Towards Freedom
Documents on the Movement for Independence in India, 1947 Part 2

The Towards Freedom series is an endeavour to document the years leading to Independence. It goes beyond the overtly political activities of the time and the notion of Independence as ‘transfer of power’. The volumes of this series underscore the fact that the struggle for Independence was not just about attaining freedom from a colonial power—it also comprised efforts to seek social justice, economic empowerment, and cultural autonomy. With meticulously selected historical material from 1937 to 1947, the volumes bring to the fore the activities, attitudes, and ideas of diverse sections of Indian society.

The 1947 volume, published in three parts, covers the major socio-political processes of that fateful year. The first part highlights the main political events that took place in the three-way conflict between imperialist, nationalist, and communal forces. The story continues in the second part, which takes up the partition award and the actual process of partition, the settlement of boundaries, the rehabilitation of refugees, and the developments in the princely states. The third part brings to the fore themes such as the future of the Congress, peasants’ and workers’ struggles, caste, minorities, language and literature, the position of women, the economic consequences of partition, foreign relations, and the celebrations of 15th August.

In this part, the second in the 1947 volume, the story of India’s independence and partition unfurls through documents ranging from newspapers, private papers, and letters, to speeches, maps, cartoons, and a wealth of materials from the colonial archives. The documents relate to the Constituent Assembly, the partition award, partition in Bengal and Punjab, the referendum in the Northwest Frontier Provinces and Sylhet, and the princely states, as also those on the Interim Government and the Indian Independence Bill. This part also highlights the problem of communalism which became so pronounced in several regions of India during this period that even the parties which stood for unity, such as the Congress, had little option but to accept partition.

General Editor’s Preface

It gives me great pleasure to place in the hands of readers Part 2 of the tenth and last volume of the Towards Freedom series of the Indian Council of Historical Research (ICHR). The project taken up by the Council many years ago is at last approaching completion. Since the volumes in the series have been published at intervals of months and sometimes years, a part of the General Editor’s duty has been to state at the beginning of each volume the objective and the general guiding principles of this endeavour. I shall address that task first, as it is customary in this series, and then share with the readers a few thoughts which crossed my mind as I read the present volume.

The agenda of an endeavour such as this series of volumes defines itself in part through editorial practice and partly through attempts towards a statement of objectives. The historical context in which this project developed initially is generally known. While we must not overestimate the influence of that historical conjuncture on the academic inputs which went into the making of the project’s agenda, one has to take that into account as one of the formative factors. After the vertiginous years leading to 1947, there came a time when historians turned their attention to those years and archives began to acquire and provide access to source materials. The last years of ‘British India’ began to be addressed by professional historians and indeed the theme attracted national attention both in India and in Britain. In June 1967, the British Prime Minister Harold Wilson made an important statement in this regard in the House of Commons: ‘In view of the great interest now being shown in historical circles in the last days of British rule in India,’ there would be published ‘documents from the India Office records on the Transfer of Power and the events leading up to it.’¹ The announcement included the assurance that ‘the editors will be independent historians who will be given unrestrained access to the records, and freedom to select and edit the documents for publication’. The outcome of the project thus framed at the highest level in England was the series known as The Transfer of Power edited by Nicholas Mansergh, Smuts Professor of the History of the British Commonwealth at Cambridge. In addition to the announcement made in Parliament, Mansergh, as ‘the Editor-in-Chief’, stated that the ‘purpose of the series’ was ‘to make available to scholars in convenient printed form the more important British historical records relating to the transfer of power in India’.²

Arguably, there is an obvious inadequacy in the notion that all that happened in 1947 was a ‘transfer of power’. In Indian perception the attainment of Independence was a significant moment in the history of the struggle against British rule in the subcontinent. The representation of the emergence of independent India and Pakistan as transfer of power, solely an alteration of constitutional relations, tended towards the occlusion of that history. The focus on the legalistic notion of power transfer and the discourse of modalities of transfer marginalized the more significant part of the historical processes at work. Likewise, the self-imposed limitations of the British documentation enterprise left many issues unaddressed: the project was to select documents from British state papers relating to the constitutional arrangements from the Cripps Mission of 1942 to 15 August 1947. In that discourse, in the official archives and the Viceroy’s papers the Indian voice was recorded only in so far as a few important spokesmen of political parties were among those present in negotiations with the British Indian government. The Indian institutions, personalities, and events were included in the documentation only to the extent the official papers took cognizance of them.

That is not to say that the task of documentation in the twelve volumes produced between 1970 and 1983 by the HMSO was not competently handled by Professor Mansergh and his editorial assistants. These volumes were products of the best of British scholarship. But the initial conception of the project was delimited to certain issues and historical sources. I recall that in 1971 when I invited Sir Penderel Moon, a brilliant officer of the Indian Civil Service and later a member of Mansergh’s editorial team, to a seminar at St Antony’s College, Oxford, a number of us questioned him about this and he pointed out that perhaps we had not paid attention to the subtitle of the Mansergh volumes, ‘Constitutional Relations between Britain and India’. Clearly the agenda for any Indian endeavour towards the documentation of the years leading to independence in 1947 would be different. How it would be different was suggested by Professor Sarvepalli Gopal in a luminous editorial Preface to the first volume produced under the present project. He said that the projected volumes aimed to ‘present, within limits set by the sources, documents relating to the activities, attitudes and ideas of the diverse classes and sections of Indian society, all of which contributed to the attainment of Indian independence with partition’.

It is significant that the title chosen for this series was ‘Towards Freedom’. While the subtitle emphasizes the focus upon the ‘movement for independence’, the title evokes discourses in other domains as well—the struggle for social justice, for economic empowerment against exploitation, and for cultural autonomy. These were also prominent discourses within the overarching framework of the Indian people’s struggle for freedom. One is reminded of the words of Mahatma Gandhi in an essay he wrote in the Harijan a few days before his death, on 27 January 1948: ‘The Congress has won political freedom but it has yet to win economic freedom, social and moral freedom.’ This awareness of different categories of freedom allows space for a conception of the freedom struggle far wider in amplitude than the textbook approach to the struggle for independence from British rule. It makes a struggle for freedoms of many kinds thinkable. And it broadens the idea of a history of freedom struggle. This is how I understand the choice of the title for this series: Towards Freedom.

Also see ‘His Last Will and Testament’, Harijan, 15.2.48, where he spoke of economic, social, and moral dimensions of independence, beyond the political independence which had been attained (Gandhi, Harijan, p. 526). This document was written c. 29 January 1948, shortly before Gandhi’s death, and it was also referred to in the AICC papers as ‘Draft Constitution of the Congress’.
To sum it up, the present series of volumes focuses upon not just the legal processes of the transfer of power and the overtly political activities which brought that about, but also the struggle for freedom in different domains—economic, social, and cultural. The agenda of the series, therefore, is open to the entry of themes relating to the struggle of the peasantry, the working classes, and different sections of people as well as to a broad spectrum of political organizations who in their own light worked towards attainment of freedom.

To anyone interested in the craft of history a pertinent question will be how the documentation will reflect this agenda. The selection of appropriate documents is not an easy task. We are here looking at long-term historical processes such as the slowly evolving ideas about nationhood or class solidarity, the dynamics of popular participation in political movements, the links being forged between movements of the peasantry, the industrial labour and the freedom struggle, the youth and student movements with regard to the political parties, the changing social hierarchy in caste terms in relation to electoral and agitational politics, the gender relationships evolving from the traditional patriarchal structure towards developments that had liberating potentials, the anti-feudal and anti-British movement in the princely states, and the interface between all these trends in the ideational and cultural domains. The instantiation of these long-term processes through events as reflected in documents is the task at hand. The documents reflect fragments of the events which constitute links in the chain of certain historical processes of long duration.

It was decided years ago at an early stage of this project to distribute the work among editors on a purely chronological basis, that is to say each of the volumes in this series would relate to a particular year assigned to an editor. This opened the project to the possibility that the long-term processes would be lost sight of in the depiction of the particularities of the year each editor is taking care of. I incurred unpopularity in the ICHR when I suggested many years ago that a thematic division of labour between the various editors, rather than a chronological one assigning one year to each, would have been a better organizing principle. I will not elaborate that point again. Whatever the drawbacks or merits of the chronological frame for assigning editorial responsibility might have been, it has been in operation for twenty years and hopefully it will enable us to complete the task before us. For the volume editors the limitation of chronological framework has been probably an irksome constraint. On the whole, the volume editors, each a distinguished historian, bore with fortitude the limits set on their temporal range, and they situate the particular historical conjuncture of a given year in the broader perspective of the long-term processes as they see them in the Introduction to the volume. The Editor’s Introduction is thus a bridge between the narrative of events and the narrative of the freedom struggle as he or she sees it. The editor’s introductory observations also provide a space for the presentation of his or her approach to the themes and issues the volume addresses and the explication of that approach.

As regards the sources from which the documents are collected for the volumes in this series, Professor Sarvepalli Gopal, in his General Editor’s Preface, remarked in 1997: ‘Although some of the volumes contain documents drawn from regional language sources, a fully comprehensive selection from these sources merit a separate project.’ This was an accurate prediction of the future output, that is, the volumes now coming out. In deciding on what non-English and regional language sources will be collected the volume editors have exercised their judgement in deploying the research assistance they were provided. Judging by volumes produced till now and the manuscripts now being received from editors and being processed in the editorial office at the ICHR, the editors possibly felt that on most of the themes addressed there exist sufficient source material in the English language and in translation. A more systematic search for and selection of non-English sources would have made this collection more complete, but it was evidently not found to be feasible. We are committed to a schedule which requires us to complete as early as possible the project undertaken in 1988–9 rather than to expand the scope of the editors’ search to new sources.

One more point needs to be made about the sources. Probably, in the last decade of the Raj, specially during the World War, perspicacious observers began to sense a debilitation of the imperial powers and the impending decolonization process on a global scale, and the consequent shift in the power relationships—this altered their perception of the politics of independence struggle radically. This was happening globally in old empires, among the people and leaders in the imperial metropolises as well as their colonial peripheries. On the latter process we do have some documentation in the present series, but not much on the shift in the imperial metropolis. This is because \textit{ab initio} the project was meant to be mainly for the collection of sources in India. This was probably because it was clear from the beginning that we have our hands full if we look at the Indian archival sources alone. The mass and density of archival sources generated by the government in India will be evident to even a layman who glances at the following pages. Moreover, as I mentioned earlier, unlike similar enterprises in England, Pakistan, and Sri Lanka to collect sources throwing light on the last days of the British Raj, this series includes a great many activities and events which are not overtly political or constitutional.

A few words on the editorial apparatus in these volumes may be in order. The chapters are thematically organized while the sequence of placement of documents in each chapter is strictly chronological. There are two guides for the reader, first the Calendar of Documents indicating the subject of each document and the source, and second, the Index at the end of the volume. An effort has been made to make the volumes as ‘reader-friendly’ as possible. In some collections of this nature the editorial practice has been to provide a synoptic account of the contents of each document. This has not been the pattern in this series chiefly because it would increase the size of the volumes. As it is each volume in the series is quite bulky and those editors who tried to trim the size down are to be applauded.

I would like to put on record the annoying delays this project was subjected to on account of political interference to the detriment of academic autonomy. One result of such interference was that the ICHR authorities appointed no successor to the General Editor, Professor Sarvepalli Gopal, when he passed away in April 2002; in fact, all work on the project was suspended for about five years. I was asked in 2006 to take up the task initiated by Professor Gopal, my senior colleague at Jawaharlal Nehru University. Upon accepting this position, an honorary one, my first task was to assemble an editorial team at the ICHR and to request the editors of the different volumes to resume the work.

The disruption in the production of the volumes in the series for several years was tantamount to political censorship of academic work. It is interesting to note here that the British developed a system which prevented political parties’ interference in such matters.
The British project for the documentation of the Transfer of Power was processed through a mechanism which ensured inter-party consensus in parliament. For this purpose a standing inter-party group of Privy Counsellors was appointed and it included a minister of the ruling party and representatives of the Conservative Party as well as the Liberal Party; thus, once the project was passed by that committee, the task was left to experts duly appointed and no political interference occurred. In the light of what happened in our country on account of governmental changes, one might say that there was much that was commendable in the mechanism devised in Britain.

It is hoped that the agenda outlined above makes it amply clear what have been and remain the principles of documentation in the Towards Freedom series. The editors of the volumes have had the freedom to exercise their choice within certain parameters and they focus upon the themes which emerge from the selected documents. An editor of a volume in this series stated what most other editors would endorse: this is not ‘an attempt to provide materials for an “official” or “definitive” statement on the history of the freedom movement’. I accepted the responsibility of being the General Editor of this series since I believe that although the Government of India has funded this enterprise, like many other research projects and institutions in this country, the output of the project is the work of autonomous minds of scholars guided by standards of the discipline of historiography. As I have said in the beginning, not only agenda statements like the one I have attempted now, but practice has defined principles as well, and that is how an academic community works.

Part 2 of the Volume on 1947: Re-constituting India

The present collection of documents, the second part of the volume on 1947, covers the ten weeks between 3 June and 15 August 1947 in the first eight hundred pages and there follows a section on the affairs of the princely states from the beginning of 1947 to 15 August where again most of the important documents relate to the same ten weeks. The editor of this volume Professor Sucheta Mahajan has ably and profusely documented a crucially important period. What is the central theme in the political discourse in these days leading to Independence? Perhaps we can say that it was in plain words the re-constitution of India. We see in these days leading to Independence different conceptions about how India was to be re-constituted, consequent contestations, and we see, as it were, in the microcosm of the documents of those days the vast canvas of the preceding freedom struggle where diverse elements were at work. When I say that this is perhaps the central theme, I have in mind the three major segments of the political discourse which the documents in this compilation focus upon. First, we have documents relating to the lineaments of the foundational ideas of the constitution of the Republic of India which was to emerge after the attainment of Independence. These are the documents in chapters 25, 27, 28, and 30. Second, we have a large number of documents on the Partition and the integrally related communal problem in chapters 26 and 29, and chapters 31 to 37. While constitution-making and the Partition were obviously part of the reconstitution of India, there was a third element, the redefinition of the status of the princely states, eventually leading to their incorporation, which is the subject of chapters numbered 38 to 44. It may be useful for the readers of this large compilation to bear in mind this thematic structure.

In the Preface to the first part of this volume, I had tried to pose and answer two frequently unasked questions: How was Independence imagined by various participants in the political processes gradually leading to Independence? And, second, how was the Partition negotiated towards general acceptance? I thought that if we failed to ask those questions of the vast mass of documents, we would miss the wood for the trees. These two questions do not fade away in this second part of the volume and the consequent continuity between these two parts will be evident in the discussion later. But in the present collection some new elements also come into focus. For one thing, from 3 June 1947, when the policy statement on ‘immediate’ Transfer of Power was issued by H.M.G., the earlier debates on the formation of successor states began to assume a new urgency. Second, while politicians had been talking about Partition, for or against it, for quite a while, when it became imminent the vertiginous speed with which the subcontinent was divided and the consequential actions at state level and the disastrous conflicts in civil society were not anticipated. Third, the lapse of British paramountcy with regard to the princely states was a new challenge to political leaders and managers. Thus the present collection in Part 2 offers much that is new and documentation is also more intense, often going down to the regional and local levels (for example, chapters 31 to 33 on the partition process, 35 to 37 on communal problems, as well as chapters 40 to 44 on political transactions in the princely states).

Making the Constitution

One can get in the documents in the following pages some glimpses of the foundational principles of constitution making for post-Independence India. The big question was whether the Constituent Assembly would lean towards centralization of power or towards autonomy of the provinces. Authorities like Sir William Ivor Jennings, Granville Austin, and Indian constitutional lawyers have expounded the view that the eventual outcome was a federal structure with strong unitary characteristics.9 Jawaharlal Nehru was the chief proponent of that model. As the Chairman of the Union Powers Committee he wrote to the President of the Constituent Assembly, Rajendra Prasad: ‘The soundest framework for our constitution is a federation with a strong centre.’10 He had the intellectual support of Sardar K.M. Panikkar: ‘The idea which has gained prevalence that the Indian constitution must be of the federal type is definitely dangerous to the strength, prosperity and welfare of India.’11 Like Nehru, he believed that the rationale for a federal structure had been the accommodation of Muslim-majority Provinces and thus the Act of 1935 was framed. But the Partition removed that necessity and for the ‘Hindustan area’ he recommended that the ‘basic principle of the constitution should be a unitary one, with large devolution of power to the provinces and suitable provisions for the Princely States'. C. Rajagopalachari pushed this line of thinking further in respect of the princely states in arguing that the idea that the paramountcy of the British India government over princely states would lapse with the transfer of power, was a spurious doctrine; he thought, like many political leaders of the day, that the fissiparous tendency in India had to be strongly controlled. There were opponents to this line of thinking. For instance, in the Constituent Assembly, Maulana Hasrat Mohani stated: it was not enough to talk of a limited autonomy for the provinces; there was 'an inherent right of all members of all these constituent provinces to demand a provincial Republic for every province' within a ‘Union of Indian Republics’. His amendment motion was, of course, negatived. Or again we see strong opposition to the unitary principle from some Assembly members representing princely state interests. Diwan Sir A. Ramaswami Mudaliar of Mysore State urged the Constituent Assembly to concede to 'provincial administration ... widest possible power' and to the princely states 'even wider power'. The Congress leadership, by and large, were opposed to such a view, they emphasized the need for a strong centre. And at that juncture—with the communal issues intersecting with the Partition process, as well as suspense regarding the accession of princely states after 15 August to India or Pakistan—their position is understandable. In fact, otherwise laudable proposals like the principle of proportional representation were rejected on the same grounds. Jawaharlal Nehru stoutly opposed that idea: 'I can think of nothing more conducive to creating a feeble ministry and a feeble government than this business of electing them by proportional representation.'

Jennings was probably the first constitutional expert to point out the essentially unitary character of the Indian Constitution, despite an apparently federal structure.

The constitution making process brought to surface many sentiments that otherwise lay hidden in nationalist rhetoric. The North–South divide surfaced in many forms. A member of the Constituent Assembly from Mysore proposed that the President should be elected 'by rotation either by the North of India or the South of India', to ensure 'fair representation' to people who desired that 'their man should be elected'. This was opposed by, among others, H.V. Kamath who pointed out the danger inherent in such an approach 'when fissiparous and centrifugal tendencies are holding the field ... and most of us want to see the unity of the country restored to its pristine condition'. Nehru likewise opposed the proposal and it was defeated by vote. Inevitably the special claims of the Schedule Castes also figured prominently. The most important instance of this was the note of dissent by H.J. Khandekar, member of the Sub-Committee on Minorities; he was in favour of 'statutory provisions being made for reservation of seats in the Central and Provincial Cabinets for the minorities', chiefly the Scheduled Castes. His contention was that the resolution of the Constituent Assembly declaring untouchability an offence was only 'declaratory and not mandatory' and did not ensure that 'in the matter of sharing power, justice will be done to the Scheduled Castes'. The majority of his Sub-Committee did not accept this view, though they made provisions for 'reservation of seats for different recognized minorities in the various Legislatures', initially for a period of ten years and to be reconsidered thereafter. Eventually, a compromise was proposed, subject to the future decision of the Assembly in the Report of the Advisory Committee on Minorities’ Fundamental Rights, chaired by Sardar Vallabhbhai Patel: a convention might be provided, borrowing from instructions issued to provincial governors under the Government of India Act on 1935, to use their ‘best endeavour’ to ensure that the ministers included ‘as far as practicable members of important minority communities’. As regards reservation or quota in the government services, Patel’s Committee writes:

A proposal was made to us that there should be a constitutional guarantee of representation in the public services of the minority communities in proportion to their population.... We consider, as a general proposition that any such guarantee would be a dangerous innovation. At the same time, it is clear to us that consistently with the need of efficiency in administration, it is necessary for the State to pay due regard to the claims of minorities in making appointments to public services.

Matters were left at this stage on 8 August 1947, awaiting numerous interventions in later times.

While the above-mentioned constitutional issues had long-term implications, there were other legal and constitutional questions which were important only in the short run. Nevertheless, they too occasioned the expenditure of much ink and passion. ‘I got an urgent message’, writes Viceroy Mountbatten to Secretary of State Listowel on 27 June 1947, ’that Nehru had blown up and was determined to resign unless the Interim Government were dismissed.’ The Viceroy’s call for the resignation of the Interim Government, the resistance of Muslim League members to that move, the reconstruction of cabinets, the singular decision of Mr. M.A. Jinnah to become the Governor General of Pakistan, the modalities of transfer of power down to details like what flags should be flown by the new Dominions, etc., were just transitional arrangements. One curious fact is worth noting. There were last-minute attempts to salvage the imperial pretensions by conservative elements in Britain. Most notable were the objections of Winston Churchill and the Conservative Party to the nomenclature of the ‘Indian Independence Bill’ (they failed to get their preferred term, ‘self-governing’); claims of UK and Mr. Jinnah to the Andaman and Nicobar islands (rejected again by H.M.G.); and the new doctrine of lapse of Paramountcy rendering the princely states sovereign entities (this was statutorily established, but the conquest Balkanization was avoided by their accession). One of the few public men who spoke openly of these manoeuvres was P.C. Joshi in People’s Age, the prominent Indian leaders did not. But the documents in this book bear witness to things now forgotten such as Winston Churchill’s letter to his successor, Prime Minister Attlee, on 1 July 1947 on the ‘Indian Independence Bill’ which signalized Churchill’s defeat in his battle to deny Indian Independence: ‘Dominion Status is not the same as independence, although it may be freely used to establish independence.... This is a measure of great constitutional importance and a correct and formal procedure and nomenclature should be observed. The

Partition and the Communal Tangle

Let us turn now to the second major theme of this collection of documents, the Partition of India and the communal tangle. In the preamble to the policy statement of 3 June 1947 His Majesty’s Government (H.M.G.) took note of the decision of the Muslim League not to participate in the Constituent Assembly and more generally the absence of agreement among the Indian political parties as regards ‘a plan of transferring power in British India to Indian hands’. The plan now announced was for ‘the transfer of power this year on a Dominion status basis to one or two successor authorities’. Jawaharlal Nehru in a radio broadcast the same day said: ‘It is with no joy in my heart that I commend these proposals to you.’ Mr. Jinnah, having mentioned the Viceroy and God in that order, expressed his satisfaction that the former ‘was actuated by the highest sense of fairness and impartiality’ and exhorted his listeners to help him to ‘fulfil his mission of the transfer of power’. Thus began the Partition process, accompanied by an unprecedented intensification of communal conflict. This is a subject which has attracted a great many historians. There is little one can add to that in this brief Preface. Further, the present volume offers a thorough documentation down to the regional level in each province of British India. The data here fully endorses the view one obtains in standard works of modern Indian history on the role communalism played in the carnage of 1947 in Punjab, Bihar, and Bengal in particular. What is striking in the narrative that emerges is also the ineffectiveness of the communal parties, Hindu and Muslim, to protect the community they claimed to speak for. However, it may be useful to persist in asking what is there in that narrative which can help answer the question, how was India reconstituted? I propose to look at two aspects that I consider to be elements which helped in that reconstitution after the holocaust of 1947. First, there was a still small voice, that of Gandhi, often unheard or ignored in those days. Second, there was a steady pragmatism in the approach of the leading public men and, above all, in the efforts of the un-heroic common people to cope with the inevitable and to build a future they could live with—a factor scarcely recognized in books of history.

Mahatma Gandhi has often been singled out as one man who took a stand against Partition. That is apparently wrong if you look at some of his statements in acceptance of Partition, in the last few weeks before Partition was effected, and yet that is right if you look at the inner consistency of the universalist values he spoke for. Gandhi’s speeches at the prayer meetings show that from 4 June he had accepted the inevitability of Partition. He told his listeners in plain words: ‘You should not feel sorry that India is to be divided into two. The demand has been granted because you asked for it.’ The next day he raised the question ‘... why I allowed such a thing [Partition] to happen. But should I then insist that the Congress should do everything only after consulting me? I am not so mad.’ His own vision of India was not a divided country, he said on 9 June: ‘If all the non-Muslims were with me, I would not let India be divided. But today the general opinion is not with me, and so I must step aside and stay back.\(^3^2\) ‘Today my tongue, my words have lost their power,’ he said despondently.\(^3^3\) But having accepted the fact that the free and united India of his dreams was in jeopardy, Gandhi looked to the future to rebuild on the ruins of his dreams. ‘Let us all,’ he said on 10 June, ‘pray to God that although India and Pakistan have become separate nations our hearts may not be divided’.\(^3^4\) Jawaharlal has suggested Union of Indian Republic as the name for the country [after Independence] ... all will live together here. If a part wants to secede we shall not force it to remain, but those that remain shall live as brothers.\(^3^5\) And he also reiterated quite often at his prayer meetings his old message: ‘True Hinduism embraces all religions.’\(^3^6\) To the AICC meeting on 14 June his message was the same: ‘Hinduism is going to be tested. If you show the generosity of true Hinduism, you will pass [the test] in the eyes of the world. If not, you will have proved Mr. Jinnah’s thesis that Muslims and Hindus are two separate nations.’\(^3^7\)

Thus the general trend of Mahatma Gandhi’s pronouncements from 3 June onwards was to reconcile himself to an unavoidable partition and to start reconstituting India on the ruins of his dreams of a united India. Parallel to this, one can see in the political discourse of those times, as well as in the life of ordinary people affected by Partition, a robust pragmatism and practical sense. A representative instance is the eminent lawyer Tej Bahadur Sapru writing to Sir Sita Ram, then President of the United Provinces Legislative Council:

> Assuming that the Congress has gone wrong in accepting the partition, what is they [critics] wanted the Congress to do?—resign office, start Civil Disobedience and leave it to be dealt with by the Muslim League. It is a practical question which ought to be answered in a practical manner.... For a few days there will be much flutter in some districts and then things will quiet down. If my estimate of the future is wrong then trouble will continue long.... We must not however lose our heads in regard to practical questions.\(^3^8\)

> wipe out from their minds the memories of the past—treat it as a terrible nightmare and look forward with single-minded purpose to make India strong, prosperous and happy. This can only be done by hard work.... In spite of my previous strong opposition to partition, I agreed to it because I was convinced that in order to keep India united it must be divided now... The partition of India is a settled fact....\(^3^9\)

The particular task on which Patel focused was to ensure the accession of princely states to the Indian Union. He appealed to the rulers in princely states to ‘join hands with those who were shaping the future of India’ in the Constituent Assembly.\(^4^0\) Rajagopalachari rejected with ruthless logic the theoretical elaboration of the new doctrine of the lapse of Paramountcy and urged the practical point of view that ‘out of the 565 [Princely] States, more than 330 are just estates. The so-called rulers of these States have not exercised powers beyond an ordinary Third Class Magistrate.\textsuperscript{41} Even Jawaharlal Nehru, known for his proclivity to dwell on history and abstract ideas, spoke of the need to address the practical tasks of the future: ‘There has been violence—shameful, degrading and revolting violence.... let us bury that past in so far as it is dead and forget all bitterness and recrimination.... We should not wish ill to anyone, but think of every Indian as our brother and comrade.’\textsuperscript{42} The Communist Party of India in the Political Resolutions of their Central Committee in June, 1947, exhorted the Left in this manner: ‘The Communist Party appeals to all Left Organisations and elements to forget the partisanship and differences of the past and come together to fight the dangers and realize the possibilities of the present....’\textsuperscript{43} To erase the memories of the recent past of communal conflicts, to focus upon the agenda of rebuilding the Indian polity, to establish communal harmony with a view to constructing a multi-ethnic society—these appear to be main themes in the pragmatic political discourse of public men. Parallel to that was the effort of tens of thousands of people in all ranks of society who were displaced from their home and hearth and were now engaged in rebuilding their lives.

There is little room for doubt that on some matters there was a disconnect between the pragmatic outlook of political leaders and the Gandhian way of thinking in the days immediately preceding Independence. As we have seen already, Gandhi himself often observed that neither the Congress nor the League would listen to his expostulations. Sometimes he took positions which his own followers in the Congress rejected out of hand. Consider, for instance, his comment on the communal carnage at a prayer meeting on 15 July 1947:

\begin{quote}
In Noakhali [east Bengal], Bihar, the Punjab and the NWFP [North Western Frontier Province], wherever there were riots there was only one demand: that the army be sent for their protection.
Why should people who ought to be brave want this?.... [We] have not the courage of non-violence, for the courage of non-violence is the courage to die, never the courage to kill.\textsuperscript{44}
\end{quote}

That was obviously intended as a statement of a moral principle, but that could not be taken as a principle of public policy. However, despite the distance between uncompromising idealism and political pragmatism, there was a common ground in some basic matters. And no one could put that to the people as clearly as Gandhi was able to do at the prayer meetings:
‘Hindus, Muslims, Parsis, Christians all are Indians. Religion is a private matter.’\textsuperscript{45} That was the simplest possible statement of the agenda the post-Partition reconstitution of India. That part of Gandhi’s exhortations was accepted across the entire political spectrum in the Congress. In asking Patel on 10 June 1947 wrote:

\begin{quote}
I do not think it will be possible to consider Hindustan [an appellation routinely used before the term Indian Union began to be used] as a Hindu State with Hinduism as the State religion. We must not forget there are other [sic] minorities whose protection is our primary responsibility.
The state must exist for all, irrespective of caste or creed.\textsuperscript{46}

Similarly Jawaharlal Nehru writes to Rajendra Prasad on the demand for abolition of cow-slaughter: inevitably majority Hindu sentiment will affect our activities in a hundred ways. Nevertheless, it does make a difference whether we try to think of India as a composite country or as a Hindu country.... You know how strong an advocate of cow protection Bapu is. Nevertheless, so far I am aware, he is opposed to any compulsory stoppage of cow slaughter.\(^\text{47}\)

Nehru believed that ‘narrow sectarian outlook [of Hindu and Muslim communalists] will do injury, not only to nationalism as such but also to the high ideals for which Indian and Hindu culture has stood through the ages’.

Integration of the Princely States

Finally, we may look at the third strand of political thinking and decision making towards the reconstitution of India: the integration of the princely states in the Indian Union. The anti-feudal and nationalistic State Peoples’ movement, documented in the previous volumes in the Towards Freedom series, continues in the present period and its culmination was witnessed in three developments. Documents on that in this collection fall broadly into three groups. First, there are papers relating to the assertion of princely states’ autonomy and even sovereignty. That was important in that it clearly meant the prospect of the Balkanization of India. Second, we see the entry of some princely states into the Constituent Assembly, often prodded by enlightened and nationalist-minded Diwans. This was accompanied by a debate whether the states’ representatives should be elected or nominated by the princes. Third, the final step taken by most of the princely states was to sign the instrument of accession in accordance with H.M. Government’s policy declaration of 3 June 1947. Sardar Vallabhbhai Patel’s greatest contribution in those days was to facilitate and expedite that entire process.

Some of the princely states took the theory of lapse of paramountcy somewhat too seriously. Some of them began with a bang by asserting their newly found powers, eventually that ended in a whimper. The General Conference of Princely Rulers on 29 January 1947 conditionally accepted the Cabinet Mission Plan and declared: ‘The States will retain all subjects and powers other than those ceded by them to the [Indian] Union.’\(^\text{48}\) However, the Cabinet Mission having failed, the princely states awaited further developments. In the meanwhile some of the major states began to join the Constituent Assembly. The lapse of paramountcy upon termination of British rule, declared by H.M.G. in their 3 June 1947 policy statement, obviously contained the possibility of Balkanization. Even prior to this the Nawab of Bhopal had been trying to secure a special status as a British Dominion and he had met Viceroy Wavell; Sir C.P. Ramaswamy Aiyer also floated a balloon, a South Indian Federation with Travancore state in the lead.\(^\text{49}\) Diwan Sir B.L. Mitter who brought Baroda into the Constituent Assembly as its Diwan, apprehends about this time that ‘the lure of independence is being held out to various States, with a view to keep them out of the Indian Union’; he does not directly blame the British Indian government but he fears that ‘India is going to be Balkanised’\(^\text{50}\). Indeed there is evidence in Viceroy Wavell’s secret correspondence that he was inclined to discourage princes from joining the Constituent Assembly, however, there is no such evidence about his successor in Viceroyalty, Mountbatten. Nehru had reasons to believe that the Political Department of the British Indian government actively encouraged the idea that princely states were to be independent sovereign states after Transfer of Power. Acharya Narendra Dev declared that the British were trying to create an Ulster in India in the princely states, and ‘in the Indian States the final battle of independence would be fought’. In the meanwhile, Mountbatten received from H.M.G. instructions that Dominion status for Bhopal or any princely state was unacceptable. The Nawab of Bhopal continued his efforts to get independence and tried to get from Jinnah an assurance that princely states can enter into ‘alliance’ with Pakistan, not ‘Union’, and further that they ‘would be independent and ... will not be molested or interfered with by Pakistan in regard to their internal matters’. The Muslim League’s response to this was a statement that Pakistan would refrain from meddling in the internal affairs of the princely states and Congress must cease to coerce them. Hyderabad was reported to be inclined to follow Bhopal while Travancore had a champion of its independent status in its Dewan, Sir C.P. Ramaswamy Aiyer. Even Mahatma Gandhi had to join battle and issue a statement condemning these efforts to keep the States out of independent India. Nehru declared in the AICC: ‘We will not recognise any independence for any State in India.’ Mountbatten in the meanwhile wrote to the Nawab of Bhopal a cordially worded letter, signing as ‘Dickie’; the letter was far from being cordial in its contents because it rejected decisively the Nawab’s plea. Mountbatten expressed his satisfaction with the terms offered to princely states by Patel on behalf of the States Department. That settled the matter for the time being, just two weeks before Independence and the story thereafter is not within the purview of this volume.

As regards the princely states joining the Constituent Assembly, that step was generally regarded as a step preliminary to joining the Indian Union. There was a division in the ranks of the princes in this regard, as we have seen already. Apart from that, an impediment to this process was a difference of opinion on the question whether states’ representatives should come through popular election or by virtue of nomination by the princes. It was a hotly contested issue. Radicals like Jai Prakash Narain demanded that ‘none of them should be nominees of the Princes’. Nehru and Patel were in favour of having the majority of such representatives elected, not nominated by the princes. Eventually a compromise was arrived at: not less than 50 per cent of the states’ representatives should be elected by elected members of legislatures.

or some other electoral collegiums.®^ Radical critics looked upon the acceptance of nominees of princes at 50 per cent as a shameful concession to feudal elements, but probably the election principle was not always workable in the princely states in the absence of appropriate institutions. There remained a bigger problem, the fact that the princes were divided into two camps, for and against joining the Constituent Assembly. Negotiations took place between the Princes’ Negotiating Committee and the Constituent Assembly’s States Peoples’ Negotiating Committee chaired by Pattabhi Sitaramayya. The latter was of the view that the Chamber of Princes did not represent the States as a whole, since several big states had kept themselves out of it. Eventually, Sardar K.M. Panikkar and Maharaja of Bikaner managed to bring about a compromise between princes who were for and those who were against joining the Constituent Assembly.®^ Patel invited the states to ‘join the Constituent Assembly forthwith’; they ‘need not be afraid of the Congress’.®^ So did Nehru at the States’ Peoples’ Conference and declared, somewhat prematurely: ‘All those who do not join the Constituent Assembly now will be regarded as hostile States.’®^ The final act in the drama was the accession of the states to the Union. The business of persuading princely states to join the Constituent Assembly was overtaken by the Accession process under the 3 June 1947 declaration regarding Transfer of Power. After dilly-dallying over niggling little points and occasionally some confused bargaining, the Princes’ accessions came by dribbles which turned into a flood after the Conference of Rulers on 25 July presided over by Mountbatten, followed by a luncheon party on 1 August at the Viceroy’s House. On the latter date, in the presence of the Viceroy, twenty-two princes indicated their willingness to sign the Instrument of Accession. That included Baroda, Gwalior, Patiala, Bikaner, Jodhpur, Faridkot, Cochin, and fifteen others while Bhopal and Travancore were also expected to toe the line.®® ‘It is expected,’ a press communiqué from the Viceroy’s House said, ‘that barring a few who have not finally made up their minds, all the States will have signed the Instrument of Accession by August 10.’ Thus a suspenseful act in the drama came to a neat conclusion, while issues such as Hyderabad and Kashmir awaited a not-so-neat resolution in later times.

I recall Jawaharlal Nehru’s words on the day the imminent Transfer of Power was announced: ‘We are little men serving great causes, but because that cause is great, something of that greatness falls upon us.’®® As I bring this Preface to its end I cannot escape the feeling that it is impossible to be satisfied with it, that it is difficult to be adequate to the great moment when India attained independence, and that much remains unsaid about what I have called the reconstitution of India. However, if the documents of those times help to recall those times, if these volumes in the Towards Freedom series raise new questions and aid and generate research, the objectives of this endeavour will have been served.

A big project such as this incurs many debts. I would like to thank the editor of this volume, Professor Sucheta Mahajan, the research assistants and the editorial team at the ICHR, Professor Arjun Dev, who acted as the co-ordinator of the project, and Dr. Amit K. Gupta who was co-editor of one volume and a consultant in respect of several volumes in this series. The Chairman of the ICHR, Professor Y. Sudershan Rao, his predecessor in that office, Professor Basudev Chatterji, and Member-Secretary of the ICHR, Professor Ravindran Gopinath, played an important role in pushing forward our efforts to complete the Towards Freedom series.

From the data generated by the publishers it seems that since 2006 when this project was effectively revived and I was asked to be the General Editor, the total output has been as follows: over eight thousand pages of text consisting of documents, and about six hundred pages of editorial research aids such as calendars of documents, biographical notes, etc., have been produced in nine bulky tomes. These figures do not mean very much, these productions are to be evaluated in terms of the extent to which research has been facilitated. That is to be seen in the future but for the present it is a matter of some satisfaction that documents hitherto dispersed in many archives and depositories have been made easily accessible and that a project that began three decades ago is nearing completion.

Needless to say, the Editorial Committee which has met from time to time was of great help. As the General Editor I would like to put on record my indebtedness to my distinguished fellow-editors in charge of different volumes, other than those mentioned above: the late Professors Partha Sarathi Gupta, Bipan Chandra, Visalakshi Menon, and Professors Bimal Prasad, K.N. Panikkar, Sumit Sarkar, and Mushirul Hasan. I would also like to thank Oxford University Press, New Delhi, for their unstinting cooperation through all these years since 2006.

Editor’s Introduction

Nineteen forty-seven, the year covered by the present volume, was no ordinary year. Two momentous developments stood out, independence and partition. The movement for independence reached its conclusion and new nation states emerged. Important issues to do with nation-building which had been raised during the years of struggle now demanded they be addressed. What would be the nature of the polity? Would India be a secular state or a Hindu rashtra, following upon Pakistan’s creation on a communal basis? What would be the place of minorities in the new state? How would the princely states integrate into the very different polity of erstwhile British India? How would the anti-colonial movement, which had operated as a broad front, transform into an ideologically distinct party?

One of the obvious questions associated with the year 1947 is why the British decided to quit. However, those looking for answers to why the British quit are unlikely to find them in the immediate context of 1947. They would be best off looking for these answers in the long term, in the years of protracted mass struggle against colonial rule. By 1947 what was left to decide were the modalities of to whom and how power was to be handed over.

By the end of World War II, the success of the national movement in the struggle for hegemony over the minds of the Indian people was evident. Nationalist fervour was at a high pitch and the anti-colonial movement had reached hitherto unpolticized sections and areas. The pillars of the colonial state, the army and the bureaucracy, were weakened at their base. At the end of the war, the civil services stood depleted, weary from wartime service and handling nationalist agitations, most recently the 1942 movement. Imperialist hegemony had gradually but firmly been eroded and, equally important, was recognized by the colonial officials and the people to be so.¹

The nationalist strategy of struggle–truce–struggle—phases of struggle alternating with phases of non-struggle—reduced colonial policy to a mess of contradictions. Repression and conciliation alternated as two poles of policy. When non-violent movements were met with repression, the power behind the government stood exposed. Conversely, the government was seen to be too weak when it went in for a truce. Loyalists deserted the sinking ship, as did Indian officials. For loyalists it was a crisis of faith; for the services, the dilemma was one of action. The same set of officials had to implement both poles of policy, repression and conciliation, and found this very confusing and demoralizing.

Looking ahead at the political prospects in India once the war ended, the Viceroy underlined the primacy of a successful settlement of the Indian question. This was believed to be essential for the future security of the Empire, to ensure British prestige in the East, and to keep India within the Commonwealth.\(^3\)

When the national leaders came out of jail after long prison terms at the end of the War and toured the country, they assured their audiences that it was a matter of time before the British would go, maybe as early as two to five years. By early 1946 the British in turn made it clear that their days in India were numbered. The Secretary of State said as much in his speech on New Year’s Day, 1946. Along with other Congress leaders, Gandhiji realized that the imperial rulers were sincere in the declaration of their intention to ‘quit’ in favour of independent rule by Indians and in turn tried to convince the people of this.\(^4\)

However, the time for exploring avenues for settlement was running out. By mid-1946 a point had been reached where government had the responsibility to keep the peace but little power to do so. The Viceroy commented on the prospect of a revolt by the Congress, this time assisted by its own governments in power in the provinces: ‘We could still probably suppress such a revolt ... [but] have nothing to put in its place and should be driven to an almost entirely official rule, for which the necessary numbers of efficient officials do not exist.’\(^5\)

When given the option of staying on in India by changing the basis of rule to coercion, British Prime Minister Attlee argued against it on the following grounds: lack of administrative machinery to carry out a policy of rule by coercion; lack of troops owing to other international commitments; adverse opinion in the Labour Party; questionable loyalty of the Indian troops and the unwillingness of British troops to serve; adverse world opinion; and an uncomfortable position in UNO.\(^6\)

As colonial rule could not survive on the old basis for long, a graceful withdrawal from India became the overarching aim of policy makers. Of course, the digits of the post-imperial relationship had to be negotiated and modalities of transfer of power worked out. For the British government it was important that withdrawal be presented not as forced dissolution of imperial power but as a step forward in the planned devolution of power. A revised draft of a statement of policy dated 2 January 1947 set out His Majesty’s Government’s (HMG’s) proposed statement as ‘the final stage in their achievement of self government’, which ‘for the past thirty years ... has been the policy of successive British governments’.\(^7\)

A new Viceroy was accordingly appointed as part of a new policy initiative. So Mountbatten went out to India not only as the new Viceroy but also the last Viceroy, with the terminal date for British departure announced for 30 June 1948. Mountbatten even claimed in later years that he introduced the idea of the time limit and that if he had not done so the British may well still be out there! But many before Mountbatten had spoken of a time limit, including Wavell and Attlee, and members of the Cabinet had argued, from different points of view, for having a specific date for withdrawal and its announcement. For Mountbatten to claim sole credit is clearly without substance. That he insisted on its public announcement is closer to what actually happened.

When the year opened, two developments had taken place. The first was that Nehru and Jinnah had been to London for talks to tease out the contradiction between their varied readings of the Cabinet Mission Plan. Congress saw the scheme as an alternative to partition and accepted the plan without accepting compulsory grouping of provinces. This was partly because Assam and North West Frontier Province (NWFP), both with Congress inclinations, were placed in the zones in the east and north west which would make up the future Pakistan. In contrast, the Muslim League was all for compulsory grouping of provinces and accepted the Mission scheme inasmuch as it implied Pakistan. It is not surprising that there was trouble given the opposed perceptions of the scheme by the two principal parties.

The second development was that the Congress had gone ahead and convened the constitution-making body for its area, given the Muslim League’s refusal to join the Constituent Assembly. But the impasse remained despite Congress accepting HMG’s pro-League interpretation of the Mission scheme in the 6 December 1946 statement. The deadlock in the Interim Government also continued. With the options available exhausted, new initiatives were needed.

The Interim Government was an arena where civil war by other means was waged by the League. ‘Non-cooperate from within’ was Nehru’s phrase for the League’s stance in the Interim Government. The intention of the League seems to have been to open battle on every front in pursuit of the end of Pakistan. Appointments made by Congress ministers were questioned and policy decisions hotly debated. Congress members in the Interim Government found the functioning of the government to be severely compromised. Patel demanded that Leaguers should resign from the government given their intemperate speech.

This went on till 5 February 1947 when Congress members demanded resignation of League members. Though disruptionist tactics of the League members was the main ground for this demand, it was also pointed out that the Muslim League had refused to join the Constituent Assembly which had convened on 9 December 1946. This implied an ambiguous acceptance of the Mission Plan on its part. This in turn meant framing of the constitution was obstructed. The League only accepted the short-term aspects of the Plan, namely the formation of an Interim Government, which it used to reach its goal of Pakistan. When the Muslim League Working Committee met at Karachi on 31 January 1947, it asked for the dissolution of the Plan. This, despite the fact that the 6 December 1946 statement by the government had accepted the interpretation of the League on the vexed issue of grouping and asked Congress to assure that there would be a set procedure for the Constituent Assembly.

A few days before Independence, Patel spoke about his experience in office in the Interim Government. As the Muslim League created deadlocks and were obstructionist, the Congress leaders decided that it was best to control some part of the country rather than have its writ run

Non-cooperation by the League in the Interim Government closed one more door and took the country closer to partition. Apart from announcing a policy initiative, an additional factor behind HMG making the 20 February statement was the Congress demand that Muslim League join the Constituent Assembly or leave the Interim Government.14

His Majesty’s Government hoped the impending February statement would gain time to answer the Congress demand that Muslim League leave the Constituent Assembly. Accordingly the government’s answer to Nehru’s demand was that he should await the policy statement soon to be announced. The constitutional crisis on the cards was staved off by the 20 February 1947 statement.15 Nehru appealed to Liaquat Ali Khan, the League leader, to meet and discuss differences as the British were fading out of the picture but got no response.16 The statement was double edged—on the one hand, it was a response to the decline of authority of the colonial state and its instruments; on the other, it was a notice to the League that agreement had to be worked out by the given time limit. The government wanted to convey the message that it was no longer willing to let the League hold the constitutional process to ransom.17

The statement was not clear about the government to which power was to be transferred. Was it the government emanating from the Constituent Assembly? Would India be united or divided? The League took the cue from the proviso in the statement that in the absence of agreement at the centre, power would be handed over to the authority at the helm in the provinces. The League duly made a bid for power in the Punjab, toppled the coalition government, and set that province on the path to civil war. Congress was convinced of the intention of the British to quit. Gandhiji said that the Congress provinces if wise will get what they want.18

Another aspect that changed in these months was the force of the strategic undertow to the evolution of political policy. Prior to 1947 all policy pronouncements or political settlements were conditional on ensuring military or strategic interests of Britain in the post-imperial scenario. A fixed date for withdrawal meant a change in the game, as it left no scope for awaiting protection of post-imperial strategic interests. The sequence now would be, as Ismay spelt out at a meeting of ministers of HMG, ‘Military arrangements in India must follow the political situation’.19 Over time the realization dawned that a military treaty was unlikely and British interests were best safeguarded by promoting friendly relations, preferably within the Commonwealth.

Congress was in a dilemma about whether India should be in the Commonwealth or not because Congress had always stood for complete independence. In mid-April Nehru and his colleagues had sought clarification on this issue from the government: Can one be a member of the Commonwealth while being an independent state?

On the British side, the question was: Could the grant of immediate dominion status get India to join the Commonwealth? This was the British hope, predicated on the Congress realization that it might be useful for British troops to stay on for a while till their own armed forces were in place, for which being in the Commonwealth would help. But Mountbatten dishonestly said at one point that the British were not interested in India being in the Commonwealth. This was a bargaining tactic. In reality, India being in the Commonwealth would present Britain in a good light in the eyes of people across the world. Also Commonwealth as a transitional institutional arrangement would suit the British as much or more than the Congress.

His Majesty's Government's assessment of their strategic interests in the subcontinent after independence inclined them to cooperate with the Congress rather than prop up communal forces as they had done in the past. However, the British never pitched fully for a united India; they modified their preference for a united India on strategic grounds to having alliances with two dominions, both of whom would be partners in Commonwealth defence. While Pakistan would be an active partner, India would provide bases, as in the case of the Andaman and Nicobar Islands.

The move towards partition is documented in the chapter which details how the new Viceroy explores political alternatives for a couple of months after coming out to India. After discussions with Indian leaders, he realized the Mission Plan was a dead horse. In particular, he found Jinnah stubborn about getting Pakistan and impossible to argue with. The alternatives before Mountbatten appeared to be shrinking and he came around to the view that partition was on the cards.

The date for withdrawal was brought forward by Mountbatten to 15 August with announcement of Boundary Awards fixed for after 15 August. When the date of 15 August 1947 was announced, there were only 72 days to quit and divide. The early date for transfer of power was intended, first, to get Congress to agree to dominion status and, second, to enable the British government to escape responsibility for the worsening communal situation. The concern of the government was primarily how best to come out of the continuing crisis in the eyes of world public opinion. They did not care what happened to Indians.

Policy preferences before HMG were a gracious, smooth withdrawal and getting benefits from both dominions, India and Pakistan. It could be said that partition was not only the closing scene of Divide and Rule but also the first act of the drama of Commonwealth diplomacy.

The intention was to showcase HMG’s intentions in the best possible way. Show of impartiality and fair play was vital, especially as world opinion was not convinced of the necessity of partition. So, since an agreed solution had not been reached, what was an award was dressed up as an agreed solution.

20 Mountbatten painted a very grim picture to V.K.K. Menon about Pakistan becoming stronger militarily if it stayed in the British Commonwealth and then argued that the only way India could prevent that was by being in the Commonwealth themselves (22 April 1947, Record of Interview between Louis Mountbatten and V.K.K. Menon, Part 1, Chapter 15, Document No. 25). Also see Archibald Nye to Louis Mountbatten, Part 1, Chapter 15, Document No. 35.

21 A brief for negotiations on India’s defence requirements prepared by the Chiefs of Staff of Britain was enclosed in Secretary of State to PM, 24 July 1947, T.O.P., Vol. XII, 1983, pp. 314–21.
A point worth noting is that the 3 June Plan was an award, whatever its projection by the British as a plan agreed to by the Congress and the League.

The British professed that they tried their best to keep India united; in fact they took the easy way out of pleasing everyone, as Gandhiji pointed out to Mountbatten: 'I suggest that the attempt to please all parties is a fruitless and thankless task. In the course of our conversation I suggested that equal praise bestowed on both the parties was not meant. No praise would have been the right thing.'\(^2\)

The British did not really make a bid for unity; they only dressed up division as maximum possible unity. As the main proposition of the Congress, namely unity, was not accepted, the British were all for meeting all its minor demands (for example, its stance on Hyderabad or on Andaman and Nicobar Islands).\(^3\)

In mid-April 1947, at a conference of governors, it was decided that provinces can join only India or Pakistan—no option of independence was given to them. His Majesty's Government was not happy with closure of the option of independence, given its emphasis on presenting the mode of transfer of power as emanating from Indian and not British will. The Viceroy on his part was clear that partition must be limited to two successor states, and not lead to Balkanization.\(^4\)

Mountbatten proposed that he be Governor-General of both India and Pakistan\(^5\) to ensure a modicum of unity between the two dominions by virtue of his being a common link. He was confident that Jinnah would welcome Mountbatten’s presence, but Jinnah decided to be Governor-General himself in order to show his independence from the British\(^6\) and refused to relent because he did not wish to appear to be appeasing the British. A joint defence machinery was set up to act as a link between the dominions.\(^7\) But the Kashmir conflict in October 1947 put paid to all prospects of joint defence. The joint defence machinery did not last beyond December 1947.

The documents on the stance of the political parties on the partition of India highlight an issue which continues to be contested—why the Congress and Gandhiji accepted partition. Depending on the ideological bent of the writer, partition is either attributed to the British policy of divide and rule or the age-old rift between Hindus and Muslims. Some left-wing writers have described independence as a deal between the metropolitan and Indian bourgeoisie for which the nation paid the price of partition. Or else that Congress leaders chose to have a strong Centre rather than share power with the League. Or that partition took place because of the Congress leaders’ lust for quick and easy power, leaving the people betrayed and Gandhiji no longer wishing to live for 125 years.

There was one moot point which was most debated in the public domain and which Gandhiji, Nehru, and other leaders had to repeatedly explain and defend. Why was partition accepted by Congress and Gandhiji after years of their resolute opposition to the two-nation theory and the politics of Jinnah and the Muslim League?

This partly explains the extensive documentation on the Congress relative to the Muslim League, whose stance on partition did not require explanation as it flowed from its earlier politics. Also the stance of the Muslim League is documented in different chapters on the division of Punjab and Bengal, on communalism in the provinces, and on exploring political alternatives. The complete picture can be pieced together by aggregating the documents dispersed across the chapters, which have not been organized according to parties, but on thematic lines, such as the League’s stance, as well as of the Socialists and Communists.

The documents in the present selection indicate that Gandhiji’s position was different from Congress’ but not opposed to it. Gandhiji’s nuanced position is evident in his proposal to the Viceroy that Jinnah be Prime Minister, embedded in the hope that this would satisfy his ambition and wean him away from his insistence on Pakistan. Mountbatten noted that this pleased Jinnah’s vanity. However, the Congress leaders saw the proposal as fraught with too much risk. If the Congress opted out of the constitutional arena, that would leave it open to reactionary forces. Also, many followers would see it as betrayal by the party. Further, the prospect of Pakistan could not be averted by appeasing Jinnah since even he could no longer call it off. Accordingly, Gandhiji withdrew his offer.

