheduled Caste Members of the Assembly, but I did not think that the Hindus or Sikhs would join him in forming a Government. There seemed to be three other ways in which the agitation might end. There might be a communal conflict so grave as to swamp it; again the Muslim League might be completely defeated; yet again there might be some kind of compromise. If there were a communal conflict, it might last for a long time and could not improve the broad Muslim position. The complete defeat of the Muslim League was not, so far as I was aware, wanted by anybody—it would cause great bitterness and the Muslims generally would gain nothing by it. If there were a compromise, it would do little good unless it paved the way for better relations between the Muslim League and the non-Muslim minorities. I asked Khwaja Nazim-ud-Din point-blank whether the Muslim League would co-operate in an all-parties Ministry, which is what the Punjab really needs at the present time.

2. Khwaja Nazim-ud-Din expressed considerable interest in my analysis of the Muslim position.... He also admitted that in the Punjab the Sikhs were a powerful and disturbing element.... He believed that the Muslim League were anxious to co-operate with the non-Muslim minorities, but their difficulty was that they did not yet know the shape of Pakistan and were not in a position to make any long-term commitments. They would be glad to enter the Government if the other parties—and particularly the Sikhs—would co-operate with them. But he feared that they could not now co-operate with the Unionist Muslims. I interjected here that the present Premier was in my judgement the only Muslim leader likely to hold a mixed Cabinet together. Khwaja Nazim-ud-Din was inclined to agree, but seemed to think that in their present mood the Muslim League would have nothing to do with any Unionist Muslim.

3. We then passed to a discussion of the Sikh attitude, and I explained broadly the Sikh party alignments. I said that among the Akalis, Giani Kartar Singh was now dominant. He had in the recent past been in favour of some rapprochement with the League, but the agitation seemed to have convinced him that this was wrong, and he was now advocating a separate Sikh State .... A Muslim–Sikh alliance had been possible, though perhaps not very likely, some weeks ago; but I thought it would now be impossible for some little time.

4. I asked whether Khwaja Nazim-ud-Din favoured some compromise of the present agitation. He said that he certainly favoured a compromise, but only on reasonable terms. The Muslim League were very sore at the restrictions imposed upon civil liberties—they could not understand why they in common with others should be prevented from airing their political views. The present prohibitions seemed to be quite unnecessary, and the Karachi resolution of the Muslim League Working Committee was a reasonable basis for discussion. The Muslim League did not contend that the Punjab Public Safety Ordinance, 1946, should be withdrawn but must be satisfied that it was not being abused and would not be abused in future. I said that in my opinion the ‘Civil liberties’ grievance was a red herring. I traced the history of the Ordinance and described the action taken under it up to 24th January last. I admitted that in some cases the District Magistrates had used their powers too lavishly; but I had been in close touch with members of the Muslim League, and particularly MLAs, on all my tours, and the Ordinance had never once been mentioned to me. Khwaja Nazim-ud-Din then admitted that the Ordinance and the orders passed under it were not the real casus belli. He said that the Muslim League were in fact aggrieved at the conduct of the Coalition Ministry since it took office. Even during the General Election there had been unwarrantable interference through officials, and once the Ministry was in the saddle persecution and victimization had continued. I said that to the best of my belief all parties had endeavoured to secure the support of officials at the General Election; conditions varied from district to district. Khwaja Nazim-ud-Din had referred to Lyallpur. I could say nothing about the conditions there, but in Montgomery I had been told on good authority that all the Police officers employed on Election duty had assisted the Muslim League candidate. As to the stories of persecution and victimization, I thought that Punjabis did not generally appreciate the distinction between political patronage and ordinary rights. ...when rewards or appointments were in question, party Governments did not ordinarily show special favour to their political opponents. Much of the Muslim League grievance seemed to me to be based on a complete misunderstanding of the position under a party Government. There was also the difficulty that below the Legislature, the Ministry and the Secretariat the real agents of the Government were not elected local authorities, but officials and various non-official helpers, some paid and some unpaid. Under the old irremovable Government there was not much question of divided loyalty. Like the permanent officials the non-official helpers were ‘Government men’ and were expected only to deal firmly with any anti-Government movements. They were seldom placed in a position in which their party affiliation conflicted with their duty to Government. Now the situation had completely changed, and many people who had been in high favour under the old regime found themselves out of favour. I did not see how this could be helped; no doubt things would adjust themselves in time. I did not think that any Government could tolerate paid helpers, such as Zaildars, openly assisting the Opposition. Khwaja Nazim-ud-Din said that he agreed with much of this, but that he had heard that people like Zaildars were expected not merely to refrain from political activity but to assist the parties in power to which they were hostile. Passing on to the question of rights, I said that the main complaint was that supporters of the Muslim League had been denied their fair share of controlled commodities, such as cloth, sugar, and others. The fact was that controlled commodities were short all over the Punjab, and that in the Eastern Punjab the Hindu Jats could claim that the shortage was due to the usual neglect of this distant part of the Province, while in the Muslim districts of the North and West Muslim zamindars could argue that they were suffering for their political views. Any section of the population could make a grievance of the shortages and could attribute sinister motives to Government. But I thought that the Muslim League grievance was not as well founded as Khwaja Nazim-ud-Din supposed.

5. We agreed that whatever the real casus belli might be, the present agitation was nominally concerned with Civil Liberties and that any settlement must deal with this topic. I told Khwaja Nazim-ud-Din that I thought the Premier would be prepared to meet the Muslim League up to a point, but he had to consider the attitude of the non-Muslim minorities, which was of very great importance. The agitation, if continued, might lead to a serious communal clash; in the same way a complete capitulation by the Premier might make the non-Muslim minorities, particularly the Sikhs, very aggressive. The Sikhs would, I thought, say that Government yielded everything to a show of force; that this meant the approach of undiluted Muslim Raj; and that they must demonstrate to the public generally, and to the Muslims in particular, that the Khalsas could still produce larger meetings and noisier processions than the Muslim League. ... Khwaja Nazim-ud-Din said that he agreed that Government must have the power to prohibit activities such as processions and meetings when necessary, but he felt that the power must be given by legislation rather than by Ordinance and must be used only on appropriate occasions. I asked him whether the Muslim League would co-operate with the Ministry in passing a Public Safety Bill to replace the present Ordinance. At first he laughed at this suggestion and said that the gulf between the Ministry and the Muslim League was so wide that he hardly thought co-operation of this kind would be possible. I said I had [not] consulted the Premier; but if the Muslim League would co-operate in such a Bill, it might be possible for the Premier (a) to persuade the Congress and Panthic Parties to do the same, and (b) to withdraw the prohibitions on meetings (probably not on processions) practically everywhere, subject to the right of District Magistrates to retain the prohibitions in any place where there is in fact an imminent apprehension of communal trouble and to impose or reimpose prohibitions as may be found essential for the preservation of communal peace. Khwaja Nazim-ud-Din eventually expressed considerable interest in this idea and asked me to put it to the Premier.

6. At the end of our conversation I said again that I was deeply concerned about the Muslim position in the Punjab. ...Their numerical majority entitled them to leadership, and to retain their natural leadership they had only to treat the non-Muslim minorities as partners and not as inferiors and subordinates. Khwaja Nazim-ud-Din finally said that he would discuss my suggestions with members of the Muslim League in Lahore and that if we decided to proceed with them he would be prepared to fly to Karachi to get the personal sanction of Mr Jinnah to them. I made it clear that I could not commit the Premier and must consult him before any further move could be made.

7. I saw the Premier at 11-45 a.m. and gave him an account of my talk with Khwaja Nazim-ud-Din.... The Premier promised to consult his colleagues and to let me know later what he thought. I said that I should like, if possible, to get into touch with Khwaja Nazim-ud-Din later in the day. I thought that if a settlement were to be arranged, we should get it through as quickly as possible.

26. Nazimuddin's Discussion with Jenkins

Extract from a Letter from S.E. Abbott to G.E.B. Abell Forwarding a Note by Evan Jenkins, 20 February 1947

[Dear Abell,]

In continuation of my D.O. letter No. G.S. 83 of 19th February, I am desired to send two copies of a further note of the interview which His Excellency the Governor had with Khwaja Nazim-ud-Din yesterday.

[ Yours sincerely, ]

ENCLOSURE

NOTE BY JENKINS

19th February, 1947

I had a further talk with Khwaja Nazim-ud-Din at 4 p.m. today....

2. ...I told Khwaja Nazim-ud-Din that the Premier was not willing to make an undertaking to introduce a Bill to replace the Punjab Safety Ordinance, 1946, a part of any settlement. The Premier's view was that any Government would require powers practically identical with those given by the Ordinance. The Opposition might interpret an undertaking differently from himself; moreover he had to contend not only with the Opposition but with some of the wilder Congressmen on the Government benches, for example, Mr Tilak Raj Chadha. The Premier certainly did not rule out the possibility of a Bill, but he thought that the details of the legislation would require careful examination and perhaps discussion with party leaders, or something of that kind. Otherwise the Premier was disposed to promote a settlement if he could, but he was not willing to withdraw the ban on processions. I understood that Khwaja Nazim-ud-Din had insisted only on a withdrawal of the bans on meetings.

3. Khwaja Nazim-ud-Din said that he hoped there had been no misunderstanding. He stood by the Karachi resolution of the Working Committee of the Muslim League and would insist on all bans being withdrawn. I replied that processions were much more dangerous than meetings; the fact that the Muslim League processions had not led to trouble was not conclusive—communal trouble seldom occurred when one community was attacking Government. But we were expecting trouble at Amritsar within the next few days; the Sikhs had begun to form their private army and might move at any time—possibly on Friday, the 21st.

I added that the Premier was in touch, not personally but indirectly with some of the Muslim League leaders in jail, and that I felt there was little more that Khwaja Nazim-ud-Din and I could do at the moment. The Premier and his colleagues had better be left to follow their own line; perhaps there might be further news tomorrow.

4. Khwaja Nazim-ud-Din agreed that since this was essentially a local dispute, some understanding between the Premier and the Punjab leaders would be appropriate; but he must revert to the question of the Ordinance. He felt it quite wrong that I as Governor should relieve a tottering Ministry of the obligation to legislate; it was my clear duty to force the Premier to bring in a suitable Bill. I said that I was the sole judge, subject to the Governor-General's concurrence and supervision, of the use of my discretionary powers. When the Ordinance was promulgated, there was no doubt about its necessity, and I was not prepared to haggle with the Ministers about its terms. Malik Firoz Khan Noon had said that when he was in Bihar studying the disturbances there, he had seen the text of the Ordinance and had been relieved that in one Province at least timely preventive action had been taken. In the ordinary way the Ordinance would expire in May next. I could continue it by further Ordinance for another six months, subject of course to the Governor-General’s concurrence and a report to Parliament. I was by no means hostile to legislation, but I would have to be satisfied that suitable legislation would in fact be passed. I pointed out that the Muslim League, if they took office, would need special emergency powers just as much as the present coalition Ministry. I asked Khwaja Nazim-ud-Din where the Opposition would stand in this matter. He said that he could not guarantee Opposition support for any Bill, and to this I replied that if I was faced with faction and irresponsibility, I should have to act as I thought best. In principle it was of course right that there should be legislation but I was concerned with the maintenance of order in the Province as a whole.

....As I had told him before even if the Coalition Ministry resigned tomorrow, I did not think that Mamdot could form a Government. Provincial Politics were unreal because the all-India political parties were controlled by their respective High Commands—thus, though the Premier had resisted interference by the Congress High Command, Congress Ministers were undoubtedly influenced by all-India Congress policy and Muslim League leaders could act only under instructions from the Muslim League High Command. If the Punjab were an island, we could settle our disputes very easily. The short point was that unless the Muslim League abandoned their present extreme communal attitude and made it clear that they were prepared to treat the Hindus and Sikhs as equals, they would get nowhere. No striking recantation or statement on the part of the Muslim League was required only an obvious and sincere change of policy in the Punjab.

7. Our talk lasted for about 50 minutes. Khwaja Nazim-ud-Din was much less amiable than he was yesterday, but on the whole friendly and frank. I ended by saying that the real trouble in the Punjab was that not one Muslim League leader had the brains of a hen and that until common sense and leadership were forthcoming I could see little hope of any improvement. I reminded him before he left that our talk must be kept confidential, and that nothing more than the statement I had suggested when the talk began should be put out.

27. League Negotiations with the Punjab Government

Extract from a Letter from Iftikhar Husain Khan of Mamdot to M.A. Jinnah, 22 February 1947

[KASUR SUB-JAIL, KASUR]

My dear Quaid-i-Azam,

You must have learnt that the negotiations for a compromise are pending. Maulana Sahib will give you all the information as to what offer has been made; what were our original demands; to what extent the Government has conceded or is prepared to concede; what is our present strength, and other things. The decision of the Committee of Action has been forwarded to you to solicit your opinion. But I must confess that in order to avoid a scene amongst ourselves, particularly inside a jail, I did not acquaint the members of the Committee as to how this thing started. I am now writing to you to say that on the 14th or the 15th of this month, Malik
Firoz Khan Noon, who is in my jail, wrote a letter to a DIG saying that things had taken a serious turn and that he hoped it was not the intention of either party to take matters to such an extent. He said that there was a chance of an amicable settlement and asked the DIG to see him. When he had despatched the letter, he informed me and I scolded him and could not do more because it had gone.

In the light of this fact, I think that our position is very weak and if the negotiations break, Khizar is sure to make use of the letter and it will have a very demoralizing effect on the poor masses. I must say that we were going very strong and that there was a genuine and big response. We could carry on but for this unfortunate incident. Anyhow we will await your instruction[s]. In case you do not want us to carry on the struggle then we will accept the terms offered by the Government and call off the movement; and if you order us to carry on then we will do so whatever happens. I am sure Khizar will not dare to face the House for getting approval for the Ordinance. He will rather break and face the agitation.

Yours sincerely,

I.H. KHAN

ENCLOSURE

Iftikhar Husain Khan Mamdot to E.M. Jenkins
(Copy to M.A. Jinnah)

SUB-JAIL, KASUR,
Undated [February 1947]

Your Excellency,

....5. My Committee met at Kasur Jail on the evening of 21st February, and we have arrived at the following decisions which I am placing before Your Excellency:

(a) My Committee is pleased that the Punjab Government is prepared to remove the ban on public meetings in all places where they are now prohibited.

(b) My Committee emphatically demands that the Punjab Public Safety Ordinance be placed before the Punjab Assembly during its next session, so that the duly elected representatives of the people may have an opportunity of reviewing the executive measures of the Government and reflecting public opinion on them. My Committee is confident that the Punjab Premier must himself be anxious to adhere to the elementary democratic convention which permits and justifies only those executive measures which meet with the approval of the majority of the legislature to which he is responsible and to which he owes all his constitutional power and position. Besides, my Committee is relieved to find that the Punjab Premier is anxious to give us the fullest opportunity of challenging his party constitutionally in the House in a fortnight’s time, and has sufficiently revised his past policy [so] as to admit of the possibility of the resumption of constitutional methods by the opposition....

6. The final position of my Committee, therefore, is that if the Government (i) is prepared to remove all bans on public meetings throughout the province, and (ii) is willing to place the Punjab Public Safety Ordinance before the Punjab Legislative Assembly at its next session, the Punjab Provincial Muslim League is prepared to call off its present Civil Disobedience Movement. It is of course understood that as an integral part of this settlement the Government will release all persons arrested or detained or convicted under any law or ordinance during this Movement.

[IFTIKHAR HUSAIN KHAN]

28. Jinnah Drafts the Terms of the Compromise between Punjab Government and Muslim League

Extract from a Letter from M.A. Jinnah to Iftikhar Husain Khan of Mamdot, 23 February 1947

OLD GOVERNMENT HOUSE, KARACHI

My dear Mamdot,

I have received your letter of 22nd February, 1947 brought to me by Maulana Dawood Ghaznavi and also the typewritten reply that you propose to send to the Governor of the Punjab along with the proposals of the Punjab Government. The following points arise:

(i) that the ban imposed on public meetings and processions under Section 144 should be removed;
(ii) withdraw all restrictive measures on political activities and not to misuse the special powers conferred by the Punjab Public Safety Ordinance; and
(iii) release all those who have been imprisoned, arrested or detained.

This was indicated in the Resolution of the Working Committee of the All India Muslim League, passed at Karachi on 31st January, and I see from your demands, embodied in the typewritten copy, that you are inclined to yield with regard to the processions. Then there remain three main points:

(i) that the Government should remove the ban on public meetings throughout the province;
(ii) that the Punjab Public Safety Ordinance should be placed before the Punjab Legislative Assembly at its next session; and
(iii) that the Government will release all persons arrested, detained or convicted under any law or ordinance during this movement.

I see that you have, therefore, as a compromise, not insisted on the removal of the ban on processions, but the other three matters stand, whereas the Punjab Government is unwilling to place the Punjab Public Safety Ordinance before the Punjab Legislative Assembly for them to adopt such measures as they may think proper. This is contrary to accepted principles and against constitutional precedents and democracy. In every province in India similar Ordinances have been placed at the first opportunity before their respective legislatures; and the Muslim League Ministry in Bengal and the Congress Ministry in Madras are following this precedent, and so is Sind....

The Punjab Government is willing to remove the ban on meetings and I take it that they are willing to agree to release all those classes referred to above; but they are not willing to place the Punjab Public Safety Ordinance before the Assembly at its next meeting. That is a position which is incompatible with constitutional precedents and what has already happened in other provinces as I have pointed out above; and it is a matter of very great principle and I cannot advise you to give it up because, now that you have raised this point, if you give it up, then it can only mean your acceptance of or acquiescence in the present Ordinance rule continuing indefinitely without their placing the Punjab Public Safety Ordinance before the Assembly as long as they like and getting the sanction of the Legislature, which is the only proper constitutional and democratic method for a popular Government to adopt. As to the other two points, I understand that the Punjab Government are willing to remove the ban on public meetings and release those who are classified and referred to above.

You and the prominent leaders of the Punjab started this movement and, I think, rightly as it was becoming intolerable, especially when the Muslim National Guards organization was declared unlawful. It was the last straw on the camel’s back and let me say that there was no other course open to you but to face the situation as you did with great courage and determination and you have carried on this movement magnificently. Not only I am proud of the Punjab and its leadership, but the whole of Muslim India is with you and the whole world is watching in admiration and with great deal of sympathy and disapproval of the policy and actions of the Punjab Government.

Your stand is a right one. This is the testing moment for you to come to a decision. I have made it clear that you started it, you have carried it on magnificently and it is for you now to come to a settlement which should be as honourable and as creditable not only so far as the Musalmans of the Punjab are concerned but the All India Muslim League; and I am sure that you will take a unanimous decision.

Honourable defeat, if it is to be, is better than a compromise which is discreditable and contrary to accepted constitutional principles and precedents and the rules of democracy for which we are working. I, therefore, have come to the conclusion that your demands are just and right and you have shown a spirit of compromise in yielding with regard to the ban on processions, but it is now for you to consider the whole matter and take such decisions as you think proper. The responsibility rests with you and we have made it clear from the very beginning that settlement must be arrived at between you and the Punjab Government, on the clear understanding that it is for your Committee to decide.

I hope I have made my views clear to you and I wish you luck and Godspeed. We must be firm and determined and take the consequences, but we should not be a party to any compromise which is discreditable, in order to avoid further suffering, once having gone in for them.

Hoping you are well,
With very kind regards,

Yours sincerely,
M.A. JINNAH

29. Impact of HMG’s 20 February Statement on League’s Negotiations with the Punjab Government

Extract from a Telegram from Evan Jenkins to Pethick-Lawrence, 25 February 1947

SECRET

...2. Position has been radically changed by His Majesty’s Government’s statement of 20th February. Premier is now not prepared to go through with repression, exercise of which could be successfully undertaken but which would not facilitate peaceful transfer of power in 16 months’ time. Attitude of services in changed conditions is most uncertain and IG Police reports that block of his British Officers are now thoroughly disgusted with all parties including Muslim League and would like to be released as soon as possible. My own position in exercise of my special responsibilities is naturally impaired and though I may still have some slight personal influence Party Leaders are beginning to realize that constitutionally Governor will soon cease to count.

3. In this somber background Premier decided to settle with League on undertaking to remove ban on public meetings and to introduce Public Safety Bill at Budget session of Assembly which begins 3rd March. Bans on military drill, carrying of arms and processions will remain. Premier hopes to complete negotiations by this evening but Muslim League Leaders are truculent and may make further demands. Punjab Public Safety Ordinance which was made under Section 89 of Constitution Act normally lapses in May. If satisfactory Bill is passed by Assembly I would withdraw Ordinance on giving assent to Bill.

4. Premier’s idea is to endeavour before, during and if necessary after budget session to promote formation of All-Parties Ministry or League–Sikh Coalition. It is clear that in new conditions present Ministry cannot carry on for long and that if chaos amounting possibly to civil war is to be avoided there must be a Ministry representing bulk of Muslims and Sikhs.

5. I do not wish to be alarmist but during next few days and possibly weeks the situation has most dangerous possibilities. Unless Muslim League change their tone completely which seems most improbable there may be an abandonment of present constitution and attempts to establish Muslim or Sikh rule by force. I intend to avoid a Section 93 situation if I possibly can but prospect of independence in 16 months’ time is not conducive to moderation and Muslim League will act under instructions from Jinnah who knows little and cares less about the real interests of the Punjab.

Repeated to the Viceroy.

30. ‘Agreement Arrived at with the Government: Mamdot’s Direction to Call Off Civil Disobedience Movement’

_Dawn, 27 February 1947._

As a sequel to the compromise arrived at between the Punjab Government and the Muslim League the Government passed order for the release of the civil disobedience prisoners....

As a result of the compromise, the Khan of Mamdot, President, Punjab Provincial Muslim League, has called off the movement.

The compromise between the Punjab Government and the Muslim League in connection with the 34-day old agitation in the Punjab was announced at noon today.... The following are the terms of the compromise:

1. The ban on public meetings is removed.
2. To bring forward such legislation as may be considered necessary to preserve peace and public order in place of the present Punjab Public Safety Ordinance.
3. The release of all prisoners detained under-trial or convicted in connection with the movement other than those accused or convicted of offences under Section 325 or of more serious offences against the person under the Indian Penal Code.
4. The ban on processions to continue. Malik Sir Khizr Hyat Khan Tiwana, Premier of the Punjab has issued the following statement on the compromise with the Muslim League.

'The Punjab Government have been accused of restricting the political activities of their opponents, and of using the Punjab Public Safety Ordinance, 1946, in order to keep their opponents out of the way during the Budget Session.

'It has never been the intention of my colleagues and myself to restrict political activities to an extent not justified by the communal situation; and we are particularly anxious that the opposition should be given the fullest opportunity of taking part in the deliberations of the House in a week's time. Moreover, the announcement made by His Majesty's Government on 20 February, creates an entirely new situation, in which the leaders of all parties and communities must be in a position to confer with one another and to decide how the Punjab should face the future.

'Keeping in view these objects, and also our responsibility to members of all communities for the maintenance of public order, we have decided to go as far as we can to make it possible for the Opposition to resume constitutional methods.

'We cannot safely remove all measures which might be interpreted as restrictive. For example, we cannot relax the existing restrictions on military drill or on the carrying of arms. We have carefully considered permitting processions where they are now prohibited, and have come to the conclusion that for the present the prohibition must be maintained unless the District Magistrate considers it no longer necessary.

'But we decided to permit meetings in all places where they are now prohibited. It will be open to District Magistrates immediately or at any time to impose or reimpose restrictions on meetings whenever and wherever the public safety so demands. Persons who make speeches likely to inflame communal feelings will be proceeded against.

'The Punjab Public Safety Ordinance, 1946, was promulgated in view of the acute communal situation of last November, after the disturbances in Calcutta, Eastern Bengal, Bihar and the Western United Provinces, and during the disturbances in the Rohtak District of the Punjab. We intend at the Budget Session of the Assembly to consult party leaders, and to bring forward such legislation as may be considered necessary to preserve peace and public order, in place of the present Ordinance.

'We must remind the members of all communities that the main object of our policy since we took office has been to maintain communal peace. We trust that the leaders of all communities will impress upon their followers the need for restraint now that restrictions on meeting have been removed.'

31. Final Stage of League Agitation

Extract from a Letter from Evan Jenkins to Wavell, 28 February 1947

Secret

No. 651

Government House, Lahore

Dear Lord Wavell,

During the second half of February my main concern has again been the Muslim League agitation. I have kept Your Excellency informed by telegram of important developments, and Abell has had copies of the notes I recorded on my interviews with Khwaja Nazim-ud-Din on 18th and 19th February.

4. The agitation was not nearly so successful as is represented by the Muslim League. Many districts gave practically no trouble, and serious trouble was confined to half a dozen districts, notably Gujarat, Lahore, Amritsar and Jullundur. The agitation was essentially communal—most of the rank and file believed that they were out to establish Muslim Raj, and I am told that they are disappointed at the somewhat meagre result achieved in view of their assumed objective. The fact that we had practically no communal trouble during the agitation was due primarily to the well-known tendency of communities not directly concerned in an attack on Government to refrain from interference. Secondary reasons for the absence of communal trouble were the restrictions imposed upon the Press, for which the Premier has been much criticized; the exemplary conduct of the Police; and the success of the Premier and Swaran Singh in restraining the Sikhs, who were and still are extremely uneasy. The Muslim League leaders did their best to avoid incidents, but their demonstrations were extraordinarily provocative, for example, non-Muslims did not relish boasts about the coming Muslim rule, and did not like having their cars forcibly decorated with Muslim League flags, and so on. The widespread belief of the Muslim demonstrators that Muslim Raj was round the corner has had a deplorable effect on communal feeling. I have referred above to the exemplary conduct of the Police. They were told to be as tolerant as possible, and it is very difficult to maintain morale when men are not permitted to retaliate in the face of continuous threats and provocation. But with very few exceptions the men stood up to the agitation admirably and never failed to obey orders or to follow their officers when drastic action was required....

6. The consequences of the agitation are closely linked with the reactions to the announcement of 20th February. I have already given Your Excellency a somewhat jejune account of some of these reactions, which I can now supplement. On 20th February, when I showed him the text of the announcement, Khizar remarked that it was 'the work of lunatics'. On 21st February he was in a more complacent mood, and said that he took it to be nothing more than 'a threat'. I said that if he thought that HMG did not intend to hand over power by 30th June 1948, he must revise his opinion—it would be most unsafe for him to act or plan on any assumption other than that HMG meant what they so clearly said. Khizar has since told me that the general reaction of ordinary people is complete incredulity, but his own final view is one of profound dismay.

The Sikhs, as I have already said, were greatly disturbed at the settlement with the Muslim League. Giani Kartar Singh saw Macdonald, the Home Secretary, on 26th February and said that the Sikhs were prepared for an alliance with the Muslims, but only on suitable terms. They did not want a partition of the Punjab except in the last resort, but they must have the right to demand partition. They would consent to a Cabinet composed entirely of Muslims and Sikhs, and would allow the Premier to be a Muslim, but in the Cabinet as a whole there must be parity between the Muslims and themselves. Any settlement of this kind would have to be guaranteed by HMG.

Giani Kartar Singh is not a very reliable person, and what may prove to be a more accurate forecast of the Sikh position was given me on 27th morning by Swaran Singh. He said that the announcement of 20th February had destroyed the foundations of everything and had removed the possibility of any effective sanctions to a settlement. The Sikhs had been profoundly moved by the obvious desire of the Muslims to seize the Punjab for themselves and would not permit them to do so. The agitation had shown Pakistan in all its nakedness and was a fair example of the kind of treatment that the minorities, including the Sikhs, might expect from the Muslim extremists. He admitted that civil war would lead to widespread misery, but he did not see how the Sikhs could be partners with the Muslims on any terms in the absence of some effective sanction. He disliked the idea of partitioning the Punjab, but felt that a partition with all its disadvantages might prove to be the only remedy. I advised Swaran Singh to persuade the Sikhs not to commit themselves at present, and told him I was always ready to see Master Tara Singh and Giani Kartar Singh if they wanted to discuss the Sikh position with me.

A retired Army officer, whose sympathies are generally with the Muslim League, told me yesterday afternoon that the announcement of 20th February had shocked him and other old soldiers of the Rawalpindi Division. He thought it cowardly and base, and he and his like did not understand what had gone wrong with the British. I endeavoured to explain the situation to him, and pointed out that in all these years no organized party in India had said a word for the British officer or the British connection. It was not surprising therefore that the British people and HMG supposed that the vast majority of Indians wanted us to clear out as soon as possible.

7. The future is still most obscure. The Premier’s plan is to get into touch with the Muslim League leaders—he has to do so in any case in connection with his proposed legislation—and to assist them in promoting a Muslim League–Sikh alliance. He believes that if the Sikhs could be brought into line, the Congress would not give very much difficulty. But the Muslim Leaguers are puffed up by popular adulation, and it is believed that they intend to go all out for a Muslim Ministry with no non-Muslim adherents, except for a few Scheduled Caste members whom they hope to be able to buy. Unlike the Sikhs, they are not free agents and cannot act as principals in any deal—so the important decisions will rest with Jinnah advised presumably by worthless creatures such as Ghazanfar Ali. Khizar has advised Mamdot through a mutual friend to refrain during the next few days from activities likely further to offend the Sikhs, but on past form this warning will probably not be heeded. I do not intend to intervene myself just yet, since until something happens to bring the Muslim Leaguers up against the bleakness of the communal outlook, I do not think they will see any reason at all. Khizar himself seems to have made up his mind to leave India for the summer starting some time in May; if he does so, the Coalition Ministry must disintegrate when he goes. It may fall before then, and the only Ministry which has any hope of keeping the Punjab stable until June 1948 is one representing all three communities, or at least the Muslims and the Sikhs. If the Muslim League succeed in forming a Ministry which is entirely Muslim except in name, they will be faced at once by an agitation far more serious than their own. I will of course report any significant developments—we may have to fall back on some partition of the Punjab before the final transfer of power takes place.

Yours sincerely,

E.M. JENKINS
32. Report from Punjab Province

Extract from the Punjab Fortnightly Report for the Second Half of February 1947, Home Poll (I), File No. 18/2/1947, NAI.

Confidential.

1. Political.

...The settlement has given to the Muslim League certain of its demands, but it has not emasculated the Ordinance nor has it done grievous damage to the control which Government considers most necessary in present circumstances. Since their release from jail, the League leaders have been active and League’s Committee of Action has met. ....So far as is known no course of conduct has commended itself to the Committee of Action which would again and at an early date bring the Muslim League into conflict with the law. To this extent the situation can be described as being satisfactory.

Although many were shocked by the vulgarity of the League’s tactics and behaviour, the agitation undoubtedly attracted the sympathy of most Muslims who are not nationalist in their political opinions, even while it failed to command the active support of the great majority of the Muslim middle classes. Nationalist Muslims largely ignored it, or made a pretence of doing so, while the Khaksars failed in their effort to exploit it to their own advantage and to the League’s prejudice. Hindus of all classes and political views resented the disorder, as well as feared the portents it contained, and a volume of bitter complaint was voiced that stronger measures were not adopted in dealing with it. Congress Socialists ridiculed it and described it as a suburban circus performance staged by ex-knights, their wives, sons and nephews. Labour was afraid to join it lest its ranks were split by communalism. The Communists watched it with interest not unmixed with envy and felt constrained to condemn it publicly as a purely communal demonstration designed to win Pakistan at the expense of the other communities. They made it clear in what they said that they supported the demand of the League that the Punjab Public Safety Ordinance should be withdrawn, but, true to their creed, they declared that this must be done by means of a joint struggle on the part of the working classes of all communities. Of all reactions, however, the most marked, and the most dangerous, were those of the Sikhs. Their resentment was bitter and their feelings inflamed by their understanding of the League’s objective and by incidents which involved Sikhs and furnished what they accepted as proof of Muslim mass animosity directed against the Sikh community. There is but little doubt that if the disorders had continued the Sikhs in some places would have made a determined effort to take matters into their own hands, and that an already bad situation would have been worsened by serious and wide-spread communal clashes....The Sikhs now have little faith in the settlement’s permanency and are continuing to advance their plans for the formation of the Akal Fauj or Saina. In doing so, in public and in private, the Sikhs leaders are making no secret of the fact that this Sikh army is being formed to fight Muslim League aggression. Every Sikh knows its purpose and when enlisted is required to take a pledge that he is prepared to sacrifice his life and everything else he possesses for the freedom of the Sikh Panth.

The turmoil which existed in the province did not prevent the greatest interest being taken in His Majesty’s Government’s statement which was made public on the 20th of February. The reception given to the statement by both Muslims and Hindus was immediately favourable, and, in the case of the former, the statement has continued to be held in esteem because it is accepted that the Muslim position in the Interim Government is not assailed, that the Constituent Assembly no longer constitutes the menace it was in Muslim eyes, and because the chances of Pakistan becoming reality are thought to have greatly improved. Hindu feelings appear to be in the process of change, and the cordiality of their earlier estimation seems to have been diminished by more mature consideration. Many of them are now gravely concerned by what they describe as the statement’s ambiguities and by the lack of an understanding which is satisfactory to them of the statement’s implications and of the British Government’s intentions. The Sikh attitude to the statement has been consistently hostile and the Sikh leaders have been quick in voicing both condemnation of and accusation against Britain, the former on the score of broken promises and the latter on the grounds of the allegation that it is the British purpose to create communal strife. The British statement has added emphasis to the Sikh demand for a separate State, or, at least, a Sikh province inside the Punjab. This is evident in a draft which the SA Dal has recently prepared in which the fundamental demands of the Sikhs are set forth as well as suggestions for the future constitution of India and a declaration of Sikh objectives. The draft which has been circulated to elicit opinions does not rule out the possibility of a United Punjab but makes it clear beyond dispute that the Muslims would have to pay a heavy price for an amalgam of this kind. When the draft has taken its final shape it is the intention to submit it to the Minorities Advisory Committee of the Constituent Assembly. It is of interest that while this matter was under consideration in the SA Dal the opinion was expressed that as the Punjab had originally been taken by the British from the Sikhs the latter had legal title to demand it back. According to the Press, legal advice is being sought in this connection and resort to law is contemplated if the advice received is favourable to the Sikh case. It is clear from what has been written in this report that the Punjab’s future is not to be devoid of interest nor divorced from much anxiety....

3. VOLUNTEER ORGANIZATIONS.

Since the order declaring the Rashtriya Swayam Sewak Sangh and the Muslim League National Guards to be unlawful under the Criminal Law (Amendment) Act was passed on the 24th of January, and subsequently withdrawn, activities of the Sangh and the Guards have increased. The former has resumed briskness in a manner which is not blatant and which was normal to it from November when the Public Safety Ordinance came into force until the time of declaration to be unlawful. The activity is persistent nevertheless and deliberately calculated to keep Hindu morale alive. The latter have been taking an increasing public part in Muslim League affairs and the improvement of their efficiency and strength was a subject of consideration when the Muslim League Committee met in session immediately after the League leaders were released from jail. In the circumstances which now obtain it is almost a foregone conclusion that the strength of these two organizations will increase and with it their potentialities for mischief. Along with them, and possibly outpacing them, the Sikh Akal Saina will increase in size with equal, if not greater, menace to the tranquillity of the Province....

33. ‘Rousing Reception for Released Muslim Women Leaders’
1 March 1947

A tumultuous reception was accorded to Begum Shah Nawaz, MLA, Begum Tasadduque Hussain, MLA, Begum Fatima, Miss Zainab Siddiqui and other women released from jail, at a big public meeting of Muslim women in the Circular Gardens outside Town Hall, Lahore on Thursday.

Begum Shah Nawaz, in the course of a forceful speech, reiterated the determination to ‘fight shoulder to shoulder with our men for a just and democratic settlement of the Indian problem’. She said the month-old League movement in the Punjab had proved that Muslim women were capable of facing all kinds of ordeals for the sake of their cherished ideals.

She paid a warm tribute to the purdah-women who cheerfully faced lathi-charges and tear-gas operations. She condemned the ‘brutal and unprovoked’ police firing on a mixed procession in Ambala in which two women were killed besides a large number of men. She called upon the Punjab Government to institute an independent and judicial inquiry into the conduct of those who ordered the police to open fire on a peaceful procession.

Begum Tasadduque Hussain and Begum Fatima also spoke.

34. League’s Role in Punjab Premier’s Resignation

Letter from Mirza Bashiruddin Mahmud Ahmad to M.A. Jinnah, 2 March 1947

ON BOARD THE KARACHI MAIL

Dear Mr M.A. Jinnah,

Assalaamo 'Alaikum wa Rahmatullahi wa Barakatuhu.

As I told you when we met at Delhi, it has been my impression all along that at the proper time Sir Khizar Hayat Khan could be persuaded to join the League. But unfortunately certain events spoiled this scheme of mine for some time. Now, however, on HMG’s new declaration, Sir M. Zafrullah Khan approached Sir Khizar suggesting that at this critical juncture he should not fail his community. Malik Sahib then asked Sir Muhammad Zafrullah Khan to come to Lahore. As I also, on my way to Sind, had to stay there for one night, Sir Muhammad came there yesterday and discussed the matter with me. Following this, last night, he had a long discourse with Malik Sahib and Qizilbash. They have agreed to resign. Sir Muhammad Zafrullah Khan has shown me Malik Sahib’s declaration which will be published tonight or tomorrow after he has seen His Excellency the Governor. I pray that no hitch occurs.

Now you have a great lever to get Muslim rights from your opponents. Now only the NWFP remains. I will try to study its situation. I hope you will get help from some other sources as well, but no more can be disclosed in a letter. Maybe we meet at Delhi in April.

Yours sincerely,

MIRZA B. MAHMUD AHMAD

Head of the Ahmadiyya Movement

PS. My address during the time I am in Sind will be Nasirabad, Kinjijhee (J), Tharparkar District, Sind.

35. ‘Punjab League Movement—Its Character and Possibilities’

Extracts from an Editorial in People’s Age, 2 March 1947.

It is exactly one month since the Punjab Muslim League launched its satyagraha against the Public Safety Ordinance.
Despite the efforts of the official communiqués to play down the sweep and extent of the movement, it is quite clear even from the communiqués themselves, that far from succeeding in throttling the League, repression has only acted as an incentive to the League masses to increase the tempo of their struggle.

The courageous manner in which the League masses—men and women—have resisted repression, the way they have faced bullets, lathi charges and tear-gas, picketed law courts and jails—the militant anti-imperialism with which they have burnt Union Jacks—have, despite all political differences, won the admiration of Congressmen and other non-League fighters for freedom.

If Only

...The Chronicler, columnist of the nationalist Sunday Chronicle, an avowed opponent of the League, voices this sentiment in his latest dispatch from Lahore:

‘Today, at least in one Province the League HAS been forced by the logic of circumstances to oppose and agitate against the bureaucracy in a manner taught by the Congress....

‘I believe that if honest hearts and intelligent minds are applied to it, this situation can be moulded into a pattern or unity.’

Transformation?

A similar hope, it seems, dominates the minds of the progressive rank and file of the Muslim League in the Punjab and they feel it may be possible to ‘transform’ the present League movement into a united Hindu–Muslim–Sikh movement against the Ordinance and Police Raj.

In their well-justified enthusiasm at the colossal sweep of the League movement and, above all, at the successful prevention of the movement being converted into communal riots, despite the worst efforts of the CID, the League progressives forget both the all-India and the Provincial context in which the anti-Ordinance struggle is being fought. They forget:

- That the All-India League leadership supported the Punjab struggle in the beginning not because of any fervent desire for civil liberties (which it itself has suppressed equally ruthlessly in Bengal), but as a means of exerting pressure on the Congress to get the most reactionary parts of the British Plan—grouping and other things—implemented.
- That today, after the Attlee statement, and its machiavellian ‘offer’ to ‘transfer power’ to the provincial governments ‘existing’. In June 1948 the League leadership sees in the Punjab movement a battle for the Ministry and consequently for Pakistan itself. The fact that a day after the Attlee Award the League started a similar movement in the Frontier against the Congress Ministry highlights this new character which the League leadership will strive to give to the Punjab movement.
- That for exactly the same reasons, after the Attlee Award, the Congress leadership will oppose the Punjab movement through thick and thin in order to keep the Ministry out of League hands and thus keep the Province out of Pakistan.

It is for these reasons that the hopes of ‘transforming’ the movement are false hopes, based on wishful thinking and blindness to the political realities of today.

Partisan, Factional

Already the special care which used to be taken keep the movement strictly non-communal, strictly for civil liberties, in order to win support of the Hindu and Sikh masses, seems to have been abandoned even by the progressives inside the League, in their flush of excitement at the seeming success with which they are meeting.

- The Pakistan and anti-Ministry slogans—which do nothing but alienate the non-League masses—are again dominant.
- With the burning of the Union Jack, which of course wins the sympathy of the patriotic Hindus and Sikhs, there is also the hoisting of the League flags on public buildings, which roused the suspicion and the opposition of the non-Leaguers.
- The campaign for the release of ALL political prisoners has once again been reduced to a demand for the release merely of Leaguers—thus failing to win the support of Congressmen, who could be roused if the demand for the release of all victims of Police Raj were raised.

Bureaucracy’s Plan

This growing partisan twist which the movement has taken has given renewed opportunity to the bureaucracy to carry out its plan to make the Punjab a riot-arena.

The opportunist and chauvinist leadership of the Akali Party—at the instance of loyalists like Baldev Singh—has come out with the threat of a counter movement against the League. Reports are appearing of an Akali Fauj being recruited, marching, shouting anti-League slogans.

There is no doubt that this will bring the riot-danger nearer than ever and enable the more rabid communal elements to come to the top on both sides.

Negotiations

....But from what has appeared in the press and from the speeches by League leaders, it is clear that the main strategy of the League leadership—both the all-India leadership as represented by Nazimuddin, and the provincial, as represented by men like Firoz Khan Noon and Mamdot—is being directed to win over the loyalist Khizar and his group of 13 toadies in order to tip the balance in favour of the League and thus form a League Ministry....

No Formula Yet

...The Attlee statement makes the Punjab Ministry a key deciding factor in the battle for and against Pakistan. And the struggle in the Punjab will surely degenerate more and more into a sordid and factional ... for Ministry through the favour of Jenkins and his sepoys—with riots thrown in it the bureaucracy can manage to provoke them.

Aimed at Upsurge

A heavy responsibility, therefore, rests today on the Communist Party, on the organized working class, kisan and student movements.

The bureaucracy and the vested interests are determined to crush the rapidly growing tenant movement against feudal extortion (which will reach a new peak with the harvesting of the wheat crop in April) and the fast increasing organized might of the working—class, led by the railway workers.

The Ordinance Raj is primarily directed against this mass upsurge of the tenants and the workers which has changed the face of the once dark ‘loyal’ Punjab.

Equally also is the conspiracy to create communal riot in the Punjab directed against this upsurge, in order to divide and disrupt it.
The Communist Party and the organized working-class, kisan and student movements must, therefore, step up their own independent united Hindu–Muslim–Sikh campaign against Ordinance Raj and against the bureaucracy’s plans to drown the upsurge in civil war....

36. ‘Punjab Premier Resigns: Dramatic Developments at Lahore’
Extract from a Report from The Tribune, 3 March 1947.

LAHORE, 2 March.—The Punjab Premier, Sir Khizar Hayat Khan Tiwana, resigned Premiership at 10 o’clock tonight. The resignation was submitted by him following almost two hours talks with his colleagues at his Cantonment house where earlier a meeting of the Coalition Party was held this afternoon for about two hours where he talked with the members of the Coalition Party which he led for almost one year having become Coalitions Party’s leader almost this time last year....

Malik Sir Khizar Hayat Khan Tiwana, in a statement late to-night, said: ‘In the course of my statement issued on the 26th February, I said that His Majesty’s Government’s announcement of 20th February, had created an entirely new situation in which the leaders of all parties in the Punjab must decide how the province should face the future. I have since given most anxious consideration to the situation with which the country is now faced and, after mature deliberation, have arrived at certain conclusions which I take this opportunity of making public.

Last year when on the invitation of His Excellency the Governor I took upon myself the responsibility of forming a Coalition Government I was convinced that the best interests of the province and of all parties would be served by the administration being run by a non-communal party or coalition.

As regards the constitutional evolution of the country, each party in the coalition was left free to pursue its own line. On my part I made it clear that my Muslim colleagues in the Legislature and myself fully supported the Muslim demands. I am as thoroughly convinced to-day as I was then that for the purpose of securing a sound provincial administration the best arrangement is a non-communal party or coalition. The risks attendant upon the adoption of any other course are too obvious to be stressed.

On this basis, I have endeavoured to maintain a distinction between the provincial and administrative problems and those that were central and constitutional. So long as this line could be maintained, I had hoped that the coalition, in addition to running the provincial administration on a satisfactory basis, might also serve as a bridge to make a communal settlement possible. Arrangement in the Punjab might have served as an example elsewhere.

It must, however, be confessed with sorrow that the gulf that, unfortunately, divides the communities is as wide to-day as it was last year. It might, nevertheless, have been possible for the coalition to continue to bridge it and to function satisfactorily on the basis on which it was formed, but HMG’s latest pronouncement has obliterated the boundaries between the provincial and central spheres and constitutional and administrative problems and has thereby destroyed that very basis itself.

HMG have declared their solemn resolve to start immediately the process of transferring the balance of political power into Indian hands and to complete it by June, 1948. To meet the contingency of HMG finding it necessary in the case of the Punjab to transfer responsibility to a provincial administration, it is only fair that all political parties in the province should have a chance of evolving between them an administration which should be ready to receive sovereign power from HMG as soon as the process of transfer commences.
If I were now to continue to lead a coalition in which the Muslim League is not represented, this might put in serious jeopardy such chances as might otherwise exist of a settlement being arrived at between the communities in the province.

The basic fact in the situation is that the province has been suddenly confronted with the main constitutional problem and, in conformity with the policy to which I have throughout adhered, the responsibility for dealing with this problem on behalf of the Muslims must continue to vest in the Muslim majority party.

HMG’s announcement has made it imperative that parties in the province must be brought face to face with stark realities and must come to grips direct with the problems that confront the country. It is now incumbent on me to leave the field clear for the Muslim League to come to such arrangement vis-à-vis the other parties as it might consider best in the interests of the Muslims and the province.

I have, therefore, submitted to His Excellency the Governor the resignation of my Government. It is needless to add that I and my Muslim colleagues will continue to support the Muslim demand for self-determination. In view of the step that I have taken, it is needless for me to stress that I shall be ever ready to promote the cause of communal harmony and the chances of communal settlement in the province as far as it might be within my power, and shall not grudge any sacrifice that might help to achieve this much-to-be-desired consummation...”.

37. Nomination for the Premiership of Punjab
Extracts from a Letter from Central Government Servants of Punjab to M.A. Jinnah, 3 March 1947

NEW DELHI

Most Respected Quaid-i-Azam,

We apologise for diverting your attention to the following few points in the midst of your multifarious activities and hope that you will give a very careful consideration to the points raised therein and guide the destiny of the Punjab in this critical and momentous hour.

2. Nobody knows better than your good self that the coming years are very critical and full of potentialities from the point of view of the Muslims. Your sound and wise leadership has so far piloted us safely through most critical hours [sic]. It is a recognized fact that the Punjab is the cornerstone of Pakistan. The sacrifices and fortitude exhibited by the Muslims of the Punjab have forced the dummy Ministry of the Punjab to resign. This altered position places the Muslim League in the forefront to form a Ministry. It is, therefore, categorically imperative that a man possessing personality, vast experience and administrative and tactical ability should be at the helm of affairs in the Punjab. We mean to say that the leadership of the Punjab Muslims should vest in a person who should be able to guide and control the Punjab flawlessly in the difficult times ahead, should such an eventuality arise in 1948 in view of HMG’s announcement of the White Paper. Permit us to suggest humbly that Malik Firoz Khan Noon is the right type of man for the Premiership of the Punjab. He bears all the qualities mentioned before. It was his initiative and guidance during the recent Civil Disobedience Movement against the Ministry that has crowned the League with success. The common argument against him that he was an Executive Councillor of the Viceroy and is, therefore, not expected to look after the interests of the Muslims has been completely washed off by his recent sacrifices [and his] going to jail... for the sake of the community and Islam. This spirit of Malik Firoz Khan Noon has actuated the masses to think differently and now they are thinking highly of him...

3. You are already aware of this fact that the Nawab of Mamdot is a good table-talker but he lacks all the qualities required of a leader. He cannot deliver a public speech, cannot control a gathering, possesses no initiative of his own and is, therefore, not fit for the premiership. He is a puppet in the hands of Mian Mumtaz Daultana and Raja Ghazanfar Ali who believe in intrigues and cliques. It has been the utmost endeavour of Raja Ghazanfar Ali and Mian Mumtaz Daultana not to give prominence to the noteworthy activities of Malik Firoz Khan Noon, for they fear that their own leadership will be jeopardised otherwise. This is a hard fact. It will be admitted that the presence of Malik Firoz Khan Noon in the Punjab and his selfless services to the community have infused a new life in the Muslims of the Punjab....

The Muslim Press in the Punjab has frequently voiced the public opinion for a change in the Punjab leadership. The people desire it and we request you not to ignore the public demand. It will be difficult, rather impossible, to amend the mistake done at this critical juncture as regards this matter. A split in the League seems imminent if the MLAs are not allowed to exercise a free vote for the election of their leader. Malik Firoz Khan Noon’s election can avoid that impending catastrophe. He knows the art of cementing people together and overcoming difficult crises.

In the end we request you to personally guide the deliberations of the Punjab at this crucial stage in forming the Ministry because upon this Ministry will rest the strength of the Muslims of the Punjab at present and during the coming year. We have implicit faith in your leadership. We earnestly hope that you will fly to Lahore to judge the matters for yourself and give guidance as you consider right and wise.

We also venture to suggest that the following should be the Ministers of the Punjab:

1. Malik Firoz Khan Noon, Premier
2. Shaukat Hayat Khan
3. Mian Noorullah
4. Begum Shah Nawaz
5. One Scheduled Caste
6. A representative each of the Hindu and Sikh communities in case a Coalition Ministry is formed.

Apologising for this tiresome narrative,

We are, Respected Quaid-i-Azam,
YOUR HUMBLE FOLLOWERS FROM THE PUNJAB
(in the Government of India)

38. ‘Record Lahore Crowds Celebrate League’s Victory Day: Scheduled Caste Sikh Leaders Pledge to Fight for Pakistan’
4 March 1947

Sardar Hari Singh Nirbhay, a Scheduled Caste Sikh leader, and Chaudhury Sukh Lal, Deputy Mayor of Lahore, were among those who addressed an unprecedentedly large public meeting outside Mochi Gate, Lahore, on Sunday, in celebration of the Muslim League Victory Day. The Khan of Mamdot presided.

Sardar Hari Singh, amidst shouts of Allah-o-Akbar, Sat Sri Akal, declared that 20 lakh of Mazhabi Sikhs would fight shoulder to shoulder with the Muslims for the attainment of Pakistan.

Chaudhury Sukh Lal said that Akhand Hindustan would prove a graveyard of the minorities, particularly the Untouchables. He assured the League leaders of every support in their struggle for the attainment of Pakistan....

Mr Ghazanfar Ali Khan, Health Member, Government of India, said that the Punjab Muslims were now wide awake, disciplined and ready for action. As far as the Muslims were concerned, they would like the British to quit in June 1947 rather than in June 1948.

Malik Firoz Khan Noon said that the present League struggle had conclusively proved what the Muslims could do if faced with a national crisis. It would be impossible for anybody in the world to force a constitution on the Muslims against their will. He paid a warm tribute to the Muslim women of the Punjab for the heroic struggle which they waged, side by side with their menfolk.

Begum Shah Nawaz declared that the minorities in the Punjab need have no fear of the Muslims.

She said: ‘Our history, our religion and our traditions are the surest guarantee for the protection of the cultural, religious and political rights of the minorities.’...

Lahore City wore a gala appearance on Sunday when Muslim localities, bazaars and educational institutions were decorated. Muslim League flags fluttered on every shop and house-top. Every lane and by-lane was beautifully decorated with green flags and arches were erected at important centres.

Over 200,000 enthusiastic spectators filled the spacious maidan at Mochi Gate, and overflowed into the lanes, hundreds of them crowding on the balconies and terraces of surrounding buildings....

In the evening Muslim houses, shops and institutions were brilliantly illuminated in honour of the Muslim League Victory Day.

39. ‘Let Us Rise Above Petty Differences and March Forward, Urges Jinnah’

Dawn, 4 March 1947.

BOMBAY, Monday.—Mr M.A. Jinnah, President of the All-India Muslim League, in an interview to the Press on the resignation of the Punjab Ministry, appeals for complete unity amongst Muslims.

‘If we establish complete unity, co-operation and harmony, among ourselves, it will not be difficult’, Mr Jinnah adds, ‘to settle with other communities or parties and the British Government’.

The following is the full text of the statement of Mr Jinnah.

‘I am glad to learn the news this morning that Malik Sir Khizr Hyat Khan has submitted the resignation of his Cabinet. He has taken a wise decision and I hope that his example will soon be followed by Dr Khan Sahib.'
Towards Freedom: 1947

‘At this critical moment and in view of the grave situation that the Muslim Nation is facing, it is absolutely essential that there should be complete unity amongst us. There is no power on earth that can stop us from achieving our goal of Pakistan provided Musalmans stand solidly behind the Muslim League.

Secure Posterity’s Admiration

‘If we fail, it will be our own fault, and let us not be condemned by history and posterity that we of this generation were not able to rise above petty differences and personal equations or quarrels at a moment when it is obvious that we should close up our ranks for our national cause and for our cherished goal of Pakistan.

‘We have to struggle against all odds and we are handicapped in many ways, but let us not be held guilty of having lost our cause owing to our own folly of creating differences amongst ourselves and allowing them to exist. Let us be absolutely united; speak and act with one voice, and if we establish complete unity, co-operation and harmony among ourselves, it will not be difficult to settle with other communities or parties and the British Government.

‘I therefore once more appeal to every Musalman to unreservedly rally round the banner of the Muslim League and let us march together as true soldiers of our nation and then we shall not fail.’—API

40. ‘No Domination by Religious Majority: United Front by All Minorities’

Extracts from a Report from The Tribune, 4 March 1947.

LAHORE, 3 March.—The formation of a united front by all the Parties in the Punjab excepting the Muslim League against any political domination by a religious majority and the establishment of Pakistan was made known to-night at a mammoth public meeting organized by the Lahore District Congress Committee at Kapurthala Grounds....

It was announced, as a unanimous decision, to appeal to all the non-League sections of the populace to observe complete general hartal on 11 March all over the province and to hold public meetings on that day to express their resolve not to accept any domination by a majority party formed on religious basis or the establishment of Pakistan.

Several speakers including Ch Krishan Gopal Dutt, Master Kabul Singh and Sardar Pratap Singh, MLAs, accused the Punjab Governor of having helped the Muslim League against the Coalition Party. They alleged ‘intrigue’ on the part of officials also who had by their attitude, created an adverse atmosphere in the province wherein the forces of lawlessness let loose by the Muslim League were encouraged....

The main theme of the speeches made was that the non-League population of the province would not tolerate the formation of the Muslim League ministry and, therefore, could not agree to any domination of a religious majority and the establishment of Pakistan....

It was also made clear by almost every speaker that the movement was not at all designed against the Muslims....Their protest was against the League ideology and therefore, people were asked to remember that they should not do anything which would in any manner, injure the feeling of any Mussalman....

Master Tara Singh, who was the first speaker, said that a grave situation had arisen in the Punjab and it was, therefore, the duty of all the non-League sections, including the Nationalist Muslims, to stand united. They should, in no case, tolerate any communal domination in the Punjab. The Punjab must remain a free and independent province wherein every one should enjoy full and equal rights....

Dr Gopi Chand was sorry to say that the word civil liberties had been exploited. All that had been done to overthrow the Coalition Ministry and overawe the Punjab Premier. He said that a struggle would be carried both inside and outside the Assembly for the opposition of a religious majority’s rule over others. Even direct action may have to be resorted to but everything would be done peacefully....

Gyani Kartar Singh described the struggle which they had started today as a ‘crusade’ for their freedom. He maintained that the Sikhs would suffer more because all their interests were so closely connected with the Punjab where 95 per cent of Sikhs resided. He stated that even though by June, 1948 India would be free, the battle of their freedom in the Punjab would begin. He had no doubt that everyone will stand together....

41. Resignation of Ministry Results in Communal Rioting

Telegram from Evan Jenkins to Pethick-Lawrence, 4 March 1947

Immediate
Confidential
No. 26-G

Punjab Situation. Yesterday 3rd March, Muslims in Lahore were jubilant and noisy. Non-Muslims especially Sikhs were correspondingly exasperated and at night very large non-Muslim meeting was held at which violent speeches were made by Congress and Sikh leaders.

2. Today, 4th March, there has been much communal tension. During the morning Student procession mostly Hindu clashed with Police and later raided Police office damaging property and injuring about 30 Policemen of whom two have since died. Police opened fire and three demonstrators are reported to have gunshot wounds. This afternoon communal rioting has broken out in Lahore City. So far six members of public reported dead and 59 treated in hospital of whom 20 injured seriously. Police are still engaged and I have no complete report. Troops are standing by.

3. Congress and Sikhs are determined to resist Muslim rule. Mamdot has made no progress in forming Coalition and now wants Muslim Ministry supported by a handful of Scheduled Caste and Indian Christians. Situation is grave and without Coalition communal trouble on a large scale seems inevitable. I have told Mamdot that he must convince me of firm Parliamentary majority before I consider putting him in and that his Muslim government would be so short-lived that it might be impossible to put him in at all. Alternative is Section 93 which would not be satisfactory but might possibly be preferred by Punjabis generally.

Repeated to Viceroy.
Dear Sir Evan,

During my interview with your Excellency on the evening of 4th March, I submitted that, in view of the disturbances which had occurred in Lahore, I wished the new Ministry to assume office and responsibility at once, even though my negotiations with the Panthic Akali Party had not yet concluded. I further explained that the Council of Ministers to be formed immediately would be expanded in due course in the light of these or other negotiations; but that the Ministry as initially proposed was by itself in a position to command a majority of the Legislature.

Your Excellency desired further assurance on this last point and expressed the view that you would not like to take the risk of handing over the administration to a Ministry which might not stay in office for more than a very short period.

During my interview with your Excellency today, your Excellency informed me that, the Care-Taker Ministry having quitted office last night, the problem of substituting a new authority—either a new Ministry or the Governor acting under section 93 of the Government of India Act—had become urgent. Your Excellency further suggested that the best course would be for your Excellency to assume the necessary powers of administration under section 93 to fill the vacuum at once and for such period as I might require in order to form a Ministry commanding a stable majority.

I submitted, and I wish to repeat the submission, that the Ministry, the appointment of which I am recommending, was already in a position to face the legislature successfully and should be given an opportunity of proving it on the floor of the House.

Your Excellency having formally summoned me to assist in the formation of a Council of Ministers, the stage of inquiry whether the Ministry, the formation of which I am advising, is likely to command a majority of the House, is really over. The likelihood, presumed by your Excellency when summoning me, can now be contradicted only by an adverse vote of the House.

I have no reason to doubt the assurances of support which I have received from various groups of MLAs outside the Muslim League Party and I have no manner of doubt that the Ministry which I am proposing will be able to command a majority of at least 90 to begin with. This number comprises the Muslim League Party of 80 plus 3 other Muslim members, 4 members of the Scheduled Castes, 1 European and 2 Indian Christians. This number is most likely to go up to about 100 before the Legislature resumes its session.

I submit that, while opinions and conjectures may differ about the likely amount of support for the proposed Ministry, the only course fair to me at this stage is to put them to actual test. As for the risk (which to [my] mind does not exist) that the Ministry may fall as soon as it faces the Assembly, I submit that, in theory, such a risk is involved in the formation of any Ministry at any time. Normal constitutional procedure should not, however, be deviated from because of the presence of a theoretical risk of this nature.
In view of these observations, I trust your Excellency will permit me to submit immediately for your approval the names of Ministers for the new Cabinet.

Yours sincerely,
IFTIKHAR HUSAIN KHAN

43. Support to the Proposed League Ministry Must Be Established Letter from Evan Jenkins to Iftikhar Husain Khan of Mamdot, 5 March 1947
IOR, R/3/1/176, Acc No. 3477, NAI.

GOVERNMENT HOUSE, LAHORE

My dear Khan Sahib,
Thank you for your letter of 5th March 1947. Since our interview today, very serious communal rioting has broken out in Multan, and the situation in Lahore has deteriorated greatly. Rioting is also reported in Amritsar. In these very grave conditions you suggest that I accept your very general assurance that you command a majority in the Assembly and ask you to instal a new Ministry forthwith. I asked you at one of our earlier interviews to let me have the names of your supporters, and today I added that in the case of those who are not members of your own party I should be glad to have a statement signed by them to the effect that they are prepared to support your Government in the House on all questions of confidence. I still think that these stipulations are reasonable, and shall be grateful if you will be good enough to comply with them. In the meantime I cannot continue indefinitely without a Ministry, and to fill the gap I have, with the concurrence of the Governor-General, made a proclamation under section 93 of the Government of India Act, 1935. I need I hardly say that I consider the early establishment of a stable Ministry in the Punjab most important, and I hope that within the next few days you will be able to let me have proposals much more definite than those contained in your letter. I can assure you that the risks involved in any hasty action are anything but theoretical—they are as grave as could well be imagined.

2. My personal belief is that no Government which does not command the confidence of Punjabis generally can solve our present problems, and it is for you to consider whether in the additional time now available you should not resume negotiations with the other communities. May I also suggest that at the present juncture a statement by yourself and the leaders of the Hindus and Sikhs condemning the present communal outbreak would have an excellent effect? I have reason to believe that a move on your part for the issue of such a statement would be well received.

Yours sincerely,
E.M. JENKINS

44. Muslim Women of Delhi Support Punjab League Leaders
Extract from a Report from Dawn, 5 March 1947.

Over three thousand Muslim women of Delhi assembled in Anglo-Arabic College under the auspices of Delhi Women’s Muslim League to congratulate the Punjab Muslim League leaders for successfully completing the civil disobedience movement on Tuesday. Begum Viqar-un-Nisa Noon presided over the meeting.
Jubilant shouts of ‘Muslim League Zindabad’ and ‘Pakistan Hamara Haq Hai’, charged with solemnity and enthusiasm received Begum Viqar-un-Nisa Noon and Dr Shaista Akhtar Suhrawardy.

The Muslim national life seemed to be taking a new turn when Muslim women both old and young restlessly listened to the account of the heroic struggle of the Punjab Muslim given by Begum Noon in her Presidential address.

‘The present political economy of India admits of large differences between the poor and the rich,’ Begum Noon said ‘progress, wealth and education have been monopolized by certain sections of our society while a large number of people were steeped in illiteracy. To abolish this difference will be the main objects of Pakistan State.’

Begum Noon also pointed out that today Musalmans in every corner of the country were struggling unitedly for the right of self-determination.

They wanted to achieve Pakistan not for exploiting the minorities but to have a democratic regime which could afford equal opportunities of progress and prosperity to all.