When Gandhiji and Jinnah issued a direct appeal for peace in mid-April 1947, Vallabhbhai Patel pertinently pointed out to the Viceroy that Direct Action had to be withdrawn for the peace appeal to be effective. Patel implied that the appeal for peace by Jinnah was not sincere, an assessment shared by Gandhiji.

By the summer of 1947 the realization had dawned on Congress leaders that conciliation of communalism was futile. Nehru described Jinnah as always wanting more even after accepting what he gets. Elsewhere he said of Jinnah, ‘We are up against something which is neither political, nor economic, nor reasonable, nor logical.’ Patel was clear that there would be no more appeasement of the Muslim League. He also pointed out that new India would not have communal weightages or communal electorates.

An alternative to partition was imposing unity by force. P.D. Tandon, Congress leader and Speaker of the United Provinces (UP) Assembly, was an active proponent of this view, as was Ram Ratan Gupta, Congressman from Kanpur. Both condemned the ‘betrayal’ by the Congress in accepting partition and argued for imposing unity. But Congress leaders chose to accept Pakistan rather than compel unity.

Nehru was clear that use of the sword and the lathi could not stem the communal forces—rather, the ensuing civil war would have long term consequences. He stressed this in his speech at the All India Congress Committee (AICC) session on 15 June 1947. A couple of months earlier, Congress President Kripalani had told the Viceroy, ‘Rather than have a battle we shall let them have their Pakistan.’ It must be remembered that as Congress did not have state power, the option of unity by force meant fighting it out on the streets against volunteer armies of the communal forces.

Hence when partition seemed inevitable, Congress tried to find a way of accepting the undesirable, not as a communal demand, but as a principle based on self-determination. Gandhi stated that the decision had been arrived at after taking into account the views of the people of all communities, be they Muslims, Sikhs, or Hindus. Nehru explained partition as the outcome of the will of some sections to not be part of India.

At the Congress Working Committee meeting on 1 June 1947, Congress President Kripalani reminded the gathering that since 1942 it had been accepted that no part of India would be forced to stay on in India against its will. At the session of the AICC on 15 June 1947, he again said that acceptance of partition flowed from the clause of no coercion in the Congress resolution on the Cripps Plan.

The fact that the settlement was final was seen as crucial by Congress leaders in accepting partition. Though Patel pinned his hopes on the partition award on the ground that there was no further uncertainty, he also expressed his dismay at Jinnah taking a communal standpoint in his broadcast over All India Radio (AIR) and the All India Muslim League’s response being contradictory and evasive and hence unlikely to be the basis for settlement.

The hope of India and Pakistan being reunited after some years reconciled leaders to the reality of division. The expectation was that once passions subsided, common interests would draw people together and partition could be revoked. Hence Nehru appealed to people to not accept partition in their hearts. This was expressed in his trademark eloquent prose: ‘We have often to go through the valley of the shadow before we reach the sunlit mountain tops.’

However, if the hope of reuniting was to be kept alive, any measure that cemented partition was to be avoided, be it dividing the army, transfer of population, or parliamentary sanction for transfer of power to two dominions. Congress leaders too joined Mountbatten to oppose transfer of population.

The AICC resolution on the 3 June Plan made it clear that partition was accepted as a temporary measure that would bring violence to an end. This was again repeated in Gandhiji’s and Nehru’s speeches at the AICC meeting on 14–15 June.\(^\text{53}\) Ironically, for a believer in ahimsa, Gandhiji had a lesser dread of civil war than his colleagues. He wrote: ‘Let British leave India to anarchy, rather than as a cock pit between two organized armies.’\(^\text{54}\)

The one positive aspect of partition for Congress was that they would get a free hand in the rest of the country. Nehru spoke of 80 or 90 per cent of India moving forward according to the map of India he had in mind and added: ‘Those who stand as an obstacle in our way should go their way.’\(^\text{55}\)

Patel spelt out further what this freedom could be used for—to consolidate the armed forces and have a strong central government.\(^\text{56}\) Jayaprakash Narayan, the Socialist leader, also appreciated the ‘emergence of a strong Union Centre’ following upon the Partition Award and its concomitant division of provinces.\(^\text{57}\)

If the hope was unity at the centre, the apprehension was the opposite. Nehru was concerned that the Plan shown to him in early May 1947 held out the spectre of fragmentation. In other words, it would create many Ulsters in India as a large number of successor states would be allowed to emerge first and then given the option to unite.\(^\text{58}\) Free choice to provinces and states was insisted upon by HMG. But the Viceroy had been in favour of only two dominions in mid-April and, accordingly, the 3 June Plan limited fragmentation to partition into two dominions.

Congress then accepted partition on the grounds that it reflected the will of the people and that it was the only way out.\(^\text{59}\) On 4 June, Gandhiji, after meeting the Viceroy and the Congress leaders, said at his daily prayer meeting that the Congress Working Committee had agreed to the vivisection of Hindustan not under any threat of violence or coercion but as there was no way of getting round the Muslim League.\(^\text{60}\) There was hope that partition was only temporary and could be reversed once the imperialists were out of the picture and once Muslim League realized its folly. Partition was seen by the leaders as better than civil war or Balkanization. This helped leaders accept it. Only options left were waging an anti-communal struggle and using force, both of which could not be taken up. In the end, partition was accepted by Congress as a recognition of the failure of its strategy to draw in most of the Muslim masses into the national movement.

The letters and documents selected on this theme corroborate Gandhiji’s reading of the communal situation that both Hindus and Muslims had moved far away from non-violence. He could not oppose Congress, he said, because Congress represented the people of India who have become communal.\(^\text{61}\)

He was asked by some colleagues and sundry elements during his prayer meetings why he did not start a mass movement. According to them, such a movement could either be against the British, whose fallout would be Hindu-Muslim unity or it could be an anti-communal movement. They believed that both movements would bring about unity. In reality, however, the possibility of anti-communal struggle was limited as cadres and the ordinary people were communalized. Gandhiji was aware of his limitations: 'I have never created a situation in my life.... People say that I had created a situation, but I had done nothing except giving a shape to what was already there. Today I see no sign of such a healthy feeling. And therefore I shall have to wait until the time comes.'

It has often been argued that Gandhiji was ignored in the parleys with the retreating imperial power. Gandhiji was believed to be helpless because of his disciples’ alleged lust for power. However, the position of the Congress leaders can best be understood in political rather than personal terms. They wanted early transfer of power to take the country forward out of the impasse created by non-cooperation by the League.

As for Gandhiji’s ‘alienation’ from the Congress, the record seems to suggest otherwise. Gandhiji dismissed any rumours of his disenchantment with Nehru by speaking very highly of him: ‘He renounces things as easily as a snake its slough.’ He was consulted on political developments when in Noakhali. Kripalani and Nehru went to meet him there and asked him to come to Delhi. When he came to Delhi he met the Viceroy and participated in the Congress Working Committee meetings of 1 May, 25 May, 2 June, and in the AICC meetings of 14 and 15 June.

Gandhiji put aside his principled objection to partition and enjoined on Congressmen to close ranks and fall behind Congress in accepting partition. At the AICC session on 14 June Gandhiji explained:

> Our constitution permits it and your duty demands it that if you feel that the Working Committee is in the wrong you should remove it, you should revolt and assume all power. You have a perfect right to do so, if you feel that you have the strength. But I do not find that strength in us today. If you had it I would also be with you and if I felt strong enough myself I would, alone, take up the flag of revolt. But today I do not see the conditions for doing so.

The acceptance of partition by the Congress and Gandhiji was the culmination of a long and arduous period during which all the major leaders of the Congress tried very hard to counter the League’s concerted attempts to create communal violence and prevent agreement on the issue of united India. While the early months of the year saw Nehru and Patel dealing with the League’s stalling tactics endorsed by the British government, Gandhiji toured the riot-affected areas of Noakhali and Bihar. He tried to provide a healing balm to the victims of both Hindu and Muslim communal violence. His efforts and methods were widely reported and debated.

64 M.K. Gandhi to Prabhavati Narayan, 30 June 1947, Part 2, Chapter 26, Document No. 73.

Nehru appealed to Gandhiji when the latter was in Noakhali: ‘But I have an overwhelming feeling that vital decisions are being made and will be made in Delhi affecting the whole of our future as well as of course the present, and your presence at such a moment is necessary.’ Gandhiji acceded to his request subsequently but explained his position: ‘But I proceed the other way. I had learnt when still a child the formula, “As in the microcosm, so in the macrocosm.”’

While Gandhiji’s efforts were heroic, their impact was limited, as even his disciples accepted. Hindu refugees were slow to return to their villages or cast off fear. Muslims in turn continued to be hostile to him in Noakhali and elsewhere. His critics commented on the futility of his method of non-violence and the politics of change of heart. Even some of his own colleagues felt his kind of politics had not yet thrown up a strategy that could counter communal frenzy. Taking off from the Noakhali tragedy the Hindu Mahasabha time and again called upon Hindus to rise to their own self-defence.

Gandhiji’s tour in Bihar and Noakhali not only reflected his efforts at combating communalism with weapons of non-violence and ‘satyagraha’ but also the feelings of fear and distrust that were mutual to both the communities. Complaints of Hindus in Noakhali and Muslims in Bihar were alike and the politics of communalism permeated every aspect of human life, including relief and rehabilitation work, as refugee camps turned into centres of further propaganda and hate speech. Amidst all of this, there were also a small crop of nationalists, both among Hindus and Muslims, who had stood the test of time, braving personal loss and treachery by their colleagues.

Ample documents cover Gandhiji and his struggle against Hindu communalism, especially in Bihar. The success of Muslim League’s Direct Action in Calcutta and Noakhali further strengthened Hindu communal forces as some Hindus came to feel the need to organize on communal lines. The Bihar riots were an example of this politics of reaction, which left 4300–7000 killed, according to one estimate.

The Bihar riots are sometimes perceived as having marked the communalization of Congress on Hindu lines. In reality, the ministry was secular and only some individual Congressmen were affected by communal sentiment and prejudice. Gandhiji insisted on an enquiry commission and on staying in Bihar, despite murmurs that his doing so would reflect poorly on the functioning of the Congress ministry and the image of individual Congressmen. His presence acted as a catalyst to the Congress ministry, despite differences with them on many issues. The simple peasants of Bihar accepted him as their conscience, which helped them along the path of repentance.

If we look at the challenge posed by Hindu communal forces, we find that it took two forms, majority assertion and minority fears. The first could be repressed sternly. But insecurity of minorities demanded something more than assurances. Hindu communal elements pressurized the Congress to place the interests of Hindus first and function as a Hindu body. After the creation of Pakistan on the basis of the two-nation theory it was not surprising that the demand for a Hindu rashtra, a Hindu state, became more strident.

Even before the creation of Pakistan, Hindu communal organizations sensed an opportunity when in some places ordinary Hindus moved away from support to the Congress. This was largely because the policies of the Congress were perceived by some sections as anti-Hindu.
One grievance was that Hindu rioters were selectively targeted for repression by the Congress ministries of UP and Bihar. Another grievance was that ministries continued pro-Muslim policies of the British government such as employment of greater proportion of Muslims in services.77

The Hindu Mahasabha was heartened by the predicament the Congress found itself in—namely, facing the challenge of creation of Pakistan and the spread of communal sentiment within its own ranks. This opened up the threat of Hindu communal elements effecting an ideological shift in the Congress. The question posed to the Congress was why it continued to ‘sacrifice the Hindus for these handful of so-called nationalist Muslims’, who in any case were not loyal to the country.78

The demand then was for Congress to accept it was a Hindu, not a national, body. Interestingly, this was the same as the position of the government, that the Congress should accept that it was a caste Hindu body. Congress leaders had refused to do so, recognizing this was an issue of legitimacy of its national character, not one of pragmatism as made out by those who argued for this.

Once Pakistan was announced, the Hindu Mahasabha called for ‘effective steps to build up a real and powerful Hindu State’.79 In the months after Independence this demand was raised with greater clamour but firmly opposed. Patel spoke eloquently of how ‘the state must exist for all irrespective of caste and creed’.80 Congress leaders knew that a Hindu state would be the real prize for communal forces. This would amount to accepting the two-nation theory, which the Congress had not agreed to even while it saw the creation of Pakistan as unavoidable in the given circumstances. This demand by the Hindu communal forces for a Hindu state was later linked with their call to murder Gandhiji and Nehru who were seen as opposing it.

The relationship between the Congress and the Hindu communal elements was a complex
one. At an individual level, there were failings but not so in the case of party, state governments, and at the level of the centre. The story was one of the Congress standing its ground and demonstrating resilience and optimism.

The chapters on communalism in the provinces include documents detailing communal ideology as well as communal outbreaks in some selected provinces. Punjab and Bengal, being the ‘scene of action’, are the provinces which generally receive maximum academic attention.
However, the documentation of communalization in provinces other than these two, like

only to the two provinces partitioned in 1947. Communal ideology, more than rioting, had spread widely across regions and areas of public activity and concern.

For the Muslim League, this year saw a new kind of politics—the ‘civil disobedience’ movements in Punjab, NWFP, and Assam. Documents pertaining to these movements have been put together as part of the stories of these provinces which were seen as constituents of putative Pakistan and were hence conflict zones.

This agitation saw an organized Muslim League attack on non-communal ministries led by Congress and its allies. These ministries had been formed after the provincial elections of 1946. However, since these areas were seen as parts of future Pakistan, the Muslim League operated with an urgency to assert its political hold over them. This urgency was exacerbated after HMG’s 20 February 1947 statement was issued. In this statement, the possibility of multiple successors to British authority was envisaged for the first time. It was stated that HMG would demit power by June 1948 to a central authority if all communities reached a compromise but should that not occur, it would consider transfer of power to provincial authorities.

With its leaders in jail and its anti-government stand, these movements were manifestations of the extent to which the Muslim League was able to mobilize its supporters for mass action. As one activist put it, it was an exciting time for Muslim League followers as their leaders were going to jail for the first time. The League’s direct action in Punjab and NWFP came as a surprise to many, including Congress leaders, given Jinnah’s pursuit of constitutional methods till mid-1946. Nehru believed the League leaders were far too reactionary, and being landlords, opposed to social change, to dare to indulge in any form of direct action. Sapru, the Liberal statesman, was of the view that Jinnah could not resort to direct action. Jayakar, in turn, quoted Patel that Congress could create more trouble than Jinnah’s 100 mullahs. 81

The ministries which the League movements sought to overthrow or besiege were those of the Unionists-Congress-Akalis in Punjab and Congress in Assam and NWFP. These ‘movements’ symbolized opposition to non-communal groupings and were, therefore, communal movements in terms of their immediate actions, interpretations, and undertones. The rhetoric and sharp opposition to coalition or Congress ministries was expressed in the pro-Muslim League press, for example, Dawn, and it fed into the communal atmosphere of the time.

In Punjab, the ‘civil disobedience movement’ tied in with the communal rioting which started on 4 March 1947, a day after the Coalition Ministry resigned from office. The large-scale rioting rapidly overtook rural and urban areas of the province. The demand for a Muslim League ministry remained unfulfilled since the Governor refused to form a communal ministry amidst widespread communal rioting. Section 93 regime or Governor’s rule was imposed once the caretaker government resigned on 5 March. The attempts to form a ministry on the part of the Muslim League continued without success. After this, Punjab saw continual rioting till it was partitioned. The documents in this section detail the complex environment of political negotiations and widening communal tensions.

In the case of NWFP, to begin with, at stake was the religious status of a girl whose Sikh husband was killed in the Hazara disturbances and who later married a Muslim. When she wished to return to being a Sikh, the League gave the call of Islam in danger. The target of the agitation was the Congress Premier in whose residence she had sought refuge.\textsuperscript{82} Pir Sahib of Manki Sharif, the League leader, gave a clarion call to all Muslims to oppose the government.\textsuperscript{83} Around March, the Khudai Khidmatgar movement picked up momentum, opposing the agitation of the League. Later they pursued the demand of ‘Pathanistan’ as an option in the referendum.\textsuperscript{84} On the other hand, the League’s agitation went on for two months followed by more arrests.\textsuperscript{85} The Congress consistently complained against Governor Caroe who was clearly pro-League but to little avail.\textsuperscript{86} The League ‘movement’ reached a feverish pitch just before the announcement of the referendum and vitiated the atmosphere completely.

In Assam,\textsuperscript{87} the issue of migrants from East Bengal and their settlement had been a matter of dispute since the decade of the 1920s. With the Cabinet Mission scheme of Grouping and the Muslim League’s desire to have Assam in Pakistan as a contiguous area of Muslim majority, the provincial Muslim League increased its activity in Assam, riding on the issue of eviction of migrants. It criticized the drive to evict illegal immigrants, mostly Muslim, as communally motivated and blamed the government for the sad plight of immigrants. It had a good following in the districts of Dhubri, Nowgong, and Tezpur, where it could easily mobilize from the large Muslim settlements and also from the neighbouring districts of Bengal. Giving the call for a civil disobedience movement, the method of Leaguers and Muslim National Guards was to publicly intimidate authorities through large gatherings and mass mobilization and deter any official procedure of eviction or arrest of any leader. Patel tried his best to salvage the situation by responding to the frantic call of the Assam Premier for military aid. He also wrote to Wavell in order to place the matter on official record.

The documents relating to these Muslim League agitations have been placed together because of the nature of these struggles. The demonstrations, picketings, processions, public meetings, and mass arrests were weapons borrowed from the Congress armoury. The word ‘civil disobedience’ is a term of self-description used in Muslim League newspapers and by Muslim League leaders for this agitation, again taken from the Congress lexicon.

The direct action or civil disobedience movement in Punjab led to the downfall of the coalition ministry in the midst of and followed by violence. This was the context of the Congress Working Committee's 8 March resolution.\textsuperscript{88} Nehru explained to the Viceroy that if Muslims could not be coerced, non-Muslims could not be coerced either.\textsuperscript{89} In the wake of the Rawalpindi riots, by the end of March 1947, the Governor could see clearly that the Sikhs preferred partition of the province to Muslim domination. On 2 April, Central Legislative Assembly members told Nehru that partition was the only solution.\textsuperscript{90} On 27 April, Baldev Singh, Defence member in the Interim Government, stated that the only solution was an immediate division of Punjab.

In Bengal, the demand for partition of Bengal emerged from Hindus’ distrust of the Chief Minister after the riots in Calcutta and Noakhali in August and October 1946 respectively.\footnote{Part 1, Chapter 21, Document No. 47.} The Viceroy thought that the partition of provinces would reveal the limits of Pakistan and tried to convince Jinnah to this effect. Jinnah, on the other hand, saw the demand for partition of provinces as a bluff by Congress. In his meeting with the Viceroy on 8 April 1947, Jinnah tried to make a case against the partition of these provinces in the name of the inviolability of the cultural unity of Bengalis and Punjabis.\footnote{Mountbatten’s interview with Jinnah, 8 April, 1947, \textit{TOP}, Vol. X, 1981, p. 159.} Mountbatten’s reply was that Jinnah’s arguments about Bengali and Punjabi culture applied even more to the whole of India and were so convincing that he was all for revising his ideas about the partition of India. This really drove the old gentleman quite mad, in Mountbatten’s words. In the words of the Viceroy, Jinnah demanded his Pakistan be made viable and threatened to demand the partition of Assam.\footnote{Part 1, Chapter 15, Document No. 17.}

The situation—as Nehru understood it—was that if Punjab and Bengal do not come into the Constituent Assembly, while some parts of these provinces do, then it implied partition of Punjab and Bengal. This is how Nehru explained the decision of the Congress to demand the partition of the two provinces to Gandhiji.\footnote{24 February 1947, Part 1, Chapter 5, Document No. 5.} The division of provinces was the only answer to Pakistan as demanded by Jinnah.\footnote{Jawaharlal Nehru to M.K. Gandhi, 25 March 1947, \textit{SWJN}, 2nd series, Vol. 2, pp. 77–8.} Later, Nehru quipped to Asaf Ali that obviously the two-nation theory was not meant to be applied in Punjab and Bengal.\footnote{14 May 1947, Part 1, Chapter 16, Document No. 7.} Actually, Nehru had anticipated the likelihood of a partition of Bengal and Punjab as early as 1945: ‘If Pakistan is given, then parts of Punjab and Bengal, where the Hindu population is in a majority, will join Hindustan and both the Punjab and Bengal will have to be divided.’\footnote{Speech at Lahore, 26 August 1945, \textit{SWJN}, 2nd Series, Vol. 14, 1981, p. 165.}

Opposed to the demand for partition was the campaign for United Bengal, begun by Suhrawardy, the League Chief Minister of Bengal, and supported by the Viceroy.\footnote{Part 1, Chapter 9 (B), Document No. 10; Part 1, Chapter 21, Document Nos 5, 20, 45, 55.} Nehru was against it, as he feared United Bengal would later ally with Pakistan. Patel said it was a trap to entice the naïve into the Muslim League parlour.\footnote{Part 1, Chapter 21, Document No. 53.} Sarat Bose, Congress leader from Bengal, was of the view that behind the demand for partition was Hindu Mahasabha support and the sentiments of Hindus against Suhrawardy’s government since the Calcutta riots. Sarat Bose warned Patel that future generations would condemn the Congress for supporting division.\footnote{Part 1, Chapter 21, Document No. 57.}

Gandhiji was against partition on any account. He, therefore, saw a ray of hope in the United Bengal scheme, as it would question the two-nation theory. When faced with the apprehension of non-Muslims about Muslim domination, Gandhiji demanded that Suhrawardy convince the Hindus of his sincerity.\footnote{Part 1, Chapter 21, Document No. 57.} However, this did not happen till August 1947, when Suhrawardy needed Gandhiji more than Gandhiji needed him (to ensure the protection of Calcutta Muslims).\footnote{Part 2, Chapter 35 (A), Document No. 12.}
But the possibility of a united Bengal began to recede when its limits became apparent. K.C. Neogy, Congress member of the Constituent Assembly from Bengal, warned Patel that large sums were being spent to purchase votes for unity.\(^\text{103}\) P.B. Mukherji spoke of legislators being bribed.\(^\text{104}\) For Gandhiji, impure means tainted the end of unity for him. He said at his prayer meeting that he could no longer support United Bengal as it had been brought to his notice that votes were being bought by its proponents.\(^\text{105}\) Another weakness of the independent Bengal scheme was that it was a way of bringing in Pakistan through the backdoor. A letter calling upon ‘Muslim Bengal’ to sacrifice for the cause tellingly referred to United Bengal as Azad Pakistan.\(^\text{106}\)

By the end of May 1947, there was already division within the League in Bengal and the matter was referred to Jinnah who came out against Independent Bengal. On 9 June 1947, All India Muslim League Council accepted the 3 June Plan, which included partition of Bengal, though making it a point to say it was not in favour of the partition of the province but accepted it as part of the plan as a whole.\(^\text{107}\)

The Viceroy’s stance was in the end crucial as he was the one who would include unity or partition of Bengal in the plan being formulated. While the plan sketched on 10 April 1947 included partition of Punjab and Bengal, by 1 May 1947 provinces were first allowed to opt for independence, then a week later for partition. However, when shown these draft proposals, Nehru expressed his apprehensions about likely Balkanization in the proposed schedule of successor states first separating and then coming together. The Viceroy then moved away from providing the option of independence, as he was of the view that if the British fell foul of Congress, it would be impossible to continue to run the country.\(^\text{108}\)

On 20 June 1947, Bengal legislators voted for partition of Bengal, 58 for, 21 against. Support to demand for partition of provinces by Congress did not prove to be an answer to the demand of Pakistan, as was hoped. Worse, it opened the Congress to the charge of giving in to Hindu communal sentiments. Curzon must be chuckling in his grave, remarked the Bengal Governor to the Viceroy, referring to the Congress opposition to partition in 1905.\(^\text{109}\) Having been proved powerless to change the state of affairs in Bengal, the Congress had no alternative to offer to those who argued that partition was the only solution in the context of a communal League government in Bengal. Gandhiji pointed out the dangers of forsaking the principle of unity, even if only tactically. For him, undivided India had to be upheld without any compromise.

Given the impending departure of the British, the politically sensitive areas were the territories contested by the Muslim League and Congress—namely Bengal, Punjab, NWFP, and Assam. The situation was very complex and became messier as the momentum towards division gathered pace. Alternative political imaginings were at hand, be they in the form of United Bengal or Pathanistan.

For instance, in NWFP, the Governor claimed that if an election was held, the Congress would win but if a referendum was held, the Muslim League would win. This was because the election was about the issue of governance whereas being part of India or not was a question complicated by the existence of a political strand favouring independence. In the NWFP referendum, a demand for giving three choices—India, Pakistan, Pathanistan—was put forth. Pathanistan was sought to be used as a counter to Pakistan once it became clear that the province could not be part of India. Pathan autonomy and independence in a free Pathanistan as against assured Punjabi domination in Pakistan was the primary demand—an idea which continues to have currency. But the ruling out of the independence option in Bengal precluded its acceptance in NWFP.

Assam’s reaction to the 3 June Plan was complex. There seems to have been general relief at the final rejection of the Cabinet Mission scheme since that would have entailed grouping with Bengal. In Sylhet, the League began to mobilize the Muslim National Guards on the grounds that the referendum could not be held fairly under the provincial Congress ministry in Assam. The documents selected in this volume provide accounts of these processes of political mobilization as well as the politics around the referendum. Accounts of protests, counter protests, rigging, and rioting indicate how the referendum was vitiated by communal politics and also ended up reinforcing it.

In Punjab, after the elections of 1946, some amount of negotiations between Akalis and the Muslim League had been carried out with a possible coalition in mind. This had been unsuccessful and Akalis joined with Unionists and the Congress to form a coalition ministry. The Governor of Punjab, even till late May 1947, was advocating a Muslim–Sikh compromise as the only logical solution to Punjab’s problems. However, the Muslim League agitation against the Ministry alienated the Sikhs and undercut the chances of any settlement. The Sikh demand for a separate non-Muslim province in Punjab became more determined—though doubts beset Akali leaders about their position in a separate non-Muslim Punjab to be demarcated by a boundary commission. Hence, appeals were made to the Viceroy to keep Sikh interests in mind while etching the boundary line and faith was pinned on the sentence in the 3 June statement which declared that factors other than population would also guide the drawing of the boundary. The Sikhs hoped that property, religious places, revenue, and interests in canal colonies would be taken into account in their favour. All this added to the fluidity of the political situation.

The chapter on Boundary Commissions covers the setting up of commissions to demarcate partitioned areas and their mode of operation. The Census of 1941 was taken as the base and population was the criterion for demarcation. The documents span the debate over the unit of territory that was to be taken for demarcation—the village or the thana—and the politics behind it. In the course of demarcation of territory, rivers and shrines were also taken into consideration along with population. The documents carry extensive memoranda from different communities and entities expressing their concerns to the commissions.
The entire operation was both botched and rushed, with the inept handling of the Chairman, Radcliffe, immortalized in the poem ‘Partition’ by W.H. Auden.114 Delaying announcement of the Boundary Commission awards to a period after the date of independence compounded the chaos and mayhem as many a village and town did not know which side of the border it was on. People found themselves on the wrong side of the border on 15 August 1947—flags of both India and Pakistan were flown in regions contested by both communities, Muslim and Hindu.

However, this story of the colonial–national–communal conflict does not exhaust the diverse themes covered by the documents selected in the first two parts of these volumes. The documents also span the themes of the Constituent Assembly, Indian Independence Bill, minorities, refugees, volunteer bodies, and princely states.

Like independence and partition, and other related institutions like the Commonwealth, Constituent Assembly is again not a routine annual occurrence but special to 1947. It came into being only in December 1946, since when it was a bone of contention between the Congress and the Muslim League, with the League dismissing it as unrepresentative and the Congress demanding that the League join or else quit the Interim Government. Gandhiji’s perspective was somewhat different from that of his colleagues. In his view, the Constituent Assembly should not function under British auspices; it should be convened when Congress has the strength to convene it for the whole country.115

A major issue with regard to the Constituent Assembly was one of representation, a need which was accentuated since it had sovereign powers and functioned as the Legislative Assembly upon transfer of power till new elections could be held and a new government setup. Second, the major concern was the future shape of the Indian polity, to decide which the initial debates and discussions were held in the Assembly. The nature of Centre–state relations in future India was also a much-debated issue in the Assembly, reflecting concern with the autonomy of provinces and the extent of central powers.116 As a result, diverse groups and communities sought representation in this assembly. This anxiety related to representation is another facet which makes this year different. The imminence of freedom and sovereignty elicited demands for representation and claims to minority or other kinds of special status by many groups and communities. In this sense it can be said that the Constituent Assembly was, in this period at least, a political body and not merely a forum for drawing up of the constitution by experts.

A detailed selection from the debates on fundamental rights has been included in the volume since the issues continue to be of relevance today. For instance, the discussions regarding the right to practise religion as a fundamental right flow from an anxiety to reassure the minorities about the secular credentials of the state. The committees which discussed these issues displayed a fascinating diversity of opinion on the nature and terms of safeguards to be provided for minorities.

The debate on abolition of zamindari in the Constituent Assembly in the volume has been included for the diversity of political and ideological strands which it represents. Abolition was opposed by pointing out the developmental work undertaken by zamindars. At the other end of the spectrum were Nehru and other socialists who had been demanding abolition of zamindari and nationalization for many years as measures necessary to start the economic reconstruction of free India.

If K.M. Panikkar from Bikaner defended the zamindari system, Hasrat Mohani demanded that provinces of free India be made ‘republics’—the Constituent Assembly, in the period covered in this volume, appears to have been a political arena wherein the contemporary political issues and political ideologies found expression.

Constituent Assembly debates have been presented unedited to preserve the unity of the documents and to give the reader a sense of the complex process of constitution making. Splitting sessions under thematic heads has been avoided consciously so as to preserve the thread of the debates.

The structure of the committees and sub-committees appointed by the Constituent Assembly must be explained so that the context of the different memoranda may become clear. The Constituent Assembly of India appointed committees to look into matters holding vital importance for the future polity of India. As such, separate committees were appointed to look into the framing of the Constitution for the Union and the provinces, minority rights, fundamental rights, and so on. Committees which dealt with more than one subject, such as the Advisory Committees on Fundamental Rights, Minorities, and others, then appointed sub-committees to go into each individual subject. Thus, a sub-committee on minority rights was appointed to report on the nature of minority safeguards recommended for free India. Each of the committees as well as sub-committees held their meetings and debated these vital issues.

In the period which this volume covers, only a few reports were tabled in the Constituent Assembly for discussion, like the Union Constitution Committee’s interim report, the report of the sub-committee on minorities, and so on. All these reports were placed before the Constituent Assembly and were discussed clause by clause, wherein many amendments were suggested and dealt with. The selection of documents presented here is both from the proceedings of the Constituent Assembly as well as from the papers of its committees and sub-committees.

The selected documents point out the concerns of different communities regarding their minority status. It is interesting to note that no one community was a minority—in fact Hindus and Muslims both had a minority status depending on their location. In Bihar the minority community implied Muslims whereas in Punjab, Hindus and Sikhs were the minority.

The chapters on minorities and displaced populations in the volume cover not just religious minorities; recognizing the fluid nature of the term ‘minority’, any group/community that formed the smaller section of the population in an area has been included—such a group may not have been a religious community in every instance.

Furthermore, (religious or other) groups such as Nagas, Jains, Depressed Classes, and Scheduled Castes claimed minority status on demographic grounds—a claim noteworthy because it sought to alter the basis of minority status, from religious to primarily demographic. Different communities and groups, such as Adivasis, Catholics, Gurkhas, claimed minority status.
status keeping in mind different entitlements. This was behind the representations that such groups made before the Constituent Assembly for minority status.

These minority populations were very often also the ones being displaced on account of communal rioting. Refugee camps and other means of rehabilitation were also started in this period which have been documented in these volumes.

Apart from the chapters exclusively on minorities and displaced populations, chapters on communalism in provinces too have documents on this theme.\textsuperscript{120}

The documents selected for the chapters on volunteer bodies\textsuperscript{121} detail the growth and expansion of many such organizations affiliated to political parties in Bombay, Sindhu, Orissa, Punjab, NWFP, and other provinces. The overall increase in their membership and activity is unmistakable. While, on the one hand, this growth signifies the deepening of communal tendencies, on the other, it also signifies a leaning towards violent methods for political ends. The increase in the membership of Rashtriya Swayamsevak Sangh (RSS) and Muslim League National Guards (MLNG) in this period is linked to the increasing communalization of arenas close to the daily life of people. In Punjab, the involvement of RSS volunteers in refugee rehabilitation increased its popularity. The MLNG were at the forefront of the Muslim League–led ‘civil disobedience’ campaigns in Punjab, NWFP, and Assam. The growth of MLNG led to attempts at formation of Hindu Guards in UP. Similarly, Red Shirts, who operated on a nationalist, not communal platform, were involved in political activities in the NWFP. Most of these developments added to the prevailing communal tensions. The details of the membership and activity of these bodies have primarily come from fortnightly reports from the governments of the provinces.

Selected documents unravel the process of the making of the Indian Independence Act\textsuperscript{122} passed by British Parliament of the United Kingdom on 20 July 1947 and the outcome of a consultative process involving the major parties, the Congress and the League. Some of their suggestions were incorporated in the draft. The strategic and military interests of the British, as in the case of Andaman and Nicobar Islands, had to be balanced against the opposition of the Congress to their being British bases. The term ‘independence’ was objected to by Churchill on the grounds that power was to be transferred on the basis of dominion status.

The princely states, comprising almost one-third of the area of the subcontinent, were vassal states and were administered through State Agencies and Residents in clusters. Comprising an entire section, the chapters on princely states (Part 2, Section IV) carry a diverse range of documents highlighting primarily how different states became part of the changes happening in provincial British India, whether it be popular peasant agitation, working class movements, communalism, or politics of partition. The documents highlight the movements for responsible government in the princely states, the representation of the princely states in the Constituent Assembly, and accession to the Unions.

In the princely states, the movement for responsible government gathered momentum with the imminence of freedom. The peoples’ movements pressed for democratization of their domains. It is in this context that the All India States People’s Conference (AISPC) sought to consolidate the widespread streams of resistance in the states.

\textsuperscript{120} Part 2, Chapter 35.
\textsuperscript{121} Part 1, Chapters 10 and 24 and Part 2, Chapter 37.
\textsuperscript{122} Part 2, Chapter 28.
These movements met with stiff resistance from the princes. Some states’ rulers were visionaries and guided their people towards responsible government. But most princes were reactionary and stood as a solid wall blocking the path of political progress. With the paramount power receding, one would have expected the princes to see the writing on the wall. But this was rarely the case. Some even saw the end of paramountcy as a return to pre-paramountcy, that is, to sovereignty, refusing to recognize the altered nature of the reality.\footnote{123 Part 2, Chapters 40, 41, 42, 43, and 44.}

The issue of representation is another aspect of the political developments in the princely states. Different political groups, be it rulers or people, sought representation in the Constituent Assembly, the forum through which they could participate in the formulation of the future polity. The Chamber of Princes agreed to accept the Cabinet Mission Plan conditionally. However, even this Chamber of Princes did not have all the princes as its members. In fact, the big seven states had kept out, which together were entitled to 38 seats in the Constituent Assembly. The AISPC pointed out this basic flaw and questioned its \textit{locus standi} as the representative body of princes. Its conditional acceptance of the Cabinet Mission Plan and dilly-dallying with joining the Constituent Assembly was criticized in the press. Representatives of different states began to raise their demand for greater representation, citing big population, importance of the state, and so on, as reasons. Then, there were also internal dissensions within the Chamber, as many diwans and high officials within the states were looking to the Congress with an eye on appointments abroad.

Representation in the Constituent Assembly culminated in the accession of the princely states to the Unions of India and Pakistan. However, this was not before many of the bigger states like Travancore and Hyderabad tried their best to negotiate their freedom outside both the proposed new dominions and maintain treaty relations on essential subjects with both Britain and the upcoming dominions. Eventually only accession to two unions took place as demanded by the Congress and its stand on the accession of Hyderabad and Travancore was accepted on the whole.

Broadly the chapters map the long and winding road that was taken to bring these states into the Union of India and Pakistan.

With impending freedom, communities of various kinds demanded recognition and representation. This was not only about fighting for loaves as often suggested. Many issues which were kept on the backburner—for instance, class—during the course of the freedom struggle now came to the fore with the end of colonialism. Hence, issues related to caste, labour, or agrarian relations acquired salience. This did not just involve positioning for better or more territory and resources. These issues had been there earlier too but were coming to the fore now, as was the question of zamindari. With British rule ending, the emergence of a new polity involved both fashioning of a new constitution and restructuring old institutions. This was part of the process of political churning which the old and new both had to go through.

The selection of documents in Part 3 also covers a range of issues related to the society and economy, ranging from division of assets and institutions to debates about the form and direction of society, politics, economy, the role of the state, governance, and so on.
The chapter on peasant movements\textsuperscript{124} mostly covers the struggles of peasants and workers which were not against the departing imperialist power, but against feudal landowners and princely despots.

Some of the main movements were the Tebhaga, Telengana, and Warli revolts. The demand of the Tebhaga movement was, quite literally, for two-thirds of the produce, plus storing paddy in the bargadar’s (sharecropper) storeroom. The Tebhaga struggle was special because of the participation of women and peasants from both Hindu and Muslim communities. Gandhiji lent support to the movement but warned against use of compulsion and violence. A massive struggle of the Warlis erupted in Western India under the banner of the Kisan Sabha and the Communist Party. Warli tribals were caught in the landlord–moneylender–official nexus and suffered forced debt, slavery, and sexual exploitation. In the course of the movement, the Congress ministry was charged by the Communists with being soft on the zamindars, jungle contractors, and other intermediary elements and repressive against the peasants. The repression against the Telengana movement was most severe in Nalagonda in the state of Hyderabad. Martial law lasted for two months and untold miseries were unleashed by police authorities. The Punjab Kisan Morchas were the result of years of work by the Kisan Sabhas among the peasants in resistance to zamindars and communalism in western Punjab. A Kisan Sabha movement was organized in Karnataka in which activists were targeted and extermed as ‘goondas’ by the reserve police and Section 144 was enforced across the state. This is also the period when the Hind Kisan Sabha was formed which aimed for an agrarian revolution.

This chapter carries a cache of documents highlighting a lesser-known agrarian conflict between Mirasdars and Adi-Dravidas in Tanjore and jagirdars’ onslaught on tenants in Patiala.

The chapter on working class movements\textsuperscript{125} focuses largely on wages, working conditions, taxes, and legislation. It carries accounts of workers’ strikes across the country as well as the different raids, arrests, and repressive measures against the Communist Party of India (CPI) and its allied organizations. The CPI presented the string of arrests of Communists as a sort of witch hunt against the party by the Congress. When the question was raised in the Constituent Assembly, Sardar Patel defended government action stating that the searches and arrests were in connection with a case of stolen defence documents and that appropriate procedure was being followed. In contrast to Communist–Congress clashes was a strike in Kanpur where Communists and Congressmen together led the agitation, which is covered by the documents in this selection.

Apart from this, the Communist Party published elaborate comments on other labour issues in the year such as the Industrial Disputes Bill. The All India Trade Union Congress celebrated the 25th year of its formation. In 1947, Sardar Vallabhbhai Patel set up the Indian National Trade Union Congress.

The chapter includes documents which highlight trade union politics embedded in party rivalries. Further, it provides accounts of numerous workers’ agitations and formation of unions in various industrial units, including in distant areas.

\textsuperscript{125} Part 3, Chapter 48.
Nationalism, colonialism, and communalism continued to shape societal developments in the post-independence era. Documents in the category of society in transition have been clubbed under the sections of caste, language, and politics; education and politics; linguistic provinces; religious and social practices; position of women; and cultural expressions.

One of the major movements was against ordering of public spaces along caste lines. A number of temples were opened up to ‘Harijans’ in South India as well as across the country. Most of these temple-entry movements were led by progressive associations from within the Scheduled Caste community. Then, there were others where Congressmen led such movements. The reaction from the upper caste community was mixed. In UP, in some places resolutions were forwarded to the AICC against the temple entry of Harijans. On the other hand, a prominent figure in Maharashtra went on a fast unto death in support of temple entry.

Documents on this theme indicate that the Congress organization and particularly Gandhiji were in correspondence with many of these organizations and movements. Most petitions, letters, and resolutions were copied to the Congress President or the AICC. The Harijan Sevak Sangh had already been active in this area, initiating self-educating and self-supporting institutions, such as community weaving centres. This met with applause as well as criticism from the organizations of Scheduled Castes. Several caste organizations began to work for material improvement in coordination with the government for scholarships, jobs, housing, and so on. There was emphasis on education informed by the Gandhian perspective, which advocated education related to everyday life and to the local economy.

Further, this year saw a major controversy over the national language and the position of Hindi, Urdu, and Hindustani in the new post-independent state. The arena was public spaces such as AIR, public signboards, schools, and so on. While Hindi and Urdu were now seen as languages ‘belonging’ to Hindus and Muslims respectively, Hindustani was preferred as the national language, including by Gandhiji, given the secular character of India and its mixed population. Provincial Congress Committees even adopted Hindustani as their language for correspondence and started preparations for its promotion. However, the conflict between promoters of Hindi and Urdu gradually led to Hindustani taking a backseat. The documents map this crucial debate.

While the debate over the national language assumed some communal overtones, education programmes and establishments too were affected by communalism and partition. The reputed Punjab University, including its famed library, based at Lahore, was partitioned between East and West Punjab. Further, there were battles between colonial, nationalist, and communal positions on this terrain around issues like imparting religious education in schools, use of the Roman script, the position of English language in education, the setting up of a new education system, strikes of primary school teachers in UP and Bengal (specifically in Noakhali), exposure of corruption in education departments, bringing back materials from the India Office in London to India, and the politics of language in literary forms. The last was the predicament of the publishers and editors of Roshni magazine who increasingly received articles in Sanskritized Hindi or Persianized Urdu while their policy was promotion of Hindustani.

Other social issues included removal of illiteracy, eradication of untouchability, abolition of beggary, promotion of inter-caste and inter-community marriages, and promotion of ayurvedic and unani medicine. The battle was on two fronts—to shed colonial elements and promote indigenous practices as well as adopt progressive measures to do away with social ills emanating from economic and social conditions. Hence, there were petitions from women’s organizations for prohibiting practices of bigamy, allowing divorce for Hindus, prohibiting the practice of devadasi, and enquiring into conditions of working women.

With the coming of freedom and the dissolution of the internal administrative boundaries of the colonial state, the demand for reorganization of states along linguistic lines came up. Linked to this was the demand from linguistic minorities for necessary safeguards.\(^{127}\)

Issues like cow slaughter and religious conversions were raised in the context of the safeguarding of religious and cultural practices. Some of these were consequences of the communalization of society at that time. Documents related to these issues are included.\(^{128}\)

This selection has a cache of advertisements for theatre and motion pictures and documents that highlight trends of artistic expression in those days, the role of progressive cultural organizations like Indian Peoples’ Theatre Association, debates on arts and politics, and the representation of communities in cinema.

The chapter ‘Economic Issues and Policies’\(^{129}\) centres around debates on economic policies and problems of the times. A few months before freedom, all eyes were set on the economic future of India and Pakistan. Like everyone else, industrialists had no choice but to opt for either India or Pakistan. The partition endangered economic assets in both countries and this bred anxieties for those industrialists who were unsettled by it. A number of petitions, resolutions, and letters by these industrialists form a section of this chapter.

Another section is based on the private papers of Indian industrialists which reflect their concerns about nation-building. While Indian business classes predicted a prosperous future for India, Pakistan was perceived with pessimism. A question widely debated was whether Pakistan would be a sustainable self-sufficient economy. Papers relating to this debate are a part of this chapter.

Unlike industrialists, zamindars did not look to the future; they were gripped by their privileged present and its protection. Congress had a firm policy of land reforms at hand. Threatened zamindars wrote a number of letters, passed resolutions, and organized protests against the Congress policy, which are carried in this selection.

On 28 February 1947, Liaquat Ali Khan, then the Finance Minister in the Interim Government, presented the budget statement for 1947–48. The budget speech had mixed reactions. It was believed to have targeted the capitalists, who were seen as supporters of the Congress. Liaquat’s speech alleviated the morale of the poor affected by the widespread black-marketing of necessities, inflation, and shortage of food supplies. The Congress criticized the budget, while the Muslim League welcomed it. The press congratulated Liaquat for a pro-poor budget while the business community condemned him for being anti-business. Some of the sharply divided discussion on the subject is carried in these documents.

During the War, the British had ushered in a period of ‘controls’ and food rationing. In 1947, the question was whether ‘controls’ would continue. The year 1947 also brought freedom for the Indian ‘rupee’ from the bondage of British ‘sterling’. A number of writings, mostly by economists, deal with the future of Indian currency. A few weeks before independence, Indian and British leadership were caught in difficult negotiations over settlement of the Sterling Balances due to India from Britain. A number of documents pertaining to these talks figure in this collection.

The documents selected in the chapter on Congress reorganization cover themes such as the future role of Congress; a new constitution for the Congress; factions and indiscipline; Socialists and Congress; and activities of the Congress, such as observance of Independence Day and membership drives.

The primary concern of the party was with its future role. Reorganization had taken a back seat given the involvement of the party in negotiations, in parliamentary work, in the Constituent Assembly and Interim Government, among other things. The Congress organization ended up playing second fiddle to the ‘government’ wing, to the distress of the Congress President. With independence, a change in the form of the party was on the cards to meet the new challenges. It was expected that the party, from being a platform for the anti-colonial movement, would come to represent a distinct ideology and interests. While some saw this as implying the winding up of the grand old party, others, like the General Secretary, Sadiq Ali, initiated a debate on the continued relevance of the organization.

The chapter on the provincial ministries highlights the complex position of the Congress as it held office while being a popular organization working for freedom. This dual role threw up a host of issues, ranging from cooperation and rivalry between different levels of the Congress organization to emerging corruption in administration. There are specific episodes which are covered in some detail.

The Congress Committee in Cochin raised the issue of the betterment of wages of workers with the Congress President, asking him to take it up with the Madras Congress ministry. Among the educated public, a lot of people began to approach the provincial ministries through the Congress President, making demands and highlighting areas of neglect, some with a tone of appeal and others with a note of criticism. The Congress Working Committee tried to address these complaints and memoranda received from various concerned members.

The case of the Madras Premier, T. Prakasam, against whom a no-confidence motion was moved is covered by the documents. So is the case from the Central Provinces and Berar where the Congress Premier publicly stated that given the creation of Pakistan, Muslims who remained behind in India would have no political rights or representation in services. His reference to Dr. Hasan, one of his Cabinet members, in this context, generated controversy, into which Gandhiji was also drawn.

Documents in the section titled Foreign Relations cover themes such as Asian Relations Conference, India's delegation to the United Nations, its position on the question of South Africa, Indonesia, Palestine, and Afghanistan, and independent diplomatic missions to the newly emerging countries. Despite its colonial past and the traumatic events in the domestic sphere, the debut of India in international politics began with the image of India as an independent nation with a promising future. This selection outlines the trajectory of India's foreign policy.
Editor’s Introduction

as Indian leaders tried to maintain a precarious balance between cooperation and critical ideological distance from the power politics of those times.

The Inter-Asian Relations Conference, which was the Congress’ way to declare India’s arrival as a new nation, was received both with criticism and applause. The Muslim League saw this conference as a ploy in what it perceived as a game by the Congress to wrest independence without addressing the Pakistan movement. Nehru, who was at the forefront of this event in Delhi, was seen to be using his best diplomatic abilities in order to demonstrate to the world that there was no fracture within India and that the idea of India was backed by reality. On the other hand, within Congress, this conference sought to widen the discourse of resistance to colonialism and imperialism to a pan-Asian platform. The pan-Asian platform did show some cracks, however, with India inviting Tibet separately, annoying China, which showed its displeasure.

Interesting developments occurred in the French and Portuguese colonies in the subcontinent. The French government became very anxious about the future of its territories in India as 15th August was approaching. In turn the people of the territory of Chandernagore, organized by the Socialist Party, demanded that the fate of the territory be left to its people. This view received sympathy from M. Roux, the French Charge D’ Affaires, who was seen as a defeatist back home. Subbaiah, the leader of the Socialist Party, had distanced himself from the CPI and gone to Pondicherry to study the feasibility of a possible plebiscite. Subbaiah had ruled out the option of merging with the Indian Union because of repression of Communists by Congress governments. He was now in favour of having an independent state which would maintain its relations with France and Hindustan through treaties.

The chapter on foreign relations also carries documents related to the politics of the lesser-known episodes of decolonization such as in Goa—its Portuguese government, the Catholic Church and its influence on Goans, and their linguistic connections with neighbouring provinces—which were given due consideration by Nehru. The chapter carries his letters to the consul in Goa and his emphasis on Goans having the right to decide their future.

For the armed forces, civil services, and police officials, this year began with a lot of anxiety over the uncertainty and delay in getting a political settlement in place. European officials placed in India mostly wanted to return home but could not ascertain what shape their post-retirement careers would take. Officials voiced their difficulties about adapting to the working style of the provincial ministries.

Once the issue of partition and two-nation theory came up, the composition of the services began to be examined in terms of community. It was found that Muslims were heavily represented in the police services. Further, the Muslim League had already clarified that they did not want a unified army, which then set off processes within the military establishment for dealing with this situation. This turned out to be a complicated matter as division on communal lines would mean a very inferior share for the Muslims, a point made to Jinnah by Auchinleck, Ismay, and the Viceroy as well. This aspect also brought the issue of representation of Muslims in the Indian armed forces to the fore.

In the course of enquiring into the communal violence in the provinces, mainly Bengal and Punjab, communal tendencies within the police services also came under the spotlight. The documents in this chapter cover the deliberations on these issues.

The chapter on the future of the Indian National Army (INA) personnel focuses on the release of the INA detainees who had been put on trial at the end of the War. While there was some resistance from the Commander in Chief and the Viceroy, primarily on the grounds of their brutality towards fellow prisoners, there was a remarkable unanimity across the political spectrum in favour of their release, as evidenced in the resolution of the Constituent Assembly. In the course of this debate, the issue of the employment of INA men in responsible positions in administration such as Deputy Collectors came up. On the eve of independence, the government proposed to release INA men too as part of the general jail release programme to mark 15 August.

The impending birth of Pakistan on the basis of the League’s two-nation theory raised several questions about the nature of its polity. Was Pakistan to be a modern, secular, democratic state, or was it going to eschew the ‘western’ form of political organization in favour of a theocratic one, in which Sharia or Islamic laws would become the basis of governance, law, and politics? Similar questions were also raised about the nature of the Indian nation state. While Hindu communal organizations did step up their demand for a Hindu rashtra in the wake of partition, the Congress dismissed all such notions as antediluvian, communal, and against Indian civilizational ethos. Documents relating to these issues have been included in the chapter ‘Future Visions of the Two States’.

The chapter on the national flag comprises primarily the proposals sent to the AICC and carried in newspapers regarding the composition of the flag. These ranged from a collage of different religious and civilization symbols of the subcontinent to being markedly distinct from national flags of other countries. The focus was on a symbol that could stand for all the stories—the new nation, the uniqueness of India, freedom, sovereignty, and its civilizational legacy.

At the same time, there were proposals for the suitable remodification of the Congress flag and also the assertive demand of the Hindu Mahasabha that the only flag suitable for the country was the bhagwa (saffron) coloured flag bearing the lotus base and yellow swastika. There was a debate over the national flag when the symbol of charkha (spinning wheel) was replaced by chakra (wheel). Savarkar, the Hindu Mahasabha leader, explained that this chakra was the Dharma Chakra, and not Ashoka Chakra, reminiscent of the golden epoch of ‘Hindu’ history. The colour white was seen as the ultimate culmination of VIBGYOR and hence symbolic of purity and most suitable for the backdrop of the flag.

The chapter on the flag includes the documents about the National Flag Committees of India and Pakistan and debates in the Constituent Assembly regarding their composition.

Jinnah, who had initially agreed to have the Union Jack on the Pakistan flag, later retracted, saying that it would not be accepted by the people of the country. There was an emphasis on the new flag of Pakistan being appealing to the minorities as well. Eventually, the national flag of Pakistan was inaugurated in the Pakistan Constituent Assembly wherein Liaquat Ali Khan, the future Prime Minister, claimed that the flag stood for liberty and equality of all citizens in Pakistan.

There was discussion on whether people and organizations that were on the ‘wrong side’ of the border could salute the flag of their choice or not. The Congress left it to the people to decide but warned that the hoisting of the Pakistan flag by private institutions would be tolerated only in the initial state of transition.

Eventually, the national flag was introduced in the Constituent Assembly of the Indian Union by Nehru and applauded on an unprecedented scale. The tricolour and the chakra on the white background found resonance with the secular imagination of a country embedded in civilizational values as well as modern attributes of liberty, equality, and fraternity. The Hindu Mahasabha resolved to respect all flags but recommended that ‘real’ Hindus salute only the bhagwa flag and take a pledge to fight for the reunification of India.

As with most events of the year 1947, celebrating 15 August was also very politicized. This volume devotes a chapter to documents wherein different groups and leaders took a stand on the matter, ranging from Congress, Gandhiji, AISPC to Shiromani Akali Dal (SAD) in Punjab. The Hindu Mahasabha declared Independence Day as a day of mourning. Newspapers carried special numbers, with messages from leaders. The midnight session of the Constituent Assembly was held on the night between 14 and 15 August wherein Nehru made his famous ‘tryst with destiny’ speech. The session began with the singing of Vande Mataram and the President’s address. The session met again on the morning of 15 August and received messages of congratulations from countries across the globe. Gandhiji spent the day in Calcutta, fasting and spinning. Political prisoners were released and all major cities held their own public ceremonies to mark the day. Most celebrations on this day acknowledged the reality of partition and passed various resolutions to that effect.

Fifteenth August 1947, then, was an occasion for both mourning and celebration. It marked independence and partition, which in turn reflected the success and failure of the anti-colonial movement. Success in wresting independence, failure in not being able to bring the majority of Muslims into the national movement.

The documents indicate that there was much discussion on the programmes for celebrating independence on 15 August 1947. The President of the Congress was of the view that the people of areas affected by partition and the ensuing violence could not be expected to rejoice on the day when their homes and villages would fall away from them. There were, however, others like Lallan Prasad ‘Insaan’ from Gorakhpur in the UP, who believed that not celebrating the day of hard-earned freedom amounted to a sin. An advocate from NWFP derided the ongoing preparations for celebrating 15 August in the face of widespread devastation and massacres.

various hues in which freedom was visualized become poignantly clear from the documents contained in this chapter. The coexisting experiences of triumph and anguish, the creation of new identities, and the questioning of old ties—the documents in this chapter evoke the multitude of reactions to the dawn of freedom.

A Note on the Organization of the Volume

The organization of the volume is somewhat unusual because the year that it deals with is unlike any other year of the freedom struggle. Nineteen forty-seven was the year of independence and partition. The conflict between communalism, nationalism, and imperialism, culminating in independence and partition, has been dealt with in Parts 1 and 2. In earlier volumes of Towards Freedom, the focus was on nationalist movements and communal politics and peasant and labour movements. Here, these issues pertaining to society, polity, economy, and culture at large, which would occur in any other routine year, have been dealt with in Part 3.

Part 1 is divided chronologically into two sections, with Section I ending on 22 March 1947, the date of arrival of the 'Last Viceroy'. Section II ends on 2 June 1947, after which the countdown to 15 August 1947 is announced by the Mountbatten Award of 3 June. Section I is organized thematically under the broad heads of political developments; communalism at the centre and in the provinces; and volunteer organizations, minorities, and refugees. This thematic pattern is repeated in Sections II and III. In Part 2, Section III covers significant political developments in the period from 3 June 1947 to 15 August 1947. Following that, Section IV is dedicated to princely states across the time period.

As regards the structure of the volume, themes, and not political parties, form the structural divisions. This allows one to demonstrate the diversity and complexity of perspectives on a particular issue. So the documents are organized under the head of labour, class, and movement, and within that the role and the position of the Congress, the Muslim League, and the Communists.

The documents selected present the diversity of political opinions on various issues—at the January 1947 session of the AICC, Jayaprakash Narayan and other socialists disagreed with the Congress decision to accept HMG's 6 December 1946 interpretation of the 16 May 1946 statement of the Cabinet Mission. These reflected the wider differences of political opinion about British policies, nature of British imperialism, and its future intentions.

Another reason for arranging documents theme-wise rather than according to parties is the existence of multiple political parties and formations among Muslims, which a party-wise classification with an attendant focus on the Muslim League would have obscured. Even the Muslim League was not a one-leader party as it is sometimes presented. For example, in Punjab, provincial leadership was a point of contest between Sir Firoz Khan Noon and the Nawab of Mamdot. A letter from Jinnah to Noon about how a certain section of Punjab leaders supported Noon as provincial leader over Mamdot reflects how the party leadership at the national level was aware of internal party differences. Further, at the Bengal end, the divergence between Suhrawardy and Maulana Akram Khan over the former's sovereign Bengal move also points to the fluidity within the Muslim League. In Punjab, the Ahrars, Khaksars, and Jamiat represented interesting strands in the politics of Punjab—the leader of the Jamiat even postulated a different political settlement for India. He advocated equal representation for Hindus and Muslims at the centre as a possible basis for all-India compromise. The Red Shirts movement in NWFP was another political organization with a different ideology. When the 3 June statement announced that a referendum would be held in NWFP to decide its future, the Red Shirts demanded Pathanistan as a third choice in the referendum. The turbulent nature of the politics in that area points to the continued conflicts over questions related to representation even today.

As far as the selection of documents goes, they emanate from both official and non-official sources. Official attitudes are reflected by documents selected from sources like the Home Department, its Political Department in particular, selections from Cabinet Papers and India Office Records in National Archives of India, and Mountbatten Papers. Very often these official documents, particularly the fortnightly reports from each province to the centre, are a valuable source of information on the nationalist, communal, and popular movements. Further, selected published official documents, such as from the Transfer of Power series, have been included where they are integrally linked to the story.

A note of caution is in order about taking what Mountbatten said and wrote at face value, without cross-checking with other sources. His megalomania is well known and informs much of his claims to having single-handedly influenced key political decisions such as the fixing of a time limit for British rule. His official correspondence is usually to be preferred over his periodical ‘Personal Reports’ and interviews, the reports being overly subjective and rather rambling and the records of interviews based on his memory (rather than kept by a secretary present in the room as is official practice), and to top it, tempered with an overweening sense of the self.

A wide variety of newspapers like The Hindustan Times, Dawn, People’s Age, Amrita Bazar Patrika, among others, represent the non-official point of view. Private papers of institutions and individuals like AICC, AISPC, All India Hindu Mahasabha, Jayaprakash Narayan, S.P. Mookerjee, B.S. Moonje, and others, also evince the intricacy of political processes in this period. Further, the numerous instances of individuals voicing their opinions about issues of socio-political and economic importance in their letters and memoranda to various political representatives, institutions, and bodies such as the AICC and the Constituent Assembly illustrate the extent of popular involvement in such matters.

Documents from published collections of primary sources such as Selected Works of Jawaharlal Nehru, Sardar Patel Correspondence, Mohammad Ali Jinnah Papers, Constituent Assembly Debates, and others, have also been selected to make the diversity of perspectives available in one place to the reader. For instance, extracts from Wavell’s journal give a day-by-day account of the political developments in early 1947 and also point out the Viceroy’s often incisive reactions and opinions. Documents have been included relating to the extremely significant issues discussed in the Constituent Assembly and its committees, for instance, fundamental rights and constitutional safeguards, which provide insights into the nature of free India.

Some documents translated from a few issues of newspapers in Hindi and Assamese have been included in a limited way as has some material from the state archives of Bengal, Madras, Delhi, Rajasthan, and Punjab.

Wherever possible, conscious preference has been given to newspaper reports over official ones to bring out diversity of opinion in the public domain. Newspapers often throw up delightful letters to the editor, maps of proposed boundary lines, cartoons with acerbic wit, and quaint advertisements, such as one for a balm, titled ‘freedom from pain’, evidently inspired by the impending freedom of the country.
In some places only extracts have been taken from documents given the vast number of documents that the year 1947 has thrown up. This would be especially true of the voluminous series of documents like the papers of the major political parties and leaders, proceedings of the Constituent Assembly, and memoranda submitted to the Boundary Commission. Sometimes the documents are damaged or incomplete and can only be carried as an extract. The justification is that the principle behind this selection of documents has been not so much to provide the definitive compendium as a comprehensive guide but to indicate to the discerning reader that such a range of documents exists and point to where they may be accessed. Overall, the attempt has been to balance readability with retaining the originality of the documents as found.151

Outline of Part 2

The outline of Part 2 is intended to guide the reader through the documents, unveiling the pattern behind the classification of documents on the overarching themes of communalism, partition, and independence into specific chapters on, for instance, the Constituent Assembly, the Partition Award, Indian Independence Act, partition of Punjab and Bengal, volunteer organizations, minorities and displaced populations, and princely states, their people and their rulers.

Section III

Constituent Assembly

Debates in the Constituent Assembly during the period between 3 June to 15 August revolved around a variety of issues, ranging from the importance of a strong federal centre, to governance in the provinces, to provisions for electing provincial governors, the role of the President in independent India, the rights of minorities, the abolition of untouchability, as well as the future contours of a ruler’s authority in the princely states. With the acceptance of Partition, Jawaharlal Nehru emphasized that a federation with a strong Centre was ‘the soundest framework for our constitution’. He put forward the view that a weak centre at this point would be ‘injurious to the interests of the country’.152

The state of flux in which the Constituent Assembly functioned is represented by the interesting suggestions put forward for future organization of the Indian polity. Maulana Hasrat Mohani of the United Provinces, who had Socialist leanings, proposed that every province should be made a republic, with the head of each Province being called ‘President’ rather than ‘Governor’. He passionately posed the question to the Congress authorities: ‘What right have you got to deprive the provinces of India from aspiring to become republics of the Union of Federal Republics, and not only Federal Republics but Socialist Federal Republics at that?2153 Mohani was wary of the reduction in the autonomy of the provinces and wanted deliberations in the Constituent Assembly on the Constitution of the provinces to follow upon discussions on the Union Constitution, rather than precede them. Nehru dealt with this criticism, arguing that it did not matter which report was discussed first, the one on the Union or that on the provincial Constitutions, as long as both did not work against the spirit of the Objectives Resolution, which had clearly defined the principles on which both provincial and Union Constitutions were to be based.154

There was an interesting discussion, which continues to be of relevance today, on the office of the President in the new constitution being framed. Most members of the Assembly agreed that the President should be non-partisan, indeed, a non-party man, accept no emoluments, and hold himself at a distance from corporate bodies, not accepting directorships of companies, etc.155

A letter from Maulana Hifzur Rahman and Abdul Qaiyum Ansari to the Minorities Subcommittee made the plea that Muslim cultural rights be safeguarded through measures such as appointment of kazis to settle civil disputes amongst Muslims, the institution of a ‘permanent separate portfolio to administer the Muslim waqfs in each province, the appointment of a Muslim judge at the levels of the Provincial High Court and the Supreme Court in the Union, etc. Most significantly, they made the interesting proposition that minority educational institutions be given grants-in-aid and stipends not according to ‘the proportion of the population of any minority’, but rather, ‘in proportion to the backward conditions of the minority concerned’.156

Rajkumari Amrit Kaur held a radical view on the position of minorities in general and in particular that of the Scheduled Castes, one that went against the decision by the Sub-Committee on Minorities. She proposed that with the abolition of untouchability, the very legal existence of the Scheduled Castes was questioned. In her succinct words, ‘Once untouchability is abolished and its practice made a criminal offence, who are the Scheduled Castes?’ She further argued that reservation of seats for a handful of representatives of minorities in the legislatures or the services would ‘not only further weaken the community concerned but will also lower the standards of efficiency and good governance’.157

Another issue that preoccupied the Congress leaders was the visits of the Tribal Area Subcommittee to places like Chhotanagpur to ascertain the wishes of the tribal people. Rajendra Prasad, Jagjivan Ram, and Sachchidananda Sinha were opposed to the suggestion of Jaipal Singh, representative of the Adivasis, that Chhotanagpur be separated from Bihar.158

Partition Award and After

His Majesty’s Government’s statement of 3 June, also known as the Partition Award or Mountbatten Plan, declared that the only solution of India’s constitutional problem lay in dividing the country. However, the statement claimed that there is nothing ‘in this plan to preclude negotiations between communities for an united India’.159

Calling the Mountbatten Plan a ‘watershed dividing the past from the future’ and accepting its proposals in the historic All India Radio broadcast of 3 June, Jawaharlal Nehru commended it to the people ‘with no joy’ in his heart.160 Mohammad Ali Jinnah, in his broadcast, emphasized the need for all communities and especially Muslims, to maintain peace and order. While he was critical of the Plan in some respects, he made public the acceptance of it by the Muslim League.161

In its meeting of 9 June held at Delhi, the Council of the All India Muslim League accepted the 3 June Plan, calling it an advance over the Cabinet Mission proposals of 16 May 1946. Through a resolution passed at the meeting, they also authorized Jinnah to ‘to take all steps and decisions which may be necessary in connection with and relating to the plan’.162

Raghib Ahsan of the Calcutta Muslim League bemoaned the loss of Calcutta and Assam while emphasizing to Jinnah the centrality of obtaining the Excluded Areas of Santhal Parganas, Khasi and Jaintia Hills, Lushai Hills, and Naga Hills, as this would give the Muslim League ‘room for expansion’.163 Indian Muslims in Great Britain welcomed the proposal to partition the country, terming it a vindication of the long struggle of the Muslim League. Despite this, Mr. Saheb Dad Khan, President of the London Branch of the Muslim League, was ‘not quite happy over the details which seem to placate the Hindus’.164

Despite the jubilation witnessed amongst large sections of Indian Muslims, the reality was different at the local and provincial levels. F. Wylie, the UP Governor, in a letter to Mountbatten noted how in the face of impending migration, safeguarding local and personal interests acquired priority for UP Muslims. As a result, he noted how many local League leaders were ‘all smiles’ now and had begun to ‘coo like doves’, observing that ‘Pakistan is of little use to the U.P.’165

At the All India Congress Committee meeting of 14–15 June, the 3 June Plan was put to vote and passed by the majority and the proposals approved. However, this approval came with the hope that ‘when present passions have subsided, India’s problems will be viewed in their proper perspective and the false doctrine of two nations in India will be discredited and discarded by all’.166 Gandhi put forward a spirited defence of the decision of the Working Committee to accept the partition of the country. He pointed out that intense communal polarization of the country had compelled a change in the position of the Congress towards partition. He reminded Congressmen that this decision had been arrived at in circumstances to which everyone had contributed.

An AICC member, Sheelbhadra Yajee, in a resolution sent to Congress President J.B. Kripalani, emphatically rejected the Award, stating that ‘the freedom loving people of India ... cannot tolerate that their fate which affects their whole future should arbitrarily be decided by the British Government as has been done in the latest British announcement. The Socialist leader Jaiprakash Narayan also rejected the Partition Award, proclaiming at a public meeting in Gorakhpur that ‘our future lies only in making the masses of Hindustan realize that the basic problems of food, clothing, wages, etc., are the same, be they in Hindustan or in Pakistan and ... their solution also is one and the same’.

A note to Congress President J.B. Kripalani from Jwala Prasad Singhal, Editor of the J.K. Review, Kanpur, justified the Congress’ acceptance of the 3 June Plan. The Partition Award, according to him, ‘saved non-Muslim populations in the Punjab and Bengal from Muslim tyranny’. He further commented that Muslims in India ‘must not be allowed to form any part of the army, the police, the executive and political services. They may hold property and do trade on terms similar to those permitted to Hindus in Pakistan and no others’.

Sir Tek Chand, a former Judge of the Lahore High Court and a member of the Constituent Assembly, denounced the 3 June Plan for it completed the ‘Balkanization’ of India. He lamented the fact that many who had struggled for independence would now ‘become aliens in their own homeland’, bemoaning the ‘strange irony’ that the sentence ‘Quit India’ ‘has been passed on the faithful children of the soil’ much before it applied to the British.

J.K. Dutt, Principal of S.D. College in Bannu, NWFP, wrote to Congress leader P.D. Tandon calling partition ‘the greatest blunder’ ever, expressing how he was ‘bitterly shocked to find that the Congress ... has at last become a party to the division of India’. Expressing admiration for Jinnah’s political resolve, he squarely placed the blame for partition on the shoulders of Mahatma Gandhi, holding him ‘responsible for the emasculation of Hindus’.

The General Secretary of the Communist Party, P.C. Joshi, criticized the Mountbatten Plan on the count that it was ‘not a real quit-India plan but one that seeks to keep as many economic and military controls in its own hands as possible’, adding prophetically that the ‘British planned partition will not mean peace, but more fratricide immediately’. The Political Resolutions of the Central Committee of the Communist Party of India, stated that the ‘Boundaries Commission and other Commissions dealing with financial and other aspects of division are only intended to worsen Hindu-Muslim-Sikh relations so that the British arbiters can give their awards intensifying the communal conflict still further’.

Despite the Congress’ and the Muslim League’s acceptance of the plan to partition India, there was still considerable opposition to the idea within the ranks of the two bodies. A ‘Delhi Newsletter’ written by A.S.R. Chari in the newspaper People’s Age noted that ‘[w]hile Mr. Jinnah choked all criticism and thus secured overwhelming majority support for the plan, inside the Congress with its strong democratic traditions the process was more difficult’. Chari further noted with prophetic insight how ‘while talking and being desirous of peace’ the leadership on both sides did ‘not really believe that peace is won by this partition’. In fact, he believed that the slogan really was ‘Build your State, rapidly strengthen it so that while you are engaged in the arts of peace you are preparing for the aggression by the other side’. Indignant at Mountbatten’s manoeuvring as evident in the 3 June Plan, Chari made the comment that

[i]t is a shameful fact that everyone has showered compliments on Mountbatten though he has followed the traditional British game of promising every party that it will get final boundaries which are nearer to its heart’s desire. This is probably why everyone is lost in admiration of Mountbatten, for he smiles and talks nicely and is all these to all men. A very successful Viceroy indeed!174

The All-India Hindu Mahasabha condemned the Plan as well as the Congress for betraying the ‘Hindu electorates’ by agreeing to partition the country ‘without a referendum’.175 Third July was observed by the Hindu Mahasabha as a Black Day, a day of protest against the partition, with slogans such as ‘Pakistan means Death’ being raised. Hindu Mahasabha leaders exhorted their followers through pamphlets ‘to defend your mother, brothers & sisters. They are tortured, dishonoured and defiled’.176

On this day, the Mahasabha leader V.D. Savarkar presented a picture of Indian history in which the Muslims were presented as aggressors who defeated the Hindus, who then rose to the challenge. Asserting that the Mahasabha would force ‘the revolting Pakistani areas to get re-annexed to our Central and Sovereign Akhand Hindusthani State’, Savarkar ended with the resolve to ‘Hinduise all politics and militarise Hindudom’.177

Dr. Ambedkar pointed out that the 3 June Plan could make sense only ‘if it was accepted that Pakistan and Hindustan should be homogeneous states. This has, however, not been the basis of partition, as is clear from the fact that neither the Congress nor the Muslim League has stipulated for transfer of population’. He believed that the fixation of the frontiers should have been determined primarily by ‘considerations of facility of defence and administration’.178

The response of the ‘Mother’ of the Shri Aurobindo Ashram, Pondicherry, to the 3 June Plan was one of reflective, measured criticism. In her words, ‘this is not a solution, it is a test, an ordeal which if we live it out in all sincerity, will prove to us that it is not by cutting a country into small bits that we can bring about its unity and its greatness’. Ending her message, she averred that ‘in spite of all, India has a single soul and while we have to wait till we can speak of an India one and indivisible, our cry must be: “LET THE SOUL OF INDIA LIVE FOR EVER”’.179

Interim Government

The relations between Congress and Muslim League members in the Interim Government were strained due to the differences over the reconstitution of the Government, sharing of assets and liabilities, international status of the two countries, and the appointment of a common Governor-General for the two Dominions.

Nine Congress members of the Interim Government sent in their resignations to Mountbatten early in July.180 Congress leaders demanded that the Interim Government should be dissolved so that two governments for India and Pakistan could be established. However, the Muslim League did not accept this proposal and argued that it was a move to deprive them of their share of power in the last few weeks of colonial rule. Liaquat Ali Khan also suspected that this could be the Congress’ way of cornering a greater share of fixed assets for India.

Mountbatten went to great lengths to quell Gandhiji’s fear that the partitioned armies could make war on each other with the departure of the British. He explained how the institution of a Joint Defence Council would ensure that the armies of India and Pakistan would not go to war. He added that, of course, the greatest guarantee for the future peace of the subcontinent lay in both remaining members of the British Commonwealth.

However, the Interim Government was reconstituted in the middle of July after the passage of the Indian Independence Act. A separate Government of India was set up. Nehru appointed his first Cabinet, remarkable for its representation of the diversity of political opinion amongst Indian leaders. In response to Jawaharlal Nehru’s formal invitation of 1 August to Sardar Patel to join the new Cabinet, the latter sent a warm response of affirmation with the telling words, ‘our combination is unbreakable and therein lies our strength’. The main portfolios were distributed among the five members of Liaquat Ali Khan’s first Cabinet for Pakistan, which included I.I. Chundrigar, Abdur Rab Nishtar, Ghazanfar Ali Khan, and Jogendra Nath Mandal apart from Liaquat himself.

Interestingly, Mountbatten’s suggestion that the Pakistan Dominion flag have ‘a Union Jack in the upper canton of the Muslim League flag’ cut no ice with the Muslim League. Jinnah told him that ‘it was his great personal regret that he had been unable to find one single supporter for the idea’ since ‘it would be repugnant to the religious feelings of the Muslims to have a flag with a Christian cross alongside the crescent’. Other similar issues relating to symbols such as the flags of the Pakistan Navy, the Governor-General, the King’s signature, etc., were also discussed at this meeting between the two on 12 July. Indeed, at a meeting on 15 July, Jinnah is said to have told Mountbatten in response to the latter’s entreaties that the Union Jack be hoisted on certain days in Pakistan, ‘Certainly, if you will give me a list of the days on which the Union Jack should be hoisted throughout Pakistan, I will see that it is done’.

At this crucial time of independence from British rule, an important group which also claimed independence from India or Pakistan, were the Nagas. A delegation of Naga leaders travelled to Delhi by air for the express purpose of discussing with leaders such as Gandhi and Jinnah, their right to autonomy.

Indian Independence Bill

The Indian Independence Bill sought to formalize the independence of India from Britain along with the partition of the country into India and Pakistan.
The Opposition in the British Parliament objected to the nomenclature of the Indian Independence Bill. They argued that since India and Pakistan were going to be Dominions, there was no need to use the term ‘independence’ in the Bill. Winston Churchill offered alternative titles for the Bill—‘The India Self-Government Bill’ or ‘Indian Dominions Bill’. Also, there was opposition to the term ‘Hindustan’ for India since it was felt that this would antagonize the Muslims. The term ‘Union of India’ was accepted as adequately denoting any political entity wider than the Dominion which might develop in the future.\(^\text{190}\)

The most remarkable point about the discussion and passage of this Bill was that the Congress and the League were shown the drafts and their comments were elicited. Each had their own experts look at it.\(^\text{191}\) Both parties raised their respective objections and submitted their amendments to the Bill to Mountbatten. Congress suggested that there be two separate Acts for India and Pakistan instead of a common legislation.\(^\text{192}\) In his communications with Mountbatten, Nehru went on to assert that ‘[e]ven if there were no two Bills, as suggested by us, it should have been made perfectly clear that the international personality of the existing India continues and that India continues to be the parent state exercising all its rights and performing all its obligations under international treaties, etc’.\(^\text{193}\) Jinnah raised the very pertinent issue of the ‘physical impossibility’ of ‘a complete division and transfer and delivery of property equitably between two Dominions by 15th August 1947’ since it would ‘take many months for Arbitration Tribunal to give its awards’.\(^\text{194}\)

Communist leader P.C. Joshi termed the Bill as being nothing more than giving ‘a legal and constitutional garb to the Mountbatten Plan’. At the end of a lengthy analysis of the Bill, Joshi proposed the institution of a ‘Joint Congress–League Commission’ to formulate common democratic rights for the minorities of the two States, retain economic cooperation in the transitional period, and negotiate a close military alliance between the two States to ‘jointly demand withdrawal of British troops and liquidation of all traces of British military control’.\(^\text{195}\)

On the issue of Andaman and Nicobar Islands, the British decided to uphold India’s authority despite Jinnah’s claims to them. British military and strategic interests in the region also played a role in this decision. The Islands were crucial to Commonwealth defence and the sea and air facilities there were deemed very important for Britain. Mountbatten felt that rejection of Congress’ claims would harm the prospects of India joining the Commonwealth or allowing Britain any access to military facilities in the Islands.\(^\text{196}\)

On July 15, the Independence Bill was given its third reading without division and finally passed by the British House of Commons. Introducing it, Sir Stafford Cripps, the Labour leader, termed it ‘the last debate in this house on Indian affairs’, adding that by giving independence to India, Britain was establishing her ‘honesty of democratic purpose’.\(^\text{197}\)

Boundary Commissions

The Boundary Commissions for Punjab and Bengal were set up to demarcate the line along which the two provinces would be divided. Sir Cyril Radcliffe was appointed as the chairperson of the two Commissions. Each Commission consisted of two members each nominated by the Congress and the League. Both parties prepared their memoranda to be submitted and discussed in the Commissions. Needless to say, there were many claims and counterclaims to the same territories.

Population was the primary criterion for determining the boundaries: the Muslim majority areas were to be included in Pakistan and the non-Muslim majority areas in India. However, this was easier said than done. The Census records of 1941 on which the analysis was based were pointed out as flawed and outdated in their calculations of the populations of Hindus and Muslims. However, there was no time to order a new census. The Commissions debated the unit of territory which should be taken as the basic unit for the demarcation—there were arguments on either side for and against the inclusion of a district or a village or a thana. The smaller the unit, the greater the amount of territory which could be claimed.

Other concerns which permeated the arguments made were the defensible nature of the boundary which would not be just a line between two provinces but an international boundary. Further, it was to be of a nature which satisfied both parties so as to avoid conflict in the future. For Punjab, the Sikhs sought that religious shrines and property interests be taken into account but the League was unwilling to relent. The Congress suggested that the Chenab should be the dividing line but the League was dissatisfied with that. The Depressed Classes of Punjab also pushed for the Chenab as the dividing line; this would not only place '97% of the Scheduled Castes in the south-east zone of the Punjab but ... also include the districts of Montgomery, Sheikhpura and Lyallpur in which they own landed property in the Eastern Punjab'. A logically argued memorandum by members of the Ahmadiyya sect of Islam, proposed that Qadian, the headquarters of their community, part of Batala district in East Punjab, be included in West Punjab on the grounds that ‘the factor of population is the major factor in view’, as opposed to natural boundaries, economic or political divisions. The Sikhs pointed to the historical conflict between them and Muslims in order to emphasize why they must have their shrines in India. It was feared that the Sikhs would resist the Boundary Award with violence if it did not satisfy them.

Similar arguments prevailed for Bengal too where the same areas were claimed by both the parties and various factors—religion, history, cultural links, linguistic roots—were invoked to lend strength to one’s argument. There was a flood of letters to the editor of newspapers like the Amrita Bazar Patrika. Some readers were disturbed at the prospect of the inclusion of regions like Khulna in East Bengal and the connection of the Hooghly with the districts of Murshidabad and Nadia. Similarly, a deputation of the Chittagong Hill Tribes met Patel, voicing their apprehensions about being included in East Bengal. Patel raised this with Mountbatten, claiming that it was inconceivable to him that a 97 per cent non-Muslim area could...

be awarded to East Bengal. He felt that ‘such a decision would also jeopardize the position of the adjoining Tripura state which is a Hindu State with predominantly Hindu population, and which has acceded to the Indian Dominion and has joined the Union Constituent Assembly’. Patel reiterated that an award made ‘without any referendum to ascertain the will of the people’ would be dubbed a partisan one by the Congress.

The demarcation of the boundary proved to be a trickier affair than anticipated. A special boundary force was constituted to ensure that the award was implemented and that people could move across the borders without harassment or violence. However, the force was rather ineffective. Punjab witnessed migration on a massive scale; in Bengal, the migration continued in a trickle right through the 1950s.

Governor-General(s) for the Dominions

Till the end of June, it was assumed that India and Pakistan would have a common Governor-General, at least for the initial period, in order to facilitate the arrangements related to transfer of power. However, at the beginning of July, Jinnah declared his intention of becoming the Governor-General of Pakistan. This placed Mountbatten in a dilemma about whether to accept the position of Governor of India alone. He tried to convince Jinnah to change his stance and have a common Governor-General with India, which would have ensured a fairer division of assets. But Jinnah did not relent.

With Mountbatten no longer continuing as Governor-General of Pakistan, India’s decision to stick to him made Congress seem uncharacteristically appeasing towards Britain. Mountbatten was aware of all these underlying implications of Jinnah’s sudden decision. He appealed to England for help and the question was discussed in the Cabinet. Eventually, the Prime Minister advised Mountbatten to accept the Governor-Generalship of India alone. This would allow for a positive future relationship between India and England as well as aid India’s entry into the Commonwealth of Nations.

Partition of Punjab

Under the Partition Award, Punjab was to be divided with Muslim areas going to Pakistan and non-Muslim areas to India. Commenting on the 3 June statement, The Tribune suggested that the division should occur along the river Chenab since that would leave a majority of the Sikhs in East Punjab. Even earlier than this, pamphlets advocating a division of the province had been circulated. One such undated pamphlet, voicing the anxieties of Punjabi Hindus and Sikhs, proposed the partition of the Punjab ‘as it is far too big for democratic rule by the people for the people’. The Shiromani Akali Dal opposed the scheme and threatened to resist it with force. It also made a demand for a separate Punjabi speaking state in India. Master Tara Singh believed that a division of Punjab would spell doom for the community and declared that Sikhs would resist any partition scheme even if it led to bloodshed. He categorically stated on June 4 that ‘it is not a matter of mere political power for us: our very existence is at stake’.

He condemned the 3 June statement for breaking up the heritage, population, and hence ‘solidarity’ of the Punjab.

Penderel Moon, formally of the ICS, suggested that Pakistan may be a better bet for Sikhs since they could constitute an influential minority and use this to their advantage. A section of the Muslim League leadership shared this view, as the _Dawn_ editorial of 7 June indicates. Interestingly, some members of the Sikh community too were drawn to this option. In a letter to the editor of _Dawn_, S. Trilok Singh of Simla wrote that ‘it will be in the fitness of things if we could arrive at an honourable settlement with the great Muslim nation who are so friendly to us...’ Some Sikhs were formulating, ‘informally and entirely privily, the Sikh conditions for joining Pakistan’ and suggesting these to their leaders. While Moon was aware of this, the Sikhs were anxious ‘it should not leak out that any such negotiations are afoot or contemplated’. Given the appalling situation of widespread riots in the province by June, it was no longer clear who had started the violence or who was ‘merely’ reacting to the instigation.

Once the decision to divide was final and the Boundary Commissions were set up, all communities put forward their arguments. All were aware that their future depended on how well they could argue their case. Sikhs, Scheduled Castes, and Indian Christians sent their memoranda to the Boundary Commissions, expressing their anxieties and wishes. Punjabi Muslims, as evident in a letter from Nawab of Mamdot to Jinnah, wished to retain Amritsar, Ludhiana, and Hissar, given the substantial Islamic heritage of these cities. On the other hand, the Hindus wanted to retain Lahore.

The spade-work related to division was carried out in the Partition Councils. Administrative assets, educational institutions, and civil servants were sought to be fairly distributed between the two halves of the province.

On 23 June, the Legislative Assembly of Punjab met in two separate meetings and voted in favour of division. Again, none of the leaders seemed happy about the event, but all seemed to accept it as a necessary evil. The extent to which the impending reality of partition was gauged by the lay public is perhaps most poignantly captured by the fact of the inmates of the Lahore Mental Hospital, too, demanding partition.

Partition of Bengal

Once again, political speculation was rife till the announcement regarding partition was made on 3 June. The pro-partition movement in Bengal had been led by S.P. Mookerjee while the move for a united Bengal was initiated by the Bengal premier, H.S. Suhrawardy. Muslim League wished that Bengal be included in Pakistan in its entirety. There were some allegations that the Muslim National Guards were intimidating Congress leaders to vote against partition.
Congress leaders were anxious that Bengal must not be included in Pakistan in its entirety. Patel was warned that some Hindu MLAs could be influenced to vote against the division of the province. Further, suggestions were made to him to ensure that public enthusiasm for partition did not decline. Bimal Chandra Sinha, a member of the Bengal Provincial Congress Committee, urged Patel to see to it that the Congress must have 'a strong organisation of one mind and one urge' to prevent the inclusion of Bengal in East Pakistan.

On the side of the Muslim League, there were some who saw partition as a potentially positive development for East Pakistan. Hamidul Haq Choudhary, an MLC from Calcutta, wrote to Jinnah arguing that separation from West Bengal would give the eastern area an opportunity to develop an economy of its own, without being bound to the economy of Calcutta.

The partition proposal was distasteful to Gandhi. However, he accepted his helplessness before the public, who he said were in favour of division. In a letter to Sarat Bose, he condemned the corrupt practices being used to lure votes of Scheduled Castes against partition and for United Bengal. This, he feared, would help the Muslim League realize its plan to have the entire Bengal as part of Pakistan. He wrote to Suhrawardy asking him to convince the Hindus as well as try to garner Muslim support for his scheme of United Bengal if he wanted to prevent the division of the province.

The majority of Hindus in Bengal were for the division of the province. The Bengali Hindus in the U.K. also supported the demand for partition. Hindu Mahasabha called for a hartal in protest against the division of the country. The Muslims were happy about the establishment of Pakistan but disappointed that the whole province was not a part of it. The loss of Calcutta was seen as a major blow to the economic standing of future East Pakistan. Demands about the apportionment of territory were made by political groups. Claims about one area were followed by counter-claims on the same area by the opposing group. Different districts like Khulna, Chittagong, Jessore, and Faridpur emerged as contested areas to which both groups laid equally vehement claims.

Simultaneously, attempts were made to install a coalition ministry in Bengal for the interim period till partition. However, Jinnah firmly turned down any such proposal. Eventually, after the Legislative Assembly voted for division, two separate ministries were set up for East and West Bengal. The Hindu Mahasabha put forward a demand for the dissolution of the Muslim League ministry arguing that since partition had been finalized, it was unacceptable for Hindus to live under the prejudicial rule of the League. A shadow cabinet for West Bengal was demanded.
The Communist Party of India expressed its dissatisfaction with the division of Bengal and argued that it would create an artificial division in Bengali culture. Further, it suggested alternative political methods like a plebiscite to arrive at a political settlement. Doubts were also expressed about the future of the Bengal Congress—whether it should split into two, one each for West and East Bengal. This was reflective of the larger dilemma which all organizations faced. The Muslim League in the Muslim minority provinces was also forced to think about the relevance of its continued existence in free India, after Pakistan had been established. Gandhi expressed his opposition to the proposed splitting of the Bengal Congress. He argued that the Congress belonged to people of every faith and hence, there was no need to question its continued existence in post-partition Bengal. The territorial status of the Chittagong Hill Tracts led to considerable discussion amongst Mountbatten, the Muslim League and the Congress leaders. The leaders of the tribes of these Tracts demanded exclusion from Pakistan.

When Rajaji’s name was proposed as the governor of Bengal in free India, Sarat Chandra Bose expressed his displeasure at this appointment. Patel advised him not to make such differences of opinion public and to support party colleagues.

Referendum in NWFP and Sylhet

The 3 June statement had declared that NWFP and the Sylhet district in Assam would choose between the two Dominions through a referendum. However, the question of choice was interrelated with other issues as well.

Congress leaders believed that the Governor of NWFP was partial towards the League and unhappy with the Congress ministry led by Dr. Khan Sahib. They also believed that the referendum could not be fair under his supervision. Mountbatten accepted Congress demands about this and asked Caroe to resign. Liaquat Ali Khan expressed his disapproval at this and said that it would not prevent corruption during the polling. The League had been demanding the removal of the NWFP ministry since February and now, with the removal of the Governor in accordance with the wishes of the Congress, they declared that it was a partisan ministry which abused its power.

At the same time, Abdul Ghaffar Khan and his supporters declared that NWFP would not join Pakistan. They also tried to start a movement in support of a separate Pathan state called Pathanistan in order to counter the League propaganda in favour of Pakistan. They argued that Pathans would be dominated in a free Pakistan and their traditional independence undermined. They also made their participation in the referendum contingent on the inclusion of Pathanistan as the third choice for the voters. The Governor wrote to the Viceroy that if Pathanistan was not included as an option in the referendum, it could lead to disturbances.

during the polling and public resentment. Also, inclusion of this option would split the vote for the other two options.\textsuperscript{241} Being a Muslim majority province, NWFP was seen by the League as an inevitable part of Pakistan. Indeed, the potential Pathanistan was seen as a ‘vassal state’ by Khan Abdul Qaiyum Khan, who said that it ‘would act as fifth column of Hindu Imperialism’. Mr. Qaiyum further claimed that the ‘Zalme Pakhtoon’ organization was merely an instrument of the Congress in an Islamic garb.\textsuperscript{242}

The strong presence of Abdul Ghaffar Khan and his steady loyalty to united India and the Congress complicated the situation. He argued that Pakistan would mean domination of NWFP by Punjab and therefore, the province must fight for Pakhtoon independence.\textsuperscript{243} Towards the end of June, the Frontier PCC, the Congress Parliamentary Party, Khudai Khidmatgars, and Zalme Pakhtoon declared that ‘a free state of all Pakhtoons be established with a constitution based on Islamic conception of democracy, equality and social justice’.\textsuperscript{244}

The League, on the other hand, was making preparations for its campaign for ensuring that NWFP be in Pakistan. It adopted the method of attacking Congress leaders; it argued that Abdul Ghaffar Khan was motivated by nothing but his desire for power and his wish to rule over the Pathans. They saw the NWFP Congress leader’s demand as a move to sabotage the rightful inclusion of NWFP in Pakistan.

While Nehru was in favour of a referendum, Gandhi was against it, being of the opinion ‘that a referendum at this moment must lead to bloodshed and probably, if not certainly, to a lasting blood-feud,’ which he felt, should be avoided as far as ‘humanly possible’.\textsuperscript{245} However this was a position he changed later on, in his letter to Mountbatten of 5 July 1947, whereby he appealed for a withdrawal of the agitation against voting by Abdul Ghaffar Khan and his supporters. He advised Jinnah to convince the Pathans to enter Pakistan willingly.\textsuperscript{246} Abdul Ghaffar Khan then asked his supporters to peacefully abstain from participating in this referendum since it would undermine the liberty of the Pathans. A movement was launched, meetings and demonstrations were held to express opposition to the inclusion of the province in Pakistan. The establishment of a free Pathan state was the primary goal. A spokesperson of the Afridi Jirga expressed this demand and the opposition to inclusion in Pakistan most succinctly: ‘This is a land of the Pakhtoons and we will never let Punjabis or anyone else dominate over us.... Here we have ... Afiridis, Mahmands and ... who unequivocally demand that they should be consulted as to the political future because we also made ... sacrifices for the freedom of our country along with Khudai Khidmatgars in 1930 and after ... Pakistan as at present envisaged contains seeds of destruction of all Muslims economically, politically, culturally and nationally.\textsuperscript{247} The Frontier ministry also put forward a demand for a free Pathan state which would join neither Pakistan nor India.\textsuperscript{248} Jinnah responded to this by saying that this was a direct breach of the Congress acceptance of the 3 June statement and therefore untenable.\textsuperscript{249}

Kripalani wrote to Mountbatten asking him to allow NWFP to vote for independence but Mountbatten argued that the same option had been outvoted in case of Bengal when Jinnah had been in its favour. Giving the same option now to NWFP, when the League was not willing and the Congress was, would complicate the matter further and contribute to a political impasse at the Centre. Gandhi supported the demand for Pathanistan. Abdul Ghaffar Khan and his supporters felt betrayed by the Congress—its acceptance of the 3 June statement had more or less pushed the NWFP into Pakistan regardless of the political inclinations of Congress supporters.

These were also the months when the League was continuing its anti-ministry agitation in NWFP. But Dr. Khan Sahib had refused to resign. The League was trying to use this mobilization for securing NWFP for Pakistan. There were also reports that the League was trying to intimidate the voters into voting for Pakistan. Efforts at a rapprochement between the League and the Red Shirts were made by the Principal of Islamia College, Peshawar, who was eager to arrange a meeting between Abdul Ghaffar Khan and Jinnah.

Congress leaders in the province refused to participate in the referendum since there was no option of independence. The referendum was nonetheless held and the results favoured the inclusion of the province in Pakistan. Congress leaders alleged that the League had adopted illegal methods like bogus voting to garner votes for Pakistan.

The referendum could not resolve all the problems of the province. The Congress ministry was still very much in office with Khan Sahib refusing to resign until general elections were held. League leaders feared that Congress would start a civil disobedience movement against the referendum decision. There was much tension between the Red Shirts and the Muslim League National Guards. The League was invited to form the new ministry early in August and Khan Sahib’s ministry had to eventually be dismissed after independence. The reason for the delayed dismissal was that the new governor, Cunningham, thought that if Khan Sahib was forced out, there would be widespread disturbances in the province which could complicate the situation just before the grant of independence.

The fate of Sylhet was also to be decided by a referendum. Different groups desired union with India and others were in favour of union with East Pakistan. Staying with Assam would imply staying in India whereas joining East Bengal would take the area into Pakistan.

Newspapers argued from both sides—an editorial in Amrita Bazar Patrika opposed the inclusion of Sylhet in East Bengal and stated that communalism was the primary problem for India and territorial claims could be settled once this basic issue was resolved. It argued that the forcible inclusion of Sylhet in East Bengal would smother the Hindu minority and the economic problems of the state of Pakistan would become its lot too. A certain R.N. Choudhury alleged in a letter to Patel that the League was trying to excite the ‘white heat’ of communal frenzy in Sylhet ahead of the referendum making it an ‘ill-timed’ exercise. Arguments were forwarded for including at least some areas of Sylhet in Assam, even if the rest of the district was lost to Pakistan.\textsuperscript{257} Apprehensions were expressed about the attempts by League volunteers to prevent the Hindus from voting. The voting strength of the tea garden labour population was also thought to be a potential disadvantage for the Hindu minority in Sylhet. The Muslim League, for its part, protested that the referendum could never be conducted fairly under the Congress ministry in Assam.\textsuperscript{258}

Purnendu Kishore Sen Gupta, a Congressman from East Bengal, wrote to Patel to push for a revision of the electoral rolls so as to include the labourers who, he argued, should ‘be given full facilities for expressing their opinion on the question under referendum’. However, this demand was deemed as impossible to meet by Patel, who advised Sen Gupta to organize local opinion in a manner that the verdict would be ‘on the right lines’.\textsuperscript{259} On the other hand, Akbar Hydari demanded of Mountbatten a separate Boundary Commission for Assam.\textsuperscript{260}

The majority native population of Cachar in Sylhet were against joining Pakistan, on the grounds that their laws and regulations were the same as in Assam Valley, and further that the percentage of Muslims was only 32.6. These and several other grounds for the inclusion of Cachar in India were detailed in a pamphlet submitted to the Sylhet Boundary Commission by the President of the Nikhil Cachar Haidimba Barman Samiti.\textsuperscript{261}

After the polling was completed, both sides alleged the usage of unfair and corrupt means by the opposing side.\textsuperscript{262} Nehru wrote to Mountbatten about the lawless nature of the proceedings and the League alleged that ballot boxes had been tampered with. However, though the result was in favour of Pakistan, some areas remained with Assam. But even after the referendum, communal discord did not die down or lessen. In his speech at a prayer meeting in Delhi, Gandhi asked why the nationalist Muslims in Sylhet were being killed or harassed.\textsuperscript{263}

It was more or less clear that even though a political settlement had been arrived at, howsoever painful or disagreeable, the communal problem was far from being contained. There had been rioting before and it still continued sporadically. In a letter dated 5 June 1947, to Patel, B.M. Birla asked whether India should not be declared a Hindu state just as Pakistan would be a Muslim state. Patel wrote back reiterating the secular foundations of future India and the need to protect the various minorities in India.\textsuperscript{264}

Gandhi’s methods of dealing with communally tense areas drew a lot of criticism from some quarters. His ideas of atonement and reassuring the Muslim minority in Bihar were seen as appeasement of Muslims in total disregard of the condition of Hindu minorities in Punjab and other areas. Taking up cudgels on behalf of the Hindus, one S.D. Sharma wrote to Gandhi about ‘inconsistencies found in your day to day bearing’, which had ‘neither logic nor diplomacy’.\textsuperscript{265} Kripalani, addressing the Congress session held in mid-June, commented on how the Gandhian concept of ahimsa had not worked in resolving the communal situation in the country. This elicited a reaction from within the Congress and he was asked to clarify his comments by the Congressman Sadiq Ali. He clarified that he was a believer in non-violence but he did not agree with Gandhi that a non-violent solution of the communal problem was possible. The method Gandhi had adopted in Bihar and Noakhali was experimental and only applicable to individuals—it was not a mass programme. Also, the sporadic nature of communal riots was an obstacle for governments which were required to function from day to day. There was no sure way a government could effectively fight communal frenzy. Illustrating his point, Kripalani said that when he had visited Noakhali after the riots, he had not been harmed but had he been a resident of the place during the riots, there was a strong chance that he would also have been massacred along with the rest of the Hindu victims of Noakhali. Though prominent leaders were unharmed after the riots, he felt that ‘this is no guarantee for the members of the minority community at the time of the frenzy’.

Nonetheless, Gandhi maintained his faith in non-violent methods to combat communal frenzy. In an interview to Arthur Moore, former Editor of The Statesman, he reiterated his belief that the current bellicose mood of the Hindus would not stay.

The divergent opinions in the Congress about dealing with the communal issue were a far cry from the manner in which the Hindu Mahasabha sought to deal with it. They believed that continuous and organized rioting must and should encourage the Hindus to take to arms themselves and prepare for combat. They criticized the Congress policy as being ‘Anti-Hindu’ and in turn concentrated on reorganizing the Mahasabha as the largest Hindu body in free India.

The prevailing atmosphere of ill-will amongst the Hindus and Muslims was evident in the way government officials were also distrusted on account of their religion. Frederick Bourne, reporting from the Central Provinces and Berar to Mountbatten, noted how the most offensive speeches (were) made by Hindu Socialist and Mahasabha speakers. The Ministry, however, are perfectly confident of their power to restrain Hindu violence but regard every Muslim as a Pakistani. This has led them to transfer all senior Muslim officers in the Civil Service and Police from Berar... This manifestation of their distrust of Muslim officers is, I think, most unfortunate and, actually, entirely unjustified by past history... the Police force as a whole has worked with the greatest loyalty to the present Government and I do not remember to have heard of a single case where a Police officer can be shown to have been diverted from his duty by communal considerations. There is, however, a lot of talk particularly in Mahasabha circles of the need for reduction in the Muslim element of all Services.

A call was made by Dr. Gopichand Bhargava and Sardar Vallabhbhai Patel for the Punjab, wherein they urged Mountbatten to replace ‘Muslim staff in the telephone and telegraph exchanges in the East Punjab’ with non-Muslim staff.
Communalism: Provinces

This chapter is divided into smaller sections, each containing documents relating to communal sentiments in different provinces.

The rioting in Bengal and Punjab remained a constant concern. Hindus and Muslims were both victims in different areas and retaliation for attacks in other provinces was common. In Bengal, Calcutta was particularly tense with stabbings and arson being the order of the day. There was much resentment against its ‘wrongful’ alienation from East Pakistan. At the same time, in an effort to counter the growing communalization of society, minorities were asked not to emigrate from their homes. It was argued that the establishment of Pakistan would calm the Muslims down as their main demand had been met. However, nothing seemed to stem the chaotic nature of the situation.\(^{274}\)

Gandhi toured the riot-hit areas in Calcutta but also declared that he would return soon to Noakhali.\(^{275}\) Suhrawardy asked him to prolong his stay in Calcutta and also agreed to live with him in a riot-affected area in order to encourage peace. They felt that this symbolic act would inspire peace not just in Calcutta but in the rest of the country too.\(^{276}\)

In Bihar, the appointment of a commission of enquiry into the riots of 1946 was a contentious issue.\(^{277}\) Gandhi was pressing for it but Patel felt that the timing was not right. Gandhi’s continued stay in Bihar and his attempts to forge peaceful relations between Hindus and Muslims there did yield some positive results when some sections of the Muslim refugees came back and resettled in their homes. Further, Gandhi was opposed to communally based settlement as a way of preventing riots in the future. He argued that it would just end up dividing the people even more. Initially, Gandhi was shocked at the extent of rioting in Bihar and the ghastly atrocities committed and was critical of the Ministry. He felt that the Hindu population needed to recognize that they had sinned and needed to feel true repentance for their actions. For this, he encouraged them to bring their Muslim neighbours back and engender enough confidence in them to make them stay in their homes again. He argued that if Hindus atoned truly for their actions, then peace could return to Bihar. Nonetheless, it was clear that his method of dealing with communal violence was not a formula yet—he was experimenting at an individual level.\(^{278}\) Meanwhile, the Muslim Ministers of the Bihar Congress Cabinet, Abdul Qaiyum Ansari and Dr. Syed Mahmud, both urged the Momins of the state to join the Congress ‘unconditionally’ and to enlist their loyalty and support to India.\(^{279}\)

In most other areas, the despondence and anxiety of the victims was reflected in their demands for compensation and their appeals for help in rehabilitation.\(^{280}\) There was also considerable confusion about whether to migrate or not. Some organizations like the Frontier Hindu Defence Committee appealed to the minorities in NWFP to stay in their homes\(^{281}\) but there were others, such as a certain Bhaskaranand of the Ramakrishna Mission, who believed that moving out as soon as possible was the best survival strategy. In this context too, Gandhi was criticized, especially by the Hindu Mahasabha, for his attempts to bring the displaced populations back to their homes.

The situation in Punjab continued to be depressing. The riots had spread to rural areas, making it hard for the administration to exert control. The leaders in Punjab issued a joint appeal to the people to stop the communal warfare, which had some temporary effect. The decision regarding the division of the province did not seem to stem the tide of rioting—communal tensions persisted. Even at the end of June, the Punjab Governor wrote to Mountbatten saying that the communal situation was getting harder to control. The Congress and the League traded allegations about the role played by Hindus and Muslims in the rioting and the aggressive stance adopted by the League National Guards. However, the anxiety of the people about their future was apparent in the transfer of assets from banks, migration towards East Punjab, and appeals for advice from leaders. Lahore was a major troublespot, requiring troops to keep things in control.

The Sikhs were resentful about the partition, leaving their community in a minority on both sides of the border. Even though they had been at the forefront of the partition demand and the Congress had supported them in this, once the declaration was made, they were unhappy with what it would mean for them. Mobilization among Sikhs increased and there were attempts to increase the membership of the Akal Fauj, all with the aim of resisting partition by force. The government was also apprehensive about the activities of the Sikh leaders and many strategies were discussed to keep them in check till the formalities of Partition were completed.

Sind Assembly Congress leader Parsram V. Tahirramani issued a circular letter in late June which spoke of the abuse and harassment of Hindus in Sind, who experienced ‘progressively increasing uneasiness and perturbation’ despite the assurances and professions of the Muslim League representatives. One Tarachand Gajra wrote to P.D. Tandon with an exhortation for UP Hindus to migrate to Sind to swell Hindu numbers: ‘If about a crore of good Hindus had pushed forward towards the western frontier of India we would have successfully defeated Mr. Jinnah and his nefarious designs.

In the United Provinces, the Congress was criticized by a section of Hindus as appeasing Muslims. A letter to G.B. Pant condoned the fact that Muslims constituted as much as 75 per cent of the UP Police, stressing that there was no need ‘of staffing the police, the defence, the transport, and other key departments with Muslims’ since there were other ‘unharmful ways of placating’ them.

The Bundelkhand Jamait-ul-Ulema Conference held an open session on June 21 and 22 under the Presidency of Maulana Hifzur Rahman where it criticized the June 3 plan, asserting that it destroyed the ‘political unity’ of the Muslims of India by dividing them into three different areas.292

An outbreak of communal violence in Aligarh on 16 July 1947 was squarely blamed by the President of the City Congress Committee on the policy of British government of appeasing Muslim League.293

In response to the call by Hindu communalists in UP to ban cow slaughter, Congress President Kripalani advised the Hindu community to first stop profiting from sale of slaughtered cows, before seeking legislative redressal.294 Prominent Hindu intellectuals and leaders like Hanuman Prasad Poddar continued writing to Kripalani with the request for a legal ban on cow slaughter.295 The UP Premier, G.B. Pant, criticized the Hindu Mahasabha ideologues for not having raised any voice ‘against the Britishers who caused cow-slaughter to feed the British army in India’, putting into perspective all the hue and cry around cow slaughter being raised by them during the crucial period of transition towards independence.296

to boycott all the celebrations whether public or private, in protest against this humbug, host the Bhagwa, their national flag, over their houses, and holding public meetings, solemnly declare their firm determination to unify the motherland and to make her one, undivided whole as of old and to continue their struggle for independence and for full and complete independence and for all that it signifies and implies.297

Minority Groups, Displaced Populations, and Volunteer Organizations

At the centre of the trouble with communalism was the issue of the state of the minorities. However, this term was relative in nature—Hindus could form a majority in one area and a minority in another. The concept applied similarly to Muslims and every other religious community. Apart from the religious definition, the Depressed Classes also thought of themselves as minorities and sought representation on various bodies as such.

Many documents detail the kind of attacks and arson that this period witnessed as also the extent of devastation that the communal riots inflicted. Financial losses were expectedly huge—many documents contain the appeals made for financial help by minorities and refugees.298

Many relief camps came up which provided temporary shelter to victims of communal violence. Various organizations were engaged in providing basic necessities to the refugees in relief camps. Arrangements were also made to escort groups of people to safer locations and evacuate people from riot-hit areas. Panic and fear about the future were endemic among the minorities in almost every province.