APPEAL FOR UNITY

Begum Viqar-un-Nisa in the course of her Presidential address laid special stress on discipline and unity not only among Muslim menfolk, but also among Muslim women. She appealed to the Musalmans in general and the Muslim women in particular, to work like soldiers in an army for the final achievement of Pakistan.

Dr Shaista Akhtar Suhrawardy who spoke after Begum Noon declared that the success of the Punjab movement had proved that no Government could work successfully against the wishes of the majority.

She further remarked that the coming months would be most crucial for the Musalmans of India and the fact that the British Government had declared to leave India by June 1948, did not mean that the liberty had been won.

Muslims had a hard and bitter struggle ahead before it could be achieved, she added....

The martyrs of Bihar and victors of Punjab have proved that the Musalmans cannot be ruled unjustifiably.

She concluded her speech with an appeal to all the Musalmans to forget their differences and to unite for Pakistan, liberty and freedom which she thought could be the only reward for the sincere efforts of a Muslim.

45. “Care-Taker” Govt Resigns: Congress & Sikh Ministers’ Protest

The Tribune, 5 March 1947.

LAHORE, 4 March—The news regarding Ministry-making in the Punjab paled into insignificance in view of the serious developments which took place in the city to-day.

The non-Muslim League sections seemed to have no interest in what was happening at Government House or at the Mamdot Villa. Of course Khan Iftikhar Hussain, President of the Muslim League Assembly Party met His Excellency Sir Evan Jenkins and while skulls were being broken with police lathis and bayonets were being aimed at anti-communal Ministry demonstrators talks were going on at Government House regarding the installation of the Muslim League Ministry in office.
Nothing has resulted from these talks though the League is making every effort to get into office as early as it can. They don’t want to lose any time.

But even though the Coalition may not have a majority to-day in view of the Muslim Unionists’ attitude yet the Muslim League is still without even a bare majority. Their strength is just 80 to-day including that interesting Unionist MLA who has changed side only yesterday, in a House of 174—one seat is vacant. Bargaining is going on for two more and it is not unlikely that the two Indian Christians D.B.S.P. Singha and Mr Fazal Elahi may go over. There was a demonstration to-day against Dewan Bahadur Singha. The League has, however, not been able to ‘allure’ anyone else though efforts are being continued. If the ten Unionists remain neutral in the task of Ministry-making the League does not get a majority to form a ministry.

Dewan Bahadur Singha’s attitude is already the subject of criticism among independent Christians who feel that their future is linked up with the minorities and an office to one of them cannot help the whole community.

R.B. Ganga Saran, who was one of the Independents and had joined D.B. Singha’s group of Independents, which was re-organized on the day the Assembly met, has announced his definite decision not to join the Muslim League Ministry in any form. He has said that he can never join any communal party because he claims he has been returned by joint electorate.

The refusal to shoulder the responsibility of the administration of the province as members of the care-taker Government under the circumstances by the three Congress and Sikh Ministers which news was followed by the resignation by the Premier at midnight and his intimation to the Governor immediately after that the resignation of his Cabinet be considered to be accepted forthwith has created yet another situation in the province.

This means that either the Governor will promulgate Section 93 in the province on Wednesday (today) for running the administration of the province for which responsibility is entirely his now or a Ministry formed by the Muslim League alone (with perhaps one Christian sparrow who will then any way make the League summer) will be announced and installed in office immediately.

In view of this situation arising overnight again and with the capital of the province in the grip of communal frenzy Wednesday’s developments would be watched with even keener interest.

46. ‘Governor Takes Over Administration: Punjab Assembly Prorogued’

Extract from a Report from The Tribune, 6 March 1947.

LAHORE, 5 March—Following communiqué has been issued from Government House at 6.45 p.m:

Malik Sir Khizar Hayat Khan Tiwana and his colleagues of the Coalition Ministry saw the Governor last night, and informed him that the resignation of the Ministry must take effect forthwith.

Since no alternative Ministry has been formed, the Governor has been obliged to prorogue the Punjab Legislative Assembly, and to issue a proclamation under Section 93 of the Government of India Act, 1935.

His Excellency the Governor of the Punjab has issued the following statement:

The decision of the Coalition Ministry to leave office forthwith; the prorogation of the Punjab Legislative Assembly and the issue of a proclamation under Section 93 of the government of India Act, 1935, have been formally announced. It may help the public to understand the situation if I explain it less formally.

Constitutionally, no government can be without a Government for any appreciable time. When a ministry resigns, the normal course is for its members to remain in office until their successors are ready to take over from them. On this occasion the Coalition Ministers, for reasons which they have made public, have decided not to remain in office. The gap caused by their departure must be filled and the only possible method of filling it immediately is by a proclamation under Section 93 of the Government of India Act, 1935 which transfers all responsibility to the Governor.

This is the first proclamation of the kind ever made in the Punjab and I hope that it will not have to remain in force for very long.

While attempts to form an alternative Ministry continue, my first task must be to restore and maintain order in Lahore and elsewhere and to prevent further disorder. Communal rioting causes nothing but misery and does not advance the interests of any community or of the Punjab.

Severe restrictions on meetings, processions and gatherings will be needed in Lahore for some days. These restrictions are essential, if order is to be maintained, and I trust that the leaders of all communities will co-operate with the authorities in enforcing them....

47. Negotiations on Ministry Formation

Extracts from a Letter from Evan Jenkins to Wavell, 7 March 1947

NO. 653.

Many thanks for Your Excellency’s letter No. 90/13 of 6th March. Yesterday there were some signs that the communities might be prepared to take a more reasonable line. Firoz, when he saw me in the morning, was strongly in favour of a coalition of some kind and said that he personally was prepared to make concessions to the Sikhs. He had not consulted Mamdot and is, as Your Excellency knows, unreliable and disloyal to his colleagues. After I had seen Firoz, I saw a non-Muslim deputation which included Sardar Ujjal Singh and Giani Kartar Singh. Sardar Ujjal Singh suggested that I should mediate and asked me to put in writing my general views about a settlement. He agreed with me that civil war and partition were both unthinkable, and that we should go in for a united Punjab under some Government acceptable to a large proportion of Punjabis. In the evening a Peace Committee consisting of Mamdot, Firoz, Daultana, Iftikhar-ud-Din, Shaukat, Tara Singh, Sachar, Singhha (the Speaker), Gopi Chand Bargava (one of the Lahore Congress Leaders), Swaran Singh and Gibbon (the Anglo-Indian MLA) was formed. I am not sure that Tara Singh really joined this Committee, as I understand he was in Amritsar yesterday and is still there. But the fact that many of the persons responsible for the present communal outbreak have met and are co-operating with one another is encouraging. Swaran Singh suggested the formation of a committee of this kind, and I passed the suggestion on to Mamdot.

2. At the moment I feel that the best thing I can do is to take up Ujjal Singh’s suggestion and let him have a paper of some kind about the terms of a possible settlement. I enclose a copy of a draft I have prepared. It is designedly written in an impersonal and non-technical way and avoids any suggestions so definite as to be converted into commitments or demands. It is intended simply to get things started, and for this limited purpose I do not think it can do any harm. The only possible difficulty is that negotiations of the kind I think necessary, if we are to have any chance of success, would to some extent cut across the proceedings of the Constituent Assembly. Section B of the Assembly is, however, completely inactive with the Muslims non-co-operating, and at some stage the Punjab will either have to make its own constitution or brief the Punjab delegates so that a constitution may be drafted by Section B. A brief approved by the leaders of all three communities would be invaluable.

3. In my paper I have dismissed partition as impracticable, and this is the right line to take at present. If we are forced back upon partition, I could not in advance of discussions with the party leaders make any definite proposal. The crux, as Your Excellency has pointed out, is Lahore and indeed a great part of the Lahore Division where land and other economic interests are largely in non-Muslim hands.

4. If Your Excellency thinks I may safely communicate my paper to Ujjal Singh, will you kindly send me a telegram, and I will send for him as soon as possible. I would of course explain that the paper does not set out to propound any precise solution, but merely suggests that in a united Punjab safeguards of a satisfactory kind could be provided for the minorities. I should like to see Ujjal Singh tomorrow, if possible, and I am therefore sending this letter and the paper by the afternoon air service to Delhi.

5. Amritsar was my main anxiety yesterday. By the evening the city was completely out of control. There was some difficulty in securing reinforcements—we are so tied up now that neither the Area Commander (Bruce) nor I wish to commit reserves until we are quite sure about the need for committing them. The death-roll does not seem to be very high, but the figures we have are only for the corpses which have passed through the hospital mortuary. Most of the population seem to have produced arms, including fire-arms, and many buildings are burning. Masses of people, including many women and children, running away from the city added to the confusion and made it even more difficult than usual to deal with looting. The Area Commander and I decided last night that the situation must be dealt with in a big way. Police reinforcements were despatched by midnight and two British Battalions, which were moved in this morning, must be well into the city by now. They have been instructed to restore order and in particular to disarm the population.

Lahore is rather quieter, though still very uneasy. I have no further reports from Multan. Bad rioting is reported from Rawalpindi with 25 dead and perhaps 100 injured. Rioting has continued in Sialkot and Jullundur.

These affairs always go through three stages—frenzy, funk and recrimination. At Lahore we are reaching the second stage. If we can clean Amritsar up in the next 24 hours, we should be able to cope adequately with any trouble elsewhere. The Police, especially the senior officers, have done magnificently, and we have first class co-operation with the Army. ...
48. Opposition to League Ministry

Extracts from a Letter from Evan Jenkins to Wavell, 9 March 1947

No. 654.

...There were two very disturbing factors in the situation. In the first place, the Sikhs regarded the Muslim League agitation and the present communal disturbances as an attack particularly upon them. They felt that they had suffered more than the Muslims and had been caught unprepared. They were therefore likely to have their revenge, and if trouble spread to the rural areas in Muslim districts and was not checked, we must expect similar trouble in Sikh districts and later in the Ambala Division where the Hindu Jats are dominant. Secondly, the resolution of the Congress Working Committee on the Punjab, which appeared in this morning’s newspapers, demanded the partition of the Punjab and would almost certainly be treated by the Muslims as a challenge. Unfortunately the resolution had been accompanied by a Joint statement of Congress and Sikh leaders in the Punjab to the effect that they are ‘in no circumstances willing to give the slightest assurance or support to the Muslim League in the formation of a Ministry’, as they ‘are opposed to Pakistan in any shape or form’. In the light of the Sikh attitude and of the resolution and statement it appeared to me that we might be faced with persistent communal trouble gradually spreading to the rural areas all over the Punjab. A coalition now seemed most improbable; the Muslims would insist upon Pakistan, which they are still quite unable to define; and the Hindus and Sikhs would demand the Ravi as the boundary of the non-Muslim State....

6. All the civil officials present said that there was a certain amount of moderate Muslim opinion in favour of peace, but that the local notables dared not co-operate with the authorities, as they would have done under the old official regime or a Unionist Ministry, because they felt that they must keep in with their party. The right solution therefore was to announce that the Section 93 regime would continue for a specified period in the first instance—say, for three months. If this were done, the local notables would come down on the side of the Administration for the time being at least. This opinion is interesting from civil officials serving in a Muslim area, since they tend to discount the case for the minorities and the seriousness of communal trouble....

49. ‘Behind Khizar’s Resignation: First Fruits of Attlee Declaration in Punjab’

Editorial from People’s Age, 9 March 1947.

Events have moved fast in the Punjab. The calling off of the League movement has been followed double quick by the resignation of Khizar and the Governor’s invitation to the League to form a Ministry.

Close on the heels of this has come news from Lahore of anti-Pakistan demonstrations by Hindu and Sikh students being fired upon by the police and a hartal of Hindu and Sikh shops in protest. The Congress leader Dr Gopichand Bhargava has given a call for an anti-Pakistan Day. The Akali Party threatens that it will fight ‘Muslim domination’.

The latest news is that communal clashes have begun and the Caretaker Ministry has resigned, refusing to accept any responsibility for the present situation.
The crisis is drawing to a climax even as we go to the press. What is it that has turned the wheel almost full circle? The League leadership claims that it has won the Ministry because of the strength of the movement it had launched.

The Congress and Panthic leaders likewise believe that it was the League movement which frightened Khizar into ‘surrender’. They are shocked at his ‘betrayal’ because they were totally unprepared for it.

What is the reality?

Police Raj Shaken

There is not the slightest doubt that the League movement shook the old Punjab police raj structure to its very foundations.

The widespread character of the movement, exemplified most vividly in the mass participation of thousands of women in the processions and meetings in burqas, the great majority of them participating for the first time in any sort of political activity; the anti-imperialist zeal and courage of the Muslim masses; the fearlessness with which men and women faced tear-gas; the demoralization and the disintegration which began to take place in the police ranks themselves as a result of the all powerful sweep of the movement—all these were factors which helped the Punjab bureaucracy realize that they were faced with a new situation, which required a new solution.

This mighty mass upsurge was an expression of the acute discontent of the vast mass of the common people.

Aimed At Upsurge

The Public Safety Ordinance, it must be remembered, was promulgated at a time when communal tension was receding, and was aimed entirely at suppressing—

The tenant upsurge which was sweeping the Western Punjab, the traditional base of British imperialism.

The growing strike wave led by the NWR workers, which was embracing in its fold all types of Government servants as well.

The immediate future held out the prospect of the tenant upsurge reaching its climax with the harvesting of the new crop in April, and of mass action by the railway workers and all Government servants following the ratification of the Pay Commission’s report.

The aim of the Punjab bureaucracy was to prepare the necessary machinery to drown this upsurge in blood.

The Ordinance failed to achieve its purpose...Strikes and tenant uprisings continued with a renewed fervour. The efforts to create communal riots were foiled. Imperialism’s eternal Ulster threatened to become a powerful base of anti-imperialist revolt.

The bureaucracy realized more and more that without the help of feudal elements in the League this mass upsurge among the tenants (the majority of whom were Muslims) or among the railway workers could not be crushed. Something more than tear-gas and bullets was needed.

It was in these circumstances that the Attlee declaration came and hastened to its fulfilment a process already begun.
Why Unionists Swung

The Attlee declaration’s devilish ‘offer’ to transfer power to the Provincial Governments existing in June 1948 made the Punjab Ministry a key deciding factor in the battle for and against Pakistan.

In 1946, when the imperialists had thrown in the deciding weight of their stooge Unionist Party in order to help the Congress to form a Ministry, they did so as a key part of their general all-India policy to lure the Congress into the false belief that it could safely accept the vicious, undemocratic grouping clause of the British Plan (which had already been prepared by Professor Coupland) and yet retain the unity of India.

In 1947, with the Congress already safely entrapped in the coils of the British Plan, the formation of an ‘independent’ North-West group which in reality would remain a British military and economic base, has become both a dire imperialist strategic necessity and also an essential prerequisite for their continued domination of the whole of India through partition.

It was for this reason that it became necessary for the imperialists to shift their balance-holding stooges—the Unionists—from the side of the Congress to the side of the League, in any event before June 1948.

Pressed for Time

That this shift took place so soon was because of the reasons described before—the immediate prospects of the harvest and the consequent mass tenant uprising and of the vast working class upsurge following the Pay Commission’s report.

In order to crush these, it was necessary to have the support of the League leadership as the majority of those participating in the upsurge in the Punjab were Muslims.

The bureaucracy also cleverly foresaw that the immediate overthrow of the Ministry, if carefully highlighted through Khizar’s statements as a question of the establishment of Pakistan in June 1948, could throw the whole Province into communal war and fulfill their heart’s desire which had been foiled till now.

The story of the negotiations with the Muslim League are a sordid tale, which, when fully revealed, will rouse the Muslim masses to indignation at the shameful cringing toady ways of some of their leaders.

It is being said that Firoz Khan Noon wrote a letter from jail to one Jenkins (not the Governor) the head of the Political CID in the Province—quite obviously the brain behind all the atrocities being committed against the League masses those very days.

It was a sweet and fawning letter, we are told, recalling the past friendship of the writer and the recipient and appealing to him to end the impasse.

Jenkins was immediately deputed by the bureaucracy to meet Noon and start negotiations.

The two ‘friends’ talked. They decided to bring the Khan of Mamdot into their ‘conference’ but took good care not to call in men like Mian Ifitikharuddin who would obviously spit on the very idea of making a deal with the head of the hated CID—the biggest enemy of the Punjabi people.

In the meanwhile the arch-reactionary Nazimuddin of Bengal conducted negotiations through Wavell with the Governor, the other Jenkins.
Shameful Retreat

Even from the terms of the agreement which were publicly announced, it was clear to any but the blindest that they were a shameful retreat on the part of the League leaders.

The ban on processions was to continue.
The ban on meetings was lifted, but could be reimposed at any time by Magistrates.
The satyagrahi persons were to be released but not all—those who had committed ‘violence’ were to be kept inside jail.
And above all, the Ordinance and its hateful provisions would remain—only it would be called an ‘Act’.

But the terms NOT announced, the terms of the pact made by Noon and Nazimuddin with the Sahibs were even more shameful.

_They agreed themselves to introduce the repressive Act in the Legislature if the Governor ordered his agent Khizar to retire in their favour._

They agreed to take in at least one Unionist into their Cabinet; to provide for certain specific Leaguers named by the bureaucracy in the Cabinet; and to exclude from the Cabinet men with an anti-imperialist record.

Cover for Police Raj

What it amounted to was that in return for the Ministry, the League would agree to form exactly the same cover for Police Raj which the Khizar Ministry had become—and because of its greater popular base it would serve that purpose even better.

Thus the resignation of Khizar is not a victory for the League masses as it is being played up as being, but a studied move on the part of the bureaucracy:

_FIRST,_ to continue their Police Raj in a new way, as in the old way it was no longer possible to crush the growing popular upsurge.

_Secondly,_ to unleash a new round of communal conflict in the Punjab and throughout India; and _Thirdly,_ as its ultimate objective, to help in the task of carrying out the partition of India and the consequent continuance of the British military and economic stranglehold over India in all but name.

As we go to press, terrible news is pouring in from Punjab. Yesterday (4 March) thirteen were killed, ninety eight injured in police firings. The API report says that a communal clash took place in Chowk Matti, the centre from where communal riots always start in Lahore. Curfew has been imposed.

In these circumstances, a great and tremendous duty rests on the common people of the Province.

The Muslim masses, who so bravely fought police terror all these days; whose anti-imperialist slogans—‘Hamari Larai Bartanvi Sarkar ke Khilaf,’ ‘Down with the Union Jack,’ ‘Police Raj Murdabad’; whose courage and endurance won the admiration of even their political opponents; who kept the demon of communal riots at bay with so much foresight and patience—must once more recall all their anti-imperialist fervour and denounce the intrigues of their ministry-making leaders, declare their determination to resist riots, and keep the Punjab united and not a battleground for the civil war unleashed by the Attlee statement.
They must realize that the only way to win their freedom and keep the Punjab united is through making the demand for the self-determination of the entire Punjabi people their own; in contrast to the communal and separatist demand of the League leadership.

They must compel their leaders to grant the fullest civil liberties in the Province, repeal the Ordinance and scotch the bureaucracy’s plan to resurrect it in the form of an Act; to fulfill the demands of the tenants and the workers and carry out the pledges of the Punjab League Manifesto.

Equally must the Hindu and Sikh masses, followers of the Congress recall the many battles they have fought which made the Punjab a Province which the country looked upon as a stronghold of the anti-imperialist struggle. They must remember the name of Bhagat Singh and of all the other great martyrs which they have produced. And they must say:

Shame on the leaders, the quarrelling, factional leaders, who today are busy rousing Hindu and Sikh chauvinism and are thus carrying out the British game of fomenting civil war.

Our interests are common with our Muslim brothers, and together alone can we drive out the British.

Above all it is the duty of the Communist Party and the organized worker, peasant and student movements to throw in their entire weight with death-defying courage to prevent civil war and to cement the common bonds between Hindu, Muslims and Sikhs.

They must expose the British Plan, helping the Congress-League masses to force their leaders to break with it, and carry forward the struggle of the tenants for a decent human existence and of the working class for a living wage.

50. Demand for Division of Punjab

Letter from Jawaharlal Nehru to Wavell, 9 March 1947
PRO, CAB 134/344, Acc No. 4042, NAI.

NEW DELHI

Dear Lord Wavell,

I have received a letter from Sardar Baldev Singh in regard to recent happenings in the Punjab. We have all been greatly exercised over the Punjab situation as it has developed during the past six weeks. Sardar Baldev Singh, being himself a Punjabi and intimately connected with provincial politics, is naturally even more affected by these developments. He has asked me to convey to you and through you to HMG what the Sikhs feel in this matter. I have suggested to Sardar Baldev Singh to write to you himself.

2. The views that Sardar Baldev Singh has expressed on behalf of the Sikhs are generally shared by the Hindus of the Punjab. There are some Muslims also who are in agreement with them. Although unfortunately this has become a communal issue, it is not essentially so. The recent trouble was started by the demand of the Muslim League to coerce and break up the Coalition Ministry in the province. The first point to which Sardar Baldev Singh wishes to draw special attention, and I wholly agree with him in this matter, is the way certain Members of the Interim Government actively participated in the Punjab agitation and encouraged the attempts to upset the Coalition Government there. This is patently opposed not only to constitutional procedure, but seemed to us wholly lacking in propriety. It put us in a very embarrassing position.
3. The present position is that any attempt to set up a Muslim League ministry in the Punjab in the circumstances will not only give rise to grave apprehensions in the minds of the Sikhs, Hindus and certain others in the Punjab, but also lead to conflict. Indeed it has led to conflict on a severe scale already, and recent events have made the position worse. This apprehension and conflict are obviously due to the fact that the Muslim League openly want to make the whole of the Punjab a Pakistan area and wish to use a League ministry to that end.

4. As I have written to you separately, a proper and fair solution of this difficulty appears to be the division of the Punjab into a predominantly Muslim area and a predominantly non-Muslim area. The Congress has recommended this and I understand that the Sikhs are also agreeable to it and indeed desire it.

5. I earnestly hope that no steps will be taken in the Punjab which may add to the apprehensions of the non-Muslim League elements in the province. If any such thing is done it can only lead to trouble.

Yours sincerely,
Jawaharlal Nehru

51. Proposed Twin Ministries in Punjab

Extract from a Note by Wavell, 10 March 1947

HIS EXCELLENCY’S NOTE OF INTERVIEW WITH PANDIT JAWAHARLAL NEHRU ON 10TH MARCH 1947

1. We began by talking about the situation in the Punjab, and I asked Nehru whether he had any suggestions to offer. He said that the situation was very dangerous and disturbing; and was principally due to a struggle between two fairly equally balanced parties to be in power over the whole Province by June 1948. The Province had remained tranquil under an uneasy equilibrium for a long time, but now that that equilibrium was broken, it was going to be difficult to restore it again. There was not much prospect of a Coalition Government, since the parties mistrusted one another so profoundly; nor could Section 93 continue indefinitely. The only suggestion he had to offer was that there might as a temporary measure be two ministries under the Governor, one for the Eastern part of the Province and one for the Western. This would not be intended to prejudice the issue of partition, but might enable the administration of the Province to be carried on temporarily. I said that I would have the proposal examined, but I was rather doubtful of its being a practical one. Did he propose that there should be fresh elections or that the existing Assembly should split in two parts according to the districts they came from? He did not seem to have thought the matter out very much, but he said that he did not see that an election was necessary, what he proposed was merely a temporary arrangement. I said that I thought the difficulties of such a solution were probably insurmountable, and that certainly a Coalition Government for the whole Province would be very much preferable.

2. We then had some general talk on the political future, particularly with regard to the possible partition of the Punjab and Bengal. Nehru agreed that the Cabinet Mission plan was the best solution if it could be carried through; and that the only real alternative was a partition of the Punjab and Bengal. I said that I did hope the Congress would make a really determined effort to get agreement with the League on the Mission plan, and asked what steps had been taken. Nehru said that he was intending to have an informal talk with Liaquat Ali Khan as soon as possible and that they expect an official reply from the League to the Congress resolution.

Nehru was quite sober and realistic in what he said, but did not seem really hopeful of a settlement with the League....

52. League Anxious of Sikh Support

Telegram from Evan Jenkins to Wavell, 10 March 1947
IOR, R/3/1/89, Acc. No. 3414, NAI.

IMMEDIATE
CONFIDENTIAL
No. 39-G. Addressed Viceroy repeated Secretary of State.

Punjab situation. My immediately preceding telegram. I visited Multan today. The city is quiet under curfew but about 30 incidents have been reported from villages. Troops are operating in rural area.

2. Mamdot, Daultana and Firoz saw me by appointment on my return. They gave no indication that they were in a position to form or wished to form a Ministry. They were most apprehensive about attitude of Sikhs and said that their overtures had been rebuffed. They asked me to mediate and I am trying to get hold of Swaran Singh who seems unfortunately to be out of Lahore.

3. Two police officers who saw Tara Singh at Amritsar today say that he is extremely excited; asserts that ‘Civil War’ has already begun and threatens attacks on police stations and a mass Sikh rising. Murder of Labh Singh a former President of SGPC in Jullundur recently is probably main cause of his resentment. We are doing what we can to get him off the boil. Anti-Pakistan Day tomorrow may give some trouble but I hope not.

4. Move now seems to be on foot to re-establish Hindu-Sikh Coalition with Muslim Unionists. I am sure Khizar will not co-operate and Muslim League have warned me that if such Ministry is formed Muslims will not tolerate it.

53. League Ministry Not Formed through Constitutional Methods

Letter from Baldev Singh to Wavell, 11 March 1947
PRO, CAB 134/344, Acc. No. 4042, NAI.

I BHAGWAN DAS ROAD, NEW DELHI

Dear Lord Wavell,

Since my talk with you last week about the Punjab affairs, distressing events have taken place in the Province. These are undoubtedly engaging your mind too. The situation seems to be somewhat under control now and I do hope the danger of any deterioration will be most firmly checked. Hindus and Sikhs have, it appears, been attacked and victimised on so large a scale over a wide area as to leave an impression as if a premeditated plan existed to swamp
Civil Disobedience Movements by the Muslim League

I make no secret of my conviction that Muslim League’s onslaught on the Coalition Ministry had been engineered in the way it was because the League had despaired of being able to defeat it by constitutional methods. We watched the manoeuvre with grave misgivings from its very start; and you will remember how Sikh opinion reacted almost instinctively to declare, as Master Tara Singh did in a press Statement, that the League’s move was in fact an attempt to establish its own domination in the Punjab.

It would be relevant here for me to observe that throughout the period when the League were staging its demonstrations and in the course of which extreme lawlessness was preached and practised, the police and the administration generally stood literally aside. Magistrates and judges sitting in courts were assaulted and Government property destroyed. The Union Jack was removed from court buildings and other places, trampled and displaced by League flags—the police still doing nothing. Strict censorship prevented facts being known but I have now heard from reliable eye witnesses and officials how things were allowed to drift to force the collapse of the Ministry.

I wish to lay the greatest emphasis on the fact that the Muslim League has not achieved its objective by just or constitutional methods. It was in fact sheer hooliganism of the vilest type. The fact that its leader has not been able to secure a majority even to this day is significant. I cannot understand how when palpably illegal and unconstitutional methods were employed to oust a coalition which enjoyed a majority in the Legislature, a minority group could have been invited to capture office.

The issue is one of extreme gravity at this crucial period in view of the latest Statement of HMG’s policy. The British Government will hand over power to Indian hands by June 1948. According to their scheme, the Authority or Authorities who receive it, will be such as are in seat or seats of power at the time. The League’s illegal onslaught on the Coalition and its design to capture power at this time is ominous in the context of impending changes and I firmly hold that it would be quite improper and contrary to the intentions of HMG to allow this to happen in utter defiance of all propriety and constitutional practice. It seems to me to be unbelievable that HMG could recognize unconstitutional and illegitimate activities at this stage as that would obviously and immediately expose the country to all manner of adventurers.

I stress this as conditions in the Punjab have become delicate and you and the Governor have to exercise the greatest care if my Province is to be saved from an inevitable disaster. You know the impossible attitude adopted by the Muslim League in coming to a settlement with the Sikhs. The British Cabinet Delegation and you assured us last year that everything would be done to secure to the Sikhs the rights they legitimately claimed in the Province which is their Homeland by using your good offices with both the major Political Parties. Beyond fine phrases and lip comfort, nothing has been done by the Muslim League in this direction. It would therefore be by-passing an essential settlement if meanwhile the ruse that has been played in the Punjab were allowed to succeed. Once in power, the Muslim League would obviously dictate its terms and I write to warn you most solemnly that the Sikhs will not be willing to expose themselves to a position of this type even inferentially.

In view of HMG’s latest Statement, a completely new situation has arisen in India,—and more so in the Punjab. We had built up the Coalition there, after much labour and great care. It was an inter-communal Ministry, held up as a model by the highest personages. The League had not been kept out as is falsely stated in its quarters. On the contrary, it was asked... to join and the invitation was always there. It remained out because of its deliberate design to dominate the Province—and to this neither Sikhs nor Unionists nor Congress could agree. It was for such exclusive communal domination that the present move was made. The proof, if any were needed that their intentions are not clean when they now seek our collaboration, is their refusal to collaborate in the Coalition. For that reason, the Sikhs cannot and will not join any Ministry if it is now formed by the Muslim League. At this stage therefore and in view particularly of the assurance given to us, to which you were a party that the major Political Parties will be persuaded, obviously before any radical constitutional changes, to concede our just demands, it would be a travesty of justice and a mockery of the constitution, now in effect spent, if power is allowed to pass into these hands.

The Sikh case has been made clear to HMG. In view of the impossible stand taken by the League and the mischief now perpetrated, the only solution is a division of the Punjab and the creation of a new Province embracing the contiguous area where non-Muslims form a clear majority as a whole and have larger property interests. The demand was put forward before the British Cabinet Delegation last year and repeated by me in my letters to the Secretary of State after the publication of the Statement of 16 May. Now that HMG have clearly defined the period when they will hand over power, the satisfaction of Sikh demand has become an immediate and relevant issue and it follows that nothing may meanwhile be done in the Punjab to prejudice this demand. The Sikhs have been recognized as one of the three major communities by HMG. Of all they have, almost everything is in the Punjab. They cannot sit by and see another community being given a place of political vantage in their own Province by dubious means.

I make these observations with considerable restraint. Grave issues involving the life and property of vast masses are at stake. As it is, there is widespread feeling in the Punjab that the administration and the Police there have shown a marked discrimination against Hindu and Sikh demonstrators in contrast with what they did when League was in the field. Lathi charges, large scale firings, and other repressive measures have now been resorted to whereas little or nothing was done before. Then League leaders even holding office in the Interim Government were openly encouraging revolt against authority and no one seems to have pulled them up. Non-Muslims have well-nigh lost all faith in the administration and fear that the worst may happen. I only hope not and expect that you will kindly still intervene. I, on behalf of my community, do urge, with all earnestness, that no League Ministry should be formed and immediate steps should be taken by HMG to divide the Province so that by June 1948, power can be handed over to the respective representatives of the two areas.

I shall be grateful if you will please convey the contents of this letter to HMG.

54. Nehru Visits Punjab

Extract from a Letter from Jawaharlal Nehru to Wavell, 13 March 1947

New Delhi

Dear Lord Wavell,

As you know, events in the Punjab and in the Frontier Province have been distressing us very greatly. Conditions there do not seem to be improving. Last night I had a telephone conversation with Sardar Baldev Singh who was in Lahore and the account he gave me of what was happening round about Rawalpindi was terrible. Evidently press and other reports do not give all the facts....

I have avoided the Punjab, as I did not wish to interfere in any way, but I feel now that I must go there. I receive moving appeals from friends in the Punjab and yesterday Sardar Baldev Singh also suggested how very desirable it was for me to go there. I have, therefore, decided to pay a brief visit to the Punjab to meet people there informally and to see things for myself. I intend going there tomorrow (Friday) afternoon by air. I shall go to Lahore first and subsequently I should like to go to Amritsar and Rawalpindi. If possible I might pay a brief visit to Peshawar. I expect to be away for the week-end, returning on Monday.

It is difficult to leave my work and important engagements here at this time, but I feel that everything else should be put aside for the moment and I must give first priority to a visit to the Punjab.

Yours sincerely,
Jawaharlal Nehru

55. League’s Resentment against Congress Demand for Partition
Statement by the Executive Committee, Jinnah Club, Aligarh, 14 March 1947

The Executive Committee of the Jinnah Club, Aligarh, views with contempt and resentment the resolution of the Congress Working Committee advocating the prohibition [sic for partition] of the Punjab and strongly endeavours [sic] the proposal as it is only calculated to deprive the Muslim majority of its legitimate rights, to deal a deadly blow to Pakistan and to worsen the condition of the Province.

The Congress Working Committee will be well advised to withdraw its resolution immediately, otherwise the Muslims will be forced to adopt measures to combat it whose consequences will not be favoured [sic] to the Congress.

The Executive Committee wishes to make it clear that if the Congress really desires to come to a mutual agreement with the Muslim League, there is no alternative for the Congress but to accept the principle of Pakistan and make a compromise with the Muslim League for the purpose of co-operation between Hindustan and Pakistan on a footing of equality.

56. ‘Impressions of the Punjab Campaign’
Article in Dawn, 15 March 1947.

‘IMPRESSIONS OF THE PUNJAB CAMPAIGN’
By Mrs H.A Hakam, MLA, Bengal

I had been keenly following the developments of the Muslim League’s agitation in the Punjab.
On learning of the jail incident, the assault on the ladies and girls and the injury sustained by them, I immediately started for the Punjab. Leaving Calcutta on 19 February (Mrs M. Yunus joining me at Patna) we arrived at Lahore on the 21st. I had not given any information about my departure to Lahore. On arrival I went to the residence of Begum Tassaduq Hussain, MLA; she was imprisoned. Begum Tassaduq Hussain who had received injuries after admittance to hospital came to her house for a day but was re-arrested for giving a speech. This was on the evening before I arrived.

On the evening of my arrival we went with Dr Tassaduq Hussain to the women’s Jail but unfortunately we were not allowed to see our brave sisters who were behind the bars. The next day I phoned the Home Secretary, Mr MacDonald, for permission to see them, but received the reply that it was absolutely impossible to meet them. This was a sure proof of the iron-hand of the Government. I had gone to the Punjab to see the actual situation and to acquaint myself with the events, as the civil liberties of the people were being crushed, and the press was being muzzled.

It was an inspiration to see the urge and enthusiasm of the masses. Even little children took part in the demonstrations. Every evening processions were taken out generally starting from Mochi Darwaza, after a meeting and addresses by League Leaders, and ending at Charing Cross near the Assembly Chambers. Here the police would form a strong cordon composed of a posse of hundreds, with the police vans in readiness. The demonstrators with League banners, shouting League slogans and demanding their civil liberties, would stop in front of the police cordon and would sit down at the orders of their leader in a disciplined manner. Then after a few words, those who were to court arrest on that day would approach the police cordon after a tussle, would break through the cordon and thereby get arrested. After this the demonstrators would disperse peacefully. The discipline of the people was remarkable. Though they would be in thousands or lacs, no untoward incident or accident took place. The roads would be closed to traffic long before the arrival of processionists. Hundreds of policemen with lathies would arrive and form strong cordons and the high officials of the police would be present. On both sides of the road the public of all nationalities would gather hundreds. The largest procession was taken out on the 24th (Punjab Day) when there was a successful general strike. The demonstrators on that day numbered over 3 lacs.

The most remarkable feature of the campaign was the part played by Muslim women of the province who vied with men in making sacrifices. The credit goes to them for carrying on the struggle in all parts of the province. At Lahore in the beginning they marched in batches through the different localities of the city. When the whole town had taken up the challenge, the women would all gather at some appointed place. After the usual meeting and speeches (I had the honour of addressing them twice) they would form columns and proceed to their destinations according to programme in a very orderly way with their leader in front, banner in hand.

On 22 February, they assembled at Charing Cross Park where the statue of Queen Victoria stands. The League flag was hoisted on the statue. The speakers addressed the gathering from the steps. Lines were formed after the meeting which marched to the Government house, the Radio Station and then to the other gate of the Government House. The League Flags were planted on the gates. After the demonstration they dispersed quietly at 3 p.m.

On 24 February, (Punjab Day) women demonstrators were over 20,000 and had assembled from the suburbs and other districts. They had gathered at Gol Bagh where Begum Yusuf Haroon of Karachi was present. The women marched to the Secretariat. There was a strong police cordon with police vans, barring the road in front. The demonstrators broke through the cordon and clambering over the iron gates of the Secretariat, opened the gates and went inside. But the Premier was not there as he had left a few minutes earlier. From there the women proceeded to the Kutchery. After hauling down the Union Jack, they hoisted the proud flag of the Muslim League on the top of the building. It was a sight which could never be forgotten by those who had witnessed it. After completion they dispersed peacefully and went to their homes.

On the 25th Begum Hidayat Ullah led the procession and she was injured by the police lathi charge, after procession had entered the Secretariat. Tear Gas was also used on the occasion but they faced it boldly and dispersed only after they had performed their duty.

The Muslim women of the Punjab by rallying together, irrespective of rank and position, carried on their struggle in a disciplined manner and have at last been successful in attaining their objectives. All marched together—aged women, young girls, ladies of the highest societies, poor women—all on foot. The most marvellous features of it was that the purdah-nashin ladies formed the majority.

Our sisters of Lahore gave us a warm reception and welcomed us for coming to help them from Bengal, Bihar and Sind. It would not be out of place to mention the assistance rendered by the Staff Reporters of ‘Dawn’ and the ‘Pakistan Times’ to this cause by their presence on these occasions and by their Press despatches outside the province, as the Press was gagged in the Punjab. On return from Lahore I stopped for a day at Patna and addressed a public meeting of Muslim ladies. Resolutions congratulating the gallant sisters of the Punjab were passed at the meeting. The Muslim women of Bihar have been very much inspired by the bravery and courage of the Punjab women and they are prepared to make every sacrifice for the cause of Muslim League. It gladdens one’s heart to see the surge of Islamic spirit that is now swaying among Muslims and Muslim women throughout the length and breadth of India. The Muslim women of Bihar after having undergone terrible privations, unparalleled in history, are still ready to sacrifice their lives and whatever is left after the great calamity of Bihar. This noble spirit heralds the attainment of Pakistan which is drawing nearer and nearer by the grace of Providence.

57. ‘Communists Say Popular Punjab Govt Means Peace’

A new popular Coalition Ministry of the Moslem League, the Congress and the Akalis (Sikhs) must immediately replace the present Governor’s regime in the Punjab.

This is the only way to end the communal riots in which more than 1,000 people have been killed, and to restore peace.

Mr P.C. Joshi, general secretary of the Indian Communist Party, expressed this view writing in the People’s Age on the present position in the Punjab.

‘The hell-fires let loose in the Punjab reveal the utter falsity of the promise contained in Premier Attlee’s recent declaration of transfer of power to Indian hands by June, 1948,’ says Mr Joshi.

‘Not transfer of power, but provoking civil war among Indians by playing off one party against another is the imperialist game.’

The Punjab is being used as a British pawn to force Congress to get the Moslem League inside the Constituent Assembly, Mr Joshi pointed out.

‘They aim to produce a constitution as per British dictation and needs or alternatively, to accept partition of India with the British dictating terms to both sides separately.

‘And with true imperialist hypocrisy they call this: “transfer of power”.’
Towards Freedom: 1947

The Indian Communists have proposed a practical programme on which the new coalition should be formed.

Restore Civil Liberties

This programme demands the withdrawal of the Public Safety Ordnance; restoration of civil liberties; and prompt measures against food black marketeers.

It calls also for legislation for a living wage for workers and employees and the control of profits; a ban on eviction of tenants by landlords, and legislation to abolish landlordism, with land for the peasants.

‘Unless a popular Ministry is formed, pledged to such a democratic programme of strengthening the people, crushing the vested interests and checking the bureaucracy, there is no prospect of peace in the province,’ declares Mr Joshi.

The Communists have helped in the building up of all-inclusive Peace Committees in the towns and villages to rouse the mass of the people against the instigators of the riots.

Mr Joshi warned against the moves of the bureaucrats and those riot-instigating politicians who want to exclude the Communists from such committees.

1. Muslim League Agitation Begins

   Letter from Olaf Caroe to Wavell, 22 February 1947

   CONFIDENTIAL

   D.O. NO. GH–21

   2. We had a bad day yesterday and are in for a difficult period. After the Mardan election the League began to think out methods of direct action, partly stimulated by Punjab events and partly yielding to the cry of Islam in danger over the Sikh girl married to a Moslem in Hazara after her Sikh husband had been murdered in the Hazara disturbances. She was brought into Peshawar, and Dr Khan Sahib put her up in his own house, unwisely as I think, and as I told him. She was kept there for several days and gave a perfectly fair statement at the end of it in the presence of her new Moslem husband and her Sikh relations that she wished to return to Sikhism. She was thereupon sent back to Hazara, where to save her life she has had to be placed in protective custody in jail. The League are trying to make what capital they can out of this affair on the lines of the Islam Bibi case of ten years ago, which originally set the Faqir of Ipi going. They arranged a large protest meeting in Peshawar, and took the opportunity of attacking what they call the black laws in Hazara and the methods adopted in handling the Hazara border tribes, and they have been busy in Mardan also. In Peshawar we decided to keep them out of the Cantonment, and we had adequate police forces available, but the meeting developed into a procession of at least 5,000 which broke the cordons and came right up the road in front of my house into the Premier’s garden, again breaking the cordon and besieging his house on all sides. I am sorry to say that the police refused to obey orders to open fire. Tear gas was used, but without effect. The police did not actually mutiny or anything of that kind, but though they went through the motions of loading they quietly disobeyed orders to fire. The mob in Khan Sahib’s garden was dangerous: it broke all his windows and threw stones into the rooms, but did not succeed in storming the house. The old man was brave as a lion, and went out on top of the porch to tell the crowd what he thought of them. He refused to give away any points, and eventually the Deputy Commissioner was able to get the crowd to move on to the jail. In the circumstances Dr Khan Sahib was lucky to get away with his life. I went over as soon as the mob had started to disperse and found the house a shambles of broken glass. Mrs Khan Sahib was splendid and so were his Parliamentary Secretary and one of the other Ministers who stuck by him through the worst. The Deputy Commissioner and the Senior Superintendent of Police (both Indians) did their best, the former exposing himself amongst crowds carrying spears and daggers and managing to argue them out of more dangerous actions. There have been threats that the same tactics would be followed today, and we have therefore turned out troops in large numbers and did a flag march round the city, holding troops ready at the exits and also at the important entrances into the Cantonment, with definite instructions that they would have to fire if necessary. So far this show of force has succeeded in preventing any repetition of yesterday’s incidents, but what is worrying is the proof of police demoralization. It has been the gradual process which one associates with all Congress Governments, but the real rot set in with Nehru’s visit, which had the result of making all Moslem Government servants, except a few at the very top, disloyal in their hearts to a regime which represents in their eyes Hindu domination. I think, too, that the action taken against Mahbub Ali and various others has done a great deal to undermine the confidence of the public servant generally, as have the continual diatribes of that idiot Abdul Ghaffar Khan. My prayer is that we shall not be driven into using military force, for with tempers as they are there will be considerable causalities, and we shall get the tribes down as in 1930.

2. ‘NWFP League Condemns Frontier Government’s Aggression at Mardan’
22 February 1947
Peshawar, 20 Feb.—A meeting of the NWFP Provincial Muslim League was held here today which lasted eight hours. Pir Sahib Manki Sharif was present by special invitation. The Secretary, Provincial League, informed pressmen that the political situation in the Frontier and the Punjab was discussed, and the following resolution was adopted:

‘Whereas the Congress Government have deliberately embarked on a policy of crushing the Muslim League Organization and its legitimate constitutional activities; whereas in pursuance of that policy the Congress Government have been deliberately suppressing civil liberties in every possible manner as evidenced by the unnecessary and uncalled-for promulgation in Hazara of the medieval and black laws; and whereas the Government have intentionally been encroaching on the Muslim religious rights as has been evidenced by the recent high-handed and unjustified action of the Ministry in enforcing apostasy on a Muslim convert under duress which has led to a province-wide resentment amongst Muslims of the NWFP and the Tribal Areas, the Council feels that it can no longer allow matters to pass unchallenged. It condemns, in strongest terms, the unprovoked interference by authorities in the peaceful mass protest meeting held at Mardan in this connection, by the arrest of leaders, use of tear-gas and indiscriminate lathi-charge.'
‘The Council is of the opinion that the situation is highly grave and will lead to disaster, the entire responsibility for which would rest on the shoulders of the Government unless this policy is immediately reversed. We, therefore, emphatically urge upon the Government to call an immediate halt to this unjustified policy and urge that they should instantly restore civil liberties in the Province, withdraw all black laws, and remove all checks on the Muslim convert.

‘The Council has, in view of the above, appointed a War Council to watch the developments and carry on the struggle which has been forced upon them by the Government, in a strictly non-communal manner. The Council also urges upon the Muslim public to hold themselves in readiness for all eventualities.’...

3. ‘Abdul Qaiyum Arrested at Mardan’
22 February 1947

PESHAWAR, 20 Feb.—Mr Abdul Qaiyum Khan, Leader of the Opposition in the Frontier Assembly, and 16 other Muslim League leaders were arrested at Mardan today.

The circumstances leading to the arrest of the League leaders were that a League procession marched to the residence of the Deputy Commissioner, demanding that Basanti, a Sikh girl of Hazara, alleged to have embraced Islam and married a Muslim, should be immediately handed over to them. A day earlier a Muslim League protest meeting was held at Peshawar where a resolution was passed on the same subject. A Muslim League deputation headed by Mr Abdul Qaiyum Khan, Leader of the Opposition, also waited upon the Frontier Premier, Dr Khan the same evening.

According to a communique issued by the Frontier Government, when the procession was returning from the Deputy Commissioner’s office, Khan Abdul Qaiyum arrived from Peshawar. He asked the District Magistrate for permission to address the crowd, so that he might ask it to disperse. When he began to speak to the crowd, however, he declared he had come with the intention of defying the District Magistrate’s order. Khan Abdul Qaiyum Khan, Muhammad Akbar Khan and Pir Muhammad Khan were arrested. Tear-gas was used to disperse the crowd.

4. ‘Pir of Manki Sharif’s Appeal’
22 February 1947

‘I strongly condemn the action of the Frontier Government and will hold them responsible for any eventuality that may arise. I can say this much that an indignant wave of resentment is sweeping the whole of the Frontier Province,’ says Pir Sahib of Manki Sharif, a prominent leader of the Frontier Muslim League.

The Pir Sahib appeals to the Muslims of the Frontier Province as well as those of the Tribal Areas to remain peaceful and ‘take every care not to give a communal strife to the incident, because we are fighting against the Government and not against any community.’
5. ‘League Movement Is Non-violent and Non-communal’

25 February 1947

Peshawar, 23 Feb.—Sh Arbab Dur Khan, General Secretary, Muslim League War Council, issued the following statement to the Press yesterday.

‘The Frontier Government communiqué, relating to the procession organized by the Muslim League yesterday gave out that processionists were in possession of guns, revolvers and other weapons. The Government fabricated this malicious lie in order to arm themselves with an excuse to crush merely a non-violent and strictly non-communal movement launched for the restoration of civil liberties.

‘We welcome what might be in store for us, but thousands of people, who accompanied the procession and many more who witnessed it, must have been amused to hear Dr Khan Sahib proclaim to the world with an air of injured innocence what he knows to be manifest untruth.

‘There is no doubt that some irresponsible persons did not behave properly at the Premier’s residence. But the Muslim League National Guards and workers throughout behaved like a disciplined army.’

Mr Dost Muhammad Khan, Advocate, was arrested yesterday.

6. ‘Aggressors Must Be Punished: Khan Sahib’s Resolve—Ministry Never Interfere with Civil Liberties’

PESHAWAR, 1 March.—Dr Khan Sahib, Premier of N-WFP, has issued the following statement:

‘After having attempted to spread lawlessness in the N-WFP, some irresponsible elements are now trying to assault the Frontier Ministry with the charge of denying civil liberties to the people. I do not generally take notice of press propaganda, but, considering the false statements being put over, I am obliged to state the true facts so that the public may not be misled.

‘There has been no greater champion of civil liberties in the North West Frontier Province than the party of which I am the elected leader in the Legislative Assembly.

‘Every individual of this party has always stood for the rights of the people, indeed, to secure these rights for the common man, we have made many sacrifices. But the licence for loot and violence cannot come within the definition of civil liberties.

‘Everyone knows that the Frontier Ministry have never interfered with the speeches, slogans, and demonstrations and even withhold action when abusive and provocative language was used. But when violent and aggressive attacks were made on peaceful citizens and their shops were looted, the Government could not just be a silent spectator. Prompt action had to be taken. No Government worth the name can tolerate such deplorable incidents as happened in Peshawar on 20 February or in Mardan on 18 February. I am sure the public will understand why firm action is necessary on the part of the Government to punish those who have taken law into their own hands.’—API

7. ‘Pir of Zakori Arrested in D.I. Khan’
_Dawn, 2 March 1947._

Peshawar, Saturday.—_Pir Abdul Latif Sahib_ of Zakori was arrested with ten local leaders when, the hitherto quiet, Dera Ismail Khan joined the Muslim League Civil liberties movement on the Frontier, yesterday.

The arrest of the Pir Saheb has caused great sensation and Muslims, from neighboring villages, are pouring in thousands to court arrest.

Fifty seven Muslim League Volunteers were arrested in Peshawar, when the movement entered in its tenth day, today....

8. ‘Chief Khan of Jadun Tribe Arrested’
_Dawn, 2 March 1947._

Peshawar, Sunday.—On Sunday, the eleventh day of the Muslim League civil liberties movement in the Frontier Provinces, the Jadun tribesmen also joined the movement. Khan Faqir Khan, Chief Khan of Jadun together with Qalander Khan, Mohammad Yaqub Khan and 12 volunteers of Jadun tribe, was arrested today in Abbottabad. They have been sent to Haripur Central Jail.

Thousands of Jadun tribesmen, under the leadership of their Chief Khan marched through the streets of Abbottabad demanding the restoration of civil liberties. Five other processions were taken out in Abbottabad, today. Thirty two persons, are reported to have been arrested.

There were demonstrations all over the Province, today, in Nowshera, Mansehra, ...Havelian, Haripur, Bannu, Abbatadab, Peshawar and Dhamtour in Hazara District. Fifteen arrests were made in Mardan and eighty-eight in Peshawar....

9. ‘“League’s Agitation Senseless”: Frontier Speaker’s View’
_The Tribune, 5 March 1947._

D.I. KHAN, 4 March—Mr Clement Attlee’s recent declaration on India of handing over complete control of the Government to Indians by June, 1948, has, unfortunately, created a somewhat wrong impression in the minds of certain League-minded Muslims to the effect that probably the Labour Government in June, 1948, will hand over British power in India to individual provinces and will leave the centre in the lurch,’ writes Nawabzada Allah Nawaz Khan, Speaker, NWFP in a statement to the Press.

‘This impression, I am afraid, is utterly wrong and they are sadly mistaken because under all conditions and in all circumstances a union centre for India is inevitable and an absolute necessity, because of India’s economical, strategical, geographical and political position in the world affairs.

‘It is futile and senseless to harass Congress Ministries in Muslim majority provinces with a view to substitute them by League ministries in those parts before June, 1948, in order to await the auspicious month of June, for receiving political power from the hands of the outgoing British. If this is not the background of a Leaguer’s mind, then why all this meaningless agitation and a storm in a tea cup in the NWFP as elsewhere?’
10. ‘Make Over the Reins of Government to Real Representatives’
5 March 1947

‘I congratulate Malik Khizar Hayat Khan on the step that he has taken and earnestly draw the attention of Dr Khan Sahib, Premier of the NWFP, to his statement,’ says Mr Ghazanfar Ali Khan, Health Member, Government of India, in a statement.

He adds: ‘The two major nations of India are now confronted with the urgent problem of deciding the future shape of India. At a juncture like the present, Dr Khan Sahib will be doing a great harm to the Muslim nation if he does not make over the reins of Provincial Government to those who really represent the Muslims. In a predominantly Muslim province like the NWFP the present set-up of Provincial Government is all the more incongruous and calls for immediate changes.

‘Since the last general election in the Frontier Province, Muslim opinion there has become much more emphatic in its support of the Muslim League and its ideals. Dr Khan Sahib should not disregard this. Division on party lines among Muslims was not so harmful in the Frontier Province in the past, but the British Prime Minister’s statement has created a new situation to which every Muslim, irrespective of his party affiliation in the past, should adjust himself in the interests not only of Muslim nation but also in the interest of the peace of India as a whole.’

11. ‘About 2,500 Arrested in N-WFP So Far: Court Picketing Continues’

PESHAWAR, Wednesday.—TODAY 40 Muslim Leaguers besides 16 students of the Islamia College were arrested while ricketing [sic] the District ad Session Courts and, according to a report from the Provincial Muslim League Office, about 2,500 Leaguers have been arrested so far in the Frontier Province since the movement began.

Seven Muslim League political prisoners were sentenced today to one year’s imprisonment each under Section 40 FCR and the accused were not allowed even to defend themselves.

These seven League prisoners, namely, Syed Abdullah Shah, Editor the ‘Alflah’, Syed Mushtaq Ahmad, Mian Mohammad Shafi, contractor, Alhaj Abdur Rahman of Sardargari, Mr Ghiasuddin Qureshi, Mr Mohd Akram Khan and Arbab Mohammad Afzal Khan and Arbab Mohammad Afzal Khan were produced before the Deputy Commissioner, Peshawar and were asked to furnish Rs 500 each as security for one year, which all of them refused.

The trial of some people who had been arrested at Mardan has been postponed until tomorrow. The trial was due to begin in the Central Jail, Peshawar, today.

Thirty students of the Islamia College were arrested yesterday near Government House.

In obedience to the advice of Sardar Abdur Rab Nishtar and Mr Mohd Ismail Khan Muslim students had been calm and quiet and were busy preparing for their examinations, but on hearing of Sir Khizr Hayat’s resignation, they sent a deputation of 20 students, including Mr Mohammad Shibli, nephew of Sardar Abdur Rab Nishtar, to Dr Khan Sahib to ask him to join the Muslim League, but the police arrested them....

Processions were taken out as usual in Paniala, Tank, Gonal; Kulachi, Paharpur and big villages in the District, but no arrests were made.
Kohat Muslim Leaguers picketed the civil courts today and a hundred volunteers including leaders were arrested. All courts remained closed on 3, 4 and 5 March.

12. Governor’s Assessment of the League Campaign

Extract from a Letter from Olaf Caroe to Wavell, 8 March 1947

CONFIDENTIAL

GOVERNMENT HOUSE, PESHAWAR

D.O. NO. GH-27

2. Our League Direct Action Campaign is growing in volume, and I do not feel that my Ministry realize that the flood may quite conceivably sweep them away. I had a long talk with them to-day on the whole subject in the light of the alarming developments in the Punjab. The present position is that we have got practically the whole Opposition in jail, with the Assembly session starting the day after tomorrow. I told them there were four courses which they could follow. The first was to go on as at present, with the Opposition in jail, and say and do nothing. This would mean that the movement would continue to smoulder, and might well break into violence under the stimulus of Punjab events, and in any case would pillory them before the world as imprisoning the Opposition during an Assembly session. The second was to make an announcement, saying that they would welcome a return to constitutional processes, to release the MLAs unilaterally in order that they might take part in the Assembly proceedings, and to place a ban on processions but to allow meetings. This was the course which I originally favored, and I should I think have been able to persuade Dr Khan Sahib to take it had it not been for the developments in the Punjab, but as things are I agree with him that it would be dangerous. The third course was to appeal to the electorate for a fresh mandate. I pointed out to all the Ministers, including the Hindu representative, that the position in the House did not represent the position in the country. The minorities have 25 per cent of the members, although their population is only 7 per cent of our total, and in the country they count for practically nothing, which showed that the Ministry had to consider afresh whether they had the majority of Pathans behind them. Even at the last election the scales were almost equal. I told them that there had been a swing-away from them during the past year, and I said that they were always underrating their opponents—a fatal thing to do. They just refused to admit that the position is in fact like this, in spite of the recent Mardan election, and are determined to cling to power as long as they can. They even said that on no account would they agree to another general election before a new constitution had been framed. I told them that I was quite certain they would be forced into appealing to the electorate again long before that date and they would do well continually to assess their position with the electorate. I said, however, that to meet the immediate difficulty the best course would be to maintain the law with one hand, but on the other to make overtures through go-betweens for a settlement, on the ground that the time had more than come when Pathans should give up their internecine squabbles and begin to consider how the various parties could at least co-operate in constitutional disagreement to find the proper place for the Pathan race in the new India. I said that this was my strong advice, but that given the present position in which my responsibility in any case would come to an end little more than a year from now I was not prepared to override them, and they must take the full responsibility for the decision they now took. Whatever they did I would do my best to help them through. They refused entirely to open negotiations of any kind at present, and the most I could get them to agree to was to go on as at present, keeping the Opposition in jail, but to make an announcement that they favored constitutional processes and did not wish to keep anyone locked up longer than necessary. At the same time they were determined—and rightly—to maintain the law, whether broken collectively or individually. An announcement on these lines will be issued by Dr Khan Sahib to-day. I think myself that by hanging on without making any substantial move towards reconciliation the position of the Ministry will gradually grow weaker, and that they do not realize how far public opinion is falling away from them. There are also signs that the Mohmands and some of the Wazirs are beginning to growl.

13. ‘Assault on Dr Khan Sahib’

PESHAWAR, 7 March.—The Frontier Provincial Congress Executive passed a comprehensive resolution recently on the political situation in the province arising out of the Muslim League agitation and declared:

‘We earnestly expect from all the League workers of the province that they should have due regard for the sentiments of decency, fairplay and good morals in the furtherance of their political ideals so that restrictions on the civil liberties of the general population may not remain in force and communal bickering may not be created.’...

The following resolutions were unanimously adopted:

‘The Working Committee has deeply pondered over the present situation arising out of the League Movement and has come to the conclusion that this was going to be the inevitable result of the type of propaganda launched by the Muslim League following its collapse in the last provincial general elections. The whole foundation of the Muslim League struggle rested on the aggravation of communal passions.

‘Political decency was completely set aside. Abusive language was used and irreligious acts performed in the name of religion. Greatly exaggerated accounts relating to the unfortunate events in other provinces in general and in Bihar in particular were given which led to the incidents in Hazara district where innocent people were turned out of their houses, looted and put to death.

‘Thereafter communal friction was caused in Mardan District, culminating in the looting of several shops, assaults on several persons and ultimately promulgation of Section 144 CrPC.

‘At Peshawar, a big crowd consisting of almost all the prominent League workers forced its way into the Premier’s house, hurled abuses, assaulted the person of Dr Khan Sahib Premier and Mohd Yahya Jan, Education Minister, and also damaged the furniture of the house. Here too prohibitory orders were imposed quite reluctantly.

‘The Congress has always struggled hard for the maintenance of civil liberties, and even now wants that there should be no interference with these fundamental privileges, but it cannot allow in any way the continuance of the civil licentiousness in the name of civil liberty, thus giving way to the jeopardy of the people, individual life property, self-respect and honour.’

14. ‘Breakers of Law Must Be Punished: Khan Sahib’s Warning’

PESHAWAR, 10 March.—The Frontier Premier, Dr Khan Sahib, has issued the following statement:
'The course which the events of the past few months have taken call for a brief review of the situation. It has always been considered incumbent on the majority community to see to it that the minorities are able to live safely in this province, but dissemination in certain quarters of communal hatred had led to a number of unfortunate occurrences in Hazara district which caused grave loss of life. Consequently, the Provincial Government were obliged to take proper measures with at least this result that, in spite of the exposed position of Hazara district, the loss of life there has been less than in other parts of India where discord of this nature has raised its head.

'The Provincial Government are glad to say that a very satisfactory settlement has now been reached with the border tribes. It has, therefore, been possible for His Excellency the Governor to release the hostages which were willingly given by the tribes as guarantee of their agreement to meet the demands made on them for amends.

'To deal with the situation in the interior of Hazara district itself, it was necessary for the Governor to promulgate a special ordinance. The Provincial Government had at first thought of replacing it with a Bill but on further consideration they have come to the decision that it is unnecessary to continue the ordinance. They would have advised the Governor to withdraw the ordinance forthwith but unfortunate happenings in the Punjab render it necessary to retain the ordinance for some time. When the conditions permit the Ministry shall have no hesitation in advising the Governor to withdraw the ordinance.

'The Government have always been and remain conscious that every party should have full opportunity to express its views in a constitutional manner. But no democratically elected majority Government can tolerate widespread acts of violence and all those who have defied the law individual or collectively will be dealt with in accordance with the law.

'The public is fully aware that action which the Government have taken against certain people had been forced on them. They, therefore, do not intend to keep any individual a day more than is absolutely essential in the interest of public peace with the exception of those guilty of violence.'—United Press

15. 'Tribal People Not to Negotiate with Hindu Government'

_Dawn_, 12 March 1947.

_Bannu_, Tuesday.—_A representative_ Jirga of the Mahsuds and Wazirs of the South Waziristan Agency was held at Tonk at the week-end under the presidency of Capt Mir Basha Khan. Prominent among those who attended the meeting were Khan Bahadur Haji Majradil Khan, Malik Kutab Khan, Col Shah Pasand, Kaiser Khan, Samandar Khan, Saif Ali Khan, Haji Soheb Khan, Mir Badshah Khan and Shahzad Khan.

The Jirga discussed the forthcoming visit of the Tribal Area Sub-Committee set up by the Constituent Assembly under the presidency of Sardar Vallabhbhai Patel and unanimously decided that the Mahsuds and Wazirs of Waziristan were against the visit of the Committee and were not prepared to negotiate with the representatives of the Hindu Government.

The Jirga passed a resolution, asking the Committee, not to visit that area, otherwise, the reception they would have will be in no way better than what Pandit Nehru and his party had. The resolution further said that the people of that area should not be held responsible for any unhappy experience the Committee may have to pass through.

By another resolution the Jirga reiterated its faith in the All India Muslim League and its full confidence in the leadership of Qaed-e-Azam Mohammad Ali Jinnah.—OPI
16. Governor’s Report on Continuing League Agitation

Extract from a Telegram from Olaf Caroe to Wavell, 13 March 1947

IMMEDIATE

No. CA/I8. North-West Frontier Province situation....On 21st February large and dangerous procession formed in Peshawar city, marched into cantonment, overpowering police, and surrounded Premier’s house of which windows were broken but fortunately no loss of life occurred. Meanwhile League leaders instituted picketing of courts and public buildings and had been defying bans Section 144 in Mardan and elsewhere. As a result of this and of demonstrations in Peshawar League leaders, including most of MLAs, were arrested with the result that with budget session starting on 10th March, main body of Opposition was in jail. Arrests were however made for bailable offences or under security sections and those arrested could have obtained freedom by giving security or bail. On my advice Ministry, though reluctant, have refrained from arrest of Manki Mullah.