Mountbatten accepted that the 3 June statement envisaged no legal measures for protection of minorities which could be enjoined upon the two independent Dominions. He believed that the protection of minorities would be a matter in which they would have to depend on each other’s good faith. The two governments did issue declarations about their intentions to do everything in order to make the minorities safe in their areas. Further, many assurances were given about a free and secure existence for people belonging to different religions by leaders of both states. Jinnah declared that the minorities in each dominion must be loyal to their states—a curious thing to say in July 1947 when the state of Pakistan had been established as the political realization of all ‘Muslims’ regardless of any other loyalties they may have held. For instance, Anglo-Indian representatives wrote to Jinnah asking for representation in the Constituent Assembly of Pakistan arguing that Pakistan would be the last to deny any minority the same rights which it had demanded for Muslims. However, many leaders were apprehensive about Hindus in Pakistan being subjected to communal rule and repressive conditions of living. Many felt betrayed by the Congress leadership, feeling that they had been made scapegoats for gaining political power. There were sincere doubts about the citizenship rights of minorities in each dominion.

The Secretary of the Jain Shiromani Committee of the Jain Biradari of Punjab wrote a letter to Patel enquiring about the future course of action for those residing in Pakistan dominion. To this, Patel responded with reasoned counsel: ‘Those who have got a stake in Pakistan of the future cannot leave their places unless they are prepared to face the misery and sufferings of refugees.’ This advice was given in the hope that the Pakistan government would proactively offer protection to the minorities.

Another facet of this development was the attempt made by various groups to get ‘minority’ status, like Catholics, Adivasis, and Gurkhas. It was believed that being a minority would entitle them to a certain kind of treatment from the independent state of India. This led to many groups sending in representations to the Constituent Assembly and to the Congress about the need to accord them the status of ‘minorities’.

The Hindu and Sikh minorities in western Punjab expressed apprehensions about their future to Congress leaders like Patel and Hindu Mahasabha leaders such as S.P. Mookerjee. On the other hand, dissensions within the Sikh community led Sardar Hari Singh Narbeh, leader of the Mazhabi or lower caste Sikhs, to cast in their lot with Pakistan.

In certain states, like Sindh, the minority populations attempted to create their own political organizations in order to present a united front in the future. Contrary to this, the minorities in Indian states felt abandoned since their fate was linked to the political settlements which would be arrived at with each individual state. The pervasiveness of anxiety and uncertainty was remarkable, as evinced in the following statement of 10 August by the President of the Rajputana States Muslim League, Allama Mohammad Abdul Hai Faiz: ‘The minority community in Indian States is in a state of utter helplessness. Atrocities of a very grave nature have been committed, but the Authorities do not pay any heed to the clamourings of the sufferers.’

Attempts to assure minorities of both dominions were also made aplenty. The Education Minister of the Government of the Dominion of India, Maulana Azad, suggested a joint meeting of leaders of both dominions in the hope that they would ‘approach their problems in a spirit of realism, wisdom and statesmanship’, for this was the only way to ‘leave communal wrangles and bitterness behind and march forward to freedom, peace and democracy’. Jinnah in particular went to great lengths to re-assure minorities in the dominion of Pakistan that they would have protection with regard to their ‘religion, faith, life, property and culture’. These statements allayed fears of a handful of minorities, and Bhimsen Sachar and Tilak Raj Bhasin, through the Western Punjab Minorities Convention, urged minorities especially in the towns and bigger villages to remain and not ‘turn their backs on their hearths and homes’. However, most minority groups of the areas that would fall within the boundaries of a future Pakistan viewed such promises as being largely superficial. An Editorial in the Aaj newspaper instead advocated a unique survival strategy for the minorities in West Punjab and Sind, that they ‘form an alliance with the leadership of the movement for independent Pathanistan given that both are faced with the same enemy’.

One of the most remarkable features of the pervasive communal violence and the subsequent relief organization was the proliferation of volunteer organizations affiliated to various political parties. Organizations like RSS and Muslim League National Guards increased their membership exponentially in this period. They were involved in relief work for refugees as well. The Khaksars, Hindu Rashtra Dal, Hindustan National Guards, and Congress Seva Dal also appear to have been engaged in similar activities. The language and means used by these organizations to enroll volunteers is vividly showcased through a pledge-pamphlet signed by a volunteer of the Hindusthan National Guards in late June. In Punjab, most of the volunteer organizations increased in their numerical strength.

In Sind, the volunteers appear to have lent their own interpretation to Muslim ‘Raj’. According to the Fortnightly Report for the first half of June 1947, some League National Guards wanted to board a lorry which was occupied by Hindu boys. They ordered them to alight to make way for them, saying that Pakistan had come and there was Muslim ‘Raj’ now.

The Khaksars, a volunteer organization under the leadership of Allama Mashriqui, were primarily active in Delhi and Bihar, though their presence was felt as far as Sind and other areas of the subcontinent as well. In Poona, the Khaksars rejected the Plan of Partition and instead commemorated the Mutiny of 1857 each month, upholding Hindu-Muslim unity.

As is evident from secret internal correspondence of the Home Department in July, the Khaksars had by this time begun making fiery speeches claiming a readiness to shed blood to prevent Delhi, Ajmer, and Agra being wrenched away from Pakistan. They further declared an intention to violently resist any attempt to hoist the Congress flag on the Red Fort on 15 August, and threatened a general violent assault against the authorities on 15 August. SECTION IV

Princely States, Constituent Assembly, and Accession

Section IV of Part 2 of the Towards Freedom volume on the year 1947 covers the story of the princely states, their people and rulers. The main themes are the accession of 584 princely states to the new and emergent nation-states of India and Pakistan and more importantly the struggles of the people within these princely states against the autocratic rule of their respective monarchs.

The resolution passed by the General Conference of the Princely Rulers of India declared that ‘Paramountcy will terminate at the close of the interim period and will not be transferred to or inherited by the new Government of India. All the rights surrendered by the States to the Paramount Power will return to the States’. Further, it also asserted that ‘every State shall continue to retain its sovereignty and all rights and powers except to the extent that these rights and powers have been expressly delegated by it’.\textsuperscript{319} In short, a substantial number of the Indian princely states (around 224) clearly reaffirmed their intention to retain their powers on the end of paramountcy.

As opposed to this, the States Peoples’ Negotiating Committee,\textsuperscript{320} representing the people of the princely states, soon after came up with their rejoinder to the absolutist strain of the January 1947 Resolution passed by the ‘General Conference of the Princely Rulers of India’. Here, they firstly questioned the claim of the Conference to represent all princes as also its very functioning. The States Peoples’ Negotiating Committee clearly pointed out that the Negotiating Committee appointed by the Chamber of the Princes\textsuperscript{321} was not representative of the states’ peoples since it ‘was formed by the Viceroy with the consultation of the Princes only’. The Committee further delineated the problems with the Resolution of the Princes Negotiating Committee, the most fundamental one being that it ‘it does not represent the States or the States’ people’.\textsuperscript{322}

Some of the princely states exhibited their authoritarian tendencies through a turn to communal tactics as well, whether as a bid to thwart the growing people’s democratic struggle within their states\textsuperscript{323} or as a measure to set up a united front of princes belonging to a majority community, as for example the stillborn Hindu National Front which was proposed in early \textsuperscript{321} The Chamber of Princes was established in 1920, through a proclamation of King George V, as a forum for the princely rulers of India to present their concerns to the British Indian government. Initially consisting of 120 member states, in 1947 it had representatives from some 109 princely states directly and 125 indirectly. Part 2, Chapter 38, Document No. 2.

August by the Maharaja Scindia of Gwalior, Raja of Faridkot, Maharaja of Bharatpur, Maharaja of Panna, Raja of Bhaghat, and Maharaja of Alwar.\textsuperscript{324}

The nationalist leaders stressed the importance of the princes’ joining the Constituent Assembly and thereby declaring a willingness to function within the sovereignty of the future nation-state of India. Jawaharlal Nehru’s speeches to the States’ People’s Conference called upon the States to join the Constituent Assembly.\textsuperscript{325} A similar call was made by V.T. Krishnamachari, Prime Minister of Jaipur, and Sardar K.M. Panikkar, Prime Minister of Bikaner.\textsuperscript{326} Many princes intended to declare independence on the cessation of British paramountcy. To this stance, Nehru asserted in an unmistakably stern tone around two months before Independence that ‘we will not recognise any independence for any state’.\textsuperscript{327} Similarly, C. Rajagopalachari also stated that the doctrine that paramountcy would end with the withdrawal of British sovereignty resulting in ‘a chaotic independence’ for 565 states was ‘indefensible’, apart from being ‘legally, historically, politically and morally’ wrong.\textsuperscript{328}

Gandhiji also held that the princes should join the Constituent Assembly—of either India or Pakistan. He was in particular disappointed with the stance of Travancore and Hyderabad states. Sir C.P. Ramaswamy Aiyer of Travancore state wanted to prevent it from joining the future Indian Union. Gandhiji felt such a stance was ‘amazing and wholly unworthy’ since Sir C.P. was quite content for the state to remain in India so long as the British King was Emperor.\textsuperscript{329}

The Working Committee of the Hindu Mahasabha also passed a resolution which appealed to the Indian princes to join the Constituent Assembly, ‘both in their own interests and in those of their subjects’. This was, of course linked to their proposal for an Akhand Hindustan.\textsuperscript{330}

The most unequivocally anti-princes stand was taken predictably by those to the left, especially the socialists and communists, who envisaged a free and sovereign India where all forms of autocratic rule would end.\textsuperscript{331} In the resolution at a conference held in Kanpur in early March, the Socialists clearly stated that ‘any attempt to whittle down the sovereignty of the States’ people is calculated to endanger the freedom and unity of the Indian people as a whole’. Achhut Patwardhan, General Secretary of the Party, asserted ‘that the decision of the British Government to quit India by June 1948 should not lead them to think that they had become free and independent’.\textsuperscript{332}

The Socialist leader, Jaiprakash Narain criticized the stance adopted by the Congress wherein the party agreed to allow the princes to send their ‘hand-picked nominees’ to the Constituent Assembly. This was against the declared policy of the Congress that they would have only elected representatives of the people of the states in the Constituent Assembly.\textsuperscript{333}

In the midst of all these negotiations between the princes, the representatives of the people of the princely states, the Congress, the Muslim League, and the British, some rulers continued to dream of a future marked by British paramountcy, free from the threat of democracy. For example, in March 1947, the Nawab of Bhopal communicated to Lord Wavell his vision of ‘a British Dominion consisting of the north-western part of India including Kashmir, Bahawalpur, the Western States of Kathiawar, and some states of Central India’. Ramesh Chandra, in an April 1947 pamphlet provocatively titled ‘Princestan—Imperialism’s Nest for Tomorrow’, sourced from the JNU Archives on Contemporary History, starkly drew out how the different princely states, scattered across India, functioned as ‘a network of royal fortresses’ and an ‘enclave’ for ‘foreign authority’ and ‘foreign troops’. Chandra’s resounding conclusion: ‘From Princestan, Britain will continue to rule India militarily and economically.’

Many anti-people princes worked to build the Muslim League as an effective counterpoint to the staunchly anti-autocratic stance of the Congress, as is evident in the letter from the Nawab of Bhopal to Muhammad Ali Jinnah. This position did receive some tacit support from the Muslim League. Muhammad Ali Jinnah categorically asserted in mid-June that ‘paramountcy cannot be transferred. On its termination the full sovereign status of the Indian State emerges’.

As opposed to this, other rulers like the Maharaja of Bikaner appealed to fellow princes to join the Constituent Assembly, warning that ‘by declining to participate in the work of the Constituent Assembly the States may not succeed in securing their essential safeguards, but that, if anything, they may find that in their absence, as has happened, various decisions have already been reached which it will be difficult to get altered later on’. Similarly, in contrast to several princely rulers’ distrust of and distance from the Constituent Assembly, the ruler of Baroda as also its Praja Mandal were ‘anxious to give the fullest cooperation to the Constituent Assembly irrespective of what the state negotiating committee did or did not do’. Needless to say, Baroda’s stance was held up as worthy of emulation by leaders like Sardar Patel.

The British were wary of the grant of Dominion Status to the princely states, as is evident in communications from Pethick-Lawrence to Mountbatten. During this crucial period of handing over the reins of governance to India and Pakistan, the British were extremely cautious that their records pertaining to the Princely States were not transferred to the new nation-states. The Secretary to the Crown Representative, C.L. Griffin, in a letter to the newly appointed British High Commissioner to India, T.A. Shone, categorically argued that it would be ‘a grave breach of confidence’ to transfer to ‘a Successor Government records containing information regarding the private lives of Rulers and the internal affairs of States’. Ironically, such information on ‘the private lives of Rulers’ had hitherto been used as an instrument to control these very rulers and align them to imperial interests.

All India States People’s Conference—All India States Muslim League

The relationship between the All India States People’s Conference (AISPC), Praja Mandals, and the All India Congress Committee also underwent shifts during this important period. The official policy of the AICC, established through the Haripura Resolution of 1937, to let the Praja Mandal take the political lead in the princely states was challenged in some places like Rewa State and Bagelkhand.\(^\text{342}\) This period also saw the AICC asserting a greater role over the functioning of the Praja Mandal in all the states, asking them to ‘function as organs’ of the All India States People’s Conference. Further, in an important circular issued from AICC, they were asked to report on their activities. Sadiq Ali, Permanent Secretary of the AICC, in this circular issued to the Praja Mandal, emphasized how the destinies of princely states and the rest of India were inextricably linked, with ‘the indivisible unity of our Common Country ... becoming more and more manifest’.\(^\text{343}\) The diverse sources (for example, princes, industrialists, etc.) for the funding of the activities of the AISPC, like the funding of other nationalist organizations, was viewed with consternation in some quarters. Fears about undue influence of donors, were voiced in the Bombay-based newspaper The Forum, edited by Joachim Alva. Balvant Rai Mehta, who was the General Secretary of the AISPC in 1947, allayed such doubts asserting that donations by princes, jagirdars, captains of industry, and commercial magnates’ would not affect the programme and plans of the AISPC because ‘just as we do not cease to advocate nationalisation of Industries or abolition of Landlordism, merely because some of this class contribute to our funds, we don’t cease to advocate the abolition of autocracy merely because some of the Princes give some donations’\(^\text{344}\).

The All India Students Congress (AISC) also supported the struggles of the Praja Mandal of the various states against autocratic monarchic rule. This is evident in the letter by the Secretary of the AISC, S.M. Jaffar, to the Secretaries of the Praja Mandal in which he asserts, ‘that the students of states must unite and prepare a common platform with the students of India against medieval aristocracy and white imperialism’\(^\text{345}\).

The States’ League Committees demanded that they be consulted as a separate entity, distinct from the All-India States’ People Congress, on the issue of joining the Constituent Assembly.\(^\text{346}\) Mahmoodul Hasan Siddiqui, the Secretary of the All-India States Muslim League, stated in an interview in April 1947 that the Muslims in princely states had decided not to join the Constituent Assembly until there was complete agreement between the two major political parties and the Muslim League decided to join the Assembly first.\(^\text{347}\) A similar stance was adopted by the Muslim Majlis of the small princely state of Janjira in Murud (present-day Maharashtra), as is evident in the letter of its Secretary, H.M. Vangare, to Jinnah.\(^\text{348}\) In the light of communal atrocities perpetrated against Muslims in the states of Bharatpur, Jaipur, and Alwar, the Working Committee of the All India States Muslim League deplored what it termed the ‘stand-alone’ policy of His Majesty’s Government with regard to the Indian princes.\(^\text{349}\)

When it was time to elect a new President for the AISPC in March 1947, Nehru proposed the name of Sheikh Abdullah, the popular leader from Kashmir who was at that time in prison.

Nehru was of the opinion that he would be an apt choice given ‘the movement in Kashmir and the fierce repression which it has encountered from the state authorities’. As a result, he argued, Sheikh Abdullah had emerged as a symbol of the peoples’ struggle against princely repression not just for Kashmiris, but for States’ Peoples across India, and hence it was fitting that ‘this honour and responsibility should be cast upon him’. In view of the fast-approaching date for Independence, Dr. Pattabhi Sitaramayya, the Acting President of the AISPC, at its Annual Session in Gwalior in April, urged the princes to ‘elevate themselves to the position of constitutional monarchs such as the King of England. They would have limited powers and prerogatives but they would have unlimited influence as social heads’. At this session, the AISPC reiterated its demand for Responsible Government in the states and ‘further concretised (it) in the form of a fighting slogan to immediately establish a Constituent Assembly for setting up a Responsible Government in each State’. Further, the resolutions passed at this session ‘defended the people’s movement as a whole and gave a lie to the propaganda of the state authorities and other disruptive elements that the repression in the states was due to the “tactics” of the Communists who fomented unnecessary disturbances’. Despite the congruence in the aims of the All India Congress Committee and the AISPC, Jawaharlal Nehru did not see eye to eye on many crucial issues with AISPC Acting President Pattabhi Sitaramayya and hence decided to resign from its Standing Committee. Nonetheless, the AISPC formally decided to celebrate August 15 as Independence Day, regardless of the fact that, in the words of the General Secretary, Hiralal Shastri, ‘the problem of swaraj in the Indian States has not yet been solved and that the people have still to struggle for their rights’.

Jammu and Kashmir

The year 1947 was a turbulent one for the people of the princely states as much as for those residing in the remainder of British India. In the north, the situation was perhaps most acute in the princely state of Jammu and Kashmir with a majority Muslim populace ruled by the Hindu Dogra kings, installed there by the British after they annexed it from its erstwhile Sikh rulers in 1849. At the start of 1947, the condition in Kashmir was particularly volatile, given the authoritarian ways of its rulers whose notably corrupt and largely incompetent government failed to effectively distribute basic necessities like food and fuel to the people in the midst of a harsh winter. The difficult climatic conditions were worsened due to an eight-month crisis in the state, which emerged from the suppression of the people’s movement led by Sheikh Abdullah by Maharaja Hari Singh’s government. The support an imprisoned Abdullah enjoyed from nationalist leaders in British India was significant, visible in the already mentioned fact that he was chosen as the President of the AISPC in March 1947 in absentia. While the Congress wholeheartedly supported the peoples’ struggle in Kashmir, the Muslim League did... not actively encourage the movement. As M. Shaukat Ali of the National Conference wrote to K.H. Khurshid of the Muslim League:

What does not stand in the way of the Hindu Congress cannot prevent the League interfering, if only to a similar extent in Kashmir politics to the advantage of our organisation. On the contrary, you have been overcautious not to offend the Princely order, so that they may support you, and not the Congress, in the future Indian Constitution-making—which too they have not done.\(^{357}\)

At the same time, given the steadily increasing anti-minority violence ensuing upon the decision to partition the country, a certain Jalali in an April 1947 letter to the Congress President, Acharya Kripalani, representing the perspective of Kashmiri Pandits, expressed his apprehension about Sheikh Abdullah saying that ‘the leader of the Movement aims at establishing Muslim Raj in Kashmir by means which are not above-board’.\(^{358}\) The steadily increasing communal violence engulfing neighbouring Punjab and other swathes of north India began to leave its impress on Kashmir as well, with the British Resident in Kashmir, W.F. Webb, noting the presence and activities of both the Muslim National Guards and the RSS in Kashmir at the beginning of May.\(^{359}\) The Congress, while stressing the installation of responsible government in the States and speaking out against the autocratic structure of governance represented by princely rule, attempted to strike a balance between the ruler of Kashmir and its people. This was evident when Kripalani hastened to oppose the National Conference cry, directed to the Maharaja, of ‘Quit Kashmir!’ by arguing that it was legitimate to ask for the British to ‘quit India’ on the grounds of nationality, which did not apply to the Maharaja and his people, both of whom were Indian.\(^{360}\)

As the transfer of power in August loomed closer with the announcement of the 3 June Plan for the Partition of India, the Muslim League began to work to get Kashmir to join the Union of Pakistan in future.\(^{361}\) July 1947 was a month of many an exchange of letters between the Congress High Command represented by Patel and Nehru and the princes, with the former assuring the latter of their intentions for friendly relations and of non-interference in the internal matters of the state,\(^{362}\) a slight change in tenor from the earlier stance which was openly in favour of the people. July, and then August, saw parleys between the Congress and the Muslim League in an intense bid to ensure that Kashmir join the Unions of India and Pakistan which they were respectively heading. Gandhi’s visit in early August 1947 acted as an opportunity for Kashmiris of all hues and backgrounds to discuss the possible future of their state, with the National Conference insisting on a referendum and the Maharaja being paralysed in a state of indecision which was to prove historically tragic.\(^{363}\)

Kalat and Other North Indian States

The Khanate of Kalat, located in the Baluchistan region, came under the purview of the clause of the lapse of British paramountcy in the Indian Independence Act, whereby all treaties between princely states and Great Britain would be null and void. Moreover, the territories ceded by the princely states to the British—Quetta, Bolan, and Nasirabad—would return to the ruler of Kalat. Kalat was predominantly Muslim, and its rulers in favour of a modern, democratic representative government organized on Islamic lines. It was one of the few states which supported Jinnah and the Muslim League. There was a contradiction in its desire, articulated as early as 11 April 1947 by Ahmed Yar Khan, the Khan of Kalat, to set up a Government of Kalat in the future with ‘friendly relations with neighbouring Muslim countries, such as Afghanistan, Iran, Saudi Arabia and especially Pakistan’ and yet declare allegiance to the League and be ‘ready to render any sacrifice for establishing Pakistan’.\(^\text{364}\) This stemmed in part from the ambiguous position the princely states found themselves in, given the impending transfer of power. Interestingly, the Khan of Kalat published a Manifesto, announcing his plans for a future independent Government of Kalat, which he claimed was supported by Jinnah. The restoration and assimilation with Kalat of the ceded territories, the prime amongst which was Quetta, was one of the issues debated most vigorously. Economic factors apart from ethnic or cultural differences, also contributed to the wariness amongst the people of Quetta of being assimilated within an independent Kalat state. Moreover, Quetta was considered to be a ‘prize city’ because it was an important military base with key trade route connections to Afghanistan and Iran; hence its potential loss for Pakistan was a source of consternation to the Muslim League. Indeed, many in the Muslim League believed that the parts of British Baluchistan, mainly mountainous and perceived as being of no great utility, shorn of the leased areas like Quetta and the Bolan Pass, would become a liability for Pakistan and a veritable ‘millstone round its neck’.\(^\text{365}\)

The Punjab princely states came together to constitute the Shiromani Riasthi Akali Dal, which included the representatives of Patiala, Nabha, Jind, Faridkot, Kalsia, Kapurthala, and Malerkotla states. The aim of this Dal was to club together all these states into one unit, the combined population of which was above 33 lakhs and annual revenue about 5 crores. They aimed for this unit to be an agricultural one ‘bound together by ties of common language, nationality, modes of living and economic interests’.\(^\text{366}\) As opposed to these efforts, the work of the Prajamandals or States’ People’s Movements in these regions was to restore the civil liberties of the people of the princely states and safeguard their rights in the face of repression from the rulers. For example, in mid-February, a protest by the people against shortage of daily necessities precipitated dramatic state repression, inviting condemnation from P. Sitaramayya, the national-level leader of the AISPC, who claimed the peoples’ movement was being combated ‘by medieval barbarous methods’. Legislations such as the ‘Protection against Seditious Meetings Act’ and ‘the Regulation of 1811’ in Patiala, Nabha, Malerkotla state and the Public Safety Ordinance in Patiala and Nabha states were used by rulers to crush political organizations and their demands for the early establishment of responsible government or the redress of economic grievances. Even as late as June 1947, the Prajamandal of Bilaspur was bringing into the public eye detailed reports about authoritarian excesses committed against his people by the Raja of Bilaspur in the lower Himalayas.\(^\text{367}\)

The Prajamandal had a mass character in the Punjab states and it had waged popular struggles in various states, with Section 144 being defied in Narnaul, Bhatinda, and Sirhind and public meetings organized throughout the Punjab states. The biggest and the most heroic struggle was fought in the small state of Faridkot in defiance of the fundamental rights of free speech, free press, and free association and public meeting in May 1946. Another feature common to the Punjab princely states was the increasing affinity they displayed towards communal forces along with a sustained hostility to the States’ Peoples’ Movement. In Patiala, Harbans Lal (General Secretary of the Punjab States Regional Council to the AISPC) noted how ‘communalism is being fostered by the Govt. by the introduction of communal representation in services and by the State encouragement in the formation of communal organizations such as Akali Party, Hindu Mahasabha and Muslim League’.

In the wake of the HMG’s Declaration on 20 February 1947, there were instances of communal trouble across princely states such as Nabha, Loharu, and Chamba. The arrest of Muslim League leaders in the Punjab in January 1947 resulted in hartals being observed by Muslims in different Punjabi princely states such as Patiala, Faridkot, Malerkotla etc. This period also saw an increasing tension owing to activities of the Muslim League and other Hindu and Sikh communal groups, in Chamba, Jind, etc. Apart from communal chaos, there was also an uprising of peasants against oppressive agrarian structures, for example in Patiala where the muzaras (tenants) rebelled against landlords demanding the abolition of the biswedari (landlordism) system and the nonpayment of batai at various meetings and demonstrations. From early April onwards, there was an influx of the refugees from North-West Punjab affected by the Rawalpindi riots of early March. This also led to increase in communal tension especially in regions of Nabha state and also Faridkot state. In Faridkot, the refugee influx and the issuing of a large number of gun and rifle licenses to non-Muslims and their recruitment in the Faridkot Police caused grave apprehensions amongst Muslim State subjects of Faridkot for their safety. As a result some 7000 to 8000 of them left the state territory and a substantial number took shelter in neighbouring Ferozepur city, cantonment, and district. The desperation faced by the Muslims of Faridkot was captured in a letter to Maulana Azad by one S.R. Rabbani who pleaded with him as follows: ‘For God Sake arrange for our safety. We are losing everything and anything.’ Similarly, some Muslims of Kapurthala migrated to the adjoining city of Jullundur while on the other hand, groups of Hindus and Sikhs migrated from the eastern part of Bahawalpur state to the adjoining state of Bikaner and to Ferozepore District.

South Indian Princely States

South of the Vindhyas, in Hyderabad, the single largest princely state, there was a growing rift between the people’s movement and princely autocracy. Fears of Britain supporting the princes further confounded the efforts towards a solution. There was the further complication of neighbouring states like Berar and Bastar apprehending a take-over by Hyderabad, in an attempt of the Nizam to carve out an independent state. Similarly, the Defence Minister, Baldev Singh, was wary of the tendency of the princely states to strengthen themselves militarily, in anticipation of future tussles for securing their sovereignty and independence.\textsuperscript{374} As of June 1947, the Nizam’s firman regarding the future of Hyderabad made clear his stand in favour of independence and against signing the Instrument of Accession. While the Hyderabad State Congress vocally opposed the Nizam’s stance, Scheduled Castes in the state were more supportive of the option for independence.\textsuperscript{375}

Meanwhile the Congress top leadership headed by Sardar Vallabhbhai Patel were considering strategies to ensure that Hyderabad would be encircled from all sides by other provinces who were in favour of joining India.\textsuperscript{376} The Nizam in his turn looked to popular support against the possibility of a forced accession\textsuperscript{377} and also looked to the British for a helping hand.\textsuperscript{378} The growing communal violence in the rest of the country also spread to Hyderabad, with the uncertain future of the state adding to the rising tension.\textsuperscript{379} However, voices that went against the norm were also heard, with some Hyderabad Muslims openly proclaiming their opposition to Pakistan.\textsuperscript{380}

More than the issue of acceding to the future nation-state of India, the people of the princely state of Berar were disturbed by the possibility of being assimilated by Hyderabad. This was because as per the Indian Independence Bill, all the treaties exercised by the King of England in relation to Indian states would also lapse. Berar had been ceded to the British by the rulers of Hyderabad in the nineteenth century and therefore on August 15 it would have reverted to the Nizam; something clarified by the legal doyen Dr. Ambedkar.\textsuperscript{381}

Mysore was one of the few states that had a ruler, its Maharaja, Wadiyar Bahadur, who believed in establishing some form of responsible government while simultaneously retaining princely rule. Despite such progressive gestures however, the idea of ultimate sovereignty being vested in the people was denied by the Mysore authorities. Such a stance was criticized by nationalist leaders like Patel who emphasized that it was hard to ‘prevent the rapidly marching forces of progress’ and advised the princes ‘to recognise the writing on the wall’ asking them to adapt to changed circumstances.\textsuperscript{382} Further, the Maharaja of Mysore devolved the responsibility of responding to the State Congress’ demand that the objective of reforms should be declared to be responsible government, onto his Dewan. The Mysore State Congress, under its president, K. Changalaraya Reddy, decided to intensify their struggle and launch a satyagraha in opposition to the stalling of pro-people, democratic reforms. Further, there were also deliberations to cobble together a Unified Karnataka Province on linguistic lines, an effort that came to naught. While the Mysore State Congress made serious plans to go and launch a satyagraha to compel the Mysore Maharaja to institute responsible government in step with the people’s wishes, the tide shifted by 16 July 1947 with Mysore deciding to join the Constituent Assembly.

Travancore, another large and prominent princely state of South India, also declared the decision to be independent on the lapse of paramountcy on 15 August. The rich thorium deposits, important in the arena of atomic energy research, possessed by the state further strengthened the resolve of its rulers to press for independence. The British, too, had a vested interest in these deposits as evident in a secret memorandum, and indeed reports of Travancore having sold rights for the development of its rich thorium sands to a British firm had caused 'countrywide consternation' in the words of the commentator Ramesh Chandra.

Gandhiji expressed surprise at this idea of independence while the Kerala Provincial Congress Committee also opposed this move as per a resolution passed on 20 June. Meanwhile, Pt. Nehru also advised the Madras Government to refuse cooperation with Travancore rulers. Almost simultaneously, the Travancore Government made overtures to Jinnah through its Dewan, C.P. Ramaswamy Aiyer. The Dominion of Pakistan, as a result of these discussions in late June, agreed to receive Mr. Abdul Karim Sahib as representative of the state in the future Dominion of Pakistan with a view to establish a relationship of 'mutual advantage' with this state. This precipitated a range of responses from the Congress, which, at the head of the Interim Government contemplated employing some economic measures against Travancore state. Ashutosh Lahiri, the Hindu Mahasabha leader, also professedly against the independence of Travancore state, nonetheless hoped to cooperate with its rulers, given the substantial Hindu population that lay within it, with a larger view to stall the 'danger of Congress alliance with the Socialists and Communists'. C.P. Ramaswamy Aiyer also extended a hand of cooperation to the Hindu Mahasabha in response. By 10 July, there were reports of repression unleashed by the Travancore state on peaceful meetings of people who held a view contrary to the official position in favour of independence after 15 August. The Communist newspaper People's Age reported a range of reprehensible measures taken by the Travancore state under directives from Sir. C.P. Ramaswamy Aiyer against the people of the state, such as instigating communal tension in a bid to organize armed goondas against the State Congress. Finally on 30 July, Travancore conceded and offered conditional accession to India, partly in response to a series of meetings held between C.P. Ramaswamy Aiyer and Mountbatten.

The maritime state of Cochin was regarded as one of the more constitutionally progressive states by the leaders of the freedom movement; it had also voluntarily decided to join in the working of the Constituent Assembly. Moreover, its progressive character was evident in its many enlightened reforms, for example, in February 1947, it had created a new department for conducting its next general election based on adult franchise while in April 1947 the Cochin government passed a legislation in favour of appointing some members of the depressed class community to certain higher executive posts in Government service. The Communist perspective in the newspaper People's Age, however, portrayed apprehension at the support the ruler of Cochin state gave to the idea of a United Kerala. According to M.M. Cherian’s article of 11 May, the reason the Cochin rulers were pushing this demand of the Malayalee people was not stemming from any sympathies for the idea, as from a desire ‘to swell their might and riches’ by attaching the territories of British Malabar to their own thrones. He called for the Malayalee people to continue in their fight against ‘autocracy in Travancore and Cochin, the end of which is a condition precedent to Democratic India’.

Western Indian States

The area covered by present-day Rajasthan corresponded, pre-Independence, to the region of Rajputana, perhaps the single largest contiguous unit consisting of 18 princely states altogether, like Alwar, Bharatpur, Bikaner, Jodhpur, Tonk, Kotah, among others. In Bharatpur, a duckshoot and hunt which depended on forced labour of poor peasants, organized by the Maharaja in January 1947, precipitated public outcry and subsequent rioting. A clear connection was perceived between the Bharatpur administration and the gangs of goondas who suppressed those who publicly disapproved of the Maharaja’s medievalist attitudes. This incident needs to be understood in view of the larger background of the systematic repression of peoples’ aspirations for a more representative government in Bharatpur. The Praja Parishad of the area thus decided to launch a Satyagraha for the abolition of forced labour, the general lawlessness in the state, and against an administration widely seen as corrupt, incompetent, nepotistic, and ridden by black marketing within its fold. The Bharatpur administration responded to the Satyagraha with a rank repression described by Dr. Pattabhi Sitaramayya as ‘inhuman and devoid of all decency’ which led to the death of one Satyagrahi in February. Bharatpur was moreover one of those princely states of the Rajputana, where, along with Kotah and Jaipur, communal volunteer organizations such as the RSS and the Muslim National Guards had widespread support.

However, what worried the Maharaja of Jodhpur were the peasant meetings in the districts of Bhavi, Jaitaran, and Nimaj held on 26 and 27 January to protest against the highhandedness of the administration. Moreover, there was also a demand from the representative council of the Marwar Lok Parishad for democratic elections to be held at the earliest in Jodhpur and also for the Maharaja to support the Constituent Assembly of India. The Socialist Party opposed what it termed the ‘piecemeal system’ of reforms as proposed by the government of Jaipur, and instead advocated full-fledged responsible government on the basis of adult franchise. The Annual Report of the Rajputana Regional Council of the AISPC released in April 1947 pointed to the largely unsatisfactory nature of pro-people reforms carried out in the princely states of the Rajputana region. While there was direct repression in states like Bharatpur, Dungarpur, and Dholpur, the report noted that the problem of the jagirdar landowners was more acute in bigger states like Jodhpur and Jaipur. Most importantly, the authors of the report condemned the exclusion of any peoples’ representatives in a potential Rajputana Union. The Bhilwara Prajamandal, seconding the resolution of Rajputana States Regional Council, severely opposed the Confederation scheme proposed by Jam Saheb of Nawanagar for the States of Rajputana, Malwar, Gujarat, and Kathiawar, seeing it instead as a plan of the rulers to ‘strengthen the despotic hold … on their subjects’.400

Shankarrao Deo, General Secretary of the AICC, urged the princes of Rajputana at the Ajmer-Merwara Conference held in mid-July to redefine their roles as people’s servants and function as constitutional heads, warning them that if they failed to do so, ‘the power which had thrown off the British yoke would also throw them off’.401 In mid-June 1947, state oppression in Dungarpur and Bharatpur acquired tyrannical proportions with the people continuing to resist despite the repressive activities of the rulers.402

In tune with its policy of befriending rulers of states with a majority Hindu population, the Hindu Mahasabha approached the Maharaja of Alwar in mid-May with a peculiarly interesting request for financial logistical help in setting up a Hindu newspaper. Subsequently, this demand was supported by the Maharaja of Alwar, clearly highlighting the communal proclivities of some princely rulers.403

May was the month that saw the beginning of a refugee influx from Sind and the Punjab into the Rajputana region, resulting in communal tensions, initially in Jodhpur state.404 Beginning in July, communal tension increased drastically across Rajputana, particularly in places like Jodhpur, Jaipur, and Bharatpur.405 There were shocking instances of carnage in Alwar and Bharatpur and Muslims across the states were in the grip of widespread panic.406 By early August, there were reports of conversions to Hinduism on a big scale in the Rajputana States, a trend even noted by the authorities of Jodhpur state.407 Meanwhile, by 10 August, one of the largest states, Jodhpur, signed the Instrument of Accession to India.

Gujarat, located close to the Rajputana states, was also home to several princely states. The Gaekwar rulers of Baroda were seen as being relatively more progressive, declaring their intention to join the Constituent Assembly as early as December 1946. Pt. Nehru, responding warmly to this step of the Baroda princes, reassured them of the ‘large measure of autonomy’ Baroda state would enjoy as a member of the Indian Union.408 The Baroda Prajamandal, however, continued to pressurize the rulers for more thoroughgoing reforms that would portend democratic governance. The Prajamandal was particularly critical of the attempts of the rulers of Baroda, Kathiawar, Kutch, and other states in Gujarat ‘to form a co-federation without the consent and co-operation of the subjects’, viewing such a scheme as a device ‘to maintain the uncontrolled power of these rulers’.409 In smaller states like Kutch, the rulers as well as the representatives of the Prajakiya Parishad were more concerned with being accorded the status of an autonomous unit with its distinctive identity as a prerequisite to joining the Constituent

Assembly of India and were provoked at being clubbed together with Kathiawar and other bigger states.\(^{10}\)

The Ahl-i-Sunnat wal-Jama’at, which claimed to represent Muslim interests in Western India and supported the Muslim League, was wary of the attempts at a confederation of the Gujarat states on the grounds that this would be inimical to Muslims of the region. Instead, they advocated that the state of Junagadh ruled by the Nawabs should incorporate the states of Gujarat and Kathiawar to ‘form a special separate group of the Muslim States’.\(^{41}\) In the princely states in the Kathiawar area as well there was staunch opposition to the idea of the Confederation. Anti-Confederation days were observed all over British Gujarat and the princely states of the region in late-April. By June of that year, the Kathiawar Praja Parishad condemned the confederation scheme and openly proclaimed the need for establishing one single political and administrative unit in the Kathiawar, with entreaties to the kings to entrust administration to the people.\(^{41}\)

Central Indian States

In Central India, there were around 62 states comprising large states like Gwalior and Rewa and smaller ones such as Bijna and Bankapahri. Incidents of communal mobilization were reported as early as January 1947 from the cluster of princely states such as Gwalior, Rampur, Benares, etc. A fortnightly report of mid-January, for example, reports the establishment of a branch of the Muslim League in Bhadohi town, even as there were simultaneous reports of Hindus converting to Sikhism in neighbouring Gopiganj town, the motive being a purely military one vis-à-vis the subsequent sanction to carry the kirpan.\(^{41}\)

At the 20th session of the Sangli State People’s Conference, a resolution was passed that opposed the plans for a Deccan States Union as proposed by the princely rulers of these states. Again, people’s representatives clearly saw this as an attempt by their respective monarchs to continue with their traditional privileges and hold over the populace and evade the imminence of democratic elections. Moreover, they perceived how such a Union would ‘bring about no good to the people as the Deccan States consist of people speaking two different languages and their regions are scattered wide apart’.\(^{41}\) At the meeting of the Students’ Federation in Indore, a resolution was passed which condemned the ‘absolute negation of Civil Liberties’ under the Holkar ruler and suggested that a constituent assembly be summoned to frame a new constitution for the state.\(^{41}\) There was a conflict between the District Congress Committee and the Praja Mandals in Baghelkhand, it being alleged that the former were in the hands of those with vested interests in the states, with the result that instead of serving the people they were serving the interests of the rich and ‘exploiting the name of the Congress for their own purpose’.\(^{41}\)

In most of these states, the impending conclusion of British rule had precipitated a series of reforms from the rulers, which, however, were ‘half-hearted measures’ and hence failed to get public acceptance. On 30 June, for example, the ruling Chief of Lugasi State announced responsible government. The author of a fortnightly report described the facile nature of such reforms thus: 'In many of the states they only decorate the archives of the state departments'.

People in Bhopal state had to also suffer from the authoritarianism of the rulers, who clamped down on the press. H.L. Masurkar, Office Secretary of the AISPC, in a rejoinder to the Bhopal Prime Minister, termed that such a procedure was 'not a mark of civilization and ... is blameworthy whether that is adopted by the States or the provinces or the Central Government'. In April, the Congress dissociated itself from the Bhopal Interim Ministry, since a Congressman had decided to individually accept the post of a minister in the Bhopal government. This went against the stance adopted by the Congress since the Haripura Resolution of 1937 whereby the Congress committees in the states would confine their activities to the constructive programme only while the political activities would be carried on by the States' Peoples' organizations. In Dewas, the Maharaja claimed in a letter to Sardar Patel that the Reforms Act sanctioned by him comprised 'constitutional advance which are the farthest yet attained in Central India'. These reforms provided for adult suffrage and direct elections in the urban areas, while representation would be through village panchayats formed on adult suffrage in the rural areas and these reforms were praised in turn by Sardar Patel. The Nawab of Bhopal was eventually convinced thanks to the efforts of Mountbatten and Patel to sign a Standstill Agreement and the Instrument of Accession on 14 August.

In Indore, while there was public resentment against the Maharaja, he took the courageous step in May 1947, of asking the major public organizations for suggestions on constitutional developments. In May 1947, some 16,000 state government employees of the Holkar government had gone on strike demanding interim relief to meet the rising high prices. May 23 was observed as 'Responsible Government and Constituent Assembly Day' in the state by all people's organizations headed by the Praja Mandal. Peasants and workers also participated in large numbers. This brought forth a wave of repression by the rulers where hundreds were arrested and several others wounded. Pt. Nehru wrote a letter to the ruler in which he condemned him for being on a 'regressive path' of appointing British ministers in his government at a time when the British were quitting India. The Prime Minister of the Interim Government urged him to consider joining the Constituent Assembly or face the consequences of being surrounded by 'a strong Indian Union'.

For the mineral-rich state of Bastar, which was ruled by a minor and in effect under complete control of the Political Department, rumours and fears of it becoming an economic vassal of Hyderabad were rampant amongst AISPC and Congress leaders. Rampur, a state that came into existence in 1774 following a treaty of the British with the rulers of Oudh, had a majority Muslim population. In July, representatives of the Rampur Muslim Conference submitted a memorandum signed by more than 12,000 Muslim subjects to the Nawab in which they opposed integration to India, emphasizing that ‘the natural place for our State is the Pakistan Assembly’.

Wider communal violence also spread to Rampur which prompted the authorities to impose a curfew in August. Interestingly the communal violence in Rampur appeared to take on a visibly anti-establishment character and many state buildings, such as the High Court building and record room were burnt down, telephone and electricity wires were cut, etc.

Eastern Indian States

In Eastern India, there were princely states such as Baudh, Dhenkanal, Sambhalpur in Orissa, Bengal, Tripura, Manipur, and Sikkim. The Socialists played an important role in spreading propaganda against the princely rulers in these areas. The Socialists especially aimed to thwart the separatist movement of the Gurkhas launched in collaboration with the Communists.

A scheme for a United Eastern States Agency which brought together 39 princely states of Orissa and Chhattisgarh regions was adopted by the rulers of this area in a conference as late as one month before Independence, on 14 July 1947. Given the promise of constitutional bodies in such a union, the rulers of its member states felt confident of support from Sardar Vallabhbhai Patel, and hoped ‘to be able to give, and to receive, the largest possible measure of co-operation in matters of mutual interest ... in its relations with the Government of India and provincial Governments’.

In Orissa, the Governor, C.M. Trivedi, was wary of the impact which the speeches of Congressmen would have on people; in particular warning the Congress M.L.A. H.K. Mahtab against ‘utterances which are either incitements to violence, veiled or open, or threatening to the Rulers’. Public grievances in Keonjhar state, which had a population of more than 5,00,000 people, such as the levying of new taxes on the rayots by the administration, the woes of workers, the curb on civil liberties, etc., were voiced to the Congress national leaders by representatives of the Praja Mandal. Interestingly, according to the Praja Pratinidhi, though the Muslims formed the smallest percentage of the population, being businessmen they had control on the administrative authorities, and were apparently ‘harassing the people at [sic] the Co-operation of the State incumbents’. The rulers of Narasingpur expressed tyranny through various measures, the most extreme being the ban on the hoisting of the national flag on August 15, as also an order prohibiting processions or meetings.

The princely states located in Tripura issued prohibitory orders against the cultivation of ‘Jum’ in 1946, with the result that the hill tribes were without crops in 1947 and acute famine was seen all over the northern parts of the state. The rulers of Tripura state were worried about the future of Tripura given its geographical position and the possibility of it joining...
East Pakistan as a result of the Sylhet referendum. N.L. Deb Varman in a letter to the Hindu Mahasabha leader S.P. Mookerjee, firmly expressed the view that ‘as a Hindu majority State, Tripura has inevitably to join Hindusthan with Assam as neighbour’.\textsuperscript{436}

Manipur was ruled by the Meitei Maharaja Meidingu Bodhchandra. The Jorhat District Students Congress strongly condemned the internment by the British of the popular leader Rani Gaidinleu and demanded the ‘immediate withdrawal of this unfair, unjust and repressive measure adopted against her’.\textsuperscript{437} Leaders like Pt. Nehru were more anxious about the issue of Manipur’s representation in the Constituent Assembly.

The issue of the inclusion in the Constituent Assembly, of the tiny state of Sikkim located on the farthest extreme of the Indian subcontinent, was not easily resolved. On the other hand, while Nehru admitted that ‘there is no question that we have the power and authority’ to deal with the representatives of Bhutan, he also acknowledged that ‘it will be recognized to be something entirely different to that of Indian States’.\textsuperscript{438} Wary of the abrogation of their rights in a future Indian Union, the Lepcha community of Darjeeling met with Nehru and Gandhi and vividly articulated their wish that their region be kept as an excluded area under Hindustan or else amalgamated with Sikkim state.\textsuperscript{439}

First of all I would like to thank the distinguished editorial board of the Towards Freedom series, a flagship project of the Indian Council of Historical Research (ICHR), who invited me to edit the volume on 1947 upon the untimely death of the eminent historian Ravinder Kumar. I was particularly gratified to be invited to be the editor as my research supervisor and teacher at Jawaharlal Nehru University, Sarvepalli Gopal, had been the founder and first General Editor of the series. The task before me was not an easy one, as Sarvepalli Gopal, Partha Sarathi Gupta, and Basudev Chatterjee had set exacting standards as editors. Ravinder Kumar, assisted by Gyanesh Kudaisya and others, had done some preliminary work, which I gratefully acknowledge, but most of the work remained to be done. Sabyasachi Bhattacharya as the General Editor extended total support for which I wish to record my appreciation. I was never refused by Arjun Dev, when I turned to him for assistance in his capacity as Coordinator and as an old comrade. At ICHR, the then Chairman, Basudev Chatterjee, Member Secretary, Ishrat Alam, and earlier, Prabhat Shukla, were always there to take care of the administrative concerns.

There was a race against time as the editorial board kept the ship afloat in the face of uninformed politically motivated criticism when the government of the day put two volumes on hold, possibly because it was not convenient for the record of certain political forces to appear as it was, warts and all. If I ended up devoting eight years to assist India towards freedom, in a manner of speaking, it was only because being on the freedom movement trail has become a way of life. Inspired by Bipan Chandra, our much loved teacher, some of us had joined him many summers ago in recording the oral histories of activists of the freedom movement. This was followed by co-authoring India’s Struck for Independence, which is now in its fifty-fifth edition. It was at his instance that I accepted the editorship of this volume at a time when I seemed to be done with 1947, having spent two decades in that time zone. Any value the reader finds in this work is because of the intellectual rigour and passion for the study of this period of history I have absorbed from him. Now that he is no more, there is no one to whom I will run to with this volume, to place before him and see his sense of excitement at it being published. I can only dedicate it to him, a poor substitute for the real thing.

After Bipan Chandra, I would like to acknowledge the support of Mridula and Aditya Mukherjee, D.N. Gupta, Visalakshi Menon, Antony Thomas, Salil Misra, Gyanesh Kudaisya, Rakesh Batabyal, Mahalakshmi, Chandi Nanda, Pritish Acharya, Shri Krishan, among others; all his students who have developed a wonderfully mutually supportive group. Of the group, Visha’s contribution was the greatest, given our close friendship and her experience of editing the volume on 1942. I cannot still believe that such a one as her is no longer with us. Outstanding historian, loyal comrade, devoted friend, you still remain my guardian angel, stopping me from being too loud or too insolent, gently urging me to love those I was wont to oppose.
The vibrant intellectual environment of the Centre for Historical Studies, JNU, has sustained me through the years. My colleagues in the modern India section and on the editorial board of Studies in History were considerate in recognizing my preoccupation with the Towards Freedom volumes. My research students responded to my cri de cœur for help, be it to translate from Assamese or run to Teen Murti to check a document or decide whether to keep the report from the Amrita Bazar Patrika or the Hindustan Standard (I thought both were indispensable).

It was my good fortune that Ashish Koul took a year off from research, just when I began work on the volumes. I could not have wished for a better assistant, indeed partner, who assumed research and editorial duties with equal ease and efficiency. She was a hard taskmaster too, reminding me of my editorial responsibilities when I got immersed in teaching or supervising my research students. Quiet, determined, she would stand at the door of my office, till I joined her for the rest of the day, to plan a volume or decide on an editorial input.

Ashish was assisted by Saumya Dey, Ranjana Saha, Surbhi Mahajan, Gurveen Khurana, Lakhimi Datta and Rachna Mehra. Later Christhu Doss was the sheet anchor, assisted by R. Vineeth among others. Christhu Doss was diligent, enlivened the office with his genial presence and generously plied the team with cakes and coffee, especially when we were working late. Vipul Dutta was amazing in his dedication. He worked on the files sitting in the lounge of the R&R Hospital where his grandmother was admitted.

Saurabh Bajpai and Subir Dey were invaluable in the crucial last stages of preparing the manuscript. Their organizational skills were appreciable and they did everything from crosschecking sources and locating incomplete documents to dealing with overworked typists and assisting me in pruning an oversize manuscript to size. Subir saw the manuscript through press. There is scarcely any aspect of research and publication that he has not ably assisted me in. His judgement is unerring and his capacity for work has increased amazingly over the years as he has imbibed a passion for working with sources of the kind this project requires. Radha Kapuria assisted with research and preparing the manuscript for publication, including a useful draft for the outline.

My research students gave freely of their time at both editorial and publication stages in return for only tea and camaraderie. Arpita Mitra was unfailing in responding to calls for assistance, be it to summarize a chapter, check typed copy, proofread, or vet editorial inputs. So was Gagan Preet Singh, who quietly produced more work than many of us put together. They did this without ever holding an appointment as a research assistant, which makes her contribution doubly valuable. Gagan organized the project files, helped me answer queries and supplied me with possible keywords for the index. Grishma Rana, too, readily pitched in, as did Akanksha Kumar, Nassif Ali, Sudha Tiwari, and Shashi Bhushan Gupta. Binayak Kumar Datta sent references pertaining to Sylhet. I wish to record my appreciation of their inputs and those of any I may have missed out inadvertently.

In the few cases where documents in different Indian languages have been included, translations have been done by my students. Rahul Kumar Ishwar translated from Hindi, Lakhimi Datta consulted copies of Axomiya and translated passages from Assamese, and Shweta Shetty translated a document from Marathi.

I wish to thank the directors of the National Archives of India, Nehru Memorial Museum and Library, Delhi State Archives, West Bengal State Archives, Punjab State Archives, Rajasthan State Archives, and P.C. Joshi Archives of Contemporary History, JNU, for permitting us to consult and reproduce documents from their holdings. Mridula Mukherjee facilitated our research greatly when she was Director of Nehru Memorial Museum and Library. Gopa of the manuscript section of the Nehru Memorial Library helped check references and locate files. One could turn to Jaya Ravindran Menon in the National Archives of India for help at any time. The staff of the PC Joshi Archives of Contemporary History in JNU were a great help in tapping its rich resources. The Archives also provided a temporary workplace during the years I was Chairperson.

The team of typists, led by Shahjahan, deserve appreciation as they had an unenviable task of deciphering copies of faded newsprint made on antiquated photocopiers.

Thanks go out to the editorial team of Oxford University Press who brought to bear to the volume their vast experience of publishing the Towards Freedom series.

As always, my family, especially Bodh, Mridula, and Aditya, provided invaluable help, having to double up as editorial consultants and sounding boards. Bodh brought to the manuscript his expertise on the subject of partition narratives. Mridula and Aditya, with the keen eye of the historian and shared passion for the subject, reminded me of the broader picture of a hard-won freedom when it seemed I could not see beyond the minutiae of the local communal riot. When I was invited to be editor of the volume on 1947, the General Editor of the series estimated the work would take me six months. It has devoured sabbaticals, leave, vacations, and hours after office and weekends for over eight years. At such times, my children, Varun and Srikant, were a much needed reality check, reminding me that there was life beyond 1947. Perhaps I so easily seemed to live in 1947 because the big story of 1947, the subject of this volume, intersected with the small tale of 1947 of my parents, Vidya Dhar and Savitri, who, like countless displaced persons, crossed the newly etched boundaries to start new lives in a refugee colony in Delhi. As a child I remember that the reference point in many a conversation was ‘those days’, before everything changed. In a sense working on this volume on 1947 was only a continuation of the family tale.