2. While strongly supporting Ministry in action taken to maintain law and control dangerous demonstrations, I urged them to open negotiations with League leaders on basis of statement of 20th February before Assembly met. This they refused to do and League demonstration was staged Assembly Hall on 10th March. It was necessary to support police with troops. Mob made ugly rushes and troops had to open controlled fire. Seven rounds fired, 15 casualties sustained of which two have subsequently died. This clash has on the whole steadied situation but immediate result was that 17 cases of stabbing Hindus took place on the same afternoon in Peshawar City. In consultation with military I decided to occupy city forthwith and impose curfew. Portion of British battalion in Peshawar with other troops was utilized for this purpose and had reassuring effect all round. Communal incidents have now spread to villages east and south of Peshawar where there have been some murders and some forcible conversion of Sikhs. On 10th all telephone lines round Peshawar were cut and poles damaged. Trunks now restored.

3. Elsewhere in Province situation in Hazara which was returning to normal has deteriorated. Gurudwaras have been burnt, individual Sikhs murdered and forced conversions have taken place. Main bazaar in large village of Ot Gaj (?) bullah is reported destroyed by fire. Picketing continues and large demonstrations have taken place in districts of Mardan, Kohat, Bannu and Dera Ismail but so far without casualties.

4. Tribes have hitherto taken no overt action and are unlikely to do so if control is maintained in Peshawar and other chief urban centers and flow of food can be assured. Shortage of food will lead to tribal invasion of more than one part of frontier on considerable scale and maintenance of food traffic is the most essential need of the whole situation.

5. I visited all parts of Peshawar city on 11th March and was well received by all communities. Hindus and Sikhs are frightened and stray stabbing assaults by Moslems are still taking place. On 12th March large funeral procession was taken out by League in city to escort body of one man killed by firing on 10th March. As this was outside curfew hours it was decided to let it go. Curfew in Peshawar City is still being enforced. Today Moslem shops have opened but Hindus still remain closed. I am hopeful that if flow of food consignments can be maintained we have turned the corner, but situation may deteriorate under influence of leaders, either Congress or League, from elsewhere or if Congress are foolish enough to send up Advisory Committee of Constituent Assembly to enquire into tribal problems or interfere in other ways. Doctor Khan Sahib is displaying his usual courage but Ministry is naturally disturbed.

Repeated to Secretary of State for India, Governor of the Punjab and Governor of Sind.

17. ““Churchill’s Friends” Active in N-WFP”

Dawn, 15 March 1947.

Peshawar, 14 March.—Dr Khan Sahib, the Frontier Premier, addressing a huge public meeting at Charsadda on 12 March said ‘a false revolution has been forced on us. Today a new party has arisen in the Frontier which declares achievement of India’s freedom as its goal but in reality its partymen are friends of Mr Churchill, the reactionary leader of Opposition, whose sole aim is to create an unbridgeable differences between the people of India and Great Britain.’

Continuing Dr Khan Sahib said: ‘It is very difficult to understand the civil disobedience movement launched by the Muslim League against the people’s Government, which can be removed only by persuading the electorate to vote for the opposition. The civil disobedience movement that we Congressites launched so far were against an irresponsible and autocratic Government. We were successful to the extent that by June 1948 it will disappear. But what this League movement signifies I do not know.’

Dr Khan Sahib also referred to the destruction of public utility properties and said: ‘It had come to my knowledge that telegraph posts and other government properties were tampered with. All this property is yours. It is you who are the Government. Consequently, it is your duty to protect these properties.’

He appealed to the brave Pathans as members of the majority community to assure safety, honour and protection of the members of minority community. He said it was their sacred duty.

In conclusion Dr Khan Sahib asked the audience: ‘I put a straight question to you. Do you want me to resign?’ To this the entire audience, like one man, replied, ‘Please do not commit this mistake.’ One old man rose and accosted the Premier, ‘Are you going to leave us to robbers?’—United Press.

18. ‘25,000 Waziri Tribemen Defy Frontier Ban’

Dawn, 17 March 1947.

Peshawar, Sunday.—A procession of about 25,000 Waziri tribesmen headed by Ghazi Marjan and Akhiajan defied the Frontier ban by parading round the Bannu city jail, as the League civil liberties movement entered into its 25th day today.

Three hundred League volunteers, including Khan Atta Mohammed Khan, Malik Yousuf Khan and Malik Ali Jan were put under arrest while picketing at a Bannu liquor shop.

Sardar Abdur Rab Nishtar, Communications Member in the Interim Government and Mr Siddique Ali Khan accompanied by Sultan Mohd Khan, President of the Provincial Muslim league Defence Committee, visited Mardan today. They met the Muslim League leaders of the district and discussed with them the present political situation in the Province.
19. Governor’s Objection to Nehru's Visit

Letter from Jawaharlal Nehru to Wavell, 19 March 1947

Dear Lord Wavell,

When I was in Lahore I received your message asking me not to proceed to Peshawar as I had intended to do. In deference to your wishes I cancelled my visit to Peshawar. I must say, however, that I was hurt by this development. It was not merely the personal aspect, though that cannot be ignored, but even more so the public aspect of the question. Am I to be prevented from performing my duty and shouldering the responsibility which has been cast upon me, because someone does not like me or does not approve of my going to the Frontier?

2. That someone presumably is Sir Olaf Caroe, the Governor. It is patent that he disapproves of my being in charge of the External Affairs Department. Long before I took charge of this, he tried to prevent my doing so by approaching you on the subject. Subsequently on the eve of my visit to the Frontier, he tried to prevent my going there. The incidents that happened during my visit may have been subsequently advanced as proof of the undesirability of my visit. They led me to a contrary conclusion and made me realize how inefficient and out-of-date the Frontier administration was. This administration had created a legend about itself and about conditions in the Frontier, and it did not like anyone to interfere with this set-up. My experience during the past six months has convinced me that no substantial good can be done to the Frontier areas unless this set-up is changed.

3. I did not wish to raise this question till other and more vital matters had been settled. More especially I did not want to raise it at this stage on the eve of your departure from India. But this new development, which led to Sir Olaf Caroe objecting again to my visiting the Frontier, has compelled me to write. I must ask your forgiveness for this. I cannot continue to shoulder my present responsibilities if I am prevented from doing my work in this way. It is an extraordinary position. Almost anyone can go to Peshawar, but I must not do so, even for a brief and informal visit.

4. I had intended going to Peshawar chiefly because Dr Khan Sahib, the Prime Minister, wanted me to go there and see him. Immediately after receiving your message, I telephoned to him and he again said that he wanted me to come. He further informed me that the Governor thought differently and that he had an argument with him that day on the subject.

5. From this and many other instances it is clear that there is no cooperation between the Prime Minister and the Governor. Indeed there is distrust and lack of confidence in each other and the Frontier Ministry think that the Governor’s weight is usually cast on the side opposed to them. This is a position which can only lead to trouble, as indeed it has already done.

6. I think the time has come when this matter must be faced squarely and a solution found. That solution should be the retirement of the Governor. Sir Olaf Caroe should, therefore, be requested to retire from his present office at an early date.

7. I do not expect any action from you in the matter on the eve of your departure. Nevertheless this is an urgent question and I cannot silently submit to it. I thought it fair, to you and the Governor, as well as to myself, to point out the urgency of a change in the Governorship.

8. If you so wish, a copy of this letter can be sent to Sir Olaf Caroe.

Yours sincerely,

Jawaharlal Nehru
20. Nehru’s Demand for Removal of Governor

Extract from a Letter from Wavell to Pethick-Lawrence, 19 March 1947

...4. The North-West Frontier Province agitation is being kept up, but Khan Sahib still offers a stout resistance. I think we are lucky that the disturbances have not been more serious on the Frontier. You have been kept informed by telegram. Nehru is making a grievance of the fact that I asked him not to visit Peshawar during his recent tour; and has proposed the removal of the Governor. I will send you his letter and my reply. It is possible that his accusations against the Governor may be stimulated by the fact that the judicial enquiry into the conduct of Mahbub Ali at Malakand during Nehru’s visit last winter has, I understand, exonerated Mahbub Ali and reflected on the actions of Abdul Ghaffar Khan and to some extent on those of Dr Khan Sahib....

22. Resolutions Passed at a Jirga in Waziristan

Letter from Sher Bahadur Shah to M.A. Jinnah Forwarding These Resolutions, 21 March 1947

TANK, WAZIRISTAN, D.I. KHAN

A joint jirga of the Waziristan Tribal Pathans (Wazir, Mahsud and Bhittani) was held in Spinkai, Raghzai, Waziristan on the 20th of March 1947. The prominent in the jirga were the following:

- Faqir Sahib of Amakhel, Din Faqir
- Faqir Shahzada Sahib of Waziristan
- Faqir of Shewa, Waziristan
- Qazi Sahib Muhammad Arif of Sararogha
- Capt Mirbadshah
- Col Shah Pasand
- Malik Gulab Khan
- K.S. Qutab Khan
- K.S. Hayat Khan
- Hayat-Nazar Khel
- K.S. Hafta Khan
- M. Khaisor Khan

The following resolutions were unanimously passed:

1. It is our birthright to have Pakistan. The very intention of the Hindus to dominate Muslim India would be crushed. If we don’t get our goal by political settlement, we would have it by bullet. We must have Pakistan whatever the consequences may be.

2. If Doctor Khan Sahib has a little sense in his head and if he is not a traitor to Pathans he should resign [along with] his Ministry and leave it to the Muslim League to form one. The present agitation in the Frontier has definitely proved that he is not a leader of the Pathans but a Hindu-hired agent. We, the Tribal Pathans, warn him that the situation in the Province would be far worse if he still remains in office.
Civil Disobedience Movements by the Muslim League

(3) We warn the Patel Committee on the rights of minorities and Tribal people, to step down in Delhi. The consequences would be very grave otherwise.

1. Muslim League Condemns Atrocities in Assam

Report of API, 2 February 1947
Home Poll (I), File No. 33/7/47, NAT

For Press advice. No. 3 Karachi, 2 Feb.

(Second resolution) The Working Committee of the All India Muslim league strongly condemn the barbarous atrocities committed by the Congress government in Assam, on thousands of immigrants by forcible mass evictions of immigrants from the so-called professional grazing reserves and government waste land by demolishing their houses and driving them to wilderness rendering them homeless and destitute.

The working committee further record their emphatic condemnation of the inhuman practice resorted to by the government of Assam of selling by auction the paddy and the food crops of the immigrant cultivators, thereby depriving them of the fruits of month’s of their sole means of subsistence, and exposing to starvation the families and children of the cultivators.

The working committee urge upon the government of Assam to put an immediate stop to these inhuman evictions and auction sales and allow settlement of government waste lands and excess land in the professional grazing reserves to those cultivators who have spent time and labour in reclaiming their waste lands, built their homesteads and sown crops there. It is a matter of great surprise to the working committee that the Assam government persist in its policy of oppression of the immigrant cultivators at a time when there is such acute food shortage in India, necessitating appeal to foreign countries for relief from distress in this country and not utilising its own productive resources.—API

2. ‘Assam League Starts Civil Disobedience’
   12 March 1947

SHILLONG, 10 March: Maulana Abdul Hamid Khan, President of the Assam Provincial Muslim League, was today arrested at Tezpur, where an Order under Section 144 has since been imposed.

‘Assam Day’ called by a Joint Committee of Action of the Bengal and Assam Provincial Leagues to protest against the Government’s eviction policy was observed all over the province.

A message from Nowgong said that the Assam League Working Committee which met here yesterday, decided to launch their Civil Disobedience Movement ‘immediately’ against the eviction policy of the Government. The Committee drew up a panel of 51 top-ranking League leaders of Assam, who will defy Section 144 and court arrest. Maulana Abdul Hamid Khan headed the list. He left Tezpur to court arrest.

The Working Committee also asked the Muslim League Assembly party not to attend the forthcoming Assembly session.—API and OPI.

3. Report from Assam Province
   Extract from the Assam Fortnightly Report for the First Half of March 1947, 18 March 1947
   Home Poll (I), File No. 18/3/47, NAI.

Political—With the preparations for the Budget session of the legislature on the 10th, there was little political activity except on the part of the Muslim League. It was reported that on release of the 19 detenus at Tezpur the hopes of local agitators had revived, but as the result of the success achieved by the League disobedience movement in the Punjab activity has intensified throughout the province, with rapidly increasing effect on the masses. A meeting in camera at Maulvi Bazar on the 20th February was commonly understood to have decided on a call for civil disobedience, and a meeting of the province working committee to be held at Nowgong on the 9th March was awaited in some general anxiety. Meanwhile Maulana Abdul Hamid Khan, MLA, had been busy organizing a training camp near Rahumari in Bengal, just over the provincial border from Mankachar, and a series of rural conferences. The extent of his success in working up excitement was at first not known, but it now emerges that the ‘East Pakistan Conference’ held at this place, which was christened ‘Pakistan Kila’, organized by Maulavi Abdul Kashem, MLA, and presided over by the Maulana, attracted some 10,000 people. The barrack for the training camp is big enough to accommodate 500 sleepers and a godown has been constructed in which food supplies, badges and the like are collected. At conference much play was made with the doctrine that the quarrel of the Muslims was with the British, and the President is reported to have stated that they should not fritter away their energy by killing Hindus. The eviction policy of the Assam Government was nevertheless bitterly criticized. An official report of this conference has not yet been secured from the Bengal Police.
Local anxiety awakened by reports of this meeting was greatly heightened when as the result of a secret meeting held at Dhubri on the 2nd and 3rd March it was bruited that a warning was to be given to the Assam Government that if evictions were not stayed within 15 days resistance would be offered, and decisions were reached to encourage evictees to reencroach and to export goods to Bengal illegally. A climax was reached on the 8th when the Maulana disappeared, announcing to his immediate followers that he would surrender himself in Assam. On a rumour that he had been arrested at Dhubri the town was surrounded by a very threatening crowd, and it was with difficulty that they were convinced that no one knew where the Maulana was. Reinforcements were called for and sent, and the Deputy Inspector General of Police arrived in the early hours of the 10th. No actual trouble occurred in Dhubri, except a petty assault on a shop-keeper, but National Guards intimidated the Bar library to such an extent that the shop keeper withdrew his case. Meanwhile the whole Hindu population of Mankachar fled to the Garo Hills in anticipation that the little town would be looted on the 10th, when ‘Direct Action’ was supposed to begin according to the schedule. A procession was led out in Dhubri on the 10th which was orderly, though the behaviour of the National Guards appeared provocative. The district authorities were considering the arrest of Maulavi Abdul Kashem, but early on the 10th were advised that if emissaries of the League were given facilities to proceed to Mankachar, where a demonstration was to take place, they could induce him to take such steps as would ensure the peace, and they decided to take chance of success through this manoeuvre. The result was striking. On proceeding later on the same day the Deputy Inspector General of Police found that a mob of no less than 25,000 people armed with stick and had assembled near Mankachar, but had been persuaded, partly through the efforts of the Deputy Commissioner of the Garo Hills, who had hastened to the place on hearing of the alarm, to abandon their weapons at the ‘Pakistan Kila’ and hold a peaceful procession. The refugees from Mankachar have since been persuaded to return. Two thirds of this large crowd were estimated to have come from neighbouring villages in Bengal.

Meanwhile, Maulana Abdul Hamid Khan after attending the Working Committee meeting at Nowgong had journeyed privily by country boat and motor vehicle to Tezpur, where he was formally arrested during a meeting and taken off when it was over. The Muslim League Parliamentary Party, who are still formally abstaining from attendance at the Assembly on account of this arrest, have sent a delegation to interview him. Resistance was actually offered at the Kumolia Grazing Reserve, operations being stopped after the destruction of three or four houses owing to the perplexing conduct of the resisters, who held a succession of prayer meetings on the open land of the reserve. The Magistrate in charge was stopped on his way back to Tezpur with two National Guards who had been arrested after a minor clash with a police patrol party, and driven to arrest six more of the resisters, with whom he proceeded in his truck to headquarters.

The period thus closed with a distinctly adverse set of conditions, the leaders of the Muslim League having demonstrated their capacity to generate mass excitement on a definitely uncontrollable scale, the population of villages in neighbouring Bengal prepared—adequate funds and organization forthcoming—to conduct a series of jatha movements to the distant areas of controversy in respect of land settlement, the Muslim leaders in other parts of Assam content to watch developments while making no distinction between the communal aspect of the matter and the economic problem set by landless immigrants from Bengal, the Muslim members of the legislature abstaining from attendance in the legislature or any other form of constitutional action on the ground that civil liberties were (ostensibly) at stake, and the Government of Bengal, whose influence could not be disputed either on practical or on theoretic grounds, an incalculable. The most interesting feature is that the influence of genuine local Muslim interests in Assam, so far as they can be brought to bear on events in practice, is still in favour of peaceful settlement of all differences. At meetings of the Muslim League held elsewhere in Assam, there appears to be less pretence at making of the British Government the bug-bear.

Muslim shops at Shillong held hartal on the 10th; on the 11th a procession was taken out, during which Hindu owned shops were closed. The public meeting organized at the meeting of the Muslim League Working Committee at Nowgong was attended by a crowd of 2,000, and a procession of about 1,000 persons was held.

On his way back to Shillong the Deputy Inspector General of Police was involved in trouble which arose over the arrest at Gauhati of Maulavi Saleh Ahmed of the Darrang Muslim League Committee, on a request from Tezpur. A crowd assembled which was so large, vocal and intransigent that the prisoner and escort were only enabled to proceed peacefully after a delay of some hours.

A report has been received from an unofficial source of the reaction at Silchar to the call for 'Direct Action', namely, the hasty consummation of a desire to haul down the Union Jack over the court of the Deputy Commissioner and its replacement by the League flag....

4. Muslim League Charged with Carrying Out Sinister Activities

Letter from Vallabhbhai Patel to Wavell, 20 March 1947

Dear Lord Wavell,

I am sending herewith a copy of a telegram which I have received from the Assam Premier regarding the situation in that province as a result of the activities of the Muslim League both there and in the neighbouring province of Bengal.

2. I am sorry to trouble you with this almost on the eve of your departure, but I feel that the position is such as cannot be allowed to rest where it is without peril to public safety in Assam. It seems to me anomalous that a party the representatives of which are in the Central Government should indulge in unlawful activities in a province. In the absence of any restraining influence of these representatives on the provincial leaders, the position of our Ministries becomes weakened for assistance from the Centre cannot obviously be as full and effective as circumstances demand while that of agitators becomes stronger for want of sufficiently resolute action. You will recall that in November last when Abell wrote to me on the subject I pointed out that what the Assam Government was doing was in defence of their lawful claims in their own lands and that it was for you to persuade the Muslim League to pursue a different course from that of forcibly securing their unlawful object. What has happened in the Punjab and what is happening in the NWFP should convince youthat the so-called non-violent agitation is merely a cover for more sinister activities and designs and that the aim quite clearly is to cause a severe shock to law and order with a view to forcing the provincial Government or Governments to surrender to the League’s unlawful demands.
3. In these circumstances, the duty of the Central Government is quite clear and we must give the provincial Government such timely and effective military aid as may be necessary. I am therefore requesting the Defence Member to see what can be done to meet the Assam Premier’s appeal and hope that you will give all possible support to the Assam Premier in his efforts to deal with a difficult and potentially dangerous situation.

Yours sincerely,
Vallabhbhai Patel

5. Supporting Provincial Ministries with Military Aid

Letter from Vallabhbhai Patel to Baldev Singh, 20 March 1947

My dear Baldev Singh,

I am sending herewith a copy of a telegram (see enclosure with No. 13) which I have received from the Premier of Assam. You will recall that last November the Premier protested against the transfer of some military units from Assam and expressed the view that the situation in the province demanded the presence of those troops. The position now, as you must have gathered from the papers and from intelligence reports, is quite critical. There is a definite attempt on the part of the League, both in Assam and in Bengal, to compel the Government of Assam by force to yield to the League’s unlawful demands on the question of eviction of trespassers from Government reserves. It is quite clear that this challenge has to be met by the provincial Government if it is to uphold its claim of being a responsible authority. As it is, our position in supporting provincial Ministries is considerably handicapped by the anomaly that we have in the Interim Government at the Centre representatives of the organization which is indulging in unlawful activities in the provinces. Therefore, if we are wanting in giving timely and effective aid to the Assam Premier in his attempts to deal with a most difficult and potentially dangerous situation, we would be placing the security of the province in serious jeopardy.

2. I do hope, therefore, that in these circumstances you will see your way to meeting the Assam Premier's request. I myself feel that the immediate strengthening of the military force in the area will have a salutary effect on the agitators.

Yours sincerely,
Vallabhbhai Patel

6. Tribals Need Protection from Immigrants' Encroachment

Finance Minister Bishnuram Midhi exhorted all the Hindus, Muslims, tribals and immigrants coming before 1938 to be united against a possible outside attack on Assam.

In response to the question of the harassment of the tribal people due to land encroachment by the immigrants, Midhi explained the land-settlement policy of the Government. The Government would protect the tribal people at any cost and would not transfer the areas bordering tribal areas to immigrants. The tribal leader Rupnath Brahma requested the Government to continue the Line System and to adopt measures to protect tribal people from attack by the immigrants.

In a public meeting held on 17 March, the government was requested to declare the Muslim League as illegal in the context of a possible attack on Assam instigated by it.

7. Differences within League

Differences emerged within the Assam Provincial Muslim League due to the interference of Bengal Muslim League. League Assembly Party led by Saadullah supported cooperation with Bordoloi and opposed the civil-disobedience movement in Assam. But the majority fraction supported civil disobedience in line with Punjab and Frontier provinces. As a shrewd parliamentarian, Saadullah opposed any illegal activities. He expressed grief over the part that his co-Leaguers had sought help from outside. He pointed out that they could not dissolve the present ministry through this movement and that the eviction policy which it has now criticized was earlier supported by the League. He was also against Maulana Bhasani and his illegal activities.

8. Opposition to Muslim League

Extract from an Editorial in Axomiya (Weekly), 22 March 1947

There is intense opposition to the evil designs of the Muslim League in Assam. In Goalpara, Mankachar, and other places, non-Muslims had fled in fear of Muslim League activities. On 10 March they led an armed procession in which 40,000 people participated. Communal riots may occur in the ensuing future and the situation has worsened due to continued influx of Muslim immigrants and the instigation by the Bengal Provincial Muslim League. The Muslim League activists deny that they are Indian citizens. Those who have tried to submerge the identity of Assam in Bengal have no right to come to Assam or stay here. All-Indian identity and provincial autonomy are not opposite but complementary to each other.
Chapter 8. Communalism: Provinces

A. Bengal

1. Plea for Tolerance

M.K. Gandhi’s Speech at a Prayer Meeting at Masimpur, 7 January 1947

Gandhiji said that some Muslims had left the prayer ground. On enquiry he had come to learn that they had left because Ramdhun was being sung. He was glad that it occurred on the very first day of his pilgrimage. It was a matter for deep regret that his Muslim friends should have been upset at the singing of Ramdhun. It indicated the nature of obstacles that must be faced and overcome if the country was to make progress. The nature of propaganda carried on here has been such that the Muslims could not even bear to hear Ramdhun sung by Hindu devotees. I am sorry because some of my friends had not been able to bear any name of God except Khuda but I am glad because they have had the courage of expressing their dissent openly and plainly. This small incident probably gives an inkling of the mentality which had prevailed during the fateful October disturbances in the district. I am extremely careful not to wound the susceptibilities of anyone unnecessarily. It is essential that my Muslim brethren should realize as also the Hindus that it does not matter by what name God is addressed. It is the same Creator whom people worship through many tongues. I appeal to the Muslim brethren to assure me of that freedom which is true to the noblest traditions of Islam. Even from the Muslim League platforms it has been repeatedly said that in Pakistan there will be full tolerance of the practice of their faiths by the minorities and that they will enjoy freedom of worship equally with the majority.

Gandhiji observed that Pakistan did not and could not mean that Hindus in Bengal and Sind should give up their religion and follow the practice of the majority community in order not to rouse the latter’s displeasure. God could be approached through namaz as well as Ramdhun and there could not be a quarrel among branches of the same tree.

Gandhiji said that there was nothing to quarrel over the Hindus, Muslims and Christians. When Gandhiji started from Chandipur, it was proposed that all through his way Ramdhun would be sung. But he thought better of it lest it displeased the Muslims. Although Ramdhun was very dear to him he did not like the idea that his Muslim brothers should think their Hindu brothers to be so arrogant as to march singing Ramdhun because of Gandhiji’s presence.

Gandhiji added that he had been very careful in his speeches and deeds not to offend his Muslim brethren. He would desist from anything that displaced their sentiments or offended their religion. But he could never give up his Ramdhun which brought him so much mental peace. He had come to Noakhali to serve all communities, to help them to live together peacefully and in healthy atmosphere. Every day during prayer, he not only recited from the Bhagavad Gita but also from the Koran, and religious differences simply did not exist for him. He had come to Noakhali, Gandhiji said, to serve Hindus and Muslims alike. But he would be helpless if Muslims wanted him to forgo the name of his God in exchange. As he did not like to parade his religion, so also he could not forgo his religious belief. It was the unity of God and religion that he had come to preach. He could not give it up, Gandhiji said, so long as he lived.

Concluding, Gandhiji pleaded for tolerance from the majority community and urged and minority community not to give up reciting Ramdhun in all humility and without any feeling of hostility towards others. With proper understanding of each other’s religion, Gandhiji said, Muslim progress would be repaid and certain.

2. Report from Bengal Province

Extract from the Fortnightly Report for Bengal for the Second Half of January 1947, 4 February 1947
Home Poll (I), File No. 18/1/47, NAI.

COMMUNAL

The situation has outwardly continued to improve though the Punjab incidents have undoubtedly stirred Muslim feeling and any incident is sufficient to destroy the present calm. The Swaraswati Puja has passed off without incident except in Saidpur.

The communal trouble in Saidpur started when a Swaraswati Puja procession was passing a mosque and was obstructed by some Muslims. The resulting riot was dispersed by a lathi charge but after night-fall arson and murder took place. On the next day some five thousand Muslims from the surrounding villages attempted to enter the town thinking that the Muslims were being murdered and the police was compelled to open fire resulting in the eventual death of some five Muslims. In addition to the fatalities from police firing there have been 15 deaths reported as a result of the communal clashes. Train services were dislocated on the 28th and 29th and for the next few days there was considerable tension. The situation has now improved but is not yet considered to be normal. Police reinforcements were moved to the site from Rajshahi as well as from the Presidency Range.

There has been no serious incident in west or central Bengal. In Dacca city, too, there has been no incident but persons are still reluctant to go through quarters of the town predominantly inhabited by members of the other community.

In Chittagong Division there has been a definite improvement in the general situation. In Noakhali the general improvement has been maintained and refugees continue to return to their homes. There have, however, been instances of returned refugees being threatened by the local Muslims and in the Dattapara areas some returned Hindus have returned to the refugee centres. The question of the departure of the troops from the district is being considered in the light of recent developments. In Tippera the communal situation has greatly improved and the repatriation of refugees is going on satisfactorily....
3. Communal Disturbances at Saidpur in Rangpur District

Letter from Kalipada Mukherjee to J.B. Kripalani Enclosing a Report, 6 February 1947
AICC Papers, File No. CL-8/1946, NMML.

Bengal Provincial Congress Committee

115-E, Dharamtala Street
Calcutta.

Acharya Kripalani,
President, Indian National Congress,
New Delhi.

Dear Acharya Kripalani,

I am enclosing herewith a report of the recent communal disturbances at Saidpur, the district of Rangpur in connection with Saraswati immersion ceremony on the 28th January and on subsequent days. The incident started on the 28th January when the Saraswati images were taken out in a procession for immersion. As the procession was passing in front of a Mosque in the presence of the SDO and a posse of Police forces, brickbats were hurled. As a result of which some images were broken. It created great resentment among the processionists and other Hindu inhabitants of the locality. The SDO who was regulating the procession bungled and mismanaged the whole thing by stopping the procession in front of the Mosque in order to examine whether the police license had actually been taken out for each individual image. This created some resentment and there was exchange of hot words between the SDO and the Hindu leaders in charge of these processions. Mr Saradendu Chatterjee, President, Saidpur Congress Committee and Sri Bejoy C. Moitra, a local Pleader and a prominent Congress leader interviewed and sought to bring about a compromise. The SDO was prevailed upon to allow the procession pass without any late [sic] or hindrance. When almost half the procession has passed the Mosque, some Moslem youths rushed from a neighbouring Moslem hotel and pushed down the images passing at that moment. Simultaneously brickbats were thrown from the roof of the Mosque and some other images were broken and the procession receded in north and south in two parts. The infuriated Hindu processionists then chased the Moslem miscreants and fracas ensued. Some men were assaulted, shops looted and burnt and the whole town was in state of mad frenzy. Presently news came from Khalari Mahalla (a predominantly Moslem area) that some Moslems of the Mahalla escaped from office in duty hours and joining a number of Moslems of Bihar refugees massacred a number of Hindus, some living in Railway quarters and others in private houses. The bodies of the unfortunate Hindu victims were being thrown into a well. Incendiaryism and plunder of Hindu property started. During the time the Hindu Employees who were residents of that Mohalla realizing what were happening outside continually appealed to the Works Manager of B.A. Railway Workshop at Saidpur for their immediate release so that they might be of some help to their wives and children marooned by the Moslem hooligans. But the Works Manager, Khan Bahadur A.H. Khan, a reputed League leader refused to grant them leave on the plea that it would create further mischief. At about 5 o’clock when the Factory gates were opened the Factory workers were allowed to go back to their respective houses. But on their way back they were attacked by Moslem hooligans, when some of them were overpowered and killed. A pocket of Hindus isolated at a spot known as Number 9 offered resistance to the continuous attack by a band of armed hooligans of the Mohalla and hundreds of Bihar refugees (Moslem).

The District Magistrate (Khan Bahadur Ishaque) arrived at night and went to Khalasi Mohalla to visit the affected areas but the first action he took the following morning was to put three Hindu leading men—Sri Chunilal Dhar, Rambishnu Sinha and Kalanya Goala under arrest. On the 29th we received alarming message from Saidpur describing the tragedy and immediately on receipt of that wire and trunk message, we despatched volunteers from here to the affected areas at Saidpur and the local congress leaders from Rangpur, Raibandha, Nilphamari hurried to the spot with a view to organizing relief and rescue work. We also contacted acting Chief Minister on the 29th afternoon and apprised him of the grim situation prevailing in Saidpur and I was surprised to learn that the Govt had not received any official report regarding the incident from the District Magistrate concerned. Anyway, the Acting Chief Minister agreed to take immediate action in the matter and to despatch armed forces to the places of occurrence at Saidpur.

Up to 30th morning about 26 dead bodies are reported to have been recovered including 6 believed to have died of gunshot wounds. It is apprehended that some dead bodies are still lying in a decomposed condition in some wells in Khalasi Mahalla near Saidpur Bazar. The Dist Magistrate and the SDO Nilphamari although they were present in the scene since 28th night failed to give adequate protection to the Hindu minority as a result of which there was a huge exodus of Hindu population from these affected areas and the neighbouring villages. We sought to impress upon the Govt as well as the Moslem League leaders the necessity of starting joint Peace Squad for the purpose of rehabilitating public confidence and morale which has been greatly shaken as a result of recent communal disturbances and seeming indifference on the part of the local authority. From the reports of local Congress leaders and the relief workers engaged in rescue and rehabilitation work in Saidpur area it is evident that the situation is still very tense owing to the threatening attitude of the Moslem villagers who are just waiting for the withdrawal of armed police to carry on their policy of further depredation amongst the Hindu inhabitants. This tension and panic are still continuing although the situation apparently seems to have improved owing to the intervention of the armed police.

Yours sincerely,
Kalipada Mukherji
SECRETARY.

4. ‘Bengal Censure Moves Fail’

The Times of India, 7 February 1947.

Premier Denies Muslim Uprising in Noakhali

Calcutta, 6 February.

Both the Bengal Legislative Assembly and the Bengal Council today rejected adjournment motions brought forward by Congress members to censure the Bengal Government on their ‘failure to prevent the disturbances in Noakhali and Tippera and to take prompt measures to check them’.
Several hundred Muslim students, shouting slogans demanding the removal of Mr Gandhi from Noakhali, the election of Mr A.K. Fazlul Huq as President of the Provincial League and the abolition of Zamindari, tried to force their way into the Assembly chamber. The police made a lathi charge and arrested 136 students who were, however, released later, with the exception of nine who were released on bail.

In the Assembly, the motion was defeated by 107 votes to 74, the European group remaining neutral. The Communist Party in the Assembly voted with the Opposition, while the Anglo-Indian members left the chamber before the division.

In the Council, the motion was defeated by 23 votes to 15.

Repeating to the debate in the Council, the Chief Minister, Mr H.S. Suhrawardy, gave the first official figures of the disturbances in East Bengal, which disclosed that a total of 182 persons were killed and 69 injured in both the districts.

Mr Suhrawardy gave the following list:

Terrible Atrocities

In the Bengal Council, the mover of the adjournment motion, Mr Nagendra Mahalanobis, referred to the ‘terrible atrocities’ committed on the minority community in these two districts in October and November last by well organized bands of hooligans under a premeditated plan.

About a dozen speakers, belonging to different parties, took part in the debate.

Winding up the debate, Mr Suhrawardy said that, compared to what had happened in other provinces, the incidents in Noakhali and Tippera paled into insignificance.

Referring to Mr Gandhi’s presence in Noakhali, Mr Suhrawardy said Mr Gandhi’s object was to restore confidence among the Hindus and he was advising the Hindus to go back to their villages. That was also the policy of the Bengal Government. During his visit to Noakhali, said the Premier, he had found that the Muslims were unanimous in wanting the Hindus to come back. They also guaranteed their security.

While, however, Government were making arrangements for the Hindus to go back, a number of persons, who posed as volunteers, were telling them not to do so.

‘I emphatically deny that there was a general uprising,’ the Premier maintained. If it had been a general uprising of the Muslims, the extent of the damage would have been much greater, he added. The incidents in Noakhali and Tippera, in Mr Suhrawardy’s opinion, ‘pale into insignificance before what occurred in other provinces. That speaks volumes for the Muslim League and the Muslim people of Noakhali.’

The Chief Minister also said that the huge figure of 5,000 deaths given by the President of the Bengal Congress was, in his opinion, responsible for what had happened to Bihar.
Before the Chief Minister had concluded his speech, closure was applied and the motion was voted upon and rejected.

5. State of Hindu–Muslim Relations

Gandhi's Speech at Prayer Meeting, 8 February 1947

NANDIGRAM

Q. The Mussalmans are boycotting the Hindus. Those Hindus who possess more land than they can till themselves are in a serious difficulty. What is your advice to them? What will they do about the surplus land which they hold but cannot till themselves, even if they take up the plough themselves?

A. In answer Gandhiji said that he had heard of the boycott and had made some remarks at previous meetings. He hoped, indeed he knew, that the boycott was not universal in Noakhali. It was probably confined to a few. Whatever the extent, he had no doubt that it was wrong and would do no good to the boycotters as it could not to those against whom it was directed. That opinion was held by him for a large number of years, say sixty. But there was a condition in which he would conceive it possible, that is, if the Muslims regarded the Hindus as their enemies and wished to avoid their presence in Noakhali. That would amount to a declaration of war from which every Indian would recoil with horror. In isolated cases, his opinion was emphatic. The Hindu under the boycott would allow his land to lie fallow like the Australians or he would sell the surplus land. What was best was that nobody should possess more than he could himself use. That was the ideal the society should strive to reach.

Q. You have been working here for the last three months. Has there been any appreciable change in the mentality of the Hindus?

A. The question could best be answered by the Hindus concerned. He flattered himself with the belief that the Hindus had, at least for the time being, shed their cowardice to an extent.

Q. There is certainly a peace-loving section among the Mussalmans. After your presence in their midst, have they been influenced to such an extent that they are able to assert themselves against the worse element in their own community?

A. As to this third question he was glad that the questioner admitted that there was a peace-loving section among the Muslims of Noakhali. It would be monstrous if there was not. Whether they had developed courage to oppose the bad and mischievous element in Muslim society, he would give the same answer that he gave to the second question. The Muslim friends could reply with certainty. But he was vain enough to believe that several Muslim friends had been so affected. As for instance, the Muslim witnesses in Bhatialpur declared that the destroyed mandir he had opened they would defend against destruction in future with their lives. There were other consoling instances he had met with during his tour....
6. ‘With Gandhi in Noakhali’

Extract from Report by Phillips Talbot, 16 February 1947

TWO WEEKS AGO I traveled for five days in order to walk for an hour with Gandhi.

The journey was worth the effort. It was revealing to watch Gandhi throwing himself during this critical season into the remoteness of East Bengal’s Noakhali district for a barefooted village-to-village pilgrimage in search of Hindu-Muslim amity. Here was a 77-year-old ascetic, rising above the physical ordeal, immersed in a peculiarly Indian approach to the cleavage that threatens the country. His quest had both a political and a religious appeal. After feeling the atmosphere around him and watching his pilgrim’s progress, I came away convinced that the aging leader is clinching his place in the Hindu pantheon. Whether he will achieve equal political results in this manner will be examined later in this letter.

In New Delhi one hears sharply divergent views on Gandhi’s latest enterprise, which he set upon while his disciples here were making rough passage on the political seas. Dawn, the Muslim League daily, quickly diagnosed the mission as a flop. Pointing out that Muslim visitors had walked away from Gandhi’s prayer meeting, Dawn scolded Gandhi for grouping Quranic quotations with readings from other scriptures, and its views were echoed by Muslims whom I know. (Gandhi answered Dawn’s complaint about an un-believer’s commenting on the Quran by referring to Quranic judgments handed down by the unbelieving British Privy Council.)

In contrast to Muslim reactions, several intelligent Hindus warned me against underestimating the Gandhi March. One called it the most significant mission of Gandhi’s life. Others agreed that its impact might be slow to appear, but predicted that it would be deep and long-lasting. The reactions of many foreigners and some Indians were less complex. They regarded the aging leader’s absence from today’s political arena as a demonstration of weakness or caprice. ‘He’s dotty,’ was the simple expression of one official.

The region in which Gandhi has secluded himself is deep in the Ganges-Brahmaputra delta, one of the least accessible flatlands of India. To reach his party, I traveled by air, rail, steamer, and bicycle, and on foot. The flight from here to Calcutta used up one day. The second morning I crossed the fields of central Bengal by train, and at noon reached the junction of the Ganges and Brahmaputra. An ancient side-wheeler (one of a fleet of paddle boats that range in age from 20 to 80 years) bent its way for the rest of the day down the, broad, winding river to a stop called Chandpur, where I spent most of the night in a waiting-room chair. In the early hours, I left on meter-gauge train for a small delta land station named Chitosi Road. There the bicycle that I had carted from Calcutta came into use. Tying my bedding roll on the luggage carrier and my typewriter and briefcase in the basket, I set off just as the sun rose. The ‘road’ for which the station was named turned out to be an earth bund about 10 feet broad and rising 10 feet above the surrounding fields. The object of startled stares from Bengali peasants whose language I do not know, I steered along the single footpath that cuts its grass surface. But for me, everyone within sight was walking. Fortunately they all pointed in the same direction for the village whose name I shouted. I couldn’t ride the whole distance. Once a hand-poled ferry carried me across a rather large stream. Frequently cross-ditches which broke the bund forced me to dismount, wheel the vehicle down the side to the field level, hoist it across the ditch, and push it up the other side onto the bund. One willing peasant carried the loaded cycle across a running stream that I waded. After about 10 miles I could cycle no farther. Then, leaving the machine at a medical relief center (which is operated by Communist party workers with government assistance grants), I set off across the fields on foot. In the three mile walk we crossed several streams on bridges that were constructed by laying one or two bamboo poles along the fork made by supporting cross-poles. We managed well except when a log that had been thrown across a book snapped under my ample bulk, dropping me neatly into the water.

Hardly a wheel turns in this teeming, jute- and rice-growing delta. I saw no motorable road. The bullock cart, one of India’s truest symbols, does not exist here. The civilization is amphibious, as fields are always flooded between April and October. In the wet season little remains above water except occasional ribbons of bund and isolated village clumps marked by coconut palms, bamboos, and betel trees. People stay at home or, at best, move about in hand-hawn skiffs. Though some of their crops grow under water, they farm mostly in the winter dry season. Here, in an entirely rural area about 40 miles square, are jammed nearly two and a half million people: 1,400 per square mile or more than two per acre. (I wonder what Illinois farmer could feed, clothe and house 90 people on the yield from the south forty.) Eighty percent of these peasants are Muslims. Apart from a few wealthy families they, ‘have nothing but their numbers,’ in the words of one senior Muslim official. Impoverished cultivators racially indistinguishable from their Hindu neighbors, they suffered severely in the 1943 Bengal famine. Many watched their relatives die while, as is frequently the case, hunger put profit into black-marketing. The tiny Hindu minority in this region is divided into two groups, of whom the more numerous are also peasants and low-caste village artisans. With the upper crust of landlords, moneylenders, grain merchants, and lawyers, peasants of both communities had shared little sympathy for many years past, I judged.

In this closely packed, rupee-starved, isolated district terror struck last fall in the wake of vicious riots in Calcutta and other Indian cities. It was the first real flare-up in a rural area. Roving bands paddled over the flooded fields from village to village, killing Hindus, looting and burning their property, abducting some women, and registering conversions from Hinduism to Islam. Many of those murdered and robbed were the wealthy who had incurred the peasants’ ire in 1943. The movement took a communal twist, however, from politicians (since disowned by the Muslim League) who led the village crowds with the cry of Pakistan. In some villages mobs burned huts even of outcasts.

Frightened and unable to run away because of the floods, many Hindu households sought safety by professing Islam. Their tormentors sometimes sealed the ‘conversion’ by putting Muslim caps and wrap-around lungis on them, feeding them beef, and in at least two verified cases conducting marriages between new converts and established Muslims.

The upheaval, in which the president of the district bar association and a well-known landlord were among those killed, swept over about half the district. Perhaps a million people were caught up in the turmoil and refugees eventually were counted in tens of thousands. This was bad enough. But the effect was multiplied a thousand fold across the breadth of Hindu India by exaggerated, inflammatory reports of what had occurred. The Bengal Congress Committee’s president told the press that 5,000 innocent Hindus had been slaughtered. J.B. Kripalani, president-elect of the National Congress, visited the area and returned describing the tragedy as ‘worse than the 1943 famine that took 3 million lives.’ Avoiding a direct estimate of murders, he justified his conclusion with the assertion that ‘if all the people forcibly converted and all the women abducted and forcibly married had been done to death, in my opinion, that would have been a lesser tragedy than their yielding to force.’

These statements, which were prominently published all over the country, may be compared with final casualty and loss figures agreed to by the Bengal (Muslim League) government, the British governor and his staff, and the military authorities in the area, both British and Indian.
They have now reported that the total number of people killed in the uprising was not more than 200. Two cases of abduction and marriage were proved. Of the conversions which were unquestionably on a large scale among low-caste or outcaste Hindus in the region, only isolated individuals had held to the new faith.

It might be added, inter alia, that these reports must have contributed to the uprising of Hindu peasants in Bihar province during the following weeks, when it is established that the number of Muslims killed ran into thousands.

This was the pitch of feeling in India when Gandhi decided to go to East Bengal himself. A few days before he left Delhi Mildred and I walked with him for half an hour in the sweepers’ settlement where he stayed and talked of the wave of mass fratricide which was then rolling over the country. Although he denied letting emotions affect his judgment, we sensed a feeling of frustration, if not of failure. This had nothing to do with the validity of the creed of nonviolence itself. Its truth, he repeated, could never be challenged. But he could not be happy with the way in which his teachings were being flouted.

To test the applicability of his faith, therefore, he went to the heart of the trouble. He chose East Bengal, and when people asked why he had not gone to Bihar province where the damage was greater and the culprits were Hindus, he replied that the people of Bihar had repented.
Besides, he said, he could control the government and people of Bihar from Noakhali, but had no special powers over the people of Noakhali. In a tiny village that suddenly acquired fame, bustling visitors, police attendants, press observers and even telegraph facilities, the old man settled into a hut and began meeting people, hearing their stories, and assessing the task ahead of him. Finally, early in January, he began the trek that will take its place in the Gandhi epic as the East Bengal March. By now he has established a routine. Rising at four, he finishes his morning prayers, takes a glass of hot water containing honey, and works at correspondence for two hours or so until dawn. At 7:30 he sets off on the day’s walk across newly plowed dew-soaked fields to the next village on his itinerary.

The Gandhi march is an astonishing sight. With a staff in one hand and the other on his granddaughter’s shoulder, the old man briskly takes the lead as the sun breaks over the horizon. He usually wraps himself in a hand-woven shawl, as the January mornings are cold enough for him to see his breath. But he walks barefooted despite chilblains. This is a fashion he started in order to relieve a blister, but continued because he liked the idea of walking as Indian pilgrims normally travel. Clustered about him is his immediate party: his Bengali interpreter, a professor of geography at Calcutta University; a Sikh attendant who fawns as much as Gandhi will permit; a retired engineer-turned-swami; and one or two youths. The dozen Indian pressmen who are following this trek walk behind. Sometimes this little body of the faithful, like other truth-seekers before them, sing of God as they walk. His name here is Ram. A squad of policemen, detailed (against repeated protests from Gandhi) by Muslim League premier H.S. Suhrawardy to accompany and protect the Gandhi party, mix with the group. As the sun begins to climb, villagers from places along the way join the trek. They come by twos and fours or by dozens and scores, swelling the crowd as the snows swell India's rivers in spring. They press in on the old man, while their children dance around the edges of the moving body. Here, if I ever saw one, is a pilgrimage. Here is the Indian—and the world's?—idea of sainthood: a little old man who has renounced personal possessions, walking with bare feet on the cold earth in search of a great human ideal. Sometimes a new arrival drops to the ground in front of Gandhi in an effort to touch those feet, but the big Sikh gently lifts up the man. As Gandhi nears the day's destination, another crowd from that village surges toward him, singing their own hymns, waiting to greet and welcome him. They lead him to his new hut, where three or four peasant women give him the special Bengal greeting, a high, warbling trill that I have heard nowhere else.

This is the Gandhi march, one of two highlights of the Mahatma's day and the act that has captured the imagination of many co-nationalists, and particularly co-religionists. After arriving at the new village, Gandhi rests while his granddaughter bathes his feet. He meets his hosts.
Then, at 9:30 he gets a massage and bath, and at 11 he takes a meagre lunch which is usually a boiled paste of scraped and ground vegetables, moistened with a glassful of hot milk. After another rest (during which he indulges himself in his widely known 'nature cure' consisting of mud plasters on his forehead and stomach), Gandhi works at correspondence and interviews until the time for evening prayers.

In his daily prayer meeting Gandhi meets the world; this is his best platform. Welcoming all who will come to his open-air meeting, he proceeds through a ritual that reveals his eclectic faith. One by one, the audience hears an extract from Buddhist scriptures (suggested by a Japanese monk who stayed at Gandhi's ashram until he was interned at Pearl Harbor); several recitations from revered Hindu writings; ashramite vows (truth, nonviolence, nonstealing, celibacy, non possession, removal of untouchability, and others); readings from the Quran; a Zend Avesta (Zoroastrian) quotation; a hymn which may be Hindi, Bengali, or some Christian song in translation; and a joyous tuneful recital of the name of Ram, to the accompaniment in cadence of hand-clapping. This devotional exercise is followed each day by a talk in which Gandhi gives expression to almost any thought exercising his mind. Listeners may hear of village sanitation, women in purdah, Hindu-Muslim relations, reactions to the latest Muslim League resolution, a hint as to what new course the Congress will adopt, and observations on London's policy. Taken together, reports of these after-prayer talks furnish perhaps the best guide to the trend of Gandhian thought. These reports, I might add, are authentic. While his Bengali interpreter translates his remarks to the village crowd, Gandhi sits crosslegged on his small platform, penning out the authorized English version of what he has said in Hindi. He writes in third person and refers to himself by his initial. 'Addressing the prayer gathering at Bansa this evening, G. said....'

After the prayers, Gandhi takes another brisk walk. Except on his weekly day of silence, he uses this exercise period to talk with villagers and visitors who half-trot at his side. Then Gandhi returns to his hut for another footbath and more correspondence and interviews. Later one of the Indian pressmen arrives to read the day's news to him. Gandhi usually sleeps at about 9 o'clock.

A word might be added about these newspaper reporters. Many of them have been with Gandhi for long periods and regard him with an affectionate and familiar, though reverential, air. Tending their aches and pains, scolding them for their little luxuries (three blankets instead of	wo), he makes them feel part of the family. Most of them would be incapable, I think, of giving him a bad press. They are Indians, and he is India. Yet they are sufficiently human to protest at the need to lay their bedding rolls side by side on earth floors of peasant huts just because he sleeps simply. City youths, they find it distasteful to go through three or four villages in a row without finding pond water clean enough for a bath. Least of all do they like the frostiness of mat huts in January. Yet, clinging to the old man, they find material for daily dispatches and hammer them out on typewriters set up on pillows. As their joint runner must go miles to the nearest telegraph office, they turn out their stories just after finishing the morning march; almost daily, they lead off with Gandhi’s comments at the previous day’s prayer meeting.

Gandhi’s decision to bury himself in this nearly unreachable corner of India at a critical hour in India’s destiny distresses even some of his closest associates. Speaking for them, Jawaharlal Nehru wrote to Gandhi a few weeks ago in this vein: One hardly knows what to say to you. You are needed in Noakhali, but you are also needed in Delhi, in Wardha, and everywhere.

Twice the non-ascetic Congress leadership has found need to refer crucial issues to East Bengal and wait days for replies. During the December crisis, when the party’s high command could not agree whether to bow to London’s interpretation of the Cabinet Delegation’s constitution-making scheme or to disavow it and carry the fight to the country, Nehru and Congress President Kripalani had to fly to Bengal and seek out Gandhi in his remote village to reach conclusion. Now again, when the Congress is pressing Whitehall to eject Muslim League members from the interim government, it looks as if new direct conversations may become necessary at any moment. Wherever he may be, Gandhi remains the high priest of Congress policy. And Congress policy needs more far-seeing, shrewd control at this transitional moment than ever before.

Yet in the opinion of his associates nothing in the outside world will draw Gandhi from his immersion in rural East Bengal so long as he feels his task there unfinished. They know of course, that many people fail to understand why he stays there.

Two answers may be suggested. Politically, Gandhi has concluded that Hindu-Muslim bitterness threatens to postpone Indian freedom, and perhaps undercuts the role India might otherwise play in Asia. Having failed to bring the two communities together through high-level negotiation, he is testing his nonviolence and seeking a solution at the familiar village level. As a Hindu, moreover, he is incapable of ignoring the threat to his culture that arises from forced conversions. Wherever they occur, he must stamp them out.

The first objective, obviously, can be attained only by winning the support of Muslims. Gandhi has consciously set out to do this. As the primary step, he is working to lift Hindu-Muslim relations from a religious to a political plane.

Time after time, Gandhi has told Bengali prayer audiences that Hindus and Muslims must settle their dispute or continue to be saddled with foreign rule. He seems to expect an early end of domination by war-weakened Britain, but to fear genuinely that internal dissension might open the door to some other agent of foreign imperialism, perhaps in the guise of a UNO trusteeship. Gandhi assures his listeners that freedom is theirs to grasp, if they will but take it. This is true, he argues, both at the government level and in the villages. At the top, he suggests that popular pressure can shape any existing provincial ministry into a true Indian government. To give emphasis to this point, he deals at governmental level just with League premier Suhrawardy, whose politics he opposes. Neither the British governor nor the British army commander found Gandhi willing to accept their help; all his requests go directly to the Muslim League ministry. He entreats people to support this government because it is Indian, or to turn it out for a better Indian government. Let the ministry call its rule Pakistan or anything else, he urges with persuasive Gandhian argument; he would not oppose it so long as it protected the people’s fundamental rights. (He always stipulates that Pakistan should not be sought until India is free and that it should assure friendliness to its Indian neighbors.) This is his appeal to Muslims on the ideological level.

Talking to villagers, Gandhi gives full rein to his anarchist instincts. A firm believer that no government is good government, Gandhi admonishes these peasants to live together quietly and to rely on themselves. ‘If a neighbor was ailing, would they run to the Congress or the League to ask them what should be done? That was an unthinkable proposition,’ says the report of one prayer speech. ‘They should in such matters [a solution of their daily problems of life] look toward themselves and if they did that, then their desire for neighborly peace would be reflected by the leaders.’ If the Hindu and Muslim inhabitants of one village can begin practicing what he calls the nonviolence of the strong, Gandhi believes, the path to communal peace throughout India will be open.

What progress has he made with this doctrine? Gandhi himself has never underestimated the task. Writing to a relative in December, he explained:

My present mission is the most complicated and difficult one of my life. I can sing with cent per cent truth: ‘The night is dark and I am far from home; Lead Thou Me On.’ I have never experienced such darkness in my life before. The nights seem to be pretty long. The only consolation is that I feel neither baffled nor disappointed. I am prepared for any eventuality. ‘Do or die’ has to be put to test here. ‘Do’ here means Hindus and Mussalmans should learn to live together in peace and amity. Otherwise, I should die in the attempt. It is really a difficult task. God’s will be done.

When Gandhi began his village tour, Muslim listeners left his prayer meetings in protest against the multi-faith ritual which, to a monotheistic Mussalman, would appear sacrilegious. His chroniclers tell of his meeting surliness in the early days. He was sometimes held up by destroyed bamboo bridges, brambles were strewn on his path and boycotts became blatant. Even today Dawn demands the removal of ‘this unwelcome visitor’ from Bengal. Its editor chides Mr Suhrawardy for observing that Gandhi’s presence has helped restore calm to the district. Several of Gandhi’s followers are scattered through Noakhali villages for independent work. They have reported hostile demonstrations against them and against Hindu families returning to their looted homes. (The earrings of one woman reportedly were cut off her lobes when she arrived back at the village from which her family had fled.)

I walked with Gandhi and sat at his feet during prayers in the twelfth week of his stay in East Bengal and the fourth week of his village-to-village pilgrimage. No difficult incidents had then occurred for many days. Carefully watching faces in the gathering of 700 villagers at the prayers, I thought I detected a spirit of neutrality mixed with curiosity. Some Muslims glared at the Ramdhun praise, but I saw none leave the open-air meeting. They stood passively during the ritual, listened quietly to the after-prayer talk and its translation, and then went away. Few but Hindus trailed along for the evening walk.

Even an advance from expressed opposition to neutral silence is progress. Given the months that Gandhi might be prepared to stay in the area, the process may go further. Gandhi’s personality is strong and vibrant. By direct contact he can often win over the unfriendly and the uninterested. This is obviously his great effort to prove to Jinnah that a single appeal can be successful with both Hindus and Muslims. It may be one of his last exertions against the threat of civil war. And yet, if Gandhi is striving for the magical touch that will transform the situation in this critical year of 1947, long odds stand against him. His approach is that of a prophet to a basic human problem, and prophets work for future generations. It is almost as if Gandhi had already admitted that India will miss this opportunity to become a free, united nation and had started—at the age of 77—planting his seeds in preparation for the next chance. If that is true, he must bear part of the blame for rousing profound suspicions among Muslims during the last 10 years. More than once he has torpedoed a prospective inter-party agreement by declaring a partisan view. But Gandhi is not so defeatist as to give up hope. He is unquestionably deriving from his present experience a fresh, sensitive responsiveness to village mentality: this will stand him in good stead in judging the mood of the country for future action. Yet in the week-by-week degeneration of political prospects, one could wish with many of his followers that Gandhi might apply his mind and heart to a national settlement which would bring inter-party cooperation without incurring what he calls appeasement at the cost of honor.

No such tangled analysis is necessary in respect to Gandhi’s religious mission in East Bengal. Here he is Defender of the Faith, and Hindus across India recognize him as such. Witness the frequent references to the well-known reformer and revivalist, Shankaracharya. This Hindu saint of the eighth century reputedly walked barefooted to the four corners of India in a pilgrimage to free Brahmanism from the smothering embrace of Buddhism. When Hindus today draw analogies between his march and Gandhi’s, they demonstrate their fear that Islam, too, may be capable of a bear’s hug.

To the relief of one Noakhali village Gandhi sent a Muslim member of his ashram, Miss Amtus Salam. She found the local Muslims still acting aggressively toward their neighbors. In the Gandhian tradition she decided not to eat until Muslims returned a sacrificial sword which during the October upheaval had been looted from a Hindu home. Now, a fast concentrates very heavy social pressure on its objects, as Indians have long since learned. The sword was never found. Possibly it had been dropped into a pond. Whatever had happened, the nervous Muslim residents were almost ready to agree to anything when Gandhi arrived in that village on the 25th day of Miss Salam’s fast. Her doctor reported that life was ebbing. After hours of discussion (which reporters said Gandhi took as seriously as the Cabinet Delegation negotiations) Gandhi persuaded the village leaders to sign a written promise that they would never molest Hindus again. Then he put the whole issue into a capsule. According to a report which I believe is the self-written authorized version:

Gandhiji explained the significance underlying the demand for the return of the stolen sword. What was being demanded, he said, was freedom for the minority community to practice their religion and worship their gods in any manner usual with them, and freedom to pursue their normal avocations. Gandhiji laid special emphasis on religious toleration....The essence of Miss Salam’s demand, he told the Muslims, was an assurance that they would use all their influence to see that no member of the Hindu community was obstructed from performing his religious rites and worship in any manner he liked.

In other prayer talks Gandhi returned frequently to this theme. People had told him, he stated one day, that if Muslims asked Hindus to accept Islam if they wanted to save themselves or their property, and if Hindus responded, there was no compulsion. What Gandhi wanted to say, according to the approved report, was that this was acceptance of Islam under the threat of force. Conversion, Gandhiji held, was made of sterner stuff. The statement reminded him of the days when Christian missionaries, so called, used to buy children in days of famine and bring them up as Christians. This was surely no acceptance of Christianity. Similarly, the acceptance of Islam, to be real and valid, should be wholly voluntary and must be based on proper knowledge of two faiths—one's own and the one presented for acceptance. This was the view Gandhi had held all his life. He did not believe in conversion as an institution.

Gandhi and all Hindus deplored the killings in Noakhali. But it is clear that to their minds the deaths were less atrocious than the conversions. These were a real threat to Hinduism, not merely as a faith but as a social organism. Should they be allowed to stand, it seemed to Gandhi, other Hindus might find themselves forced to profess Islam in order to live peacefully where their lands and homes are. Already Muslims number 80 percent in Noakhali, a corner of India in which their claim is staked for a completely Islamic Pakistan. Conversions, if unchecked, would mean the disappearance of Hinduism in the region. And once it were proved possible to ‘Islamicize’ an area by show of force, many Hindus fear that the process would spread to other areas in which Muslims are in a heavy majority. In the belief that Gandhi is preserving the spark of Hinduism against the blast that would try to extinguish it, they are already canonizing him.

7. Gandhi’s Speech about Communal Disturbances

Unamended Version of Gandhi’s Prayer Meeting Speech, Debipur (Noakhali), 17 February 1947

Home Poll (I), File No. 33/7/47, NAI.

Passed as Amended

REUTER TELEGRAM

Press Advice No. 1

Debipur (Noakhali) 17 February: The following is the authorized version of Mahatma Gandhi’s post prayer this evening:

Mahatma Gandhi drew attention to two things that had been brought to his notice. The first was that a complaint, in sending which he was unfortunately an instrument, had been found on enquiry by officers to be without foundation. Articles, which were reported to have been looted, were merely found in the very place where they were said to have been looted. This was a serious matter. It was the second case that had come under his notice. Yesterday some Muslim friends had come to him and admitted that Muslims had undoubtedly gone mad on October last, but though they had not been so bad as the Hindus had been in Bihar, the Hindus were making for it by putting Muslims to inconvenience by lodging false complaints against some of them. They said that the false complaints were far larger than the true ones. That was not the way to bring the two together. He said that all those who lodged false complaints should be prosecuted and severely punished on conviction. If he was the Superintendent of Police or the Minister he would certainly institute proceedings and bring the perjurers to justice. For him, as a citizen desirous of serving his country, he would only be able to do something if the names and addresses of the perjured complainants were given to him. So far he had received no such names. The only case that was sent to him could not be supported when the complainant was requested to support his complaint. Generally, he would say that Hindus who lodged false complaints injured themselves, their co-religionists and the whole country.
The other thing he wished to draw attention was a letter he had received from a responsible person who was doing the work of bringing about peace between the two communities. It was that a lad was molested by some Muslims and that the latter had threatened the Hindus that they were to expect more drastic measures than last October’s after he had left Noakhali, or, which was the same thing, as after his death. He would like to think that this statement was untrue. But he feared it was not. But he did hope that the poison was limited to a few illmannered persons. Whether, however, it was restricted to a few or whether it was a widespread trait, he ventured to think it was wholly against Islam. This, he said, with apologies to Fazlul Huq Saheb, but no less firmly than on that account.

It would be an evil day for Islam or any religion when it was impatient of outside criticism. He did not believe himself to be an outsider. He respected Islam he respected every other religion as his own and therefore he claimed to be a sympathetic and friendly critic. It was up to every good Muslim to take up a firm and unequivocal stand against what he believed to be vicious propaganda.

Mahatma Gandhi held the prayer in front his house here. He had a long walk after the prayer. Mr Satish Dasgupta came from the Haimchar area, walking fourteen miles, and met Mahatma Gandhi. Mr Dasgupta is still busy chalking out the final routes of the third part of Mahatma Gandhi’s waking tour. (END)

8. Report from Bengal Province

Extract from the Fortnightly Report for Bengal for the First Half of February 1947, 18 February 1947
Home Poll (I), File No. 18/2/47, NAI.

...II. Communal.

12. The general outward situation has tended to improve in all areas, despite a setback in Dacca.

In West Bengal the situation is peaceful except in Asansol where prominent members of the Muslim League have been paying frequent visits to the refugee camps and where an office of the League Rehabilitation Committee has been opened with the object of finding lands and buildings for settling Muslim refugees from Bihar: these activities are reported to be helping to increase communal tension in the area. In Midnapore and Bankura, however, relations are almost normal and there were no incidents following the Saraswati Puja.

In the Presidency Division the general communal situation is improving and in the 24-Parganas district Union Board elections are proceeding smoothly and sharp communal lines are being avoided.

The disturbance in North Bengal at Saidpur, referred to in the last Report, has fortunately not had any serious repercussions. A setback occurred on the last date of January with the organized shouting of slogans by members of both communities, and a further setback on the 2nd when a case of stabbing occurred, fortunately not serious. Apart from these incidents the situation has remained under control and confidence is slowly returning, the main problem now being rehabilitation which has been taken up. No incident worth mentioning has occurred elsewhere in the Division and the events in Saidpur have not caused much increase of tension.
in the neighbouring districts. The number of Bihar refugees in Dinajpur has however risen to about 6,400 and these refugees participated in the anti-Punjab demonstrations.