Chapter 25. Constituent Assembly

1. K.M. Panikkar Argues Against a Federal Constitution for India

Extract from a note by K.M. Panikkar dated May 1947 circulated among members of the Union Constitution Committee, 4 June 1947

B. Shiva Rao (Ed.), Framing of India's Constitution, Vol. II, pp. 533-8

I propose in this note to supplement the answers I have furnished to the questionnaire issues by the Constitutional Adviser. My views on the specific issues raised in that document are contained in the replies and are not dealt with here. In this note I confine myself to a few general observations which I think are of fundamental importance to the constitutional structure of India.

2. It is generally held that in any constitution devised for India, there should be a clear demarcation between the powers of the Union and the powers of the constituent units. This has almost become a doctrine of constitutional orthodoxy. From Hamilton's Federalist to Dicey's Law of the Constitution theorists have held steadfastly to this view. But it has to be remembered that this doctrine of division of powers is one that prevailed in a time of peace and tranquillity; that in periods of national stresses it invariably broke down, or was subjected to so much strain as to create perpetual constitutional crises. In the United States of America the breakdown of the federal principle—though it had been going on slowly for a century—became so marked that the late President Wilson declared that the United States from a plural verb had changed to a singular one. It became patent to all during the bitter fight between President Roosevelt and the Supreme Court, ending in the surrender of the judiciary when the courts finally came to the conclusion that, 'the national government is entitled to employ any and all the powers to forward any and all the objects of good government'. In a recent book entitled The Fiscal Impact of Federalism in the United States, Professor Maxwell shows also how the ramifications of fiscal control have to a very great extent nullified the constitutional division of powers in the United States. Nor has the position been much better in Canada, where though as a result of the special predominance of Quebec and Ontario the Federation has some special characteristics. But the development of the last 20 years, specially in the matter of federal subsidies, has been such that Premier Drew of Ontario has recently declared that the provincial governments have been reduced to the status of 'Pensioners of Ottawa' bereft of any real control over their financial fortunes.

3. The demarcation of Union and Provincial powers which federalism involves, is to my mind a dead issue, and the idea which has gained prevalence that the Indian Constitution must be of the federal type is definitely dangerous to the strength, prosperity and welfare of India. Federation is a fair-weather constitution and in the circumstances of India it is likely to be a dangerous experiment leaving the national government with but limited powers, weak and consequently incapable of dealing with national problems. The American example is totally inapplicable to our circumstances as the United States of America had a hundred years of peaceful development to enable it to build up a strong Centre.

4. Federation, with limited powers for the Centre, was an unavoidable evil in India, so long as the Muslim majority Provinces had to be provided for in an All-India Centre. Now whether the partition comes, or whether a Hindustan constitution is created with a loosely confederated Centre, the necessity for a federal constitution has ceased. It is no longer necessary to provide for the very large measure of power for the units, which a full Union with the Muslim majority Provinces would have rendered unavoidable. I would, therefore, very strongly urge, that the basic principle of the Constitution should be a unitary one, with large devolution of powers to the Provinces, and the suitable provisions for the States and other units so desiring to accede in a limited manner to the Centre.

5. This, in fact, has been the administrative and political tradition of India. The Regulating Act established a unitary government and the great provincial administrations were no more than local governments, as they were formally designated. The 1935 Act brought in the idea of Federation, primarily because such a conception reduced the possibility of a Hindu majority Centre dominating the Muslim majority Provinces and also in a measure to enable the States to accede to a Union. The experience of the last ten years, especially in relation to famine and food administration, has shown the weakness of this system. At least for the Hindustan area what we have to do is to go back to the idea of the Regulating Act, i.e., the supremacy of the Centre over the Provinces, while normally keeping with the Provinces the same powers as are given to them in the Act of 1935.

6. Further, let it be remembered that never has Federation as a constitutional device been supported or accepted, except where the independence of the units made any other system impracticable. There has never been a case of a unitary system breaking up and then joining as units in a Federation. In the 1935 Act so far as British India was concerned the limitation of Central authority was considered unavoidable in order to give the guarantee of freedom to the Muslim majority Provinces. Since that question no longer has to be considered, the raison d’être of breaking up the Central structure of British India vanishes and the never-too-desirable system of government based on checks, prohibitions, and limitations, all trying to stunt the growth of a united nationhood, need no longer be considered. Federation for British India is no longer a necessity and should definitely be eschewed.

II

7. How will the States fit into such a scheme? It is clear that if a unitary government is postulated for a Union of the Provinces, the States cannot be brought into it except by force. The alternative is what was contemplated in the 1935 Act, that the States should join the Union only for a limited range of subjects more or less similar to the subjects included in List I of the Seventh Schedule attached to that Act. The accession of the States must be on a uniform basis, i.e., there should be no variation in the powers that the Union will exercise in relation to each State. This does not, however, mean that fiscal, financial and administrative arrangements should not exist with individual States or groups of States in matters where special rights exist. For example, if customs duty is a Central subject, then the legislative authority of the Union must be uniform in regard to all States, though arrangements may be negotiated with maritime States for administration of custom duties and financial agreements may be entered into with them for sharing the revenue. The general conception of the scheme should be what it was before 1935—a unitary Central Government of India entering into agreements with the States. Up to now such agreements show great variation. In the case of the Union Government, a uniform principle will be followed subject to administrative, financial and fiscal arrangement where necessary....

IV

16. What should be the objective of our Constitution? That has been clearly defined in the Resolution of the Constituent Assembly. What we have to examine is whether a federal constitution such as the one generally contemplated will meet the defined objective; or indeed any objective which has the creation of a firm Indian nationhood as its ideal. George Washington after two terms of Presidency warned the infant United States against the danger to the Union of the prevalent ideas of local patriotism, and that passage is worth quoting:

The unity of Government, which constitutes you one people, is also now dear to you. It is justly so: for it is a main pillar in the edifice of your real independence, the support of your tranquility at home, your peace abroad, of your safety, of your prosperity; of that very liberty, which you so highly prize. But as it is easy to foresee that from different causes and from different quarters, much pains will be taken, many artifices employed to weaken in your minds the conviction of this truth, as this is the point in your political fortress against which the batteries of internal and external enemies will be most constantly and actively (though often covertly and insidiously) directed, it is of infinite moment, that you should properly estimate the immense value of your national union to your collective and individual happiness, that you should cherish a cordial, habitual, and immovable attachment to it, accustoming yourselves to think and speak of it as of the palladium of your political safety and prosperity, watching for its preservation with jealous anxiety, discountenancing whatever may suggest even a suspicion that it can in any event be abandoned, and indignantly frowning upon the first dawning of every attempt to alienate any portion of our country from the rest, or to enfeeble the sacred ties which now link together the various parts.

17. The tendency of the Provinces to fall apart is already noticeable; and it cannot be presumed that there will be a High Command always watching and supervising the activities of Provincial Ministries. It cannot also be presumed that the party High Command will in future carry the same weight vis-à-vis the Provincial Ministries. One thing should be clear. In a federation, the all-India Centre will not have authority over the Provinces and the structure of administrative unity built up in Hindustan will fall to pieces unless the Centre is given an overriding power. The unity of law which binds the people together may itself vanish unless civil and criminal law is uniform. Company legislation, banking, insurance and other spheres of economic activity have to be controlled by uniform laws: otherwise we shall see the chaos of Delaware corporations magnified beyond imagination. And above all, planning has to be a Central subject. So the form of federation will be seen to mean little when the realities of economic problems have to be faced.

18. It may be asked how the States will function in relation to such a unified Central Government in India. As stated before, their accession will only be for a limited list of subjects, covering what may be called the present list of all-India subjects. In matters like civil and criminal law, company and banking legislation, the States accept the British Indian legislation as normative and will follow it in the main as they do even now. As long as the British Indian Provinces are united in a strong Centre, the problem of approximating the States to the policies of the Union in subjects on which they do not accede may well be left to the pressure of public opinion in the States.

19. Essentially the question to answer is: What does India expect of a Central constitution? Is it merely meant to look after Defence, Foreign Affairs and Communications? Even the Cabinet Mission contemplated that at least so far as the group constitutions were concerned the functions would cover a much larger range. Now we are really combining both group and Central functions and naturally we have to approach the problem not merely from the point of view of the three subjects earmarked for the Centre but also of the primary social functions of the State, which would have been left to the groups. The limitation of Central power, which a federal constitution implies, denies the social functions of the State so far as the Union is concerned. In Canada the entire fight with the Provinces has been on the question of social services. In America the New Deal controversies raised the same issue. In India the problem is much more important. The main function of government will be to raise the standards of the common man, to educate him, to provide him with medical facilities and to create in all a loyalty to the Union, without which the whole structure will break down. To place the emphasis on the rights of the units, as a federal system must inevitably do, and to entrust the effectuation of those rights to courts is to put a premium on backwardness and to invite disaster.

2. ‘Strong Federal Centre: Provision in Future Constitution of Hindustan’

Extract from a report in The Tribune, 8 June 1947

NEW DELHI, June 7.—The future constitution of India would provide for a strong federal centre, with residuary powers vested in it, but this would not affect the position of the Indian states who had already joined the Constituent Assembly and those who are expected to join it in the near future. Insofar as the States are concerned, it is understood, their relations with the Centre would be on the basis of the Cabinet Mission plan, namely, that they would surrender only three subjects, foreign affairs, defence and communications to the Centre.

This decision is believed to have been taken at a joint meeting of the Union and provincial constitution committees of the Constituent Assembly this afternoon.

It is understood that the Provincial Constitution Committee, on which provincial Premiers are represented and which is to present to the Constituent Assembly a draft provincial constitution, was of the opinion that there should be reversal of the Cabinet Mission’s plan insofar as the provincial constitutions are concerned. The suggestion was that there should be a powerful Centre, which should delegate certain subjects to the provinces for administration.

The Union Constitution Committee was, however, not prepared to accept this suggestion and the question was discussed at a joint meeting of both these two committees today.

It is understood it was decided that the future Central Government would be a strong federal government.

It is proposed to have three lists, federal, concurrent and provincial. On the concurrent list provision would be made for the Centre to override the provinces under certain circumstances.

The Provincial Draft Constitution Committee which is now settling the principles before making a draft, it is understood, has decided to retain the office of provincial Governors as the office of the Governor would be an elective position.
3. ‘Bi-Cameral Legislature for Free India, Precedent of British Parliament Recommended’

_The Tribune, 11 June 1947_

NEW DELHI, June 10.—A bi-cameral union legislature on the pattern of the British Parliament, it is understood, has been recommended for an independent India by the Union Constitution Drafting Committee of the Constituent Assembly at its meeting held on Monday afternoon.

The lower house is proposed to be called the House of People while the upper house will be known as the House of States where the Indian States in the Indian Union shall have representation. The membership of the House of People will be 500 and that of the House of States 250, according to recommendations.

The powers of the two Houses of the Indian Union have been recommended to be based on the precedent provided by the British constitutional system.

The House of People alone will be competent to initially consider the legislation on all matters pertaining to finance. In other matters legislation can originate in either of the two Houses.

The Committee for drawing up a model constitution for the provinces held another sitting yesterday when, it is understood, important decisions were taken regarding the nature of the provincial executive.

It is understood the Committee approved of the idea of having elected Governors on the votes based on adult franchise. The provincial executive consisting of the Governors and Ministers would, according to the committee’s decision, be removable by adverse votes in the legislature. The legislature would be for a term of four years and the normal tenure of office of the Governor would be five years.—United Press.

4. Visits of the Tribal Area Sub-Committee of the Constituent Assembly

My dear Sir,

...2. Two Committees appointed by the Constituent Assembly for laying down the principles of the Union Constitution and drawing up a sort of model Constitution for the Province have now practically completed their work. Their reports will be ready soon and will be circulated to the members. The Constituent Assembly itself is likely to meet about the middle of July to consider the reports of these Committees as also other matters left over for consideration by the last session. Thereafter the actual drafting of the Constitution will be taken in hand and when the draft is ready we may sit continuously for a number of days to pass the Constitution. This is the programme as at present envisaged.

3. The Tribal Area Sub-Committee has been touring the different parts of the country where there are tribes and Chhotanagpur remains to be visited by them. I think it was sometime ago that, perhaps, the question of separation of Chhotanagpur from Bihar was raised by Mr. Jaipal Singh and the people of his way of thinking, and Sjt. Jagjivan Ram, having come to know of this, took the precaution of writing to you and to the Ministers to resist any such move if it is taken. The date of the visit of the Sub-Committee is not yet, as far as I know, settled. I say as far as I know because the Sub-Committee makes its own programme and I am not in possession at the moment of writing of what they have decided. But I know that a request has been made by various persons including Mr. Jaipal Singh that the visit might be postponed for a later date. I do not know what has been decided on that and will write to you later when the date is definitely fixed. Perhaps you will know that from other sources also. You may keep the memorandum which Sjt. Jagjivan Ram has asked you to prepare ready so that it may be placed before the Sub-Committee, if required, but it is just possible that the Sub-Committee may hold that it is not within its terms of reference to consider this question and, therefore, it should not take any evidence on that point for it may not make recommendations on it. The question was, I understand, referred to the Constitutional Adviser and I am told that his opinion is that it does not come under the terms of reference of the Sub-Committee. If that view is taken by the Chairman of the Sub-Committee, Thakkar Bapa, and I am told that is his provisional view also, then the question may not arise but in any case it would be better for you to be ready to deal with it. I hope you will be attending the Constituent Assembly in July. The Sub-Committee will probably see to it that its visit does not clash with the session of the Constituent Assembly.

Yours affectionately,

Rajendra Prasad

After dictating the above, I understand that the visit of the Sub-Committee is put off for the present.

5. ‘DR. RAJENDRA PRASAD OUTLINES TENTATIVE TIME-TABLE: Constitution of Hindustan by October’

   Extract from an editorial in The Tribune, 17 June 1947

NEW DELHI, June 16.—...A vital issue is being tackled by the committee of legal and constitutional experts, namely, the issue of citizenship.

The issue would have been simple if the country had remained undivided. With partition inevitable, several complicated problems arise, but the pivotal point relates to the definition of citizenship.

The questions that arise are (1) Should there be two citizenships within India? (2) Should there be common citizenship between the two separate states of India? (3) Should there be dual citizenship?
The position becomes more difficult because, while the country is being divided on the demand of a large bulk of Muslims, there will be about three to four crores of Muslims within the Indian Union.

They demanded the division of the country and now they have to decide whether their allegiance would be to the Indian Union or to the separate Muslim State. Whose citizens would they be and prefer to be?

Even if for temporal advantages they may remain citizens of the Indian Union, their loyalty may be put to a test on crucial occasions. Could they be given key positions in the Indian Union if there is tension between the Indian Union and the Muslim State?

6. Citizens Should Concentrate on Fundamental Duties

_Collected Works of Mahatma Gandhi_ (hereafter _CWMG_), Vol. LXXXVIII, pp. 230–2

BROTHERS AND SISTERS,

What I am going to tell you today will be something very special. I hope you will hear me with attention and try to digest what I say. When someone does something good he makes the whole world partake of the good. When someone does something bad, though he cannot make the world share his action he can certainly cause harm. The Constituent Assembly is discussing the rights of the citizen. That is to say they are deliberating on what the fundamental rights should be. As a matter of fact the proper question is not what the rights of a citizen are, but rather what constitutes the duties of a citizen. Fundamental rights can only be those rights the exercise of which is not only in the interest of the citizen but that of the whole world. Today everyone wants to know what his rights are, but if a man learns to discharge his duties right from childhood and studies the sacred books of his faith he automatically exercises his rights too. I learnt my duties on my mother’s lap. She was an unlettered village woman. She was unable even to sign her name. Nobody in those days thought of learning to read and write by employing tutors. I am telling you of things seventy years ago. My father was a Diwan, but at that time a Diwan did not have to be particularly well versed in English. He dressed himself in an angarkha and wore village-style shoes. He did not even know what trousers were. My mother taught me to repeat Ramanama. She knew my dharma. Thus if from childhood we learn what our dharma is and try to follow it, our rights look after themselves. I could live only on condition that I drank the milk that my mother gave me. If I had shirked the obligation to drink milk I would have forfeited my right to live. The beauty of it is that the very performance of a duty secures us our right. Rights cannot be divorced from duties. This is how satyagraha was born, for I was always striving to decide what my duty was.

Today we notice a strange phenomenon. He who is a ruler for a moment gets it into his head that he has been created by God solely to rule over people, that he has the right to hang some, to imprison others and to fine some others. He wants that all the duties should be discharged by the people. He says he has derived his right to rule from God. Industrial workers and industrial magnates are demanding their respective rights. The zamindar insists on his rights, the peasant on his. But there are no such two classes here that one of them should exercise only rights and the other discharge only duties. If a ruler shirks his duties while the people do theirs then the people become the ruler. If the ruler does his duty and considers himself the trustee of his people he will survive. But if he becomes authoritarian he cannot survive in this age. Till now we have been sunk in darkness. The rulers have forgotten their duties and so have the ruled. The rajas have only been repeating that they were descended from the sun or the moon.

But in truth a sovereign is only the first servant of the people. It is the duty of the servant to surrender all to the master and then live on what is left over. The people similarly should learn to do their duty. They are in millions. If they are so disposed they can kill the ruler. But by so doing they will only harm themselves. If we keep our streets clean and well lighted or do something similar we should do it as a duty. Every one of us should become a scavenger. A man who does not first become a scavenger cannot live, nor has he a right to live and we are all scavengers in some sense or other even if we do not admit it. If the people pay taxes it is not so as to fill the coffers of the ruler but because without that the administration cannot function. The same thing applies to mill-workers and mill-owners. Here at hand and around is squalor in the Harijan quarter. When I see it my heart cries out at our worthlessness. I live in such beautiful and clean surroundings while they have to wallow in dirt. Mill-owners should similarly first feed the workers and themselves eat only afterwards. But even if the mill-owners do not do their duty, does it mean that the workers should kill them? They can certainly do so. But then the whole structure would collapse. They gain nothing by frightening the mill-owners.

They would themselves be behaving as masters then. If they want to improve their lot they must not forget that they will earn their rights only by doing their duty. There are today millions of workers. If they forget their duty anarchy and chaos will result.

Every man is born a debtor. The scripture also says that we are born debtors in the world to which we owe a debt and we are dependent on others right from birth. Man becomes man only by recognizing his dependence on others.

7. Socialist Party to Join the Constituent Assembly

Letter from Jawaharlal Nehru to Jayaprakash Narayan, 5 July 1947

Selected Works of Jawaharlal Nehru (hereafter SWJN), Vol. III, p. 132

New Delhi

My dear Jayaprakash,

I have received your letter of the 3rd July. I am very glad that you have decided to allow members of the Socialist Party to join the Constituent Assembly. We shall welcome the persons you have suggested and we shall try to get them in; but I may point out that it is no easy matter now for vacancies to be created or to be filled. This is largely a provincial matter and there is a tremendous desire among Congressmen to come into the Constituent Assembly, more especially as this is going to function as a Legislative Assembly. It is difficult to issue orders from here as to who should be elected and who should not. In some Provinces it will be relatively easier than in others. So far as I know, there are not likely to be many vacancies, as most people want to stick on to the Constituent Assembly anyhow.

I have sent a copy of your letter to Rajendra Babu.

Yours sincerely,

Jawaharlal Nehru
8. Report of the Union Powers Committee
Forwarded in a letter from Jawaharlal Nehru to Rajendra Prasad, 5 July 1947

From
Pandit Jawaharlal Nehru
Chairman, Union Powers Committee

To
The President
Constituent Assembly of India

Sir,

On the 28th April 1947, the Hon’ble Sir N. Gopalaswamy Ayyangar on behalf of our Committee, presented our first report to the Constituent Assembly. In doing so, he referred to the changes that were developing in the political situation and were likely to affect the nature and scope of the Committee’s recommendations, and sought permission to submit a supplementary report at a later date. The House was pleased to grant us leave to do so.

2. Momentous changes have since occurred. Some parts of the country are seceding to form a separate State, and the plan put forward in the Statement of the 16th May on the basis of which the Committee was working is, in many essentials, no longer operative. In particular we are not now bound by the limitations on the scope of Union Powers. The first point accordingly that we considered was whether, in the changed circumstances, the scope of these powers should not be widened. We had no difficulty in coming to a conclusion on this point. The severe limitation on the scope of central authority in the Cabinet mission’s plan was a compromise accepted by the Assembly much, we think, against its judgement of the administrative needs of the country, in order to accommodate the Muslim League. Now that partition is a settled fact, we are unanimously of the view that it would be injurious to the interests of the country to provide for a weak central authority which would be incapable of ensuring peace, of coordinating vital matters of common concern and of speaking effectively for the whole country in the international sphere. At the same time, we are quite clear in our minds that there are many matters in which authority must lie solely with the Units and that to frame a constitution on the basis of a unitary State would be a retrograde step, both politically and administratively. We have accordingly come to the conclusion—a conclusion which was also reached by the Union Constitution Committee—that the soundest framework for our constitution is a federation, with a strong Centre. In the matter of distributing powers between the Centre and the Units, we think that the most satisfactory arrangement is to draw up three exhaustive lists on the lines followed in the Government of India Act of 1935, viz., the federal, the provincial and the concurrent. We have prepared three such lists accordingly and these are shown in the Appendix.1

We think that residuary powers should remain with the Centre. In view however of the exhaustive nature of the three lists draw up by us, the residuary subjects could only relate to matters which, while they may claim recognition in the future, are not at present indentifiable and cannot therefore be included now in the lists.

3. It is necessary to indicate the position of Indian States in the scheme proposed by us. The States which have joined the Constituent Assembly have done so on the basis of the 16th May Statement. Some of them have expressed themselves as willing to cede wider powers to the Centre than contemplated in that Statement. But we consider it necessary to point out that the application to States in general of the federal list of subjects, in so far as it goes beyond the 16th May Statement, should be with their consent. It follows from this that in their case residuary powers would vest with them unless they consent to their vesting in the Centre.

4. To enable States and, if they so think fit, Provinces also, to cede wider powers to the Centre, we recommend that the constitution should empower the Federal Government to exercise authority within the Federation on matters referred to them by one or more Units, it being understood that the law would extend only to the Units by whom the matter is referred or which afterwards adopt the law. This follows the Australian model as set out in section 51 (xxxvii) of the Australian Constitution Act.

5. We have included in the federal list the item ‘the strength, organisation and control of the armed forces raised and employed in Indian States’. Our intention in doing so is to maintain all the existing powers of co-ordination and control exercised over such forces.

6. We recommend to the Assembly the proposals contained in para 2-D of our previous report on the subject of federal taxation. It is quite clear, however, that the retention by the Federation of the proceeds of all the taxes specified by us would disturb, in some cases violently, the financial stability of the Units and we recommend therefore that provision should be made for an assignment, or a sharing, of the proceeds of some of these taxes on a basis to be determined by the Federation from time to time.

I have the honour to be,

Sir,

Your most obedient servant,

Jawaharlal Nehru

Chairman

9. Changes in the Constituent Assembly after the Acceptance of Partition

Extracts from the proceedings of the Constituent Assembly of India, 14 July 1947

Constituent Assembly Debates, Vol. IV, pp. 537–54

...Mr. President: Members who have not yet presented their credentials and signed the Register will do so now.

(The Secretary then called out the name of Haji Abdul Sathar Ham Ishaq Sait.)

Mr. Deshbandhu Gupta: (Delhi): Mr. President, may I rise to a point of order?

Before the Honourable Member is called upon to sign the Register, I would like to know whether it would not be fair to this House to ask whether he still subscribes to the Two-Nation theory or not? I take it that, as a sovereign body, and in view of the Partition that has been decided upon, we should review the whole question and lay down that a Member who does not subscribe to the Objectives Resolution that has been passed cannot sign the Register.

I want your ruling, Sir.
Mr. President: An interesting point has been raised. But I do not consider it is a point of order at all. It is a question of the right of Members who have been elected to the Constituent Assembly under the procedure laid down. Any one who has been elected is entitled to sit in this House as long as he does not resign. Therefore I do not think I can prevent any Member who has been elected duly from signing the Register.

The following Members then presented their Credentials and signed their names in the Register:

Mr. President: Is there any other member who has not signed the Register yet? I take it that there is no one here who has not signed the Register yet.

Shri Balkrishna Sharma: (United Provinces: General): Mr. President, before you proceed to take up the business of the day I beg to put forward, with your permission, some questions for consideration. Sir, have I your permission?

Mr. President: The practice so far has been that, when any question is brought forward, it is considered whether permission to debate any matter relating to it is to be given or not. No question has been raised so far. I do not know what you intend saying. I think that permission will be given if what you intend saying is found to be proper and in order.
Shri Balkrishna Sharma: Though no question has so far been raised yet my prayer is that I may be permitted to explain my purpose, and a discussion may follow on it thereafter.

Mr. President: I do not know what you intend saying. If you had seen me and explained your purpose before, I may have given you permission. As no question has been so far raised, I do not see how I can give you the permission to speak at this moment.

Shri Biswanath Das: (Orissa: General): Mr. President, before you go on to the other items of the agenda I beg to invite your attention to the communiqué issued under the authority of Government on the decision regarding allotment of Armed Forces as per recommendations of the Sub-Committee. Sir, the decision is said to be final. It is said that it is a rough and ready division on communal basis based on the unanimous recommendation of the Armed Forces Reconstitution Sub-Committee, and it is said that this relates to allotment of ships etc., and that the requirements of each Dominion have been kept in view.

Mr. President: Mr. Das, I do not think the Constituent Assembly as such is concerned with any statement in any newspaper, at any rate, at this stage. Therefore the question does not arise.

Shri Biswanath Das: I am only submitting to you the contents to judge the relevancy of it. This concerns important questions of division of assets of India and has made us all anxious. This is practically the Legislature and Sovereign body. This matter is agitating the minds of all people.

Mr. President: I think you are suffering under a misapprehension. We are not yet the Legislative Assembly. We are still only the Constituent Assembly as it has been functioning so far. If this were the Legislative Assembly you might perhaps bring that in. Now I do not think that question arises. ...

ADDRESS BY PRESIDENT

Mr. President: Hon'ble Members, we are meeting today after an interval of two and a half months. During this period many important events have occurred to which I believe I should refer. The most important of these was the statement of His Majesty’s Government made on June, the 3rd. This statement has profoundly affected Indian politics. One of its results has been the division of India, and it has also been decided to partition two provinces. Further, as a consequence of this, discussions are taking place, so far as I know, in the Government of India and the Provinces concerned regarding the details of the Partition, and actual work relating to Partition is also proceeding. Besides this, changes in the membership of this Constituent Assembly have occurred. In place of the members who formerly represented Bengal and Punjab some new and some former members have been returned in the new elections held in these two (which have now become four) provinces. Many States which had so far kept aloof from this Assembly have now sent in their representatives. The members belonging to the Muslim League who had so far remained absent are also attending the Assembly now.

The Constituent Assembly had appointed a number of Sub-Committees. Reports of these Sub-Committees have appeared in the Press and also been sent to the members. These reports, as they are now ready, will be placed before the House from time to time and you will be called upon to give your considered decisions on them. One of these Sub-Committees had been appointed to draft a model Constitution for the Provinces. Another was appointed to determine and recommend to us the principle on which the Union Constitution was to be based, and to prepare a rough draft of the Union Constitution as well. A third Committee was appointed to consider and determine the powers of the Union and submit its report relating to them. The reports of all the three Committees are now ready. One of these reports has been presented to the House for consideration and the reports of the other committees will be presented in due course, and I hope that the House will take its decision on them after due consideration during this session. It is my suggestion, and I believe you will approve of it, that after the House has accepted the reports some persons may be appointed to prepare the detailed draft of the Constitution, and that a Committee be appointed to go through this draft carefully and to submit its opinion on it to this House when it meets again. The draft will then be introduced in this House for detailed consideration and acceptance. Thus the Constitution would be finalised.

Another committee known as the Advisory Committee had been appointed, but it has not completed its work. It has set up the following Sub-Committees—Minority Sub-Committee, Fundamental Rights Sub-Committee, Tribal and Excluded Areas Sub-Committee. These Sub-Committees are parts of the former. One of these Sub-Committees has submitted its report, but the reports of the other two are not ready as yet. I hope that very soon the reports of these Sub-Committees will also be submitted, so that when the Constitution is drafted these may be incorporated therein and the Constitution when finally accepted may be complete in all respects.

It is my hope that, if all this is done properly, we shall be able to pass the Constitution finally after due consideration in the October meeting of the Assembly. I want that the work of the Constituent Assembly should be speeded up, because, as you are aware, according to the proposed Indian Independence Bill the Constituent Assembly would also function as the Legislative Assembly, and already there are many matters pending before the Legislative Assembly which must be taken into consideration. After some time the Budget Session would also be due. Consequently, the earlier we finish the work of the Constituent Assembly the sooner we shall have the opportunity to take in hand the work of the Legislative Assembly.
But I do not want that the work of the Constituent Assembly should be done in such a hurry as to spoil any part of it. Every matter will have to be decided after full consideration. In placing this proceed hurriedly to finish the work early, irrespective of whether its consequences are good or bad. On the other hand, you must devote so much time to each matter as you consider desirable. But if you keep in view that we have to do, sitting as the Legislative Assembly, other work also, we must finish our present work as early as possible.

I welcome all the new members, and they are many, who are present today. I hope that all of us together will finish, as early as possible, the work of the Constituent Assembly and will give a Constitution that shall be agreeable and acceptable to all....

ELECTION CHANGES FROM BENGAL AND PUNJAB

Shri Sri Prakasa: (U.P. General): Mr. President, so far as I know it was said at the time the elections to this Constituent Assembly were held that no outside authority had any control over it. I would like to be informed whether you were consulted about the changes that have taken place in Bengal and Punjab. Have these changes taken place according to the rules made by this Assembly? So far as I am aware, members of this Assembly lose their membership when they submit their resignation. I would like to know if the members for Bengal and Punjab, who are no more members, lost their membership by submitting their resignation or as a result of the Viceroy’s statement which led to new elections being held. If this is what has happened, and this appears to be the actual case, I would like to know your opinion on this matter and whether you consider all this proper and regular or not. We were told that once the Constituent Assembly was elected, neither any changes would be made in its constitution nor could any outsider have any authority or control over it. It appears to me that all these changes have taken place according to the statement of the Viceroy—a proceeding which is improper, unjust, illegal and contrary to the rules.

Mr. President: Your statement that these changes are the result of the Viceroy’s statement and the consequential action taken by him on it is correct. But I believe that everyone has consented to these changes being made and so also have we done. The question of invalidity, therefore, does not arise. Moreover, now no one from among the members who had been formerly elected and have now lost their membership has submitted any petition against the termination of his membership. The newly elected members are members of this Assembly and shall continue to take part in its proceedings.

Shri Balkrishna Sharma: Mr. President, I want to draw the attention of the House to a point arising out of your statement. It is this. You have in your opening statement welcomed the new members and have expressed the hope that they will make their contribution to the proceedings of this Assembly and will help in the framing of such a constitution for our India....

Mr. President: Are you making a speech or asking a question?

Shri Balkrishna Sharma: Sir, I am asking a question.

Mr. President: Please ask the question now.

Shri Balkrishna Sharma: My question is that when you expressed this hope it must not have escaped you that the election of some members, and their number is appreciable, has been through a special procedure and that they are participating in the Assembly while putting faith in the two nation theory....

Mr. President: You have started making a speech; or are you asking a question?

Shri Balkrishna Sharma: Have you been given the assurance that those who have been elected on the basis of the two-nation theory, will associate in your work after renouncing the two-nation theory and cooperate in furthering the common task?

Mr. President: A similar point was raised by Shri Deshbandhu Gupta. I then said in reply that I had no authority to forbid the members who had been duly elected from attending. I have therefore asked for no assurance and no assurance has been given to me. I have accepted all those who have been duly elected as members and on this we are acting. What all of you do here will show the intentions of each and all.

An Honourable Member: We could not follow your reply, Sir, in Hindi.

Mr. President: The question has been put in Hindi and I have to answer it in Hindi. If anyone puts a question in English I will answer it in English.

Pandit Govind Malaviya: (United Provinces: General): Sir, I would like to ask a question in order to clarify a point. My Honourable friend Mr. Sri Prakasa has raised a question, viz., that this Constituent Assembly being a sovereign body and in view of the fact that members who had been previously elected had not resigned, how have others taken their places. You,
Constituent Assembly

Sir, were good enough to say that everybody seemed to have acquiesced in this position and therefore it was right. I want to ask you, Sir, whether the position is not this that if any parts of the country decide to go out of the country, or secede from it, as, happily or unhappily, parts of two provinces have by their own vote decided to, the members from those parts of the country no longer have the right to continue as members of this Assembly? I want to get this point clarified, for, in future, it will be very important. I submit that the moment any part of the country decides not to remain part of India, automatically it loses all rights with regard to this Assembly.

Mr. President: I take it that any member elected from a part of a Province which has seceeded [sic] is not entitled to sit here: and I do not think any member like that is here.

Mr. H.J. Khandekar: What about Mr. Sidhwa?

Mr. President: Mr. Sidhwa was your representative, (Laughter), and elected by you from the C.P. and Berar.

MESSAGE FROM THE CHAIRMAN OF THE BURMA CONSTITUENT ASSEMBLY

Mr. President: We shall now go to the next item of business.

I am sure the Assembly will be glad to hear the message we have received from the Chairman of the Burma Constituent Assembly, in reply to the message that we had sent them.

‘On behalf of myself and the Constituent Assembly of Burma, I desire to thank you most warmly for your very kind message of goodwill and good wishes which has been most deeply appreciated by the Constituent Assembly and the country. Such cordial greetings and sincere good wishes from you and the Members of the Constituent Assembly of India, at the outset of our deliberations, would be a source of inspiration and encouragement to us in the task of framing a Constitution for a free and united Burma. I can assure you that a free Burma will regard it as its special duty and privilege to maintain most cordial and friendly relations with your country and to make all possible contributions to the peace and happiness of the world.

May I avail myself of this opportunity to thank you and Sir. B.N. Rau for all the kind help and assistance accorded to our Constitutional Adviser during his short stay at New Delhi and for the free gift of your publications which are found to be most valuable in our work?

May I also take this opportunity on behalf of the Constituent Assembly of Burma and the people of this country to send you and through you to the Members of your Constituent Assembly and the people of India our sincere good wishes, for the successful conclusion of your labours and speedy realisation of your cherished aim of establishing a free and united India?’ (Cheers).

REPORT OF THE ORDER OF BUSINESS COMMITTEE

Mr. President: The next item on the Agenda is the motion to be moved by Mr. Munshi.

Mr. K.M. Munshi: (Bombay: General): Sir, I beg to move the following resolution:

‘Resolved that the Constituent Assembly do proceed to take into consideration the further Report of the Order of Business Committee appointed by the Resolution of the Assembly of the 25th January, 1947.’

I have great pleasure, Sir, in moving this Report of the Order of Business Committee. As the House will see, this Report is quite different from the one submitted to the last sittings of the Assembly. Many and momentous have been the changes that have occurred in this country since the last sittings, and this Report has become necessary as a result of these changes. Some parts of the country have seceded from India and from the jurisdiction of this Constituent Assembly. By the end of this week, the British Parliament would have adopted legislation which would set India free by the 15th of August, 1947—an event for which we have been waiting for centuries; and lastly, the fetters that were imposed upon this Constituent Assembly by the plan of May 16 have fallen. These changes, therefore require that the programme of this Constituent Assembly should be reorientated in the new atmosphere to meet the new situation which has arisen.

Sir, I may take the liberty of pointing out that the May 16 Plan has now gone for all practical purposes and that we as a sovereign body are moving towards reconstructing the constitution of the future in an atmosphere of complete freedom. I will take the liberty of mentioning in greater detail the change which has been referred to in a paragraph of the Report. The plan of May 16 had one motive—to maintain the unity of the country at all costs. A strong Central Government was sacrificed by the May 16 plan at the altar of preserving the unity which many of us, after close examination of the Plan found to be an attenuated unity which would not have lasted longer than the making of it. There were two stages envisaged in the Plan of May 16. The stages were the preliminary stage and the Union Constituent Assembly stage. A number of committees, which the House was pleased to set up, struggled to get some kind of a strong Government of India, a Government worth the name, out of these difficulties, but, the struggle, I am free to confess, was not very successful. As a matter of fact, very often if I may express my own sentiment, while examining the plan of May 16 over and over again the plan looked to me more like the parricide's bag which was invented by ancient Roman law. As you know, under the ancient criminal law of Rome, when a man committed a very heinous crime he was tied up in a bag with a monkey, a snake and a cock, and the bag was thrown into the Tiber till it sank.

The more we saw the plan the more we found the minority struggling to get loose, the sections gnawing at the vitals and we had the double majority clause poisoning the very existence. Whatever other Members may feel, I feel—thank God—that we have got out of this bag at last. We have no sections and groups to go into, no elaborate procedure as was envisaged by it, no double majority clause, nor more provinces with residuary powers, no opting out, no revision after ten years and no longer only four categories of powers for the centre. We therefore feel free to form a federation of our choice, a federation with a Centre as strong as we can make it, subject of course to this that the Indian States have to be associated in this great task on a footing of the four categories [of] powers and such further powers as they choose by agreement to cede to the centre. Therefore, Sir, I personally am not at all sorry that this change has taken place. We have now a homogeneous country, though our frontiers have shrunk—let us hope only for the moment—and we can now look forward to going on unhesitatingly towards our cherished goal of strength and independence. And therefore the report that was submitted to the House had to be revised. ...

It is highly necessary, Sir, as you were pleased to point out that the work of Constitution making should be completed at the earliest possible moment and that if possible by November we should complete our Constitution-making work. At one time the rules were framed on the footing that we may take longer. They dealt with the question of sections and groups and various other things. At the time the rule was framed—old Rule 63—it was intended that after the general lines of the Constitution were approved by this House they should be circulated to the members of the legislature. It is not necessary to indulge in that elaborate procedure, first because the office of the Constituent Assembly has circularised a set of questionnaires to which replies have been given by members of the several Legislatures in this country and the opinions are therefore before the Committees. Secondly, things are moving so fast that we cannot go on at the pace at which we intended to go before. By the 15th August India will be a free and independent Dominion. We want to attain that stage as early as possible and to secure a constitution of our own which will give us the necessary strength. We must not forget the fact that in the Dominion Constitution which comes into existence on the 15th August the States' representatives have no place. We want that the Constitution of the Union therefore must come into existence at the earliest possible time. If that is so we shall have to eliminate this unnecessary procedure of circulating the decision to the members of this House. This House is sufficiently representative of all interests and there is no reason why we should unnecessarily lengthen out the proceedings. Further, we know that this House is working under high pressure and within a limited time. For that purpose Members will find that in the Report of the Union Constitution Committee a provision has been made to this effect that within the first period of three years the constitution could be amended easily. In framing a Constitution as we are doing under great pressure, there are likely to be left several defects; and it is not necessary that we should have a very elaborate and rigid scheme for amending these provisions, in the first three years. Therefore, the point that is placed before the House by the Report is that on the one side the Advisory Committee will continue to complete its task, on the other hand the Drafting Committee will take up the Constitution Bill and by the middle or the end of October next will be ready with the Bill for being placed before the House. It is of great importance that this Constitution should be framed as early as we possibly can do it.

One other point. We have today with us the representatives of the Muslim League. I have no doubt that they are here as loyal and law abiding citizens of India and that they will co-operate with us wholly in framing as speedily as we can a Constitution for the Union in which we hope they will get an honoured place as a minority. Secondly, I may refer to the representatives of the States who have come here and I will make only one appeal to them. The time is very short. The report envisages the formation of the Union by the end of October or at least by the end of November. The House naturally expects the cooperation of Members and the representatives from the States as partners in this urgent work of framing a Constitution. ...

I only want to say one thing. Time is of the essence of our activities here. We have to face the world with the determined purpose of framing a Constitution for a strong India which will be great and powerful. The world, I am afraid, is moving towards another crisis, and when that crisis comes—may it never come—it should not find us unprepared.

With these few words, I place this Report before the House for its consideration.

I have no objection whatever to accept the amendment which Mr. K Santhanam is proposing to move.

Shri K. Santhanam: (Madras: General): Sir, I beg to move:

‘Add the following at the end of the motion:

"Resolved further that with the exception of para. 3, the Report be adopted and the Advisory Committee on Fundamental Rights, Minorities and Tribal and Excluded Areas be called upon to formulate at an early date and if possible before the end of this session the general principles to be adopted in the Constitution in relation to minorities for consideration and decision of the Assembly prior to their incorporation in the draft of the Constitution and when the principles are so approved, the procedure proposed in para. 3 may be followed."

I need not say much about the need for this amendment. We all know how our minds are greatly exercised about the principles to be followed regarding the safeguarding of the rights of minorities. If they are incorporated in the Draft Constitution, we shall find ourselves greatly handicapped in changing them. There will be a great deal of heart-burning if any important changes are sought to be made after the Draft is published, circulated and even commented upon in the press and on the platform. Therefore, it is essential that, like the other principles of the Constitution, the principles regarding electorates franchise and similar matters should first be approved and then only they should be put in the Draft.

Mr. President: Does any Member wish to speak on the motion before the house?

Mr. Naziruddin Ahmad: (West Bengal: Muslim): Mr. President. Sir, I am a new-comer to this House. I find from the motion moved by K.M. Munshi that what is proposed to be taken into consideration is the 'further Report' of the Order of Business Committee. It means that there was an earlier report. We have no copy of it. This puts us under a handicap. It is very necessary for us to know what has been done already.

Secondly, we should have official copies of the May 16 Statement and also of the June 3 Statement. Although everybody has read them, we should like to have official copies of the same. Only then will it be possible for us to proceed in a systematic manner.

The Mover of the Resolution has appealed to the Members of the Muslim League to be loyal and law-abiding citizens of India. I should have thought that there was no need for any doubt whatever regarding the fact that we have come here as loyal and law-abiding citizens of India. (Applause). I submit with due humility that we have come here to take part in the deliberations of this House in framing a Constitution as quickly and as reasonably as we can. But we, the new-comers, require a little time to study the previous report, the debates and other relevant papers, before we can take a useful part in the House.

Shri R.V. Dhulekar: (U.P.: General): I agree with the Report submitted by Mr. Munshi and with what he has said regarding the work that this Constituent Assembly should have done so far. I want to speak about some matters which will come before the House. The first is that recently some changes have occurred, with the result that some have ceased to be members of the Constituent Assembly and new ones have been elected, in their place. The new members, who have come here, will take some time to understand all that we have done. Thus we have to review the work that this Constituent Assembly has done during the past six months, and so long as we do not take into consideration what has been already accomplished we cannot proceed further. We have to think over it. We find that India has now been divided into two and we have to see whether the Constituent Assembly should stick to the views it adopted at the time of its inception or whether it should change them. We have to consider that also, because there are many things which are proper at a particular time which cease to be so when the times have changed. The first thing that we have to note in the proceedings of the past few months is that we promised in the Objectives Resolution, which was moved in the House, that the people residing in India would be protected in every way and their culture, language and civilization would be fully safeguarded. We have to consider now whether the significance of these safeguards should continue to be what it was when they were accepted or it has to be altered. In my opinion it is necessary now to change our point of view and I think it necessary to amend the resolution that we have passed and also change the views expressed in discussing that resolution. At that time I raised the point that this Constituent Assembly should adopt Hindustani as its language. Now I submit that we have to reconsider the question of our language and script. The second thing that has been recorded in the Report relates to the month of October or November. It is said that this Constituent Assembly will now be converted into Central Assembly and we have to consider as to what will be the position of those who are members of the Provincial Legislature and have been returned to the Constituent Assembly. Some people say that the members of Provincial Assemblies, who have come here, will be requested to go back....

Mr. President: Mr. Dhulekar, I think you have strayed far from the matter under consideration.

Shri R.V. Dhulekar: No, Sir; I am not far from the point.

Mr. President: I have been under the impression that I was doing my job and I feel that you have strayed far from the point. The question before us is whether we accept the programme or the time-table submitted to us in this Report. You are raising too many questions and this is not the time for you to raise constitutional issues.

Mr. R.V. Dhulekar: Sir, I am sorry but I beg to point out that the programme submitted by Mr. Munshi makes the Business Committee, which is in existence, feel that no matters, such as new elections, should be brought up as might cause delay. Therefore, I suggest that the present members of the Constituent Assembly should continue till the Constitution has been framed.

Mr. President: The question as to who should continue to be its members and who should not, does not arise. The simple and straight question is whether or not you accept the time-table now submitted by the Committee. Nor is the question of language before us. Your remarks in this connection are irrelevant. What have you to say about the time-table and the other questions before the House?

Shri R.V. Dhulekar: I am sorry, but I beg to submit that it would suit the convenience of the Constituent Assembly that the existing members who have devoted all their time to it should continue till October by which time the Constitution would be ready.

Mr. President: Again the same question I have already told you and the whole House that up to the time the members do not resign they continue. If anybody intends to remain as a member this question will arise.

Shri R.V. Dhulekar: Sir, I am satisfied, I wish to say one word more that some opportunity should be given to the House in its present meeting to have an idea of the work already done and to be done in future. I have to say only this much.

Haji Abdul Sathar Haji Ishaq Sait: (Madras: Muslim): I just want to call the attention of the House to the fact that this important amendment was not circulated to members of the House. I am not objecting to the amendment. It is an important amendment and I am in favour of it but it is very difficult to understand it without having a copy. May I therefore request your help to see that such important amendments, as far as possible, are circulated to members, in good time?

Mr. President: I entirely agree with you that all important amendments should be given notice of in due time so that members may have an opportunity of studying them.
The Hon’ble Pandit Hirday Nath Kunzru: (United Provinces: General): May I request you, Mr. President, to talk a little louder? We could not hear you even when you were speaking through the microphone.

Mr. President: I am very sorry, but nobody complained before.

The Hon’ble Pandit Hirday Nath Kunzru: We can hear you now.

Mr. President: But I don’t think I have raised my voice now.

The Hon’ble Pandit Jawaharlal Nehru: (U.P.: General): It is a matter of the distance between you and the mike.

Shri M. Ananthasayanam Ayyangar: (Madras: General): I want to say a word or two about what Mr. Munshi said in moving his resolution. I do not feel very happy over what has happened, though I and others of my view have reconciled ourselves to this solution as the best in the circumstances. I am glad, Sir, that the members of the Muslim League have come here in so far as they are residents of the Union of India. I am glad too that many States have come in. I would have been gladder still if entire India had been represented here. I am really surprised that my friend, Mr. Munshi, who stood for Akhand Hindustan, is now equally supporting this solution. I personally think that the May 16 solution was the best. I am sorry that solution has been given up. But let us not float over what has happened. Even though what has happened is the best in the circumstances, we should all hope for the day when we will come again together. If the May 16 solution which was unanimously approved had been adhered to, the partition of Bengal, the partition of the Punjab, the secession of the North-West Frontier Province, the giving away of Sylhet, all these would have been avoided.

Mr. President: I entirely agree with you, but it is no use taking Mr. Munshi to task for that.

Mr. S.H. Prater: (Madras: General): Sir, I rise to support the amendment. We are considering the principles of a new Provincial Constitution which deeply affect the position of the minorities and decisions may be taken at this session accepting these principles. I therefore propose that the Minorities Committee be given early opportunity to consider them and their views may receive due consideration by this Assembly before decisions are finally adopted. I therefore support the amendment.

The Hon’ble Mr. Jaipal Singh: (Bihar: General): Mr. President, I have great pleasure in supporting the amendment moved by Mr. Santhanam. While we all fully appreciate the urgency of expedition in the carrying on of our business here. I feel that it is quite impossible for the Report of the Excluded Areas Sub-Committee to be presented during this session. It has been suggested that big principles might be decided during this session. But, as it is, the Sub-Committee on Excluded Areas has yet to visit the Excluded and Partially Excluded areas of the provinces of Bihar and the United Provinces. While these two Provinces cannot possibly be visited during the rainy season, I do not see how the Adibasi problem and the big things that are going to affect them can possibly be decided during this session, as Mr. Munshi suggests. I think as Mr. Pratar [sic] has pointed out, it is very necessary that no ‘section’—I regret I have to use the word ‘section’—no portion of people of this Union should be left out when matters which vitally affect them are being considered. I wish only to point out that the Report of the Tribal Sub-Committee cannot possibly be ready till the end of August.
Mr. Aziz Ahmad Khan: (U.P.: Muslim): Honourable President, I oppose the Resolution which has been moved by Mr. Munshi and support the amendment. Sir, agree with you, that as in the process of this glorious task we have to solve scores of important problems, it does not behove us that we should conclude the proceedings in haste without considering them thoroughly. Sir, you have said that we should remember that the time at our disposal is short and work is long, but at the same time, we should keep in mind that we have to frame the constitution of India with due care. Contrary to this, I find in this Resolution that the Mover is of opinion that the Reports of the three Committees, which are extremely important, need not be submitted to this Assembly even after their completion. Accordingly, they are inserting the sections in the Constitution of India. The Resolution runs thus: ‘We propose accordingly that the Assembly authorise the President to summon a session sometime in October, preferably in the early part of this month, for the purpose of considering the Draft Constitution.’ Sir, so far as Fundamental Rights are concerned, we ought to get an opportunity to express our opinion after careful consideration and then to hand over suggestions to the framers of the Constitution.

Mr. President: So far as Fundamental Rights are concerned, the Constituent Assembly has considered them very carefully. Now, only the Reports of Minority Committee and Tribal Areas Committee remain to be considered.

Mr. Aziz Ahmad Khan: If this is so, I think the wording of the resolution is wrong, because in the original resolution the Committee on Fundamental Rights has been clearly mentioned. So far as the Committee on Tribal Areas is concerned I think, in the present circumstances perhaps that would almost useless. Why will it be useless? You know the reason better. But before the Minorities Committee Report is inserted in the Constitution, it is desirable that it should be placed before the Constituent Assembly and we should get the fullest opportunity to discuss it and after we have given our best thought to it, it should be drafted in accordance with the procedure laid down in this connection. Therefore, as the Honourable President in his inaugural address has pointed out, in these matters we should not be in such a hurry as to make a mess of the whole thing. Taking my stand on this. I oppose this resolution and support the amendment.

Mr. Mohan Sinha Mehta: (Udaipur State): Sir, I understood from Mr. Munshi’s speech—I may be wrong—that he had anticipated and accepted Mr. Santhanam’s amendment.

Mr. President: Mr. Munshi had said that he had already accepted the suggestion of Mr. Santhanam, although he had not formally moved the amendment. Mr. Munshi has already accepted the amendment.

The Honourable Pandit Jawaharlal Nehru: Mr. President, I have listened attentively to all the speeches that have been made hitherto, but I fail to understand why so many speeches have been made on this subject. Unfortunately, I could not follow even Mr. Munshi’s speech. In any case, it is a simple matter that we must determine our programme and the principles involved therein. We are not concerned with whether the work is finished in this session or the next. But we must have a concrete plan before us. Mr. Munshi has now put a plan before us, and we have to take a decision on it. After all what is the debate about? We will try to finish as much work as we can during this session and take up the remainder in October or November.

Mr. Mahomed Sheriff: (Mysore State): Mr. President, I endorse what has been said by Maulvi Aziz Ahmad. He has stated in his speech that no resolution, no law, and no plan can be of much use without granting adequate and satisfactory safeguards to the minorities. The principle to which the Maulvi Saheb has drawn your attention is very important. You know that if the resolution is accepted, an atmosphere of opposition and mistrust will be created among the minorities. So it is better to decide it (the minority question) at our earliest. So long as we do not find its solution, I think it would be premature to support the resolution. I, therefore, oppose this resolution and fully support the position taken up by Aziz Ahmed Saheb. ...

B. Pocker Sahib Bahadur: (Madras: Muslim): Mr. President, first of all, I must confess the disability under which I am suffering, namely that I have not been able to follow most of the proceedings which have taken place, to the extent to which they are in languages other than English. Therefore, I would appeal to the President to make provision for rendering into English the proceedings that take place here. Otherwise, it would be very difficult for us to follow and participate in the proceedings. No doubt, I do agree that it is necessary to have a common language, a lingua franca, a national language. I agree with all that. But we have to take facts as they are. As the Constituent Assembly is now constituted, it consists of members who are acquainted with various languages. All of us know that all the members of this Assembly are not familiar either with Hindi or with Urdu. There may be some members who are not familiar with English. But I take it that most of the members are familiar with English and therefore it would be a very useful procedure if the President finds his way to make the proceedings known to us all.

Now, Sir, as regards the proposition before the House, before dealing with that subject itself, I would like to say just one word as to the circumstances under which we the Muslim League Members have come here and have decided to participate in these proceedings. Now, Sir you will agree that we have met here after an unprecedented event in the history of the world, namely the securing of independence for both India and for Pakistan without shedding a drop of blood.

Many Honourable Members: No. No.

B. Pocker Sahib Bahadur: I know quite well that there are several members....

Mr. Debi Prosad Khaitan: (West Bengal: General): I rise to a point of order, I submit the speech of the Honourable Member is absolutely irrelevant to the proposition before the House.
I would submit, Sir, that he should be asked to restrict himself to the motion before the House.

Mr. President: I would ask Honourable Members to leave that part of the task to me.

B. Pocker Sahib Bahadur: I know the feeling, Sir, perhaps a very painful feeling in many quarters, that what was known as India before has been reduced in extent and another kingdom namely Pakistan has been..

Mr. President: Will you please confine yourself to the motion before the House?

B. Pocker Sahib Bahadur: Sir, why I referred to that fact is only this. We have met here now after an event which has no precedent in the history of the world.