13. There was again an outburst of communal feeling at Dacca, where, for no adequate reason, 11 stabbings took place on 10th, 6 of them proving fatal, followed by one stabbing on the 11th which also proved fatal. Since then there has been no further development and it is heartening that the general public were clearly both unprepared for and dismayed at this latest outbreak. Demonstrations and public meetings in protest against this recrudescence of communal ill-feeling were staged with the approval of the local authorities. Stringent measures—the imposition of the Defence scheme and curfew were taken—and the present indications are that the trouble has died down. In Chittagong Division the general overall situation has continued to improve though there has been a good deal of dissatisfaction among the Muslims at what they have regarded as police oppression in Noakhali. In Raipur thana in Noakhali the repatriation of refugees has been slow; there has however been recently an influx of refugees from Chandpur and about three to four hundred a day have been arriving to Chaumahani and Sonaimuri. There have however been several incidents of a communal nature and the interception of quantities of acid and petroleum in the Noakhali district in suspicious circumstances may also have some significance.

14. The latest reports from Noakhali indicate that the original estimates of damage done were below the actual figures: the number of reported Hindu deaths is now 193; the numbers of homesteads ‘burnt’ and ‘loomed without being burnt’ are now reported to be 826 and 1,340 respectively. Both in Chittagong and Tippera there is growing irritation at Mr Gandhi’s prolonged stay in the area, said to be to divert public attention from Bihar and focus it on Noakhali. A number of prisoners in the communal disturbances cases went on hunger-strike during the period but subsequently all broke their fast....

9. Position of Hindus

Letter from Ashutosh Lahiry to K.C. Chakravarty, 27 February 1947
AIHM Papers, File No. P-107, NMML.

Babu Kumud Chandra Chakravarty,
Secretary,
Hindu Mahasabha,
Mymensingh, (East Bengal).

My dear Kumud Babu,

Many thanks for your letter. I am staying here indefinitely. From the report of Somnath Lahiry it appears a number of villages have been damaged in Susaug Area and numerous persons have been massacred but your report is rather very cautious. I hope this is the final truth. Kindly let me know if the Provincial Sabha has arranged any relief.

Position of Bengal, as result, of the latest announcement of the Prime Minister, is extremely grave. Pakistan is almost inevitable. Partition is no solution. The only thing which the Hindus can now do is to organize a resistance against every act of injustice or wrong, to the Hindus, while keeping up an effective agitation both against Pakistan and Partition, if these be carried into effect. Through fight and stern resistance alone the Hindus can recover their freedom. There is now, therefore, little work for the people who dominate the Hindu Mahasabha in

Bengal for they are not a type of men who are competent to undertake such grave and risky business.

Trust you all are doing well,

Yours sincerely,
General Secretary.

10. Legislation regarding Crimes against Women and Conversions

Extract from Question in Legislative Assembly, 5 March 1947
Home Poll (I), File No. 22/16/47, NAI.

Legislative Assembly

Starred Question No. 744.

(To be answered on the 5th March, 1947)

744. *Mr Sasanka Sekhar Sanyal: Will the Honourable the Home Member be pleased to state whether the Government of India propose to introduce legislation in connection with crimes against women and forcible marriages and conversions?

REPLY:

The Honourable Sardar Vallabhbhai Patel:
No; the provisions of the existing law are considered adequate for the purpose.

...(Notes in the Home Department)

Please see the Legislative Assembly question in the p.u.c. The question presumably refers to the riots in East Bengal when the crimes mentioned in part (a) of the question took place. The Bengal Premier recently made a statement in the Bengal Legislative Assembly on the riots in Noakhali and Tippera in connection with a censure motion. He has given the following figures for offences against women:

Abductions 10
Forcible marriages 2
Criminal assault No specific information.

Figures for forcible conversions are not given. These are the latest figures.

2. Part (d) of the question is for the Provincial Government as the compensation will be for the victims of communal riots in the Province.

3. Parts (b) and (c): The crimes that took place in East Bengal which have been referred to in the question were in connection with local communal riots and therefore these may be taken as relating to ‘Public Order’, a Provincial subject. Since an element of force is involved in these crimes they can always be dealt with under the Ordinary criminal of marriage laws in force. The question however talks of legislative or other steps for special preventive and punitive measures. This would mean an amendment of the criminal and marriage laws and since these are concurrent subjects, the Central Government can also legislate on these matters. But Central Government should perhaps legislate only in matters where the Legislation is required for the whole of British India and not in cases where the legislation is required to meet the situation in one or two Provinces. Where the ordinary law is sufficient to meet the situation Provincial Governments who are not affected may not like to have stringent legislative measures introduced. All the Provincial Governments and Chief Commissioners will have to be consulted before Legislation. Even if the Central Government legislate the question of giving effect to lies in the hands of Provincial Governments.

The question of undertaking legislation or taking any other preventive or punitive steps should therefore it appears be left in the hands of the Provincial Government in this matter we may therefore reply for parts (b) and (c), if the question is admitted that as such crimes occurred in connection with communal riots the matter is primarily one for the Provincial Government concerned. The Central Government has, in any case, no executive authority to deal with such problems in Governors’ Provinces.

11. Report from Bengal Province

Home Poll (I), File No. 18/3/47, NAI.

... II. Communal

9. Except in the Chittagong Division there has been a general improvement in the communal situation in the Province though some reactions as a result of the recent communal disturbances in the Punjab have been apprehended by certain District Officers. In West Bengal the only incident of note centered round the Ghushkhara Bihar Refugee Relief camp where 21 refugees were arrested following the report that the police outpost at the camp had been attacked by a large crowd of refugees. An enquiry into the incident has been ordered. The Janmastami procession and Holi festival passed off without incident though, in Dacca, the District Magistrate had to intervene personally to settle a dispute between the police and the processionists. The only other incident of note in the Division was the explosion of a bomb in Patuakhali early in the month when a Hindu house was being searched for arms.

10. In Chittagong Division the Commissioner reports a distinct deterioration in the communal situation in both Chittagong district and Noakhali. In Chittagong the deterioration has been due to the activities of the Muslim National Guard referred to in the Political section. In Noakhali several instances, indicative of communal ill-feeling, have been reported, notably the tying down and beating by Hindus of the inmates of a house following arson and dacoity and the garlanding by local Hindus of the eight up-country armed Hindu constables, who took part in the firing on Muslims at Sandwip last October, at the time of their departure from the island. The Provincial leader of the Muslim National Guards has also been touring the area and making speeches of a provocative nature referring to the coming religious war against all who stand in the way of Muslim interests. Speeches made by local Muslim League supporters have also been a direct incitement to violence against Hindus—the conclusion drawn by the Commissioner being that such persons intended to foment communal disturbances: appropriate action is under consideration by the local officers.

12. Communal Situation in Noakhali and Chandpur

A Report from the Associated Press of India, 20 March 1947
Home Poll (I), File No. 33/11/47, NAI.

The Associated Press of India
(Inland News Telegrams)

The following is for press advise:

'Calcutta, 20 March.—In a statement issued today Dr Shyama Prasad Mookherjee states during the last fortnight we have been received information from Noakhali and Chandpur that the communal situation there is fast deteriorating and requires immediate attention at the hands of the authorities. From numerous letters and personal interviews held with local representatives we find that loot, arson, attacks and intimidation of the minority community have become common. Unfortunately the victims do not receive due protection from the local authorities. Accused persons who are now released on bail are openly threatening the villagers (villagers) demanding withdrawal of cases, on failure of which serious consequences are threatened. The situation is further worsened in view of the decision to observe 23rd March as Pakistan Day. Meetings are being held and preparations are being made which are naturally having an unnerving effect. Many of the thanas have been removed, and this has emboldened the mischief makers.

Dr Mookherjee quotes from a telegram he has received from Mr Satish Chandra Das Gupta, Gandhi's camp, Ramganj, which says that loot, arson and other communal cases are increasing. Mr Das Gupta adds: Authentic cases are being reported by me to the police superintendent without perceptible reaction. All our centres report threats of violence. Sunday next is rumoured to be observed as Pakistan Day by parading with illegal processions.'

Dr Mookherjee also quotes from a telegram received by him from the Secretary of the Chandpur Bar Association, and concludes:

'I have forwarded both these telegrams to HE the Governor and the Chief Minister and have also had a personal talk with the latter. I have requested both of them that immediate steps should be taken to stop all meetings and demonstrations on 23rd March and Government should take every production to prevent recurrence of any trouble in the affected area.'—API RAP 4 p.m.

1. Communal Situation in Bihar

Letter from Jawaharlal Nehru to M.K. Gandhi Enclosing His Letter to H.S. Suhrawardy, 1 January 1947

New Delhi

My dear Bapu,

I enclose copy of a letter I am sending to Suhrawardy.

I might add that there were probably a few cases of rape and abduction. The number must be small. The nature of the upheaval was such that this did not fit in with it and the whole thing lasted only a few days.

Yours affectionately,

Jawaharlal

Enclosure

New Delhi

Dear Mr Suhrawardy,

I wrote to you a rather hurried letter from Srirampur on the 29th December. This was sent to you in Calcutta on the 30th.

2. In Calcutta I met General Bucher and enquired from him about the situation in Bihar from the military point of view. He told me that there had been no incident of any importance whatever during the last six weeks and that situation was returning to normality.

3. I broke journey at Patna and met some of the Ministers (the Premier was not there) as well as Mr Houlton, the Relief Commissioner, and Mr T.P. Singh, the Assistant Relief Commissioner. I discussed the situation with them and more specially the points raised in your letters to Mahatma Gandhi and in the Bihar League's report. They were all agreed that there was no foundation for the specific points mentioned by you and that the report was, to say the least of it, grossly exaggerated. Some described it in much stronger language and said that there was hardly any truth in it.

4. I also told them about the Atri incident mentioned in your letter. I found that no one had heard of it. Indeed I was definitely informed that no incident even faintly resembling that had happened ever since the second week of November, about the time I returned from Patna. There was some agrarian trouble about the 16th November in Hathiaunda, Saharsa District. This was something entirely different from the communal troubles which had taken place previously, though it took a certain communal aspect. It appears that two Hindu boys were killed and thereupon a mob attacked some Muslims of whom 35 were killed.

5. Another incident took place a few days ago at Masani. No Muslims were involved in this. The police were searching a number of houses. This irritated people there and a crowd of Hindus attacked the police who fired upon them.

6. Apart from these two incidents nothing of note has happened during the last seven weeks in Bihar and in every way, except one, the situation has been returning rapidly to normality. This one exception relates to the exodus of people from Bihar to Bengal. The curious part of this exodus is that much of it has taken place in December, that is, about a month after the end of the disturbances. Further it has taken place from areas where there had been no trouble whatever as in Shahabad District. In Chapra the exodus started round about the 10th December although Chapra had been completely calm for at least six weeks previously. There was no question of the situation deteriorating. In fact it had considerably improved. Yet Muslim League volunteers went about asking and influencing people to leave their homes and generally creating a psychology of fear. This has been done and is being, done on a fairly widespread and organized basis, with what object I do not knew as it can do no good to anyone concerned. There is no question whatever of any risk to these people many of whom actually remained in their villages throughout the disturbances.

7. Houlton, the Relief Commissioner, told me that this was one of the main difficulties he had to face and but for this the situation would be normal. There was no reason, he said, why anyone should go away as the situation was quiet and there was no apprehension of further trouble. Indeed the peasantry were in a greatly chastened mood and often full of remorse for what they had done.

8. Houlton expressed his surprise at the Muslim League report which apparently had been prepared with no attempt at verification.

9. About the number of deaths according to present information available, the figures are supposed to be between 4,300 and 4,700, in any event under 5,000. Patna District was the most heavily affected and far the greatest number of deaths took place there. Some attempt has been made to collect accurate figures for this District and to check them. The Assistant Relief Commissioner stated that the figure thus obtained after checking was 2,700 for Patna District. It was added, however, that after fuller inquiry the figure may have to be increased somewhat. Every one was, however, agreed that the number of deaths in the whole province was under 5,000. They had found that very often refugees had been included among those dead and had thus gone to swell the figures of the dead.

10. The allegations of deaths and ill-treatment in hospitals were stoutly and indignantly denied. It was stated that the hospitals achieved remarkable success considering the number of serious cases that they received and the doctors were of opinion that everything possible had been done. Lavish use was made of the latest drugs and there were indeed very few deaths.

11. The figures for refugees at present are roughly 40,000 in Bihar and probably a like number in Bengal. The highest figure for refugees was 110,000. Many of these returned to their homes. Many who had not left their homes previously have now left them at the instigation of the Muslim League volunteers.

12. The complaint that there is a ban on volunteers was said to be completely without foundation. There is no ban on volunteers and a very large number of Muslim League volunteers are present in the province and they are deliberately coming in the way of a return to normality. There have been complaints about their behaviour. In Patna District the Government camps have actually been put in charge of Muslim League volunteers. In Monghyr volunteers were regulated as an excess of them created some confusion.

13. You mentioned in your letter that Khwaja Nazimuddin was not permitted to go somewhere. It appears this had nothing to do with the Provincial Government. A military sentry stopped him because he did not have the necessary pass. Even Houlton, the Relief Commissioner, was stopped by the military sentries as he had forgotten his pass. This matter has been put right since. It was well known that passes were required and only a few days before. Mr Feroz Khan Noon had gone with a pass. These are military regulations with which the Provincial Government has nothing to do.

14. I might add that even now the Government camps in Patna are largely run by Muslim League volunteers who have sometimes not allowed Government agents to go inside the camps. You will realize that it is an odd situation for the Government to organize a camp, to pay for all expenses and then to have its own representatives treated in this manner by outside volunteers.

15. A census has been taken of the total number of houses destroyed or damaged. Including those, which have been slightly damaged, the number of huts or houses comes to 3,700. About 50 of them are only partly damaged. All these are mostly huts.

16. The complaints about the food in camps, I was told, had no foundation. The food was in fact on the whole of a high standard and independent observers have said as much. The Relief Commissioner told me that arrangements about food and other matters were generally good.

17. There was no question of the ration being cut off. In Monghyr it was stated once that refugees should return to their nearby houses which were intact and if they did not return the ration might be cut off. As a matter of fact it was not cut off. Even when people went back to their villages these rations continued to be given to them.

18. Every effort is being made to start rebuilding houses. Orders have been placed for very large quantities of building materials. It is hoped that these materials will begin arriving within a fortnight.

19. It is proposed also to improve communications. Roads are being thus improved to make the interior easily accessible.

20. The refugees in camp, even though they do not return to their villages, are given every facility to go and cut their crops and return to their camps.

21. The Provincial Government want the military to remain for some time longer, chiefly in order to help in the rehabilitation schemes and in cutting the crops. General Bucher, however, told me that he would like them withdrawn as there was no need for them.

22. I was told that there was still some nervousness among the Muslim population, chiefly caused by the propaganda of the Muslim League volunteers. This nervousness, Houlton and others assured me, was quite unwarranted and that there was no fear of fresh incidents. The peasantry, who had misbehaved, were genuinely sorry. The outbreak was a mass peasant upheaval, and such upheavals are not followed by sporadic incidents later on.

23. These are some of the facts I gathered from my conference at Patna. You will notice that the picture they present is completely different from that contained in your letters to Gandhiji.

24. The Bihar Ministers told me that they were anxious to have an inquiry. It was the Governor who had discountenanced the idea, but they would press for it. They welcomed Gandhiji's suggestion that there should be a joint inquiry into the occurrences in East Bengal and Bihar. Such an inquiry should not be superficial but nevertheless should be of a more or less summary character. If you agree to this there should be no difficulty. If, however, you feel that you cannot join such an inquiry, even then they would like to proceed with their own inquiry.

25. There are one or two other matters I should like to mention. There is a mention of Jayaprakash Narayan in the Bihar League's report. This in itself shows how completely wide off the mark the Bihar League is. One may or may not agree with Jayaprakash Narayan about his politics, but it is just fantastic nonsense to refer to him in the manner the Bihar League report has done. He is a confirmed socialist and is as far removed from a communalist as anyone can be. He was away from Bihar for some time previous to the disturbances and only returned when I was there. He did extraordinarily good work. This instance as well as many others show how unbalanced a document the Bihar League's report is.

26. I happen to know the Bihar peasantry fairly well and have some influence with them. I am quite clear in my mind that the extreme rapidity with which the Bihar trouble subsided was due not so much to the presence of the military and the police, though that helped, but to the intensive and widespread propaganda conducted by many of us as well as by the Government. I left Patna when I felt sure that the trouble had ended. The aftermath, of course, remains and it is up to us to deal with that effectively. But unfortunately the activities of the Muslim League in Bihar are bent on keeping alive the nervous tension and an atmosphere of fear.

Yours sincerely
Jawaharlal Nehru

2. Action Taken against Hindus
Letter from B.S. Moonje to Vallabhbhai Patel, 6 January 1947
B.S. Moonje Papers, Correspondence with Patel, File No. P-25, NMML.

Dear Sardar Vallabhbhai Patel,

I trust my last letter of 11th December 1946 enclosing a copy of my report on Bihar Disturbances has reached your hands. I wonder if you had time to go through it.

I learn from the Government Reports published in the papers that more than 1300, that is, about 1400 Hindus have been so far arrested in Bihar, while the Moslems similarly arrested are only 81. It would be interesting to know how the figures compare with similar arrests in Bengal, Ahmedabad, Bombay and other places. Your office may have complete figures in the matter.

It seems the arrests of Hindus in Bihar are inspired by the feeling that the Hindus were the aggressors, but it is not a fact as I have shown in my report. I am glad to know that the Bihar Government are thinking of appointing a Committee of Enquiry. But I hope it will not be like the Bengal Committee. If the Enquiry is conducted fairly and freely, I have absolutely no doubt that it would come to the conclusion that the actual starting of the quarrels in Bihar was the result of provocations, offensive challenges and indecent assaults on women by the Moslems.

But even supposing that the Hindus have been provoked by the happenings in Noakhali, is it not too much to make the Hindus alone suffer to such an extent. When I was in Bihar, I had personally noted how the people felt the sting of Mahatma Gandhi's accusation against them that they were a disgrace to humanity. They felt distressed and disappointed because in the heart of hearts, they felt and knew that they were really not the aggressors and that though the Moslems were really the aggressors even in Bihar. They were feted and treated as if they were the honourable guests of the Government. Such discrimination was causing great demoralization amongst the Hindus. Would such a demoralization, if cause, pay the Congress Government, that is, the Hindu Government in the long run? It is now certain that the Hindu–Moslem question will not be settled without war. Mr Churchill is at the bottom and Mr Jinnah will not give it at least until the next General Elections in England.

Under the circumstances, I feel that we Hindus will be nowhere if the Hindu masses are thus subjected to demoralization when the real testing time of the bloody war between the Hindus and Moslems come.

But after all is retaliation a crime? So as to reserve the appellation of disgrace. What do we find in England? In England the Britishers say in reply to the flogging of British officers by Jews in Palestine—'You flog; we burn' and accordingly in retaliation they have burnt two synagogues and offered threats of violence to prominent Zionists. Thus retaliation is human nature and no moral crime.

Whatever it may be, I have to request you to take some personal interest in the matter. Kindly speak to the Hon'ble Mr Shri Krishna Narain Sinha, the Prime Minister of Bihar. The Hindu Mahasabha in its session recently held in Gorakhpur unanimously adopted a resolution to the effect that in the interest and with the object of bringing about communal harmony, Government should declare general amnesty.

Begging to be excused for the troubles and trusting this finds you in improving health.

Yours sincerely,
Dr B.S. Moonje

3. ‘League and Bihar Government’

Editorial from Aaj (Translated from Hindi), 12 January 1947.

Communal riots occurred in Bengal and Bihar... But the big difference between Bengal and Bihar riots is that whereas in Bengal the riots were orchestrated, according to a premeditated plan, the riots in Bihar were spontaneous and were in reaction to the events in Bengal. This is also proved by the fact that in many riot affected areas in Bihar, Hindus and Muslims unitedly fought the rioters and at many places Hindus saved their Muslim neighbours, risking their own lives. Moreover, it needs to be kept in mind that just as riots began suddenly, they ended all of a sudden and completely, one week after they began. Today, there are no complaints from any corner of Bihar that one community is being attacked by the other community....

The Congress ministry in Bihar has shown remarkable firmness and readiness in dealing with the riots. It could only have been possible under Congress rule in Bihar that the entire expenditure on refugee camps was borne by the government but relief activities were managed by Muslim League workers—those very Muslim Leaguers who use these facilities to carry out their propaganda and persuade refugees to migrate to the Pakistan provinces and prevent them from returning home. Even then the Bihar Provincial Muslim League has put forth 14 demands before the Bihar Congress Government and warned that if the government does not agree to these demands by 30th January, this will imply that the government does not wish Muslims to stay in Bihar and is forcing them to migrate to the Pakistan areas. If this is not a challenge from the Muslim League to the Bihar Government then what else is?....

There is no doubt that no just government can accept such outlandish demands and no level-headed Muslims of Bihar can support such an ‘ultimatum’....
4. Gandhi Demands a Commission of Inquiry

Extract from a Letter from M.K. Gandhi to Vallabhbhai Patel, 14 January 1947

SHAHPUR,
CHI VALLABHBHAI,

...Now about the proposed Bihar commission of inquiry. It was some gentleman from Bihar who gave me the information. I did not note down his name. Is it not a fact that you, the Governor and the Viceroy are against the appointment of a Commission and that this is sufficient to stop the Chief Minister from appointing one? In spite of all this, I am strongly of opinion that if no commission is appointed, the League’s report will be accepted as true. I alone know what pressure is being put on me....

Blessings from

BAPU

5. Bihar Ministers Should Be Held Responsible

Fragment of a Letter from M.K. Gandhi to Ali Hussain, 18 January 1947

...I am firmly of opinion that whilst the Bihar Ministry may not be accomplices in the crime committed by the Bihar Hindus, to their shame and disgrace, as responsible Ministers they could not be acquitted of responsibility for the behaviour of crowds within their jurisdiction.

6. Nehru’s Apprehensions about the Communal Situation

Extract from a Letter from Jawaharlal Nehru to M.K. Gandhi, 30 January 1947

Dear Bapu

...I am quite sure that your visit to and tour in Noakhali District has great significance and importance. It is not for me to suggest to you to go against your own inclination. You are the best judge. What I had ventured to put to you however, and would like to repeat, is that conditions all over India to some extent are very unsatisfactory. There is a certain disruptive tendency at work, which affects our work in every direction. The whole Congress organization is suffering from it and we, who are in the Government, have no time at all to give to any work except the immediate problems, which confront us. It is difficult to write much in a letter. But I want you to realize that there is in some ways a progressive deterioration in the situation and I feel very unhappy about it. I would not mind so much any number of what I would call external problems however difficult they might be. But when our own approach is not quite clear and there are different viewpoints and pulls, then it becomes even more difficult to deal with any problem.

I know that we must learn to rely upon ourselves and not run to you for help on every occasion. But we have got into this bad habit and we do often feel that if you had been easier of access our difficulties would have been less.
Towards Freedom: 1947

I am worried about Bihar. I made it quite clear to some of the Ministers there that they must ask for a Commission of Inquiry or appoint it themselves even if the Bengal Government got out of it. I thought they had agreed, but nothing has been done since. I do not know the reason for this, and I am writing to Sri Babu about it.

I have a feeling, for which I have no proof whatever, that there is no strong desire for an inquiry. The Bihar Government anyhow moves slowly. The Government has done a great deal in giving relief and yet it has not done it in the right way and hence the psychological results achieved have not been great. There is a sense of fear and apprehension among the Muslim population. Badshah Khan passed through Delhi the other day and I met him. I did not have time to talk to him about Bihar, but I understand that he is not at all happy at what he found there.

I have found both in Bihar and elsewhere very little regret or remorse among the Hindu for what happened there. There is a feeling of justification. Among the Muslims there is definitely a fear, whether justified or not, that there might be further attacks on them.

In Hazara in the NWFP some horrible things were done, though, of course, in point of extent and numbers there is no comparison whatever with Bihar. In quality or lack of it there is little to choose, in my mind, between Noakhali, Bihar, Meerut District and Hazara. They all represent utter degradation and depravity.

Yours,
Jawaharlal

7. Enquiry Commission for Bihar Riots
Letter from Jawaharlal Nehru to Sri Krishna Sinha, 31 January 1947
SWJN, Vol. I, p.112

My dear Sri Babu,
I have received a letter from Gandhiji in which he says: 'There seems to be no announcement yet by the Bihar Government of the appointment of a Commission. I am quite clear that the sooner it is done the better it would be all round.'

I do not know how this matter stands. I conveyed Gandhiji's message to Anugraha Babu and others who met me in Patna when I was coming back from Noakhali. Subsequently I think I mentioned it to you also. I think that the Bihar Government should make it perfectly clear that they want a Commission of Inquiry into the happenings in November last. I hope you will write to Gandhiji on this subject.

Yours sincerely,
Jawaharlal Nehru

8. 'Lest We Forget'

Three months have elapsed since the Great Bihar Massacre wiped out thousands of innocent human beings, rendered countless others homeless and destitute and hoisted the red light of danger as a warning to scattered minorities on their possible future fate. The first confusion and chaos have passed, the murderous hordes have retreated into their fairs and 'peace', we are told, had been re-established.

But there is no sign yet that Authority, either provincial or Central has applied itself with sincerity and earnestness to the urgent and imperative problems arising out of the brutal orgies which it criminally failed for many days to control. On the contrary, a blanket of silence appears to have been thrown on the whole affair to make the rest of India and the world in general forget that great human suffering still remains not only unrelieved but also unavenged through the processes of the law.

Those who have perished will not come to life again, but what of the hundreds of thousands who have been uprooted for ever from the villages where for generations they had their homes, of their little cottages and settlements, of their lands, and such other worldly goods as they possessed? The exact number of the sufferers who have sought and found refuge in other provinces, notably Bengal has not been authoritatively estimated yet, although it is generally known to be in the neighbourhood of 200,000. Most of them had property in the areas from which they have been driven by fire and sword, never to return. What machinery has been set up to take a census of their property, of the crops in their fields, and of the other goods and possessions they left behind, so that these may be disposed of and the proceeds made over to their owners? And yet, this is one of the tasks which belongs undeniably to the Bihar Ministry unless it is that Ministry's desire that all this property should be quietly misappropriated by people who have no right or title to it.

Then there are those who still remain in Bihar although determined not to return to the scenes where some of their dear ones have perished and where they can never again expect security. Some of them still live on private charity, and a few in refugee camps, mostly unofficial. Where are they to go and what about their future? The Bihar Ministry claims that a number of the refugees have returned to their villages, but no figures are given nor any light thrown on the conditions under which they are now living. Our own information is that this story of the return is contrary to facts.

Next, comes the problem of the minorities whom the wave of massacre had not reached but who were searched nevertheless by the fire of aggression and lived on in terror on the terms dictated by the majority. What those terms could have been can be better imagined than described and life under such circumstances is perhaps no better than death. What arrangements has the Ministry made to release these unfortunates from the thralldom of Fear—to present the majority from feeling that the hand of Law and Order also far away from them that they need not be concerned about that all?

Fourthly, a large number of girls and women, forcibly converted and carried away during the holocaust, still remain captives of their abductors. No attempt has yet been made to rescue them although many of them can be rescued if only the Government cares to make a determined effort.

These are some of the problems of rehabilitation and restriction of justice to the wronged. There are other problems as chastisement of the guilty in dealing with whom the Congress Ministry continues to be markedly negligent and deliberately tardy. Many a criminal, known to Authority and the public alike of having openly instigated the crimes or actually, taken part in them, are still at large and moving about freely, confident that they will never be brought to book. Some of them, although arrested on serious charges, have been let loose on bail when they should have been held in custody. On the other hand, many relatives of massacred people have been arrested and kept in jail for having merely exercised the right of self-defence and heroically resisted attacks by overwhelming odds.

Finally, no Commission of Inquiry has yet been set up to hold an independent investigation into the greatest of all massacres within living memory in India or anywhere else in the world. Meanwhile, traces of the crimes committed are being obliterated and evidence destroyed.

This is the situation in Bihar after three months of the terrible happenings of October–November. Sir, Hugh Dow, the Governor, has proved utterly incompetent, callous and unworthy of the position he holds. The Viceroy has proved hardly any better, although he had been very early acquainted with the real state of affairs, not only through the League deputation headed by Khwaja Nazimuddin which met him in the middle of November, but also through a member of his personal staff who investigated the situation on the spot.

Nor can we say that, great though has been the initial work done by its members individually and collectively, notably by its President, Khwaja Nazimuddin, the Central Relief committee appointed by the Qaed-e-Azam has sustained its drive. The public, at any rate, has not heard much of its recent activities. A complete statement by the Committee of the work done, of what is planned for the future and of the complications created by the Congress Ministry’s obvious policy, is overdue.

9. Bihari Muslim Refugees Must Return
Letter from Vallabhbhai Patel to Sri Krishna Sinha, 2 February 1947

New Delhi

My dear Sri Babu,

Since you left Delhi, I have not heard anything from you about the situation in Bihar. It causes continuous anxiety and unless vigorous efforts are made to set right the communal situation, you might find yourself in trouble. It is not enough that there is no more violence taking place. What is wanted is to tackle vigorously the question of refugees. They must be persuaded to go back to their villages, and for that purpose the first thing to be done is to get them out of the control and influence of the Muslim League and take the entire relief and rehabilitation work under the control of Government. You may find difficulties in doing so. Your own people may give you trouble, but you have to face it and deal with this situation firmly.

2. I suggest that you must give this work to your Momin Minister, [Abdul] Qayum Ansari, who is capable of handling this situation effectively and firmly. He can put in a large number of Momin Muslim volunteers and he could defy the League. In this matter, Mahmood may be an obstacle, but you have to overrule him.

3. I understand that Ansari is in charge of the Cottage Industries Department. If it is so, it is more appropriate that he should be allowed to handle relief and rehabilitation work of the refugees. Besides, he should be given the control and distribution of yarn. Yarn would be the principal factor in developing the cottage industry. Why yarn is given to another Minister I cannot understand.

4. What is going on about the appointment of an enquiry about the Bihar communal riots, and what do you propose to do in this matter? I understand Jawaharlal had spoken to you about it. Do not think that he has abandoned the idea, but if there are any difficulties, it is better that they should be explained to him and you should put yourself in the right. As Bapu had asked you to appoint an inquiry, perhaps in future the question may arise when they may all turn down against you, and therefore it is better to clear up this matter in time.

5. I should like to know the number of refugees in Bihar, in what camps they are kept and what are the arrangements made for their relief and rehabilitation.

6. I should also like to know how many people have gone to Bengal and to other places. Also whether the refugees are going back now to their villages, or they are still afraid of returning to their places. Vigorous efforts should be made to remove their apprehensions about any possible danger to life or property in case of their return to their villages. Mere increase in the police force is not enough. The Hindu villagers must be persuaded to change their attitude and they must give an assurance to the refugees for their safety.

7. I am told that your Governor has complained that your Ministry is not fulfilling the undertaking given in the matter of the war service candidates. I understand that the matter is to be considered in your Cabinet shortly. All provincial ministries have fulfilled their undertaking, and it would not be wise for you, particularly in your difficult situation, to give any legitimate cause for a breach of undertaking on behalf of Government. Please write to me about it.

Yours sincerely,
Vallabhbhai Patel

10. Muslim League Condemns Bihar Riots

Home Poll (I), File No. 33/7/47, NAI.

THE ASSOCIATED PRESS OF INDIA
(INLAND NEWS TELEGRAMS)
KARACHI NUMBER ELEVEN (GENERAL)
KARACHI

FOURTH AND LAST RESOLUTION. THE WORKING COMMITTEE OF THE ALL INDIA MUSLIM LEAGUE EXPRESS THEIR DEEP SENSE OF SORROW, GRIEF AND HORROR AT THE GREAT BIHAR MASS SAUGHTER (slaughter) OF THE MUSLIMS IN TENS OF THOUSANDS AND ON THE MOST INHUMAN BARBARITIES PERPETRATED AGAINST THEIR MEN, WOMEN AND CHILDREN ON AN UNPRECEDENTED SCALE. THE WORKING COMMITTEE CONVEY THEIR PROFOUND AND HEARTFELT SYMPATHIES TO THE BIHAR MUSLIM IN GENERAL AND TO THOSE IN PARTICULAR WHOSE RELATIONS HAVE BEEN KILLED OR INJURED AND ASSURE THE SUFFERERS, REFUGEES AND SURVIVORS OF EVERY POSSIBLE HELP FROM MUSLIM INDIA FOR THEIR REHABILITATION.

THE WORKING COMMITTEE MOST STRONGLY CONDEMN THE BIHAR GOVERNMENT FOR THEIR UTTER FAILURE TO GIVE PROTECTION TO THE MUSLIMS FOR OVER TWO WEEKS WHEN ALL CONCEIVABLE METHODS OF OPPRESSION WERE ALLOWED TO BE PERPETRATED AGAINST MEN, WOMEN AND CHILDREN. IN MANY CASES UNDER THE CLOSEST POSSIBLE VICINITY OF THE THANAS AND OFTEN IN PRESENCE OF POLICE OFFICIALS. EVEN NOW AFTER THE CARNAGE, THE CONGRESS GOVERNMENT HAVE NOT TAKEN STEPS TO ALLAY THE FEARS OF THE SUFFERERS BY TAKING DRASTIC ACTION AGAINST THE CULPRITS AND IMPLEMENTING SCHEMES WHICH MAY INSTILL CONFIDENCE IN THE MINDS OF THE AFFECTED MUSLIMS OF BIHAR. THE BIHAR GOVERNMENT SHOULD REALIZE THAT THOSE MUSLIMS WHOSE HOUSES HAVE BEEN DESTROYED AND WHOSE RELATIONS HAVE BEEN BUTCHERED MAIMED AND INJURED CANNOT BE EXPECTED TO RETURN TO THEIR VILLAGES AND PROVISION MUST BE MADE FOR THEM BY EXCHANGE OF LANDS OR ACQUISITION OF LANDS OR OTHERWISE TO SETTLE THEM IN AREAS WHERE MUSLIMS STILL CONTINUE TO LIVE AND WHERE THEY ARE IN SUFFICIENT NUMBERS TO PROTECT THEMSELVES AGAINST REPETITION OF SUCH INDENTS. (INCIDENTS.)

THE WORKING COMMITTEE OF THE ALL INDIA MUSLIM LEAGUE FURTHER DEMAND THAT THE BIHAR MINISTER SHOULD IMMEDIATELY ADOPT THE FOLLOWING STEPS FOR THE PREVENTION AND AGAINST THE REPETITION OF SUCH CARNAGE:

1. ARREST AND DETENTION IN JAIL OF MURDERERS AND CULPRITS OF HEINOUS OFFENCES WHO ARE STILL ROAMING ABOUT FREELY APPLAUDING THEIR MISDEEDS AND CANCELLATION OF BAIL IN ALL SUCH CASES AND THEIR TRIAL BY SPECIAL TRIBUNALS.
2. IMPOSITION OF PUNITIVE TAX OR COLLECTIVE FINES ON THE MAJORITY COMMUNITY IN THE AFFECTED AREAS AND BINDING DOWN OF INSTIGATORS AND THOSE FROM WHOM THERE IS FURTHER APPREHENSION AS DETERRENT AND PREVENTIVE MEASURED TO PREVENT RECURRENCE OF SUCH CARNAGE.

11. ‘Hindu Mentality’ Strong in Bihar Ministry
Letter from M.K. Gandhi to Syed Mahmud, 5 February 1947

KAZIRKHIL CAMP
P.O. RAMGUNJ, NOAKHALI.

BHAI MAHMUD,

The Secretary of the Muslim League has written to me. An extract from that letter is as follows:

I have reports that the Hindu mentality is so strong in the Congress Cabinet of the Bihar Government that even a Muslim colleague is avoided. I am told that Maulana Abul Kalam Azad and Dr Rajendra Prasad decided that Dr Mahmood be entrusted with the relief operations in Bihar to inspire the lost Muslim confidence, still he is kept at arms length.

Please write to me whether this is correct and if it is what you have done in the matter. The Secretary further writes:

One of your Ministers who undertook tour of the affected areas is Dr Mahmood. He can give you a true idea of the brutalities and damages. We do not want to exaggerate the facts. They are of such enormity that no one can honestly minimize their impact. Even now the Government is callously indifferent. They have lost the confidence of the Bihar Muslims.

Please let me know all the facts.
12. Patel against an Inquiry Commission
Letter from M.K. Gandhi to Vallabhbhai Patel, 5 February 1947
_CWMG_, Volume LXXXVI, pp. 431–2.

CHI VALLABHBHAI,

...I hear that your opposition is reported to be the reason why the Bihar Ministry does not appoint an inquiry commission.¹ I do not believe the story, but I bring it to your notice. If a commission is not appointed, it will do great harm. The Ministry will be regarded as guilty. If their work has been above board, what harm can the Commission do to them? Considerable pressure is being exerted on me, but I do not go because I have reposed confidence in the Ministers. But if a Commission is not appointed after all, I shall have no choice but to go to Bihar.

Blessings from

BAPU

¹ In his reply dated February 10, the addressee wrote: ‘Who told you I have a hand in the non-appointment of a Commission of Inquiry in Bihar? I do hold the opinion that there is no gain but only harm if the Commission is appointed. If in spite of it a Commission is appointed, how can I prevent it? .... The Bihar Governor is behind the non-appointment of the Commission. The Viceroy, too, does not want it.’ (footnote as in original)

13. Appeal by L.B. Bhopatkar for Defence of Bihar Hindus
Statement by All India Hindu Mahasabha President, 14 February 1947
AIHM Papers, File No. C-165, NMML.

I, as the President of the All India Hindu Mahasabha, whole-heartedly support the appeal made and request the Hindu public at large to run to the rescue or their ill-starred brethren in Bihar. On reports received by me from disinterested persons and quarters as regards the happenings in Bihar. I feel no hesitation in saying that the Hindus in Bihar, who are proposed to be hauled up on criminal courts on charges of the commission of heinous offences, were more sinned against than sinners themselves. It is really regrettable that the Bihar Government should have fallen an easy victim to the efforts of the Muslim propagandists to exploit the situation. The Hindus of Bihar particularly residing in the village have already terribly suffered at the hands of the different governmental agencies, and to prosecute them now and to fine them collectively will mean, to all intents and purposes, to crush ruthlessly all village life, and to throw their helpless dependents to the tender mercies of the Muslims fanatics. It is therefore, the pious duty of every Hindu to render his co-religionists in Bihar all the help he is capable of and to rescue them from the catastrophe which threatens to engulf them.

President
All India Hindu Mahasabha,
New Delhi

.....
An Appeal, for the defence and protection of the Hindus in Bihar

The Muslim League propagandists are not tired of making out that the Hindus of Bihar are so santonly aggressive that the life and property of no Musalman are safe in the Province. The Congress Government, whose policy of appeasing the Muslims at the cost of the Hindus is too well-known to be recounted, has spent lakhs in giving the Musalmans relief and is going to spend several lakhs more to rehabilitate them out of the public ex-chequer, contribution to which is mostly from the Hindus of the Province. The Hindus, who had equally suffered during the disturbances brought about by the obnoxious and aggressive activities of the Muslim League, were not or only denied help but are now being threatened with the imposition of collective fines and institution of Criminal cases on charges of murder, arson, loot, and others. Our information is that a large number of Hindu inhabitants of the villages round about those where the disturbances broke out have been falsely implicated and their number will exceed a lakh. How many of them will be ultimately put on trial is yet to be seen. If the cases are not properly defended a large number of innocent persons will be in the danger of being sentenced to death, transportation for life and hard labour for a long period. Apart from these, the Hindus who have lost their property or earning-member of their family are to be looked after. The attempt of the Muslim League who are working behind the scenes is not only to demoralize the Hindu residents of Bihar but to exploit the situation of helplessness that will be brought about if the leaders and bread-earners in the Hindu families of the rural areas are removed from their midst through sentences in wholesale criminal cases. If things are allowed to drift and the cases go undefended the apprehension is that there will be only women and children left in many villages with the result that can be better imagine than described.

In Bihar, a Committee called the Bihar Hindu Relief and Protection Board, with Mr Nawalkishore Prasad No.1 Advocate as its Chairman, has been formed under the auspices of the Bihar Provincial Hindu Sabha by Dr Shyama Prasad Mookerjee during his last visit to Patna. But the magnitude of the task is such that in the present situation prevailing in the Province enough fund to cope with it cannot be raised from the province alone. We, therefore, appeal to all those Hindus throughout the country who appreciate the sacrifice and sufferings of the Hindus of Bihar to subscribe liberally to the fund and send their generous contribution to Mr R.C. Pandit the Manager of the Bank of Behar, Patna, who is the Treasurer of the Board. Intimations of the sum donated may also be sent to Kumar Ganganand Sinha MLC, President, Bihar Provincial Hindu Sabha, Darbhaga and Mr Nawal Kishore Prasad No.1, Advocate, Chairman of the Bihar Hindu Relief and Protection Board, Kadamkuan, Patna. We trust that the Hindu Sabha organization of the whole country will co-operate with us in the matter and earn the gratitude of their innumerable brethren in Bihar. It must be remembered that charity delayed is charity denied.

Kumar Ganganand Sinha,
President,
Bihar Provincial Hindu Sabha.

14. ‘League No-Confidence Motion against Bihar Ministry Moved’

Patna, Thursday.—The no-confidence motion tabled on 6 February by Mr S.M. Ismail, Leader of the opposition and the Leader of the Muslim League Party in the Bihar Assembly, against the Council of Ministers of Bihar for the policy which was being consistently followed by them before, during and after the recent communal disturbances in the province, was moved in the Bihar Assembly yesterday.

This is the first no-confidence motion brought against a Congress Ministry in India.

Before moving it for the consideration of the House, Mr Ismail wanted to know the period of time that would be given for discussion. Mr Sri Krishna Sinha, the Leader of the House, replying to his query stated that he could just visualize the intensity of feeling behind the motion and did not want, therefore, to stand in the way of the Muslim League members to have their say although he would have like to finish the debate the same day.

However, he stated that if the Muslim League members wanted to have another day for the discussion he would not have any objection.

It was decided ultimately to have a two-day debate on the motion.

There was an unusual influx of visitors in the visitor’s gallery yesterday. The rush was so great that some pieces of furniture were broken and there was invasion even on the Press gallery which could not be stopped by the police.

Ladies and young girls in colourful sarees filled the women gallery to its utmost capacity and followed the speeches keenly. Some ladies in burqa were also present.

There was a flutter in the House and the visitor’s galleries, when Mr Amin Ahmed, former member of the Indian Civil Service, stood up to speak in support of the motion after its mover Mr S.M. Ismail.

Mr S.M. Ismail, mover of the no-confidence motion, blamed the Government and its officers for not taking steps in time for preventing what he characterized as the Great Bihar Killing and narrated the history of the communal trouble in the province.

Soon after the Congress Government was formed the Ramnavmi festivals were marked in some parts of the province by minor communal riots, after some time in the capital of the Province itself.

Mr Jaiprakash Narain was taken out in a procession in Patna city in which, the member alleged, slogans inciting the people against the minority community were raised.

Then followed the riots in village Andhana in Bihar Sharif, which formed the subject of an adjournment motion in the last session of the Assembly and the first major communal trouble occurred in Beniabad in Muzaffarpur district in the fag end of September, 1946, and culminated in the series of communal disturbances which had no parallel in history.

It was no pleasure for him, said Mr Ismail, to make allegations against the minority, but what had happened in Bihar must make the Ministers hang their heads in shame. He did not want to discuss the conduct of the Governor on the floor of the House but maintained that he also failed completely in the discharge of his duty.

Inquiry Demanded

Mr Ismail demanded that the Government should appoint an impartial tribunal to investigate into the disturbances; to entrust Muslim officers with the investigation of riot cases; to hunt down the criminals responsible for the disturbances; to equip at least 10 per cent of the Muslims with arms, and to take steps for the concentration of Muslims in larger pockets.

If the Bihar Government wanted their rehabilitation measures to succeed and wanted to discourage emigration of Muslim population from Bihar they must concede these minimum demands.

‘If you want our co-operation,’ he concluded, ‘give us hope and give us justice. Do not perpetrate the humiliating conditions under which we are living at present.’

Mr Amin Ahmed (Muslim League) who followed opened a frontal attack against the Government of Mr Srikrishna Sinha which he maintained was wholly and solely responsible for the unprecedented carnage in the province.

Mr Ahmed referred to the emigration of three lakhs of Muslims and stated that no amount of propaganda would have persuaded them to take such action, but it was the feeling of insecurity caused by the leniency showed by the Government to persons who had been responsible for the riots.

He had still hopes however, in the Prime Minister, who he thought could make amends by dealing even-handed justice.

If the Government or the Prime Minister felt that they could not discharge their duties, they should vacate office, he contended.

Mr Latifur Rahman (Muslim League) blamed the Congress Government and Congressmen for the disturbances who, he said, had a great hold on the masses.

This had been proved by the fact that as a result of their directive no Muslim was harmed during the great upheaval of 1942. And he inferred, therefore, that the recent riots occurred at their instigation. The fact that the riots were stopped quickly, he said, lent support to his contention.

Confidence Lost

Mrs Zohra Ahmed (Muslim League) said that Bihar had made history as a result of the recent communal riots and written the blackest page in the history of the world. The Ministry had proved, she said, thoroughly incompetent to protect the people under their face and her Party had lost all confidence in them.

Mr Phulan Prasad Verma (Congress Socialist) opposing the motion, said that whatever might be the fault of the Bihar Government, communalism was not one of them. It was unfair to abuse and accuse them for inactions.

Mr Mazhar Imam (Muslim League) charged the Government with dealing leniently with the culprits responsible for the riots and the officers who had neglected their duty in protecting the Muslims.

He cited some instances of Government’s ‘failure’ to punish a number of officers and said that the action of the Government showed that, either they failed to control the people whose representatives they claimed to be and the officers or it was at their instance that the people and officers acted in the manner they did.—API.
15. ‘Bihar Casualty Figures’
Dawn, 16 February 1947.

Patna, Saturday.—The following casualty figures of the victims of the Bihar disturbances and the number of houses burnt were given by Mr Sinha, Bihar Premier, in the Legislative Assembly:

- Muslims killed: About 5,000
- Muslims injured: About 1,350
- Hindus killed: About 200
- Hindus injured: 12
- Hindus killed in firings: 400
- Hindus injured in firings: 106
- Muslims houses burnt: 4,268
- Hindus houses burnt: 424

16. ‘League Party Leader Urges Govt to Do Justice to Oppressed Minority’
Dawn, 17 February 1947.

Patna, Sunday.—His voice was the voice of the oppressed, suppressed and humiliated Muslims of the province, who would have ‘justice from God if not from man,’ said Mr S.M. Ismail, Leader of the Opposition in Bihar Assembly and the mover of the no-confidence motion against the Bihar Ministry’s policy during and after the riots in the province. He appealed to the Premier to accept his demands.

Mr Ismail stated that he had no malice or grudge against the Government but he maintained that the Government had been negligent of their duty. He pointed that the highest official of the province during 1942, the Governor of Bihar had been made to resign for his failure to check the disturbances and that the references that the Section 93 Government could not prevent the August disturbances of 1942 had not been happy.

He did not, however, want to compare Mr Sinha’s Government with the Section 93 Government, as the present Government was a popular Government from which he had every right to expect equity and justice. He knew he had no power to make the Congress Ministry resign but he wanted the Government to know that they had no confidence in the Muslims of the province.

Sir Chandreshwar Prasad Narain Sinha (Landholders) who opened the debate on Friday in the Bihar Assembly analysed the speeches made in favour of and against the motion and said that there was complete agreement on the point that what happened in October and November 1946 was something for which everybody was sorry and ashamed.

But, the question still remained to be answered, if they were to go down before this disaster or should they put their heads together and rise above it?

Regarding the demands of the Muslim League, Sir Chandreshwar opposed the imposition of heavy collective lines as it would not create a helpful atmosphere and also disfavoured the idea of formation of large pockets of Muslim population as so many small Pakistans would be created.
Mr Jagat Narain Lal (Congress) who had been charged with having a hand in the disturbances for organizing Noakhali Day meetings and processions in Patna stated that what had happened had blackened the name of Bihar but he claimed that whatever he had done had been with the best of motives for maintaining communal harmony. He maintained that he had been able to divert the feeling of the people to heal their channels by his speeches in the meeting held on the Noakhali Day.

Dr Syed Mahmud, Development Minister, said that such communal atrocities merited wholesale condemnation in the name of humanity wherever and by whosoever they were perpetrated.

His heart went out in sympathy to all sufferers whether in Bengal or in Bihar. If communal sympathies blinded people to wider humanitarian principles the future of India either in Pakistan or Hindusthan would be bleak indeed.

Mr Syed Mehdi Hassan, Mr Abdul Ghani, Mr Abu Zakar, Mr M. Burhanuddin and Mr Maqbool Ahmed, all Muslim League members also spoke and gave details of the atrocities and the role of the officials.

Mr Shyam Narain Singh (Congress) opposed the motion. Mr Morris (Anglo-India) said that his heart went out in sympathy to those who had suffered in the riots and condemned all types of communal atrocities.

Premier’s Statement

Mr Sinha stated that the latest figure of number of houses of Hindus searched for looted property was 8,059. Giving detailed information about the measures taken by the Bihar Government for the safety and security of the Muslims, Mr Sinha said that it had already been decided to enroll 2,000 constables and a large number of officers to man temporary outposts to be opened in affected areas: in addition there would be reserves of armed police to aid them; there would be a fair percentage of Muslims in these forces.

All District Magistrates had been ordered, Mr Sinha said, to pay sufficient remuneration to chowkidars and to ask them to properly safeguard the property of persons who had evacuated the places under their charge.

Mr Sinha referred to the demand for the creation of larger pockets of Muslim population and asked the Leader of the Opposition to think of the difficulties of the Government in undertaking transfer of population. It was beyond the resources of the provincial Government. But he had decided that those who lived in distant corners of the province and those whose houses had been wiped out and who wanted to live in safer zones would be allowed the liberty to settle wherever they liked.

A general grant of Rs 250, Mr Sinha said, would be made to individuals for rebuilding their houses and the District Magistrates had been asked to grant larger sums wherever necessary. Small traders, craftsmen and business men who had suffered would be given aids to give them a new start in life.

A list of widows and orphans due to the disturbances was being prepared to help them with grants so that they might carry their normal life. Orders had been also issued to all District Magistrates to attend to the work of rehabilitation and officers had been asked to contact the Muslims in villages to give hope and encouragement to them.

The motion was pressed to a division and lost by 92 votes to 27.—API.

[PART II (A)]

THE MUSLIM LEAGUE VIEWPOINT

Until a few years ago, the Bihar Muslims were more or less all Nationalists. But as they turned towards the Muslim League ideals of self-determination and Pakistan, they became unpopular with the Hindu majority. After the heavy Muslim League victory in the last elections, Hindus became hostile. Even before the Direct Action Day in August [1946], many acts of aggression by Hindus had taken place, for example, at Andhra in June when eight Muslims were killed for which no one has been punished. Then before the Noakhali [riots] came the incident of Beniabad where a mob of 20,000 attacked and looted this village, killing about 14, amongst whom most were Congress Muslims including Hafiz Mohd Shafi. The League leaders issued a statement on the 2nd October 1946, giving a warning to Government of the serious disturbed feeling. Mahatma Gandhi had asked Hindus not to celebrate Dewali for certain reasons, but unscrupulous [elements] spread the story that it was done as mourning for Noakhali. This had a profound adverse effect. The situation was being made worse by speeches, writings and lectures of certain Hindu leaders such as Mr Jagat Narain, MLA, and Mr Murli Dhar, Editor, Searchlight. Mr J.P. Narain was adding fire by advocating violence to overthrow the British and their helpers and then naming the Muslim League as the chief helpmate.

Thus the [Bihar] Government must have been aware of the seriousness of the situation and should have taken adequate steps for the prevention of any large-scale riots. Instead, in spite of Section 144, the Government allowed the holding of Noakhali Day. For two days, 25th and 26th of October, [1946], large meetings and processions, headed by the Congress leaders, were held in Patna and slogans such as Khun ka badla khun se lenge (We will avenge blood with blood) were shouted, bringing the crowds to a frenzy point. This was the spark that set the fire.

The riots started on 25th October [1946], and they raged uncease till about the middle of November. Mass murders, loot, arson, rape, and abductions took place. Brutalities unknown in human history happened such as pressing the child out of a pregnant women, cutting few months [old] babies in front of mothers, and making them drink the blood, all-out killing of women and children, large scale murders in mosque’s, and other things. The minimum [number of those] killed is 15,000 and cases of loot[ing], and murder are still taking place. Crops are being stolen. Relief has been totally inadequate. The Hindus are still very hostile. Thus, the Muslims have lost faith in the Government and the Hindus, and they have a hopeless feeling of insecurity. In these circumstances, to ask the Muslims to go back and live as of old is impossible. So the Muslims now want to live in strong-armed pockets and if that is not acceptable, they will have no choice but to migrate.
Other points brought out by them were as follows: the Chief Minister is a good man but even he and other Ministers are unable to control some Hindu leaders and the masses in such a matter for fear of losing their votes and popularity. There are two parties amongst the Congress fighting for power, the Brahmans in the present Government and the Kayastha, the latter being out to bring the former into disgrace and thus this has brought [about] softness and hesitation in Government actions and so [it] failed to prevent riots in spite of the warning. The police either watched silently and in other case actively encouraged the Hindus. Some extreme [sic for extremists] (fortunate neither the Muslim League President nor the majority) went on to say that the Hindus want to suppress once for all the Bihar Muslims who so far had been intellectually ahead of the Muslims [sic for Hindus]. One Professor even suggested that the Hindus were out to systematically annihilate the Muslims out of the country as they did to the Buddhists and the Spaniards did to Moors.

In the official statement issued by the Bihar Muslim League, they make three demands:

(a) Exchange of population; this they have now modified to formation of pockets
(b) Setting up of an impartial Commission; this has already been agreed to and
(c) Special tribunals to try cases.

NATIONALIST MUSLIMS' POINT OF VIEW

1. The brutalities were extreme.
2. The Government's intentions were good but there was some hesitation in their actions during the riots; a determined lead such as that given by Pandit Nehru would have prevented or at any rate saved huge casualties.
3. The Government's policy and relief measures since the riots, are inadequate, maybe partly due to corrupt or inefficient administration.
4. The Hindus, though now quietened down, are not repentant. So, unless some immediate steps are taken to remedy the situation, it will result in great damage to the cause of the country and the Muslim League is out to exploit the situation fully.

Dr Mahmud: The brutalities, including rape, were extreme. The Congress Nationalist Muslims and the Momins were all murdered just as Muslims, helping to prove the Two Nation Theory. Among the causes were Hindu–Muslim feelings in the administration, exaggerated reports given about Noakhalii even by the highest leaders, black marketeers, and the presence of many false [sic] workers in the Congress (for example, where there was a good Congressman such as Pandit Grusthwari in Chhapra, all was controlled there quickly and well).

Relief is poor and slow. [The victims of the] Beniabad incident of September [1946] were promised Rs 40,000, [but] still not given; cases of looting are still happening; feelings of insecurity are great; even educated Muslims wishing [sic for wish] to leave. Only a few days ago, he received applications from 400 Muslims, some of whom he personally knows as good fellows, wishing to go to Sind.

He feels that out of this evil tremendous good could have come out if we, especially the top Hindu leaders, had grasped the opportunity. Pandit Nehru realized this and he started building a new India (by showing [that] Congress was above all parties and communities) but the attempt had no support. In fact, the unwelcome [sic] given to Pandit Nehru by the Bihari Hindus made the Muslims more fearful that even one of the great Hindu heroes may not be able to protect them. No topmost Hindu leaders have toured the afflicted areas. Even now, the wound can be patched up and the effort should be made by the topmost leaders. He thinks that Gandhijee’s immediate visit to Bihar, even though for a few days, might again start the [movement] for a New India. He thinks only Gandhijee can solve the Hindu-Muslim problem, which may become unsolvable [sic] after his death.

He related the following three personal stories which show the depth of [his] emotions and speak for themselves:

(i) An old woman in one of the villages clung to him and said: Ham ne ka kia hai; ham ko kae ko mare (What have we done? Why do you kill us?).

(ii) A group of simple Muslims met him and said: Ham ko Pakistan men bhej do (Send us to Pakistan).

(iii) A group of Muslim refugees protected and brought to the railway station by Hindus were getting into the train with their kits. As the Hindu helpers were entering the railway compartment, a policeman stopped them and asked them why were they getting in, not being refugees. The Hindus answered: Inke bux Patna kon utarega (Who would unload their boxes at Patna?)

Ma. Gen Shah Nazjvaz & Co. Mahboob Ahmad of INA [Indian National Army]: The brutalities were extreme and Noakhali was nothing compared to Bihar. No determined and co-ordinated action was being taken to cover up the wounds. It has already greatly affected the Nationalist Muslims and, unless something was urgently done, the Congress may lose their sympathies. Power politics was perhaps at the background. Shah Nawaz says that a noticeable difference in the Hazara riots was [that there was] no raping or killing of women and children. He also thinks Press is greatly misused. Thinks that Gandhijee should visit Bihar. Both have visions of a great, united and free India and this has come as a terrible shock and an obstacle in their way.

Shah Nawaz is returning from Delhi to work in any capacity here, should Badshah Khan want him.

Badshah Khan Sahib: The British put obstacles in the way of effective dealing of the riots. Whereas to suppress the 1942 riots they sent soldiers in batches of two and three all over the country, they refused to do so now. The Prime Minister himself went to Ranchi to get military support but even then it was delayed. The police joined in to create trouble to please the British officers since there is no mental change in them and they still regard British officers as masters. The Governor went to Bombay to receive his wife when the riots were in full progress. The brutalities were extreme. There was perhaps some softness in the Government’s dealing with the riots. It was a mistake to hand over relief work to the Muslim League, who are using this to exploit the situation to their own end, spreading hatred and disunity and creating every obstacle. The relief is totally inadequate and not a single house has yet been rebuilt. Corrupt and inefficient administration is making relief [work] worse.

The Hindu mentality has not changed yet; this is dangerous. Many revolutionaries working [sic] pamphlets advocating the killing of Muslims; and Hindu Mahasabha workers are working under Congress label. An immediate action to remedy the situation is required. The principle should be that the Government should do all the needful and the local leaders and citizens should stand on their own legs and carry out all the work. It is a most difficult task with corrupt administration and corrupt character of the so-called Congressmen, but still the locals in each area must be made to realize their responsibility. Outsiders can help the Government and local leaders by helping to give a determined push and bringing about a clear, impartial and rapid relief organization, based on a clear-cut plan and policy. Urgency is obvious, and Badshah Khan is already working in [sic] this plan.
HINDU POINT OF VIEW

The brutalities were extreme and the largeness of the riots unexpected, but the cause was strong provocation. The Muslim League leaders had been threatening and constantly speaking of sword. Our leaders were being frequently insulted. Then came the ‘Direct Action Day’. Calcutta Riots took place in which Biharis from most districts were affected and on the top of it all, Noakhali specially the treatment of women. On the top of this Muslims showed arrogance and in many places in Bihar attacked first; then the masses went mad. They want the Muslims to come back here and hope no incidents to excite the people again will take place anywhere.

Murli Bobu, Editor, Searchlight: He did write strong articles but it was to counteract the ‘theory of sword’ constantly preached by the Muslim League. He never expected such serious riots or barbarity. Calcutta and Noakhali were the immediate main causes. The Noakhali Day was only a condemnation day but slogans were shouted in spite of the efforts of the leaders to stop them. Even before Nehrujee ordered shooting, the police had opened fire 49 times between the 25th of October and the 4th of November.

.... He thinks Muslims attacked first in several places, for example, Tarapore (Police Station), where Hindu girls were molested. He thinks if there were any incidents elsewhere, Hindus may retaliate. He does not see any objections to modified Muslim pockets if they so wish and said that the Chief Minister would also place no obstacle.

CHIEF MINISTER’S VIEWS

The main cause of the trouble is the political background and the Muslim League’s attitude and actions. The local Muslims also gave provocation and in a number of places were the first aggressors. Nonetheless, suddenness and extent of the riots were totally unexpected. The police force is inadequate to meet such extensive disturbances, and military aid was delayed, maybe deliberately. The Commissioner of Patna asked for military aid on 27th October, but without effect. On the 31st, in a conference at the Commissioner’s House, the Chief Minister himself asked for military aid.... Even the Inspector-General of Police and the Chief Secretary (both Englishmen) placed obstacles in his way and considered that the situation was not really serious. Then he himself went to see the Military Commander at Ranchi. Hence the military aid was delayed for three or four valuable days. In some cases the police did not behave properly and inquiries are being instituted against them, but in good many cases they acted promptly and well. He agrees that the police and the administration generally are suffering from the foreign rule legacy. He thinks where the Congress was strong such as in the Tirhut Division, everything was kept under control. There is no truth in the Muslim League allegation that caste among the Hindus is making them play power politics and thus weakening the Ministry in maintaining law and order. Nor does he agree that J.P.’s (Jai Parkash Narain’s) lectures and statements have contributed to the riots. This he thinks is British propaganda through the Muslim League.

It was a mistake handing over relief to the Muslim League, who have used it for their own purpose. The control is being taken back now; other reason for effective relief not reaching the sufferers is poor administration. Even the English officer appointed by the Central Government for rehabilitation is doing nothing. The Chief Minister was surprised when I told him of the poor relief measures. All the arrests have been more or less made. The Nationalist Muslims have undoubtedly been seriously affected.
When asked if co-ordination of relief between the two provinces would do any good, he said he had not considered it. He agreed that the Hindus were not really repentant yet. His answer to the Muslim League demands was: Inquiry Commission? Yes. Special Tribunals? No. Pockets? As a principle, no, also not practical; but any voluntary adjustments? Yes.

PART II (B)

ASSEMBLY DEBATE

Muslim League no-confidence motion debate took three days. I attended it one day. (Regretfully, what is said in the beautiful Assembly room and [from] its chairs is necessarily [not] what one sees in the villages and among the folks affected.)

PART III (A)

VISIT TO THE AFFECTED VILLAGES PATNA DISTRICT

_Nagar Nausa:_ This village is 29 miles from Patna and is the home of Mr Noman, Member of the Central Legislative Assembly. The battle, including use of guns, raged for three days until the majority of Muslims (over 1,000) were rescued by army firing, after Panditjee arrived.

About 100 Muslims were killed. Muslim houses were adjacent, well built and prosperous. Now [they are] entirely destroyed. [It is] amazing how huge masonry has been blown up as if by dynamite. No Muslim [lives] here except one living with the military. He said his crops have been stolen only a week ago, so how can he live and what for. We escorted two Muslims who found some of their jewellery hidden in the wall. Frames [of houses and other], materials, and other things are being looted even now. (There is) complete destruction (burning) of the Muslim houses. Mosques also broken [sic].

3 days’ fighting but no police arrived. [Only] one army platoon is posted here.

Local cause: The Hindus say that the Muslims insisted on sacrificing cow in those strained days. The Muslims say they were attacked after peace committees were formed.

_Tilhara:_ It is 45 miles from Patna and two miles from Ekanagar Police Station. Complete Muslim part of the village was destroyed and population murdered. Muslim part of the village here also one side [sic]. The mosque broken [into] and many murdered inside. Blood, hair, and bones inside the mosque. Each house has a well; all of them were filled up, it is said, with bodies and debris. In some skeletons [were] visible. Heavy blood marks in all houses. The butchery obviously horrible and evidence still there—three wooden planks top-bloodsmeared—presumably persons were cut on these.

One well, half a mile outside the village, [was] full of skeletons, some visible on top [sic]. No Muslim living anywhere near [by].

MONGHYR DISTRICT V

_Aahrah:_ Is 12 miles from Monghyr. 148 deaths [took place], 56 Muslims escaped. Saw wells full up [sic], some bones visible. The Hindu and Muslim parts in the village separate, the latter completely destroyed. No Muslims seen in the area. The Muslims evacuated even [from the areas] where they were protected. One Muslim, Habib Khan, killed 15 days ago.

_Murahv:_ The mosque and the total [sic for whole] village burnt. Nobody living. 130 including 40 men killed. Here, 200 men went to the police station and cowardly left [behind] their womenfolk who were never rescued but some escaped through crops [sic].
Lakhanpore: 600 Muslim houses complete burning and destruction of the houses, majority Muslims killed [sic]. Blood marks, bones, hair visible in the houses. One house smells of dead bodies, even now horrible sight, mosque also destroyed.

Bishanpore: Total village destroyed. Heaviest [sic] murders because considered a Muslim stronghold. Here, every house tells its tale of the dead. Every house, including the mosque, has blood marks and bones and burning of dead bodies. I walked around this village in the fields for half a mile and found the whole area full of skeletons and graves every few yards. Too terrible for words. Muslim school destroyed.

Ghazipore: In the Lakhanpore and Bishanpore villages, Muslims were sent back by order, otherwise no rations. Theirs is a pitiable state; no roofs, no materials. Each home graveyard with bones of their own kith and kin, and yet they have to live there. Truly, villages of dead even those who are walking about [sic]. They should never be there until the cleaning of the area, burial or disposal of the dead, rebuilding of the houses and some relief has taken place. Nothing has been done yet. This scene will remain a nightmare of my life....

PART V

CONCLUSION V

Note. The Muslims form 13 per cent of the population and generally are in a prosperous condition. I have tried to see the Muslim point of view who are the sufferers here and to ascertain facts; and I write with the sole object of how we can heal the wounds and do maximum good. All my remarks should be read in that light, for the work in hand is of such a humane nature that it should transcend all party politics.
CAUSES

Basic Causes

The basic cause is the political background and moves. The British have cleverly succeeded in their policy of divide and rule, and loom large behind all the happenings. While talking about democracy and progress, they have introduced the cursed system of ‘Separate Electorates’ which is the very negation of democracy. Thus, offering power based on separation and religion, they have created its logical sequence—disunity and hatred. The British administration in India, that is, the British officers collectively and individually, have never ceased to play this game and, as will be seen later, this happened during the Bihar riots also.

The Muslim League (justified or not, is out of the scope of this port) is unfortunately playing this game. While it is beginning to dawn on the mankind that the basic teachings of all the religions are brotherhood and equality of man irrespective of caste, creed, colour or belief, and while civilization is rightly progressing towards a world federation, here in India we have a retrograde cry of dividing up India, based on religion (but how can true religion teach that?), thus sowing seeds of endless enmity and hatred for posterity. This attitude of the Muslim League, plus violent talk of its leaders advocating the cult of sword, has had its effects on the Hindu community and is the major cause of our troubles, and unfortunately it is tending to become worse. So it follows that unless this cause is removed, other efforts to improve the situation can only be of a secondary nature.

That India is one whole is even proved by these riots, as cause [sic] in one part of the country had its effects in other [parts]. To this extent, it can be said that it is outside the control of the Provincial Governments to check the causes and [their] effects. It may also be said that this India needs a strong, united Centre, capable of healing wounds inflicted upon any part of it instead of the limbs of the same body non-co-operating and thus hurting themselves and the whole body.

Immediate Causes

In Bihar the tension perhaps took a different turn since the elections in early 1946. The Muslim League won a heavy victory but they themselves admit that they used very insulting and provoking [sic] propaganda. There may have been other minor incidents but there was nothing special to worry [about]. Then came the ‘Direct Action Day’ and the Calcutta Riots. Calcutta has Biharis from every district, so the effects spread throughout Bihar. In September, the Beniabad incident took place when a large Hindu mob attacked and looted this place, killing about 14, among whom most were Congress Muslims. Then came Noakhali, about which perhaps exaggerated news was given by some leaders and the press. It was not so much the killing as mass rape and conversion that hit the Hindu mind. There appears to have been some local provocation in some areas by the Muslims also who may have gloated over Noakhali. I understand many officials had reported increasing tension during the last three months, but the IG of Police and the Chief Secretary (both Englishmen) had not taken any serious notice of these reports. Under the circumstances, the observance of the Noakhali Day appears to have been a mistake as this set the fire. It is admitted by all that such slogans as Khun ka badla khun se lenge (We will avenge blood with blood) were shouted by large crowds in Patna.
GOVERNMENT APPRECIATION

I have no doubts about the good intentions of the Government. After the Beniabad incident, the emergency scheme had been put into action. Celebration of the 2nd of September had been banned in order not to antagonize the Muslims. But the Government failed to appreciate the mass feelings and tension (in which misappreciation they were helped deliberately or otherwise by the I.G. [of Police] and Chief Secretary) and were caught unawares by the suddenness and largeness of the riots.

RIOTS (25 OCTOBER–8 NOVEMBER)

In general, there is little doubt that the riots were spontaneous and the result of pent-up feelings, and that the Government and the leaders were caught unawares by the extensiveness of the disturbances. Goondas, communalists, demobbed soldiers (after-effects of War) and similar people made full use of the opportunity and the crowds went mad. Murders, looting and arson took place on a large scale. Brutalities and destruction were extreme, such as perhaps had never happened in the Hindu history. It was difficult for me to check up regarding rape and conversion in the short time available but all Muslims say that rapes [were committed] on a large scale and there are still many abductions. Conversions, if any, have perhaps been on a minor scale [only]. Even the official list of the 5,000 persons killed is bad and serious enough, but the casualties are probably somewhat more.

All aspects of such disgraceful riots are bad enough, but call for special mention of regret, namely, (a) large-scale killings of women and children, (b) killings just of Muslims, no matter whether they were Congressites, Nationalists or Leaguers, thus helping to prove the Two Nation Theory.

The comparative seriousness of riots in various areas was affected by the following considerations:

(a) Where there was lack of communications, military or police aid was delayed.
(b) The attitude and actions of local leaders and leading citizens.
(c) The efficiency or otherwise of local officials.
(d) Local relations between the two communities.

GOVERNMENT ACTION

Since the Government was caught unawares, there was a natural hesitation in realizing its seriousness and in dealing with it most effectively. Other possible reasons for some softness in the Government action may be:

(a) Hesitation to antagonise the Hindu masses.
(b) Services are not free from communal feelings.
(c) The administration is the legacy of the British, who have been taught only to please their masters, rather than act impartially and effectively on their own initiative as should be the case in free countries.
(d) The wrong appreciation and advice by important British officials, the IG [of Police] and the Chief Secretary, who, as late as the 31st [of October], argued with the Premier that the situation was not serious and so, together with the Military Commander, delayed military aid. It is illuminating to know here that whereas in 1942 the military was spread all over the province in twos or threes, the Military Commander refused to adopt that method now though that was the very thing asked by the Chief Minister. It is also surprising that the Governor should go to receive his wife in Bombay on the 31st when riots were mounting up.

Nonetheless it would be correct to say that the Government acted with average efficiency and with the best of intentions... Firing by the police had taken place before Pandit Nehru’s arrival. But his visit accomplished the following two purposes:

(a) It brought military into action.
(b) It added determination to the Government actions.

Both of them could and perhaps should have been accomplished by the Government themselves and this may have brought the riots under-control much earlier.

(Muslims in general are of the opinion that Pandit Nehru’s arrival and action saved many thousands of Muslim lives and they are grateful to him).

POST-RIOT POSITION

(9 NOVEMBER–17 FEBRUARY)

Relief: It is a sad fact that relief arrangements are poor. Whatever may be the paper schemes or orders issued, the effect on the actual sufferers is totally inadequate. The rations are adequate but not at all the places. Children are given no special facilities. Clothing is the worst point. No rebuilding of the houses has started [yet]. Camps show a dismal sight; no effort of recreation [sic] etc. is visible. Dr Mahmud told me that the Beniabad sufferers of September 1942, who had been promised Rs 40,000 [as] compensation, had still not received it. This has a very demoralizing effect and helps the Muslim League object much more than their own propaganda.

The loot of material (doors, frames, boxes, and other things) and of crops is still going on. Some Muslims individually have been found missing or hurt recently also.

The Government in general allowed the Muslim League to run the relief [work]. This was a mistake as (a) the Government must never shirk [from] its rightful duty and (b) the League (primarily there from outside Bihar) has exploited the position for its ends, spreading disunity and hatred. Their leaders come and make speeches, [indulge in] politics, [and arrange] and relief. Systematically they advocated migration, which is most harmful to the Muslims themselves. Finding it impractical, they (Bihar Muslim League) now advocate strong-armed pockets and are carrying out all propaganda to this effect, with one-sided stories. Other possible reasons for inefficient relief may be:

(a) power politics (matching Bengal);
(b) corrupt administrative machinery; and
(c) poor Congress workers.

But the fact is that it is the lack of good relief arrangements more than the League propaganda that is making the Muslims feel insecure, making them wish to form pockets or even leave the province.

The Government’s answer to the Muslim League demands has already been given, namely,

(a) Inquiry Commission: Yes (it has created good effect even in the Muslim quarters).
(b) Pockets: No, except in special cases. Regarding pockets, it is true that even now there are limited Hindu and Muslim areas in towns and villages. But it must be realized that in Bihar most damage has been done where there were so-called pockets and Muslims have collected together. An argument not easy to refute in favour of pockets is how can those who were dishonoured go back and live in houses which are cemeteries of their own kith and kin. The pocket principle, however, is against the real interests of both Muslims and Hindus, but where the people concerned really voluntarily want to live together, let them do so. The choice should be of the people, not of political parties.

(c) Special Tribunals: No. The above is OK but the fact is to take relief, consolation, and friendship to the sufferers and none of the above do that.

The problem is, therefore, most urgent and the effect of the policy must reach the masses earliest possible. The Muslim League is justified in claiming that relief has been inadequate.

SOME IMPORTANT COMMENTS

The Congress or Nationalist Muslims have been deeply agitated and find themselves in a most difficult position. I fear that unless the problem is courageously tackled from the highest to the lowest level, it may be driving them into the League’s arms. It is really said that Nationalist Muslims and Momins (Mr A.Q. Ansari, a Momin) were killed just like others simply because they were Muslims, even though they stood with the Congress.

Hindus are quiet, but it cannot be said that they are repentant; and incidents elsewhere may still create effects here. This is a serious aspect. So, the Muslim feeling of insecurity has a good foundation.

SUMMARY

The British game has been successful. Indians stand ashamed before the eyes of the world and that too when the masses of India, be they Hindus or Muslims, in reality care not for Pakistan or Hindustan except superficially or artificially. What they want is good clothing, simple decent living for them and their families. This really can only be had if India arises [sic for rises] as one strong country for both its own and the world’s benefit. But at the moment both the British and the Muslim League perhaps are sitting back satisfied that their case of the Two Nation Theory is proved and Mr Nishtar is going about making violent speeches that a handful of Muslims will conquer and rule over crores of Hindus. And I know the general feeling among the Hindus, and to some extent share them too, that brute like actions can only be met by force, that when animal nature in human beings predominates, they understand not the feelings of love but learn a quick lesson from punishment. But young India must rise above this, look upward and ahead, fight these obstacles and even that without falling into the trap of violence and retaliation. I can see no other way of accomplishing this except that the Hindus (perhaps right [ly] too being majority) once more will have to bear the brunt of hard work and sacrifice for the sake of India, for the sake of both Hindus and Muslims alike and itself be, all the purer and better after the ordeal. I feel also that this great [tragedy] will bring forward [sic] the best or the reality of Islam, thus paving the way for both to live as brothers and equals, each developing [to its] best and helping mankind and civilization in its onward march.

There are some silver linings too. Many Muslims were saved by Hindus just as a number of Hindus were saved by their Muslim friends in Noakhali. The Muslim League leaders and the simple Muslim refugees met me very pleasantly. Quite a number of them (in spite of the propaganda to the contrary) after a few minutes’ talk were willing to go back if only decent arrangements could be made. I found Mr Jaffar Imam, President of the Muslim League, as a very reasonable and rationally [sic for rational] man and so were a number of others, of the Muslim League view, such as Mr S.A. Aziz. Then Bihar has excellent Muslims such as Dr Mahmud, Prof Bari, and Col Mahboob (INA). So, why should the problem not be solved?

18. Bihar Situation

Letter from H.S. Suhrawardy to M.A. Jinnah, 26 February 1947

BENGAL SECRETARIAT, CALCUTTA

My dear Quaid-i-Azam,

You may be interested in the report given by Sardar Naranjan Singh Gill of what he saw in Bihar. The Sardar Sahib does not want his report to be used until he has received the comments of the Premier of Bihar. I sent the Sardar Sahib to Bihar and refused to discuss with him matters regarding Noakhali unless he visited Bihar.

I also send you a copy of my own report on the Bihar situation which I have gathered as a result of my visit to Bihar and my discussion with the Premier there; also a copy of a letter which I have written to him. You may be interested in these, particularly in the report of Sardar Naranjan Singh Gill, which does not hesitate to bring out the terrible atrocities committed by the Hindus.

I also enclose a copy of a letter, which I have written to Sir Frederick Burrows and which is my first reaction to the statement of HMG.

Yours sincerely,

SHAHEED SUHRAWARDY

Enclosure

A NOTE ON BIHAR BY HUSEYIN SHAHEED SUHRAWARDY

In spite of my best efforts to be optimistic regarding rehabilitation of Muslims in Bihar, I feel that there is little to justify any great hope in that direction. I fear that the Ministry are not taking adequate steps to reassure the Muslims of the province that their lives and properties will be safe at the hands of their Hindu neighbours or that the Muslims will receive adequate protection. I do not think that the Ministers have realized the extent to which the confidence of the Muslims has been shaken in the ability, if not the desire, of the Government to protect them and to take offensive action against Hindu aggressors. The view generally held, not only by non-officials but also by officials, is that more than 5,000 persons were killed in the riots. Their minimum estimate is 8,000 but [it could well be up to] 15,000. It is further admitted that most of the persons killed were women and children. It is also admitted that the atrocities perpetrated have no parallel in history. It is purely brutal and brutish savagery. Even primitive people would not have stooped to the brutalities performed by the Hindus of Bihar. Butchering of little children and babies in arms became a normal course of events. The account of how the head of a suckling child was cut off while it was, feeding from the mother’s breast and [of] how a mother’s breast was cut off while the child was suckling, is disquieting: [these are] accounts which Mr Gandhi refuses to believe and which have been falsely denied by some of his informants. It is regrettable that Mr Gandhi himself has either refused to credit any of these stories or deliberately made up his mind that he will not under any circumstances do so. One can quite understand why Mr Rajendra Prasad has tried to assure Mr Gandhi that everything is all right in Bihar and that he need not go there.

2. As I have said above, the Ministry does not realize to what extent the Muslims have lost confidence in the Ministry and in the Hindus. Over and over again, the Premier has stated that the reason why the people had left Bihar was due to the propaganda by the members of the Muslim League who had been entrusted with the task of supervising Relief Camps and who, according to him, had betrayed their trust by calling upon the people to leave Bihar in order to make the tragedy appear worse than it actually was and to get some political advantage. To my mind such an attitude only shows his incapacity or unwillingness to realize the extent of the tragedy and the repercussions on the Muslim mind. It also shows a complete want of imagination and a desire to find scapegoats for his own failures. He gave some stray cases of how refugees ran away from the Digha Camp when it was in the charge of the Muslim League, and of how Muslims left unaffected localities long after the incidents had ceased. For instance, he gave the example of the town of Barh from which there has been a general [Muslim] exodus. Within the town itself, there were only a few incidents but round about it nearly all the villages have been decimated. This the Premier refuses to realize. I pointed out to him over and over again that he should realize that persons are not likely to leave their hearths, their homes, their lands and their property and everything dear to them merely on account of political propaganda. He had, however, made up his mind to blame the Muslim League. It is difficult with such an attitude of mind for the Ministry to take adequate steps to reassure the Muslim population.

3. I placed certain suggestions before the Premier, most of which he could not accept because he still thinks that life can proceed in the normal way. In my view, the steps that he is taking are wholly insufficient to get the Muslims back and there seems to be no alternative left to the Government of Bengal but to take steps to settle the Muslim refugees of Bihar as soon as possible and take them out of Relief Camps.

4. Up till now the Bihar Ministry has done nothing except talk. I believe it is only recently that they have accepted the view that the Muslims who lived in villages where there were only a few Muslim houses and where the vast majority has been wiped out cannot be expected to go back to those villages. It is only recently that they have agreed to houses being built in villages where Muslims still exist, so that persons from these outlying villages may find some shelter. I was informed that Muslims round about [sic] Lakhapur were prepared to come, live in Khanpore, keep their wives and children there and put up huts for themselves in the fields and live there at the risk of their lives. No houses have yet been erected. I have requested that these houses should be erected before the rains set in. It is doubtful, however, if this will cater for the refugees of those villages which have been destroyed. It may help the Muslims of those areas round about [sic] who are still in the soil but feel unsafe in the event of an uprising. This is about the most that I could [say] of the constructive work being done by the Ministry. Nobody is taking advantage of the offer of Rs 250 for erecting houses. It may be noted here that the houses demolished in Bihar were far more substantial than those demolished in Noakhali and Tippera. I just cannot see what the Ministry has done which can induce the Muslims to go back. I understand that collective fines are now being imposed for incidents now taking place. Up till now not more than ten times the Panchayat rent or Chowkidari tax has been imposed although. I am told that recently up to forty times has been recommended. There is also a move to get hold of the bad characters and make them responsible for looking after the property of the Muslims in the affected areas. This, as we can see, will not carry anybody far because when their houses were abandoned whatever was left behind was looted. These are all the measures.

5. The Ministry has turned down the suggestion for the creation of pockets of defence. But it seems that it will not stand in the way of Muslims finding a habitation in areas where they still exist. They [Ministry] are not, however, prepared to find land for them [Muslims] to put up a habitation on. I suggested that they [Government] should purchase land in order to enable these Muslims to put up [their] households. The Premier made it a condition that it will [only] be applicable to those Muslims whose houses have been destroyed in villages where Muslim houses were few. The Premier was not agreeable to consolidation of holdings or exchange of lands. It is not possible for the Muslims to go to their lands and cultivate them and it is no use the Premier expecting them to do so. There are stories of persons who had returned who have been assaulted and killed, and there is a general story of boycott and of hatred and oppression and also taunts, which make it impossible for the Muslims to return to their previous homes. I think the Premier should be asked to set up an organization that would act as an intermediary so that the lands of the Muslims who want to sell them may be purchased by the Government at proper rates and compensation given to the Muslims accordingly. These lands would subsequently be sold to the neighbouring Hindus. If this is not done, then I think the Muslims will have to sell their lands for a paltry price or abandon their lands which ultimate will be encroached upon. As a matter of fact, many lands given out in batwara are now being claimed by the local Hindus as having been given to them on rent and, therefore, they are claiming permanent rights thereon. There are also bakasht lands, which are now passing out of control of Muslim zamindars. Some sort of a final Arbitration Board has been set up. The Hindus claim these bakasht lands of the Muslims, and the Muslims are not there to contest. In spite of what the Premier said, I have very definite information that the Muslims are back. It is greatly to be regretted that the Ministry is not carrying on any propaganda in that area to induce them to do so. The Premier agreed that bail had largely been given to persons who had been arrested, and he said that where necessary. He further stated that he had ordered an increased police force of 2,000 and had agreed to 25 per cent of them being Muslims, either from Bihar or from UP and Ballia, But that he was not getting any Muslims. Also, the remuneration of chowkidars is being increased so that they may guard Muslim properties....

SUGGESTIONS MADE TO THE PREMIER

(i) Villages where there were few Muslim houses (some are wholly destroyed) inhabitants cannot be expected to go back. What can we do about them and their lands?
   (a) Build houses for them in adjacent Muslim localities.
   (b) Arrange (through the Relief and Rehabilitation Department) for exchange of lands.

(ii) Rebuild houses (partially damaged) where Muslims still exist. [Steps mentioned in (i) and (ii) [above must be taken] before the rains.

(iii) In order to build [houses] for Muslims, we need homestead lands for them. [How to secure such land?]
   (a) Acquire?
   (b) Exchange?
   (c) Pay money to enable [them] to purchase lands (and put up houses) for two categories [of Muslim affectees] according to the Hon’ble Prime Minister:
(1) Those whose villages have been wholly or almost wholly wiped out.
(2) Where there are a few Muslim houses in a village.

(iv) lands of
(a) widows
(b) all [those] killed
(c) those who cultivated [land] by their own labour
(d) those who cultivated [land] by bhagidars.

Is exchange possible?

(v) Police: For some time at least, get Punjabi Muslims or Afridis

(vi) Arms for Muslims

(vii) Muslims—their future—what assurances?

(viii) Necessary propaganda against Hindus—that they must accept Muslims

(ix) Engage more Muslims in the rehabilitation work

(x) Orphanages

(xi) Widow Homes

(xii) Cases: hardly any arrest (accused bailed out)

(xiii) Special constables and [their] responsibility

The Premier agreed to build houses in adjacent Muslim localities and to rebuild houses where partially damaged and where Muslims still exist. He was not prepared either to acquire land or to [arrange] exchange [of] land to build homesteads for Muslims. I do not think he will be prepared to give money to enable them to purchase lands. In any event, if he did put up houses for them on lands in Muslim localities, he would do so only for those villages where there are few Muslim houses. He was not prepared to do anything to exchange the lands of widows, of persons who have been killed or of those who cultivated [land] with their own labour and who cannot go back to their land, or who cultivated [it] by _batwara_. I wonder if the Ministry would be agreeable to realizing the rents for the benefit of the landlords in _nij jot_ _ryotdind_ bakasht Xdcads.

The Premier was not prepared to bring in Punjabi Muslims or Afridis as police. He said that the Hindus would resent it in view of what took place in 1942. It was clear that he was more anxious for Hindu sentiment than to reassure Muslims. He was not prepared to give arms to Muslims for their protection. As regards future assurances, it appeared that he was hoping that the Muslims would begin to return with the passage of time. How could they stay away leaving their properties behind, [he asked]. He was agreeable to carrying out the necessary propaganda amongst the Hindus. However, it still remains to be seen whether he will do so or not.

He was not prepared to engage Muslims in rehabilitation work. He is practically trying to give some relief through Khan Abdul Ghaffar Khan and carrying on anti-Muslim League propaganda through him. According to him, it is the Muslim League, which must be held responsible for the Hindus attacking Muslims. Why did the Muslim League raise the slogan of Pakistan, [he asked]. Through Khan Abdul Ghaffar Khan he is carrying on propaganda that Muslims must desert the Muslim League, as Muslim League is responsible for what is taking place.

It appears that the proposal of Orphanages and Widow Homes has not yet struck him. He will probably put up Orphanages and Widow Homes.
He said that about 6,000 persons have been arrested and he said that 3,000 persons are in hajat. This is not the report of the local people.

7. Although our conversation was fairly cordial, as I had no desire to pick up a quarrel with the Premier and I had not gone there with the intention either of accusing him or of teaching him his business or anything of the kind, I must confess that I was deeply disappointed at the general attitude of the Premier and the Ministry. I see little hope of the Government of Bihar taking any big step, which may induce the Muslims to go back to Bihar. Something spectacular was necessary [but] that the Premier would never do. On the other hand, there is every fear that the European elements will leave the Bihar Service en masse. Muslim officers are all apprehensive. The Bihar Service would be manned almost wholly by Hindus and this is not likely to create any great confidence in the future. I was surprised to find that the Premier and the Muslim League there had no contact with each other at all. The Muslim League had written to him for further discussions. He had replied to the effect that he would meet them in the beginning of February but up till now he has not met them. He has agreed to take them into confidence. This was my last request....

Enclosure 3

CALCUTTA

My dear Governor,

I am taking the liberty of writing to you this letter which is more in the nature of thinking aloud than of constructive suggestions. It appears to me that we have got to do a terrific amount of work in order to prepare ourselves for June 1948. The problems will be very much greater if there is no settlement between the League and the Congress. The alternatives appear to be the following:

(a) A settlement between the League and the Congress. The League going to the Constituent Assembly and co-operating with the Congress and working out a scheme also entering into the Minorities Advisory Committee in order to draft safeguards for the interests of all minorities.

(b) Each province setting up its own independent organization particularly in Sections B and C. In our Section we shall have to draft a separate constitution as it is not likely that we shall get the Government of Assam, as at present constituted, to agree to work with us or even to hand over any of its Bengali territories.

(c) Pakistan Constitution. It seems to me that this is the alternative, which the HMG has visualized but not specifically mentioned. This is likely to take shape. This, however, does not exonerate us from having our own constitution and working out our own provincial plans.

2. Constitution-making is not so difficult but the question of agreements and treaties with others and to what extent we have to rely upon them are of very great importance. If we are going to be independent, it appears to me that the following problems must be tackled at once.

(a) Defence. We have got to have an Army as well as military education, military bias, military training, a territorial force, conscriptional training for two years, officers' training establishment and so on.

(b) Workshops for making guns and munitions.
(c) Shipbuilding yards in Calcutta and Chittagong for small and large craft.
(d) Arrangements for making armoured vehicles and tanks. It may be necessary, therefore, to control the steel works and factories under our jurisdiction so that they may produce the necessary kind of steel material.
(e) Self-sufficiency in food grains and, therefore, a more intensive programme of Grow More Food.
(f) A survey of deficiencies in foodgrains, such as mustard oil, ghee, groundnuts, salt, pulses, linseed, sugar, and other things, and devising ways and means of how to supplement them.
(g) A survey of all our industries from the point of view of making ourselves self-sufficient in necessary commodities; for instance, cloth, iron and steel, cement, oils, and others.
(h) A general survey of our industries and a programme of industrial development by attracting foreign capital and industrial enterprise.
(i) Control of jute cultivation, sale and purchase of the jute industry and also of jute manufactures.
(j) Finances of the province and how to make ourselves self-sufficient.
(k) Currency.
(l) Customs.
(m) Transport.
(n) Requisite proportion of Muslim and Hindu officers in the administration of the province in all its branches. We may have to get rid of those on whose support we cannot rely in moments of crisis, such as Gurkhas, Assam Rifles, and the UP and Bihari Hindus in the Armed Forces and [in the] Police Force.
(o) The Government's authority is bound to be shaken and considerably undermined. It is not possible for the Government to have a Police Force that will cover the entire province. It is necessary to think of ways and measures of assuring protection to the people likely to be in jeopardy in the event of a mass uprising.

3. There are thousands of other problems I am stunned by [HMG's] announcement [of 20 February 1947]. It will be easy for a settled Government to take over from the British Government. That could be done almost immediately. But if a new constitution has to be framed, that is to say, if there is going to be separation and division, then it is clear that much work will have to be done. The Muslims may feel happy that it is suggested that power may be handed over to the province but I doubt if the provinces will be sufficiently organized by June 1948 to be able to stand on their own legs as an independent entity. Hence practically this is tantamount to forcing us to accept the Centre.

4. The most important thing is that we must get hold of jute and tea. These are the only two things with which we can barter with the other provinces. For instance, in order to develop our river system, it is necessary to come to an agreement with Bihar, Assam and even Burma. If they refuse to do so, what have we got with which to coerce them? This will surely have to be worked out.

5. These thoughts are rather puerile, but they are the first reactions of a person who, while believing in independence, also believes that sometimes too high a price may have to be paid. Also, no attention has yet been paid by anyone regarding the problems that will arise if separation is also coupled with independence. Hence I have no knowledge and no experience.
6. Would it not be advisable to set up some sort of organization or Committee or Special Officer that will advise on the basis of an independent constitution for Bengal? Maybe we shall not need it but it will nevertheless be useful, if not in its constitutional aspects, certainly in its economic and financial aspects.

Yours sincerely,

H.S. SUHRAWARDY

HE Sir Frederick Burrows, GCIE,
Governor of Bengal

19. ‘Little Progress towards Recovery: Official Apathy in Bihar’

Extracts from a Report from Dawn, 27 February 1947

Bihar is suffering from a morbid condition which it seems to lack the will to shake off. There is a lethargy in all branches of the administration that is puzzling to those who looked, with the coming of Congress into power, for a revival of energies; there is a malaise abroad that is disquieting to those who remember how much leeway has to be made up after the hardship and denial of the war years, how much healing to be done after disturbances of last November, writes a Special Correspondent of the ‘Statesman’ who has been lately in Bihar.

In Patna, inquiries in official circles about progress made with repairing the damage done four months ago arouse scant interest—even thinly veiled resentment, as if they would rather not be reminded of that legacy. It is an escapism that is disquietingly widespread. Accurate statistics of persons displaced by the riots are strangely difficult to obtain. Estimates vary from the ridiculous 25,000 of the Government’s curious Publicity Department to the Muslim League’s exaggerated 400,000. Officials engaged on rehabilitation work put it at 175,000—probably a conservative estimate, for 150,000 refugees are admitted by Hindu Mahasabha sources to be in Bengal alone. Most of the remainder have shifted about within Bihar itself, only very small numbers going to other provinces like Sind.

Marks of Tragedy

So little progress has been made towards recovery that it is difficult for a visitor to believe that almost four months have passed since tragedy seared its way across a large part of the province. In villages a few miles from Patna, the administrative hub whence succour must come, the illusion of immediacy is complete. There all the marks of tragedy are as fresh as if it had happened, but yesterday.

In the peaceful sunlit Bihar countryside charred and deserted houses still huddle in stork and incongruous ruin, their courtyards uttered with torn paper and rifled tin trunks, their rooms filled with smashed furniture and tiles from collapsed roots, their verandahs strewn with women’s slippers and broken bangles. Everywhere the pattern is the same—the sign of past violence and the present quiet, underlined by the wind in the trees overhead or a gurgling stream nearby.

Muslims in Patna like to take visitors to these villages on conducted tours and there re-live the horror all over again. They would resent the suggestion that this is sheer futility. Futility is a very large part of Bihar’s attitude towards the thousands of her peasants who have been torn from their homes and see no prospect of return. Tragically, they have become pawns in the political game.
The Problem of Return

Leaguers say refugees cannot be expected to go back to their homes because of the horrible associations, because evidence in cases against miscreants would be stopped by intimidation, because many ‘murderers’ have been released on bail and are going about again and, lastly, because no rebuilding has been done.

Many of these obstacles to resettlement are real, but Leaguers go further. They say that the only solution is to have Muslim ‘pockets’ in Bihar—villages of from 5,000 to 10,000 Muslims, ten per cent of them armed with their own police stations, schools and even (frontier fashion) watch towers—in short, defence areas in a hostile country. Meanwhile League funds are assisting Muslims to leave the province.

The Government understandably refused to create these ‘little Pakistans’. But it went, unwisely, to the other extreme and insisted (certainly up to the time of the Assembly debate) that the refugees go back to their original villages. This, it had become obvious, after four months, they would not do out of fear—fear that is in most cases well founded. There is still communal hostility in some villages which even a foreign visitor can feel....

Unpleasant truth

The unpleasant truth is that whatever the province’s legislators may say in the isolation of the capital’s Assembly chamber, there has been no change of heart in the villages and towns of Bihar and the visitor looks in vain in both Hindu and Muslim circles for some genuine feeling for the province’s 175,000 displaced persons, some realization that their resettlement is an urgent, humanitarian problem, not a political one, some effective and selfless championship of the ignorant, bewildered homeless, tragic peasant of Bihar.

20. Gandhi’s Work in Bihar

Extract from a Report from the Governor of Bihar to Wavell, 3 March 1947.
IOR, R/3/1/148, Acc. No. 3463, NAI.

...9. News has just been received that Gandhi is on his way to Bihar. According to Mazumdar, my Chief Secretary, he has been prevailed on to do this by my Development Minister, Syed Mahmud, and the rest of the Ministry are by no means pleased about it. It is difficult to foresee exactly what line Gandhi will take. It is probable that he will insist on the Ministers taking more vigorous steps than they intended to implement their undertaking to appoint a Bihar Riots Inquiry Committee. I also think it likely that he will back with his personal influence and example the line that Khan Abdul Ghaffar has been taking since his return to Bihar. That is to call on the Hindus and Congressmen to repair with their own hands the Muslim houses that were damaged in the riots. This sounds very well, and accounts of Khan Abdul Ghaffar working hard himself all day as a coolie and living on the simplest fare makes good propaganda. These occasional incursions into the simple life are all very well when one has a return ticket, and when the Frontier Gandhi goes back to his own place his band of helpers will melt away. Unfortunately he has expressed himself against allowing the work of restoration to be carried out through contractors, which is the only way it can be done in quick time, and is a method to which the Ministers have now given a reluctant assent. The inevitable result of these appeals to Hindu benevolence, which I fear the Mahatma will support, will be that the work of rehabilitation will be greatly retarded, and there is no doubt that the Muslim League will put this down to deliberate policy on the part of the Congress, which is probably not true.
21. Gandhi Promises Effective Protection to Muslims
   Interview between M.K. Gandhi and Rajendra Prasad, 5 March 1947

Gandhiji told him that he was not yet ready with his plan. On one or two points, however, he had come to a definite decision. He would allow Muslim concentration under certain conditions but he would neither give arms nor Muslim military and police. Instead, he would give them effective protection. Dr Rajendra Prasad agreed....

22. ‘Advantage Lies in Admission’: Gandhi Tours Bihar
   M.K. Gandhi’s Interview to C.P.N. Sinha, 5 March 1947

Sinha: Well, now that you have come, our burden is lightened.
Gandhiji: I have come to lighten it. I have also wired Badshah Khan to come.

S. What did Badshah Khan think of the work that is being done here?
G. He said that the Ministry were agreeable to everything he told them but the officers would not be able to cope with the problem. People alone can do it. He further suggested that there should be a committee for the purpose but it should be purely non-political. I also feel the same way.

S. There are many Hindus who did good work during the disturbances. Where there were such workers, very little damage was done. The Muslims still have faith in them.
G. All this should never have taken place.

S. People forgot themselves for a while. Where some care was taken, nothing happened. Congress workers did not check the disturbances at all places as they ought to have done.
G. That is the truth. Advantage lies in admission. Then alone can the remedy be applied.

S. At places Hindus did their best to protect the Muslims. But the problem calls for whole-hearted active co-operation of all sections. They are ready to give it.

23. ‘Bihar Massacre Like Jallianwala Massacre’: Gandhi’s Appeal for Commission of Inquiry
   M.K. Gandhi’s Discussion with Rajendra Prasad and Bihar Ministers, 5 March 1947
   Valmiki Chaudhary (Ed.), Dr Rajendra Prasad; Correspondence and Select Documents, Vol. VII, pp. 251–2.

We should make a public confession of our mistake. No commission of inquiry has been appointed to date. If we are not quick about the matter, it will lose its effect. If we do not appoint a commission, we shall be held to have admitted the League’s case.

The Chief Minister, Sri Krishna Sinha, expressed the fear that the League would make political capital out of it. Gandhiji admitted that that was not improbable. But justice never paused to consider if it would be exploited.
GANDHIJI: My sixty years’ experience has taught me nothing if not that. That is also the lesson of my three months of travail in Noakhali. I was groping in the dark but I said just what seemed to me to be the truth. Those who regarded me as their enemy could exploit it. But I had faith that sooner rather than later they would see their mistake. Be that as it may, my only strength lies in my ahimsa. The same applies to you also. If you grasp that, you will get over your fear and, undaunted by extraneous considerations, do justice.

Again and again Gandhiji tried to clear his old friend of unmerited suspicion. Dr Mahmud’s letter, which had brought him to Bihar, was in reply to his (Gandhiji’s) peremptory inquiries; the Doctor had not acted disloyally towards his colleagues. Dr Rajendra Prasad explained that there was really no difference. The Bihar Ministers were never opposed to Gandhiji’s coming earlier. But they had judged that the situation might call for the employment of drastic measures; how could they call Gandhiji in that context? The Chief Minister put in that they had never tried to ‘minimize’ the atrocities.

GANDHIJI: From what I have been hearing, it seems to me that the Bihar massacre was like the Jallianwala Bagh massacre. Dr Mahmud’s wife today brought some Muslim women to me. I had no reply to their tears.

M.K. Gandhi’s Discussion with PCC Members at Patna, 9 March 1947

Gandhiji told them that the more he heard of the Government spokesman’s apologia, the more he felt the need for turning the searchlight inward. He wondered if behind his earlier determination to stay on in Noakhali was not ‘sheer obstinacy’ on his part.

ONE MEMBER: Tell us how we can wash off our sin. What are your orders?

Gandhiji replied that he was ever averse to issuing orders. In Noakhali he could not. In Bihar he could but did not want to. The very nature of the work precluded it. What he wanted was to awaken their conscience and win their reasoned co-operation. Since the advent of power, Congressmen had forgotten the path of duty. In a way Muslims had come to believe Jinnah’s charge that the Congress did not belong to all, that the Muslims that were with the Congress were there as mere puppets of the Congress with an axe to grind to the detriment and ruin of Islam. If the Hindus were sincere and brave, even the few Muslims that were with them could give the lie to that calumny and enable the Muslim masses to see that they were being misled, and perhaps save them from being misled.

He had served Bihar before. He had now come to them on what might be his last pilgrimage. If he died striving there, he would have done his duty. All things hung on truth, courage and knowledge. If none of these virtues was there, the future was dark indeed for Bihar and for India.

A Congressman got up to say that some Congressmen had taken part in the riot. He was interrupted by another Congressman who emphatically declared ‘that no Congressman had taken any part in the riot’. Gandhiji felt hurt. The gentleman, he cut in, did not seem to know what he was talking about. Even their own colleagues had admitted that some Congressmen had taken part [in the riot]. If their confession was half-hearted they would not gain anything by it. He had said enough. They were all responsible people. They should search their hearts.
The Chief Minister explained the genesis of the trouble and how his Government had tried to do all they could before, during and after the outbreak. They were caught unprepared. The Governor was absent. The Chief Secretary and the Inspector-General of Police, both Englishmen, had let them down. British officers were having their revenge for 1942. He was sure, the ‘inquiry would fully vindicate the Bihar Government’. Of course, they could not act with the strength of Pandit Nehru, who gave a thorough shaking to the officers. If it could be proved that the Government had intentionally allowed a single Muslim to be killed, said Chief Minister, they would have no right to remain in office.

Then, put in Gandhiji, it had to be admitted that there had been lack of foresight. They should not bring in the Governor or the English officers. The popular Ministers had to act as if the Governors did not exist. Granting that they (the Ministers) had not been guilty of any willful neglect of duty, still something was owing for what had actually happened. That needed intelligence, courage and purity of heart. Never had he been confronted with such a stupendous task in his life. Everything turned on what he could do with Bihar and the Biharis. If he succeeded in Bihar, India would be saved, the situation in the Punjab would be controlled, and the Frontier Province, Sind and Baluchistan would come into their own.

25. ‘Do or Die’: Gandhi Stays On in Bihar
A Letter by M.K. Gandhi, 11 March 1947
CWMG, Vol. LXXXVII, p. 68.

PATNA

I have your letter. Now you and Shantilal have to worry about Panchgani. I don’t think I can leave this place in the near future. I must do or die. God alone knows the final result. I understand about Bhangis. As regards village industries consult Kumarappa.

26. Gandhi Asks Leaguers to ‘Convince the People’: ‘Hindus Should Not Worry At All’
M.K. Gandhi’s Talk with Muslim League Members, 11 March 1947

PATNA

In your own interest please do not exaggerate. I admit that whatever has happened here is really deplorable. But in Noakhali also [the Hindus] are full of fear. Volunteers amongst you should go there and convince the people that we haven’t yet attained independence and ask them why they are fighting with each other. You should go and declare that even a little Hindu girl or boy is just like your daughter or son and that they [Hindus] should not worry at all. If you go and do this much, peace will automatically return to the Punjab and Bihar. At the same time your name will shine forth in the world. Everyone is liable to make mistakes; but if they are rectified in time with a sincere heart, they will be forgotten.

27. Non-violent Resistance to Provocations

M.K. Gandhi’s Speech at Prayer Meeting in Patna, 11 March 1947

Gandhiji began his address by saying that that was perhaps his last evening prayer for the time being in the city of Patna, because his tour was going to begin on the following day. For the next few days, he would tour with the city as the centre and return to it every night for rest, the prayers being naturally held elsewhere. He expected, however, that the spirit in which the previous evening’s contributions to the fund for the Muslim sufferers had been made would continue unabated. The collections had amounted to nearly Rs 2,000, besides some ornaments, which yet remained to be auctioned. He was glad that women had given their ornaments, and he reminded them in this connection that the true ornament of woman was a pure heart, the place of which could never be taken by any physical adornment.

A friend said to me today that what the Hindus had done was no doubt very wrong, but that they had acted under great provocation. How could they remain peaceful after such incitement and provocation? Well, we should not try to minimize our guilt. The above argument would mean that if someone abuses or beats you, you will also return the abuse and hit back. Is it good to do the very thing, which angers you? You in your turn will provoke further anger. The world has reached the stage of atomic warfare in returning violence for violence. Let us pray to God that He may save us from this atom bomb mentality. I have been persuading everyone to observe silence in reply to abuse or violence.

The whole world tries to suppress the coward. Even God does not help the coward. He says, ‘A person who is afraid of anyone except me, lacks faith in me.’ The brave man who has learnt the lesson of non-violence does not return abuse for abuse, nor does he slaughter innocent children and women under any provocation.

If I am starving and you feed me, the contentment in my eyes will brighten your face too. But take another instance. Suppose I am starving and demand food from you by abusing you. You will drive me away, saying: ‘Go and starve yourself to death.’ My abuses will not get me food. They will, however, make me feel that I am a brave man. Again, if you ask your gatekeeper to beat me up for my abuses that will sow the seeds of hatred against you in my heart. I will say, ‘You may deny me food if I abuse you; but why did you beat me?’ The next day I shall gather a few friends and retaliate. Or, if you manage to kill me, it will create among my relations and friends a feeling of revenge against you. This will aggravate the quarrel. I look upon all this as cowardice. Even if the Muslims had incited the Hindus, they should have remained peaceful.

An evil returned by another evil only succeeded in multiplying it, instead of reducing it. It was a universal law, he said, that violence could never be quenched by superior violence but only by non-violence or non-violent resistance. But the true meaning of non-violent resistance had often been misunderstood or even distorted. It never implied that a non-violent man should bend before the violence of an aggressor. While not returning the latter’s violence by violence, he should refuse to submit to the latter’s illegitimate demand even to the point of death. That was the true meaning of non-violent resistance.

I shall now discuss Pakistan. Jinnah Saheb is my friend. I have gone to his house many a time. If Jinnah Saheb says to me: ‘Concede Pakistan or I will kill you,’ I will reply: ‘You may kill me if you like; but if you want Pakistan, you should first explain it to me. If you convince me that Pakistan is a worthy ideal and Hindus are maligning it for no reason, I shall proclaim to the Hindus from the house-tops that you should get Pakistan.

But if the demand was backed by force, then the only course open to the non-violent man was to offer non-violent resistance against it as long as he was not convinced of its justice. One was not to return violence by violence but neutralize it by withholding one’s hand and, at the same time, refusing to submit to the demand. This was the only civilized way of getting on in the world. Any other course could only lead to a race for armaments interspersed by periods of peace brought about by exhaustion, when preparations would be going on for violence of a superior order. Peace through superior violence inevitably led to the atom bomb and all that it stood for. It was the complete negation of non-violence and of democracy, which was not possible without the former.

The non-violent resistance described above required courage of a superior order to that needed in violent warfare. Forgiveness was the quality of the brave, not of the cowardly. Gandhiji here related a story from the Mahabharata: one of the Pandava brothers was accidentally injured while living in disguise in the home of King Virata. The brothers not only hid what had happened, but for fear that harm might come to the host if a drop of blood touched the ground, they prevented it from doing so by means of a golden bowl. It was this type of forbearance and courage, which Gandhiji wished every Indian to develop, whether he was a Hindu, Mussalman, Christian, Parsi or Sikh. That alone could rescue them from their present fallen condition.

A friend has written to me eulogizing the sword. The Muslims came here, says he, hurling abuses and unfurling Muslim League flags. We tried to dissuade them, continues the friend, but they did not listen. When, however, we pulled out the swords, asserts the friend, they came to their senses and became our friends. I tell you this was no true bravery. The persuasion was backed by the threat of the sword. Threats do not produce true friendship. If you were honest, you should have told the Muslims: ‘Look here, you are only a handful and we are vast majority. You are abusing us. You want to unfurl your flag. And yet we shall not say anything to you nor return your abuse. But we shall not allow you to unfurl the flag nor shall we salute: the Pakistani flag.’ If the Muslims had seen that, in spite of your vast majority, you do not wish to fight them, but that on the other hand you wish to be friendly with them, their conscience would have awakened and they would have become your true friends. The weapon of non-violence is mightier than the weapon of violence. The last Great War also proves this truth.

The lesson of non-violence was present in every religion but Gandhiji believe that perhaps it was here in India that its practice had been reduced to a science.

Hindu religion prescribes great tapashcharya for the realization of ahimsa. It is said that innumerable Hindus had shed their blood in the cause of ahimsa until the Himalayas became purified in their snowy whiteness by means of that sacrifice. The Hindus of today pay only lip service to ahimsa. You must demonstrate true ahimsa in this land of Ramachandra and King Janaka. True bravery consists in true ahimsa. At the moment you are guilty of committing very cowardly acts.
28. ‘Women as the Very Embodiment of Non-violence’
M.K. Gandhi’s Meeting with Muslim Women, 16 March 1947

You should have faith in God. He is the one who looks after everyone. I am only striving [to do my duty]. You mix with the Hindu women. Tell the children in your families things, which promote love [among the two communities]. What you can do, men can never do. Tell your husband, son or father, or whoever is there, that he should rush to the rescue of the Hindus if they are terrorized by the Muslims anywhere in the country. Protect the Hindu women and inspire confidence in them that they are your own sisters. I have described women as the very embodiment of non-violence. God has given to woman a loving heart which man does not possess. You should put it to good use. It is as clear to me as daylight that as long as women do not acquire qualities of refinement and do not realize their duty, the country can make no progress. Women from numerous such Muslim families have come to me. So many of them are just like daughters to me. One of them is right in Noakhali. Amtussalaam is just skin and bones, but she is putting up a brave fight. She undertook a number of fasts. Raihana who comes from the family of Abbas Tyabji is just as brave. She is a devotee of Krishna. She reads the Gita and the Koran together. She understands the meaning of the Gita as much as she understands the meaning of the Koran. I believe that she has more Hindus than Muslims among her friends. There are many girls who have given up distinctions of caste and creed. My advice to you is that you should forget distinctions of caste and community if you want to be happy. It is one God who has endowed us with human life. We are all human beings, all men and women belonging to the same country. Let us justify our religion as human beings.

29. Gandhi Disturbed by Violence in Bihar
M.K. Gandhi’s Speech at a Prayer Meeting in Bir, 18 March 1947

I saw today the wreckage caused by us at Masaurhi. I had read in newspapers the Muslim League version of the happenings at Masaurhi, and I confess I thought the version was grossly exaggerated. I did not believe that man could be so depraved or that Biharis could stoop so low. But today I witnessed it with my own eyes. When Muslims fled you either looted their property or destroyed it. They had not harmed you in any way. I have come here with the resolve of serving the Muslims. I am a servant of God and therefore consider it my duty to serve all human beings.

It is very unfortunate that our hearts have not yet been cleansed. I concede that the Muslims behaved very viciously in Calcutta and Noakhali. But how can that be avenged in Bihar? It was very wrong decision to observe a Noakhali Day here. Had I known it, I would never have allowed such an observance in Bihar. I am very sorry that my name was falsely dragged into this affair and I was maligned.

My statements were presented to the public in a twisted and distorted form. When Pandit Jawaharlal Nehru constituted the Provisional Government at Delhi, people wished to celebrate the occasion like Diwali. When I heard this, I said we would do no such thing because Jawaharlal and his colleagues had put on a crown of thorns. The Muslim League had not joined the Government and it was a pity that riots had broken out in Noakhali. But my statement was distorted and people were told that Gandhi wanted them to observe a Noakhali Day. I had never dreamt of this. And when the Noakhali Day was observed, people were so much excited that they thought they were expected to settle the Noakhali scores with the Muslims.

Hindus and Muslims used to live here as good neighbours. They had mutual love and affection. They might have quarreled occasionally, but that did not affect their relations. They used to become friends again soon. It is an altogether different story now. Today celebration of any Day leads to fratricide. I have said that this must not happen while I am alive. I can never be a witness to fratricide. If this thing is repeated in Bihar I shall perish in that conflagration. I have heard that the Muslims here are panic-stricken over the Punjab Day to be observed on the 23rd. I hope this is a false alarm. I assert that we must not observe a Punjab Day. If we do this, it will lead to dreadful consequences. The freedom of our country will become a distant dream. I pray to God that He must never let me live to witness that day. I am awakening the whole of Bihar through these words addressed to you.

While I was coming to the village of Bihar, the residents of two villages stopped me on the way and handed over to me two letters. The first letter was addressed jointly by the Hindus and Muslims of Sain. They also contributed Rs 55 for the relief of distressed Muslims in Bihar. I wish to read out to you their letter. They write:

We the residents of Sain are pained to see you in anguish which has been caused by our foolishness. We are extremely sorry for what has happened. Here, however, we Hindus and Muslims lived like brothers despite the prevailing lawlessness and we are happy and proud to tell you that we are living as brothers even today. We seek your blessings that we may continue to live in love and affection.

The other letter was given to me by the residents of Barni. They write:

When the riots were going on all around we formed a peace committee. No one was harmed here and no disturbance was caused in our area. There is absolutely no difference between Hindus and Muslims. We are working on the same lines even today, and we assure you that we will always continue to live like brothers.

The residents of this village also were not involved in any riot; and yet they are feeling sorry. This has made me very happy.

Some of our Muslim brothers have said that they are afraid of returning to their homes. Thieves and dacoits have carried away their goods. According to me, even the thieves and dacoits are our brothers. It would be ideal if they gave up their profession. But if that is not possible, they should at any rate not rob the innocent people whom we have beaten away from their homes.

Now you should contribute as much as you can for the relief of the Muslims in distress. I cannot collect the donations myself, because that exhausts me, besides I shall have to work during the night also. Volunteers are going round for collection. Please donate the maximum amount you can and thereby earn the merit for it and at the same time atone for your sins.

Gandhijike Dukhe Dilki Pukar-II, pp. 10–12
Shah Uzair Munimi, President of the District Congress Committee, described the devastation in Patna district. According to him the district of Patna was the worst-hit in Bihar. After listening to his report, Gandhiji said:

What should we do now? Have you thought of something? Shah Saheb replied that if they could get even a few honest men, thing could be set right. Thereupon Gandhiji asked:

Is it or isn’t it a fact that quite a large number of Congressmen took part in the disturbances? I ask this question because people are making this allegation. But the Congressmen assembled here can themselves tell the truth. How many of the 132 members, your Committee were involved? It would be a very great thing if all of you assert that none of you was involved. But this assertion cannot be made. These 132 are supposed to be the elected representatives of the people. But, I learn there is a lot of fraud involved in this. There are many in the Congress who register bogus members by paying four-annas from their own pockets and thus become elected representatives. I have also worked in the Congress. Today I am not even a four-anna member. But there was a time when I was a member of the Working Committee and I was virtually all in all. Hence I know the Congress inside out. This Police Station has jurisdiction over 300 villages which have elected 132 representatives. They can do substantial work if they so choose.

I wish to ask you, how could you live to see an old woman of 110 years being butchered before your eyes? How could you tolerate it? I do not wish to talk about anything else. I have vowed to do or die. I will not rest nor let others rest. I would wander all over on foot and ask the skeletons lying about, how all that had happened. There is such a fire raging in me that I would know no peace till I have found a solution for all this. You know what happened when I reached Sodepur. I had not gone there for rest. Hence I left for Kazirkhil and Chaumuhani is a big Station. What was the use of waiting there? Kazirkhil had been devastated. But the station-master there had transformed it into some sort of an ashram. So I requested him to take me to some place where there were no amenities. Hence I proceeded to Srirampur. It was a predominantly Muslim area with only a sprinkling of Hindu houses which had been burnt down. The Muslims welcomed me. Even then I hurried from there and wandered from village to village. I am afraid I will have to go through the same ordeal in Bihar. If I find that my comrades are deceiving me, I will be furious and I shall walk barefoot on and on through hail or storm. I would throw away the soft seat and other amenities which you have offered me. After all, it was in Bihar that I had renounced similar comforts earlier. When I came to Champaran in 1917, though Rajendra Babu and other leaders were my friends, they used to have their meals in separate kitchens. I asked them why we should eat separately when we were all engaged in rendering service. Then I set up a common kitchen. My wife Kasturba, Mahadev Desai’s wife Durgabehn and Narahari Bhai’s Manibehn all of them together used to cook and all of us had our meals together. I would never get more loyal and hearty co-operation in the whole world than what I got from Rajendra Babu, Brijkishore Babu, Janak Babu, Dharani Babu and Gorakh Babu. As a result of this there was a transformation in Champaran. The British indigo planters lost their hold. But I am told the Indian planters today have become even more powerful. The lesson we learnt in Champaran was the result of the hardships undergone by the people of Bihar. Without them I could not be what I am nor could my achievements be worth much. I am bird of passage. God has not allowed me to stay at one place. We have to work in the same spirit today with which Brijkishore Babu had worked. Today I do not find that honesty or loyalty. I once again appeal to you to work only if you can do so truthfully. My words may sound harsh, but you must realize that even if you forsake me, I shall not leave Bihar. It is difficult to force me out of Bihar. During the Champaran satyagraha, the Commissioner of Tirhut notified me that I, being an outsider, should leave the area. I told Brijkishore Babu and Rajendra Babu that I wished to challenge the Government and that they would have to give up their legal profession and become my clerks or interpreters if they decided to back me up. I gave them a night's time to think it over. Rajendra Babu had been offered a judicial post. But the next morning itself he and Brijkishore Babu announced that they had decided to give up their legal practice and to become my clerks and interpreters. The Bihar of today is the result of the transformation of their hearts. It is now for you to decide whether I should go in the car or travel on foot. Of course I prefer walking. When Muslims in Noakhali taunted me to go to Bihar, I used to feel hurt. Some Muslims look upon me as an enemy of Islam. Some people expressed doubts whether I could achieve what I wanted to in Noakhali. But I had no doubts. Even today I believe that I can work for Noakhali and the whole of India from Bihar. The non-violent fight which I had launched against injustice and oppression in Champaran had sent new life pulsating throughout India. The work in Bihar this time is far more difficult and significant. This time it seems I will have to strive to the utmost to prove that Hinduism and Islam can exist side by side. This is being put to test today. Many people believe that they cannot and one will have to remain subordinate to the other. I do not think so. If the Hindu Mahasabha insists that Muslims should remain subordinate to Hindus or if the Muslim League insists that Hindus should subordinate themselves to Muslims, this will not do. No one need live as subordinate to another. All have to live together as equals. Even Jinnah Saheb has now declared that the minorities will be shown greater consideration in regions where Muslims constitute the majority.

Q. All people lived like brothers in Bihar before the trouble started in Bengal. Later on Noakhali turned everyone's head. The events in the Punjab are also casting their shadows. It is necessary that we go and live among the people to prevent the outside evil influence from spreading and to maintain cordial relations. But today many Congressmen do not wish to serve the people; they want power for themselves. They join the Congress for their own selfish ends and indulge in intrigue and groupism. How shall we get out of this mire? If we strengthen the Congress in Bihar we can check the evil. The people of Bihar have behaved badly, we have become vicious, the whole atmosphere has been vitiated. In this atmosphere, many Congressmen kept quiet and could not stem the tide, and some of them were carried away by it.

A. It was easy to wrest power from British hands but it is very difficult to overcome our own weakness and to set up an efficient administration. You should tell me whether you can co-operate with me in this work or not. If you cannot, I request you to leave me. There are people today who declare that I am out of date and that I should give up all politics. I do not agree with this. This region is teeming with Hindus. We will not rely upon the police for our work although they are our police. We must do this work ourselves. Suhrawardy Saheb had deployed the police in Noakhali to protect me from Muslim fanatics; but I made friends with Muslims there. The Government here have also deployed the police. I ask them, what is the police for? Muslims are not going to kill me here; the Hindus may probably think of doing so. That is why I wish that the task of establishing peace should be undertaken by you all and not only by the Government although it is our Government. You should either achieve success in your mission or die in the attempt.

31. Gandhi Appeals to Hindus to ‘Undo’ the Damage
M.K. Gandhi’s Speech at a Prayer Meeting at Masaurhi, 20 March 1947

You know I have returned after a two days’ stay at Bir. I could see within these two days the damage wrought by us. Today also I saw a village which had been deserted, and where a large number of women and children had been killed. I cannot narrate the whole story, because my heart is so full that I might burst into tears if I tried to tell it. One who wants to see things for himself can still go there. We have not been able to do anything by way of reparations during all these months. The devastated villages continue to wear a deserted look. Even now thieves and dacoits haunt the place and carry away goods since no Muslim stays there. And how can the Muslims stay at a place where their brothers and sisters, parents and children have been slaughtered? The mere memory of the massacre will stun them. I myself, perhaps, could not have stayed there. You might argue that the Government should rebuild or repair the damaged houses. But I ask you, ‘Did you seek permission from the Government, when you resorted to murder, loot and arson?’ You have to atone for the sins, not the Government, because, after all the Government is your own and not imported from England.

If you rebuild Muslim houses and clean up their villages, they may think of returning to their homes in the confidence that Hindus had become their brothers, forgetting and forgiving the death of their relatives, who after all, had to die one day or other. But this can happen only if you rebuild their houses with your own hands, clean their wells, sink new wells to re-place the old ones filled with corpses of massacred Muslims. Muslims will trust you only when you do all this; and then they will return to their villages on their own. I appeal to every Hindu brother and sister to participate personally in undoing the damage. Those who are convinced that this is their duty should enter their names in the list with me or with Mridulabehn. Those who cannot come to me here or at Patna, should send their names by post. Much work remains to be done at Masaurhi too. You should render service wherever necessary, preferably in your own neighbourhood. There is no need for outsiders to come over to Masaurhi for their work of resettlement. Put up beautiful houses in place of the debris so that one who looks at them will hardly believe what ruins were there. When you do this it is bound to influence the other provinces too and its fragrance will spread all over India.

I would request you not to think of celebrating a Punjab Day. Never make the mistake of avenging the Punjab in Bihar. Just as the Muslims here are in panic, so are the Hindus trembling in fear in Noakhali at the talk of a Pakistan Day. I wish to reach the ears of Janab Suhrawardy Saheb, the Chief Minister of Bengal. I wish to remind him that he had called upon me, as a Hindu, to go to Bihar where Hindus had perpetrated many atrocities, and that I came to Bihar at his bidding. The Hindus here have indeed committed many sins which need to be atoned for. I am myself undergoing penance. That is why I am here in Bihar although I have many tasks awaiting me at Sevagram and in Delhi. If Suhrawardy Saheb wishes that I should remain in Bihar, he should prevent the observance of a Pakistan Day in Bengal. I do not want to prevent the Muslims from demanding Pakistan; but they should do so by explaining the advantages of Pakistan. Even if they want to observe a Pakistan Day, they should do so by convincing the Hindus so that they don’t get nervous.

Hindus have been writing to me and confessing their guilt. I am also receiving letters written by Hindus and Muslims that because of the fraternal feeling there had been perfect peace in the village and that they will never turn into each other’s enemies. Such sentiments make me happy. I am also happy that people are contributing generously for the relief of afflicted Muslims. But now I would appeal to you to donate not merely money but also your own hard labour; take up the trowel and get down to reconstructing the homes of Muslims which you have destroyed.

C. Bombay

1. Report from Bombay Province

   Home Poll (I), File No. 18/1/47, NAI.

   ...3. COMMUNAL—The communal situation in Bombay city continued to be disturbed during the fortnight and stray cases of stabbing occurred daily. There were also cases of arson, looting, acid-throwing and stone-throwing and some crude bomb incidents. The situation deteriorated on 9th January as a result of the murder of Mr D.N. Fad, a caste Hindu physical instructor, by a Muslim and a Hindu. Although the Hindu assailant claimed to be a Maratha, rumours were afloat that he was a Harijan and this resulted in the murder by caste Hindus of Mr B.J. Deorukhkar, a well-known Harijan leader, a member of Dr Ambedkar’s Party and a Municipal Corporator. On this day alone there were 43 stabbing cases, the highest number for a day during the fortnight. The workers in 43 textile mills struck work on the day on account of the murder of Mr Lad. The funeral procession of Mr Lad was attended by about 30,000 persons. The crowd swelled later to about 50,000 persons, most of whom were in an aggressive mood and attacked lorries and cars and stoned the surrounding buildings indiscriminately. One of the processionists also stabbed a Muslim in a passing lorry and as its driver accelerated his speed to get away from the crowd, he knocked down some processionists, three of whom succumbed to their injuries. This incident infuriated the mob who got out of control and indulged in rioting and arson on a large scale. The police resorted to firing on several occasions during the fortnight to disperse violent crowds and as a result 21 persons were injured. The total number of casualties from 1st September to 15th January is 769 dead and 2,612 injured. During this period 13,936 persons were rounded up and 4,731 persons were arrested for breach of prohibitory orders.
The only incidents which occurred in the rest of the Province during the fortnight are the burning of two paddy stacks in a village in the Kolaba District and the disturbances on 8th and 12th January in Nandurbar in the West Khandesh district. The disturbances arose over the premature termination of a wrestling bout on 8th January between a Muslim and a Hindu. Thereupon the spectators, who were mostly Hindus, created confusion and panic and as they dispersed they became rowdy and threw stones in a Muslim locality and damaged Muslim property. The police, however, rushed to the spot and restored order. The town continued quiet till the evening of 12th January, when suddenly there was a clash between two rival crowds. The police dispersed the crowds by opening fire. Shortly afterwards four persons were stabbed, one of whom died, and another was assaulted with sticks. No casualties were caused by police firing. The situation is now quiet....

   Home Poll (I), File No. 18/1/47, NAI.

   ...3. COMMUNAL: During the first half of the fortnight the communal situation in Bombay City began to improve, though stray stabbing incidents occurred daily. The situation again deteriorated on 23rd January, when...considerable hooliganism occurred in connection with the birthday celebrations of Mr Subhas Chandra Bose. The incidents assumed a communal aspect and several cases of stabbing, assault, stone-throwing, acid-throwing, and other things were reported from different parts of the city. In the wake of these disorders the news of the imposition of ban by the Punjab Government on the Muslim National Guards and the Rashtriya Swayam Sewak Sangh reached the City. As a result communal tension increased and stabbings and other incidents occurred daily. The police resorted to firing on several occasions to disperse violent crowds and as a result six persons were killed and 63 persons were injured. Tear gas was also used to disperse crowds defying curfew orders. The total number of casualties from 1st September to 31st January is 811 dead and 2,867 injured. During this period 14,814 persons were rounded up and 5,302 were arrested for breach of prohibitory orders.