We are all very glad that we have met here and I congratulate Mr. Munshi for the excellent speech and for the excellent spirit in which he made it,—a speech which will be conducive to the united work of all the people concerned. I am very sorry to note that another Honourable Member has made a note of discord in his speech and I do believe that it was not quite wise on his part to have done so. We have to take the facts as they are and I may say that, so far as division is concerned, it is a matter of agreement between the two important bodies, the two great organisations in this country, namely, the Congress and the League. Both the organisations having agreed to the division, there is nothing to cry over.

Mr. President: May I remind the Honourable Member to confine himself to the motion before the House? I am afraid he has gone much beyond that.

B. Pocker Sahib Bahadur: I am only dealing with the point that has been dealt with by Mr. Munshi and referring to the reply given by another Honourable Member. If I am out of order in these circumstances, certainly I bow to your ruling and I do not want to say anything further. I have only made a reference to that. Mr. Munshi made an appeal to the members of the Muslim League to be loyal citizens of India and to cooperate. Certainly this assurance has been there and the Muslim League members will be loyally co-operating with this Constituent Assembly and they also expect a responsive co-operation from the other side.

Now, Sir, so far as the resolution before the House is concerned, certainly the resolution has to be carried. As regards the amendment of Mr. Santhanam, I wholeheartedly support it.

Many Honourable Members: The question be now put.

The Honourable Pandit Govind Ballabh Pant (U.P.: General): I was going to move that the question be now put.

Mr. President: I accept that motion. I think the House does not want any further discussion.
I put Mr. Santhanam’s amendment to the House.

The amendment was adopted.

Mr. President: The motion, as amended, is put to the House.

The motion, as amended, was adopted.

10. Every Province Should Be Made a Republic

Extract from the proceedings of the Constituent Assembly of India, 15 July 1947
Constituent Assembly Debates, Vol. IV, pp. 589–91

Mr. President: I now call upon Maulana Hasrat Mohani to move his amendment.

B. Pocker Sahib Bahadur: (Madras: Muslim): I only want to remind you of the request I made yesterday, that arrangements should be made to render the speeches into English as a large number of members are not able to follow the speeches in languages other than English.
Therefore, Sir, in view of the fact that Maulana is going to speak in Urdu, I would request that arrangements may be made to give us a rendering into English of the valuable speech which Mr. Maulana is going to make.

Maulana Hasrat Mohani: Sir, I move my amendment to this Clause No. 1. I think I will have some difficulty in expressing myself in a foreign tongue but to accommodate my friend from Madras, I shall try my best to express myself as best as I can. I move: ‘That in Clause 1, for the words ‘a Governor’ the words ‘a President’ shall be substituted.’ By this I intend to say that we have got an inherent right of all the members of all these constituent provinces to demand a Provincial Republic for every Province. What we have intended and what we thought and what we were expecting to get, we wanted and we thought that we will get a Union of Indian Republics. My friend Mr. Tripathi had moved an amendment in the last session of this Assembly that he wanted to introduce the word ‘Socialist’. It did not have the support of the House. We will see to it afterwards. If we have got a Federal Republic, it does not matter whether you agree to make it a Socialist Republic or not. In the first instance, you may have a Nationalist Constitution and majority of Nationalist members but I am sure that the tendency of the world is to become, everyone of us is becoming now, socialist minded and I think that the time is not far off when, as we expect, we will be able to form a solid group of leftists and I think that by the latest, in the next election, I hope that we will be able to capture the whole of the organization. If you now agree to make every province a Republic, I do not care whether you agree to make it socialistic or not. We will make it a socialist republic. But one thing I must say, you cannot shelve this question. You cannot say ‘We want only a Republic in the Centre. We will not allow any of these Provinces to become a Republic’, and as I said, this is a trick when you say that in each Province there shall be a Governor. I say that it must be a President, if you accept the word ‘President’, then it means that you agree to make every Province a Republic. If you refuse to accept the word ‘President’, then it means that you are determined to retain those Provinces as mere autonomous Provinces. You grant only Provincial autonomy and nothing else. If that is your intention, I most strongly protest against this sort of treatment which if I am not using any strong words, I shall say, will be something like staging a farce on the people of all the Provinces, especially on my Province, the United Provinces.
Here my friend Pandit Nehru says ‘you can introduce afterwards any amendment you like to the Union Constitution’. I say I introduce this amendment here and now, and ask you to make this word ‘Governor’ ‘President’, so that you may not be able to refuse to reopen the whole thing on the occasion of my moving an amendment to the Union Constitution. Then the question of the Union Constitution will anyhow come in and this difficulty will crop up.
My friend Sardar Patel also said there is no difference whether we call Governor or President.
There is a great difference. Once you disallow my amendment you will say ‘No, we will have only Governor’. That means that you want to give us only Provincial autonomy. You do not want many of the Provinces to go even a single step further. I have read very carefully your Union Report. In this Union Report, page 12, Clause 9 says: ‘The executive authority of the Ruler of a Federated State shall continue to be exercisable in that State with respect to Federal subjects until otherwise provided by the Federal authority.’

To this Clause 9, a note is added which says: ‘In this respect the position of the provincial units is rather different. These have no executive power in respect of Federal subjects save as given by Federal Law.’ In respect of the Indian States you say something. But you say the position of the Provincial units is different. They have no residuary power in respect of special subjects. You fix only the provincial subjects. And you ask us to accept this clause. We will not.
Of course, you have got a majority. You can pass anything you like. But I ask in the name of justice and fairplay ‘What right have you got to deprive the provinces of India from aspiring to become republics of the Union of Federal Republics, and not only Federal Republics but Socialist Federal Republics at that’? This was moved in a former meeting of the Assembly. You did not accept that. But the position was quite different then. You were suspecting the Pakistan people might make mischief. But they have been separated now. Some Muslim Leaguers raised this objection; ‘Now that India and Pakistan have become two different things, what is the meaning of the All India Muslim League?’ All-India Muslim League means the Muslim League of India, i.e. of the minority Provinces. So, they said, ‘If you want to have a Muslim League, you can start one for Pakistan, where we the Muslims of the Muslim minority provinces can have no influence, except through the Council of the All-India Muslim League which according to the decision of Mr. Jinnah still exists and to which new members have already been elected.
I am one of them from U.P. (Interrupt).}

Mr. President: Order, order.

An Honourable Member: Does the speaker think that this is the All-India Muslim League Council?

Maulana Hasrat Mohani: No, no. I am pointing out that I have nothing to do with Pakistan except as a member of the All-India Muslim League Council. Where is the harm if we take the Union Constitution first. You have deliberately put the Provincial Constitution here first.
What is the meaning of that? By taking this model provincial report first you are doing us a very grave injustice. Of course, you can have it passed. But you cannot prohibit the provinces from demanding independence and becoming republics. You have said 'We want only a Unitary Republic'. Then why have you introduced the word 'Federation' in your report here? It is simply to deceive the public. You fight shy of the word 'Unitary'. Therefore to have your way you have said 'Federation'. This is why you want to preclude the provinces from demanding republican government. But I tell you, you cannot compel them. You cannot impose your authority on them. We want a Union of Socialist Republics and if you persist in imposing nationalism and a nationalist constitution on your provinces you will soon be swept off the face of the earth. ...

11. 'Union Assembly Rules Amended: Constitution on UK Lines Favoured'

Extract from a report in National Herald, 16 July 1947

NEW DELHI, 15 July—The Constituent Assembly today amended its rules whereby all references to sections were deleted.

Mr. K.M. Munshi moved more than 30 amendments to the rules of the Constituent Assembly necessitated by the June 3 statement. The effect of the amendments were: The need to break into sections as stated in the state paper of May 16 was done away with, the double majority votes required to settle major communal issues and reference to the federal court of certain issues, etcetera were also dispensed with. ...

Moving the memorandum embodying the recommendations of the provincial constitution committee, Sardar Vallabhbhai Patel said that both the provincial constitution committee and the union constitution committee met jointly to consider whether we should have a federal or unitary type of constitution and came to the conclusion that a parliamentary system of constitution of the British type, with which we were familiar, would suit conditions in this country better.

The provincial constitution committee had made its recommendation accordingly.

Some misunderstanding might arise on the question of some of the items mentioned in clause nine (governor's discretionary powers). If we analysed this clause, we found that practically the only powers left to the provincial governor was the power to report to the Union president about any grave menace to the peace and tranquillity of the province and the summoning and dissolving of the provincial legislatures.

The committee generally agreed that there should be only one house of legislature, but it was also agreed that if any of the provinces wanted a bicameral legislature, it should be open to that province to set up such a legislature. But the constitution of the upper house should be on the British model.

The committee had given special attention to the appointment of the judges of the high court as the judiciary should be above suspicion and party influence. There were many checks provided to ensure fair appointments.

For the rest of the constitution, it was agreed that the draft should be made on the adaptation of the present 1935 Act with suitable alterations.

This report contained roughly 85 per cent of the draft, the rest being covered by the advisory committee on minorities....

NEHRU EXPLAINS

Pandit Nehru, replying to Maulana Hasrat Mohani’s criticism, said that the Maulana would have been justified in his objections if the house had proceeded to frame the provincial constitution without first deciding the principles on which both provincial and Union constitutions were to be based. As it was, the Assembly had passed the objectives resolution, clearly stating those principles. After that it did not matter which part of the constitution-making was done first, because essentially the house was to be guided in its deliberations by that resolution.

The report on the provincial constitution, Pandit Nehru explained, was ready earlier than the report on the Union constitution and thus it had been presented for consideration in order to give the members more time to think over the Union constitution report which had been prepared only a week ago. There was nothing secret about either of the two reports. The only thing to be kept in view was that they did not work against the spirit of the objectives resolution.

Mr. Munaw Ali, supporting Maulana Hasrat Mohani, said that until it had been decided what sort of constitution the Union would have, it would not be possible to draw up the provincial constitution.

Pandit Balkrishna Sharma opposed the postponement of consideration of the report. It really made very little difference whether the Union constitution was considered first or the provincial constitution because the objectives resolution was already there to guide the house; if anything in either of the reports contravened the terms of that resolution, any member was at perfect liberty to point it out.

Mr. Naziruddin Ahmed agreed with this view.

12. ‘Provision for Elected Governors Approved’

Extract from a report in The Hindustan Times, 17 July 1947

NEW DELHI, Wednesday.—Each province of India will have a Governor elected directly on the basis of adult suffrage and a Deputy Governor elected by the provincial legislature. These two important decisions were taken by the Constituent Assembly at its sitting today.

Material modifications in the proposals of the Patel Committee were made by the House, the sponsors being members of the Committee or their associates. The general trend of discussion showed that, whereas a great deal of lip-service is paid to the idea of a strong Centre, most of the changes made today were aimed at strengthening provincial autonomy.

Before the proceedings began Mr. Sri Prakasa reported ‘a serious breach of the privileges of the members of the House’. A European police officer, he said had refused to let tongas enter the portico of the Council House because only cars could drop passengers there. Since it was raining, members using tongas had been put to inconvenience. Moreover, Mr. Sri Prakasa added, it was a case of snobbery. The President, Dr. Rajendra Prasad, promised to look into the complaint....

13. ‘Cabinet System of Government for Provinces’
The Hindustan Times, 18 July 1947

The Constituent Assembly on Thursday approved without debate the clause in the Provincial Constitution Committee’s report regarding the creation of a Council of Ministers to aid and advise the Governor in the exercise of his functions except in so far as he was under the constitution required to exercise his functions in his discretion.

The discretionary powers vested in the Governor relate to the prevention of any grave menace to the peace and tranquillity of the province, the summoning and dissolving of the provincial legislature, the superintendence, direction, and control of elections, etc. These special responsibilities of the Governor are enumerated in subsequent sections of the report which would be taken up for discussion at a later stage.

A number of speakers participated in the discussion on the clause relating to the appointment of the Ministers. According to the draft, the Ministers shall be chosen and summoned by the Governor and shall hold office during his pleasure.

League Amendment

Mr Aziz Ahmed Khan moved an amendment which sought that the Governor’s Ministers should be elected by members of the Provincial Assembly by the system of proportional representation by single non-transferable vote.

Mr B. Pocker Saheb Bahadur and Begum Aizaz Rasul moved two other amendments which prescribed that the Ministers should be responsible to the provincial legislature and that they should hold office during the life of the Assembly.

Commending his amendment, Mr Aziz Ahmed Edian said that the system he had suggested was already in vogue in America and Switzerland. The real cause for friction in India, he said, was that we had adopted British Parliamentary system.

Mr Pocker Saheb said that under the draft constitution all powers would be concentrated in the Governor and it would be dangerous to invest all powers in a single individual even though he might be elected on adult franchise.

Plea for Swiss Model

Begum Aizaz urged that there should be a stable Ministry and the Cabinet should not be at the mercy of the parties. They had a precedent in the Swiss constitution where the Ministers were elected.

Opposing the amendment, Seth Govind Dass said that it would not be fair to find fault with the British democratic system of Government because it had not been given a fair trial in India. The British Parliamentary system had not proved successful so far because of such theories as two nations and the slogan of religion in danger. In the appointment of his Working Committee, the Muslim League President had followed the same principle which was now enunciated in the draft constitution.
Mr Jaipal Singh, opposing the amendment, said that it looked as though the Governor had arbitrary powers but there was to be a schedule to the Act which would clearly define his powers.

Mohammed Sheriff supported the amendment.

Mr N.V. Gadgil, opposing the amendment, said it would be dangerous and unfair to the electorate and unworkable in practice if the Legislature did not have the power to throw out a Ministry but instead had to wait for its term to run out.

Kazi Syed Karimuddin, supporting the amendment, said that the Constituent Assembly was not a political platform but a body charged with the task of framing a constitution. The Muslim League had every right to put forward socialism or any other theory for its consideration. Both in the 1919 and 1935 Acts of the Government of India there was provision for majority rule. This had led to undesirable results and nepotism.

Reservations Urged

Mehboob Ali Saheb Bahadur hoped that reservations would be made for the various interests in the future constitution so that all interests could secure due representation in the Legislature.

Mr Nagappa, supporting the original motion, said he would have preferred if the Ministers were chosen by the Legislature. Such a procedure would give an opportunity to every member of the House to select his own representative.

Dr Pattabhi Sitaramayya, opposing the amendments, said that the amendments were based upon the bad experience that they had had in past due to the vicious system of separate electorates, under which the majority community could sweep the polls and monopolize the Ministries. They were looking forward to joint electorates and forming political parties based not on communal but on political principles and they should, therefore, not judge the future by their unfortunate experience of the past.

Chaudhri Khaliquzzaman, Leader of the Muslim League Party, supporting the amendment, said that his party felt that having given very wide powers to the Governor ‘we must have an irremovable Ministry.’ In support of this proposition, he would not refer to the American, Swiss or any other constitution. To his mind, the question must be looked upon purely from the point of view of the genius of the people.

Experience in Municipalities

They had not tried the 1935 constitution for long but a method somewhat similar to that suggested in the present clause had been tried in the Municipal and District Boards, with the result that every day there was a vote of no-confidence against the Chairman of a District or Municipal Board and the provincial Governments had to introduce the principle of two-thirds majority for the removal of a Chairman. Within the last few days one Ministry had fallen in Madras. These were the experiences which led his party to conclude that it would be better in our own interest to have an irremovable executive. Otherwise with a change of slogans, there might be a change of Ministry.

To say that this amendment had been moved because his party wanted to secure representation by some method was to misjudge its intentions. ‘Personally I believe that no Governor who has been chosen by the vote of the people will ever have a Ministry without representatives of the people, whether they be Muslims or achuts. Therefore, it is not from that point of view that we have asked for consideration of this amendment.’
No Proportional Representation

Mr K.M. Munshi, opposing the amendment, said that nothing fragmented the political life of a country as proportional representation in the selection of Ministries. After the Treaty of Versailles, on account of President Wilson’s partiality for proportional representation, several of the Central European countries introduced proportional representation and they lived to be sorry for it. ‘The net result of proportional representation will be that instead of a Ministry having collective responsibility and interested in the good of the province as a whole, there will be a Ministry consisting of representatives of different groups with different ideologies and policies.’

Danger of Coalition Govts

This would invariably result in Coalition Governments, the greatest danger to which democracy was prone. In France there had always been a fashion of having coalition Ministries and not Ministries based on a majority with the result that during the last eight or ten years there had been 22 Ministries.

As regard the other amendments, once they had a democratic system, they must agree that if during the life of the House a vote of censure was passed on the Ministry that Ministry must be prepared to resign. Otherwise, the Ministry would be entirely unresponsive to the fluctuations of public opinion.

Sardar Vallabhbhai Patel, replying to the debate, said, ‘We have in this provincial model constitution adopted the British Parliamentary model, namely the Cabinet system. The mover of the amendment contemplates the Swiss model, which is entirely different and which would, if passed, probably require us to reconsider the whole constitution.’

The election of Ministers by proportional representation was a system which was contrary to the whole framework of this constitution. ‘It cuts at the very root of democracy and, therefore, does not fit in here.’

No Wide Powers

It had been suggested that Governors had got very wide powers under the proposed constitution. ‘I do not think that in this constitution a Governor has got as wide powers as under the present constitution foreign Governors have got. The present constitution was such that we had not only no Governor elected by adult franchise representing the will of the people but a foreign Governor with instruments of instructions, and instructions to protect foreign interests. The experience derived from the working of that constitution cannot be compared with the constitution that we have proposed here.’

Proceeding, Sardar Patel said: ‘Whether in the working of the constitution that we propose, we will have [a] pleasant experience or not will depend much upon the manner in which we work it. Constitutions are always broken by people who have the will to do so. We are not wanting in instances where, if the constitution is worked in such a manner that a Prime Minister or Minister is irremovable by vote of the House, he could be removed by a bullet. (laughter)’

‘It is no use saying that an irremovable executive will be safe. If an irremovable executive functions in such a manner, then people will find out other methods to deal with it. What we want is real goodwill to work a good constitution.

‘Here we have contemplated joint responsibility of Ministers. Under the method suggested by the mover of the amendment, individual Ministers would go their own way and each Minister has only to work for five or ten votes which he can probably obtain by means which cannot be very desirable, and the whole machinery would be liable to be corrupted.’

The amendments were rejected and the clause as originally moved was adopted.

Question of Conventions

There was a debate on the clause relating to conventions of responsible Government to be observed by provincial Governors. The clause while stating that in his relations with Ministers, the Governor shall be generally guided by the conventions of responsible Government, left it to a schedule to be drawn up later on to work out the details of these conventions.

A number of members raised doubts as to whether this could be done with constitutional propriety. What was there to prevent anyone from inserting schedule after the clause was passed and say that it had been passed as well. They suggested postponement of consideration of the clause or deletion of the reference to the schedule, as otherwise it might be like leaving a blank cheque.

Replying to the debate, Sardar Vallabhbhai Patel recalled his preliminary remarks when he moved for consideration of the report and said that only the principles of the provincial constitution were being approved now. The constitution would be drafted based on these principles and would come up again before the House for consideration. Had the members borne in mind this fact the whole discussion on this clause could have been avoided.

Messrs Pocker Saheb, Anantasayanam Ayyanger, M.S. Aney, Haji Essack Sait, P.S. Deshmukh, Ramachandra Gupta, Abdul Hamid, Shibanlal Saxena and Mahabir Tyagi participated in the debate, after which the clause was adopted.

The Assembly also passed without debate a number of other clauses and adjourned until tomorrow when further consideration of the report would be taken.

14. Discussion on the Position of Provincial Governors

Constituent Assembly Debates, Vol. IV, pp. 703-7

The Honourable Sardar Vallabhbhai J. Patel: ‘Sir, I move:

1. Any person holding office as Governor in any Province immediately before the commencement of this Constitution shall continue as such and shall be deemed to be the Governor of the Province under this Constitution until a successor duly elected under this Constitution assumes office.

2. There should be similar provisions mutatis mutandis in respect of the Council of Ministers, the Legislative Assembly and the Legislative Council (in Provinces which decide to have an Upper House).

3. The Government of each Governor’s Province shall be the successor of the Government of the corresponding Province immediately before the commencement of this Constitution in respect of all property, assets, rights and liabilities.

These are provisions for the transition period in order to avoid an interregnum. I do not think there can be any controversy over this and I hope it will be accepted. ...

Mr. K.M. Munshi: ...I feel, Sir that the words ‘successor of the Government’ might create difficulties and at this stage it would serve no useful purpose to keep Clause 3. I therefore submit that Clause 3 should be deleted. The words ‘successor Government’ might lead to other complications which need not be invited at this stage.

Mr. H.V. Kamath (C. P. & Berar: General): Mr. President, Clause 1 of this part is of course unexceptionable and I think there will be no difficulty in the way of its acceptance by this House. But upon its acceptance certain consequences will, to my mind, flow from it and therefore I wish to draw your attention and the attention of this August Assembly to those consequential aspects of this clause, viz., Clause 1 of Part IV. This clause says: ‘Any person holding office as Governor in any province immediately before the commencement of this Constitution shall continue as such and shall be deemed to be the Governor of the Province under this Constitution until a successor duly elected under this Constitution assumes office.’

We are today passing from the darkness of servitude to the light of freedom. But there is bound to be an interregnum between our Dominionhood and that Republican Independence for which we are striving. This interregnum may be long or it may be short, and again there will be another time-lag between today and the commencement of this constitution. By ‘Commencement’ I believe the promulgation of this constitution is meant. I presume that the constitution will be promulgated perhaps by the end of this year but between now and that date of the promulgation of the constitution we are entering upon a new state and that is the state of Dominionhood. The Indian Union will be formally ushered in or inaugurated as a Dominion on the 15th of next month. Therefore, if according to this clause, in December when the constitution is likely to be promulgated, there are certain Governors in certain Provinces, they are likely to continue as such and they will be deemed to be the Governors under this constitution. I want to emphasise the word ‘shall be deemed to be the Governor of the Province under this constitution.’ I think it would be derogatory to the dignity of the constitution, if certain non-nationals are permitted to continue as Governors under this Constitution after the commencement of this Constitution and before elections under this constitution take place. As we all know, very shortly, in the middle of next month, it will be within our power; within the competence of our own leaders to say who will be Governors and where. If, unfortunately, some non-nationals—Europeans or Britishers—remain or are appointed as Governors in certain provinces, on August 15th it will follow that in December when the Constitution will be inaugurated or will commence, they will be there and therefore they will continue as Governors, under this Constitution till the elections take place and their successors assume office. Therefore, Sir, I submit that this is a position which, as a Sovereign body today and aspiring to become shortly a Sovereign legislature of the Dominion, we cannot envisage or tolerate. We have struggled hard these many years and decades to see the end of foreign rule in India. A few months less than five years ago our cry, our revolutionary campaign of ‘Quit India’ was launched and it is a happy coincidence that in the very month of August we in India are attaining Dominionhood if not independence, quite a good degree of independence, and power will, I hope, come into our hands. Thus, Sir, when it will be within our competence to have our own Governors, I for one want that our own nationals and citizens of the Indian Union should be the Governors when the new Constitution is inaugurated. I wish to draw your attention to these words in the ‘Transitional Provisions’ I am quoting: ‘In any province immediately before the commencement of this Constitution’. We should take care to see that the Governors in all our Provinces immediately before the commencement of this Constitution are Indians, our own nationals and not non-nationals or foreigners. Have we undergone all these troubles and fought the rulers on so many occasions merely to see these martinets, these panjandrums and these minions of a foreign imperialism continuing their rule in our Provinces? I should like to see the end of it. I do not like to see the day when even after the commencement of this Constitution these very Europeans, whom we asked to quit five years ago, will be continuing as our rulers in certain provinces. I was hard put to it, some days ago, to explain to a common man why Lord Mountbatten was recommended for the Governor-Generalship of the Dominion of India. We can quite understand and appreciate the high considerations of diplomacy, political strategy and tactics which influences the recommendation of Lord Mountbatten for the Governor-Generalship. But the common man fails to understand it all. It is true that we cannot always act on the views of the common man. But, at the same time, in a democracy the psychology of the common man has its place. Democracy is largely conditioned by the psychological reflexes of the common man. I would request the Hon’ble Mover and this Assembly to bear these considerations in mind and see that the Governor of any Province immediately before the commencement of this Constitution is not a non-national. It is our men, our citizens who should be there. It is only if we see to this that we can produce the necessary psychological reaction in the mind of the common man. We will fail to produce this essential psychological effect if on the dawn of freedom and independence he were unfortunately to see the same foreigner still stalking the land as ruler or Governor. Our Quit India Resolution is fast bearing fruit. At such a time we should create in the mind of the common man the impression that all power has been taken over by us towards the consummation of the ‘Quit India Resolution’ which was inaugurated by us five years ago.

When we are shortly going to witness the dawn of independence we must make a supreme effort to see that the common man is able to grasp the fact that we are out on [sic] masters and that there is no foreigner ruling over us. The sooner we do this the better it is for us and for our country. If we achieve this we will have gone a long way towards awakening the ‘shakti’ necessary for building up our Indian Union. I am sure I am voicing the feeling of a vast majority in this Assembly when I say that at the time of the inauguration of the Provincial Constitutions, no foreigner remains as Governor in any of the Provinces. It would be a mistake to allow a foreigner to continue as Governor of a province, after that date.

Sir, I will conclude with the words used on another historic occasion and request this August Assembly to tell the foreigner ‘We asked you to Quit India five years ago. We now again tell you with more power, more authority in our hands: For God’s sake go. Leave India to its own fate. Leave India free to build up a strong Independent Sovereign Republic.’ ‘Jai Hind.’

Sri M. Ananthasayanam Ayyangar: I should like to say a few words with regard to the Transitional Provisions. These ought to be absolutely transitional. That is my desire.

We must congratulate ourselves, Sir that we have spent five days over the elaborate provisions recorded in this Constitution submitted to the Assembly. I am sure we will be able to finish the details considered by the Expert Committee that will be appointed to go into the details of the formalities and bring out the Constitution at an early date. All that I am anxious about is that, when the British Government who originally fixed 30th June 1948 for ushering in a new Constitution have advanced the date, we should not be found unready. We should have our Constitution ready and there should be no delay on our part. I do want that 26th January 1948, the day which we have been celebrating as Day of Independence for India should surely be the day when we celebrate the Independence of India. Let it not be said that we have unnecessarily dragged the proceedings here. We will not be charged with that. We have spent only five days on this important matter. We have not left the details to take care of themselves. I hope all concerned will be able to push through the necessary work so that on the 26th day of January we will really have an Independent India and work under an Independent Constitution. As regards the present Governors continuing till then, I am sure that they will not continue for any longer time than is necessary. When the new constitution comes into being, I expect that only nationals will be appointed as Governors.

Thirdly, after the new constitution is framed, it will take some time before elections take place; before delimitation of constituencies takes place. All these will take some time. I do not want to have any definite date fixed within which elections should take place under the new constitution. At the same time I would like to urge that after the new constitution has been framed, care should be taken to see that within six months and not later than that, the new constitution must be in full swing. Even before the constitution is drafted, since we are providing for adult franchise, we should ask the existing Governments to prepare the electoral rolls regarding adults in every village and town. Thereafter, the delimitation of constituencies will have to take place. No effort should be lost and all efforts must be made to see that the new constitution comes into being as early as possible. With these words, I support these transitional provision clauses.

Mr. President: Does anyone else wish to speak about this?

Shri Biswanath Das (Orissa: General): Mr. President, Sir, I heartily congratulate the Honourable Sardar Patel for having piloted the report within the shortest possible time. Sir, while congratulating him, one must also confess that the constitution that has been drafted for the provinces gives them less powers than what the provinces were enjoying under the Act of 1935.

We expect to have under the new dispensation a government of the people for the people and by the people. Now, all these three slogans will be meaningless if we do not have the leaders of the people of the provinces as governors of the provinces. Sir, the interim period that lies between the present and the date of the election should not be marred by having men of the permanent services as Governors of provinces. Sir, I support the decision taken in nominating Lord Mountbatten as the Governor-General. There may be important reasons and justifications for the same. The country will be fully with our leaders in that. Sir, that cannot however be translated into the provinces. I am not here to make any distinction between nationals and non-nationals. Sir, I cannot agree to see that people, who have been public servants, continue as governors of provinces. Most of the I.C.S. people do not have the Indian outlook and cannot in any sense be termed as servants of the people. That being the case, I would submit that it would be very hard on the country to tolerate a system of administration in which the same I.C.S. regime is being perpetuated in the provinces. I believe our leaders will not commit this blunder.

Sir with these submissions, I fully support the resolution and congratulate the Committee on having presented a report which was acceptable to the House so as to be passed within the shortest possible time.

The Honourable Sardar Vallabhbhai J. Patel: Sir, I suggest a verbal alteration in Clause 1, third line instead of the words ‘shall continue.’ I want to insert the words ‘may be continued’. ‘Any person holding office as Governor in any Province immediately before the commencement of this Constitution may be continued’. In the fourth line I suggest the insertion of the words ‘when so continued’ after the word ‘and’. These are purely verbal alterations.

I will now remind the House that perhaps some of the friends who gave valedictory orations have forgotten that there is still one clause, Clause 15, to be moved. It is a controversial clause and it will take some time.

Shri C. Subrahmaniyam (Madras: General): May be continued by whom? Who is the authority to continue him as Governor under the new Constitution?

The Honourable Sardar Vallabhbhai J. Patel: No doubt by the Government of India, who is the authority to appoint him. There is no difficulty about that.

Mr. H.V. Kamath: ‘May continue’ or ‘may be continued’. Why not ‘may continue’?

The Honourable Sardar Vallabhbhai J. Patel: Put in ‘may continue’ if you like.

Dr. P.S. Deshmukh (C.P. & Berar: General): ‘May be continued’ is better. ‘May continue’ is likely to be interpreted as ‘should continue’ and Mr. Kamath would be defeating just the object that he has in view. ‘May be continued’ involves continuation only if so ordered by the Government.

Mr. President: I put this resolution to vote with this verbal change. In place of ‘shall continue’ substitute the words ‘may be continued’ and in the fourth line add the words ‘when so continued’ after the word ‘and’.

The motion was adopted.

Mr. President: Mr. Munshi, you moved that Clause 3 be deleted. I am sorry I did put that to vote, but I take it that it is accepted.

The motion was adopted.

Mr. President: I shall now put the whole resolution as amended by the deletion of Clause 3 to vote, because there was some misunderstanding.

Part IV as amended, was adopted.

Mr. President: Mr. Ananthasayanam Ayyangar has given notice of an amendment.

(The amendment was not moved.)

15. Election of the President in Free India

Extract from the proceedings of the Constituent Assembly of India, 23 July 1947
Constituent Assembly Debates, Vol. IV, pp. 782–91

Mr. President: We shall now take up the discussion of the Union Constitution Report. The first Clause of Part IV was moved by Pandit Jawaharlal Nehru. We are now to take up the amendments to that clause. I have got a very large number of amendments of which notice has been given.

Shri Gokulbhai D. Bhatt (Eastern Rajputana States Group): Mr. President, Thursday was the last day for submitting amendments to the rules framed by the Union Powers Committee. But now that you have fixed the order of business, you could kindly extend the time for submitting amendments to the Report of the Union Powers Committee.
Mr. President: I informed the House yesterday that the time had already expired.

Prof. Shibban Lal Sakseña (United Provinces: General): Sir, in Part III of the Memorandum on the Union Constitution, it is stated.

‘Here enumerate the Fundamental rights and principles of State policy as passed by the Constituent Assembly.’

But, Sir, some of us have given notice of amendments to these Fundamental Rights and Principles of State Policy. I have in particular an amendment to add a fresh clause to the Fundamental Rights and Principles of State Policy, saying that ‘Slaughter of Cows shall be forbidden in Bharatvarsha by law.’ I would like to know when I shall have the opportunity to move that amendment.

The Honourable Sir. N. Gopalaswami Ayyangar (Madras: General): The clauses relating to the Fundamental Rights were discussed in this Assembly and so far as putting them into the draft text of the Constitution is concerned, these clauses were passed at a previous session. The Member who has just spoken has asked when he and others who have given notice of amendments to the clauses relating to Fundamental Rights will have the opportunity of moving such amendments so that the House might consider them. I think, the proper time for moving all such amendments is when the draft text of the Constitution incorporating the Fundamental Rights is taken up for consideration at the final session of this Assembly. I think Pandit Jawaharlal Nehru made the position perfectly clear. He said that when that draft text was brought before the House, members would be free to move amendments not only to the wording of the draft, but also to the substance of the draft.

Mr. President: I think that makes the position perfectly clear. It was made clear by Pandit Jawaharlal Nehru also. The amendments to the Draft Constitution, dealing with the Fundamental Rights can be moved at the final session.

An Honourable Member: We have not approved of all the clauses in Fundamental Rights.

Mr. President: We shall deal with them when they come up. Amendment No. 61 on the Order Paper—Shri Vijayavargiya.

Shri Gopi Krishna Vijayavargiya (Gwalior State): Mr. President. I do not want to press my amendment because of the views expressed here, after I had moved my amendment. But there are many things to which I consider it necessary to draw your attention. This Section deals with the method of election of the Head of the Federation. According to the amendment, all the units of the States will participate in the election of the President. But the States Legislatures are very faked-up and crude. They will affect the result of the election. Therefore, I moved an amendment that the Union President should be elected directly on the basis of adult franchise, so that the people—even the poor ones—may have the opportunity of exercising their votes for the election of the President. Now I do not want to press my amendment in view of the opinions expressed here. I would say only this much that there will be no uniformity among those who will elect the President, because on the one hand the elected members of the provincial legislatures will take part in the Presidential election and on the other hand, the members of the State Legislatures which are irregularly constituted. This will be grotesque. The States have only parodies of legislatures. They have nominated members, landed aristocracy and other representing special interests. So long as there is no democracy in the states, there is great danger for our Federation. The States representatives will take part in the election of the President. There may be many other dangers too. Having all these in view, I deem it desirable that the States representatives should be properly elected and necessary safeguards should be incorporated whereby the nominated members, jagirdars and others belonging to special interests in the States legislatures, may not be allowed to vote for the election of the President.

Federation is going to be established in our country but as yet we do not know if all the States will join the Indian Union and what attitude they will adopt towards it. We do not know as to how the participating States will affect the Union. I represent the States people and I think it necessary to incorporate some measures as safeguards against possible dangers. The danger is real. The elected members of the States Legislatures will seriously affect the result of the election of the Union President. Many States ministers are bringing various amendments seeking to secure more favours for the Princes in the draft constitution. This is not in the interest of the people. I desire that the Union President should be directly elected on the basis of adult franchise. This would satisfy the people of the States. Even the poor ones will have the right to vote for the election of the President. However, this method is not going to be adopted and for various reasons I do not want to press my amendment. But I wish to point out that in view of the conditions prevailing in the States, we must be cautious about the intended amendment from the States ministers. I do not move my amendment. ...

Mr. T. Channiah (Mysore State): Mr. President, Sir, I move the following amendment, namely: That in sub-clause (1) of Clause I after the word “elected” the words “by rotation either by the North of India or South of India” be inserted.

Sir, why I have suggested this system of election to the Presidentship of the Federation is due to the following reasons: The election of a President to the Federation by rotation either by the North of India or by the South of India gives a fair representation and satisfaction to the people of India who stand geographically divided into two distinct divisions, namely, the South or the North of India. The people in these parts of India have got a distinct culture and methods of thinking and languages of their own, acclimatised to the conditions of those parts. More than anything else, Sir, there is in existence the lack of realization of the universal brotherhood and due to various reasons each man or woman has got a love of his or her own clan and does not realise to the extent possible the interests and rights of other people who are equally entitled to such rights or privileges. Such people are struggling hard to put forth their claims that their man should be elected as the President of the Federation, totally unmindful of the realisation of the universal brotherhood.

Secondly, Sir, the next feeling that comes and predominates in most of the people is this, namely, our man, our home, our state or our province, or does the President belong to North of India or does he belong to South of India and so on. So, Sir, we see how the people are forced to think under various circumstances and that broadmindedness limits itself to think in a selfish way.

Mr. H.V. Kamath: On a point of order, Sir. Can an Honourable Member read from a manuscript speech?

Mr. T. Channiah: Again, Sir, let us take for instance, the existence or predominance of any one majority party in India. Such an organisation tries to put a man of its own as the President of the Federation and never allowing any other smaller organisation to take its chance. Granting that any smaller organisation takes its chance, there will be a sort of feeling in the minds of the bigger Organisation that it should try to overcome the difficulty at the earliest opportunity.
There is again, Sir, the problem of the existence of innumerable castes in India. One community struggles to get over the other and at every stage each Community tries to get power and recognition in the administration of every Government. That is but natural.

Apart from these, Sir, there will be great discontent among the minorities like the depressed classes and Muslims, when their claims are overlooked and when their very existence is not felt sufficiently either in the administration of the country or when their claim for Presidentship is not contemplated at all.

Just as we have got the love of clan in India, so also we have been observing by experience the North Indian employee in North India will look down upon a person coming from South India and vice versa. So, Sir, under these circumstances we see that each one of us is struggling for some power or other in the administration of the country. When once the power is attained by some people the interest and care on the part of the person so chosen to that high power naturally neglects the interests of the other people and in the ultimate scramble for power, we the common men would have really lost the very democratic principles for which every common man is aiming to enjoy.

So, in order to create harmony of feeling among the people of India and for the proper justification of the President to be elected for the Federation, it is quite necessary to adopt the system of the election of the President to the Federation by rotation either from the North of India or South of India. ...

Rai Bahadur Syamanandan Sahaya (Bihar: General): I beg to move: That in paragraph (b) of sub-clause (2) of Clause 1, the words ‘or where a Legislature is bicameral the members of the Lower House thereof’ be deleted.

Sir, Clause 1 lays down the procedure for the election of the President. It says that the election shall be by an electoral college consisting of (a) the members of both Houses of the Parliament of the Federation, and (b) the members of the Legislatures of all the Units or, where a Legislature is bicameral, the members of the Lower House thereof. It will be seen, Sir, that in the election of the President, the members of the Upper House are being excluded from taking part. I would submit in this connection that, as this House has decided that the Provinces have the option of having a second Chamber, it does not look graceful that we should exclude the members of such Upper Houses, who will be there by election, from taking part in the election of the President. In fact, if members of the second Chambers are considered unsuitable for taking part even in the election of the President of the Indian Federation, why have second Chambers at all? ... That such second Chambers are needed has been accepted in the Union Constitution, because at the Centre you have provided for a second Chamber. Second Chambers have now been existing in different Provinces and functioning for some time and I do not think I shall be contradicted by anybody if I state that if anything, they, the second Chambers, have served a useful purpose by pointing out to the Lower House errors and omissions in the legislation coming up before them from the Lower House. In most cases I believe the suggestions of the Upper House have been accepted by the Lower House. I can say this from the experience I have of my own province of Bihar. There appears to be a fear, I suppose, in the minds of those who desire to debar the members of the Upper House from taking part in the election of the President. That fear emanates from the fact that the representatives in the second chambers generally belong to the propertied classes. In the first instance, I do not see why this House should decide that propertied classes could be debarred from taking part in the election of the President. For the election of the Governors in the Provinces, we have already decided that it should be by adult franchise, and that every person whether he is a propertied person or otherwise, will be entitled to take part in the election. Why then the distinction in the Presidential election?

We have not yet laid down the franchise for election to the second Chamber. It is open to this House to lay down such a franchise that the Upper Chamber will not merely be representative of the propertied classes of this country. We may lay down the franchise in such a way that men of experience in different walks of life in this country, in industry, business, administration, public life etc., may hold a good proportion of the membership of the second Chamber. I am sure it will be conceded that the opinion of such representatives who will be men of experience should be taken in such an important matter as the Presidential election and nothing should be done by which we deprive ourselves of the views that those representatives in the second Chamber may have. There is another aspect to the question also. From all the amendments which members have tabled to the provision for election of the President, it will be clear to you, Sir, that there is a large section of this House which desired that the election of the President should be by adult franchise. Now, if that is not possible Sir, I say that as many people as possible should be enabled to express their opinion in the matter of the election of the President. We were not able to accept adult franchise on account of practical difficulties perhaps, but we should not further narrow down the circle and debar elected representatives of a section of the Provincial Legislature, constituted under the constitution framed by us from taking part in the election of the President. Considering how many important works we have to undertake and the rather difficult position in which this country may be placed in the future. I think it would be unwise to debar men of experience from taking part in important business of the country, especially in the matter of the election of President where in principle it will be agreed that it should be the right of every citizen to take part. I would suggest to the Honourable the Mover that this limitation on the members of the Upper House should be removed and that they should be permitted to take part in the election of the President. ...

Prof. Shibbanlal Saxena (United Provinces: General): Sir, my amendment is that for subclauses (2) and (3) of Clause 1, the following may be substituted: ‘The Rastrapati shall be elected directly by the people on the basis of adult suffrage.’

This is a very serious matter and I deeply feel that the scheme that we have accepted in the provincial constitution in regard to the election of Governors, should be adopted in the Union Constitution as well. In the provincial constitution we have decided to elect the Governor on the basis of adult suffrage. Shortly before we heard the forceful speeches of Pandit Pant and Mr. Kher, and in the end Sardar Patel accepted Mr. Munshi’s amendment which lays down that a Governor elected on the basis of adult suffrage will have some special powers which he will use in times of crisis. It is clear from this, that Mr. Patel and this Constituent Assembly recognise what moral strength the Governors, elected on the basis of adult suffrage, will have and what will be its advantage. In the same way, I think, the ‘Rashtrapati’ should also be elected for [sic] adult suffrage.

It is certain that a person elected by twelve to thirteen crores of voters of the country, will have incomparable moral strength and dignity. He will be a man of the people and their true representative. Besides, in my opinion, for fulfilling our pledge for re-establishing unity in our country, which is broken up today and may be further broken up in view of the present efforts of some States, the election of the ‘Rashtrapati’ by adult suffrage will be very helpful. Then, even the poorest person in every part of the country from Travancore to Kashmir and from Calcutta to Bombay, will feel that he has the right of electing the President. He will then fully realise the dignity of an Indian and thus the roots of Indian unity will get stronger and stronger and the feeling of seceding from India, which is at present noticed in Hyderabad, Kashmir and Travancore will no more exist in the country. Even the people of those parts, which have seceded from India, will have a strong desire of reuniting with India. Therefore in the present circumstances particularly, I think that the election of the ‘Rashtrapati’ on the basis of adult franchise is very necessary and will prove to be very useful.

This is also the ‘national genius’ of our country. We are hero-worshippers. By having an austere man and a genius as ‘Rashtrapati’ our country will make speedy progress. A ‘Rashtrapati’ elected by twelve to thirteen crores of voters will be a genius and will command moral support. With a population of 35 crores, we will be the greatest independent nation in the world. A ‘Rashtrapati’ elected by twelve or thirteen crores of voters will enjoy unique moral prestige in the world. His individuality and moral strength will be very helpful to the country in the field of international politics. It will also appease the sentiment of hero-worship of the people of our country.

Today Mahatma Gandhi is the father of our nation even though he has not been elected to be so. All of us call him ‘Bapu’. He is like a permanent president of our nation. An elected Rashtrapati will reach his position to some extent only if he is elected by twelve or thirteen crores of voters as their ‘Rashtrapati’. He will thereby gain great moral prestige and honour and even though he may be aloof from every day work, he will benefit the country a good deal.

The draft constitution before us is an admixture of two constitutions. One of them is the American Constitution under which the President is directly elected on the basis of adult franchise. The other is the British Constitution under which the Prime Minister is the leader of the majority party in the parliament. But in England too, there is a King who has great dignity and the people respect him more than any Prime Minister. Under the constitution he is not free to take any action independently but he plays a useful part in improving the administration. The ‘Rashtrapati’ in our constitution will fulfil the purpose served by the British King. I know that many of our leaders are not in its favour and they will oppose it. They say that when we have accepted a parliamentary form of government, we would like to have a constitution in which the leaders elected by the Assembly and the Legislature will represent the whole nation and will have the responsibility of its administration and therefore to talk of the election of the ‘Rashtrapati’ on the basis of adult suffrage will be a sheer waste of time and will create unnecessary confusion. I do not agree with this. In my opinion, the party which will triumph in the presidential election in the country, will be in a majority in the legislature and will possibly command a majority in the federal legislature also.

For example, we elect Babu Rajendra Parsad, the President of the Constituent Assembly, as our president and Sardar Patel or Pandit Jawaharlal as premier. These two leaders will help and co-operate with each other. They will not be at loggerheads against each other. Pandit Pant while just now supporting another motion asked as to what will happen if the President dies. I say that if the President is not there, we will have the Prime Minister. His ministry can function and immediately conduct a second presidential election. In such an eventuality as we find in Burma, where the Prime Minister and his ministers have been murdered, the ‘Rashtrapati’ can manage the administration of the country and form another ministry. I say that the election of the ‘Rashtrapati’ will enhance the prestige of the country. Even though we do not give him powers, he will have his special influence on the administration by virtue of his position. Mahatma Gandhi is not even a four anna member of the Congress but everyone knows that every action in the country is taken on his advice. He is the architect of the present free India. I hold that the presidential election will be beneficial to us in every way but as I am not free in the matter, I do not press this amendment.

Mr. D.H. Chandrasekharaiya (Mysore State): Mr. President, Sir, the amendment that stands in my name runs as follows: That the following new sub-clause be added after sub-clause (3) of Clause 1 (3A): ‘The President shall be alternately elected from the state and the non-state Units’.

You know, Sir, that the President of the Federation is proposed to be elected through an electoral college consisting of the members of the two Houses of the Federation, and the members of the Legislatures of the units of the Federation. From this it is evident that the members from the States will not be in a position to successfully contest the elections by putting forward a candidate of their own for the Presidentship at any time because the members from the non-State Units will form an overwhelming majority of the electorates.

The population of the States is nearly 91 millions. That is to say, it forms nearly one-third of the population of the provinces forming the Indian Union and nearly more than four times the population of the Pakistan Units. The States representatives to the two Houses of the Federal Parliament, though forming a minority yet constitute an important part. So far as the Council of States is concerned, 71 members are contributed by the States alone, out of a total of 287 members of that body. Similarly, the House of the Peoples which is formed on the population basis, will contain an appreciable number from the State Units. In these circumstances, it would be just and proper that the State Units should be given a chance to put up their own candidate for the Presidentship exclusively for every second term. If that is considered to be a somewhat extravagant demand it may be provided that at least for every third term, the States may put forward their own candidate for Presidentship.

You know, Sir, the States form an important element in the life of the country. After the 15th August, the States too will attain a status of independence just as other elements are going to do. But I for one would wish that the States, whether big or small, will not remain aloof and isolated. They must join hands with the Indian Dominion now and with the Indian Federation or Indian Union after the Constitution is framed. For this purpose a certain amount of goodwill and accommodation towards the States is very necessary. I believe that a provision of the kind proposed in this amendment will go some way towards establishing that happy relationship between the States and the non-State elements of our country. With these words, I commend this amendment for the kind consideration and acceptance of this House.

Mr. President: There is another amendment in your name.

Mr. D.H. Chandrasekharaiya: The next amendment which I am proposing reads as follows: That the following new sub-clause be inserted after sub-clause (4) of Clause 1: ‘(5) Provision should be made for the President to take the oath of office as in the Constitution of U.S.A.’

One of the most important responsibilities cast on the President of the Federation is that he should preserve the Constitution and protect it from being violated. For any violation of the Constitution, he is removable from his office through impeachment. On account of that it would be necessary and proper that the President should give [an] undertaking in terms, of an oath to that effect. Almost all Constitutions, especially Federal Constitutions provide that an oath should be taken by the head of the Executive. For instance, in the United States of America, the President of the Federation takes an oath of allegiance before he enters on his duties, in the following words:

‘I do solemnly swear and affirm that I will faithfully execute the office of the President of the United States and will to the best of my ability preserve, protect and defend the Constitution of the United States.’

The Irish Constitution has a similar provision in its Constitution and it is to this effect:

‘The President shall enter upon his Office by subscribing public in the presence of members of both Houses of the National Parliament and Judges of the Supreme Court and the High Court and other public personages the following Declaration:

‘In the presence of Almighty God I do solemnly and sincerely promise and declare that I will fulfil my duties faithfully and conscientiously in accordance with the Constitution and law and that I will dedicate my abilities to the service and welfare of the people of Ireland. May God direct and sustain me.’

Any one of these forms will do for our own Constitution and the President of the Federation should also take a similar oath before he takes up his duties.

I therefore commend this amendment to the kind consideration and approval of this House.

Mr. President: It is 1 O’Clock now. So the House will adjourn till 10 O’Clock tomorrow.

The Assembly then adjourned till Ten of the Clock, on Thursday the 24th July, 1947.

16. President Should Be Elected through Adult Franchise

Extracts from the proceedings of the Constituent Assembly of India, 24 July 1947
Constituent Assembly Debates, Vol. IV, pp. 793–806

...Syed Kazi Karimuddin (C.P. and Berar: Muslim): Mr. President, Sir, sub-clause (2) of Clause 1 says:

‘The election shall be by an electoral college consisting of—

(a) the members of both Houses of Parliament of the Federation, and
(b) the members of the Legislatures of all the Units or, where a Legislature is bicameral, the members of the Lower House thereof.’

All the amendments which were moved to have the election of the President on adult suffrage have been withdrawn; but I want to bring home to the House why this election should be made on the basis of adult suffrage.

The decision on this point mainly rests on the point of view whether the executive should be non-parliamentary or parliamentary. I have been of the view that in India, looking to the conflicting political parties, diverse ideologies and many diverse factors, for the maintenance of peace and tranquillity and for the effective representation of all parties in the Cabinet, it is necessary that there should be a non-parliamentary executive. The only reason that has been advanced why adult suffrage should not be introduced is that a huge machinery will have to be set up for dealing with the elections and the energies of the nation will be consumed in holding these elections. But that is absolutely no reason. In a country like America, the election of the President is held on adult suffrage and my submission is that if every fifth or every fourth year the election of the President is held, and held on the basis of adult suffrage, it will educate the masses. Momentous economic problems of great magnitude will be brought to the forefront.
The masses will be educated if the election of the President is held on an all-India basis. Under the present sub-clause 2 of Clause 1, the President will be a puppet of the majority party and the persons who have fought the elections partly on provincial basis and partly on the all-India basis will elect the President for the whole Union.

Yesterday, while discussing the powers of the President, we felt that very wide powers had been given to him. He will be entitled even to suspend any part or the whole of the Constitution of a province. A President who will be afraid of the majority party and be elected by the electorate under sub-clause 2, will not, my submission is, be a man who will represent the entire nation on an all-India economic basis or on all-India issues. I have one more difficulty and that is very important. In order to suit the States, we have agreed that the members of the States’ Legislatures shall be members of the Lower House of the Union. It is a patent fact and is known to everybody that there is no popular rule in the States, and the members of the Legislatures in the States probably will be those who have been nominated by the States or who will not be the real representatives of the people. By electing a President by such representatives who will form one-third of the voters practically, the President will not be representing the people of the States but those who are nominated by the States Rulers. Under these circumstances, it can never be said that the President will be the true representative of the people of the States. Under these circumstances I earnestly appeal to the House that if you want democratic rule, if you want that the President shall be the true representative of the people who vote on adult suffrage, under the electoral college mentioned in sub-clause 2 to Clause 1, as regards the States particularly, he can never be representative of the people of the land. Therefore I oppose this amendment.

Mr. Mahomed Sherif (Mysore State): Sir, I am of the opinion that the President of the Union should be elected on the basis of adult franchise. It would be in the fitness of things that the person who would be at the helm of affairs and to whom so many powers would be given and so many responsibilities, should be one who must be elected on this basis. Every voter who is qualified to vote should have the satisfaction that in the election of the person who should govern the country, he should have a voice. It was argued that if this method is to be followed, it would [sic] intelligence of the people is not very high; that this method will not work satisfactorily, and that corruption, bribery, and so many vitiating factors will operate. It seems to me, Sir, that these difficulties will be more than offset by the advantages accruing therefrom. The election will be a great education by itself. It will lead the people to further their political insight which they have got and it will be advantageous in more than one way.

In these circumstances I would suggest that the President should be elected on the basis of adult suffrage. As I said such an election would have the seal of approval from the point of view of the voters. With these remarks I oppose this motion.

Mr. Tajamul Husain (Bihar: Muslim): Sir, sub-clause (1) of Clause 1 of Part IV lays down that the head of the State shall be called President and that any person or citizen of the Republic who has attained the age of 35 can be elected as President of the Republic. An amendment has been moved, Sir, to the effect that the election of the President should be held in rotation, that is to say, that for one term of office the President shall be elected from the north of India and for another term of office from the south of India. The reason advanced by the Honourable the Mover is that the people of South India are total different from those of Northern India. I submit, Sir, that is a very dangerous principle to adopt. If you want to accept this principle that there should be a reservation of seats for the election of the President, every province may claim that in turn the President should be elected from a particular province.

I will give you an example. The people of Western Bengal may very well claim that they are a different people from the rest of India.

An Honourable Member: No, no.

Mr. Tajamul Husain: I am glad that there is a voice saying no, no. And there should be no difference between one province and another. Therefore I submit, Sir, that the office of the President being the highest in the realm and he being the biggest dignitary of the Republic, we should have the best man. It does not matter from where he comes. It is quite possible that when the election is being held a Bihari, or a Christian, or a Jain, or a Parsee may happen to be the best man at that time. He may be elected President. Therefore, I have come here to oppose this amendment.

Paragraph (b) of sub-clause (2) of Clause 1 of Part IV lays down that the Upper House of a province where there are two Houses, should not have the right of choosing the President of the Republic. An amendment has been moved by Rai Bahadur Syamanandan Sahaya of Bihar that that right should be given to the Upper House as well. You will find that under sub-clause (a) both the Houses of the Central Legislature have been given the right of electing the President of the Union. There is no difference between the Upper House of the Central Legislature and the Upper House of a Provincial Legislature. Both have got special representation. If you do away with the Upper House then that is a different matter. I might support you on democratic principle but we have decided that we are to have an Upper House for the Central Legislature and there are going to be Upper Houses in some provinces. In that case I would submit that the qualifications of the members of the Upper House of the Central and Provincial Legislatures being the same, the members of the Upper House of a Provincial Legislature may be allowed to participate in the selection of the President of the Republic. To me it appears there is no reason why the members of the Upper House of a Provincial Legislature should be deprived of their right, their privilege and their pleasure of choosing their own President of the Republic.

I support the amendment of Mr. Syamanandan Sahaya.

Mr. H.R. Guruv Reddy (Mysore State): Mr. President, Sir, yesterday I was listening with very great interest to the discussions about nominations and particularly about the principles underlying nominations. One of our worthy colleagues was saying that the system of nominations, particularly in States, should be done away with, and that if those nominations are adopted elsewhere, they would not be objectionable. Sir, I fail to see the reasoning of this part of the proposition. If nominations are bad, they are bad everywhere and, if they could be accepted, they ought to be accepted on principle everywhere. I fail to see why we should attach sanctity to nominations if an elected person adopts it and consider his action just and proper and right too, and at the same time consider nomination by a ruler of a State or under his direction as something fundamentally wrong and bad. There is no justification for accepting this principle of nomination in one place and rejecting it in another. If you want to do away with nominations, let us do so boldly. But, if for reasons of representation of various interests nominations have to be resorted to, certainly let us have nominations both in the States and in the other Units. No one need be afraid that these nominations will be overwhelming in number. There is no need to fear that the ruler of a State would choose a person who would undo the good things that others attempt to do. In fact, if there is danger ahead, the ruler ought to be presumed to act suitably and put in persons who would represent all interests. I would therefore repeat that if nominations are to be adopted in this House or by the President of the Federal Legislature, what reason is there to say that that system would be bad elsewhere?

The other idea that was put forward by one of the speakers was that it would be a method by which we could coerce the States or other Units to adopt the method of election. That word ‘coerce’ is something very jarring. It is not a good and sound principle that we should coerce any person to accept or adopt our view. Our endeavour should be to win him over to our view. Therefore, Sir, once the principle underlying nominations is adopted here by the President, it ought to be allowed to be adopted elsewhere also on principle. But, as I said, I am basing my arguments on principles and not on facts. I would appeal to this august House that as the system of nominations has been accepted under the Constitution put forth for India, it ought to be allowed in other places also and it would certainly mete out justice to that section of the population which would be unrepresented otherwise.

Sir, I now pass on to the more interesting, if more disturbing factor, namely the North and the South, the States and the non-States. Sir, personally I feel that the North is not separate from the South, nor is the South separate from the North. I am one of those who believe that any one who is given an opportunity, if he has got the requisite qualifications otherwise, should come up. It is only an opportunity that is sought for. It is not a territorial division. We know certain reasons why the North and the South are frequently apprehensive of this or that thing. A man like me coming from the South, the Mysore State, feels that the North has been getting larger representation on this Constituent body than is due to it and that hereafter it should not be so. Sir, while I honestly feel that the South has been neglected for some time for various reasons, I do not put the blame for it on anybody or on any section. But I do feel that the South is to some extent neglected. But then it is a question of opportunity being given to the people of the South. If opportunities are allowed I am positive that persons coming from the South can equal if not surpass those coming from the North.

Sir, this question of States and non-States is really perplexing. Coming from a State I very much desire that an opportunity is given to someone from the State to be the Chief of India. But then it is again a vicious thing. The States form only one-third of the entire Dominion. And then the qualifications and other considerations that are to be laid down for this purpose is another disturbing factor. So far as I am concerned, I cannot agree to the separation of States and non-States for the purpose of election. As I said, given the requisite opportunity, given the requisite representation to the States, anyone who has got that courage of conviction to speak out boldly, honestly and fearlessly ought to find a place in the Indian Constitution.

Sir, it is difficult to create a reservation either for the non-States or for the States or even to set up a rotation as it were, in the Constitution. I emphasise the word ‘Constitution’. Sir, these are things which should be looked into and provided for in what we know as ‘convention’. We are starting today with a new Constitution for India and the Constitution itself provides for a change. We can work for another three years and if we find any difficulty we could have the Constitution changed suitably. Apart from that, I would never invoke the aid of the legislature for the purpose. As I said, it is only a healthy convention and good feeling and understanding between the North and the South and between the States and the non-States that can solve the problem. No legislation can solve it.

In this connection I would like to draw your very kind attention to the Madras mayoralty. There was a lot of bickering so far as the Madras mayoralty was concerned. Some years ago, it should be said to the credit of Sir Ramaswami Mudaliar that he, when he had something to do with that mayoralty, set up a convention. And that convention is being now respected and persons of various communities and various sections are being elected according to the convention laid down. It is not difficult for us to take this illustration and to follow it up even in the election of our President. Sir, I would once more state that it is convention, good understanding, good feeling between the North and the South, between the States and non-States that will solve this problem, not any law or any clause in the law.

Sir, with this I pass on to another very small matter but which looms very large, the question of the oath which was very ably put forth by my worthy colleague as an essential matter, and I do not know that lacuna crept into this report on the Union Constitution. No provision has been made here for the oath. Sir, it is a common thing all over the world, in all well-established Governments, that the Head of the State takes the oath on his entry into that high office. It would be becoming and worthy of our Indian Government that the President should take the oath before an appropriate authority that he would safeguard the constitution that is being framed now and which he is going to work.

With these remarks, Sir, I commend the amendments and principles I have just put forward to the acceptance of the House.

Pandit Lakshmi Kanta Maitra (West Bengal: General): Sir, I do not want to make a speech.
I want to suggest that the pace at which we are moving is very slow. At this rate I am afraid we won’t be able to stick to the time-table. I suggest that now that we are discussing only the principles of the constitution, speeches may be confined to the particular clause or amendments under discussion and not touch the entire field of the Indian Union Constitution.

Mr. President: I entirely agree with you that we should not discuss the entire field of the Constitution but must confine ourselves to the particular amendment that has been moved or the particular clause which is under discussion. I would also request members to limit their speeches to five minutes, unless in a particular case I find that the question that to being discussed is of such a nature that it requires a longer time.

Mr. H.V. Kamath (C.P. and Berar: General): Sir, two amendments moved on the floor of this House yesterday, one by my friend, Rai Bahadur Syamanandan Sahaya, and the other by my friend Mr. Channiah.

Mr. Sahaya’s amendment is to the effect that, where the legislature is bicameral, the members of the Upper House also must have the right of voting in the election for the President. I stand here, to oppose that amendment. It was asked why, when the members of the Upper House of the Union are allowed to vote, the same privilege should not be extended to members of the upper chambers of the Units. If my friend looks at Chapter II, he will find that the Council of States is proposed to be set up on a different basis from that of the upper chambers of the Units. Moreover, we have visualised the President as being an integral part of the Federal Parliament which will be composed of the President and the National Assembly, the National Assembly in its turn being composed of the Council of States and the House of the People.
Where the President is an integral part, an essential part of the Federal Parliament, it stands to reason that both Houses should take part in the election of the President.

The other amendment was moved by my friend, Mr. Channiah. That amendment is astounding, bordering on the ridiculous. At a time, Sir, when we have regretfully accepted the division of India on a communal basis, at a time, Sir, when fissiparous and centrifugal tendencies are holding the field, at a time, Sir, when most of us here want to see the unity of our country restored to its pristine condition, it is amazing that a member of this House should stand up and draw a distinction between the north and south of our country. I was inclined to think that at least after the march of Agstya across the Vindhyas and after the battle of Rama with Vali and Ravana, this difference between the north and south of India had been obliterated. We have heard of the Maginot Line in Europe; we have heard of the Siegfried Line in Europe; we have heard of the Curzon Line, the Durand Line in Europe. If Mr. Channiah’s amendment is accepted the day will not be far off when we will have a Channiah line in India between the north and south of India. When we are trying to build a strong State, when we are trying to wipe away all the differences of the past, when the division of the country on a communal basis has been accepted most reluctantly, it is amazing that an amendment of this kind should be propounded on the floor of this House. Precisely for that reason, Sir, I am opposed, for the present at least, even to a linguistic division of provinces. Let us for the present bend all our energies to the task of building up a mighty Indian Union; and let us bend our energies to the task of restoring the unity of our country. Let us, Sir, realize the goal which we have fondly cherished of a strong united India, an independent India marching forward for the welfare of India and the peace of the world; an India where all Indians, be they Hindus, Muslims, Christians, Parsees or Sikhs all small march together, as citizens of one common Motherland, a united, strong and independent India. That is the theme, Sir which is uppermost in our minds. We are still hoping to realize the dream when the unity of our country will be restored. It is in the spirit of the words of that famous song, which is on the lips of all Indians today:

Har sooba ke rahanewale har mazhab ke prani
Sab bhed aur farak mitake sab goda me teri ake goonthe prema ki mala.
Suraj bankar jag par chamke Bharat nama subhaga that I oppose the doctrine which was propounded yesterday by my friend Mr. Channiah seeking to divide the North from the South. One of my friends, Sir, said that the South has been neglected. I fail to see how or in what way the South of India has been neglected. If my friend says that the South means only Madras, I differ from him. I would like him first to define the South of India, whether the South means only Madras or Madras plus Bombay and the various other component parts. I for one think that the South has not been neglected. Today it is the two States in the South. Hyderabad and Travancore which are giving us the headache. If it is the result of neglect and if it is the result of being unimportant, I do not know, Sir, what my friend means. These two States of the South today, Sir, are giving most of our statesmen and our leaders a big headache. If my friend thinks that Southern India has been neglected, I do not know, Sir, how he can forget the eminent and leading politicians from Bombay and from Madras who have contributed to the political development, the political evolution of our common Motherland.

Then, Sir, a point was made out that the oath should be taken by the President of the Federation. I agree, but this is not the place where the oath should be mentioned. The oath will certainly find a place in the Constitution when it comes to be finally drafted. Here we are discussing merely the principles of the Constitution therefore I think that here the mention of the oath to be taken by the President is out of place. For that matter, Sir, we can as well say that the members of the Legislature too should take an oath of allegiance to the country, but you are not mentioning anything like that. They are mere details which are to be taken into account when the Constitution is actually drafted. I therefore, Sir, shall not take the time of the house. I oppose the amendments which were moved by Rai Bahadur Syamanandan Sahaya and my friend, Mr. Channiah.

Shri Ajit Prasad Jain (United Provinces: General): Mr. President, I support the resolution moved by Pandit Jawaharlal Nehru. The method suggested herein for the election of the President is very appropriate, some of the members present have proposed that the President should be elected by adult franchise. Many arguments have been advanced against this proposal. At one place the resolution says different weight will be attached to the votes of different members, e.g. the vote of the member representing lesser number of people will be considered less weighty and that of the member representing greater number of people will be considered more weighty. I would like to say this much that this balances the defects caused by indirect election. The example of America has been cited where the population is 130 to 140 millions and the President is elected on the basis of adult franchise. I beg to point out that in America it was considered desirable that the Presidential election should not be direct but through ‘Electoral College’. We too have here a proposal for the formation of an Electoral College, the members of which will be elected by the people. Thus the election of our President will also be according to the choice of the people. I had only to say this much, but I feel one difficulty in the scheme sponsored by Pandit Jawaharlal Nehru. According to it, the President will be elected through an electoral college. All members of both the Houses of the Federal Parliament—The Council of States and the House of People—will be the members of the electoral college and they will participate in the Presidential election. The members of the Provincial legislatures and the States legislatures too have been given the right to participate in the Presidential election. So far as the votes of the members of the Unit legislatures are concerned, it is said in the proposal that different weightage will be given to them. For example, one vote of a member representing ten thousand voters will be considered equal to 10 votes of a member representing one million voters, Sir.

So far as Unit legislatures are concerned this method is very appropriate and desirable. But it has not been clearly stated in the proposal, whether any weightage will be given to the votes of the members of the Federal Parliament (House of People and Council of States) or what will be the value of their votes or the relative position of those votes. One of the interpretations of the proposal relating the unit legislature appears to be that in the present state of affairs, each member of the House of People has merely one vote. If this is correct, I consider the proposal very wrong. In the draft proposal presented to us, it has been stated at a later stage that on an average a member of the House of People represents one million voters. If he gets merely one vote, this means that members of the Unit legislature who represent only ten thousand voters get 10 votes and a member of Federal Legislature, e.g., the House of People who represent one million voters gets only one vote according to the present scheme. In my opinion this is not fair. The question of giving due weightage to the votes of the members of the Federal Parliament should be reconsidered so that the people might be properly represented.

There appears another difficulty. It is possible that state may have some sort of nomination and would be difficult to say as to what would be the value of the votes of the nominated members. Again, there might be some constituencies which are not territorial for example, the university and the Labour Constituencies. So far as the provinces are concerned, we have decided that there would be territorial constituencies and there shall be no special constituencies. But in States it is possible that there may be some territorial and some non-territorial constituencies and some nominations as well. Another difficulty may arise from the method suggested for giving weightages to different votes of nominated members. If you decide that some sort of weightage should be given to the votes of the members of the Federal Parliament also, although the proposal contains no mention of it—the difficulty arises as to what would be the weight of the votes of the members nominated to the Council of State.

However, I wish to draw your attention to the necessity of a clear provision for classifying and giving weightage to the votes of the members of the Federal Parliament.

With these few words, I hope that you will consider my suggestions.

Mr. President: I have got three more names in the list. I find some more members standing up wishing to speak. We have already taken one hour today and we took about one hour yesterday on this clause. If we go on discussing at this rate, I do not think we shall be able to complete even one Part by Thursday next when we wish to close. I therefore desire to request the members to cut down their speeches to the minimum and if any point has already been discussed by any member, not to speak on the same point and repeat the same arguments.

Dr. P.S. Deshmukh: May I suggest, Sir the system of giving names should be stopped and opportunity should be given only to that member who catches the eye of the President?

Mr. President: I accept that. Hereafter, I shall not accept any slip. Any one who catches my eye will be allowed to speak.

Mr. Yudhisthir Mishra (Eastern States Group 1): Sir, I support the amendment of Mr K. Chengalaraya Reddy to sub-clause (2) (b) of Clause. Mr. Reddy has moved an amendment to substitute the words ‘elected members’ for the word ‘members’. It would appear to many of the honourable members present here that the word sought to be inserted is unnecessary and superfluous, because under the present constitution, the provincial legislatures would have no nominated members. But I would like to remind the honourable members that there is no corresponding change in the constitution of the State legislatures. In many of the States, especially in the smaller ones, there is an overwhelming number of nominated members in the legislatures. In fact, in some of the States, there is no legislature at all. I represent the Orissa States and I would submit before this House that in some of the States there is no legislature at all. Wherever there is any legislature, the number of nominated members is so large, that the elected representatives have no voice in the Legislative Assembly. In some of the States, the State Congress and the Praja Mandals have boycotted elections to the Legislative Assembly in view of the unsatisfactory franchise. Wherever there is a legislature, the franchise is narrow and based on communal lines, and it has a large number of nominated members. Sir, if you allow the nominated members to take part in the election of the President, then, some of the States may set up inadequate and bogus representative assemblies and try to influence the election by undemocratic methods. It would be a mockery of democracy if the nominated members are allowed to take part in the election of the President of the future Republic of India. I therefore support the amendment which has been moved by my honourable friend Mr. Reddy.

At the same time, Sir, I would oppose the amendment moved by Mr. Chandrasekhariah. He says that the President shall be alternately elected from the States and non-States units. It is an insult to the States if such a limitation is placed on the election of the President.

Mr. R.K. Sidhwa (C.P. and Berar: General): Mr. President. I had no desire to enter into this debate but for one point which was raised by my Honourable friend Mr. Reddy from Mysore State, who advocated the rotation system for the election of the President and in support of that he quoted the instance of the mayoralty of the Municipal Corporation of Madras.
An Honourable Member: There are two members from Mysore. The reference may be clarified, Sir.

Mr. President: (To Mr. Sidhwa). You have made a mistake with regard to the name of the speaker.

Mr. R.K. Sidhwa: He came from Mysore. Sir, it is true that in the Municipal Corporation of Madras, there is the rotation system for the election of the Mayor. In the first year a Brahmin is elected, in the second year a Non-Brahmin and in the third year a Harijan. A similar convention prevails in the Bombay Municipal Corporation. In the first year a Hindu is elected in the second year a Muslim, in the third year a Parsi and in the fourth year a Christian. A similar system exists in the Karachi Municipal Corporation also. In the first year a Parsi is elected, then a Muslim, then a Christian and then a Hindu. Also in the Calcutta Corporation, a similar system exists. As I have something to do with this rotation system, in the Municipal Mayoral elections in India, I may say that this rotation was introduced to give an opportunity to every community for the purpose of presiding over this only honoured office. It is only an honoured office, I repeat, Sir. The Mayor has absolutely no power except that he presides at the meetings of the Municipal Corporation. Let me assure you, Sir, he has no executive power although he is the first Citizen of the city. Therefore, you cannot compare the mayoralty with the election of the President. The President of India will be the best man. He will have many executive powers. He will have to select a Premier and he will have to select his Ministers. He will have power of dissolution of the legislature. Over and above all, Sir, under the proposed constitution, he will be the Supreme Commander of the Army. Do you want, under these circumstances, Sir, the President to be elected by rotation? I shall certainly strongly oppose the President being elected on any kind of communal basis or the rotation or province wise system being introduced. We must have the best man for the President. If the President elected is the best man, we shall elect him for a second time—the best man whosoever he may be he may have become from the north, south, west or east. We cannot tolerate the election of the President community wise, or province wise or anywise as I stated. The convention introduced in the election of the Mayor does not apply in the election of the President. The Mayor is merely a figure-head. He only presides over the meetings. He has no executive power. The convention is only meant to give opportunities to the several communities to occupy the honoured and dignified post of the first Citizen of the city. You cannot mix up therefore the conventional system in the election of the President. I therefore strongly oppose this. There is no amendment to that effect, but implicitly or explicitly no reservation or no convention should be made even by our topmost leaders that, we shall elect the President province-wise or from the north, south, west or east of India, or we shall elect a Parsi, a Christian or a Muslim. The best man should be elected. I therefore, Sir, strongly oppose the convention of election provincewise to the office of President.

Shri R.V. Dhulekar (United Provinces: General): Mr. President, I desire to speak a few words in support of the clause which has been moved. Much has been said in support of it but I would not say anything about them. I would draw your attention to only two matters.

Firstly, some members have said that the system of election is very irregular in the States and some of the States representatives to this Assembly have been nominated either by the government or by the rulers and they should not be allowed to take part in the election of the President. In fairness, we must admit that the rulers, participating in the Constituent Assembly were subjected to such injustice at the hands of the British government that they have grown apprehensive that if they join the union they would be crushed. A burnt child dreads fire. We must not think that they are degraded and demoralised Indians. Personally I think that they were placed in such circumstances under the British government that they could not follow the policy which they should have. Therefore, I do not think it proper to raise this point that the nominated members should not be allowed to participate in the Presidential elections. In my opinion we must accept their request that they should be given time so that they may fully realise on joining the Union that the rulers and their people will have the same rights and status that we have. When they have realised the advantages of joining the union, their autocracy will automatically vanish and the rulers will feel that they are common Indians and they have the same rights that the common people have.

The second thing to which I desire to draw your attention is this. According to this clause regarding the members of the Provincial legislatures it will have to be considered as to how many people they represent; and in order to give weightage to the votes, the word ‘weightage’ has been included here. In my opinion, it is unnecessary. It is quite possible that some members might have said that at some places with lesser population they had got comparatively more seats than those having greater population. But in my opinion, no member, whether returned from any provincial legislature or State legislature should be considered so narrow minded that he would demand weightage for his votes in the presidential election. I know, in my own province, some members represent 50 thousand voters while some represent ten thousand and others fifteen thousand voters. But after being elected, he does not think it at all that he represents so many people. He considers himself only a member of the legislature and behaves in a ‘way befitting his dignity.’ Therefore the inclusion of the word ‘weightage’ appears odd but at the same time there is no harm in it and hence I do not oppose it.

With these words I support the clause.

Mr. President: The Mover, Pandit Jawahar Lal Nehru, may now reply to the debate.

The Honourable Pandit Jawaharlal Nehru (United Provinces: General): Mr. President, there are many amendments. But the greatest emphasis has been laid on one point: the election of the President on the basis of adult franchise, i.e. everybody should take part in the election. Another amendment is that the word ‘Rashtrapati’ should be substituted by the word ‘Neta’ or ‘Karandhar’. Still another amendment is that the President should be elected alternatively from the North and the South. Again, there is an amendment which says that the members of the Upper Houses also should take part in the Presidential election. There is yet another amendment; but I do not know whether it has been moved or not. According to this amendment, the President should be elected from the States and non-State portion of the Indian Republic (by rotation) alternately.

Lastly, there is an amendment which deals with the oath of allegiance.

I regret very much that I cannot accept any of these amendments except the one proposing that the word ‘member’ should be substituted by ‘elected member’, though the word ‘elected’ is not a definite improvement. The draft would have thoroughly clarified the point; but in spite of this, if you wish to add the word ‘elected’, I am ready to accept it. Something has been said about the oath also. It is obvious that it will figure in the Constitution. At this stage, it does not seem necessary.

So far as the question of the election of the President, from the North and the South and from the States or non-State units is concerned, it seems to be wrong in principle. It is not desirable that we elect the President, once from one class and the next time from the other, and framing of rules and statutory provisions for this purposes is highly undesirable.

In answer to the query, as to why members of the Upper Houses should not take part in the presidential election. I submit that there will be much difference between the Upper Houses of the States Units and those of the provinces. I cannot say which of the units will have an Upper House. Another point is that the States and the Provinces will have different standards. No body knows what principles the States and the provinces will adopt. If this right is conceded to the Upper Houses it will create confusion. Therefore, in my opinion, the proposition is correct that in the Centre, both the Houses shall have the right to take part in the presidential election, and in the units only the Lower House. There is a complexity which has not been clarified i.e., whether the units will have greater rights than the Centre, whether the members of the Central Legislature will have one vote or more to balance the voting strength of units. It is for our advisers to make this point clear. Therefore, for the present, in my opinion, as I have already stated and as has already been printed it should be left as it is. I have already stated in the beginning, and I repeat it once again and if you too reflect over it, you will arrive at the same conclusion, that it is best to leave this choice unfettered. I am not prepared to believe that adult franchise is absolutely essential. Obviously, the number of those who will elect the members of the Assembly will be in millions and they are expected to be proper persons. Therefore, when the members of the Assembly themselves are being elected by the votes of millions where is the necessity for electing the President by adult franchise? Therefore if you desire to frame and promulgate your constitution without necessary delay, then we should avoid complications; otherwise we will not be able to frame our Constitution in the least possible time, and act on it.

If you want to elect the President by adult franchise, then this would mean that we will have to waste much of our time in holding (Presidential) elections and we will not be able to act according to our new Constitution. Therefore, it is my desire that this resolution should be accepted in the form I have put before you.

Mr. Mahomed Sherif: Will you kindly throw some light on one matter? You have referred to election in Clause 2(a). When you accept the principle of nomination in this amendment, then why do you not accept this amendment also? Why this contradiction between the two?

The Honourable Pandit Jawaharlal Nehru: Which clause did you read?

Mr. Mahomed Sherif: Page 9, Clause 14 (a).

The Honourable Pandit Jawaharlal Nehru: The question of my accepting or rejecting nomination is not in issue. I accept that particular type of nomination which is recorded herein, that is to say, nominees of units and 'scientific bodies' should be taken. This is not the question. I have already said that the President should be elected by the votes of the elected members.

Mr. President: I will now put the amendments to vote first. The first amendment which I have to put is the one moved by Mr. Channiah: ‘That in sub-clause (1) of Clause 1 after the word “Selected” the words “by rotation either by the North of India or South of India” be inserted.’

May I point out to the member the great difficulty which I have felt with regard to this. The clause as it sought to be amended by him will read: ‘The Head of the Federation shall be the President to be elected by rotation either by the North of India or South of India.’ That is to say, the members alone of the North in one year and alone of the South in the next election will take part in the election, but I think he means not the members who will take part in the election, but the President himself. I have pointed this out, and shall now put the amendment to vote.

The amendment was negatived.

Mr. President: The next one is by Mr. Naziruddin Ahmad:

‘That in sub-clause (1) of Clause 1, for the words “as provided below” “the words in the manner set out below” be substituted.’

It is a verbal amendment. I do not know if it is necessary. Anyhow, I shall put it to vote.

The amendment was negatived.

Mr. President: Then there is the amendment of Rai Bahadur Syamanandan Sahaya:

‘That in paragraph (b) of sub-clause (2) of Clause 1, the words “or, where a legislature is bicameral, the members of the Lower House thereof” be deleted.’

The amendment was negatived.

Mr. President: There is an amendment by Mr. Chengalaraya Reddy:

‘That in sub-clause (2) (b) of clause 1, for the words “the members” wherever they occur, the words “the elected members” be substituted.’

This has been accepted by the Mover.

The amendment was adopted.

Mr. President: Then there is an amendment by Mr. Chandrasekharaiya: that the following new sub-clause be added after sub-clause (3) of Clause 1:—

‘3(A) The President shall be alternately elected from the State and the non State Units.’

The amendment was negatived.

Mr. President: There is another amendment by Mr. Chandrasekharaiya: that the following new sub-clause be inserted after sub-clause (4) of clause 1:—

‘(5) Provision should be made for the President to take the oath of office as in the constitution of U.S.A.’

The amendment was negatived.

Mr. President: The next is, Sir, N. Gopalaswami Ayyangar’s amendment:

‘That in the last sentence of sub-clause (2) of Clause 1, for the words “the votes of the Unit Legislative” the words “the votes of the members of the Unit Legislatures” be substituted.’

The amendment was adopted.

Mr. President: I think these are all the amendments that have been moved. Of these two have been carried. Now the Resolution as amended is put to vote.

Clause 1, as amended, was adopted.
17. Discussion about the Status of the President in Future India

Extract from the proceedings of the Constituent Assembly of India, 24 July 1947
Constituent Assembly Debates, Vol. IV, pp. 812–20

Clause 4

The Honourable Pandit Jawaharlal Nehru: I move Clause 4, Conditions of President’s office.

(1) The President shall not be a member of either House of the Federal Parliament and if a member of either House be elected President, he shall be deemed to have vacated his seat in that House.
(2) The President shall not hold any other office or position of emolument.
(3) The President shall have an official residence and shall receive such emoluments and allowances as may be determined by Act of the Federal Parliament and until then, such as prescribed in schedule...
(4) The emoluments and allowances of the President shall not be diminished during his term of office.

There is one small matter which I thought might be cleared up and I shall await an amendment to clear that up. In sub-clause (1), it says ‘The President shall not be a member of either House of the Federal Parliament’. Obviously he should also not be a member of any provincial legislature. I believe some amendment will be moved to this effect. If so, I will accept it.

Nawab Muhammad Ismail Khan (United Provinces: Muslim): May I ask the Mover as to what he means by the words ‘The President shall not hold any position of emolument.’ Does he also mean that he cannot be a director of a company or merely that he cannot hold any position of emolument under the Government?

The Honourable Pandit Jawaharlal Nehru: He shall not hold any other office or position of emolument, whatever it may be. He cannot hold any other office which brings him some gain.

Nawab Muhammad Ismail Khan: I hope you will make it quite clear.

The Honourable Pandit Jawaharlal Nehru: It is perfectly clear. It is dead clear. As the House knows, the convention is that even the Ministers should not hold directorships of companies. That is the convention in many countries, although it cannot be the law. So far as the President is concerned, he should not hold any directorships or any position of profit or gain in business.

Dr. B. Pattabhi Sitaramayya (Madras: General): But that is not conveyed by the wording.

Mr. President: We shall have a discussion of the clause when all the amendments have been moved.

(Messrs. Seth Govind Das, Ajit Prasad Jain, S.V. Krishnamurthy Rao and Naziruddin Ahmad did not move their amendments.)

Mr. Naziruddin Ahmad (West Bengal: Muslim): Mr. President, Sir, I beg to move that for sub-clause (2) of Clause 4, the following be substituted: ‘(2) The President shall not hold any position or office under the Union or under any Provincial Government, or in or under any local authority or in or under any business concern (whether incorporated or not) in any honorary capacity or for any emolument allowance.’ Sir, I find that this point has struck some honourable members of this House. What the report says is that the President shall not hold any other office or position of emolument, but it may be that he may hold an honorary office in a business concern. It he is concerned with any religious charitable, educational or similar... other institution, there can be no objection, but I think, if he is connected with any business concern even in any honorary capacity, it will be open to serious objection. Any businessman can ask the President to be a patron of his business and he might secure good business because of that. That would be throwing the President into the arena of party politics. I would submit that this sort of business connection should not be allowed. I am only urging this to enable the drafting committee to consider this point. This is all that I desire to submit to the House.

Mr. H.V. Pataskar: Sub-clause (2) of Clause 4, gave rise to doubts and therefore I tabled this amendment which stands in my name, ‘nor shall he be interested in any business or profession for gain or profit’. Since I now understand that it is not the intention that the President should hold any interest in any business, I am not moving this amendment. All the same, I would request that when the final draft constitution is prepared, this should be made more clear.

Shri T.A. Ramalingam Chettiyar (Madras: General): My amendment refers to appointments after the President has held office. I will leave it to the Mover to accept it or not, as he likes, and if he does not accept it, I do not want to press it.

The Honourable Pandit Jawaharlal Nehru: What is the amendment referred to?

Mr. President: The amendment which Mr. Ramalingam Chettiyar has given notice of is ‘that the person who has held office as President shall not be eligible to be appointed to any salaried office in the Federation’ i.e., after he has ceased to be a President, he shall not be appointed. The amendment is not moved formally. Therefore we shall proceed further.

(Messrs. D. Govinda Doss, P. Kakkan, V.I. Muniswami Pillay and P.M. Velayudapani did not move their amendments.)

K.T.M. Ahmed Ibrahim Sahib Bahadur (Madras: Muslim): Mr. President, Sir, I move: That in the last sentence of sub-clause (2) of Clause 1, for the words ‘the votes of the Federal Parliament and until then, such’ be deleted. Now, Sir, the President of the Federation is the supreme executive authority of the whole State and as such he should be completely free from any party influence when once he is elected. But if the determination of his emoluments and allowances are dependent on any Act of the Federal Parliament it is quite possible that he will be conscious of the fact that the determination of his salary is subject to party influence and that his actions may on occasions be swayed by such consciousness. It is therefore meet and proper, Sir, that the President’s salary should be placed beyond any party influence in order to ensure impartiality in his actions and therefore I have moved this amendment. I hope it will be accepted by the Honourable Mover.

(Messrs. B.M. Gupta, R.K. Sidhwa, Biswanath Das, Thakur Das Bhargava, Syamanandan Sahaya, and S. Nijalingappa, did not move their amendments.)

K.T.M. Ahmed Ibrahim Sahib Bahadur: Mr. President, Sir, I move: That in sub-clause (4) of Clause 4, for the word ‘diminished’, the word ‘altered’ be substituted. In the draft it is provided that the salary of the President shall not be diminished, but at the same time there should also be no Provision for the increment of salary during his tenure of office as President. The reason is the same as I pointed out when I moved the previous amendment, i.e., the President should not be in any way conscious that his salary is dependent on any Act of Parliament and it is absolutely necessary that the quantum of his salary should be determined by the Constitution Act itself.
Mr. Ramnarain Singh (Bihar: General): Mr. President, I propose: that the President must not be a party-man.

When the Objectives Resolution enunciating our objectives was moved in the House I put in an amendment that a proviso that no party would be deemed legal in this country, should be incorporated in the constitution. Every party whether named after any person or following any particular principle should be declared illegal.

The reason for my amendment is this. In many countries of the world there are party governments and they flatter themselves with the thought that they are democratic. What does democracy mean? It means, ‘Panchayati Rajya’—the peoples’ government. The very word makes it clear that the party system of government is poles apart from democracy. In India it is believed that the ‘Panch’, is God Himself and its rule is God’s rule. I venture to say that the very term party system deteriorates at times into a government of the wicked and the sly. Sometimes it seems as if there is no gentle soul in the party. A few sly persons form a party and establish their own government in the name of Democracy. I appeal to the members of this Assembly that the party system be abolished. So long there is a party true of democracy cannot exist. The party system is fatal to democracy.

Pandit Jawaharlal Nehru: Mr. President, on a point of order. I would like to know what bearing this speech has on my motion.

Mr. President: The amendment which he has moved is ‘that the President must not be a party-man’.

The Honourable Pandit Jawaharlal Nehru: I should like to understand its bearing.

Mr. President: He wants to put a disqualification on a candidate who wants to stand for Presidentship.

The Honourable Pandit Jawaharlal Nehru: A disqualification which can be measured, weighed, computed somehow. It must have some relation to fact.

Mr. President: So far as the amendment is concerned, I cannot rule it out.

Mr. Ramnarain Singh: Yes, I will just tell you. I am condemning here the party system and suggest to the House that our President should not be a party man. What I mean is this that often the party system of government is mistaken for democracy or Panchayati Rajya. To make it clear let me put a concrete example. Suppose a particular party has 300 members in the Assembly.

Mr. President: Please do not discuss the party system at length. You just make out your point that the President should not be a party man. Merits and demerits of the party system cannot be discussed here.

Mr. Ramnarain Singh: I submit to your ruling, Sir, I shall not discuss that. But it is difficult for me to support the amendment unless we condemn the party system. However, I shall not further press it at the moment. If given a chance, I shall speak on it later. Now I conclude with the remark that it is absolutely essential that the President must not be a party man.

The Honourable Sir. N. Gopalaswami Ayyangar: Sir, I wish to move an amendment to sub-clause (1) of Clause 4. It is in the following terms: For sub-clause (1) of Clause 4 the following be substituted: ‘The President shall not be a member of Parliament or of any, Legislature and if such a member be elected President, he shall be deemed to have vacated his seat in Parliament or in the Legislature concerned.’

The principle of sub-clause (1), which, now, according to the draft above the House, applies only to the Federal Parliament will be extended by this amendment to membership of the legislatures of the Units. I have advisedly used the terms ‘Parliament’ and ‘Legislature’, because, under the principles adopted for drafting in connection with this document, ‘Parliament’ applies to the legislature of the Federation and the word ‘Legislature’ is confined to the legislatures of the Units. I have nothing more to say.

Mr. President: All the amendments have been moved. The original proposition and the amendments are now open for discussion.

Shri K. Santhanam: Sir, I accept the clause as it is; but I do feel that it requires to be filled up in the drafting stage.

My honourable friend Mr. Ramnarain Singh moved an amendment which in its present form is not suitable. The President has to stand as a party man. But it is essential that after the election, he should give up all his association with any political party.

As you know, there has been some discussion as to whether the Speaker of the Assembly can continue to be a party man. It has not yet been decided. I hope in the new constitution, the President, the Governors and the Speakers, will all cease to have connection with any political party.

Then, again, there are business connections. Of course, ‘position of emolument’ may cover many things; but it will not cover other things. Take for instance the holding of shares in a company. It is not possible to prevent the President from holding shares; but it is essential that as soon as he is elected, he must declare his holdings in any company so that the public will know. During his term of office, he should not be allowed to acquire any shares or immovable property except through a special procedure. We must keep the President far above all these complications. Otherwise, all kinds of rumours and slander will be set afloat. I hope the Drafting Committee which will be set up for drafting will go into the matter and give us a good, comprehensive draft which could be put into the constitution.

Pandit Lakshmi Kanta Maitra: Mr. President, Sir, I wish to put in half a dozen sentences in connection with the amendments which have just been moved.

In reply to the question of my Honourable friend Mr. Ismail, the mover of the resolution has made it perfectly clear that the Union President will not be entitled to hold any office in any joint stock or limited company. He cannot be a Director of a registered or unregistered body. He cannot be in receipt of any salary or emoluments from any quarter. The principle is very salutary and sound. He should be a man who has no other allegiance except to the State, a man who has for the time being dedicated his whole energy to the service of the State. He should be in a position to give undivided attention to his office.

While I am clear on this and the House will agree to this, that he should not hold any office of emolument, I think we should go a step further. I am inclined to think that the President should not hold any honorary office. For instance, he cannot be the President of a Chamber of Commerce; he cannot be the President of a Trade Union organisation and the like. My idea is that from such honorary offices also he should be excluded, because, his position might be utilised for furthering sectional interest. I am not moving a formal amendment. I hope and trust that the honourable the mover of the resolution, when it goes for final drafting, will take note of these things and see to it that in the final draft these things are included.
We are all agreed that the President should be a man, who like Caesar’s wife, should be above suspicion. To ensure this, all these steps should be taken and even the extreme step proposed by my honourable friend Mr. Ramnarain Singh should be taken into consideration. You cannot eliminate a party man from standing for the Presidentship. But as soon as he gets into the office of Union President, he should certainly sever all his political connections and political affiliations, and he should cease to be a party man. That goes without saying. Keeping in view all these things, I hope the honourable the mover will, at the final stage, take such steps as will make the position of the President unimpeachable and above suspicion.

Mr. M.S. Aney (Deccan and Madras States): Mr. President, Sir, I have to make one or two suggestions in regard to the words ‘Position of emoluments’ so that when this memorandum goes back to the Drafting Committee for final draft, they may be taken into consideration.

It has been pointed out, and rightly too, that the words ‘position of emolument’ are not comprehensive to include many positions in which emoluments are had by persons and therefore the words have to be made more clear. I may point out one or two instances which probably you may not have noted. For example in the C.P. and Berar, there is a system of hereditary village officers known as Patels and Patwaris. Again there are persons who are called Ex-Pargana officers styled Deshmukhs. Deshpande, etc. They were real Pargana officers in olden times and in recognition of that fact, certain emoluments are given to them by the British Government. My honourable friend Dr. P.S. Deshmukh who is our colleague in this House belongs to that class. They get certain emoluments which are known as Rasams; these persons are called Ex-Pargana officers. Up to this time, in all matters of elections, Patils, Patwaris and these Pargana officers in C.P. and Berar used to be considered as not holding a position of emolument debarring a citizen from standing as a candidate for election. The second thing I want to mention is there are members of the old Royal family who are getting certain political pensions. They are not called emoluments. Are we to consider that persons in this position should be debarred from standing for election as President? It is not an emolument but a compensation paid for what was taken from their royal ancestors. It is something in the nature of a private property of the man. These are the three kinds of emoluments, two of which are particularly peculiar to the provinces in which I live. I therefore wish that the Committee which is going to draft the Constitution should consider these points while drafting with a view to exclude them from ‘emoluments’ in this clause.

With regard to the amendment of my friend Mr. Ram Narayan Singh would like to state that if a man, no matter what party he belongs to, once occupies the Presidentship, he must sever his connections with the party and remain a non-party man, but you cannot expect a man to be a non-party man before he does take that place. It is something like asking a fish not to be in the water. A person must belong to some party, it may not be a political party like the Congress, it may be some other party, he may belong to some religious party. A man being a social being, is supposed to belong to some kind of a party or group and if we use that word ‘non-party man’ it will be difficult to elect a President. Therefore, although I cannot subscribe to that particular amendment which he has suggested, I accept the principle that once he is elected to that position, he is expected to be a non-party man and he should sever his connection with his party and remain there as a man belonging to all or as a man belonging to none. He must take one of the two positions and only in that case he will be in a position to discharge his duties properly.

Mr. President: Mr. Sri Prakasa.
Shri Sri Prakasa: Listening, Sir, to some of the speeches almost compels me to repeat what I said in another place that it seems that some members at least are of the opinion that the President should be a person who has no ostensible means of livelihood. (Laughter). I think, Sir, that we should have some trust in the person whom we are putting up for the Office of the President. We should not fetter him in any way. If we do not like the man’s profession, then we need not put him up at all. But if we like the man, we can trust him to do his best as President and not allow his profession to interfere with his actions. We can understand your prohibiting a man from practising law or practising medicine as long as he is the President of the Republic but it would not be fair to expect him to give up all or any means of livelihood that he may possess as a non-President simply because he is elected to the office of the President.

How, I ask, would it be possible for a person to transfer all his property, if he has any house property, landed property, shares, etc. to someone else who should keep all these things in trust for him against the day when he returns to non-official life? How are you going to be sure that the person is going to get back on relinquishing his office, all the property which he possessed before he became President? I could agree, if you have a provision that a person who has once been a President will be guaranteed a sufficient competence for the rest of his life. In that case I can understand any member wanting to deprive the President of all or any of his possessions that he may have had before. Even lawyers find it difficult to go back to their profession after they have been out of it for a long time. I am particularly worried about persons who like myself, may possess some landed property. (Laughter.) Before all these landed properties are abolished in your province and mine, there may be some provision made for persons—not that I am a candidate—who are in that position so that they could stand for the Presidency. There may be some provision so that persons who are in the unfortunate position of possessing some properties of that nature may not be wholly debarred.

Sir, it would not be fair either for the person who is put up for the Presidency to be required to declare all the shares that he may possess in various companies. Suppose he forgets one or two non-paying shares that he possesses e.g., in the National Herald of Lucknow...

Shri Balkrishna Sharma (United Provinces: General): May I know on a point of information, *viz. *, why has he taken it for granted that the person will have divest himself of all his properties as soon as he takes up his office.

Shri Sri Prakasa: I thought that was what Mr. Santhanam was after.

Shri K. Santhanam: I merely wanted him to declare his shares so that we will know.

Shri Sri Prakasa: I think, Sir, we must look at the man whom we are putting in the President’s position and not at his property or at his shares or anything else. If we trust the man, we ought to put him in that office. If we don’t, we ought not to put him there. Even if you make a beggar a President, he can be as dishonest as the biggest shareholder or anyone else. Honesty does not necessarily depend upon the economic position of the individual. Honesty is something apart. What we want is that our President should be a person above suspicion; and whether he is already possessed of any property or not does not really matter. I think we should not hedge in the position of President by any of the provisions that we are seeking to introduce.

Shri M. Ananthasayanam Ayyangar: Sir, it is rather surprising that we should hear these words from our friend Shri Sri Prakasa. It is not that he has entirely misunderstood the scope of the amendment. If he should be chosen as the President, let him continue to be in possession of his properties. But we will assume he becomes the Commerce Member. He ought not to deal in shares the moment he becomes a Member. Otherwise, if a Commerce Member of any Government or the President gets into the share market, there is an assurance that that particular share for which he goes in is a sound one. The next day he may sell them away. He will be in a position to monopolize the shares. We are not going to clothe the President of the Federation with such powers to traffic in immoral business—there are various kinds of immorality. Now, Sir, my friend Mr. Santhanam’s amendment is that we should insist upon the President to declare what shares he possesses. My friend Mr. Sri Prakasa says there may be a share lurking in some corner and he may not know. I don’t think he will be so negligent about his own affairs. But he expects the President to be negligent about his affairs. As regards business, even if he is a honorary President or Director of a business, and may receive only sitting fees, all the same when he has to give assent to a particular Bill, he may be induced to send it back, particularly if those provisions affect his bank or concern. I don’t mean to say that a particular thing will arise but it shows the necessity why the President should not be connected with these directly or indirectly.

Then as regards his being a party man, Sir, it is impossible unless he is a wooden block or a wooden tool. He ought to belong to one party or other. After he is elected, it must be obligatory that he should resign all his connection with the previous party and absolve himself of the allegiance that he owes. To that extent, one may reasonably expected [sic] but to say that he ought not to be a party-man is impracticable. I am trying to find out one but I am afraid we may not be able to get a non-party man at all. I can only think of a pial [sic] school teacher as a non-party man. Even he may be inclined in favour of his District Board President who may be a party man. Therefore, it is impossible to come across a non-party man in any sense of the word. It is enough if he gives up his connections with his party after he becomes President of the Federation or the President of the Union. I do say, Sir, that all these limitations and qualifications are necessary so as to ensure that proper administration and proper men will be available.

Mr. President: There is no other speaker. Has the Mover of the clause anything to say in reply?

The Honourable Pandit Jawaharlal Nehru: Sir, a great deal has been said about the emoluments of the President. It seems to me that it is very difficult to make lists of offices which he should not hold. Only a general principle can be laid down and carefully no doubt, but subsequently the rest depends a great deal on convention. If you start making long lists, it means that there may be many things left out which he can do. So normally speaking, one will have to depend upon convention. The point is that he should not be actively connected or associated with the management of any gainful office. Obviously, in the modern world, if he is at all well-to-do, he will have some shares or like Mr. Sri Prakasa he may be a landholder or he may have some other property. There is no chance as far as I can see of Mr. Sri Prakasa being prevented from standing for the Presidentship and I would deem it a calamity if it were so. So I submit that at this moment one need not go further into this question but leave it as it is and not only for the drafting but for the convention to grow up.

In one matter I am inclined to agree with what Mr. Santhanam said, although I do not think it is necessary to put it down, and that is that any person in high responsible office should make some kind of disclosure of his connections with business and of his holdings, etc. I think there would be an advantage in that, whether he is a President or whether he is a Minister or any other person in high responsible office. (Hear, hear.) I accept, Sir, the amendment moved by Sir N. Gopalaswami Ayyangar, which clarifies sub-clause (1).

There is the question I believe of the emoluments and allowances of the President. A suggestion has been made that some other words should be used instead of ‘diminished’. After consideration we came to the conclusion that ‘diminished’ was the right word. We could use ‘varied’ or ‘increased or diminished’ but on the whole ‘diminished’ was considered the best. The point is that the legislature has in its power to do anything it chooses, but it must not exercise its power to the detriment of the person who has been chosen the President. There is no question of increasing his allowances or emoluments unless the Parliament so desires. You need not check Parliament doing anything, but there is the slight danger possibly of Parliament or the people from making the position of the President impossible. Therefore you say it should not be ‘diminished’. In these days, one does not quite know, suddenly there might be inflation and it may affect the situation so much that all normal standards of salaries and allowances might have to change. So I don’t think any change is needed there.

Last of all, the amendment moved in regard to the President not being a party man—now, I don’t know, but certainly I have a certain sneaking sympathy with such a proposition. But inspite of that, it seems to me completely impractical. What is a party man? No doubt, one thinks in terms of the huge party machines running political elections. But it is almost impossible for you to advise all of them. There are all kinds of parties and a person does not become bad because he belongs to a small party or a big party. Everybody is associated, I am afraid, with some group or association. The point is that the President should not function as a party man after he is elected. That, on the whole, is so. I am not myself clear in my own mind as to what his relation to the party he belongs to should be after his election. However, the question does not arise. But in any event, he should function as any one should function, whether he is a party man or not, completely impartially when he is in high office. So Sir, I regret I am unable to accept any amendment except Sir N. Gopalaswami Ayyangar’s....

18. Demand for Safeguarding Muslim Rights in India
Letter from Maulana Hifzur Rahman and Abdul Qaiyum Ansari to the Minorities Sub-Committee, 24 July 1947

We beg to request that the following may kindly be included in the agenda for discussion in the next meeting of the committee:

(i) Whereas the present judicial system in India has never harmonised with the spirit of the Islamic laws, the system of appointing Muslim Kazis to settle the question of marriage, divorce, khula, etc. be introduced so that they may be decided according to the tenets of Islam.

Note: This system shall be confined to the Muslims only without being prejudicial to the religious rights of non-Muslims.

(ii) A permanent separate portfolio to administer the Muslim waqfs be attached to a Minister of State in each Province and at the Centre and that Minister be a Muslim as far as possible.

(iii) As the protection of cultural rights of minorities in every unit in the Union of India has already been incorporated in the Declaration of Rights by the Constituent Assembly, the Muslim minority can rightly claim for the protection of its cultural rights. Therefore, the High Courts of the Provinces (units) and the Supreme Court of the Union should each have a Muslim judge to judge the propriety of any cultural right coming under the purview of protective laws of the States.

(iv) Educational scholarships, stipends etc. to minorities and grants-in-aid to educational institutions of minorities should not be given according to the proportion of the population of any minority. Such kinds of benefactions ought to be granted in proportion to the backward conditions of the minority concerned, i.e., the greater the backwardness of a minority the greater the grant of benefaction to it.

19. Debate about an Amendment in Rules of the Constituent Assembly

Extract from the proceedings of the Constituent Assembly of India, 25 July 1947
Constituent Assembly Debates, Vol. IV, pp. 823-7

...Mr. President: The first item of the agenda this morning is a motion by Shri Sri Prakasa.

Shri Sri Prakasa (United Provinces: General): Mr. President, Sir, I have the honour to move: That after Rule 5 of the Constituent Assembly Rules the following new rule be inserted:

'5-A. Notwithstanding the provisions of Rules 4 and 5 above, the Governor-General of India, may in pursuance of His Majesty's Government's Statement of June 3, 1947, order; fresh elections to the Constituent Assembly from the areas mentioned in para 14 of that Statement and thereupon the members already elected from the said areas, whether or not they have taken their seats in the Assembly in the manner prescribed in Rule 3, shall be deemed to have vacated their seats; and the members newly elected shall be deemed to have been duly elected as members of the Assembly.'

This Rule shall have retrospective effect from June 3, 1947.

Sir, I venture to place this motion before the House with three objects. The first is that I should like to regularise some of the very undesirable incidents that have occurred during the last few months. Secondly, I want to vindicate the honour of this Assembly and, if you will permit me to say so, with respect, your own honour as the President of this Assembly. And, lastly, I should also like to lodge a protest against the manner in which many things have been done during the last few months. (hear, hear). Many old members of the Assembly who were originally elected were, so to say, summarily dismissed; new elections were ordered and new members were elected in their places.

Sir, when this Assembly was first elected—it does not matter how it was elected—it claimed to be what it obviously was, a Sovereign Body, fully entitled to make its own Rules of Procedure. It was quite clear that an Assembly like this could not go on without any rules for its own conduct and therefore we prepared a regular pamphlet that gave all the Rules of Procedure of this House. No person could claim that he was ignorant of the existence of these rules. If anyone had taken care to look into this pamphlet he would certainly have found Rules 4 and 5 staring him in the face, which laid down in unequivocal language the method by which new members of this Assembly could be chosen after other members had vacated their seats in the manner prescribed. What has happened, however, is that certain negotiations took place between certain people behind the back of this House, certain agreements were come to, some members were, so to say, summarily dismissed from this House, new elections took place and new members were elected in their places. And we had to acquiesce in that agreement. Whether we like it or not, the fact is that new members have come and old members have gone, and in the bargain our dear country has been cut up into two. I think, Sir, that it is high time that we should at least regularise this procedure by inserting a rule of our own so that we may at least save our faces and be able to say that what has been done has been done according to a definite rule framed by ourselves.

Now, Sir, my second purpose is to vindicate the position of this House and the honour of its President. I looked in vain during those fateful days to see you mentioned anywhere, in the course of those negotiations and to be assured that you were consulted. You may have been consulted as a Member of the Interim Government and as a member of the Congress High Command; but you were nowhere in the picture as President of this Assembly. I have no doubt that if you had been consulted as President of this Assembly, punctiliously careful as you are of the proprieties, you would certainly have asked this Assembly, for its own opinion on the subject.

When, Sir, you asked the Assembly whether it would permit me to move a simple Resolution like this the other day, you will surely have consulted the Assembly on such a vital matter if you had been consulted as President. We would have been amply satisfied if we could have been assured by you that you had agreed to the procedure on behalf of the Assembly, that was not sitting at the time. You were perfectly entitled to act on our behalf. The Assembly, however, if I may say so, has been completely ignored. The other day when Pandit Govind Ballabh Pant referred to some sort of a party mandate, you very rightly got up and said that the Assembly does not recognise any parties. But, if I am not mistaken, over and over again during those fateful days, the leaders of the two major parties were referred to in statement after statement that appeared in the Press. So, while you do not recognise the existence of any party so far as this Assembly is concerned, we have to acquiesce in an arrangement that had been come to behind our backs by what are described as leaders of major parties in the country. In this connection I feel that the insertion of this rule might right the wrong to some extent, and we may at least have the feeling that what has been done has been done according to the rules of our Assembly themselves.

Lastly—and this is as far as I am concerned the most important part—I would like to lodge a protest against all that has happened. I do not think it was right either on the part of the leaders referred to in those statements or on the part of the Governor-General not to have consulted you, Sir, as our President and the Assembly in that important matter. You know that those negotiations have resulted in the cutting up of our country which is not to our liking. I have no doubt, Sir, that if the original procedure had been followed, and if all who had been elected to this Assembly had attended it and the matter had been placed before the house in the proper manner, we ourselves might have agreed—gladly or otherwise—to the very arrangement that was finally come to over our heads. We would in that case have had the satisfaction that the representatives of the country met in this Hall, and after solemn deliberation decided that for the time being at least in the interests of the country it would be best if we have two separate Constituent Assemblies and two separate parts of the country governed by two Governments. But, as it is, the whole thing has been flung at our face in a manner which it is difficult for an ordinary person to understand,—much less to appreciate. In any case, as things are, there is nothing else for us to do than to agree, as gracefully as possible, to what has happened. I hope that I shall have the unanimous support of the House to my motion to insert this new rule in the Rules of Procedure of this House.