   Collective fines amounting to Rs 18,400 were imposed on the residents of eight localities in the City.

   The Gujarat and Karnataka districts continued quiet.

   In Maharashtra, some incidents, mostly minor, occurred in the districts of Kolaba, East and West Khandesh and Poona. In Kolaba 13 houses and five cattle sheds were burnt and a Hindu MLA was stabbed by a Hindu. It is suspected that the latter was hired by a Muslim for the purpose. There were also two bomb explosions, one in a mosque and the other in a Hindu house. In East Khandesh, a clash between Hindus and Muslims occurred at Yawal over the question of playing music before a mosque. In West Khandesh, the situation at Nandurbar continued tense and a Hindu was assaulted and a Muslim boy was stabbed. In Poona, an attempt was made to set fire to the door of a mosque and two tombs were damaged....

1. Censorship of Newspapers and Other Organizations

Note by SP, CID, Delhi, 10 February 1947

File No. 29/47-C, 1947, Confidential Branch, Chief Commissioner's Office, Delhi, Delhi State Archives

Delhi CID,
No. D-1448
10.2.1947

A list is attached of the persons and organizations whose correspondence requires attention by our censorship staffs. It will be seen that censorship is only contemplated in the case of the Communist Party of India, the Congress Socialist Party, the Forward Bloc, the Revolutionary Socialist Party of India, Students and all communal volunteer organizations. The only exception to this is the censorship of newspapers. The reasons for including newspapers in our censorship list are as follows:

(a) a good deal of general information on the political situation, particularly with relation to the left wing parties, is obtained from sources in touch with newspapers;

(b) a large number of Government servants are in the habit of writing to newspapers of all political views either disclosing secret departmental information or revealing the fact that they are members of, or sympathizers with political or communal organizations contrary to departmental rules.

It is to be emphasized that the censorship of newspapers does not necessarily imply the collection of intelligence regarding the political parties which they represent as strict instructions have already been issued to all censorship staffs not to touch the correspondence of persons belonging to the political parties now in power at the Centre. The censorship contemplated is to collect intelligence which is in the interests of the Government of India and the local administration only. Moreover, left wing subversive organizations have their contacts in all newspapers and it is necessary to keep a watch on these. It is in the knowledge of the Intelligence Bureau that a considerable amount of information of value from this aspect has been derived from censorship of these newspapers already and it will leave a definite gap in our intelligence system if it is dropped.

The suggestion has been made that a somewhat irresponsible attitude is being adopted towards censorship in Delhi. It may be pointed out that all interceptions are dealt with by me personally and that the strictest supervision is exercised over the activities of censorship staffs. If the Home Department of the Government of India are to scrutinise our censorship lists it ought to be pointed out to them that most of the valuable information obtained by intercepting correspondence comes to light through the somewhat irregular process known as 'fishing'. It is only in this way that accommodation addresses of Communists and others, the whereabouts of absconders and, in fact all information other than the routine communications sent between branches of political organizations, can be ascertained. It is presumed, therefore that, in general, there will be no objection to a continuation of this system. On the other hand, if the Government of India record their objection to a regular order for the interception of the correspondence of any particular person or organization they cannot expect the Delhi CID to undertake the responsibility of producing any information, however important, relating to such person or organization in an irregular manner.

Secret
D.O. No. 158-ST/CC

Delhi
19 February 1947

My dear Porter,

This is in reply to your secret D.O. letter No.1570/47-Poll (I) dated 14th/15th instant regarding the censorship.

2. I am sorry that I omitted to give details of the students and their organizations mentioned at Serials No. 28 to No. 38 of the list enclosed with my D.O. letter No. 120.-ST/CC dated the 11th instant. These details are as follows.

There are three student organizations in Delhi.

The Delhi Provincial Muslim Students Federation which, although supports the policy of the Muslim League, contains an extremist left wing element which I think it is desirable to watch.

The Delhi Provincial Students Congress is at present under the influence of the Congress Socialist Party, but members of other revolutionary organizations at a work in it, including the Forward Bloc and the Revolutionary Socialist Party of India.

3. It has in the past been found necessary to watch the correspondence of the student organizations of the type of those mentioned above from the law and order point of view as irresponsible youths very often do not follow the land or instructions of their more sober-minded elders. It is therefore in the interest of good and peaceful administration to be able to anticipate strikes, demonstrations, and other things, more particularly as these more often than not lend to breaches of the peace.
4. Items 28–30 of the list refer to the three organizations mentioned above, while items 31–38 refer to the more prominent members of these organizations.

Yours sincerely,

W. CHRISTIE

2. Politicization of Government Servants

Minutes of the Fortnightly Meeting of the Home Department and the Chief Commissioner, Delhi, 18 March 1947
Home Poll (I), File No. 5/7/47, NAI.

79. Situation in Delhi.

The SSP mentioned that a number of Government clerks were participating in political demonstrations. On the 11th March (‘Anti-Pakistan Day’) large gatherings in which there were almost certainly government clerks hold meetings in Karol Bagh and Lodi Colony, shouted slogans and blocked roads. Lists of persons participating were not at present available, but were under preparation. The SSP suggested that Section 151 of the CPC could perhaps be applied as the 23rd March is being kept up as ‘Pakistan Day’ and the Hindu Mahasabha are planning to hold ‘Punjab Day’ also on the 23rd. He mentioned that communal tension had risen in the city and that Hindu and Sikh refugees are arriving from the Punjab.

3. Report from Delhi

Extract from the Fortnightly Report on Delhi for the First Half of March 1947, 19 March 1947
Home Poll (I), File No. 18/3/47, NAI.

Political and Communal—On this occasion also I combine these two paragraphs as it is almost impossible to separate the political events from the communal. The serious and widespread disturbances in the Punjab, following the resignation of the Unionist Ministry, have gravely agitated people of all classes and communities, and communal feelings in Delhi, which had shown a welcome improvement in previous weeks, have again deteriorated seriously and tension is high. The scarcity of news contained in the official communiqués issued by the Punjab authorities has encouraged the spreading of wild rumours and the publication of what are probably garbled and exaggerated reports, but subsequent information has not always proved these reports to be wrong.

The enthusiasm displayed by the Muslim League over what they regarded as the successful outcome of their civil disobedience movement has given place to acute nervousness as a result of the subsequent events in the Punjab and the possible repercussions they might have here in Delhi. The leaders of the Muslim National Guards and Bazm-i-Pakistan are now concentrating chiefly on what they call defensive precautions for the protection of the Muslim community. Even nationalist Muslims have been outspoken against Master Tara Singh in particular for his provocative speeches and the action which they allege was responsible for the outbreak of the rioting. Hindus and Sikhs on the other hand have severely condemned the police firing on Hindu and Sikh demonstrators in the early stages of the disturbances, and full support has been offered to the Hindus and Sikhs in their efforts to prevent the formation of a Muslim League Ministry there. The Sikhs more than the Hindus perhaps have been perturbed and have reacted even more violently to the news of the rioting in the Punjab, partly due to the lead given by Master Tara Singh and partly to the heavy casualties which Sikhs are said to have suffered. The result has been several inflammatory speeches at meetings at which His Excellency the Governor and Government officials of the Punjab have also been strongly criticized for their alleged alliance with the Muslim League. There has been talk of raising an Akali Regiment in Delhi and sending jathas to the Punjab but the Shiromani Gurdwara Parbandhak Committee is reluctant to take any definite action without instructions from Amritsar.

Anti-Pakistan [sic] Day was observed jointly by the Hindus and Sikhs in Delhi on the 11th March, and the occasion caused considerable anxiety to the authorities, but eventually it passed off without any serious major incidents, chiefly due to the fact that processions had been banned and other precautions taken. It is also true that the responsible leaders were not anxious to have a clash with the authorities, and the mischief-makers were really in a minority. Although considerable enthusiasm was displayed at the public meeting held on the afternoon of the 11th March, the attendance was actually below what had been expected. An Anti-Pakistan Council of Action has been formed in Delhi, the members of which are chiefly young and irresponsible elements of the Hindu and Sikh communities, including students. Throughout the day of the 11th the Hindu and Sikh shopkeepers in the city observed a hartal and Hindu and Sikh students remained absent from their classes. By midday most of the mills had closed down. The only important examples of lack of discipline of Government servants on that day was a strike of about 2,000 Hindu and Sikh workers in military depots in the Cantonments and by some residents of the Lodi Road Colony, who held an Anti-Pakistan meeting that evening.

The resolution passed by the Congress Working Committee recommending the partition of both Bengal and the Punjab as a solution of the communal problem of these Provinces has not been liked by the Muslims, who realize that its acceptance will merely reduce their Pakistan areas. On the other hand, the Hindus and Sikhs welcome the recommendation as it will give them two more Provinces in which they will hold a majority.

The RSS Sangh in Delhi held its annual rally on the 9th of March in which about one lakh of volunteers were present, of whom about half were from outside Delhi. Madho Rao Golvelkar, the leader of the Sangh, in his speeches both at the rally and at its subsequent private meetings was very cautious but gave strict instructions that all outsiders should leave Delhi without delay when the rally has finished. The recent announcement of the British Government to hand over power in India not later than June 1948 has led to an increase of activities by the Sangh with a view to strengthening it....

1. ‘Further Raids in Hazara Distt’

The Tribune, 5 January 1947.

RAWALPINDI, 4 Jan.—Alarming reports of further raids on a number of other villages in Hazara district—culminating in loot, murder and arson—are still pouring in every day.

Mallachh, a prominent village situated between Nathiagali and Doongagali in Hazara district, having about 400 non-Muslim houses was raided on the noon of 2 January by a mob about 100 strong, mostly composed of goondas of the area, according to report received here last night.

It is stated that the raiders after ransacking several houses, lifting cattle and removing grains, set fire to them—burning alive a number of inmates, including women, children and aged men.

One Arjan Singh, an only survivor of his family of about 12 persons, arrived here along with his brother Baldev Singh after traversing on foot a distance of about 60 miles mostly covered with snow. He told ‘The Tribune’ Representative that his wife, six children and children of his brother and uncles were done to death and their houses set fire to. He was himself saved because he was not present in the house and it was only on returning after the day’s work that he witnessed the tragedy enacted.

Arjan Singh despatched telegrams to the Frontier Governor and the Premier from Sunnybank, near Murree, on Friday afternoon intimating them the tragic happenings, which he characterized as general massacre.

Reports received from other sources further indicate that a number of villages including Mauri Wadhbhen, Jaba and Pelian, have been looted and burnt. Several other villages are threatened with the same fate.

Vaidya Yogi Ramnath Shastri, President of the District Congress Committee, Rawalpindi, has dispatched lengthy telegrams to Pt Jawaharlal Nehru, Sardar Patel, Sardar Baldev Singh, Acharya Kripalani, Khan Abdul Ghafer Khan, the Frontier Governor, Dr Khan Sahib and Mr Mehr Chand Khana conveying the above happening and requesting them to adopt immediate measures to save further catastrophe.

No. 74-L.D., dated Peshawar, the 8th January, 1947.
The North-West Frontier Province Public Safety Ordinance.
No. 1 of 1947.

An Ordinance to provide for special powers to prevent dissemination of false rumours and power to require security from the notables of a village to safeguard the property of evacuees.
Whereas the Governor of the North-West Frontier Province is satisfied that circumstances exist which render it necessary for him to take immediate action to provide for special measures to prevent dissemination of false rumours and power to require security from the notables of villages, and others, to safeguard the property of evacuees and to appoint chaukidars at the villagers’ expense to look after such property until they return.

NOW, THEREFORE, in exercise of the powers conferred by Section 89 of the Government of India Act, 1935, the Governor is pleased to make and promulgate the following Ordinance:

Short title, commencement and duration:

1. (1) This Ordinance may be called the North-West Frontier Province Public Safety Ordinance, 1947.

   (2) It shall come into force in the Hazara District at once. The Provincial Government may by notification in the official Gazette extend it to such other part of parts of the Province as it may deem fit.

   (3) It shall continue in force for a period of six months....

Protection of property of evacuees—

4. The District Magistrate, if satisfied that circumstances exist due to which a class of people have left their place of residence for fear of their lives or property, or both may with the approval of the Provincial Government—

   (a) call upon such lambardars and notables of the place as may be selected by him to execute a bond jointly or severally, with or without sureties, for such period and for such amount as may be considered sufficient by him for the safe custody of moveable and immoveable property left by the evacuee;

   (b) require the place, at its own expense, to furnish such number of chaukidars as he may consider necessary to look after the property of the evacuees until their return to the place....

3. ‘Public Safety Ordinance in Hazara District’

   Extracts from a Report from Dawn, 11 January 47.

Peshawar, Thursday.—A Public Safety Ordinance has been enforced in Hazara District for six months by the NWFP Government. It can be extended throughout the Province if considered necessary, says a Press communiqué issued by the Director of Information, NWFP.

...A fresh incident is reported from Nagridhudlal, north-east of Havelian, where some houses were attacked. Details are lacking.

It is understood that the provincial Government has allowed the Deputy Commissioner of Hazara to make use, without reference to the Government, of the powers under Section 22, 36 and 40 of the Frontier Crime Regulations.
Collective Fines
These sections relate to collective fines, expulsion from the district and taking of securities for keeping the peace and good behaviour.

Mr Mehrchand Khanna, Finance Minister accompanied by Sardar Ishar Singh, Revenue Parliamentary Secretary, left today on a second tour of Hazara.

A Press Note issued by the director of Information, NWFP, says: The Deputy Commissioner and superintendent of police of Hazara with detachments of the Frontier Constabulary and police rounded-up the villages of Garhi Phulgaran and Rajoya about six miles from Havelian.

'At Phulgaran, 40 people were evacuated while a family of 14 refused to leave the village. Two people were arrested and 10 taken as hostages. It was found that no arson or loot had been committed at Phulgaran.

'At Rajoya 40 shops had been burnt. The villagers were fined Rs 5,000 under Section 22 of the Frontier Crime Regulations. Of this, Rs 200 was realized on the spot. One family was evacuated from the village.

'At Balakot, 40 miles north of Abbottabad, eight shops of both communities and a place of worship were burnt on 5 January.'—API.

6. Communal Trouble in Hazara District

Extracts from a Report by Jai Dev Kapur, 17 January 1947
AICC Papers, File No. G-14/1946-47, NMML.

Along with the other people throughout India, the tribal people in the Hazara district were feeling the inconvenience due to shortage of food and other commodities during the II World War. The Muslim League leaders took an undue advantage of this and carried on misleading propaganda amongst the tribal people. They held meetings at several places to poison the minds of the tribal people. Unluckily Congress lost all but one Muslim seat in Hazara district to the Muslim League in the election. When the Congress Ministry was formed in NWFP, the leaguers made their headquarters in Hazara and started a vigorous propaganda against, the Congress in general and the Hindus in particular. When the Interim Government was formed by Pandit Nehru, the Leaguers raised the false cry that 'Hindu Raj was established in India' and poisoned the minds of the people further. The communal riots in Calcutta, Bombay, Noakhali and Bihar lent further breeze to the fire lit by the Muslim Leaguers especially when some Muslim from those places returned to the District carrying all kinds of panicky stories with them. The Leaguers sent their workers everywhere, and even students studying in mosques were employed for this nefarious work. The Provincial Government was in the know of this. It was expected that the tribal people would resort to dacoities at any time. Just two months before the first dacoity from the side of the tribal people, Khan Wali Mohd Khan, son of Badshah Khan, came to Batal on a hunting expedition and he, being fully informed of the situation, went back and requested Dr Khan Sahib to make proper arrangements in the Batal Area....

Communal troubles are continuing throughout the Hazara District and 31,000 Hindus and Sikhs are in a dangerous position. Some have been killed, some wounded, and some invariably reduced to the position of paupers. These people are today roaming about for want of shelter and several are even sick due to their being ill clothed in this winter season.

If proper action is not taken in time, similar troubles are expected in other parts of Northern India.

It is suggested that the Government should immediately take the following measures:

1. The Leaders who are responsible for this disturbance should be at once arrested and should be given severe punishments.
2. The Sirdars of Karlal Nation, who disturbed the area between Murree Hills and Havelian should be at once taken into custody.
3. Strong measures should be taken under Public Safety Act, curfew order and Section 144 and these should be firmly enforced.
4. The Government officials who have taken part should be suspended and tried by the proper court.
5. The Hindus and Sikhs who have evacuated the District to the Punjab and Kashmir should be brought back with assurances for their safety. Public men should be requested to help in this. A greater number of Hindus and Sikhs should be sent to live in places like Kot Najibullah, Haripur, Sarai Salah, Havelian, Abbotabad, Nawan Shar, Dhamtaur, Mansehra, Baffa, Shinkairi and Garhi Bahibullah and must be properly provided with military forces till peace is restored.
6. The Government should take charge of Relief Camps and the children of people killed in riot.
7. The Hindus and Sikhs who are arrested for nothing should be released immediately.
8. The minorities should be provided with arms and ammunition for their self-protection.
9. Each Member of the Ministry should by turn visit the disturbed area and increase the confidence of the people by his stay there.
10. Badshah Khan should be requested to instruct his Salar of Khudai Khidmat to tour the riot-affected area and to create a peaceful atmosphere there.
11. The Relief amount of Rs 25,000 sanctioned by the Frontier Government is highly insufficient. The President of the Frontier PCC should be requested to provide funds for this purpose. People very badly affected should be given the necessary relief.

Jai Dev Kapur.

7. Communal Disturbances a Result of League Propaganda
Letter from Vallabhbhai Patel to M.K. Gandhi, 17 January 1947

REVERED BAPU,

...Yesterday there was a wire from you regarding Hajara district but that matter is under Jawahar’s jurisdiction. He has sent his reply by wire.

There the situation is not peaceful. In Hajara district there are nine lac Muslims, 31 thousand Hindus and Sikhs. 20 thousand has left the place. 50 to 60 must have been killed. There was much looting and many buildings were burnt. They are taking revenge of Bihar. In the beginning at two or three places there was widespread looting and buildings were set on fire by frontiers tribes. Therefore local Muslims are indulging in the destructive activities, League is asking people to take revenge of Bihar incidents, and this is result. Badshah Khan has left that place in such horrible incidents, and this has gone to Bihar where everything is quite. But he will do what he thinks proper.

British officers are doing nothing to extinguish fire. They allow the situation to remain as it is. Some are instigating. Khan Saheb is good person but his position is awkward. Poisonous propaganda of League is continuing. So he is afraid to taking a drastic step. Such is the situation at present.

Rajkumari is here. After some time she will be again going to Europe.

3. Communal—The situation inside the Hazara District has been bad during the fortnight under report but latest indications disclose an improvement. There are instances of Mohammadaans, particularly of the rural classes, sheltering Sikhs and Hindus, and inviting those who have fled to return on guarantees of protection.

Arrangements are under way to establish on a more permanent footing and under civil control the refugee camp which the military authorities have started at Kakul near Abbottabad. A special officer of the Provincial Civil Service has been appointed and accommodation arranged. A census of evacuees in Punjab centres has been started.

At the request of the North West Frontier Province Government the Punjab police along the Rawalpindi–Hazara border have agreed to cooperate with the local District authorities inside the Hazara district at points inaccessible from Hazara district centres.

Orders under section 144 Criminal Procedure Code were promulgated earlier in the fortnight at Abbottabad and certain other towns of the Hazara district prohibiting speeches, processions and assemblies of more than five people. As reported in the Press, the Governor has promulgated a public Safety Ordinance. This Ordinance is confined to a penal provision to regulate speeches and dissemination of rumours, and to measures for taking and enforcing village security for safeguarding the property of evacuees. Hitherto it is having a useful effect.

As a special temporary measure the Deputy Commissioner, Hazara, has also been empowered to use certain sections of the Frontiers Crimes Regulations relating to security and collective fines without prior reference to the Provincial Government.

The Oghi border is quiet and it is hoped that the transborder tribes will comply in full with the terms imposed at a Jirga on the 4th January held between tribal representatives and the Commander of the Military Force assembled to enforce submission. The terms then announced were 40 hostages, Rs 75,000 in cash and 75,303 rifles. Rs 28,000 have already been recovered in cash and 7 rifles and 27 valuable hostages surrendered. The tribes have been given up to the 19th of January to comply in full. A Sikh girl who had been kidnapped has been surrendered.

Master Tara Singh visited Abbottabad during the fortnight and was naturally agitated at that he saw and heard.

The Military authorities’ assistance in dealing generally with problems in aid of the civil power, and with the refugee situation, has been invaluable.

The exodus of large numbers of Hindus and Sikhs refugees to Rawalpindi and to the Punja Sahib shrine at Hasan Abdal in the Punjab must have caused embarrassment to the Punjab authorities, but the North West Frontier Province Government have received the fullest cooperation from them in all respects, and hope shortly that rehabilitation and relief measures will begin to have effect.

By order, etc.,
D.G.H. de la FARGUE,
Chief Secretary to Government,
North-West Frontier Province.

9. Tribal Raids in Hazara

Jawaharlal Nehru’s Speech in the Central Legislative Assembly, 3 February 1947

The Honourable Pandit Jawaharlal Nehru: (Member for External Affairs and Commonwealth Relations): Sir, the occurrences that took place in Hazara district last month were very unfortunate and I am sure the whole House will deplore these occurrences. The motions for adjournment read out look upon the affair from two different angles. One seeks to condemn the Government for not taking action; the other seeks to condemn the Government for taking too much action. As a matter of fact, I think this particular incident, deplorable as it is, shows the extreme efficiency of Government in this particular matter, and the extreme leniency of Government also in this particular matter. It is very difficult for Government, for me, to say much about preventing such things happening, because all these things are due to many causes, and it is not an easy matter unless some long distance policy is aimed at. Unfortunately such things do take place. Unfortunately even now people are kidnapped; raids take place on some scale and this House must accept the position that this sort of thing must be stopped. In the present instance, what happened has already been publicly stated in a number of communiqués issued by the Government. We have tried to take the public fully into our confidence right from the beginning. There was, unfortunately, due to certain agitation largely conducted by people coming from outside the Tribal areas and the Frontier Province....

Sir, I wanted to tell the House exactly where matters stand. I want to oppose the motion, because there is no urgency about it. There is no question of anything happening—something happened a month ago. I should like to take the House into my confidence if you will permit me. Otherwise, I merely oppose the motion.

JN: Many of the facts that the Honourable Member has stated are perfectly correct but I should like the Honourable Member to bear in mind that this kind of thing is not new, although certain new factors came in. It is a very difficult matter to deal with these situations, more especially because a certain policy has been followed and it is not easy to change that policy completely and suddenly. I do not think it is correct to say that the various incidents to which the Honourable Member has referred necessarily indicated that there would be a raid. Such incidents are continually happening. There was this raid. It was not on a very big scale but it had disastrous consequences undoubtedly, in that it resulted in killing, looting and burning of property. It lasted for a fairly short time. I cannot exactly state the period. May be the whole thing was over in two or three days' time. Immediately steps were taken. I do not think it is possible to say that the steps subsequently taken were either delayed or inefficient. It may be that if a different policy, a long-term policy, had been acted upon, such things might not have happened but this might equally be said about many other things happening in India. We are the inheritors of past policies, of past legacies and some of them are of such a nature that we cannot change them suddenly. That is why we want independence for this country, so that we may be able to change them quickly and completely....

We had a choice in this matter as to whether we should immediately bomb these territories from the air or not. After very grave consideration, naturally, we were entirely opposed to bombing and we decided that we should not take this step. Our decision was justified by subsequent events because, in effect, the other steps we took had the immediate effect of stopping the trouble. We sent armed forces there and various terms were announced. When the armed forces collected there, the tribes submitted to the terms imposed upon them. The terms were more or less lenient, although one of the adjournment motions refers to them as barbarous terms. The terms imposed upon them were a cash fine of Rs 75,000, a fine of 75 rifles and the surrender of 40 hostages. Now this business of taking hostages and keeping them is certainly not a very desirable one. I may, however, draw the attention of the House to what is happening in the Tribal areas in regard to these raids. That is also extremely barbarous and Jawaharlal Nehru: (Member for External Affairs and Commonwealth Relations): ... Sir, of the adjournment motions that come before the House from time to time I venture to say that there has been one with such little justification as this one.... I was anxious also that this matter be debated in this House because there has been so much said and so much is being said directly or obliquely or by insinuation about various things happening in the Frontier that a debate here would probably not only enlighten the House but the country. So far as I am concerned or so far as the Government is concerned inevitably we would have to follow the policy which was commendable to this House and the country. We have no other alternative before us. If a policy suggested by us does not commend itself to the House, we have to change that policy or we have to resign. Therefore, I am glad of this opportunity because we will be able to know at least the temper of the House in regard to such matters. I have no doubt that on future occasions we may have to come up before the House for more guidance and directives as to how we should proceed about the general policy, which we may pursue.

I am glad that the Honourable Mover of this motion has said that there is nothing communal about this. Unfortunately, there is on this subject, though not on this motion, a great deal of communal passion and communal criticism. There is, if I may say so, a great deal of misuse of language. The subject is worthy of discussion, but I do submit to this House that the language of this motion itself and the language that the Honourable Mover used about barbarous inhumanities and other things, is a complete misuse of language or ignorance of language. Some of the facts have been stated and I shall state the facts still further, if necessary.

Now, there are two or three points. This motion is perhaps confined to one particular issue, which is inevitably mixed up with the larger issue of policy in the Frontier. That is a big issue and I do not think I would be entitled to take up the time of the House over it even if I was prepared for it. Nothing has been a greater burden on my mind during these last five months since I have been in charge of my Department than this question of the policy to be pursued on the Frontier. I took an early opportunity to go to the Frontier. Ever since then I have thought about it. I have many ideas on the subject and some of them have been discussed among my colleagues. Ultimately we felt that in view of other developments elsewhere in the Constituent Assembly and in the Advisory Council, which is particularly meant, among other things, to deal with Tribal areas, it would perhaps not be desirable for a new policy to be initiated from the External Affairs Department. So, for this reason as well as for other reasons we did not attempt to initiate that new policy though at the same time inevitably we tried to give a new orientation to such policies as were being pursued. There were other difficulties, of course, because our problem, whether it is a Frontier problem or any other problem, is connected and is affected by various developments in India. This very instance about which this motion has been brought was in a sense a reflection of something that happened elsewhere in India. And we thought that because of this close connection with all India events, it could not be wholly isolated from them and it had to be taken together. Perhaps an attempt to hasten a change there without due consideration of an all India problem may not yield results or might yield wrong results. In other matters, undoubtedly, as Member in charge of the External Affairs Department, I am fully responsible for anything that may happen in the Frontier in regard to this Department. I do not for an instant deny any responsibility or disclaim it. Nevertheless, the House knows well that any head of the Department has got the machinery and apparatus which he inherits, he cannot function just as he wills unless that machinery and apparatus are changed. Now, Sir, the Frontier machinery and apparatus have been trained in a particular way for over 100 years. It is not so much the question of the present personnel. The personnel there for years past have been trained in a particular way. It is a way with which I have little sympathy and naturally because that policy was laid down long ago with different objectives and today, with an entirely different approach, few people can have sympathy with that policy. I do not propose to argue whether that policy in the past succeeded or failed. But I would certainly submit that it is totally out of keeping with the present day. And so, it was a peculiar question, a big question before us, how far with this present machinery and apparatus of government in the Frontier Province, trained in this past policy, we can use them, how far we can initiate new policies without some other changes also. So, for these reasons we decided not to put forward any radically new policy for the moment, but wait rather for the Advisory Council and the Constituent Assembly to consider these matters. But if, however, occasion arises and some day this policy is to be considered, the House may take it that it will be placed before it for consideration before any vital change is made....

Well, Sir, what happened there in so far as this border raid is concerned? On the 7th and 8th December, 1946, a large body of transborder tribesmen raided the villages of Battal and Oghi. During that raid two market places were burnt down, 15 Hindus and two Muslims were killed, bazaars were burnt and looted. There were other petty outrages in the district. On the next day or two days after, a lorry load of Hindus mainly women and children, who were trying to escape, were stopped and there was a general massacre of the occupants of that lorry. Fourteen were killed, chiefly women and children, and 27 were wounded.

Now, Sir, practically speaking these are the main incidents which happened in connection with this border raid. I have to meet two arguments, firstly that we were slow and lenient, and secondly that we were barbarous and medieval. The two really cancel each other. I put it to the House, I will give the facts to the House and leave the House to judge them. Immediately this happened, within a day or two of it, we were seized of the facts, we gave very earnest consideration to various proposals that were put before us from those in authority in the Frontier over these Tribal areas. The proposals were that we should bomb these territories from the air. The House knows that we have been averse to bombing, we are averse to bombing. Powerful arguments were adduced that this was the safest course, the humanest and the quickest way of putting an end to the problem. We were told that there was danger that if we did not put an end to this, it might spread, it might affect other Tribal territories round about. We were told that the settled areas also were in danger. It was a very difficult proposition for us because we took the responsibility of the danger of this trouble spreading. On the other hand we were totally averse to this bombing business. I must confess that I spent a very difficult day and very difficult two nights thinking over this problem and consulting others. I came to the conclusion for a variety of reasons that we should not bomb. In the meanwhile we had been waiting for further news about the developments in the Hazara district and this further news confirmed us in our conclusion. It has been suggested by Sardar Mangal Singh that we did not do anything for three weeks till January. Well, Sir, that is not correct. At that time we decided straightaway two things. First, of course that the Frontier constabulary should immediately go there and protect the citizens. Those who were easily available were there within a day or two and they did protect. In fact in one or two places they came into conflict with the raiders. But the bigger operation necessitated troops being collected there. It was decided to send a brigade immediately. But we were informed by the military that it would take some days, it would take about a fortnight before a full brigade could be gathered there. Meanwhile, of course, the House will remember that the armed constabulary and others were protecting the people.

So that while the Frontier constabulary was holding the fort—if I may say so—protecting the people, the brigade was gathering there and it did gather there. When the brigade was there early in January these terms were announced, because there was no point in terms being announced until there was nobody to enforce them. The terms, as the House has already heard, were a fine of Rs 75,000, 75 rifles and 40 hostages. I need not say much about the money part or the rifles, it was undoubtedly lenient. So far as the question of hostages is concerned, it sounds awful, and the Honourable Mover of this motion asked us if we are going to behead the hostages and the rest of it. As a matter of fact the House will remember that many of these tribesmen are continually taking hostages from us. It is a daily practice and a frequent practice. Every person kidnapped is a hostage held up for ransom and sometimes comes to a worse end. Now the real question before us is how we are to face this contingency and stop this, and I shall be very glad if any Honourable Member would help us in finding a solution. This taking of hostages means keeping certain persons handed over more or less as detenus—not in prison but under some restraint—till the terms are fulfilled and till there is an assurance that no further trouble will occur. It is unfortunately a custom which has been prevailing there for some time past in the Frontier areas. Whether I liked it or not, I did not myself feel justified in coming in the way of the local authorities who have been functioning in that way, and telling them that they must not do this, without being able to give them an alternative. But I prevented them—not I of course but Government prevented them—from indulging in air operations.

If I went on to tell them not to do this or that who was going to be responsible for the safety of the people or the prevention of any further disorder? It sounds awful but I do not think that keeping 40 or 50 or 60 men under restraint is so awful. The House will remember that thousands have been kept under restraint in various parts of India; it is not a measure of barbarity or anything, I do not like it to happen but it really means that certain persons who have misbehaved are kept in detention for a while. So that I do submit that there is nothing in it. We could not have done it previously, perhaps we might; I do not know; but what we did has in effect been justified by events and nothing further has happened. We have to find a balance between two factors; one is that we must make the evil-doers feel that they have done wrong and we must prevent them from continuing it and they must see that if they persist in it they will be punished. The second is, not to go so far as to make them feel humiliated and revengeful so that they may revert to their evil-doing afterwards. That balance is a difficult balance, but I think in this particular matter we did succeed in arriving at that balance and found some kind of middle way avoiding either extreme. And you can judge from this that since the first two or three days of these raids when a number of murders and looting occurred nothing further has occurred; we could keep them in check, whether with the constabulary or the armed forces. Secondly, when these terms, which are supposed to be terrible, were announced, they were accepted very soon. It was not necessary for our armed forces to enter the Tribal territory; before they entered it they were accepted and part payment was made immediately. I do not know if complete payment has yet been made. But about three-fourths of the payment was made, rifles were given, most of the hostages were given; and the leading Maliks of that area accepted those terms and promised good behaviour. So that such a terrible incident ended in relatively less ill feeling than it might have done; and, as one Honourable Member said, the people who had run away from their homes are returning to their homes. That too is a sign of how soon we are trying to go back to normal conditions.

I do submit that in those conditions Government, whatever their many failings might be, have succeeded remarkably in dealing with this particular situation; and I do submit further that this motion which condemns Government for their barbarity has absolutely no justification whatever. There is no question of barbarity, we dealt with the situation with extreme leniency and justice.

4. Communal.—In Hazara the fortnight has been devoted to further strenuous efforts to restore confidence and towards rehabilitation. The eyes of both communities concerned are still on the case of the Sikh woman reported in some detail a fortnight ago, but there have not been any outbreaks or further demonstrations of excitement. The Sikh woman and her female relatives are now in Peshawar in neutral hands and the question of her future is under consideration. Her Mohammaden protector is still absconding.

12. Forcible Conversion Triggers Communal Rioting

Letter from Sant Singh Talwar to M.A. Jinnah, 24 February 1947

PESHAWAR

Respected Quaid-i-Azam,

I am one of those Sikhs who honestly think that the peace and prosperity of Northern India lie in the cordial and brotherly relations of [sic] the Muslims and Sikhs. My paper, the Frontier Gazette, Peshawar, will bear me out on this point. We have always maintained very good relations and in the last Muslim League Ministry, the non-Muslim Minister was a Sikh gentleman. My paper was the only non-Muslim paper which supported the League Ministry throughout very vehemently. Incidentally, I may point out that up till now my paper is on the Congress Government’s black list. In the present Provincial Assembly, the only non-Muslim MLA in opposition is also a Sikh gentleman.

It, therefore, pains me and thousands of other Sikhs of my way of thinking to see that once again the eccentric and short-sighted League leaders in the NWFP have started a very damaging agitation on an extremely ill-advised and wrong issue. Whereas in the Punjab some courageous Sikhs have joined the League Civil Disobedience Movement for civil liberties, in the NWFP, I regret to say, that eccentric opportunist, Mr Abdul Qaiyum Khan, and fanatically blind Arbab Abdul Ghafoor Khan, started agitation purely on communal and religious issue. This ill-conceived move may help Mr Qaiyum and others to win cheap popularity but it has already extremely embittered the sweet relation of Sikh and the Muslims in this tiny province.

The facts of the case are that a widowed Sikh girl named Paisri, aged 22 years, under pain of death was compelled to conversion and marrying a Muslim. She was forced to declare her conversion to Islam in the Mosque and gave a statement of this effect to a magistrate in Hazara, where the atmosphere for non-Muslim was very dangerous at that time. When the Sikh Relief Committee started work and refilled the Sikh with confidence, the fact of Paisri’s forcible conversion was brought to their notice. They approached the district authorities and the Ministry for getting back the girl. I must frankly confess that although this minor incident was quite of a minor nature, the Ministry thought it proper to bring the girl to the Headquarters of the Provincial Government. It is surmised in well-informed quarters that this was a clever move on the part of the Ministry to entrap the League leadership in a communal net and thus defame the League in the eyes of the Frontier minorities and, more specifically, the Sikh, who are still out of the Congress. The girl was kept in the Premier’s house from 8th to 18th February 1947. When the League leaders learnt about this, they easily fell in the trap and started an agitation. The girl had already stated before the Premier and other that she was forcibly converted and married to a Muslim. The Premier, thereupon, sent for the mother and so-called husband of the girl to Peshawar, and in their as well as in the presence of the European Chief Secretary, the Muslim Deputy Commissioner and the Muslim Superintendent of Police asked the girl to give a statement to the Muslim City Magistrate. All of them assured her that if she was a Muslim she will be allowed to go with her mother. The girl gave the statement that she was always a Sikh and that she was forcibly converted to Islam and married to a Muslim.

This should naturally have silenced the wrong and damaging agitation, because Islam does not permit forcible conversion. Besides this, from the political viewpoint it was also essential to abandon this bad issue and thus win the confidence of the minorities [to show] that in the Muslim-majority province of Pakistan, Religion, Culture, and other rights of the Minorities are quite safe. But, as usual, Mr Qaiyum failed to appreciate the dire and a far-reaching consequence of the situation and thought if fit to sacrifice the most important principle for winning cheap popularity. He got himself arrested at Mardan and now both in Mardan and in Peshawar this communal and foolish agitation is going on. May I point out that the Hazara Muslims are more religious and League-minded. Out of the eleven seats of the Assembly, Hazara returned ten League members. There, the Muslims rather welcomed this decision that the girl herself went to the Sikhs and there is no agitation at all there. Similarly, the sane and far-sighted Muslims in Peshawar also condemn this wrong agitation and wholly and solely blame Mr Qaiyum and Arbab Ghafoor for this. Since the move is taking a communal turn and it may now spread to other districts and the Tribal Areas, I, as a true Sikh and a true Frontier man, request you kindly to intervene and stop this wrong agitation. The Nawa-i-Waqt and other sane Muslim papers of the Punjab have also advised the Frontier Muslims to abandon this un-Islamic issue and to fight for civil liberties only.

Your immediate or rather telegraphic intervention is eagerly sought, because you are the only one who can stop such wrong moves.

An early reply would highly oblige the Sikhs of this province.

My paper, the Frontier Gazette, of 24th instant is being sent to you under a separate cover for your kind perusal.

Yours sincerely,

SANT SINGH TALWAR

13. ‘Arson & Looting in Attock Villages’

Extracts from a Report from The Hindustan Times, 12 March 1947

LAHORE, 11 March.—Reports received from several villages from Attock district reveal that communal trouble has spread to the rural areas, according to passengers arriving in Lahore from Rawalpindi.

The passengers, who were interviewed at the Lahore aerodrome, said that six villages had almost been destroyed. Strong military reinforcements have been dispatched to different villages. Damage to life and property is not yet estimated but it is feared it may be considerable. Many persons have been arrested by the police and the military.

The rural areas of Multan continues to cause anxiety, says a Punjab Government ‘communique’ issued this evening. Looting and burning of villages in these areas continue, the ‘communique’ added.

The trouble in Campbellpur is spreading, according to information reaching Lahore. A Punjab Government official described the situation in Multan as ‘very bad,’ although there were no fresh incidents in the city today.

The official said: ‘The military concentration in Multan where airborne troops are available for action is expected to exercise a sobering effect on the warring elements. The troops will be detailed in disturbed villages in a day or two and the authorities hope that it would bring the situation under control.’

The situation in Rawalpindi city is under control. Some snipers were fired at by the police killing two and injuring five....

The situation in rural areas of Rawalpindi district is still unsatisfactory. Troops are guarding all approaches to the city. The intruders, who had raided the town on the first day of the rioting, were still lurking about, the travellers added....

Attendance in office establishments was thin. The local bus service under military escort resumed service today. Mails still remain undelivered.

The District Magistrate, Rawalpindi, has issued a proclamation that military has been authorized to shoot any person found rioting, committing loot and incendiariism. Persons who refuse to surrender their arms when ordered are also liable to be shot at. Assembly of more than five persons who refuse to obey order to disperse will also be shot at.
Brigadier Hobb has been placed in charge of Murree, and all families belonging to minority communities have been shifted to the northern Command Depot and are being looked after by the military. According to travellers, the Mall and the lower Bazar in Murree are safe.

The Eastern Punjab is free from trouble, although the atmosphere is tense, adds the announcement.

None of the disturbed towns had anything disquieting to report up to this evening.

14. Communal Situation in NWFP

Extracts from a Letter from Jawaharlal Nehru to Wavell, 13 March 1947

Dear Lord Wavell,

...In the Frontier Province the agitation led by the Muslim League has now definitely taken a communal turn. The demands of the Muslim League there have been, and are, refund of the fines levied on and realized from the Nandihar tribes in the Hazara area and the return of a Sikh woman who was forcibly converted and I believe raped. These demands are very extra-ordinary. You know the circumstances in which action was taken against the Nandihar tribes and a relatively moderate fine was imposed upon them. This fine was agreed to and has in fact been paid. No further operations were undertaken. To ask for the return of this fine is to put an end to the whole administration of the tribal areas. Also, to ask for the return of the Sikh woman is fantastic and immoral. She was forcibly taken away and she does not want to return. She has been mishandled and ill-treated. The question to consider should be what punishment to inflict on those who treated her in this way. Instead of this a demand is put forward by the Muslim League and supported by agitation for her return to her original captors. No government can agree to such demands, whatever the consequences.

Yours sincerely,
Jawaharlal Nehru

2. Political and Communal.—Events in the Province during the last fortnight have proceeded from those reported at the beginning of the month. Apart from the Hazara district, where earlier butcheries derived from Bihar, communal trouble now flourishing in other parts of the Province dates from the day on which the Budget Session of the Assembly commenced in the absence of many prominent Muslim League MLAs. who were (and still are) in jail under security sections including section 4 Frontier Crimes Regulation or on charges of bailable offences. On that day a large and ugly crowd on the railway embankment in the vicinity of the Assembly Hall was opposed by military forces who were compelled to open controlled fire. As far as can be ascertained 9 rounds were fired resulting in about 15 casualties of which 2 have so far died. This incident was followed by attacks on Hindus and Sikhs in the City and the round-up of several Sikh families in a cluster of villages on the Kohat road about 10 miles south of Peshawar. Three Sikhs in this round-up were murdered and about 40 forcibly converted. These are still detained by Muslim villagers but no brutalities have been inflicted on them as far as is known. Measures to effect their release are being concerted. From then on communal outbreaks have continued to occur and have been reported in a series of situation reports to the Government of India. The latest confirmed report has been a raid on Chajian village south-east of Haripur in the Hazara district and the massacre there of about 50 Hindus. This latest horror has naturally accentuated the refugee problem in the Hazara District. So far communal trouble has been practically solely confined to the Hazara and Peshawar Districts. Mass agitation organized by the Muslim League against the Ministry has continue unabated, but unaccompanied by murderous violence, in the Kohat, Mardan and Dera Der Ismail Khan districts. It is also in evidence in the Bannu district, where, in addition, two assaults of a communal nature have occurred. Bans under section 144 continue in many centre, but except on arms have not been revived in the Hazara district. A curfew has been imposed in Peshawar City during recent night and also two or three times in the Saddar areas of Cantonment. British troops have been in occupation the City, and it is hardly too much to say that only ready and whole-hearted assistance by Military Commanders has saved Peshawar and Hazara from complete or at least serious disintegration. As reported at the time all telephone and telegraph communications leading from Peshawar were cut on the night of the 9th March.

By order, etc.,
D.G.H. de la FARGUE.
Chief Secretary to Government.
North-West Frontier Province.

16. ‘NWFP Men Raiding Punjab Villages’

The Tribune, 19 March 1947.

PESHAWAR, 18 March.—The Frontier Government received a complaint yesterday from the Punjab Government that Frontier men were crossing the Indus river and raiding villages in the North-West Punjab.

The evacuation of Sikh and Hindu families from the disturbed areas of the North-West Frontier Province continued yesterday. The number of refugees was reliably estimated at about 6,000.

The authorities stated that they themselves had evacuated about 2,000. They said this number did not include those who had left of their own accord.

Military and police patrols are keeping constant watch and making daily checks in villages where there are fairly large Sikh and Hindu minorities, particularly around Peshawar and in the unsettled Hazara district, near the Punjab border.

There were no official reports of any violence in the province on Monday. Hindus and Sikhs compose only 4 per cent of the 3 million population of the province.

Hindus and Sikhs in Peshawar twice refused to open their shops and special rations had to be distributed by the authorities. Shopkeepers did this, despite the advice of police and other civil authorities, fearing fatal assaults.—APA.
17. ‘NWFP Minister Brings 2000 Red Shirts to Peshawar’

21 March 1947

PESHAWAR, 19 March: About 2,000 Red Shirt volunteers have arrived here from Charsadda Tehsil (18 miles north of Peshawar) to ‘check violence non-violently and to restore confidence among Hindus and Sikhs in Peshawar,’ said Mr Mohammad Yahya Jan, Minister for Local Self Government at a press conference on Tuesday.

Mr Yahya, who had dressed himself in the red uniform of Khudai Khidmatgars, revealed that the only reason for their coming was, assist the 30,000 Hindus and Sikhs of Peshawar to regain their confidence.

This is the first experiment of its kind being tried in the Frontier.

The Red Shirts have camped in the southern part of the city in two groups.—API.

18. Prevent Disintegration of NWFP

Extract from a Letter from Olaf Caroe to Louis Mountbatten, 22 March 1947

CONFIDENTIAL

GOVERNMENT HOUSE, PESHAWAR

2. Here are we between the storm-ridden Punjab on one side and the tribes on the other, and in the strange position of having a Congress Government which has—or had—a considerable Moslem backing. But the influence of the North-Western Punjab to the East and the tribes to the West—all declaiming against Hindu–Sikh domination—is, I think, certain to squeeze Congress out before long, for Congress is not natural here. The shifting of the balance might have happened before if the League had had any leaders to compare with the Khan Brothers. The tribal attitude is beginning to crystallise under the leadership of the Afridis, and I wrote to Abell a few days ago to explain how this was working out. Here I will only say that the attitude of the longer-headed tribes-men and of the League also, in so far as they have thought at all, is to keep the tribes in reserve until the time comes when we have to hand over, and not to get them embroiled while we are still here. Meanwhile I think the elements that count in the tribes will refuse to deal either with Congress or with the League separately, and that there will be a more or less effective tribal boycott of any attempt by the present Constituent Assembly to send up an Advisory Committee.

3. Our disorders here have not approached the Punjab rages in fury. But there has been butchery of defenceless minorities in villages of Peshawar and Hazara and some forcible conversions. The Ministry have survived the first shock, and with the aid of troops (who had to fire on a protest demonstration) have managed to carry through the budget session of the Assembly with the Opposition in jail. So much for democratic processes. I shortened the session, which finishes, I am glad to say, to-day. The only new feature is the bringing into Peshawar City of Red Shirts. For the moment this has sent Congress stock up, but it was a totalitarian move and as such will bring its revenges, more particularly as it has been undertaken by a party whose power is by no means consolidated on this frontier.

4. As I see my job during the next year it is to prevent the disintegration of the North-West Frontier. The more I think of it the more I am struck by the refusal of the Cabinet Mission to face up squarely to this question. Their statement scarcely mentioned the land frontier or the tribes, who also fail to figure in the Prime Minister's statement of 20th February. Yet they are just as vital to India as the State. The various forces acting on this frontier, particularly since the 20th February statement, may produce a resultant [disturbance] which will even cause this part of India to fly off into space, and I think all our efforts in these parts during the next year should be directed to ensure that there is an orderly handing over India's land frontier in a state of stability. For this is one of the most essential needs of the new India, and a considerable amount of force up to the end will be need to secure it. But not one word have we ever been able to get out of His Majesty's Government on this subject. The tribes in their hearts even now won't recognize that power will be handed over. (They regard themselves as realist, and what is more they are so.) They are certainly anxious about their position, and would much rather go on with an orderly balance which secures them the considerable benefits they enjoy at present than have to face the chaos which at one time was supposed to suit the Pathan outlook. One thing is certain, and that is that they will in no sense submit to any local control which could remotely represent as exercised by a Hindu-dominated Government.

19. Atrocities on Hindus and Sikhs in the Frontier

Extract from a Letter from Devprakash Shastri to V.G. Deshpande (Translated from Hindi), Undated, c. March 1947
AIHM Papers, File No. C-150, NMML.

Respected Deshpande ji, Greetings.

I was upset to hear on the radio that your visit has been stopped. Brother, here, from Jhelum to Peshawar, Muslims have devastated the Hindus; no village or town is left where Hindus and Sikhs have not been killed and converted to Islam. The districts of Jhelum, Rawalpindi and Campbellpur have been totally wiped out. Hospitals are full of thousands of wounded. Trains full of corpses are coming in. Almost all Hindus and Sikhs have been made Muslims. Why these atrocities? ...humanity teaches this. Holi is being played with the blood of Hindus. Are you people asleep? Brother, the Hindu community should show some power in their area. Only you people can stop the terrible atrocities being wreaked on the Hindu community here. The Hindu Mahasabha should now adopt a programme of war. The insult should be avenged by going from village to village. The Hindu community is going through a terrible time now. At this time Gandhi cannot be the protector of the Hindu community; all his schemes have failed. Kindly resolve to visit the rural areas for a propaganda campaign....The times of Aurangzeb are dancing before our eyes. If you were here, you would undoubtedly have cried....My friend will also relate the entire story to you. You must introduce him to Patel. He is a Sangh preacher in Kohat, You should take the trouble of visiting Peshawar by air to see how these people have reduced Hindus to rats in their holes. I hope you will ponder over this and arrange matters after consulting the ministers of the Interim Government. Krishna Baldev ji will tell you all these things.

...Yours
Devprakash Shastri, Harnam Gali, Peshawar Cantonment.

1. ‘Police Open Fire in Lahore: Hindu & Sikh Students Lathi-charged’

Extracts from a Report from The Tribune, 5 March 1947

Lahore, 4 March.—On the very first day of the minorities’ demonstration against the proposed imposition of a communal majority rule on the Punjab, the police resorted to firing seven times and lathi-charged the demonstrators about a dozen times....

In the firing by the police five times in the Gol Bag area and DAV College about 60 persons were injured of whom 27 were admitted into the Mayo Hospital and Sir Ganga Ram Hospital.

Then there was a communal clash near Chauk Matti in the city which resulted from a procession of demonstrators being attacked. There was free fight in which lathis, hatchets, knives and brick-bats were used. About 60 to 70 persons were injured many of whom were admitted into the hospitals and six of these are reported to have died. Two were killed at the spot and others died in hospital. Some of the injured persons are lying in a precarious condition.

Two police constables are also reported to have been killed to-day and two who were said to be missing returned by the evening....

The non-League sections of the Lahore population headed by Hindu and Sikh students of the local colleges took out processions raising anti-Pakistan slogans against the proposed ministry for the Punjab, and against the Punjab Governor.

These processions consisted mostly of students who gathered together from various colleges and were proceeding towards the Gol Bagh where they wanted to hold a protest meeting....

These processions of students were confronted by the police at various places who lathi-charged them in order to disperse them...

A huge procession then marched along the Mall Road to hold a demonstration in front of the Assembly buildings. One the way the procession was met by Sir Bhim Sen Sachar who addressing them in front of the General Post Office appealed to the processionists to remain peaceful and do nothing that would injure anybody’s feelings. On the pressing request of the processionists Mr Sachar agreed to lead them towards the Assembly Building where the procession proceeded....

It is alleged that there was some trouble outside Mochi Gate also. Passers-by were assaulted. Police arrived at the spot and opened fire to frighten away the crowd.

The firing at the DAV College Hostel followed chase by the police of some students who were standing on the Lower Mall near the SD High School at about 6 p.m. These students are alleged to have raised slogans when a police lorry was going on the road. The lorry is stated to have been stopped and the police chased the students who went towards the DAV College Hostel. The police, it is alleged, chased them and then opened fire. As a result of this, a IV Year student of the DAV College Mr Rattan Chand who was standing in his room was killed instantaneously. The matter was reported to the authorities by the Principal.

It is alleged that during the morning one police motor vehicle was set on fire near Gol Bag.

Mr Abdul Aziz, President of the Punjab Students Congress writes:

‘The Punjab Police lathi charged and opened fire today on a peaceful procession of students on its way to Gol Bag for holding a meeting there. The police attack was absolutely unprovoked and at a number of places even pedestrians were not spared. Almost all the important workers of the Students Congress have been injured, some are still in danger. The Government knows that these injured students are the last persons to be aggressive. I warn the Government, therefore, that such things will rather aggravate the seriousness of the situation, than make it easy. I demand an impartial enquiry into the conduct of the police, and punishment of the culprits responsible for firing.’

2. ‘Anti-Pakistan Day’ in Punjab

Note from Deputy Private Secretary to Viceroy to Vallabhbhai Patel, 5 March 1947
IOR, R/3/1/89, Acc. No. 3414, NAI.

The Congress and the Akali Sikhs propose to hold an Anti-Pakistan Day all over the Punjab on the 11th March. Patel may be asked to get the Congress High Command to discourage this demonstration, which may be very dangerous. He has frequently complained that Muslim League Members of the Cabinet have no right to encourage demonstrations against the Government of the Punjab, and must act up to this now.

2. A procession is reported to have been led yesterday by Bhim Sen Sachar, a Congress Minister in the Punjab. This was done in spite of the fact that processions were illegal and has provided a very bad example.

3. Cannot the Congress make an all out effort for unqualified acceptance of the Cabinet Mission’s plan?

3. ‘Punjab Situation Takes Serious Turn’

Extracts from a Report from Dawn, 6 March 1947

Lahore, Wednesday

British troops have been called out in Lahore and the District Magistrate has imposed a curfew order from 8 p.m. to 7 a.m. for 10 days.

Communal trouble spread throughout the city and stray assaults have been reported from several quarters. A large number of injured have been brought to civil and other hospitals. Though the exact number cannot be gathered, they are about 90 while 18 are reported to be dead. The District Magistrate and the Superintendent of Police are personally supervising arrangements. Great panic prevails in the city and cases of arson have also been reported....

‘Stop Killing’, Mamdot Appeals to Opposition

Lahore, Wednesday.

An appeal to Hindu and Sikh leaders to come forward and co-operate in forming peace committees to restore peace and order in the Province has been issued by the Khan of Mamdot, President of the Punjab Provincial Muslim League.

He says, ‘The communal rioting, killing, arson, and loot which have broken out in Lahore and certain other places in the Punjab are most regrettable and deserve strong and unreserved condemnation by every right-thinking person owing to the sudden quitting of the office by the caretaker Government under Section 93 of the Government of India Act.*
Even though the Administration’s responsibility rests on the Governor for the time being, the leaders of communities and parties must not overlook their own responsibility to their people who can gain nothing and can only suffer untold miseries owing to this outburst of communal madness.

It is the duty of all of us to make a joint effort to end this terrible state of affairs. I, therefore, invite Hindu and Sikh leaders to come forward so that we may co-operate in forming one or more peace committees to restore peace and order in the province.’—API.

Addressed Viceroy repeated Secretary of State. Punjab situation. Lahore has been quieter today but tension is still acute and stabbing cases continue. Amritsar showed little change this morning though arrival of Police reinforcements effected slight improvement. Lahore Area Commander put two British Battalions into City at 14.00 hours with instructions to restore order particularly by disarming rioters and searching for arms. He has just returned (19.00 hours) and reports that on arrival of troops populace and arms disappeared completely. People have been forbidden to leave their houses for 48 hours and situation was completely under control when he left. Searches will continue tomorrow. Rawalpindi gravely disturbed since noon 6th. Hospital casualties 20 dead 100 injured. Total casualties may be double these figures. Trouble has spread to villages in Rawalpindi Division. Frontier Mail was attacked near Taxila today also train at Chaklala. Details not reported. Cars are being attacked on roads. Three casualties reported. Sialkot reported casualties up to this morning 3 dead 11 injured. Multan under control but trouble continues. Jullundur reported 7 dead 35 injured up to 6th evening and 4 more casualties this morning. Communal tension reported from almost all districts and further outbreaks likely.

Repeated to Secretary of State for India. Punjab situation. My immediately preceding telegram. Mamdot has made no further move. Peace Committee has been formed in Lahore by Mamdot, other League leaders and leaders of Congress and Sikhs. I suspect that Mamdot is not anxious to assume responsibility for present situation and I cannot blame him. Lahore Sikhs are threatening to take out Hola procession tomorrow but it is hoped to make them see sense. Situation still very bad but if Amritsar is cleared up by tomorrow night it should improve.
6. ‘Punjab’s Baptism’
Extract from an Editorial in Dawn, 8 March 1947

While by tacit consent of the Muslim League Premier-designate, Governor’s Rule fills the interregnum between the fall of the old Ministry and the advent of the new, over considerable areas of long quiescent Punjab rioting, arson and murder continue to mark the last-ditch stand of communal vested interests. However deplorable, there was perhaps an inevitability about the disorders that commenced in Lahore on Wednesday and later spread to some other towns. And if the Punjab has to pass through its baptism of fire and blood, well, it has to. But there is one fact about which there can be no dispute, for we believe that the militant elements who precipitated these disorders will not be so cowardly as to deny that the responsibility falls fairly and squarely on their shoulders, not on those of the Muslims. For 34 days full of stress Muslims showed exemplary spirit of non-violence, not being provoked to retaliation even when an assassin’s brick killed one of their number on Beadon Road. When their movement brought the Ministry crashing down, they were humble in their hour of triumph. They ignored Master Tara Singh’s threat, broadcast to the world via the United States, that he would ‘drive the Muslims out of the Punjab’, and they begged him and his community to cooperate. They promised the minorities that although they might well claim it they would not dominate over the latter, because that was not the Islamic way....

We trust that the situation in the Punjab will soon return to normal and Sikh and other minority leaders will likewise return to the path of reason. The Khan of Mamdot has pointed out that between the Muslims and the Sikhs at any rate there are many things in common, although the latter’s vision has been purposely warped by Congress propaganda for the time being. If what is happening now helps to clarify that vision, all this loss of life, limb and property may not have been in vain. Master Tara Singh and his fellow leaders of the Panth will do well to ask themselves just what they are waving their kirpans and injuring their larynxes for. To establish Sikh–Hindu minority domination over the Muslim majority? If so, perhaps the noise that their tongues make prevents them from hearing the counsel which their brains must be trying to give them. The minorities have many rights and must needs be granted them, but in politics and statecraft the tail can never wag the dog. Short of this, there is little else within reason which the Muslim League will be found unprepared to concede either to the Sikhs or the Hindus, provided the latter gracefully accept the inevitable leadership of the majority. Muslims do not want to rule the Punjab by themselves, but they cannot force partnership in power on those who would not have it. In that event their own broad shoulders will have to bear the burden.

7. Communal Violence in Rawalpindi
Report of Satnam Kaur, Village Mogul, Rewat Tehsil, Rawalpindi, Undated
AIHM Papers, File No. C-165, NMML.

On Saturday the 8th of March ‘47 at about 12 p.m. Muslim mob surrounded the village Mogul from all the sides. They shouted slogans of Pakistan Zindabad. They made entry into the village and started putting to fire to the houses in the Dhok. This Dhok was inhabited only by Sikhs. The Sikhs of the village had all collected in the main Gurudwara along with the women folk and the children in order to give a joint defence. They had only two guns with them from which some shots were fired in return of the volleys of bullets fired by the Muslims ruffians who were putting the houses to fire after looting them under the covering bullets. The petrol and kerosin oil was freely used by the mob. Our house was set on fire by Babares tailors of Dhok Daraian. Prehlad, Mehtab, Gurbachan and others saw this. The process of looting went on upto 5 a.m. next morning that is Sunday. The Muslim leaders then deputed posts on all outlets of the village so that no inmate of the village may go out. Each and every house was then searched and all valuable and useful things taken away by the mob on donkeys, bullock-carts and camels, and on other things, and these remaining houses after being thus looted were put to fire. The fanatic mob was not satisfied with the booty and they turned to the main Gurdwara, where the inmates bewailed and requested the mob for their lives telling that they should be satisfied with the merciless looting and ruthless acts of putting to fire their houses. There were only 180 persons in the Gurdwara including women and children. The Muslim mob started throwing stones inside the Gurdwara and began firing bullets. One Subedar of Durna village tried to appease the furious mob but nobody paid any heed to the saying and he was sent back. More Muslim ruffians began pouring into the village and the mob grew over a thousand persons who completely surrounded the village and the Gurdwara. Harnam Singh a prominent man of the village requested the mob for the lives of the inmates but persons armed with guns and rifles, hatchets, swords and sticks started shouting Pakistan Zinda Bad and began to fire guns and rifles. Stones were also thrown inside the Gurdwara. Harnam Singh was the first to shot through the neck and then my father-in-law Mehal Singh who tried to appease the mob was shot dead by Mohd Khan Havaldar whom the inmates recognized well. My husband then came in front to request they should cease firing but nobody listen to him. The Gurdwara building was then set to fire. As the heat became unbearable the women and children shrieked and the men lost heart. The mob was asked to forgive the inmates their lives who replied the two guns and swords, sticks etc. may be thrown down and then their lives will be restored. This was readily agreed to and the gun and swords etc., was handed over to the Muslim mob. The inmates came down into the streets from the Gurdwara roof. All of us were taken into the Haveli or Makhan Singh where Kazim of Daducha village shouted to the mob that they should see either we are forcibly converted into Islam or mercilessly butchered. Man Kaur, Ishar Prehlad, Gurbachan, Joginder Kaur and some others are still alive, and can tell about the occurrence. All the Sikhs yielded. The mob then suggested that women folk should be separated from men and taken to a separate place. Our men refused to do this. The men were allowed to seek shelter with their respective families into the houses of the persons known to them. In the meanwhile as some of the families had just moved more people from the surrounding villages poured in who persisted that every Sikh women and child must be killed and the body giving shelter will be similarly dealt with. My family then consisting of eleven alive members (my husband Puran Singh, his mother, his four younger brothers, his two sisters, his brother's wife, and my ten month’s old daughter and myself) ran towards the Mughal Pari Dhok of Muslims and concealed ourselves in the grain field as one Shafi of Mughal village where we intended taking shelter was threatened by his ... that offering protection to us will mean death for him. Some mob happened to see us in the grain field and ran towards ... hatchets but some of them recognized us as belonging to the family of Hohi Singh, my father-in-law and moved by our bewailing they went away. We again went to the house of Shafi at night, Sunday; but early in the morning he turned us out in spite of our repeated requests not to do so and we again concealed ourselves in the grainfield. We were again pointed out by some of the members of the mob who came shouting towards us. They told us to accompany them to our burning village stating that some of our persons were still alive. We refused to go but we were forcibly pushed and taken to the village. Karim, Channu, Akbar, Fazal Akram son of Sain Jahana, Mohd Khan Havalidar, Mohd Aslam, Maulavi, all of village Mughal. Aurangzeb, Nawab, Nur Hussain, Mohd Ghauz, ... of village Mughal Benarea, Karam Elahi of Dhok Darzian, Wedi son of Fazal Dad of Dhok Fazal Dad, Mohd Zaman of Chak, Inamkhaur Abdul Razaq and many others whom I cannot name but can recognize, took us to the place where dead bodies of the inmates of the Gurdwara were burning. My husband, Puran Singh shouted for his and our lives but the fanatic mob did not listen to his pathetic appeal and started stoning at us. I and my husband’s sister Nain Kaur (young girls) were pushed aside as Wadi Hussain and others had some evil motives towards us. Karim caught hold of my husband and threw him down and then everybody named above hurled stones at the ten members of my family with the result that they were done to death by stones. Several bodies of Sikh men women and children alive and dead were soon burning in the Gurdwara and its vicinity. My husband’s brother’s wife, Sujan Kaur was thrown into the burning fire by Channu son of Mohd Shaffi after he had taken off her clothes. I and my husband’s sister Nain Kaur were taken away by Wadi Hussain son of Fazal Dad and Sain Juhana respectively. I cried and shouted and refused to live at Wadi’s house as I suspected his intention. I wanted to put an end to my life but very strict watch was kept on me. Wadi’s sister’s husband was moved by my bewailing and took me to his house where I stayed for two days. One Sain of Gujrat solaced me that I would not be dishonoured and when ever the rescue party comes I will be handed over to my relatives. My husband’s sister Nain Kaur also came running to the place where I was confined and we both stayed there for the Tuesday night. On Wednesday at 2 a.m. the Military Rescue Party accompanied by Darshan Singh of village Moghul came to Dhok Fazal Dad and brought us to the Relief Camp at Rawalpindi.

8. Punjab Governor’s Tour of Riot Afflicted Areas

Letter from Evan Jenkins to Wavell, 9 March 1947

I am greatly obliged for the loan of Your Excellency’s aircraft. I flew in it to Rawalpindi this morning and had a conference with the Army Commander, the Rawalpindi Area Commander (Key), the Commissioner, the Deputy Inspector-General of Police, and the Deputy Commissioner. Bennett, the Inspector-General of Police, accompanied me.

2. I gave the conference an appreciation of the situation in the Punjab as a whole. I have already reported events very fully to Your Excellency and need not go over them again in this letter. I ended my appreciation by saying that Lahore, Amritsar, Multan and Rawalpindi had all been seriously disturbed; that there had been smaller disturbances at Sialkot, Jullundur, Kamoke in the Gujranwala district, and one or two other places; and that communal tension was acute in almost all districts. The danger points were Lahore, Amritsar, Multan and Rawalpindi. Lahore was now under control but was still most uneasy, and incidents in Lahore always affected the rest of the Punjab. Amritsar had probably had the worst outbreak yet reported. The known casualties were not particularly high, but there had been an enormous amount of damage by incendiariism, and the City was without electric light, vegetables and fodder for its innumerable cattle. Multan city and Cantonment were reported to be under control, but the trouble was spreading rapidly to the rural areas. The District authorities had at their disposal only their normal strength of Police plus small police reinforcements and a weak battalion of the 3rd Dogra Regiment. They had asked for further help. Those present would know more than I did about the details of the Rawalpindi situation.

In the past communal trouble had seldom occurred in two important places at the same time. We had therefore been able to concentrate our resources and to come down very quickly on each outbreak as it occurred. On this occasion, however, outbreaks had been widespread, and it had been impossible for us to reinforce at all points simultaneously. We had had to leave it to District Officers and the local Military Commanders to deal with each situation as it arose.

There were two very disturbing factors in the situation. In the first place, the Sikhs regarded the Muslim League agitation and the present communal disturbances as an attack particularly upon them. They felt that they had suffered more than the Muslims and had been caught unprepared. They were therefore likely to have their revenge, and if trouble spread to the rural areas in Muslim districts and was not checked, we must expect similar trouble in Sikh districts and later in the Ambala Division where the Hindu Jats are dominant. Secondly, the resolution of the Congress Working Committee on the Punjab, which appeared in this morning’s newspapers, demanded the partition of the Punjab and would almost certainly be treated by the Muslims as a challenge. Unfortunately the resolution had been accompanied by a Joint statement of Congress and Sikh leaders in the Punjab to the effect that they are ‘in no circumstances willing to give the slightest assurance or support to the Muslim League in the formation of a Ministry’, as they ‘are opposed to Pakistan in any shape or form’. In the light of the Sikh attitude and of the resolution and statement it appeared to me that we might be faced with persistent communal trouble gradually spreading to the rural areas all over the Punjab. A coalition now seemed most improbable; the Muslims would insist upon Pakistan, which they are still quite unable to define; and the Hindus and Sikhs would demand the Ravi as the boundary of the non-Muslim State....

4. The Rawalpindi Area Commander then gave an appreciation of the local situation. During the last four days there had been several serious incidents. Rawalpindi City had been disturbed with a good many casualties, but was now under control. The trouble had quickly spread to the rural areas, and there had been an organized raid on Murree by a party of Muslims in cars or lorries. These persons had attacked mainly property belonging to Kirpa Ram (the well-known draper), and several large buildings including at least three hotels, had been burnt. There were five companies of troops in or near Murree, but the raid was cleverly carried out and substantial contact with the raiders does not seem to have been made. At about the same time there was an attack on the Frontier Mail at Taxila. The area bounded, by the Grand Trunk Road from Taxila to Gujar Khan and eastwards by a line drawn roughly from Gujar Khan through Kahuta, Murree and back to Taxila was disturbed. (About six villages were to be seen burning as we approached Rawalpindi in the aircraft this morning.) A Battalion of Gurkhas had been sent to Murree, and Military patrols, including detachments from the Norfolks, were operating in the disturbed area and along the Grand Trunk Road. Railway Security had been introduced from Taxila to Jhelum, but trains were not yet running northward of Rawalpindi. The disturbed area is full of crowds of villagers armed with lathis, spears, axes, agricultural implements, and in some cases firearms. One or two patrols had been fired on, but on the whole the people showed little hostility to authority as such.

The Commissioner and DIG, Police, said that no estimate could be made of casualties in the villages. There was reason to think that in several villages the Hindus had been massacred. The Deputy Commissioner said that he was making arrangements in consultation with the Area
Commander for the accommodation of refugees; but he did not wish to invite non-Muslims to leave their villages since in many villages the Muslims were definitely protecting them.

5. The civil authorities seemed to have no special needs, and I said that my only comment on what I had heard was that although most of us knew a great deal about the suppression of communal disturbances in cities, we had had little experience of dealing with such disturbances in a large rural area with bad communications... The Army Commander remarked that if communal trouble developed in the rural parts of a large number of districts, it would be virtually uncontrollable—the DIG of Police had already observed that conditions in many of the villages affected were not known, since they were approachable only by bridle-paths or tracks, and it took a long time to deal with them.

6. All the civil officials present said that there was a certain amount of moderate Muslim opinion in favour of peace, but that the local notables dared not co-operate with the authorities, as they would have done under the old official régime or a Unionist Ministry, because they felt that they must keep in with their party. The right solution therefore was to announce that the Section 93 régime would continue for a specified period in the first instance—say, for three months. If this were done, the local notables would come down on the side of the Administration for the time being at least. This opinion is interesting from civil officials serving in a Muslim area, since they tend to discount the case for the minorities and the seriousness of communal trouble.

7. The Commissioner mentioned some indiscipline among the police. The incident was discussed after the conference by the IG and the DIG, and I gathered that it was not really serious.

8. The conference was, I think, useful, and I am very glad that troops are being sent to Multan and that the Army Commander has secured an additional Brigade. I hope to go to Multan in the same way tomorrow morning. The Lahore Area Commander and the Inspector-General of Police will accompany me, and the Army Commander has ordered the Brigadier who is taking the two airborne Battalions in to stay at Multan tomorrow until he has seen me. On Tuesday I hope to visit Jullundur and Ambala.

9. I found Abell's letter No. 90/13 of 8th March to Abbott awaiting me on my return. The resolution of the Congress Working Committee and the statement by the Congress and Sikh leaders of the Punjab may alter the situation for the worse. It is almost certain that the resolution and the statement were co-ordinated and that the Congress and the Sikhs would meet the formation of a Muslim League Government by a demand for instant partition. I shall have to wait for a day or two to study Muslim reactions. The Muslim League will, I fear, treat the resolution and statement as a challenge it seems that they are still trying to form a Ministry with a small technical majority. As soon as Muslim reactions are clear, I will see what can be done to mediate; but I have little hope of success, and there is an unpleasant undercurrent in the resolution and the statement which may mean that the Congress intend to turn the heat on the British officials and myself....

10. A great deal of political intrigue is going on in Lahore. Some persons were stabbed in Lahore yesterday, but today has been reasonably quiet so far. The curfew came off for four hours in Amritsar at 10 a.m. today, and at 1-10 p.m. Intelligence reported that there had been no incidents. Amritsar casualties seen by the Civil Surgeon now amount to 100 dead (Muslims 64, Sikhs 31, Hindus 4, and Christian 1) and 151 injured (Muslims 97, Sikhs 27 and Hindus 27); but the city is still full of fallen buildings and rubble and the real casualties must be considerably higher. The figures do not bear out the Sikh contention, which is true of...
Rawalpindi and Lahore, that the Muslims have been victorious. In Amritsar they were on top for some time, but the Sikhs seem to have got into a Muslim quarter and killed a large number of the inhabitants in one operation.

12. It is most unfortunate that our affairs are controlled for the Muslims from Bombay and for the Hindus (including for the moment the Sikhs) from Delhi. We will do our best to keep the trouble out of the rural areas; but if we fail, widespread massacres are inevitable and we may have to concentrate on the points where we can protect most people.

9. Communal Incidents in Gujarkhan, Rawalpindi

First Information Report by Moti Ram Singh, Undated
AIHM Papers, File No. C-165, NMML.

The District Magistrate, Rawalpindi.

Subject: FIR of Moti Ram Singh S/o B.K. Nihal Chand caste Gupta resident of village Bewal Police Stn, Gujarkhan, District Rawalpindi at present refugee at Gujarkhan Khalsa School.

Sir,

On 9-3-'47 at about 4 p.m., we Hindu and Sikhs residents of village Bewal, saw some houses in village Qazian on fire and we came to know that the Muslim rioters had looted and set fire to the houses of Hindus and Sikhs of the surrounding villages. We also apprehended danger and so S. Mukand Singh and myself approached Ch Miran Dad of village Samet and Suba Sadiq Inamkhor of Bhatian who were at that time present in our village. They demanded Rs 1,200 and promised to protect us. We agreed and Mukand Singh paid Rs 1,200 in my presence to Ch Miran Dad. Night between 9th and 10th March passed off peacefully without any incident.

On 10-3-'47 Muslim rioters from the surrounding villages began to collect round our village at 11 a.m. Most of the Hindu and Sikh ladies and children of the village collected in the house of S. Gokul Singh, Retired EAG.

By 12 p.m. about five to six thousand Muslim rioters armed with guns, pistols, hatchets, spears, swords and sticks began to attack the village on all the sides and began to break open the doors of the shops and houses of Hindus and Sikhs and looting and burning them. The following persons were leading the rioters:

1. Mirza Khan Zaildar of Rewal.
2. Khadim Hussain Sarbrah Siladar, Bewal.
4. Subha Sadiq Inamkhor of village Mohra Bhatian.
7. Gulab Lohar of Bewal.
8. Sh Mohd Yusaf of Dhera Kanial.
Towards Freedom: 1947

10. Wali Ahmed of Bewal.
12. Mohd Akbar S/o -do-
15. Lt Mirain of village Samot.
17. Nathu Gangal of Bewal.
21. Mohd Amin, Timber Merchant of Golian.
23. Havaldar Mohd Iqbal of Civic Guard, Bewal.

Besides these leaders I know the persons shown on annexure to this report who were amongst the rioters and I can recognize many others whose names I do not remember.

Simultaneously with the looting and burning the rioters began to murder Sikhs and Hindus also.

The first person who was murdered was Dalip Singh S/o Sunder Singh who was done to death by a sword blow by ... S/o Subedar Mutwali of village Dhera Kalian, Bakshi Balmukand Grandson Kuldip and Bram Dass were murdered by Talib Sheru S/o Mangu Hav; with the aid of others. Lochan Singh, who was at the roof of his brother's house, was killed by Banka with a sword blow. Banka belongs to village Bewal. Mst Rukman Devi widow of Jem. Kishore Lall, Ishar Devi widow of Bk: Kilyan Dass, Bana Devi daughter of Bk: Ganpat Rai had lot of ornaments, jewellery and cash on their persons and took shelter in the house of Jem: Mustafa of Dhera Kanian. This was witnessed by Trilochan Singh S/o Hoshiar Singh also.

On 11 March 1947, at about 9 a.m. Gulzar of Mehra Shamash, Khadan Hussain Ziladar, Banka Gnaga of Bewal and Zaffar Ali retired Sub Inspector shouted to the Sikhs and Hindus besieged in the house of S. Gokul Singh and said 'If you surrender arms and embrace Islam we shall spare your lives'. At this about 60 to 70 men, women and children came down. A list of those who came down is given as an annexure by 150/200 rioters and then taken to Juma Mosque in Bewal. From Juma Mosque we were taken to the house of Fazal Karim Barbar. Under threat of immediate death our Keshas and beard were cut by Fazal Karim barbar. From the house of the barber we were taken to the house of Mohd Alam Teli. From Mohd Alam Teli house, taking advantage of the darkness we went to Gurha Dakhali Rafial in the house of Mansabdar and Shabaz who gave us shelter for the night between 11th and 12th March, 1947. From that place we went to Sohwa Mirzian and remained there in the house of Said Mohd Shah for 8–9 days and Military rescued us from there. While we were in Juma Mosque I saw Mohinder Kaur daughter of Girdit Singh, Amrit Kaur daughter of Ishar Singh, Basant Kaur, daughter of Raja Ram and Her Kaur, d/o Bishan Singh, all grown up girls being taken away by Abdul Wahid S/o Sh Mohd Shafi and Ditta Khan S/o Fazal Ghumar village Dhere. Kanian said Kala Shah and Pahlwan Khan were also with them.

The following facts have been narrated by those persons who are alive and were left behind in the house of S. Gokul Singh.

At about 12 noon on 11th March, 1947, a hand grenade was thrown by Gulzar of Mahra Shamas on the house of S. Gokul Singh. About 15 Sikhs were killed and wounded as a result of this explosion of grenade. Dr Awtar Singh, Ishar Singh, Ujjagor Singh, Awtar Singh, S/o Amar Singh, B. Basant Singh and Lochan Singh, S/o Jodh Singh, Wishwa Nath S/o Bhagat Ram and Didar Singh, S/o Bk. Nihal Singh and others. Jom: Mustafa and Zaffar Ali retired Sub-Inspector set fire to the house of S. Gokul Singh. After this all the men, women, and children in the house of S. Gokul Singh were evacuated to the Gurdwara Singh Sabha through brigades of planks. It was about 12 noon. The rioters besieged the Gurdwara and started firing at the Sikhs and Hindus besieged in the Gurdwara. Karam Ali of Ratala fired a shot from a gun which struck S. Gokul Singh in the chest and he fell down dead. Jaffar Ali shot down dead Chot Singh. Khadam Hussain Sarbrahb Zaildar shot down S. Mohinder Singh. Similarly many others were shot down by the rioters.

At about 4 p.m. on 11.30 p.m. on 11–3–47 a sten gun was fired by Ghulzar Khan of Maira Shamash from the roof of Gurumukh Singh DAC, MA, a result of firing of the gun, 25/30 Sikhs were shot down including Sohan Singh, S/o Ram Singh, Awtar Singh, S/o Mehar Singh, Makhan Singh and Gurbux Singh, S/o Hara Singh, and others. The firing went on till 4 a.m. on 12–3–47. At about 4 a.m. the rioters succeeding in making a big hole on the west side of the Gurdwara wall about 50 rioters including Banka Gangal S/o Fazala Subha Saddiq Inam Kher of Mohra Bhatian Sh Abdul Wahid, Sh Mohd Shafi Sh Mohd Hussain of Dhera sawar Namaladar of Mankra, Akber S/o Subedar Mutwali, Mohd Anwar S/o Sub Muwali, Sarwar.

S/o Kariwa Malyar, Choudari Naram Dad Mamardar of Mohra Dhamial and Ch Miran Dad of Samot, and others entered Gurdwara and started general massacre of inmates. Names of some persons who were murdered are as under:

Some 200 to 300 persons were killed in that Gurdwara. Following is the list of those persons who have been either murdered or are missing and are believed to have been murdered.

This village had a population of about 500 Hindus and Sikhs out of which only 76 have been accounted for and out of the rest, some 361 have been done to death and the remaining are missing and are believed to have been murdered. There were about 150 houses and 60 shops belonging to Hindus and Sikhs. All excepting one home belonging to Sukha Singh (who has been forcibly converted to Islam) have been looted and burnt.
Bewal was a proper village and a centre of trade in the lakhs property—movable and immovable worth 80-90 lakhs of rupees belonging to Sikhs and Hindus has been whither looted or destroyed. 10. ‘Murree and Taxila Burnt Down—Amritsar Fire Cause Huge Havoc’

The Tribune, 10 March 1947.

Lahore, 9 March.—Judging from all outward appearances, the communal situation in Lahore was heartening.

Disquieting reports, however, have come from the northwest part of the Province. It is stated that Taxila, the ancient seat of learning, has been completely gutted. The Murree hill station and Ghora Gali are still ablaze.

His Excellency Sir Evan Jenkins, Governor of the Punjab, accompanied by the Inspector-General Police, Sir John Bennett flew to Rawalpindi today to see things for himself. Sir Evan returned to Lahore at about 2 p.m.

In Rawalpindi area troops have been ordered to shoot at sight on the slightest disobedience of orders.

The investiture, which was to have been held in Government House, Lahore on 15 March, has been postponed to a date which will be announced later.

In Lahore itself there was greater activity and more people were seen going about on the roads and in the streets. There was increased traffic—and all this infused confidence in the hearts of the people....

The District Magistrate, Mr Eustace, passed a couple of fresh orders today, in order to be able to control the situation more strongly. By one of these orders, the District Magistrate has banned the raising of any false alarms and shouting of slogans as also the beating of drums and the ringing of bells.

This order, it is expected, will be strictly enforced and the authorities are determined to take strong action against any one infringing it. It will remain in force for 8 days from today. By another order, the District Magistrate relaxed restrictions in certain areas in the Civil Lines where the Curfew Order will remain in force from 12 midnight to 7 a.m.

There were three cases of stabbing in Lahore today of which one is stated to have proved fatal....

The Punjab Riot Sufferers Relief Fund has been initiated by the Council of Action and an appeal has been made by about fifty leading Hindu and Sikh leaders, asking for donations for the purpose of affording relief to those who have suffered in the riots....

Peace Committees Being Formed

Peace Committees are being formed in various localities of the City, where well-meaning people of all communities are anxious to maintain peace and establish cordial relations between the various communities living in the mohallas and the suburbs of Lahore....

Corporation Councillors Active

The Councillors of the Lahore Corporation, who held a meeting today at the Town Hall, with Mian Amir-ud-Din in the chair, decided to issue an appeal to the leaders of all parties and communities to devise immediately effective ways and means for the promotion of communal harmony and peace in the province.

The meeting adopted a resolution, condemning the acts of violence, arson, and looting perpetrated during the last two days and making an appeal to the citizens of Lahore to refrain from all such reprehensible acts and try to cultivate communal peace and goodwill. Deep sympathy with riot victims was also expressed by the Councillors.
Rescue and Relief Work
The Lahore District Congress Committee is conducting rescue and relief work, with the aid of other organizations. At a meeting of the Working Committee of the District Congress Committee and office-bearers of the Ward Congress Committees, it was decided to ask the Congress Corporation Councillors and the ward Congress office-bearers to patrol the various Hindu and Muslim localities and ask the people to re-establish good relations. The District Congress Committee has been able to rescue a large number of people of various communities from the affected areas or areas which were considered to be insecure.

The relief camp opened by the District Congress Committee has been doing good work. The police wanted the camp to be removed for reasons best known to them. It is stated that when the Congress workers refused to remove the camp someone had the audacity to water the plot....

Agha Shorish Kashmiri, General Secretary of the All-India Majlis-i-Ahrar has appealed to the people of the Punjab to remain calm and quiet and exercise restraint. The Red Shirt volunteers of the Majlis-i-Ahrar have rescued a large number of people from disturbed areas and given them shelter in the Ahrar Office. They have also conducted a very large number of passengers from the Railway Station to their homes.

The Hindustan Scouts and the Punjab Patel Sewa Samiti Sutarmandi, are doing social work in helping people and looking after the injured. The Muslim League National Guards are working in Muslim Localities and doing relief work. League leaders visited Muslim localities.

Sardar Swarn Singh and Mr Singha Visit Hospital
Sardar Swarn Singh, Leader of the Panthic Party in the Punjab Assembly and former Minister for Development visited a large part of the city today. He impressed on the inhabitants to maintain peace and tranquility.

Earlier Sardar Swaran Singh accompanied by Diwan Bahadur S.P. Singha, Speaker of the Punjab Assembly, paid a visit to Mayo Hospital where they spent about an hour and enquired after the condition of injured persons belonging to all communities.

Diwan Bahadur Singha also visited the affected areas in the city along with Mr C.E. Gibbon and Mr Brij Lal and exhorted the people to maintain peace....

11. ‘Gandhiji Deplores Punjab Riots’
The Tribune, 10 March 1947.
Patna, 9 March.—In his post-prayer speech last evening, Mahatma Gandhi referred to the Punjab disturbances and stated that those who acted in such manners in any part of the country did not serve either their religion or their country. They simply helped to retard the cause of independence through their own fault. In the Punjab, these disturbances had only served to re-establish Section 93 Government.

Mahatma Gandhi called upon Hindus of Bihar to come forward with liberal contribution for the relief of Muslim sufferers as an earnest of their goodwill towards Muslims.

This, said Mahatma Gandhi, would also be a form of ‘Prayashchitta’ (atonement) for them. He did not ask for such contributions in Noakhali because he got about three lakhs of rupees, without asking, from different quarters. He wanted only the Hindus of Bihar to contribute to this fund and asked them to be more generous in the matter than the Harijan Fund, for which he received sufficient contributions from all over India.

Some collections for the Bihar Muslim Sufferers Fund (opened by Mahatma Gandhi) were made after Gandhiji’s departure from the meeting.—API.

12. Governor’s Discussion with League Leaders

Note by Evan Jenkins of His Interview with Mamdot, Daultana, and Noon, 10 March 1947

Khan Iftikhar Husain Khan of Mamdot, Mian Mumtaz Muhammad Khan Daultana and Malik Firoz Khan Noon called on me at 3.15 p.m. today at their request.

2. I had just returned from Multan and gave them an account of what was going on there and at Rawalpindi which I visited yesterday. They seemed satisfied at the measures we were taking. I rubbed into them that in Multan and Rawalpindi the Muslims were undoubtedly the aggressors and that retaliation for outrages in the villages was now a very real danger. They admitted that this was so.

3. Daultana then said that they wished to explain the origin and failure of the Peace Committee. Mamdot had suggested this, and at first it appeared that the other communities would co-operate. Unfortunately Master Tara Singh never turned up and Giani Kartar Singh attended only one meeting. When the Committee was formed, it had been made clear to Sardar Swaran Singh and Lala Bhim Sen Sachar that the Muslim League were prepared to negotiate with the Congress and the Sikhs both on short-term and on long-term issues. This offer had had a very poor response. I said that the suggestion for a common statement by the leaders of all communities had actually come from Sardar Swaran Singh, and I knew that originally he was keen about the Peace Committee. I did not know what had led to the sudden change in Congress and Sikh views; but the resolution of the Congress Working Committee and the simultaneous statement by Congress and Sikh leaders in the Punjab, which were issued yesterday, seemed to indicate that the Congress were acting under instructions from their High Command and had carried the Sikhs with them. I thought I knew where Master Tara Singh was; he was certainly keeping out of the public eye; and I fancied he had had a hard time from some of his followers who thought his statements immediately before the communal rioting had been ill-timed.

4. The deputation then made it clear that they still wanted to get into touch with the Sikhs. They asked for my help and we had a long discussion on the best method of proceeding. I enquired whether they had the authority of their High Command to negotiate freely; it was evident that they had not obtained such authority, but they thought they could obtain it. I pointed out some of the difficulties in negotiations at the present moment. The Sikhs were very sore at what they regarded as a Muslim attack on them. (I said that in Rawalpindi and Lahore I thought the Sikhs had had much the worst of it; in Multan the casualties were mainly Hindus; in Amritsar the casualties were mainly Muslims.) Moreover, the Congress and Sikh leaders had committed themselves publicly to a partition of the Punjab, and Punjab Congressmen were chained to their High Command. Unless the Muslim League could explain what Pakistan meant they would not get very far. I was quite prepared to see S. Swaran Singh, but I thought it desirable for me to see L. Bhim Sen Sachar also, since I thought the Sikhs might now be so committed to the Congress that they could not move without them. If I could persuade S. Swaran Singh and L. Bhim Sen Sachar to participate in negotiations, the best plan might be for me to invite two leaders from each community to meet me at Government House. We could explore the possibilities in a general way, and if the communities—or at least the Muslims and Sikhs—were ready to come to terms, they could then take over direct negotiations. I did not think it right that I should be concerned with the details, which were for the leaders themselves to settle. The deputation did not seem very clear about their position with their own High Command, but they agreed to this procedure. I said that my interviews with S. Swaran Singh and L. Bhim Sen Sachar would be entirely without commitment and that any subsequent meeting at which I presided would also be without commitment. In fact I was prepared to mediate if I could, but I should have to start informally and try to work up to a position in which the parties would talk to one another direct without my intervention.

5. Malik Firoz Khan Noon said there was one matter of a somewhat delicate nature that he wished to bring to my notice. There was a movement among the Congress and Sikh leaders to revive the Coalition Ministry with a very small number of Muslims. They had failed to secure the former Premier, but were believed to have secured Nawab Sir Muzaffar Ali Khan Qizilbash and Mian Muhammad Ibrahim Barq. The latter was said to cherish ambitions of the Premiership in a new Coalition. I could well imagine that the formation of a Government of this sort would cause the greatest resentment among Muslims. I said I appreciated the point, but, as far as I was aware, there would be little cohesion among the Muslim Unionists if the former Premier did not lead them.

6. There was no suggestion that a Muslim League Government should be formed, and from something said by Malik Firoz Khan Noon I think it is most improbable that they are anywhere near securing even a technical majority in the Assembly.

7. In the course of our conversation the deputation expressed great apprehension about the attitude of the Sikhs. They said they had heard that trouble was imminent at Ludhiana and Kartarpur. They also said that there were large stocks of arms in the Gurdwaras, and that they would be quite prepared to agree to Mosques being searched if we would search Gurdwaras as well. I made no comment on this latter suggestion except to say that I believed it to be true that the Sikhs had accumulated some arms during the War. I said that I had heard nothing about trouble being expected at Ludhiana and Kartarpur. Stories about the collection of fighting Sikhs in the Darbar Sahib at Amritsar and Sikh attacks on Tarn Taran and Jullundur had so far proved quite untrue.

8. Will G.S please pass on to IG Police the Muslim League apprehensions about Ludhiana and Kartarpur?

E.M.J.
Dear Lord Wavell,

My colleague, Dewan Chaman Lal, a member of the Central Assembly from the Punjab, has just returned from a visit to Lahore. He has sent me a report of conditions and happenings there. As this might interest you, I am sending it to you.

Yours sincerely

Jawaharlal Nehru

His Excellency
Field Marshal Earl Wavell, Viceroy's House,
New Delhi.

I returned from Lahore late last night. During my three days stay in Lahore I had prolonged discussions with leaders of all communities and received reports from most of the affected areas. I visited various parts of the city and attended meetings of the Peace Committee. Individuals from other affected areas in the Punjab excepting Amritsar and Multan brought news from their respective centres. I arrived at the final conclusion, after cross-examining many eye-witnesses and sifting the evidence contained in many reports received by me that

(a) There were definite signs of a pre-arranged plan of action in the North-Western areas of the Punjab;

(b) The unwise and precipitate action on the part of the police in Lahore in attacking a procession of students in Anarkali, making a lathi charge on them and in resorting to indiscriminate firing almost immediately thereafter on students assembled in a meeting at Golbagh, Lahore had the cumulative effect of on the one hand creating bitterness and resentment among the Hindus and Sikhs, and on the other encouraging all those of the other community who were spoiling for a fight who got the impression that the authorities at last were on their side.

2. During the 34 days agitation engineered by the Muslim League not a shot was fired at the students. The procedure adopted was that the first line of offence was a Tear-Gas squad; the second line, police armed with lathis and the third and final, armed police... to open fire into the crowd, but this last action was not resorted to nor generally were lathis employed. But on the morning of the 4th of March at about 9.40 a.m. three batches of students headed by the leaders of the Punjab Students' Federation and the Indian Students' Federation entered Anarkali and were beaten up by the police according to statements made to me by eye-witnesses. A newspaper correspondent Mr P.C. Batra stated that he had never seen any League procession of a students during the previous agitation, lathi-charged by the police, but on this occasion not only was a lathi charge resorted to but that a police official opened fire. The students proceeded to Govt College and a free fight took place between them and the police. Not far away a meeting was being held of students of various Hindu and Sikh colleges; and it is stated that armed police, about 60 in number, rushed to this meeting in Golbagh and attacked it, first with lathis and very soon thereafter opened fire on the crowd. The firing was indiscriminate, killing people far away from the scene including a litigant in the Civil Court named Karamchand, and a student in the DAV College Hostel standing by the window of his room, who it is stated was deliberately shot.

3. This was the origin of the trouble which spread throughout the city. An impression was created that the Muslim police definitely taking sides.

4. Meanwhile extremely well-organized bands of the Muslim League National Guards took charge of the situation. Two of our Ministers, Mr Swarup Singh and Mr Lahore Singh, informed me that they had a talk with the Governor who admitted that he had received information that the Muslim League National Guards had been round in police uniforms and were armed, but that it was not known how they came by these uniforms.

5. A general sense of insecurity and despair created in the minds of Hindus and Sikhs in Lahore due to the knowledge of these facts and due to what they considered to be partisan action taken by the police has led to a demand that a military should be given charge of the situation. I was told that the Governor had asked for the assistance of 3 companies, and that when public men approached him he stated that enough troops were not available. The Brigadier, however, then approached and declared that he had eleven more companies available on the spot and that he had been asked for only three.

The necessity for the employment of troops is to me borne out by the fact that when the citizens of Lahore Cantonment asked the military authorities to take charge, the effect was instantaneous. A great deal of murder and arson which otherwise might have been indulged in, was avoided, and generally, as compared with the city, the situation in the Cantonment was under control.

7. I give extracts from a memorandum submitted to me by well-known Sikhs and Hindus in Lahore:

(a) ‘Two non-Muslims were shot dead by the police when they were purchasing their rations at a shop and that too without a warning. Afterwards the police attribute this to a mistake.’

(b) ‘Where Muslim mobs entered non-Muslim areas and started looting and setting fire, police connived at it.’

(c) ‘When forced to fire on a Muslim mob, the police either fired in the air or on the ground.’

(d) ‘When even non-Muslims have been killed, they take up the absurd plea that non-Muslim killed non-Muslims to give a bad name to Muslims.’

(e) ‘So long as the predominantly Muslim police is in control, there are no chances of restoring confidence among the masses, especially non-Muslims.’

(f) ‘The Governor is not making full use of the military. A large number of companies are available, but only three have been called. If the military had been called in everything would have been quiet in the Punjab by now.’

(g) ‘Inspite of clear complaints against Muslim aggressors no action is being taken by the I.G. of Police or other police officers....’

Whatever the truth, a sense of utter insecurity and lack of confidence in the police is evident and not only have the Muslim National Guards been found in police uniforms but empty cartridges have been found marked ‘Specially prepared for HH the Nawab of Bhawalpur: Made in England’.
9. I was shown hand bills with pictorial representations giving instructions how to stab and kill efficiently, ending up with verses from the Quran Shareef. Definite and reliable information received was to the effect that charts have been prepared indicating various sites to be attacked in regular organized military fashion, and men designated to take charge of a systematized campaign of stabbing. The answer is complete military control and a ruthless rounding up of those who are behind these organized campaigns.

10. What the public in the Punjab is unable to understand is that with the political situation that had arisen in Lahore, immediate precautionary steps were not taken by the authorities in Amritsar, Multan and Rawalpindi; for it was known both to the citizens and presumably to the authorities that crowds had been collecting outside Pindi city. We are unable to understand why these crowds were not dispersed and action taken against them....

11. I attended meeting of the so-called Peace Committee. The Muslim League representatives were present including Mr Mumtaz Daultana, Mr Feroz Khan Noon, Mr Shaukat Hayat Khan and others. It was suggested that the leaders should go round the city, but that they would do so only if Master Tara Singh accompanied them. I wrote to Master Tara Singh, but as no one was allowed to enter or leave Amritsar my letter was sent through official channels....

After very careful examination, the position as I see it is that the Muslim League Assembly Party in the Punjab cannot claim the support of a majority in the Assembly. Mr Feroze Khan Noon admitted the fact that they could not form a ministry and that even if they were called upon to do so they would be defeated the very first day. In this situation the resolution of the Congress Working Committee was released suggesting a partition of the Punjab. This resolution has had a tremendous reassuring effect on the general political situation in the Punjab, as far as the Hindus and Sikhs are concerned, and steps to implement it would so a long way in bringing breath of reality into the present abnormal situation.

12. The situation would certainly have not arisen had the Ministry continued in office. At any rate it would not have assured its present serious aspect. Both Ministers, Mr Swam Singh and Mr Lahiri Singh informed me that they had been told by Malik Khizar Hayat Khan that the Governor had tried for some time to persuade him to join up with the League in order to form a more stable ministry, suggesting that after the position had been stabilized, if he so chose he could retire. It seemed to the Ministers and to all those who knew this fact that rather then join the Muslim League, Malik Khizar Hayat Khan would prefer to tender his resignation. I am aware that some British Press Correspondents were informed by the Governor that he had tried to induce Malik Khizar Hayat Khan to stick on to his job. But the then Ministers were definite in regard to the pressure to put upon Khizar Hayat Khan.

13. It is quite obvious that Section 93 administration will have to continue for some time but it must be reinforced by the military. There is no prospect whatsoever either of a Muslim League Ministry coming into power by itself or a coalition. I consulted all the non-Muslim Leaders and they unanimously of the opinion that they would not lend their support to the Muslim League Party....

14. ...Since the key positions in the Punjab are today by important British officials I think it is about time that this matter should be looked into... where the failure has occurred in order that the future may be secured. I am afraid of repercussion in South-Eastern Punjab. As to where the riot fever will break out is as unpredictable as the happening of an earthquake, but it is obvious that both the North-West and the South-East are, terrible danger points....

I have referred to the responsibility of officials. One example will suffice. Some of the communiqués issued by the Punjab Govt during the first three days were dangerous in the extreme, I might even say provocative. On the second day of the occurrences a communiqué was issued by the Govt that a Muslim while offering Namaz in a mosque in Krishna Nagar was stabbed by a Hindu. No such incident occurred. As a matter of fact there is no mosque in Krishna Nagar. When the official in charge was asked about this false communiqué his reply was that this was information conveyed to him, which apparently, he had not taken the trouble to verify. No doubt when enquiries are not going such facts will be elicited, establishing the responsibility for the happenings not only of those who were expected to ask for trouble but of those also who became accessories and provocateurs.

Chaman Lal

Letter below from Pandit Nehru. The note by Dewan Chaman Lal is not an impressive document. He has believed all the stories he has been told, and some of them are manifestly false. It is natural that there should be a feeling among the non-Muslim population in Lahore that they will get less than a square deal from the Punjab police because the rank and file of the Punjab police are predominantly Muslim. From all accounts, however, the police have done extraordinarily well, and Hinds and Sikhs of Lahore may well be thankful for the protection they have received....

2. ...I think, however, that there should be a denial at once of the entirely false story in paragraph 12 that the Governor brought pressure to bear on Malik Khizar Hayat Khan to join the League and form a more stable ministry...

14. Sikh Leaders’ Refusal to Negotiate with Muslim League

Note by Evan Jenkins on His Interviews with Baldev Singh and Swaran Singh, 11 March 1947

I had a very long talk this afternoon with Sardar Baldev Singh. We began at about 5.00 p.m. and Sardar Swaran Singh joined us shortly after 6.00 p.m. We did not finish until nearly 7.30 p.m.

2. Our conversation ranged over the whole of the present situation. The Sikhs are intensely aggrieved and are not really in a mood to enter into negotiations with the Muslim League. In the end Sardar Baldev Singh and Sardar Swaran Singh agreed that if the Muslim League leaders would (a) take open steps to stop Muslim outrages in Rawalpindi, Attock and Multan districts, and (b) obtain authority from their High Command to negotiate as Punjabis with the minorities, the Sikhs would be prepared to attend a meeting convened by me. This meeting should consist of the three Parliamentary leaders, Mamdot, Sardar Swaran Singh and L. Bhim Sen Sachar, the option being allowed to each of these leaders to bring one associate with him. I undertook to contact Mamdot and to try to arrange a meeting for tomorrow evening.

3. There is little doubt that the mind of the Sikhs is running on reprisals and that the Muslims have little chance of maintaining a united Punjab. The Sikhs will demand at best a deferred partition, and at worst an immediate partition, of the Province. They were not clear about the boundary but it is clear that they will demand a good deal more than the Muslims have ever expected to concede.
4. Sardar Swaran Singh produced a cyclostyled questionnaire and a writing pad alleged to have been found by R.B. Badri Dass in the High Court. The questionnaire invites Muslims to give information to an unspecified authority on various subjects which indicate revolutionary intentions. The writing pad contains what purports to be notes on a revolutionary organization. DIG/CID took these documents over.

5. After our conversation I asked DIG/CID to contact Mamdot tonight and to make an appointment for him to see me at 10.30 a.m. tomorrow. I told DIG/CID to explain to Mamdot the conditions on which the Sikhs would be prepared to negotiate.

15. Nehru to Visit Punjab

Extract from a Letter from Jawaharlal Nehru to Wavell, 13 March 1947

Dear Lord Wavell,

As you know, events in the Punjab and in the Frontier Province have been distressing us very greatly. Conditions there do not seem to be improving. Last night I had a telephone conversation with Sardar Baldev Singh who was in Lahore and the account he gave me of what was happening round about Rawalpindi was terrible. Evidently press and other reports do not give all the facts....

I have avoided visiting the Punjab, as I did not wish to interfere in any way, but I feel now that I must go there. I receive moving appeals from friends in the Punjab and yesterday Sardar Baldev Singh also suggested how very desirable it was for me to go there. I have, therefore, decided to pay a brief visit to the Punjab to meet people there informally and to see things for myself. I intend going there tomorrow (Friday) afternoon by air. I shall go to Lahore first and subsequently I should like to go to Amritsar and Rawalpindi. If possible, I might pay a brief visit to Peshawar. I expect to be away for the weekend, returning on Monday.

It is difficult to leave my work and important engagement here at this time, but I feel that everything else should be put aside for the moment and I must give first priority to a visit to the Punjab.

Yours sincerely,

Jawaharlal Nehru

16. ‘The Punjab Tragedy’

The Hindustan Times, 13 March 1947.

Since the resignation of the Khizr Ministry, the Punjab has been the scene of communal rioting reminiscent of Bengal and Bihar. In Amritsar, Lahore, Multan and Rawalpindi, destruction of life and property has been heavy. Though disturbances have lasted ten days and the situation seems to be under control in the urban areas, the destructive movement is reported to be spreading in the rural parts of Western Punjab. If this is not checked it may provoke trouble in Eastern Punjab and the entire administration may break down leaving the province in the throes of a civil war.
There is no doubt that these disturbances are wholly political in character. We do not know whether those who were responsible for upsetting the Coalition Ministry expected this terrible sequel. But they cannot escape responsibility for it. If it is true that the Governor of the Punjab put pressure on Malik Khizr Hyat Khan to make way for the Muslim League, he should be aghast at the consequences of his action. As The Times says, ‘the Punjab disorders are a terrible warning of the dangers to public order inseparable from any attempt to enforce communal dictatorship by unconstitutional agitation.’ If the leaders of the Muslim League thought that they could seize power by force, they must have been disillusioned. One of the most reprehensible features of these disturbances is the open partisanship of officials. Our Special Correspondent has given typical instances of the way in which responsible police officials in Lahore participated in the rioting on 5 March. In many places, members of the Muslim National Guard are reported to have been found in police uniform and armed.

Though the first duty of the Section 93 administration in the Punjab is to restore order by firm police and military action, it is obvious that that will not be sufficient to put down the movement. Drastic political action is necessary if these disturbances are to be prevented from spreading all over the province. Unless popular Government can be restored in some form, the Punjab will have to pass under martial law. A purely communal ministry is out of the question. A coalition of all parties is practically ruled out by the Muslim League’s insistence on Pakistan. We are, therefore, driven to the conclusion that the only way to restore peace, in the Punjab is to devise separate popular administrations for the Muslim and non-Muslim parts of the province. It need not involve any final decision on the issue of partition. There seems no escape from the fact that the Punjab as a single political and administrative unit cannot survive and that partition will have to be recognized de facto. It will make for peace on both sides of the line of demarcation, while enabling the Nawab of Mamdot to form unencumbered the Ministry he is hankering after and at the same time giving the Hindu–Sikh area the only administration it will tolerate under existing circumstances. When the League started the campaign to upset the Coalition Ministry, it deliberately courted the present developments. It put on the false mantle of democracy. The Times has rightly remarked: ‘The danger is in no way lessened if the agitation claims to be based on democratic principles. It is a curious feature of the campaign conducted in the Punjab by the Muslim League that a 56 per cent Muslim majority in the province enables it to invoke those principles while it fiercely controverts them in other parts of India. No Muslim party can form a ministry unless it secures Sikh or Hindu support.’ Such support can be secured only by abandoning the demand for Pakistan.
17. Communal Atmosphere in Punjab
Letter from Evan Jenkins to Wavell, 14 March 1947

Secret

Dear Lord Wavell,

This is my letter for the first half of March. I have reported very fully on the communal disturbances and discussed them with Your Excellency at New Delhi yesterday. I need therefore say little more about them now.

2. There is no immediate prospect of a new Ministry and I may have to remain in Section 93 for some weeks....

3....I have been much concerned since I took over as Governor at the increasing inefficiency of the Central Services. The telephone service is not only inefficient, but disloyal. Telephone calls are regularly tapped and the substance of conversations is passed on to the political parties, particularly the Muslim League. It is unfortunate that the politicians are destroying the services on which they will depend when they take over.

4. I have arranged for Nehru to be met here and at Rawalpindi and Multan by the Commissioners concerned. We are all rather apprehensive about his visit; but P.N. Thapar (whom you know), the present Commissioner of Lahore, will probably be able to cope with him. Nehru never seems to hear more than one side of any question, and Chaman Lal, who appears to be his adviser on Punjab affairs, is both mischievous and untruthful. Like most Congressmen, Nehru is at heart intensely communal, and if he loses his head, he may also lose us some of the ground we have won back so hardly during the last week.

5. The news from the Rawalpindi and Attao districts is still very bad, and I hope to submit to Your Excellency today proposals for a very drastic amendment in the Criminal Law to enable the police and troops to deal with the situation. Multan is also bad, but the country is easier and yesterday or the day before a small party of Indian troops, who had been surrounded by a riotous mob and were obliged to open fire seriously, did considerable execution. This should have a good effect.

Yours sincerely,

E.M. JENKINS

18. ‘How Dr Kitchlew Escaped Death’

The Tribune, 14 March 1947.

Lahore, 12 March.—The veteran Punjab Congress leader, Dr S.D. Kitchlew, President Punjab Provincial Congress Committee, it is now learnt, socially escaped from the laws of death. The circumstances under which he was placed could have proved tragic. God be thanked, however, that it did not happen so.

Dr Kitchlew was today brought by Sardar Baldev Singh, Defence Member, and Government of India from Multan and taken to Amritsar.

The tragic story of the death of his host, who was murdered and whose house was set on fire at Multan, was narrated by Dr Kitchlew himself to the ‘Tribune’ at the aerodrome at Multan before he flew with India’s Defence Member and others. Dr Kitchlew had received injuries all over the body, these having been caused by lathi blows and stones which were hurled upon him but the most severe injury was the one which he received on his hand by the result of lathi blow which was hurled upon him by the rioters on three occasions.

Describing the events leading to the death of his host, Seth Kalyan Dass, Dr Kitchew said that his host drove him back from the courts where he had gone on a professional visit and before the two reached back the palatial bungalow of Seth Kalyan Dass, fire had been set to an adjoining house and even though Seth Kalyan Dass suggested to Dr Kitchew to go back leaving the host to his fate. Dr Kitchew did not agree and insisted upon going into the bungalow, they were told by the son of his host (who is lying injured in the hospital) that some people were trying to break upon into their house from the back. Seth Kalyan Dass, who had been very friendly with the members of all communities, particularly the Muslims, thought that he would be able to persuade the rioters to go back and create no trouble. Leaving Dr Kitchew in his room, Seth Kalyan Dass went up to the rioters never to return again. The distinguished guest kept waiting for the host who could never come back and while he shouted for him he got no reply from either the host Seth Kalyan Dass or his son. Dr Kitchew came out of the room and as he did so he was face to face with two or three ‘goondas’ who attacked him at once and hurled two blows on him. One of them asked the name and when he was told that he was Dr Saif-ud-Din, he was spared.

Before, however, Dr Kitchew could come out of the house, some other goondas appeared on the scene and were about to make a murderous assault on him. But he was spared again after his name had been ascertained. The rioters asserted themselves by every possible means.

While he was going out he was helped by some other well-meaning Muslim gentlemen, who conducted him to their own house. But before these gentlemen could help Dr Kitchew to go back to the railway station (because he was to have left the same night) some persons in the locality insisted upon Dr Kitchew becoming a member of the Muslim League and asked him to sign a pledge. This Dr Kitchew refused to do and said that he could not possibly agree to change his own convictions.

The group of Muslims who had rescued him safely from the clutches of the goondas earlier helped Dr Kitchew to get back to the railway station. Even though Dr Kitchew and those who protected him were stoned on their way, he reached the railway station. Here a good police officer persuaded Dr Kitchew not to proceed by train and kept him back for a day. Dr Kitchew was then removed to the military hospital from where after having received all attention and good treatment he was discharged today and taken to Amritsar. Excepting for the rather bad injury in his right hand Dr Kitchew otherwise is keeping very good spirit.

19. Nehru Demands Martial Law

Note by Evan Jenkins about His Interview with Jawaharlal Nehru, 14 March 1947

Pandit Jawaharlal Nehru spent rather over an hour with me this evening from 7 o’clock.

2. We talked first about the immediate situation. He said that since he arrived in Lahore at 4 p.m. he had done nothing but see a large number of people. He felt that the solution to our immediate problem in seriously disturbed areas, such as Rawalpindi, was to hand over to the Military Commanders. Rightly or wrongly the communities had lost confidence in the services—the non-Muslims suspected Muslim officials and vice-versa. I explained the difficulties about Martial Law and said that as I understood the position it could no longer be imposed by proclamation and Ordinance. It represented in fact a decision taken by a Military Commander on his own responsibility, usually because the civil administration had completely ceased to function or his operations or troops were endangered. The Military Commander acted in the exercise of a recognized power under the common law; he had no statutory backing and was answerable afterwards for his actions. Pt J.L. Nehru said that he was not well up in the legal technicalities, but the ‘short point’ was that the people should feel that really firm measures were being taken to suppress the agitation. I replied that in my opinion certain offences, such as attempted murder, kidnapping and its variants, robbery and dacoity and their variant, rape, and arson, should be made punishable with death. The principle of ‘minimum force’ should also be abrogated. I said that I had made these proposals to the Viceroy in the letter. I was dispatching today. Pt J.L. Nehru seemed to agree with these measures, and said that if we were to stop trouble in the central and east Punjab, the north and west must be pacified within a few days. In Bihar firm action by the Army had had an electric effect. I replied the troops were operating in large numbers in the disturbed areas and had been told to interpret the principle of ‘minimum force’ in a sensible way. Pt J.L. Nehru asked if it was possible to extend the restrictions on gatherings, the carrying of weapons, and other things to the rural areas. I replied that it was possible and that action had been taken to my knowledge in Rawalpindi and Multan. I was less sure about Attock. (G.S. might see that suitable orders issued to DC Attock and DC Jhelum. The point is that unless restrictions are in force in seriously disturbed areas, the police and troops cannot act automatically against gatherings which are in all probability unlawful. They have to ask what the people are doing, declare to be unlawful, and so on, which is an indefinite and unsatisfactory procedure.)
Towards Freedom: 1947

3. We then passed to a discussion of the long-term problem. Pt J.L. Nehru said that some sort of partition was inevitable, but it must be made within the framework of the present constitution and by methods which could be established by convention and not by legislation. He thought a Muslim Area, a Central Area and not a Non-Muslim Area should be recognized, and that Ministers should be so appointed that each area was for certain purposes autonomous. The Ministers of all three Areas should sit jointly for other purposes—that is to say for matters of common concern. I said that the same idea had occurred to me, namely, that we should avoid a physical partition, but adopt devices which would give confidence to all communities. The arrangement would be a cumbersome one and might lead to trouble in the Departments. For example, there would have to be at least two and possibly three separate sections of the Education Department, each working under its own Minister. I referred to the arrangements for Scotland, and Pt J.L. Nehru took this point up and said that the analogy was not at all a bad one. Bills affecting Scotland had to be passed in Parliament, but were first referred to a Grand Committee consisting of the Scottish Members, whose advice was by convention accepted.

4. Pandit J.L. Nehru ended our conversation by saying that if I were here on Sunday evening, he would like to see me again. I said that I would be very glad to see him.

5. During our conversation he put through a telephone call to Dr Khan Sahib at Peshawar and subsequently transmitted a message by G.S. to HE the Viceroy in reply to a message from the Viceroy which I handed to him.

20. Worsening Situation in Punjab: Patel For Martial Law
Letter from Vallabhbhai Patel to Wavell, 15 March 1947
SPC, Vol. IV, pp. 11–12.

New Delhi

Dear Lord Wavell,

The situation in the Punjab has been a matter of grave concern and anxiety to me since the past few days and I have been considering how best we could bring it under control as soon as possible. Both private advice and official reports confirm that, while the authorities have been able, to some extent, to bring under control the communal disturbances in the cities, those in rural areas, particularly in the districts of Multan, Rawalpindi, Attock, Campbellpur and Mianwali are still defying the efforts of the civil power in collaboration with the military authorities. Instances of murder, forced conversions, abductions, and other things, are fairly common, while acts of arson and loot are being perpetrated with impunity on a very extensive scale. It is clear from the telegrams of the Governor of the Punjab that the position in rural areas has been deteriorating despite attempts to check it and that infiltration has started even from across the Indus.

2. As far as I can judge, these disturbances, both in intensity and extent, have thrown Bihar in the shade. Any further prolongation of these disturbances would seriously disturb the situation in the Eastern Punjab where, according to the Punjab Governor’s report, high tension is prevailing all over. I have no doubt in my mind that only the severest measures can curtail the duration of these disturbances, particularly in the rural areas in Northern and Western Punjab, and I would impress upon you, with all the earnestness at my command, the desirability—in fact the necessity—of enforcing martial law in the worst effected areas. I feel that the situation warrants it and the failure of the efforts of the civil power to bring the situation in these areas under control fully justifies this step.

3. I realize how distasteful this step would be to you on the eve of your departure from India. In fact, I have often expressed my regret at the fact that the end of your Viceroyalty should see a situation hardly less alarming and tragic than its commencement. The latter was the legacy of the past and we still take pleasure in recalling how the effective intervention of a military mind contributed to the alleviation of the situation. I hope that firm and determined action of the kind I have suggested within the next few days will enable you to hand over to your successor a better legacy than you received from your predecessor.

Yours sincerely,
Vallabhbhai Patel

21. Punjab Police Alleged to Be Partial Letter from J.J. Singh to Jawaharlal Nehru, 15 March 1947
J.J. Singh Papers, NMML.

Jawaharlalji:

I have been here since the 7th of February. Ever since my arrival in Lahore I have kept myself in close touch with American and British journalists who came along with me. Being ‘whites’,
They had greater opportunity to go about and see the things for themselves. Also the British officials ‘opened up’ a little more to them.

As a result of what I have seen and heard I can say that the following observations are fairly accurate.

The Punjab police has been far from impartial. That is true of Muslims and non-Muslims. But because about 80 per cent of them are Muslims, the non-Muslims populace has suffered at their hands.

In all western and northern Punjab more armed forces should be stationed. That may put a stop to the present orgy and may also discourage future outbursts.

The Hindus and Sikhs are not as well organized, as they were supposed to be. Muslims have proven to be much better organized.

The British officials in Lahore are openly contemptuous of the British Labour Government. Jenkins is reported to have said ‘Atlee is a bloody fool.’ The ‘Burra Sahibs’ are having a sordid satisfaction out of Indians’ misery. They keep on saying ‘We told you so.’ They are almost gleeful. They are even foolish enough to think and hope that the Punjab trouble may change the British decision to quit India in June 1948.

5. Sikhs pride has been hurt. They would like to take revenge. I think they should be dissuaded from such fruitless ideas. Some way should be found to punish the culprits, so that others may learn a lesson. (I will be leaving on the 21st evening for Patna to see Gandhiji. Any message etc.?)

22. Casualty Figures in Punjab

Telegram from Evan Jenkins to Pethick-Lawrence, 16 March 1947

MOST IMMEDIATE
CONFIDENTIAL

No. 53-G. Your telegram 3359 of 13th March. Following are very approximate casualty figures up to evening of 14th March.

4. Urban figures are complete for deaths officially verified and injured treated in hospital. Rural figures are quite incomplete.

5. We do not repeat not issue classified casualty lists here as this inflames communal feeling. Unclassified dead and injured can doubtless be classified except for decomposed corpses but complete classification has not been attempted yet. Your reply in the House (? will, omitted) of course be published here.
23. ‘Punjab Today—A Victim of Imperialist Manoeuvres’
Article by P.C. Joshi in People's Age, 16 March 1947.

The utter falsity of the Attlee promise to transfer power stands revealed in the hell-fires let loose in the Punjab. The transfer of power to Indian hands but provoking civil war among Indians by using one party against another is the imperialist game, and it has been unfolding itself.

In 1946 it was necessary to conciliate the Congress, the premier national organization, so the Cabinet Mission talked against Pakistan and offered it the chance of forming a Ministry in the Punjab and created the hope that it could keep the Punjab away from compulsory grouping.

In 1947 it is necessary to conciliate the League, so the latest Attlee Declaration threatening the Congress to accept compulsory grouping unequivocally or face partition, and the threat has been underlined by the fall of the Punjab Coalition Ministry.

The imperialist manoeuvre has been stage-managed in the crudest way. The seasoned British stage, ‘non-communal’ Khizar, suddenly become riot-ridden Punjab where rioting is spreading even faster than it did in Bengal or Bihar. The Punjab is neither in the hands of the Congress nor the League but of Governor Jenkins; Section 93 has been proclaimed.

The great Land of Five Rivers is being used as a British pawn to force the Congress to get the League inside the British designed Constituent Assembly and produce a Constitution as per British dictation and needs or accept partition as the alternative with the British dictating terms to both separately, which they with true imperialist hypocrisy called ‘transfer of power’.

Result of Congress-League Policies
The Punjab is under curfew, the golden city of Amritsar is in flames, women and children are flying for shelter. British armoured... on the streets. British brigades are being rushed. Horror and dishonor could not go further.

And it would have never come to this but for the fact that the leaders of the Congress and the League have been following the disastrous policy of... the British and pursue the most shameless power politics against each other and play straight into British hands.

The same League leaders who started the struggle against Ordinance Raj agreed to pass it as an Act; the same leaders who announced Khizar as a British puppet and traitor welcome him back inside the League, just for the right to form a Ministry under Governor Jenkins.

The same Congress and Akali leaders who doggedly and rightly oppose the partition of India now shamelessly demand the partition of the Punjab, the same leaders who talk loudly of ‘Quit India’ have no objection to Governor Jenkins’ arbitrary rule rather than let a League Ministry be formed.

It is all a game of power-politics pursued by those who are out to safeguard the vested interests either of the landlords or of the capitalists at the cost of disruption among the masses.

The League leaders talk in the name of the Muslim masses, but are now willing to enact the Ordinance to suppress the Hindu and Muslim tenants and safeguard the interests of the landlords.

The Congress leaders had already agreed to the Ordinance to effectively... the voice of workers and peasants under the pretext of suppressing communalism.
Could the astute rulers desire better Indian leaders to play their military game against the freedom of Middle-Eastern peoples and a base against the Soviet Union?

Hence the British interest in weakening the Punjab through civil war today and keeping it in safe hands is very genuine. The Punjab's calamity today may be the world's tomorrow if the Punjab's and India's leaders are not made to make a sharp right about turn.

The Communist Party outlines and will tirelessly pursue the following course to save the Punjab from going deeper into the imperialist-planned abyss and lift it to its proper place in India's march to freedom.

All Parties' Peace Committee

The Communist Party was the first that has always called and worked for an All Parties Peace Committee. One has been announced in the Press but the names of trade union, kisan and Communist leaders are missing from it, that is, just of those elements who have fought the riot danger all through and the hardest.

The experience of Bombay and Calcutta reveals that it is bureaucrats and the worst riot-mongering politicians who insist on Communist expulsion so that they can paralyze such Committees. We warn against this danger.

The Communist Party will endeavor its hardest to form all inclusive Peace Committees in every mohalla and village to rouse the workers, peasants and the mass of common, people against riot-mongers, whoever they be, and defend their hearths and homes.

We appeal to leaders of all parties to join hands and demand full facilities and civil liberties for the anti-riot campaign. Without this there can be no popular initiative, and the police and the military will continue to rule the day and let the situation worsen while goonda raj remains.

We warn that any popular party that does not join hands in this will be guilty of leaving the people helpless and defenceless under British terror against all communities.

All Parties’ Ministry for Peace, People’s Needs

The Communist Party was the first to call for an All Parties Coalition Ministry as the only way to certain communal peace in the Province. Our warning went unheeded and today after the orgy of fratricide the same call is coming from other parties.

Once again they give the warning that the reactionary power-politicians must not be allowed to exploit the urge of the common people for unity, only to hide their own factional manoeuvrings and put the blame on other parties under cover of a popular slogan.

The Governor's Raj must go and a united Popular Ministry must come. But it will need a firm stand by progressive anti-imperialist elements inside all popular parties told intense mass pressure by common Hindus, Muslims and Sikhs to ensure.

FIRST, that today’s communal and reactionary elements inside all parties who have brought the Punjab to its present plight are isolated and kept out of any new Ministry, and

SECONDLY, that the new coalition must be based not only on the best elements inside the Congress, League and Akalis but that it is pledged to an emergent practical programme of:

- Maintaining communal peace through popular initiative and cooperation;
- Withdrawal of the Ordinance; Restoration of full civil liberties;
Guaranteeing the fulfillment of people's needs by taking prompt and emergent measures against blackmarketeers and profiteering capitalists and by trying landlords who are worst food thieves, all of whom together are intensifying the miseries of the people, making them desperate;

- Enforcing living wage for all workers and employees;
- Banning ejectments of tenants; and
- Introduction of legislation to abolish landlordism and give land to the tiller.

There is no prospect of peace in the Province, nor is the well-being of its people possible, unless the Popular Ministry is pledged to the democratic programme of strengthening the people, crushing the vested interests and checking the bureaucracy.

‘Let Punjabis Decide Punjab’s Future’

An All-Parties Ministry is the only way out of the present tragic crisis. The imperialist bureaucracy could act the incendiary because it could exploit the deep differences among the leaders of the popular parties about the future of the Punjab.

The Punjab is the common homeland of Muslims, Hindus and Sikhs who have all suffered together under the present policies of their leaders.

Unless progressive elements inside every popular party, backed by the common people can force agreement on the only democratic basis possible, namely, that the future of the Punjab shall be decided by the Punjabis, Hindus, Muslims and Sikhs, as equals, through the plebiscite of all, the British imperialist will impose their own solution, form the Ministry that suits them best, and the people will only know Police Raj, profiteers’ domination, provocateurs of politics.

Punjab at the Parting of Ways

The Punjab stands at the parting of the ways. It can become the problem of India leading not only to the partition of India but also of the Punjabis, or it can show the way to India saving its own unity and helping to build the unity of India on a new democratic foundation through the efforts of its own people, aided by its progressive leaders.

It is a tough, hard battle in the land of Bhagat Singh, inspired by his memory—out of the tragedy of fratricide and the Governor’s Raj, today the Communist Party works for the glory of brotherly unity against British manoeuvres, for free and united Punjab in a free, united India where all will be equal, free and happy.

24. Measures Suggested by Baldev Singh and Nehru

Telegram from Evan Jenkins to Wavell, 16 March 1947

IMMEDIATE
CONFIDENTIAL

No. 52-G. Addressed Viceroy repeated Secretary of State. Punjab situation. My immediately preceding telegram. There has been no further approach to me by any Punjab Leader. Nehru talked, with me for an hour on 14th evening. He advocated martial law in disturbed areas but was unaware of conditions in which martial law can be imposed. Similar demand has been made by others including Baldev Singh. Nehru said quite rightly that disturbances must be suppressed with utmost firmness. This is in fact being done but politicians seldom appreciate difficulty of regaining control in broken country with bad communications. With long term purposes Nehru advocated national [notional] partition on territorial basis and (?) Ministers deliberating separately on matters allocated to new provinces. Legislature would be divided similarly by convention though formal vote of House as a whole would be needed to give effect to any measure (gr. crpt) and Legislature as a whole would deal as now with matters of common concern. Nehru’s point is that arrangement must be such as to fit by convention into framework of present constitution. There may be something in this.

[Para 2, on Sir E. Jenkins’ visit that day to Sargodha, Mianwali and Lyallpur, omitted.]

3. Situation still very grave with talk of reprisals and civil war. I visit Attock and Rawalpindi tomorrow.

25. Notional Partition of Punjab

Extract from the Record of an Interview between Evan Jenkins and Jawaharlal Nehru, 17 March 1947

...3. In recording this note yesterday I omitted to mention that Pt Nehru said he had talked to Master Tara Singh, and felt that a ‘notional’ partition might work—he had given me his views on it during our earlier talk here. I replied that any arrangement that would serve as a ‘bridge’ would be worth trying. I added that it was essential to try to get a popular ministry into office within reasonable time.

ENCLOSURE

A. Legal points

The following might be included in any legislation:

(1) Forcible conversion to be punishable with death. (What section of the IPC covers this?)
(2) Destruction of religious places and religious books to be similarly punishable. (Same query. Destruction by fire is already covered.)
(3) Conspiracy should be covered.
(4) Stabbing might be dealt with by a special system of collective fines, for example, if Muslims stabbed in a village, Hindus pay, and vice versa.
(5) Military should be given powers to search and arrest. (I have already referred to L.R.)
(6) Trials to be summary. (Ordinance provides for this, and I have asked L.R. to see whether provisions are suitable.)
(7) Ordinance to be given retrospective effect. (I said I thought this was impossible on legal grounds though I agreed whole-heartedly in principle.)

B. Executive matters

(1) Special search to be made for Sikh women alleged to have been seized by Muslims. Master Tara Singh attaches supreme importance to this. Orders should be issued at once to the districts concerned to go into this matter and make searches where necessary.
(2) Zaildars and village officials who have taken part in disturbances, or have not helped, to be suspended, and this to be announced publicly.
(3) New legislation to be widely published. (I agree.)
(4) Special arrangements to be made for investigation. (This is already in hand.)

Necessary action should be taken immediately where indicated.

26. Problem of Refugees

Telegram from Evan Jenkins to G.E.B. Abell, 17 March 1947
Lionel Carter (Ed.), Punjab Politics, Vol. IV, p. 84.

IMMEDIATE

No. 55-G. Addressed PSV, repeated Secy of State.

Punjab situation. Immediately preceding telegram. I spent today in Attock and Rawalpindi. We already have something like 25,000 refugees on our hands from these two districts and Jhelum and must cater for 35,000. Attacks on non-Muslims have been organized with extreme savagery. Deputy Commissioner Rawalpindi believes that in his district alone there may be 5,000 casualties including killed, injured and missing. Military opinion is that we shall regain physical control within a week but feeling between communities is very bad indeed and there is no sign of improvement.

2. I saw Ghazanfar Ali, Mamdot, Ifikharuddin at Rawalpindi. They seemed genuinely shocked at brutality and treachery shown by members of their party and undertook to do everything possible to stop disturbances.

I had further talk with Nehru this evening. He was well satisfied with progress in Multan which he visited today. He made various suggestions about special legislation now being considered. He returns to Delhi after visiting Amritsar tomorrow. Ends.

27. Continued Rioting in Different Areas of the Province

Extract from a Letter from Evan Jenkins to Wavell, 17 March 1947
IOR, R/3/1/89, Acc. No. 3414, NAI.

SECRET

GOVERNMENT HOUSE, LAHORE

No. 657.

Dear Lord Wavell,

...3. Major disturbances in the cities and towns have been confined to Lahore, Amritsar, Multan, Rawalpindi and Jullundur. Lesser disturbances have occurred at Ludhiana, Sialkot, Kamoke in the Gujranwala district, Hoshiarpur, and Khushab in the Shahpur district.

In Lahore the rioting differed little in kind from communal rioting of the past. Casualties were fairly heavy, but there was no extraordinary destruction of property.

In Amritsar the main feature of the rioting was incendiariism. Several important streets look as though they had had a heavy raid, with many houses and shops completely down and the road and pavements heaped high with rubble. The electric transmission lines were broken, and for some time the greater part of the city was in darkness. Casualties were heavy; the Muslims suffered worse than the other communities.
At Multan the trouble was started on 5th March by a sudden procession of non-Muslim students shouting 'Qaid-i-Azam murda-bad'. Between 12 noon and 3.15 p.m. it is estimated that about 150 people—nearly all Hindus—lost their lives. There was much incendiarism, but the damage as compared with that in Amritsar is small.

At Rawalpindi, as in Lahore, the rioting seems to have followed the pattern of earlier communal riots. I have not been through Rawalpindi City, but from the air it does not appear that many buildings have been burnt. Casualties were fairly heavy.

There is nothing special to note about the other cities and towns. Jullundur had the worst of the lesser outbreaks, and Ludhiana probably came next.

The urban disturbances were brought under control pretty quickly with the aid of troops.

3. The rural disturbances have been far more serious. The major outbreaks are so far confined to the Rawalpindi and Attock districts, the part of the Jhelum district round Chakwal, and the Multan district.

Trains have been attacked in Mianwali, and there is a report in this morning about the looting of an entire train on the Khushab–Kundian line somewhere near the Mianwali border.

4. In the rural areas gravely affected there has been extreme savagery. In the triangle Taxile–Murree–Gujar Khan there was a regular butchery of non-Muslims, particularly Sikhs. Cruelty and treachery seem to have been common. General Messervy told me that he had seen in hospital a child whose hands had been cut off; there are at least two well-authenticated stories of non-Muslims being lured into 'peace committees' and then murdered; and in one village, Sasali, a party of Sikhs, who surrendered to the Muslim attackers on a promise that their lives would be spared, were murdered out of hand. The most brutal killings seem to have been in the triangle to which I have referred, but there has been frightful brutality outside it, and everywhere in the district burning and arson have been common.

In Attock the Chauntra area, which is very close to Rawalpindi, was affected in much the same way. In the rest of the district there seem to have been fewer killings than in Rawalpindi, but quite as much burning and looting. A common method of attack has been for the Muslims in a village to put white flags on their houses and to invite the Muslims of the neighbouring villages to come in and deal with property not so marked.

In the Chakwal neighbourhood of the Jhelum district a large village, Dhudial, was sacked, but the Police and troops were able to inflict fairly heavy casualties on the attackers.

In Multan murder, arson and looting were much the same as in the districts of the Rawalpindi Division, but the area affected (the Sadar Police Station and part of the Shujabad tahsil) is flat and relatively easy to control. The troops seem to have inflicted fairly heavy casualties on a mob at an early stage, and though the loss of life and property must have been heavy, it is certainly less than that in the Rawalpindi district.

7. It is very difficult to account for this extraordinarily violent rural movement. General Messervy thinks that there are some signs of organization and conspiracy—in parts of Rawalpindi outbreaks seem to have occurred almost simultaneously, and the raid at Murree, to which I referred in my letter of 9th March, appears to have been carefully planned and carried out. All Muslims in the affected districts seem to be involved in or sympathetic to the movement. The Commander 7th Division told me when I saw him yesterday that attacks on non-Muslims had been led in some cases by retired Army officers—some of them pensioners with honorary Commissioned rank. The Muslim section of the local notables, to whom I spoke at Campellpur yesterday, were extremely sulky, and though some of them are beginning to be frightened, there is little doubt that they believe that the movement was inevitable and are not prepared to oppose it. The most probable theory is that the growth of the Pakistan idea from 1943 onwards, the extreme communalism of the election campaign of 1945–46, the frustration which followed it, the propaganda against the Coalition Ministry, the Muslim League agitation, HMG’s statement of 20th February, and Khizar’s resignation combined to touch off an explosive mixture which had been forming for some time. The Muslims say that they were influenced by rumours of a large Sikh Army marching on the north; also that the movement is a spontaneous outburst against black-marketing by non-Muslims. It is more likely that they believe that by exterminating non-Muslims now they will make their districts a safe base for operations against the other communities in due course. No educated man could reasonably believe the story about the Sikh army, and though opportunity has been taken to wipe out economic scores, resentment at the controls and the way in which non-Muslims make money out of them was not in my judgment the immediate cause of the trouble.

8. The disturbances have produced a crop of special problems:

(1) The non-Muslims are vehemently bitter against the civil services and particularly against the Police. The District Officers in the Rawalpindi Division were not happy about police morale and were inclined to make the most of any indication that the police would not do their duty. There have also been complaints of partiality against the troops—the Commander 7th Indian Division told me that one of these complaints was justified. I shall now be bombarded with demands (they have in fact already begun) for the transfer of Muslim officials from the districts affected, for the use of non-Muslim troops, for the issue of arms licences to non-Muslims, and so on. We can only do our best with the resources we have, and as long as I am in Section 93 I do not propose to issue arms licences so that the minorities in any part of the Province may be able to fight more effectively against the other community.

(2) The ordinary law, even as supplemented by the Punjab Public Safety Ordinance, 1946, is inadequate for disturbances on this scale. Certain offences common during communal disturbances must be made punishable with death, and the troops and police should have authority to use more than the minimum force in dealing with rioters. Troops should also in my opinion have power to arrest and search on a reasonable suspicion that an offence has been committed. These matters have already been referred to Your Excellency and are being dealt with. I am referring separately a measure to give us power to impose collective fines and to deal much more comprehensively and promptly than the Police Act permits with the assessment and distribution of compensation....

Yours sincerely,

E.M. JENKINS

28. Need to Restore Normalcy in Punjab

The situation in the Punjab is more or less under control. I propose to say little about my Punjab visit at this time. I have seen ghastly sights and I have heard of behaviour by human beings which would degrade even the brute. The first thing to be done is to put an end to every kind of disorderly action. The second thing is to protect and rescue the people who may be threatened or are in danger, more specially the women, who have been abducted or removed by force, must be brought back to their own homes. Then other problems like the care of refugees and rehabilitation have to be tackled.

I think that the present disturbances will be completely ended within a very few days. So far as I have been able to see, the military are acting efficiently and with rapidity.

There is never any need for panic for whatever has happened, much less today when the situation is more or less under control. The man who is panicky is a useless citizen and a danger to others.

Obviously all that has happened is intimately connected with political affairs. I prefer to say nothing about that aspect except this: if political affairs are to be conducted in this way then they cease to be political affairs and become some kind of a jungle warfare which reduces human habitation to the state of a desert. If there is any grain of intelligence in a person, he must realize that whatever the political objective, he may aim at, this is not the way to attain it. Any such attempt must bring, as it has in a measure brought, ruin and destruction in its train. Let people struggle for their political aim if they want to. But they can do so as human beings with a measure of human dignity.

I am not enamoured of slogans anywhere. The Punjab is specially fond of slogans. There may be times when slogans are useful and good but when we are up against these hard facts which we face today, these slogans cease to have any meaning. In particular slogans cursing and denouncing others are peculiarly unbecoming and objectionable. Slogans with murdabad attached to them are not brave slogans but indicate the mentality of a coward or a bully.

India will go along this path to her destined end of independence and nothing that has happened is going to stop this. So, I am sure, will the Punjab as a part of India, in spite of everything that has happened, or is likely to happen. Mighty historic forces are at work driving us all in that direction in spite of our own follies. It is up to us, however, to march ahead with dignity and with head erect or crawl like animals in the field.

The Punjab has had a hard lesson. Let it learn from it and not lose itself in a sea of hatred and reprisals which can only lead to mutual destruction and infamy. Let us all build together and prepare ourselves for the great things to come.

A relief fund has been started and an appeal has been issued for it. I hope that this fund will be liberally subscribed to and that it is to be employed to give help to a large number of sufferers of these disturbances regardless of creed or any other distinction.

29. ‘Protection of Minorities a Sacred Duty’

Extract from a Report from Dawn, 18 March 1947.

Bombay, Monday.—Qaed-e-Azam Mr M.A. Jinnah, President of the All India Muslim League, has directed the Punjab Provincial Muslim League ‘to give its unstinted and wholehearted co-operation to the Administration in the Punjab to restore immediately order in the Province’ and has also reminded the Musalmans of the Punjab that ‘it is their sacred duty to protect the minorities that live amongst them’, according to Mian Mumtaz Daultana, General Secretary of the Punjab Provincial Muslim League.

Disclosing this to an API correspondent today before his departure for Lahore by plane, Mian Mumtaz Daultana, who was deputed by the Punjab Provincial Muslim League to see Qaed-e-Azam Jinnah in Bombay said: ‘I came to acquaint the Qaed-e-Azam of the terrible situation in the Punjab.”
‘I take back with me two mandatory orders from him. Firstly, the Muslim League in the Punjab must give its unstinted and whole-hearted cooperation to the Administration to restore immediately order in the Province’.

FULLEST CO-OPERATION

‘We are to offer our fullest and unreserved co-operation to every party and community which was this object in view, and we are to seek the help of every man of goodwill in that ravaged Province.

‘Secondly, it is the sacred duty of the Mussalmans of the Punjab to protect the minorities that live amongst them’.

The Punjab Muslim League leader declared that the entire Muslim population would be mobilized by the Punjab Muslim League to achieve this object, because, he said, ‘we feel that guarding the honour, security and well-being of our Hindu and Sikh minorities is our first duty before God and man’.

Mian Mumtaz Daultana invited everyone in the Punjab to help in the task of restoring tranquillity and peace in the Province.

30. Hindu Mahasabha Violates Orders

Press Statement by Ashutosh Lahiry on Punjab, 18 March 1947
AIHM Papers, File No. C-165, NMML.

Ashutosh Lahiry, General Secretary, All India Hindu Mahasabha, in course of a Press Statement says:

‘It is unfortunate that the Governor of the Punjab should have issued orders banning the entry of the President and General Secretary of the All India Hindu Mahasabha, when we were served with the order at Ferozepore Cantonment Station, we decided not to violate the order, for the time being, firstly, because we wanted to give some time to the Punjab Government to realize the full implications of the ban and secondly, because the situation in Ferozepore itself was so tense that our defiance of the ban might have easily led to unpleasant developments, which we were most anxious to avoid. In fact, during the three hours that we spent at Ferozepore Cantonment Station, a pretty large crowd numbering several hundreds had gathered round us, apparently in excited mood, and had we decided to defy the ban we felt that this would not have conduced to maintenance of communal peace and harmony.

Now that sufficient time have elapsed, the Government of the Punjab must realize that Hindu Mahasabha cannot stultify itself by being deprived, indefinitely, of its right to serve the stricken Hindus and Sikhs of the Punjab in the staggering calamity that has overtaken them. The ban is an insult on intolerable affront to the Hindu Mahasabha, which we cannot obviously take it lying down.

I remember when the Bihar tragedy was being enacted how the Bihar Government forthwith allowed Moslem League leaders of Bengal and other provinces to run to the succour of the Moslems in Bihar and enable them to make a detailed tour of the riot affected areas of the province. They virtually invaded Bihar with a large number of trucks, lorries, gypcars and over one thousand members of the Moslem National Guards for rendering relief to the Moslems. If the Bihar Government could trust the League Leaders, even though they appeared on the scene with such strength and evident preparedness, why cannot the Punjab Government permit even a visit of the leading persons of the Hindu Mahasabha who are certainly the most responsible men of the organization. To say that it is necessary in the interest of communal peace is to malign us and the organization we represent.

We desire to carry to our brotheren of the Punjab a message of hope and confidence. It is obvious that the Hindus and Sikhs are the main sufferers in this great tragedy, since all the acts of murder, arson and loot had taken place in North and South Western Punjab which have got an overwhelming Moslem majority. But up till now what have the Moslem League leaders, the leaders of the aggressor community, so far done? One of the League Members of the Viceroy’s Council who by his provocative utterances and a campaign of hatred and violence against the Hindus have been largely responsible for stirring the Moslem mass mind to acts of fanatical fury has been sitting inert in a western Punjab district all the time the Punjab has been in flames and we have no knowledge that he has stirred finger for pacifying his comrades and helping the government in preventing the massacre and spoliation of the Hindus and Sikhs. Another League member of the Viceroy’s Council who is now visiting the North Western Frontiers Province on a “Peace Mission” has been giving general call to the Moslems to enroll themselves in thousands in the Moslem National Guard, at a time when the conflagration has been dangerously spread in the North Western Frontier Province. It is the time for a responsible Moslem League leader who, besides, holds such an important office of the Government of India, to start on a recruiting campaign for Moslem National Guards when we know what part the Moslem National Guards have played in the Punjab catastrophe and in various other parts of India.

The Hindu Mahasabha has no desire to disturb peace or to hamper in any way the restoration of normal conditions in the unhappy province. But we cannot allow our anxiety for communal peace and harmony to deflect us from the obvious call of duty and from submitting to restrictions unworthy of our self-respect. We look upon the action of the Punjab Government as an act of senseless perversity which if, persisted in, will ultimately result in defeating the purpose for which it has been alleged to have been taken. We shall take whatever steps we think necessary in vindication of our just rights and liberties. But before we do so, we must give a timely notice to the Punjab Government that the responsibility for the future developments must rest on their shoulders’.

Ashutosh Lahiry

31. ‘Haryana Prant Will Resist Communal Domination’

_The Tribune_, 18 March 1947.

Lahore, 16 March.—Pandit Sri Ram Sharma, MLA, Member, Constituent Assembly, says in a press statement:

‘The latest pronouncement of the Congress High Command hinting at division of the Punjab is not unwelcome to predominantly Hindu districts of the Haryana Prant. If the Muslim League after the Quit India declaration of the British Government, still persists in its demand of a vague Pakistan, quite independent of the Union Centre, there remains no other alternative to the Haryana district, but to stand as one man for separation, Haryana was not originally a part of this province. Sikhs are already in favour of dividing the Punjab.

The Anti-Pakistan Day has been enthusiastically observed with complete hartals, big public meetings and peaceful demonstrations throughout Haryana. We would like to remain in a United Punjab, governed by a true coalition as a part of the Indian Union, but if it is not to be so, and then the Haryana will be in open revolt against communal domination.'
The monster gathering at Rohtak with a view to expressing its full determination against Pakistan and its forerunner, the Muslim League Ministry, was jointly addressed by the Congress, Hindu Unionist, Hindu Sabha and all other non-League representatives.

The same is the case everywhere in the south-eastern part of the Punjab.

32. Congress Criticism of Punjab Police

Extract from a Letter from Wavell to Pethick-Lawrence, 19 March 1947

PRIVATE AND SECRET

THE VICEROY'S HOUSE, NEW DELHI,

Thank you for your letter of the 14th March. This will be my last letter to you in this series.

2. You have seen Jenkins’ telegrams about the situation in the Punjab. Though there is still danger of retaliation, things have settled down somewhat and I hope that the worst may be over. Nehru was most careful during his visit not to embarrass the authorities. The general tendency on the part of the Congress and the non-Muslims generally, is to criticize the police, of whom the majority are Muslims, and to seek to put more reliance on the military authorities under the Defence Member. The Muslims, on the other hand, are inclined to suggest that the Defence Member interferes with military dispositions, so as to place Hindu troops where they can oppress Muslims. This of course is quite untrue. Jenkins has promulgated a drastic Ordinance to increase the penalties for certain offences and to give the Police additional powers; and I have issued a Central Ordinance to give the Military the same powers.

3. According to Colin Reid, the Daily Telegraph correspondent, who saw Jinnah recently, 'Jinnah has no intention of making any move in response to the Congress resolution until he is sent for by Mountbatten. Reid got the impression that he might accept the Cabinet Mission's Plan if the Congress accepted it in unequivocal terms. It however seems most unlikely that the Congress will so accept the plan since events in the Punjab have made it very difficult for them to "let down the Sikhs" as they would put it...'

33. Migration of Muslims into East Punjab

Letter from Malik Mohammad to M.A. Jinnah, 19 March 1947

HISAR

Respected Jinnah Sahib,

The current Congress movement for division of the Punjab into two parts is dangerous for us Muslims. It is essential that a good number of respectable Musalmans should settle down in East Punjab districts to save Muslims there from the Hindus. All this land is agricultural and inhabited by farmers. If some zamindars purchase agricultural land here, the Muslim population would increase and the local Musalmans will also become safe. Of course, you know better as to what should be done.

We Muslims are ready to sacrifice our lives at your call.

[Your] servant,

MALIK MUHAMMAD
34. Critical Situation in Punjab and NWFP
Letter from Gokul Chand Narang to Vallabhbhai Patel, 19 March 1947

5, Montgomery Road
Lahore

Dear Sardar Patel,

On 11 December 1946 I sent to you a fairly long letter under registered cover giving you some facts about the situation in the Frontier Province. I got a postal receipt from your P.A. but as you were then touring in Bombay Presidency I am not sure if my letter was at all placed in your hands. I did not remind you as I did not feel sure that even if you got it you would acknowledge it. In any case, I am now enclosing a copy of it for your perusal.

My apprehensions, you will see, have proved more than correct, if you have been following what has been happening in the Punjab from the 5th up to now. Your colleagues have paid visits to this province but we are all in the dark as to what steps they propose to take to put an end to the present trouble and to make recurrence of the trouble impossible. The situation in the Punjab and the NWFP is tragic. I do not believe that the number of casualties officially given is correct and the general apprehension is that the casualties may be many times more than what has been officially communicated to the authorities in the Punjab and by the Punjab authorities to your Government. The situation is very critical indeed. The time for talking is over. If you want to save the Punjab and the NWFP, and I may say even India, you will have to wake up. If the future action of the Government is to be judged from what they have done to meet the present trouble the outlook is gloomy indeed. If the Government has not been able to cope with the present trouble, what hopes can we cherish for its success in case the law-breakers in the Punjab are reinforced from the NWFP and from the Tribal area! A large proportion of the people are armed and I speak it on the authority of a high police officer that the mob of 12,000 odd that surrounded Mianwali was armed to the teeth not only with rifles but with tommy guns and hand grenades. You might have also seen a picture taken from the air of the mob marching from Golra to invade Rawalpindi. I am enclosing a cutting for your information.

I am writing to you this letter which is a sort of SOS as we have reason to believe that more trouble is ahead. Please read the cuttings from the Statesman of the 16th and 17th and from the Ajit of the 19th enclosed herewith. I hope you will consider the following suggestions that I venture to make for consideration by you and your colleagues:

1. The army should be strengthened as I have no doubt in my mind that when the trouble spreads the Muslim section of the army will go over to the rebels and you will have to meet a large trained Muslim army in addition to the irregulars from the Punjab, NWFP and trans-frontier tribes if not from Afghanistan itself. The cry of reduction in military expenditure should be silenced and military organization should be given preference over all other programmes whether of social reforms or of commercial and industrial expansions.

2. You should see that all voters to the legislatures in all the Congress-governed provinces are allowed licenses for firearms.

3. Muslim National Guards are being openly recruited and many of them are being armed. They have been going about in uniform with steel helmets on their heads firing on the Hindus with illicit arms or arms lent to them by the Muslim policemen. There is no reason why the Congress should not organize a similar band of civic guards for the maintenance of peace. If the Congress had acted upon the suggestion which I made to Mahatma Gandhi eight years ago and also to the then Premiers of the first Congress Governments the Congress would have had an army of two millions at its command even if without any firearms. If men are there properly drilled and trained it does not take long to train them in the use of arms.

4. You must strengthen the air force as without an air force no battle can be fought in these days. You should also encourage the establishment of flying clubs all over the country and as was the case of a few years ago and may be even now you should liberally subsidise them. In Bombay and Madras you must have nautical schools and should persuade the Indian State having sea ports in their territories to do the same.

5. If funds permit I would reiterate the suggestion of conscription on a peacetime footing as suggested in my last letter.

I trust that you will not look upon this letter of mine as coming from an alarmist but I visualize the situation and I have to apprise you of the danger as my previous anticipations in this direction have proved absolutely correct. The Hindus suffered for centuries because they did not take the first incursions and invasions seriously and woke up when it was too late.

I have refrained from discussing political and constitutional questions. Pandit Jawaharlal Nehru has been here and I have no doubt that he will take you and his other colleagues into confidence and arrive at a satisfactory solution of the constitutional muddle in the province. There is some difference of opinion regards the partition of the Punjab but I can assure you that if the dividing line is the Ravi river it would satisfy a vast majority of the Hindus and Sikhs.

Yours sincerely,
G.C. Narang

35. Report from Punjab Province

Extract from the Fortnightly Report for the First Half of March 1947 for Punjab, 20 March 1947

Home Poll (I), File No. 18/3/47, NAI.

1. POLITICAL AND COMMUNAL: One of the most remarkable features of the fortnight under report has been the speed with which events have moved. On the 2nd of March, following the settlement with Government, the Muslim League celebrated a 'Victory Day'. No communal clash accompanied the observances but they were widespread and, in affording evidence of Muslim solidarity and arrogance, they intensified the fears and hatred of the other communities and increased their determination not to be subjected to unwanted domination. On the same day, the Premier announced the resignation of the Coalition Ministry in a statement (to the effect) that he was taking this step because he felt that His Majesty's Government's pronouncement of the 20th February made it incumbent on him to leave the field clear for the Muslim League to come to some arrangement with the other parties. On the 3rd of March the Punjab Assembly met only to be postponed on the first day of its Budget Session, and HE the Governor invited the leader of the Muslim League party to form a Government. On the 4th of March, disorder commenced and the Premier and his colleagues, in acknowledgement that a situation had arisen which was beyond their powers of control, signified their inability to act longer as a caretaker Government and their desire that their resignations should have immediate effect. On the 5th March, in the presence of the Muslim League’s failure to form a Government, a proclamation was issued under Section 93 of the Government of India Act of 1935 transferring responsibility to the Governor. Since then events which have followed thick and fast have been in the characters of communal conflagrations. On one hand, there has been vigorous Governmental action to control the situation, which has been increasingly effective, and has thrown into bold relief the political bankruptcy, communal prejudices and general lack of sanity displayed on the other.

The serious disorder in the Province started in Lahore during the forenoon of 4th of March, when the Police were attacked by Hindu and Sikh students outside the district courts, and the first Police casualties occurred. In the first fury of mass wrath animosity was directed mainly against the Police, but this phase did not last long. On the afternoon of the same day, and inevitably, communal rioting broke out accompanied by cases of stabbing and arson.
By the 6th of March both Amritsar and Multan were gravely affected and much damage had been caused to life and property. Since that date, with the news of grave events radiating from Lahore, there has been blood shed and burning in many districts and rural areas have paid the price levied by... fury as well as towns. Many of the gravest incidents have taken place in the districts which from the Rawalpindi Division where Muslims are in the majority. In the Rawalpindi and Attock districts in particular there is every reason to think that casualties have been heavy. Up to the 5th March the known victims of internecine strife numbered 136 killed and 1,110 injured. The figures in both categories are most certain to be much greater, there has been more accurate counting after the madness was passed.

None of the political parties of the major communities can escape blame for what has happened. The General Election of 1946 was fought in an atmosphere of extreme communal bitterness and all communities made the most of communal disturbances in other parts of India later in the year. The Muslim League....impressed others with the potency of direct action... brought communal feelings to the boiling point... weakened respect for authority. The Sikh and Hindu leaders... escape censure for they were themselves responsible for their inflammatory speeches, and the Hindu leaders for their uncealed abetment of everything the Sikhs did and said. His Majesty’s Government’s statement supplied a spur where one was not required, and the Coalition Government’s resignation, interpreted as a move to give the Muslims an immediate advantage, added frenzy to a situation already big with danger. In circumstances such as these it would have been remarkable if peace and good reason had prevailed. The immediate cause of the trouble in Lahore can be traced to a huge Hindu and Sikh public meeting which was held on the night of the 3rd of March, at which there was dangerous and truculent talk, and to statements by the Sikh leaders that they were determined to fight Pakistan, and would oppose the formation of a Muslim League Government at all costs. The harsh attitude thus displayed has been maintained and such overtures as there have been from the League have been rejected, including one which offered the Sikhs five seats in a Cabinet of eleven.
Inter community political negotiation has virtually been broken off and there is no doubt that Sikh and Hindu favour is now strongly in support of a division of the Punjab. The Congress resolution which has advocated this as a solution has the backing of most of the members of these two communities and particularly of those to whom partition would grant the right to govern the area they now inhabit. Sikhs and Hindus in places where Muslims predominate have much less enthusiasm for such a plan but any outcry against it has not yet developed.
H.E. the Governor has visited the areas which had suffered most and has done what he could to encourage hard-pressed officials in their difficult task and to help public man to a sense of their responsibility. The Police and the Army, from whom the greatest possible measure of willing help has been received, are active constantly in the worst area. As a result of their endeavors control is being increasingly established. However, it is control exercised by force. It has brought about little change in the peoples’ mentality and has left communal tension radically unchanged. Because of this, and in the absence of any agreement between the leaders of the three committees, the future remains charged with gravity. The prospect is not improved by the brutality of some of the acts committed by the majority community in the areas most affected. When details of these acts become known, as inevitably they will, the danger of retaliation will arise in a degree fraught with much danger.

The All India Congress Working Committee’s resolution suggesting partition as ours for the Punjab’s disease has not had a favourable reception from the Nationalist Muslim organizations. They think that if minorities in Punjab are to be protected by this device, Muslim minorities in other provinces should be shown the same favour. As a result, both the Khaksars and the Ahrars have drawn closer to the League although important differences of opinion still/continue to divide them. The Communists are divided in their views on the same issue. One of the groups which goes to form the party in the province has condemned the resolution out of hand while the other has found merit in the proposal, provided separation is on a linguistic and cultural and not on a religious one. How they think that such a division could be affected they do not trouble to explain. Other parties have not had a great deal to say on the subject yet, but it can be accepted that their ideas are dominated by communal rather than political or national considerations.

2. LABOUR: In some places Canal and Revenue patwaries have continued their strike but so far their action has not resulted in much dislocation of Governmental work. The other Government servants who were threatening to strike, the ministerial staffs of Civil Departments, decided temporarily not to do so in view of the disturbed situation in the Province. In railway labour circles unrest continued and there were some short lived strikes at Rohri and other places. The most important matter, however, affecting railway was the decision taken to discharge the Communist leader, Mirza Muhammad Ibrahim, and some of his satellites, including Jagdish Chandra, the General Secretary of the Communist Union from railway employment. This action was taken on the 15th of March and despite it being known beforehand what was afoot the day passed without incident in the workshops where Mirza Ibrahim was employed. The probability that railway labour will demonstrate its protest against the action taken exists, but as stated in an earlier report the Communists find the present tense communal situation far from their liking for they fear that communalism may divide their labour following. In the circumstances there is reason for hope that if a demonstration is staged it will be less serious than would have been the case of the general situation had been normal.

3. ECONOMIC: The fortnight’s communal disturbances had repercussions on the food situation in the Province. Damage to stocks of foodgrains was reported from the Amritsar, Multan, Rawalpindi, Lahore, Jhelum and Attock districts, but this was confined mostly to retail depots and the total loss though by no means shall, was fortunately not very serious. Full details of losses to foodgrains are not yet available. Arrangements had to be made for the emergency supply of rations both in the rationed towns, where normal distribution and transport arrangements had to be completely dislocated, by opening emergency depots and arranging an immediate supply of atta from the Mills. Similar arrangements had to be extended to non-rationed areas, where damage to property and similar things was serious and to the refugee camps opened in the Rawalpindi and Jhelum districts.

36. Attitude of Ghazanfar Ali Khan towards the Communal Situation

Telegram from Evan Jenkins to Wavell, 20 March 1947

Immediate
Confidential
No. 64-G

Addressed Viceroy, repeated Secretary of State. Punjab situation. My immediately preceding telegram. Congress Hindus appear to be working up for an agitation against British element in the Punjab administration but signs are as yet not very definite. Ghazanfar Ali saw me this afternoon. He was complacent about rural massacre and suggested (a) a general election and (b) the formation of a purely Muslim League Government. I replied that no responsible person could possibly consider (a) and that after what had happened neither I nor any other British officer in the Punjab would have anything to do with (b) in the immediate future. I thought it best to make these points clear since folly and complacency of Muslim League leaders here are almost beyond belief. Khizar called shortly after Ghazanfar Ali and said that in his opinion general elections would be madness. It could only further inflame communal feeling and would not alter basic position in any way. He believed that establishment of purely Muslim League Government would lead immediately to bloodshed on a far larger scale than hitherto. He thought no stable Government possible in the Punjab now unless there were agreement at the Centre. Khizar reported his own district quiet. Muslim mobs had been assembled there by circulation of chits announcing falsely arrival of large Sikh Jathas. He had seen one of these chits but their authorship is unknown.

37. Atrocities Committed against Hindus and Sikhs

Letter from Vallabhbhai Patel to Wavell, 22 March 1947

New Delhi

Dear Lord Wavell,

I am sorry to trouble you on the eve of your departure with the enclosed copy of a telegram which the Managing Editor of the Hindustan Times has received from the President of the Singh Sabha, Gujarkhan, in Rawalpindi district, and the former’s letter to the Secretary to HE the Governor of the Punjab. But I thought that the description given there would be of interest to you. It may be an exaggerated picture, but it could not be wholly untrue.

2. You will notice that the Hindustan Times did not publish the telegram.

Yours sincerely,

38. A Note on the Communal Outbreak in Punjab
Letter from Claude Auchinleck to G.E.B. Abell Enclosing a Report by Gen. Messervy,
22 March 1947.
Mountbatten Papers, File No. 111, NMML.

Top Secret & Personal.
D/O No. 80/P-1/47

My dear Abell,

I enclose an account by General Messervy, GOC-in-C Northern Command, giving his personal opinions on the recent communal outbreak in the Punjab.

I think HE may like to see this.

I invite particular attention to the remarks in para. 5, in view of the allegations which are certain to be made by interested parties. I would like to add that I am in entire agreement with the opinion expressed by General Messervy in para. 9 of the note. Unless effective action is taken by the leaders to compose their differences and restore mutual confidence between the two main communities in the Punjab, I fear that the large part of the Army which is drawn from the Punjab may become infected with communalism. This is a contingency which no one can contemplate with equanimity at this juncture.

I shall be obliged if you will return the note to me when the Viceroy has read it.

Yours sincerely

Auchinleck

G.E.B. Abell, Esq, CIE, OBE,
Private Secretary to HE the Viceroy,
Viceroy’s House.

SOME REMARKS ON THE DISTURBANCES IN THE NORTHERN PUNJAB

1. Causes
The first cause was politico-religious. The Muslim League, though a political party, has been framing its main propaganda on religious lines for some time. This has undoubtedly had a great effect on all Muslims in the Punjab, Pakistan and Islam together provide an almost irresistible force on the minds of the mass of comparatively uneducated Muslims. Then the intensive Muslim League campaign succeeded in forcing the resignation of the Unionist Punjab Government and was followed by militant anti-Pakistan statements by Master Tara Singh and other Sikh leaders, Muslim feelings were roused to a pitch of fanaticism. It only needed a spark to set alight the raging fires of religious passion. This was provided by anti-Pakistan meetings and processions in such places as Lahore, Amritsar, Multan and Rawalpindi. In Multan the Hindu–Sikh processionists were even so madly unwise as to raise the cry of ‘Qaid-i-Azam Murdabad’. In the predominantly Muslim areas of Rawalpindi and Multan Divisions the fires spread rapidly to the rural areas.

There have been also two minor causes. The first is the economic element. Scarcity of cloth and some items of food, such as sugar, has undoubtedly been taken advantage of by the Hindu–Sikh bania community to profiteer and indulge in black market operations. The Govt controls were also mostly in the hands of Sikhs or Hindu agents and clerks. The Muslim peasant and labourer was only too ready to get some of his own back when he got the chance. The second is the ‘goonda’ element in every community which is always ready to take full advantage of such disturbances to practice arson, loot and dacoity.

2. The course of the disturbances
In the cities events followed the usual course, well known to us for many years, but attacks were fiercer, more sudden, and more savage than ever. In the rural areas attacks were launched by large mobs of Muslim peasants who banded together from several hamlets and villages to destroy and loot Sikh and Hindu shops and houses in their area. In some areas arson and loot were the main objects, and casualties inflicted on the Hindu–Sikh community were not great. In others savagery was carried to an extreme degree and men, women and children were hacked or beaten to death, if not burned in their houses. There were also quite a number of cases of forcible conversion of males and abduction of females. Having served for 34 years, mostly in the Punjab and with Punjab troops I would never have believed that agitation could have aroused the normally chivalrous and decent PM peasant to such frenzied savagery as was widely prevalent. Much of this savagery was undoubtedly deliberately intensified by the wildest rumours, the commonest of which was an impending attack by a large Sikh Army. It is interesting that on no occasion as far as is known has a second major attack been made on any village or area in a village. The passion of the mob burns itself out and the survivors are generally left unmolested. There has also been a widespread desire to rid many areas of all Sikhs and Hindus, entirely for ever. Some former sites of houses have even already been ploughed up.

3. Police
Considering that they are about 90 per cent Muslim, I think that the police on the whole have done well. The Hindu–Sikh community, however, who have suffered will not accept this view except in a few exceptional cases. Their almost unanimous indictment is that the Police took no steps to defend or save them and they accuse them in many cases of having even directed and participated in the attacks. When Pandit Nehru drove out of the Refugee Camp after his visit the cry which went up from the multitude was ‘Punjab Police Murdabad’. I had never heard this before. I fear that the police in the rural areas have shown partiality, but not to the extent of which they are accused by the refugees.

4. Junior Officials
Junior Officials are accused vehemently of the same partiality as the rural police, though there are some pleasing exceptions. Obviously they were powerless in most cases, and in others were probably affected by the surge of fanaticism around them.

5. Army
The Army has been steady and disciplined throughout. The rough proportion of troops employed is about 2/3 Hindu–Sikh and 1/3 Muslim. There have been a few cases reported of Muslim troops not acting with the energy and alacrity with which they should have done, and of Hindu–Sikh troops taking action against others than mobs or looters. Two special cases are under enquiry. The first is one of a Muslim officer with two platoons of 17 Rajput who is alleged to have withdrawn in front of a large mob at JHAND (CAMPBELLPORE district) without taking action; the second is of alleged terrorization by some Hindu–Sikh troops of 1/2 Punjab under a Sikh officer, in villages near Rawalpindi. If either of these stories can be proved to be true the officers concerned will of course be court martialed. I mention these cases with no intent to belittle in any way the magnificent behavior of the troops, but to show that such happenings are possible and in my opinion will increase as the entirely impartial influence of the British officer becomes less.

6. Pensioners and ex-Soldiers
The Districts affected are as heavily recruited as any in India. There is little doubt, I fear, that ex-soldiers and pensioners, some of the latter even including VCOs and Hon Commissioned officers, have been heavily involved in many areas. In others they did well and helped to save many of the minority communities. The forfeiture of pensions and grants of land in the bad cases should be as excellent deterrent.

7. Martial law
I have several times considered advising the imposition of Martial Law in Rawalpindi Division, and about the 10th March this was fully discussed between Major-Gen KEY and the Commissioner, DC and DIG Police. Maj-Gen KEY advised me that Martial Law was not required as the Army already had all the powers of action necessary, and the necessary restriction on the civil population could be imposed under the Punjab Ordinances. It was better to carry on action in support of the Civil authorities and Police than for the Army to take over control and be supported by the Civil authorities and Police. In effect the action taken would be the same either way. If the Army took over control the rural police and junior civil officers would be apt to throw in their hands even more than they had already done, thinking that the responsibility had now been shifted. I agreed with this view.

Pandit Nehru and Sardar Baldev Singh obviously favoured Marital Law. Their main argument was the psychological factor which would undoubtedly have an effect both in the area of the disturbances and outside. There is a good deal in this argument but not enough, in my opinion, to have made the declaration of Martial Law advisable. There was another aspect which deterred me. This was primarily a political struggle. It was essential for the Army to take every possible step to restore law and order and to prevent arson, loot and murder. This it could do in support of the civil and police. But to declare Martial Law might only in the end make things worse, as it might appear, and be used as political propaganda, that Martial Law had been imposed and the Army used as an anti-Pakistan instrument.

The extra powers which have been imposed by the Punjab Government, or asked for by legislation at the Centre, are necessary in disturbances such as we have experienced to strengthen the hands of both the Civil and Military authorities. These are:

8. Refugees in the Rawalpindi Division Refugees in the Rawalpindi Division are likely to amount to some 40,000 homeless and largely destitute persons. This is a big problem. We are planning eventually to form camps to take the whole number at WAH and KALA (near JHELUM). Other refugees, who may amount to about an equal number will either be persuaded to return to their homes or be absorbed in other Sikh–Hindu communities in towns or large villages. Some 4,000 have already been absorbed in RAWALPINDI city.

9. Prevention of outbreaks in other Districts of the PUNJAB
I have concentrated all available troops in the Punjab. Flag marches and patrols are being carried out widely wherever tension is greatest. But it must be clearly understood that such preventive action is only a palliative. We are dealing with the symptoms of disease, and cannot eradicate the disease by military action. The disease comes from the political leaders of all parties. The only complete cure is for them to come to some agreement. An agreement now between the Sikh and Muslim leaders would result in immediate peace in the Punjab. Failing this unlikely contingency the avoidance of provocative statements and the impressing on their followers of the necessity of avoiding bloodshed and protecting minorities is the only hope.

39. ‘Terrible Happenings in Punjab—League Coercing Minorities, Says J.P.’

Extract from a Report from The Tribune, 22 March 1947

Lahore, 21 March.—‘I find it hard to express my feelings at the terrible happenings in the Punjab. The tales of suffering and brutality that I have heard and the scenes of havoc and devastation that I have witnessed have overwhelmed me with horror and disgust. That men could be capable of such cruelty and bestiality I could not have found possible to believe but for the compelling evidence of facts,’ says Mr Jaya Prakash Narayan in a statement issued by him regarding the Punjab disturbances.

All communities have suffered, the minorities in the Western districts of the Province being the worst sufferers and men of all communities have vied with one another in the race of communal fury. Yet, in this desert of inhumanity and barbarity there are cases too of humanity and brotherhood, and here too all communities have vied for the pride of place. It is these rare instances of fellowship and mutual help that point to a ray of hope in the prevailing darkness.

The development of recent events in the Punjab clearly indicate that the present disturbances were carefully planned and are part of a conspiracy to install the Muslim League in office as a step towards the final installation of Pakistan.

The events of the Punjab have once again brought home to me that if there is to be peaceful settlement of the Indian question, the British must quit here and now. Whatever be the attitude of the British Government, it is clear that the tin gods of the British bureaucracy find it hard to shed their imperialism. The longer these people remain the more mischief will they do.

Coming to ourselves in the Punjab, it seems we have not yet realized that we are faced now with realities and must settle our affairs among ourselves instead of running every time to the third party. The Congress has already invited the Muslim League to a discussion. The Muslim League, if it wants a peaceful settlement, must respond.

The question that underlies Punjab disturbances is whether the League wants to follow the path of negotiation and settlement or the path of intimidation and violence. Recent League propaganda in the Punjab shows that the League is determined to use force in order to secure its aims. If that is so there can be no settlement short of a civil war. The League must face this question squarely now and say if it is civil war it is preparing for. If it is not it must change the tenor of its propaganda and sit down around a table determined to find a solution. If after discussion no peaceful solution is found and if India has to be divided and divided peacefully the dividing must be based on the concept of the people concerned, that is, on the basic principle of self-determination—every territory being free to choose the political centre with which it should affiliate. This would inevitably mean the division of the Punjab and Bengal. If the League does not agree to this it can mean nothing else except that it wants to coerce the territories against their will to accept Pakistan. This cannot lead to anything but civil war. That is the clear issue and it is for the League to make up its mind.

In conclusion, I should like to say that there is danger at this moment that even sensible people in the Punjab should lose their head and that nationalism may be submerged by communalism. Already dangerous steps have been taken and unless the opposition to Pakistan is freed from communal feelings and interests and the Provincial Congress disassociates itself with them, there may be a political set back that will have reduced the work of half a century to naught. On the socialists of the Province particularly lies a heavy burden and isolated though they may find themselves and threatened on all sides by the seas of communalism, they must stand firm and keep flag of freedom flying....

40. Directions for Observance of ‘Punjab Day’
Letter from Ashutosh Lahiry, 22 March 1947
AIHM Papers, File No. C-150, NMML.

Dear Sir,

You are aware that the Working Committee of the All India Hindu Mahasabha has decided that the 30th March 1947, shall be observed as the All India Punjab Day throughout India. The full story of the ghastly tragedy that has been and is still being enacted in the Punjab and the North Western Frontier Province has not yet been revealed to the Public. It is obvious that not one but several ‘Noakhalis’ have taken place in the overwhelming Muslim majority areas of the North Western Districts of India. Loot, arson, rape, massacre and forcible conversions have taken place on an unprecedented scale and the fate of thousands of Hindus men, women, children are yet unknown.

In this tragic crisis, it is our imperative duty to do all that is possible to be done, to give succor and relief to the oppressed Hindus and Sikhs. You are requested to observe the day by holding meetings taking out processions and organizing such other demonstrations as local condition may permit. You shall also collect funds from the public and send all such collections either to Dr Gokul Chand Narang, Treasurer Punjab Relief Fund, Montgomery Road, Lahore, or to the undersigned at New Delhi.

Yours Faithfully,
Ashutosh Lahiry
General Secretary

41. Political Parties Responsible for Communal Flare Up Letter from Shareef Mateen to M.A. Jinnah, 22 March 1947

AMRITSAR

Dear Sir,

As it was feared, scores of cities and towns in the Punjab are in the grip of serious communal riots. Many innocent people have been done to death, while property worth crores of rupees has been destroyed.

The riots were very severe in Amritsar—in the commercial and political centre of the province. A large part of the city has been razed to the ground. The different communities have lost faith in each other. Life has become a constant worry.

The public is tired of such a way of life, but there seems to be no way out. On the other hand, the unsocial elements are getting on the top and misleading the people. They may try their hand at another flare-up.

It is not possible to narrate the tale full of woes in these few lines, nor is it our desire to do so. But we must draw your attention to the fact that the present riots are not the result of some local trouble, nor are they due to another mosque or temple incident. It is the game of power-politics, as indulged in by the political parties in India, that is primarily responsible for the present flare-up. Till this is stopped there can be no real peace and the Peace Committees and others will function only on paper. The Congress-League agreement is the only safeguard against riots. It has become imperative for us to work for a peaceful future rather than shed tears over what has happened.

In my opinion, only a United Ministry can ensure peace and safety in the Punjab and can become the sound foundation for peace and unity in India. If the major political parties in India write [sic] on some such basis, they will have the whole-hearted support of the working class.

Pinning our faith to your great popularity and sagacity, we earnestly hope that you will leave no stone unturned to turn the tide in the country, thus saving it from the clutches of communal frenzy.

Yours faithfully,
SHAREEF MATEEN
President, District Trade Union Committee

1. Call for Halting Communal Warfare

   Extract from G.B. Pant's Speech at a Public Meeting in Hapur, 6 January 1947

Addressing the meeting Pandit Pant said that he welcomed the criticisms of the policy of the Government. They did not disturb him. He revealed that leaflets protesting against his policy towards the Meerut riots were distributed at the AICC session at Delhi.

Pandit Pant deplored the outburst of communal frenzy which caused anguish and shame to all right-thinking men. He stressed the need of the utmost restraint on the part of every person. He said that Hindus and Muslims were descendants of common ancestors and, judged from any criteria, there was a community of race and descent running through them making them one nation. He made an impassioned appeal to both the communities to call a halt to fratricidal warfare.

Pandit Pant said that he was greatly moved by the reports of the Hapur riot. Hapur, one of the most important trade centres in India, suffered very heavy loss by the paralysis of its entire business for full 18 days.

Concluding, the Premier said that there could be no talk of freedom and progress in the absence of real amity and goodwill. The crying needs of social rehabilitation and economic reconstruction, which were the real objectives of any popular government, could not be fulfilled if all their efforts were consumed in maintaining law and order.
2. Riots in Allahabad

Extracts from G.B. Pant’s Speech in the UP Legislative Assembly, 16 January 1947

...The heart of Allahabad is lacerated. The great and old town, its inhabitants, its history and its traditions have all been victims of a series of attacks inflicted by hooligans from time to time during the last 7 or 8 months. It is a matter of distress, anguish and agony to me that a city like that of Allahabad, which is the intellectual and cultural centre of our province, should have witnessed such ghastly tragedies and painful scenes. It is not for me to go into the origin of the trouble or to say how the start was made, or how the ball went on gathering momentum.... It is easy to blame the authorities in charge of law and order but does it really befit the self-respect of the citizens of Allahabad that they should have failed to maintain peace in their own city? After all, we are looking forward to the dawn of self-government and independence in our country and we will have to manage the affairs of over 7 lakhs of villages and thousands of towns and cities. Ultimately peace of the country as of every part of it will depend on the people of the land themselves. Citizens go on abusing those who have tried their best to save us against ourselves, to look after us while we were lost in a fit of frenzy and did not realize our own weak points, our own deficiencies and our own, if I may say so, foul tendencies. I think it is time we realized that we are expected to play a part in the defence of peace in our respective cities ourselves....in the circumstances I deplore what has been said against the authorities of Allahabad.

...So if we are determined to fight how is the poor Sub-Inspector to prevent us? If those who pretend to be enlightened and imbued with a high sense of responsibility make it impossible for him to maintain peace, it is no use blaming him for his failure to achieve what you must realize is your responsibility....

Now, Sir, coming to the events of the particular day with which we are concerned here, I should like honourable members to take into account what actually happened. A procession, I am told, of about 1000 Sikhs had started, and soon after it had started, trouble too started. There was first some sort of a quarrel between a boy—a Muslim boy—and a constable. This, I am told, was followed by an assault on a Sikh and later by a shower and rain of brickbats from roofs on the procession itself. Well, all this necessarily caused a great commotion there and this was followed by a certain amount of arson and people began to rush from the lanes and by-lanes. Imagine the situation that there are one thousand persons who are armed and equipped with swords. It is not our responsibility. It was said that this Government is responsible. They had got these swords not in our time, but many decades before that when we were the victims of a hostile system of administration here and had no hand or share in the management of the affairs of the province. If they had the swords the responsibility was not ours. It is what has been allowed to them by the Arms Act....Things of this sort have a great reflection. So very reckless could be the attitude of those who can have recourse to such methods even against a procession of this type! I am told that there were two Magistrates in it...with a section of the military police and a section of the Special Armed Constabulary at the tail of the procession, and one section of the military police, one section of the SAC, two GOC’s, 3 inspectors, 8 under officers and 35 constables accompanied the procession. Then there were sentries posted on the roofs of the houses bordering on the road through which the procession did pass... If a procession like that, for the safe movement of which or the speedy progress of which such enormous precautions had been taken, can be attacked in this way how can any authority maintain peace? This I would request honourable members to consider....Some shops were burnt and there were firings in that connection too. Then people rushed in from galis. The whole affair did not take more than 10 or 12 minutes and by the time the police could move from the tail end to the head the whole thing had almost taken its course. So, how can the police help a situation like that?...

Sir, I think it is time we learnt a lesson from all that has happened. We are told about the imposition of curfew. I ask the educated gentry and other responsible persons whether really they do not feel the pangs which one should feel when they think of the suffering that is being caused to the poor, to the starving people, by their recklessness? If they are unable to get food for hours, if they are unable to get water, who is responsible for it?...

3. UP Maintenance of Public Order Bill, 1947

Extracts from G.B. Pant's Speech in the UP Legislative Assembly, 13-18 January 1947

Mr Deputy Speaker, Sir, I would urge the House to consider the Bill rather than the amendment moved to it and come to some concrete conclusion. The debate seems to be going on in a different direction. The last speaker, Maulvi Aziz Ahmad Khan, dealt with matters entirely unrelated to the Bill. What he said was that certain incidents had taken place in the province which had pained him, and that the Government had failed in taking preventive measures. I am really sorry for this lapse on the part of the Government and admit that there should be capability in us to check such riots. So long as we do not acquire that capability and people continue to suffer, it will remain a matter of regret for us. When precious lives are lost, no amount of grieving or consolation can be adequate. Such incidents cause us the acutest pain. If someone thinks that we are not affected by such incidents, he is devoid of all humanity and it is meaningless to say anything to him. If we have not been able to maintain complete communal peace in the province, one of the reasons for it is the kind of speeches that are delivered here. Such speeches are not conducive to creating a harmonious atmosphere which is our aim....

...Aziz Ahmad Khan Saheb has said so many things in his speech but not cited even a single instance of the authorities having misused powers. He emphatically said that riots took place at so many places. We do not deny that. It is also true that at several places Government servants were assaulted, which was only to be expected.... He has accused the Government of being a Hindu Government. But he must concede that this Hindu Government, in spite of great provocations, has not committed any excesses against the Muslims....the law has been used to control riots. As you may be aware, dozens of persons have been arrested and are still in jail. Arrests have been made in Agra, Kanpur, Varanasi and wherever a breach of peace was apprehended.... Because of these unsocial elements being behind the bars no riots are taking place now. Hence responsible persons should not give credence to garbled reports containing half-truths and half-lies.

The issue before the House has nothing to do with the Congress or Muslim League. The question is of maintaining peace in the province without which both the parties will be finished off. Hence this question should not be seen from a political standpoint. We are all Indians. It makes no difference whether we are Hindus or Muslims or Christians. The main question is whether we all realize that it is our duty to create such an atmosphere in the province that every person can enjoy freedom. Unless such an atmosphere is created freedom has no meaning. Freedom does not mean licence to murder innocent people. I want you to consider the whole matter in the light of our duty in the present circumstances.

Some people say that if we adopt this Bill, it will bring a bad name to the Congress. Others say if the Muslim League does not oppose the Bill it will be weakened. But in my view both the parties will gain by adopting a right path, and we all must do whatever is right while strictly adhering to our principles.... Unless basic human values are recognized there can be no healthy politics. Hence let us concentrate on basic human values. As far as the Congress is concerned, even if it loses its popularity it will continue to work for the security of life and property of every Hindu and Muslim. It is the duty of the majority community to provide protection to a minority community. Hence it is our duty to look after the Muslims. Irrespective of political freedom, maintenance of peace is essential for the progress of society. Even after attaining political freedom, which is now imminent and nobody can stop it, if we want real freedom we should create an atmosphere of communal harmony and improve the lot of the poor. Mutual goodwill is indispensable for progress. Hence I request you not to treat this question as a political question. It has nothing to do with politics....

The objective of the Bill is to arrest persons guilty of indulging in activities likely to disturb peace, to foster amicable relations among the people, and to create conditions in which mutual relationship of different communities is not strained and people do not cut each other’s throats....

...before giving a speech one should think what effect his words will have on his audience. It is not at all proper that leaders like Maulana Azad and Jawaharlal Nehru should be blamed for giving less rations to a particular class of labourers. Suppose I go around saying that Jinnah Saheb wants that the Hindus of Bengal should starve. What effect will it have on the people? People will believe that the Bengal Government is acting under the influence of Jinnah Saheb. You are free to criticize our policies, but you should not say things likely to lead to a breach of peace. Hence an order was issued for the arrest of Visaluddin Saheb. After that, Lari Saheb came to me and said that he was present at the meeting addressed by Visaluddin Saheb, and that he had not said the things attributed to him. Visaluddin Saheb also sent me a letter protesting against his arrest and claiming that he had always been working for Hindu-Muslim unity. So I ordered his release. Is this incident not a testimony to this that we want people to behave correctly and adopt a right path, and that nobody should be harassed unnecessarily?

You have every right to criticize the Congress. But I request you to judge this Bill solely from this viewpoint whether the conditions prevailing in the province call for such a legislation or not. We have to establish peace in the province....

You have also the right to demand the creation of Pakistan. But you should not make this demand on the ground that Hindus and Muslims are two separate nationalities. We have always lived together in villages and cities. If you say we are separate nationalities, what will be its result? I want to submit that we are all descendents of common ancestors. We have been living as neighbours for centuries and we could never wipe out each other. Hindus and Muslims have always been loyal to each other and have always relied on each other, if Pakistan is created it should be done in a manner in which two real brothers become separate without letting their mutual loyalty to each other be affected....

I did not want to talk of principles but I must say that it is not proper for any member to utter, while commenting on the Bill, things likely to arouse communal passion.... Doing so does not help anybody. It is no use referring to the happenings of Garhmukteshwar and other places again and again....We are ashamed of those incidents. But must you go on rubbing it in? It does not do good to anyone and particularly to the Muslims....What we want is that Muslims should become strong and make progress....It is not at all proper to say that laws are made by us in order to weaken the Muslims. Regarding the proposed legislation, it has been said that a civilized Government should not enact such a law. I want to tell you that in Bengal there are such laws and ordinances that people can be kept in prisons for months and years. There, it is a Muslim League Government. But no Muslim leader has ever raised a voice against those laws. Had the Muslim League been earnest about its beliefs, it should have pressed for a judicial inquiry into the matter. The powers we are seeking through this Bill are much less—ten times, a hundred times, a thousand times less— than those enjoyed by the Bengal Government. But no one raised his voice against the Bengal Government. Rather our Bill is being criticized and it is being said that it is aimed against the Muslims....Maybe in certain cases officials might have committed mistakes and exercised powers indiscreetly, and there may be legitimate grounds for complaints. But my contention is that there is no use going on dwelling on such matters ceaselessly. Instead of repeating the refrain that this is a Hindu Government which is bound to create communal bitterness, you should deal with specific cases....

As I told you, in Bengal the president of a District Muslim League has been sentenced to death because of his involvement in communal disturbances. In Karachi, 30 Muslim youths have been arrested for a most reprehensible act. In India, if we take action against some members of the Muslim League even on most legitimate grounds, you attribute it to our bias against the League. It is a very strange situation. It means whatever is done by members of the Muslim League, it should be beyond the purview of law. But the fact is that sometimes it becomes necessary to take action against them. Then, please tell me what the solution is? It can not be provided in the Bill that it will not be applicable to members of the Muslim League. Of course, if they do not contravene any of the provisions of the Bill, well and good. But if they do contravene, then being in the Government what is our duty?...We have to do everything to discharge our responsibilities well. Whoever indulges in undesirable activities, whether he is a Hindu or Muslim, whether he is connected with the Congress or Muslim League, if he is not restrained, peace may be affected. And the Government is duty-bound not to allow such things to happen.

I may tell you that at present communal passions are being aroused in certain parts of the country and when a man is driven mad by passion, he has to be tied with a rope lest he should kill himself or others. Sometimes one may have to bind one's own brother or relative or near and dear one however much may dislike to do so. Throughout the country we have to save people from communal violence.

...Anxious as I am to see that the law and order situation improves as soon as possible, I would be most pleased if in three months' time I could come before you and say that as the condition in the province had improved this legislation could be repealed. I do not want this law to be on the statute-book permanently. Had there been no extraordinary situation in the province we would not have tried to assume any special powers. Whatever our political views we have to live together, and I see no reason why we cannot have a common approach to problems relating to the law and order in the province. I have been told that several Congress members share the views of the opposition in regard to this matter. Maybe it is true. But at the same time it is also likely that some members of the opposition agree with the viewpoint of the Government, but, because of the party whip, refrain from expressing their opinion freely....

When the situation improves we can all jointly repeal it, and then there will be no occasion for the opposition to scold the Government....It is our misfortune that today the political parties are so organized that, whatever the issue, they invariably adopt a communal attitude rather than political....When a Bill to curb communal riots is moved, it is opposed not on political grounds but on the plea that it is meant to harass members of a particular community. Such a tendency must be discouraged in spite of the fact that the opposition has the full right to oppose any Bill. I would request the members of the opposition to keep in mind that, while criticizing a Bill, nothing should be said which could aggravate the communal situation.

I have tried to accommodate as many amendments as possible....It has been said that the Bill does not offer complete solution of the problem. But no Bill can be perfect.... No law can be successful in this task unless we ourselves are determined to accomplish it. I assure you that we will spare no efforts to establish peace and communal harmony so that the province can make progress and the conditions of the poor can be alleviated by eradicating unemployment, illiteracy and poverty prevalent among them.

4. Hapur Riots

Report by Algu Rai, 19 January 1947
AICC Papers, File No. CL-10/ 1946–47, NMML (Translated from Hindi).

A description of the enquiry into the Communal Riots in Hapur, District Meerut (UP)

Background of the Hapur Troubles

The riot which took place on 6th November 1946 in Garhmukteshwar on the occasion of the Kartik Mela and before the Congress session at Meerut and a consequence of which the Muslims of Garhmukteshwar suffered heavy loss of life and property, continued for many days....

The news of the Garhmukteshwar riot reached Hapur—as a result the Muslims were resentful and unhappy. The Hindus could sense this. Tension increased on all sides—aggressive and defensive efforts were made on both sides....

A brief account of events from 13/12/46 to 19/12/1946

...a meeting of the Congress committee was going on when shouts were heard that there has been an attack, knives have been drawn, etc. People panicked. Lala Saray Prasad ji wanted to quieten the crowd, but their enthusiasm was out of control—there was a big crowd on the road—Lala Saray Prasad Ji went to the spot himself and asked Parmanand ji, Secretary, Town Congress Committee, to stop the crowd. Shri Parmanand ji reasoned with the crowd but it continued to advance—it was determined to proceed to the spot where Kailash had been stabbed. Parmanand ji continued to reason with the crowd—and eventually it agreed after going some distance, to not proceed further. A Hindu bank employee argued with Parmanand ji that ‘why don’t you Congress walas stop people in Noakhali, why do you stop people here, and other things.’...

5. ‘Hapur Riot’

Report by Phool Singh, Secretary, United Provinces Provincial Congress Committee,
23 January 1947
AICC Papers, File No. CL-10/1947, NMML.

Garhmukteswar riot took place on 6th and 7th November 1946 in which many muslims were killed and their property looted. On the 9th November, 1946, the muslims of Shahjahan Pur and Dasna attacked the Garhmukteswar pilgrims on their way home. The Hindus in their turn retaliated by killing muslims of Harsaon and Indergarhi on the 10th of the same month. The following table shows the places in Meerut District where riots broke out along with the dates, the number of killed or wounded (whether Hindus or Muslims) the number of arrested and released on bail. The table B shows stray cases in Meerut District.

Hapur town is not very off from Garhmukteswar and is on the way to Delhi and the Punjab. The feelings in both the communities ran high and each began to take defensive and offensive measures. The sober minded people of course organized a peace committee as well which held sittings on 11th and 13th December, 1946. The last mentioned meeting was held at the house of Gulzar Ahmad proprietor Bone Mills. At this meeting one Ghaffar an irresponsible and mischievous muslim said that the big people cannot maintain peace unless men like him want it. The Sub-Inspector of Police and Tehsildar were also there. Even before 11th December certain events had happened which necessitated the calling of the meeting on that day. These events were:

1. One Suffi’s brother was suspected to have brought two (Hindu) women from Calcutta as he pawned a gold Hansli which the Bangalees generally wear. The ladies were suspected to be in one of his houses but the Police Station Officer intentionally delayed matters and he is suspected to have connived at their removal to another place.
2. Between 9th and 11th one Pyare Lal was beaten at Bindis place—a muslim Halwai shop. A report was lodged with the Police. The President Town Congress also wrote to the Police but no action was taken.
3. The wife of Manu was also beaten the same day but no report was made.
4. A chamar girl was molested by Rahmat butcher. A report was lodged but the S.O. rebuked the father of the girl instead.
5. On 12th December, 1946, Manoher Lal Lohia Kabari’s shop was set on fire.
6. On 13th December, 1946 some goondas wanted to molest Damodar Dass’ daughter.
7. The same night at 7-45 p.m. Kailash a student got knife wounds in his hands and a lathi blow on his head.
8. In the meanwhile the bonds for keeping the peace executed by leading citizens in Hapur just after the Garhmukteswar riot were allowed to lapse and no fresh bonds were taken.
9. The news of Kailash being stabbed spread like wild fire and Hindus collected in large numbers and proceeded on Bulandshahr road. The Congress Committee people who were holding a meeting at that time tried their best to maintain peace. A few muslims were beaten on the Bulandshahr road. The Kishan Ganj is a Hindu Mohalla with 4 or 5 muslim houses. The muslims were safely evacuated. The Congress people also informed the District Magistrate on the phone about the gravity of the situation.
10. On the 14th at 8 a.m. the muslims attacked a few villagers who were bringing their carts into the city. Similarly Hindus attacked 2 muslims. But the former incident was not reported in the Thana while the later was. The police reported that the Hindus started the riot while Mr Algu Rai Shastri’s report is to the contrary.

There was a free fight. The Bone Mill bugle was sounded and a number of Hindu villagers and muslims of the town prepared for a fight. The Supdtt and Assistant Supdtt Police tactfully handled the situation. The Muslims were the aggressors in Gally mohalla and on the cart men. The Hindus were the aggressors on the Robert Road, Burj Bazar and Kishan Ganj and Garhmukteswar road. Four muslims were killed, the body of two being burnt in a thatched cottage by the Hindus of a neighbouring village.

Rupees 2 lakhs has been imposed as collective fine on the Hindus including those Congress men who staked their all to stop the mischief. The villagers were also to pay the fine while those Muslims who started the mischief are left untouched. The local congress people demand:

1. Non-official enquiry into the whole affair.
2. Pending the enquiry the stay of the realization of fine which should be realized from those found guilty as a result of the enquiry.
3. Immediate enquiry against the Sub-Inspector Police.