Mr. Naziruddin Ahmad (West Bengal: Muslim): Mr. President, Sir, I find myself in a difficulty in regard to this Resolution. But with regard to the Honourable Member’s desire to regularise any irregularity if there is one, I have full sympathy. Then again, with regard to the vindication of the honour of yourself, Sir, I also fully sympathise. Then, as regard the protest against many things that have happened, I feel that I should express my neutrality. Things happened in an overwhelming manner with which we poor fellows had nothing to do.

Coming to the merits of the Resolution, it says: that the Governor-General of India, may, in pursuance of His Majesty’s Government’s Statement of June 3, 1947, order fresh elections to the Constituent Assembly from the areas mentioned in para. 14 of that Statement.

Sir, in this famous paragraph are included the following areas:
(1) Sylhet which is now beyond the jurisdiction of India; (2) West Bengal which is now within the jurisdiction of India; (3) and (4) East Bengal and West Punjab which are outside the jurisdiction of India; and (5) East Punjab which is within our jurisdiction.

Pandit Lakshmi Kanta Maitra (West Bengal: General): I want to know, Sir, whether the Honourable Member is in order in raising a discussion, on the whole of His Majesty’s Statement, in connection with this Rule? The Honourable Member has referred to that Statement in extenso and to parts of it which have no bearing on the motion before the House.

Mr. President: I think he was referring to paragraph 14 of the Statement because the motion under consideration itself refers to it, and developing his argument. He is in order.

Mr. Naziruddin Ahmad: That is exactly my position, Sir. In fact, these areas are referred to by implication in the resolution under consideration. I was referring to the areas mentioned in paragraph 14.

Then it is said that as a result of the election of those members and in consequence of the proposed election, the members who have already been elected in the first election will from that date be deemed to have vacated their seats. It assumes therefore that till the proposed election the members who were originally elected at the first election would retain their seats, although I understand that all of them have resigned. Then again it is also sought to be made out that upon the proposed election the newly elected members—I believe members who would be elected hereafter—should be deemed to have been elected, and what seems to be impracticable and absurd is that they should be elected with back effect, namely with effect from June 3. I submit that there are three elections to be considered; the first election, the second election through which we, some of newcomers have come, and the proposed third election. The resolution ignores altogether the second election through which some of us have come. Then the implications of this are that the members who were elected at the second election have no locus standi as their place will be occupied by those elected at the first election and things said and done by us in this Assembly would have to be erased from the pages of the report. Then, let us consider the probable time when the third election is likely to take place. The second election took place within about a month of the June 3 Statement, that is in the beginning of July. This third election can thus take place within about a month from this date, that is about the 25th August. If that is so, serious complications will arise. The resolution refers to election from all the areas including those areas which will then be outside India. By 15th August, a new transformation in the country will take place. Two new Dominions will come into existence, and it would be a serious proposition to say that the Viceroy, Lord Mountbatten, will order fresh elections from the areas over which he has no jurisdiction. In these circumstances, I submit that resolution is impracticable. It will lead to serious anomalies. The resolution purports—at least so the speaker made out—to regularise what has happened. It seeks to vindicate the honour of this House. The Honourable Member supposes that those very members who have been elected at the second election will automatically be elected at the third election, if any. I beg to submit that some of us may not be able to come. It may be that we will have a new set of members. In that case, the so-called regularisation of the election of members like us goes to the wind. I will ask, what is to become of our assertion that we have come here as loyal and law-abiding citizens of India? If we go out, will that declaration stand or will that go? Then what will become of the acceptance by Choudhury Khaliquzzaman Saheb of the National Flag on behalf of the League group here, if he fails to come? Then again, what will become of our signatures in the Great Book which is to go down to history? Will they be scored out and erased? What will become of the T.A. and daily allowances which we have received? Will the monies have to be returned or will that be made over to the next set of members to be elected and who are to be our legal heirs and representatives? These are some of the serious anomalies which face us in accepting the resolution as it stands. I have already submitted that I am in full sympathy with the spirit which actuated this resolution. The resolution is however impracticable. It is said that the honour of this House will be vindicated by this. I believe that the honour of the President will not only be vindicated but will rather be stultified. The Honourable the President has in his wisdom allowed us to take part in the proceedings and do other things in the House. If the resolution is carried, I think it would stultify the action of our own President. I submit that, if the real desire of the Honourable Member is to safeguard the rights and prestige of the House, we could have done it by straightforwardly declaring that we adopt the second election. That would regularise the second election in a decent manner. That will regularise irregularities if any, and safeguard the honour and prestige of this House. I repeat I am in full sympathy with the spirit which actuated the Honourable Member in moving this resolution, but there are practical difficulties and the best way would be for the House to adopt the second election. With these few words, I submit that the resolution in its practical implications cannot be accepted, and therefore I respectfully beg leave to oppose it.

Haji Abdul Sathar Haji Ishaq Sait (Madras: Muslim): May I draw the attention of the Honourable Member to the last clause of the resolution which says that this Rule shall have retrospective effect from June 3, 1947?

Mr. Naziruddin Ahmad: That does not solve the problem at all. The point is, will those gentlemen, those Honourable Members who have been elected, come back, in a body in the third elections? Can any one guarantee that? If the same Honourable Members are elected once again, then this retrospective clause has some meaning. Retrospectivity with regard to members who would be elected for the first time at the third election has no practical meaning, so far as my humble judgment goes. Then there will be overlapping of two batches of members, the first batch and the second batch who will, according to the Resolution, both be members simultaneously for a period. With these few words, Sir, I respectfully oppose the adoption of this resolution.

The Honourable Pandit Jawaharlal Nehru (United Provinces: General): Sir, I am in entire agreement with the object of the Honourable Mover of this resolution. At the same time, I must say that I find it difficult to understand it. The resolution gives power or seeks to give power to the Governor-General in pursuance of H.M.G.s Statement of June 3 to do this or that even in the future. I cannot understand at all why the Governor-General should be brought into our rules. Mr. Sri Prakasa's object obviously is to validate something that has been done, something bad according to him, and I agree with him that was not done with due propriety. I agree that we should validate it but not by making any fundamental changes in our rules, even giving powers to the Governor-General in the future about it. So I suggest, Sir, that instead of considering this resolution as it is in this form, it might be referred to a small committee to redraft it with the object of merely making it a validating measure. I would suggest a committee consisting of Mr. Shri Prakasa, Sir Alladi Krishnaswami Ayyar and Sir B.L. Mitter.

This is a legal matter and so I have suggested the names of these three lawyers although Mr. Sri Prakasa is not much of a practising lawyer. I do not think it will take very much time to redraft it and bring it forward as a resolution, not as an amendment to the rules.

Shri Sri Prakasa: I agree with what my friend Pandit Jawaharlal Nehru has just said. In fact when I tabled this Resolution at the beginning of this Session, the N.W.F.P. referendum was in the offing and there was the prospect of three more members being dismissed—they have since been dismissed and this is the reason why I have given this power to the Governor-General. Now this is finished, and so far as I can find out there is nothing for the Governor-General to do in this behalf so far as the H.M.G.’s Statement of June 3 is concerned. We might just as well have this in the form of a Resolution as suggested by Pandit Jawaharlal Nehru and I am quite agreeable to this Committee being appointed and to bring forward the whole thing in a sort of validating Resolution. In that case I shall ask for leave of the House to withdraw my motion.

The motion was, by leave of the Assembly, withdrawn.

The Honourable Mr. Hussain Imam (Bihar; Muslim): What about Assam? Election is still in the offing there.

Shri Sri Prakasa: This Committee will have to consider Assam also. It is just as well that it should.

Mr. President: I was just going to point out that the Resolution as it is drafted has that lacuna also. It does not cover members from Assam other than Sylhet. So I think the best course is, as has been suggested by Pandit Jawaharlal Nehru, that the matter be referred to a Sub-Committee and the Sub-Committee might redraft the Resolution, because, there is, as far as I can judge, no difference so far as the object is concerned. May I take it that it is the wish of the House that this Resolution be referred to a Sub-Committee consisting of Mr. Sri Prakasa, Sir Alladi Krishnaswami Ayyar and Sir B.L. Mitter?

The motion was adopted.

20. Discussion on Continuation of Ruler’s Authority over Federal Subjects in a Princely State

Extract from the proceedings of the Constituent Assembly of India, 25 July 1947
Constituent Assembly Debates, Vol. IV, pp. 839-52

The Honourable Sir N. Gopalaswami Ayyangar: I beg to move Clause 9: ‘The Executive authority of the Ruler of a Federated State shall continue to be exercisable in that State with respect to Federal subjects, until otherwise provided by the appropriate Federal authority.’ At the present moment, both federal and unit subjects are within the jurisdiction of the executive authority of an Indian State. When federation comes into existence and certain subjects are assigned to the Centre, their administration which is already in the hands of the State authorities, it is proposed, should continue in these hands until the appropriate federal authority makes other provision for their administration. The general principle, as I have already stated in connection with the previous clause, is that the executive authority of the federation is co-extensive with its legislative authority. That principle is respected in this clause. The only thing that is provided for here is that where that administration is in the hands of the State authorities now, that agency should continue, until the federal legislature or other appropriate federal authority chooses to make other provision. That is really for the purpose of preventing a hiatus in administrative jurisdiction particularly at the time of the inception of the federation. ...

Shri Mahavir Tyagi  (United Provinces: General): Sir, this part of the Constitution is very important because it concerns a vast number of people of India residing in the States. At present, they enjoy enough powers of internal administration but in spite of this, in every state there is a Resident who represents the Paramount power. He has some voice in the administration and exercises a check on the powers of the rulers. Often he has safeguarded the rights of the people. If with the end of the office of the Resident, the Assembly does not provide some via media for safeguarding the peoples’ rights, I venture to say, Sir, our functions of constitution-making will not be considered successful. When the States and their people join our Union, it is the duty of the Assembly to look to the welfare of the States’ people and protect their rights. I stand here to take a little of your time so that the States people may not have cause to complain that when the question of the peoples’ rights came before the Assembly, it remained silent and sacrificed the interest of the people in order to get the co-operation of the rulers. I do not want to delay the proceedings by bringing any amendment, because all the rules and provisos which are being framed here will come up before the Assembly in their final shape. Then it will have the right to scrutinise and change them. What I mean is this: At present there is a Resident who exercises some control and check on the powers of the rulers. But with the abolition of his office there is no machinery to control the authority of the rulers. The Negotiating Committee must place before the House now or later at some opportune stage in very clear terms as to what arrangements it has made to control the authority of the rulers. In the present set up, the rulers have all the powers that the Union will have and also powers which they do not possess at present. Its result will be that the despotic and autocratic States will become all powerful and there will be no check on them. There are many States which have no legislature at all. Under the circumstances if the present wide and discretionary powers are allowed to remain with the rulers, their joining the Union would be an advantage to them. We are paying this as the price to include the States in the Union. If the rulers are allowed to retain their present absolute powers, every ruler will be a gainer by joining the Union, because the States People have so long been fighting against their despotism with the help of the Congress and other such organisations and now the people will not receive this help any more from them. Henceforth the rulers will use their powers in their own arbitrary manner. Therefore, though it is proper to concede the rulers whatever powers they at present enjoy or to give them power similar to that of the Union, some restrictive provision must be incorporated in the Constitution so that they may not misuse the powers granted to them. When the Government of India Act was being framed in 1935 such restrictive provision was suggested in it in order to check the authority of the rulers. It is clearly stated in the said Act that any law of the States, which is contrary to or is incompatible with that of the federation, shall be deemed null and void and the law of this Federation shall prevail. The only difficulty at present is that instead of one, there are two Dominions now, one of Pakistan and the other of India. Both the dominions are anxious to include in their Dominion a greater number of States than their rival. Because of this rivalry, the Princes are raising the price of their co-operation higher. I do not consider it desirable to concede to them more and more powers only in order to include them in our dominion. They are not willing to forego any of their powers in order to join the Union. By joining the Union they will be gainers in as much as they will receive military protection from the Union, but what benefit is that to us? We will only increase a member in our family. The States will receive tremendous help from this vast Dominion but in return for the privileges how many of their rights are they ready to concede to us? We must have everything before us. Every detail of the negotiation that is going on between our Negotiating Committee and the States must come before the House. It is only then, when we have considered all these, that we should decide as to what power the rulers should be allowed to retain and what amount of control the Union should exercise over them. This clause, as it stands at present, grants wide powers to the States, but it does not mention as to what power the Union will have over them. I do not want to put any obstacle to the passage of this resolution but I want to [sic] that this must be established as a convention that when a member speaks it is not imperative for him either to oppose or support the resolution. When an important matter is being discussed in the House a member must have the right to express his views without supporting or opposing the motion so that his views may be recorded. I stand here only for this purpose that my views may be recorded and our Negotiating Committee may know that a section of the House entertains such views. I want that my speech should bring to light what ‘liberties’ the States have and what further powers we are granting to them. I demand that when we are representing here the people of the States, the rulers must not be given powers beyond what they had. They have had ample powers. When they have joined the Union, the office of the Resident will be abolished and some of the States will become despotic. Therefore, without meaning any offence to and without making any allegation against any State I wish to say that when the States are joining our family—the Indian Union—they must respect the principles and our democracy. Despotic states have no place in our Union. Because of the assurances from some leaders States may feel today that they will have all the liberties in the Union; but I want to make it clear to them that, though the House is accepting all their terms, their joining the Union will put their despotism in danger. India and this Assembly will soon put an end to despotism and the States must join the union with this definite knowledge. The general public demands it and, if for some reasons this Assembly cannot do away with despotism the nation will, after the expiry of the existing Assembly, call a new Constituent Assembly which will not only solve our economic problem but the political problem too. That revolutionary Assembly will not allow even a trace of despotism to remain in India. The Union of India will not allow the black spot of despotism to remain long on her fair face. This is what I have to say.

The Honourable Mr. Hussain Imam: Mr. President, the remarks made by the last speaker asking for a minimum of democracy in the constituent units of the Federation is one on which I hope there will be no difference of opinion in this House. There are certain standards, and certain measures which are regarded as the bare minimum, as the sine qua non of a decent existence; and it is wrong in this age for any one to claim the privilege of divine right to rule as they please. I am one of those persons who believe in moderation as well as in negotiation. But there is a limit beyond which you cannot carry on these two processes. There are certain bedrock principles which have to be accepted. Because of the fact that the foreign Government had sanctioned the existence of 560 state units, it is not necessary that this Constituent Assembly should also accept the separate existence of these units. In these days it is almost a common principle that various small units cannot fight in the battle of life. Look at industrialisation and cottage industry. Cottage industry is every day being eliminated. We are trying to protect it and give it support because it is to the greater advantage of the worker than the mill industry. Similarly, if it were to be greater advantage of the common man to have the 560 units, I for one would have supported them. But many of the units are so small that they themselves have considered it essential to join together and form bigger units. This is a move in the right direction and if it is developed to the full extent to which it should be developed, it is possible to allow them to exist even today. But if individuality prevails and if the move for having a union of States where they can give common privileges and common advantages to which a citizen is entitled is not put forward, I am afraid that the existence of the States will be jeopardised. I endorse the appeal of the previous speaker that this Assembly and those who are in charge of negotiation should look to it that the right of the common man in the States which is as precious to us as the citizens of British India is safeguarded. (Hear, hear.) They must be protected with as much care and as much solicitude as we are taking in the other units, the provinces. There should be a minimum standard of democracy, and minimum rights of citizenship which should not be denied to any one in the Continent of India. No matter whether it is a big State or a small State, they must all strive to uplift and if we cannot uplift, we will be failing in the charge which has been entrusted to us. Independence is not worth anything if we allow a large part of the units to remain in the same degraded condition in which they existed before the departure of the British. I therefore endorse the appeal and hope that something will come out of it.

Mr. Jainarain Vyas (Jodhpur State): Mr. President, at present the whole question of States is not before the House but we have only to consider as to what authority the Princes should be given in respect of central subjects. Therefore I shall confine myself to this only and I would like the House also not to go beyond the scope of the subject.

It is true that the Princes or the States are going to have the powers and authorities which they do not have in the current set-up. But the words (of the resolution) show that power would continue with those who had it: not more than this, unless some other arrangements are made by law. In spite of this, as our Federal subjects are numerous and of various types it is apprehended that the powers granted to the Princes in respect of these subjects might be abused in some States. But now that we all have joined the Union, we may hope or rather we should appeal to the Rulers to fall in line with the rest of India. The Provinces too should be requested to make proper use of the powers granted to them. Under the circumstances, we need not oppose such clauses or sections. Mr. Tyagi has just said many things with reference to the general question concerning states. I am a State subject and represent the States people. I do admit that the representatives of the States people do not hold the same status as the ministerial representatives hold. They speak on behalf of the Government of the States. We have not attained this status. Really this is a painful position for us. But this certainly does not mean that we have given up all hopes of securing our real status. It is impossible for us to remain long in this position. I hope our Union will exercise its influence over the Princes, their ministers and the governments to see that the representatives of the people have equal share in the internal administration of the States. And if for certain technical reasons or legal complications this cannot be done, I hope we shall try to settle the matter by negotiation. However, if our negotiations with the Princes fail to secure an amicable settlement, after 15th of August the Rulers and the States people will stand in opposition to each other. The people have strength enough to settle their own affairs. We are grateful for the sympathy shown to us. But at the same time I wish to say that our attitude would not seriously affect the federal subjects. It might affect the Union which would consider its own interests. Such is our hope. With these words, I support the original resolution.

Mr. S.V. Krishnamurthy Rao (Mysore State): Mr President, Sir, I had myself brought an amendment that in these matters the representatives of the people in the States, may have a voice but I withdrew that amendment because an amendment by Sir N. Gopalaswamy Ayyangar was accepted by the Ministers of the States. In this I see the dawn of a new era in the States. I hope the ministers have accepted this amendment with all the implications behind it. We the peoples' representatives from the States, are in a very delicate position. On the one hand we do not want to take any attitude which will jeopardise the Union of India. Unity is the prime need of the hour. On the other hand, we have to safeguard the interests of the people of the States. With this view, we have accepted the amendment of Sir N. Gopalaswamy Ayyangar. By the acceptance of the amendment, Sir, we believe that even in the States, minimum standards of democratic Governments will be established ere long, because the acceptance of this amendment in the Union Federation means the acceptance of the adult suffrage for the election of the representatives to the Federal Assembly and also the acceptance of the Citizenship Rights and the Fundamental Rights. I am sure the acceptance of these fundamental principles will have its own repercussions on the administration in the States. With this hope in view that ere long the Ministers who are charged with the heavy responsibility, will do their duty not only to their Rulers but also to the Union Federation and the people of the States, and will see that responsible Government will be established in the territories of the states, with this hope, I support the Resolution as amended.

Diwan Bahadur Sir A. Ramaswami Mudaliar (Mysore State): Mr. President, I have only a few words to address this august Assembly on this very important subject. Some of the States' Representatives—I use the word 'Representatives' with some hesitation,—the official Ministers of the States as they have been described,—have given notice of an amendment which tries to incorporate Section 125 of the Government of India Act. That Act suggested that the executive power of the Federation will be carried out by the States and the Rulers of the States through their own officers and that the Federation should be content to have what may be called the right of inspection to see that that authority was properly exercised. There are a great many States where even now, whatever is required on behalf of the Federation or the Government of India the work is carried out essentially by the State Governments and the executive authority of the States. During the years when the Government of India Act was under consideration at various Sessions of the Round Table Conference it was pointed out that while the States which acceded to the Federation would have no objection to legislation being passed on the ceded subjects by the Federal Legislature, the power of executive authority should still rest in the Officers of the States. This is to say that the Federation shall have legislative authority alone, but that for the administration of those subjects which States had ceded, the administrative authority, the executive responsibility may still vest in the States. This was the position taken up as far back as 1930. Things have marched very far in some of the States during the intervening period and there are indications that in many States things will march further still in the direction of a closer association of the people of the States in the administration of the States. There is no doubt whatsoever that the trend of events, the march of public opinion, the awakening in the States themselves and the very fact that the States may accede to the Union and send their representatives to the Union Legislature, all these facts will tend to quicken the progress and the process of the greater association of the people of the State in the administration of the State. (Cheers). I do not want to refer to any individual State, but I had in mind States which very shortly will give such an amount of power to the subjects of the States that there will be very little feeling in the matter in those States, at any rate. Even in 1930-31 those who represented the States in the Round Table Conference took the view that while the legislative power may be readily conceded to the Federal Parliament, the executive power must vest in the States to be exercised by the officers of the State. I venture to think—it is not a proposition that I am putting forward on behalf of any bureaucratic or undemocratic administrator of a State, but it is a proposition which may very well be put forward on behalf of the subjects themselves—that the executive authority in those States must vest in the authorities or the officers of the State. While that executive authority is to be imposed by a Federation through its own officers, who is it that will lose the exercise of that authority, except the very subjects who through their responsible representatives will be in charge now to a certain extent, and hereafter, to a much greater extent, for the affairs of the State? If, therefore, the Federation intervenes with its own executive set-up in the administration of a State, I venture to think it is not the Ruler who is going to lose much or anything at all; it is those representatives, those popular representatives as they are called, those who will be in charge of administration by closer association of the people in the administration, it is they who will forego the right of exercising their authorities in those States. It may be said that in provinces to a certain extent federal jurisdiction is exercised by federal executive authority. But I believe the Union Constitution Committee and those who have taken part in these proceedings have realised that there is a fundamental distinction between Provinces and States. I do not know whether Provinces are altogether too happy or will be happy over the decisions that have been so far taken with reference to the powers of the Federation in the Provinces. The list of subjects—Provincial and the Concurrent List—have still to be examined by this House. What the fate of that examination will be I do not venture to say. But after all, Sir, I have not always been associated with States—my association has been of very recent times—and for years—30 years of my public life have been spent in what till the 15th of August may be described as British Indian Provinces. I venture to express the view that there is a very strong urge in the Provinces that as far as possible, what has been the subject of our agitation for decades, namely, provincial autonomy, should be a very real thing indeed. Provinces are not likely to easily yield to the suggestion that a strong Central Government means a Central Government with a vast number of subjects to administer. My own view of a strong Central Government is not that. For what purpose should a Government be strong in the Centre? I venture to think that if that position is clearly and analytically examined, you will come to the view that for certain subjects and with reference to certain powers, the Central Government—the Federal Government—should have ample plenary and exhaustive powers, but that does not mean that, taking a subject like even patents or copyrights, strong Central Government is created by vesting the rights over patents or copyrights in that Centre. It may be for other reasons, that it may be desirable. It may be done by co-operation, by co-ordination, by the idea of the agency that is established at the Centre which will have not the power, at least to a certain extent, the advisory capacity to bring about that co-ordination, but let us not, because we think in terms of a strong Central Government, forget the fact that strength does not lie in expansiveness, a wide variety of subjects coming under the scope of the Central Government. In fact, my own view is that the more subjects you bring under the Federation, the weaker you make it. So I would press very strongly when the time comes—if I may be permitted for a moment to say on behalf of the Provinces, forgetting my new avathar—I would press very strongly in favour of provincial administration having the widest possible power in consonance with the strength of the Central Government. There are occasions, of course, when an emergency arises when I would be willing to have the Federal Government over-run the whole of the sphere of the Federation. When an emergency is declared or proved to exist, then all these restrictions which we had even under the Government of India Act may well disappear and the Central Government may have all these powers; but normally, in day-to-day administration, in the absence of such an emergency, I venture very strongly, very respectfully and with great humbleness to urge that, Provinces should have as much and as wide powers as possible. If that is the case, Mr. President, a fortiori, the States should have even wider power and except for those subjects that they accede there ought not to be any interference in the States and so far as this power of administration is concerned. I venture to state that States may be left to administer their own subjects. I understand that there may be some difficulties in some areas, some States, to confer the power on them to administer these subjects. I understand that the amendment of my Honourable friend Sir N. Gopalaswamy Ayyangar wants to preserve that position and to take care of that situation. It may be so. It is from the point of view that we have not pressed the amendment which goes the whole way before this House at present. But barring such exceptions, the general rule shall be and must be that the States which can administer properly, which have an administrator, whether popularly elected or unpopularly based, who carried on the administration on correct administrative principles, those States cannot and should not have their administrative sphere encroached upon by the Federal Government. I think some of the States at least can show a record of administration which is—in the presence of such a large number of provincial representatives and provincial ministers, I dare not say what otherwise I would have liked to say—which is at least not less efficient than the administration in the provinces. With that record, I venture to think that it will be accepted by everybody in this House that as far as possible, in as many States as possible where there is no question of the administrative machinery not rising to the occasion, that administration shall be that of the State itself. I therefore want to make the position perfectly clear that in accepting the amendment of Sir N. Gopalaswamy Ayyangar we are not giving up the essential principle that it shall be the rule that States shall have their own executive authority and that in special cases exceptions may be made.

Sir Alladi Krishnaswami Ayyar: Sir, I had no idea of speaking on this Resolution, especially after an agreement had been reached between the Mover of the Resolution and certain representatives of the States. In dealing with this subject, it is unnecessary for me to go into the question as to the relative sphere of the Federation or of the Provinces in the Federal structure. I may have a good deal to say in favour of what Sir Ramaswamy Mudaliar has stated, namely, that the strength of the Centre does not depend upon the number of subjects assigned to it but upon the nation-building and nation-preserving subjects being in the hands of the Centre and the Centre being necessarily equipped with the machinery for enforcing its power throughout the area. But that is entirely irrelevant in the consideration of the question now before the House. The essential principle underlying the previous clause is that the executive power must be co-extensive with the legislative power. If the Federation has the power to pass certain laws it must have the necessary power to enforce those laws throughout the Federation. That is the common-sense, accepted constitutional principle to which no exception can be taken, either by State protagonists or provincial protagonists.

The second question is, how is this executive power to be exercised? It may be exercised through the instrumentality or agency directly appointed by the Federation, or it may, for the time being, employ a State or provincial agency. But the ultimate power and responsibility must rest with the Federation which must be satisfied that an efficient administration is carried on. If an efficient administration is carried on in State A, or State B or State C, very well. The Federation will not interfere. But the Federation is the sole judge and the only judge of the efficiency of the administration throughout the Union, and every State agency and every Provincial Agency and every other agency must be the agency of the Federation to that extent. The object of this amendment is very simple. If the State machinery is functioning properly, then you need not interfere; let the status quo continue. But the ultimate power will rest with the Federation, that is the principle to which we are committed. But that does not mean that the Federation or the Federal executive will go on experimenting. Why should it? For example, if the postal service or some other service is efficiently and properly conducted by the State agency, then the Federation will not have any need or business to interfere. If on the other hand, the State agency does not carry on the administration properly, the final authority must rest with the Federation. That is the principle of this amendment and I do not think that any State can take exception to it. It is really a midway solution between two extreme views. One view is that here and now the Federation must start off with a special agency for the purpose of carrying on this work. That is one extreme view. The other view is that the existing state of things must continue, especially when they are satisfactory. The view taken in this clause is that if and when the agency is found to be ineffective by the Federal authority, it will be up to the Federal authority—and they are the sole judges of the situation—to interfere. Let there be no misunderstanding on this point. The principle of Section 125 of the Government of India Act is expressly departed from in this Constitution. It is not a question of parleying between the States and the Federal authority. It is a question of the responsibility of the Federation. It is but a matter of prudence. It is a matter of giving stability to the administration. When the administration of a particular subject is efficient through the State agency, that agency may continue to be employed. But there is no denying the fact that so far as the principle of this clause and the earlier clause is concerned, the ultimate responsibility for the proper execution of the laws which the Federation is passing is with the Federation and Federation alone and the principle that the executive power is co-extensive, in general, with the legislative power is not to be departed from. It is on that ground, Sir, that I support the amendment moved by Sir N. Gopalaswami Ayyangar with the modification, and on no other ground.

Sri K. Santhanam: Sir, I am glad that Sir Alladi has explained the fundamental principle of the federal system so clearly and emphatically. I shall not try to cover the same ground. But there is one point mentioned by Sir Ramaswami Mudaliar which also requires our attention.

He suggested that as the States are getting democratised it may not be so objectionable to leave in their hands the executive authority on federal subjects. Sir, I do not think this is correct. To the extent the States get more and more democratised, the distinction between the Provincial and Federal subjects must become clearer and clearer. That is my view. When a Ruler or his Dewan defies the Federation it may be easy to deal with him because the Federal authority will get the support of the people. But if the Federal subjects are under democratic States then the people themselves may get a vested interest and they may defy the Federal authority. Therefore, in all federal schemes, as far as possible, the powers of the Federation and the powers of the units are kept distinct. The executive authority of the Federation is emphasised in all Federal subjects and the autonomous units have the executive authority only in their own subjects. This distinction is carried to such an extent in the United States of America that even in the matter of courts the Federal laws are enforced by the Federal Judiciary and the State Laws are enforced by the State Judiciary. In course of time, the Indian Federation also will have to follow the same principle. I agree with Sir Ramaswamy Mudaliar that the strength of the Federation does not depend upon the number of subjects it administers. The Indian Federation may have only a handful of subjects—four or five. But so long as it has absolute and undivided authority over those subjects, it is bound to be strong. I am sorry Sir Ramaswamy Mudaliar brought in these issues, particularly the issue as to what constitutes the strength of the Federation. What should be the scope of the Federal subjects and what the scope of the Provincial subjects is an entirely different issue on which many of us will go a long way to agree with him. But this particular clause has nothing to do with it. Assuming that we define the Federal subjects, to what extent should Federal authority extend over these subjects? That is the issue of this clause. Sir Alladi has, of course, stated and explained the general principle. I say that to leave the Federal authority in the hands of the States will be even more dangerous when they become democratised. There may be conflicts between all-India patriotism and unit patriotism, and local conflicts can be dangerous. The Provincial authority may set in motion disintegrating forces which we should seek to avoid even from the very beginning. Therefore, let us make it quite clear that it shall be open to the Federation to take the executive authority in all Federal subjects whenever it chooses to do so. For the present, it may be left in the hands of the State, but the power to resume it, whenever the Federation may think fit, should be with the Federation. The argument that more and more the authority in the States will be with the people, has no relevance whatsoever. In fact, it operates against leaving the authority in the hands of the States. Therefore, let us have the Federal authority intact for the Federation. I suggest that, when the final draft comes, there should be no doubt left as to the power of the Federal authorities to resume their executive functions in Federal subjects as they have been defined in the list.

Shri Gopikrishna Vijayvargiya (Gwalior State): Mr. President, Sir, I come from an Indian State. The motive in my mind is that our country should have a strong Centre. Unfortunately our country consists of many parts. In some Indian States and in districts and provinces too, in a wave of local patriotism people wish to possess more 'autonomy'. This will make our country weak and our Centre will not remain strong.

I wish to tell you that we all, the States also, shall have to surrender (rights) so as to invest the Centre with the maximum power, to make it and the country strong. Under the present circumstances, the scope of executive functions in States should not be enlarged. As suggested by Sir Mudaliar the mere number of Federal subjects, by themselves are not enough to create a strong Centre. This is correct but some subjects have to be assigned to the Centre and the ultimate authority about them should not be left to the discretion of the States.

The Central affairs of the States and provinces should be entrusted to the Centre. The minimum possible executive power should be with the States and provinces. It is not proper to keep the maximum power with them. In small countries like Switzerland and others, the executive authority is left with the units, but in India we cannot do so, as that would not be free from risks. Therefore excessive power should not be handed over to the States. The federal authority in the States should as far as possible be exercised through a federal machinery. But as suggested by Sir Gopalaswami Ayyangar, in the beginning it is not necessary to add a provision to this clause. We would not object to it. But I think it proper to create a strong Centre in the Country and the States should not grudge it. If we want to make the Centre strong, we shall have to hand over at least some subjects to the Centre. Without it our country cannot progress. Hence it is in the hands of the States and the provinces that if they intend having a strong Centre, they should confer upon the Centre the maximum power. We must make our Centre strong and along with this the powers of direction and inspection should vest in the Federation. The States should not seek to possess as much power as possible. Therefore, at present I do not oppose it. As it is, the amendment of Sir Gopalaswami Ayyangar should be accepted but this should be our aim, that the Centre be made as strong as possible.

Mr. R.K. Sidhwa: After Sir Gopalaswami Ayyangar’s speech it was very good of Sir Alladi to have made the position very clear as to what the object of this resolution is. He has in unmistakable terms stated that the final authority shall vest in the Federation: Sir, we congratulate the States’ representatives who have been good enough to participate in this Constituent Assembly and I also congratulate those of the States who have given a lead in this matter and made it clear for others to enter it. I also desire to tell them that while one part of the country is becoming democratic, the other part of nearly ten crores of people cannot remain under autocratic rule. It has been a principle with us and we have declared that when India becomes free we shall see to it that our States’ brethren also become free. Therefore in this august Assembly, when we have all met together—and I am very glad that it is so—the Rulers, their representatives and the peoples of the States,—that we should tell them that was our object and desire. I am very glad that some of the Rulers do feel that they cannot expect one part to rule autocratically and the other to rule democratically. I do not want to go into the details of various States but I know of some States where there are no local bodies, no municipalities, and where there are Legislative Assemblies there is a majority of nominated members. Days of nomination are gone. There should be all elected representatives both in the municipalities and the legislatures. The nomination period has gone, and if you want to make it democratic, abolish all these nominations. I would suggest to the Rulers that they must have elected Legislative Assembly members with powers to function as it will be in the provincial legislatures. Please also see that elected members, local bodies and municipalities are also established where they do not exist. I know of a State where a printing press is not allowed to be established. I do not want to mention the name of that State. It is a fairly big State. I do not want to record a discordant note on this. Our spirit is equally good but we want to tell the Rulers today that the time has come when we have to implement the pledge given to the States people. We have been telling them ‘when the time comes to obtain our freedom we shall see to it that you also shall get it’, and I therefore take this opportunity of telling the people of the States that we shall strain every nerve and see that the people of the States are also ruled exactly in the manner we rule in India.

Mr. M.S. Aney (Deccan States): Mr. President, Sir, the amendment under discussion is a compromise arrived at between the Ministers of some of the important States who are fortunately present here and who have joined the Constituent Assembly to help us and the spokesmen of non-official members of the Constituent Assembly representing British India. Therefore, the proper persons to explain the implications of this compromise are those who are parties to that compromise. We have yet to hear what Sir Gopalaswami Ayyangar has to say. But one of the important members of the ministerial party, Sir Ramaswami Mudaliar, has made a speech and tried to explain the point of view which he had in mind in accepting the compromise which is embodied in this amendment. I only want to make a general observation and not any specific suggestion. The point of view is perfectly clear to my mind that as a general rule the executive authority of a State shall be continued to be exercised by the ruler in respect of federal subjects. There is a warning however to the States in the clause that a certain standard of administration is demanded of them. I believe at present, at least, the Assembly is in this mood. It does not want the Federal authority to exercise its powers to bring about a change in the administration of the States. It expects that the force of great events and the circumstances which we have to face, will have the desired effect upon the psychology of those who have to administer the States. The signs of progress are already there. It has begun, and we hope it will continue uninterrupted for some time. We have come to a compromise and let us for the time being rest our faith in that hope. We can tell them that if the time comes the Federal authority will not be wanting in exercising its powers in cases where it may become necessary in course of time. I think the wording is sufficiently clear. Those who have got the interest of the country at heart will easily understand the importance of mutual responsibility and obligations that the Federal authority and the States have to bear in mind. We want to make a strong India, by encouraging the States to take part in the Union and by bringing about concord between the Union and the States. Our attempt should be to bring about this desirable result viz., a strong India. That strength lies in the willing co-operation between the acceding States and the Federal authority. Therefore the policy of the Federal authority will be to maintain the essential unity. The proper thing for the State to do is to enlist the sympathy of their people by associating them with the State administration and that too as quickly as possible.

With these few words I support the amendment.

Sir B.L. Mitter: Sir, it is somewhat surprising that an innocent and agreed amendment should have evoked so much eloquence and a certain amount of heat also. What are the implications of this amendment? There are two implications: one is that the amended clause postulates the supremacy of the Federation. The last words are: ‘until otherwise provided by the appropriate Federal authority in cases where it is considered necessary.’ This shows that the ultimate authority is the Federal authority. The first part which says ‘The executive authority of the Ruler of a Federated State shall continue to be exercisable in that State with respect to Federal subjects’ merely continues the status quo.

The constitution which we are framing in this Assembly is not an unreal thing. We have got to take the facts in the country as they are into consideration and in the light of those facts prepare an appropriate constitution, one of the facts being that in some of the major States some of the Central subjects are administered by the State authorities. It has not caused any embarrassment to anybody. It has not occasioned any inefficiency. Well, if that be so, that state of affairs will continue. If you find that there has been any abuse or inefficiency, there is power in the Federal legislature to make adequate provisions. This is a simple clause embodying two principles, first is supremacy of the Federal authority and second the continuance of the status quo.

The Honourable Sir N. Gopalaswami Ayyangar: Sir, we have had a most interesting debate, if I may say so on an issue which is certainly an important one, but an issue on which I thought those who took somewhat differing views had already come to an agreed settlement. I do not wish to add to the eloquence that has been spent upon this issue in the last one hour and more. I wish only to say, Sir, that the basic principle of this clause is that the executive authority of the Federation is co-extensive with its legislative authority, that, normally, it is the Federation that is responsible for the proper administration of Federal subjects. But we have taken the existing facts into consideration where a large number of Indian States are actually administering what will be Federal subjects in the new Constitution. We are providing that the existing state of things should continue, but that continuance is necessarily subject to the overriding control of the Federation itself, whenever it chooses to impose that control. We cannot get away from that position. As Sir B.L. Mitter pointed out, the supreme authority in regard to the executive administration of the Federal subjects is vested in the Federation. I should reverse the position that Sir Ramaswami Mudaliar contended for. He seemed to think that the general principle should be that the executive authority in relation to Federal subjects should vest in the States, but that, as an exceptional measure, the Federation should take over the administration into its hands whenever that becomes necessary. What I wish to point out is that the general principle should be that it is the Federation that is responsible for the executive administration of Federal subjects, but that it will not, unless it considers it necessary, interfere with the State administration of Federal subjects where it is in existence today and where it is efficient according to proper standards.

Now, it was said by the mover of one amendment that the taking over of executive administration in respect of the States should be done by Federal law and not by any kind of Federal authority as indicated in the Clause. I would only mention to him one range of subjects, viz., External Affairs. A very large portion of the field of External Affairs is covered not so much by legislation as by executive action. In such cases it would be absolutely unnecessary for us to look to a Federal law for the purpose of the executive administration of External Affairs being carried out in the proper way within the limits of Indian States.

So far as this particular matter is concerned, Sir, I consider that in regard to the executive administration of Federal subjects there is no fundamental distinction, as was pointed out by Sir Ramaswami Mudaliar, between the Provinces and the States. The only distinction is that the States are actually administering some Federal subjects while the Provinces are not doing so.
But, so far as the right to administer them is concerned, I do not think there is any distinction between the Provinces and the States. Now what really distinguishes the Provinces and the States is only that different kinds of internal administration exist in the two areas. I do not wish to go into this wider field which some of the speakers have covered but I do wish to endorse and emphasise one point which was I think made by Mr. Santhanam and that is this: The need for the taking over of the executive administration of Federal subjects by the Federation will not be less, but perhaps will be greater when democratic institutions become more common in the States than they are today. After all we have got to consider that the principle of a Federal system is to divide the administration or the exercise of Sovereign powers between the Centre and the Units. And I do not see why any hesitation should be felt with regard to accepting this position, because after all the federation is as much a part of the constitution which the people and the rulers of the States have to reckon with as the State constitution be [sic]. In the federal legislature the States will be adequately represented, and when, for example a federal law is passed providing for direct administration of federal subjects by the federation, that law will be one in the passing of which the representatives of the States have had a voice, and therefore I could see no real principle involved in contending that you must reverse the general principle in the States from what it has to be in the provinces. I do not wish to say more, Sir, on a subject on which there is agreement as to what we actually should do. I think the House is generally in favour of accepting the amendment that I have moved. I wish to say nothing more.

Mr. President: I will now put the amendments to the vote. The first is an addition of four or five words to the clause which, Sir Gopalaswami himself proposed, that at the end of Clause 9 the following be added:

‘In cases where it is considered necessary.’

I take it that the House accepts that.

The motion was adopted.

21. Scheduled Castes Should Be Given Statutory Reservations

Minute of dissent by H. J. Khandekar in the Sub-Committee on Minorities, 25 July 1947
B. Shiva Rao (Ed.), Framing of India’s Constitution, Vol. II, pp. 400-1

I herewith submit my note of dissent on the majority decision of the committee today against statutory provisions being made for reservation of seats in the Central and Provincial Cabinets for the minorities in India.

2. The Scheduled Castes are a major minority. But they have numerous difficulties in all walks of life. They are still untouchables and have no place in the hearts of the vast majority of the Caste Hindus. I am fully aware of the fact that the Constituent Assembly has passed a clause declaring that untouchability shall be an offence in India but I have to point out that this clause, for a long time to come, will only be declaratory and not mandatory. It has always been the experience in the past that the case of the Harijans was neglected when their interests clashed with those of the Caste Hindus. It cannot therefore be safely expected that in all spheres of life and particularly in the matter of sharing power, justice will be done to the Scheduled Castes. My community has experiences in the past of the unfair treatment in matter of formation of Ministries and my people fear that such treatment will be repeated. Under the illustrious leadership of Mahatma Gandhi, those in authority now are no doubt recognising the claims of the Scheduled Castes but there is no guarantee that when conditions change the same sympathy and considerations will be forthcoming for the Harijans. If at any time in the future the Scheduled Castes find that there is a distinct change in the outlook and the attitude of the Caste Hindus towards them and that untouchability is removed root and branch, so much so that not even the very mention of caste will not [sic] only allowed in society, the Scheduled Castes will be gladly prepared to give up these concessions which they now demand for their protection.

3. The condition of other minorities is quite different from that of the Scheduled Castes. The case of the Scheduled Castes should not be weighed with the same standard as that of other minorities.

4. I, therefore, request you to pass this note on to the Advisory Committee and to the Constituent Assembly so that the case of the Scheduled Castes may be considered as a special case by these bodies; by giving statutory reservations to Scheduled Castes in both the Cabinets.
22. Report of the Sub-Committee on Minorities
27 July 1947
B. Shiva Rao (Ed.), Framing of India’s Constitution, Vol. II, pp. 396–400

The Minorities Sub-Committee of the Advisory Committee met every day from the 21st of July to the 27th of July under the chairmanship of Dr. H.C. Mookherjee. The agenda placed before the sub-committee on the basis of the replies received to the questionnaire issued to the members consisted of the following items:

(1) Representation in Legislatures, joint versus separate electorates and weightage;
(2) Reservation of seats in the Cabinet;
(3) Reservation in services;
(4) Administrative machinery to ensure protection of minority rights (partly covered by making certain fundamental rights justiciable).

2. The sub-committee held prolonged discussions on the various points before them. It was not possible to arrive at unanimous decisions on any point and the voting on several questions was very close. On some points, the voting was equal and the Chairman considered that as the matters were anyhow going to the Advisory Committee, it was pointless for him to exercise a casting vote. On some points, the sub-committee came to the conclusion that a decision had best be deferred till the meeting of the full Advisory Committee. In view of the shortness of time available for preparing this report, it is not possible to indicate the arguments used in the course of discussion. This report contains merely a bare summary of the conclusions reached by the sub-committee and it is hoped that this will be found adequate by the Advisory Committee.

3. Representation in Legislatures:
   (1) The sub-committee decided by a majority of 28 to 3 that there should be no separate electorates for elections to the Legislatures. It was understood, in arriving at this decision, that it was open to the sub-committee to decide on any one of several methods of joint electorates that could be devised.
   (2) As a general principle, there should be reservation of seats for different recognised minorities in the various Legislatures. This was carried by a majority of 26 to 3.
   The reservation shall be for 10 years, the position to be reconsidered at the end of that period.
   (3) The sub-committee considered what minorities and in which Provinces may be given the right of reserved seats. For this purpose, the recognised minority communities were considered in three groups as shown below:

   \[A—Population \text{ less than } \frac{1}{2}\ \text{per cent in the Indian Dominion omitting States}\]
   1. Anglo-Indians
   2. Parsees.
   3. Plains tribesmen in Assam.

   \[B—Population \text{ not more than } 1\frac{1}{2}\ \text{per cent}\]
   4. Indian Christians.
   5. Sikhs.

   \[C—Population \text{ exceeding } 1\frac{1}{2}\ \text{per cent}\]
   7. Scheduled Castes.
(4) Sir Homi Mody advanced the claim of his community for adequate representation in the Central and Provincial Legislatures. While the committee was of opinion that adequate representation should be provided for in response to this claim, it welcomed Sir Homi’s request to have more time to think over the matter and therefore the matter was left over for decision by the Advisory Committee.

(5) The sub-committee then examined the demand put forward by representatives of the Anglo-Indian community but thought it advisable that the question of both the minorities in ‘A’ group should be decided at the same time by the same body, viz., the Advisory Committee to whom the matter was decided to be referred.

(6) The representatives of the Indian Christians stated that so far as their community was concerned they did not like to stand in the way of nation-building. They were willing to accept reservations proportionate to their population in the Central Legislature and in the Provincial Legislatures of Madras, Bombay, Assam and East Punjab. In the other Provinces, they would have the liberty of seeking election from the general seats. They made it plain, however, that if any weightage was given to any minority in groups ‘B’ and ‘C’ they would demand similar weightage though, on principle, they were against weightage being given to any community. The sub-committee accepted this position and decided to commend it to the Advisory Committee. Rajkumari Amrit Kaur dissented from the views of the other Christian members as she was opposed both to reservation and weightage for any community. A copy of her minute of dissent is attached.1

(7) In view of the peculiar and uncertain position of the East Punjab and the position of the Sikhs, the sub-committee decided by a majority of votes (15 to 4) that the question of their representation be referred to the Advisory Committee.

(8) The sub-committee decided by 9 to 4 votes that no weightage be given to any minority in groups ‘B’ and ‘C’.

(9) It was decided by a majority of 8 to 2 that cumulative voting should not be permissible.

(10) The committee examined the proposal that a minority candidate standing for election for a reserved seat should poll a minimum number of votes of his community before he is declared elected. 7 members of the sub-committee voted for this proposal and 7 against it, and it was decided to refer it to the Advisory Committee.

(11) It was proposed that members of a minority community who have reserved seats should have the right to contest unreserved seats as well. This was accepted by the sub-committee in the case of both the Scheduled Castes and other minorities.

Mr. Thakur Das Bhargava made the point and the sub-committee agreed that the position of the communities in East Punjab is so balanced that the whole question of East Punjab should be considered in the Advisory Committee independently of the decisions of the sub-committee.

(12) Dr. Ambedkar suggested that candidates of a majority community should, before being declared elected, poll a minimum number of votes from among voters of the minority communities in their constituencies. This was lost by a large majority, only Dr. Ambedkar voting for it.

4. Reservation of seats in the Cabinet: The sub-committee considered that (a) no statutory provision should be made for reservation of seats for the minorities in Cabinets and that (b) a convention on the lines of paragraph VII of the Instrument of Instructions issued to Governors of Provinces under the Government of India Act, 1935, be provided in a schedule to the Constitution.
The first proposition was carried by 8 votes to 7 and the second by 12 votes to 5.
A proposal to delete the words ‘important’ in paragraph VII of the Instrument of Instructions was lost by 9 votes to 8.
Mr. Khandekar has submitted a minute of dissent, a copy of which is attached to the report.2

5. Reservation in Services: (1) The sub-committee voted on the general proposition that there shall be reservation in the public services for the different communities mentioned in groups A, B and C of paragraph 3(3).

It was agreed that the provisions, if any, regarding reservations should appear in a schedule to the Constitution Act and should have the force of a directive of Government policy. The decisions were its [sic] follows:

(i) Agreed by a majority of votes (16 to 1) that there shall be reservation in the services for the Scheduled Castes.
(ii) Agreed by a majority of votes (9 to 7) that there shall be reservation in the services for Muslims.
(iii) Agreed by a majority of votes (6 to 1) that there shall be reservation in the services for Sikhs.
(iv) Agreed by a majority of votes (12 to 1) that there shall be reservation in the services for Plains tribes in Assam.
(v) Agreed by a majority of votes (12 to 3) that there shall be reservation in the services for Anglo-Indians.

Note: The Parsees and the Indian Christians did not ask for reservation in services.

(2) Mr. Ali Zaheer moved the following resolution:

This committee recommends that in the Provincial as well as Central services, the claims of all the minorities should be kept in view in making appointments to such services consistently with the consideration of efficiency of administration. The committee further recommends that suitable provision to this effect may be embodied in some form in the Constitution or in some other way.

When this proposition was put before the sub-committee, Chaudhari Khaliquzzaman raised the point that the proposition was out of order in view of the decision already taken in para 5(1) above. The Chairman did not accept this view.

Nine members voted for Mr. Ali Zaheer’s proposition and 9 against.

(3) The sub-committee then considered the question as to whether seats should be reserved even for posts for which competitive examinations are held. The decisions were as follows:

(i) Agreed by a majority of votes (11 to 6) that there should be reservation for Scheduled Castes in services to which recruitment was made by competitive examination.
(ii) Decided by a majority of votes (8 to 7) that there should be no such reservation for Muslims, Sikhs and tribesmen.

Note: Anglo-Indians did not want reservation in services of this category. Parsees and Indian Christians did not want reservation in any services, whether filled by competition or otherwise.

(4) Chaudhari Khaliquzzaman, before these proposals were put to vote, raised a point of order that as the sub-committee had already decided on reservation in the services for certain communities in unqualified terms, it was not in order now to break up the proposition into compartments and vote on each of them separately. The Chairman did not accept this view.
on the ground that it had from the very beginning been understood that these matters would be considered separately. On this ruling being given, Ch. Khaliquzzaman and the Hon’ble Mr. Ismail Chundrigar abstained from taking part in the voting on the above propositions. Subsequently, Maulana Hifzur Rahman also raised the same point of order, and the Chairman again ruled it out.

(5) The next question examined was on what basis reservation should be made in those cases in which the committee had decided in favour of reservation. It was proposed that reservation should be on the basis of population. This was rejected by the sub-committee by a majority of 9 to 8 votes.

6. Item (4) of the Agenda: (1) There were four proposals before the sub-committee as regards the administrative machinery to ensure protection of minority rights. Mr. Khandekar moved a proposal for a Minority Commission whose findings should be mandatory on Government. This was lost by a large majority. Mr. Anthony proposed a Minority Commission with the right only to make a report. This also was lost. Dr. Ambedkar suggested that there should be an independent officer appointed by the President at the Centre and by the Governors in the Provinces to report to the Union and Provincial Legislatures respectively about the working of the safeguards provided for the minorities. This was accepted by a majority of 16 to 2 votes. The proposal that the officer should be independent of the executive like the Auditor-General or the judge of a High Court was negatived by a majority of 9 to 6. In view of the voting on this proposal of Dr. Ambedkar, there was no voting on Mr. C. Rajagopalachari’s proposal that a sub-committee of the Legislature concerned, together with an adequate secretariat staff, should be charged with preparing a report for submission to the Legislature.

(2) Mr. Munshi proposed and the sub-committee agreed that there should be provision for the setting up of a statutory commission to investigate into the conditions of socially and educationally backward classes, to study the difficulties under which they laboured and to recommend to the Union or the unit Government, as the case may be, the steps that should be taken to eliminate these difficulties and the financial grants that should be given and the conditions that should be prescribed for such grants.

I wish to record my dissent on the decisions taken by this committee in the matter of reservation of seats in Legislatures and in the services.

2. I have always held that anything in the nature of privileges for any special class or section of society is wrong in principle and when the same is given on the ground of religion it is, in my opinion, doubly wrong, for all religions stand for the brotherhood of man and none for separatism. Moreover, to perpetuate any such privilege in the Constitution of a free India would be against the ideals for which the Indian Union stands pledged to work, namely a classless society where there shall be no high nor low, no rich nor poor, and would also keep alive the flame of communalism which is destroying the very fabric of our national life.

3. I question the legal existence of the depressed classes the moment the new Constitution comes in. Once untouchability is abolished and its practice made a criminal offence who are the Scheduled Castes? They have always been and will now, I submit, become legally one with most of the backward and ignorant poor Hindus of this country. They need straightaway all the necessary facilities and opportunities for raising their standards of education and life in general.

4. No minority will get facilities and opportunities of service through reservation of seats for a handful of their representatives in Legislatures or the services. If such are conceded by statute they will not only further weaken the community concerned but will also lower the standards of efficiency and good governance.

5. I am of opinion that in the new set-up a new spirit has to be brought in. Old policies which have tended to accentuate the communal problems must be abandoned. Palliatives and expedients are no remedies. The minorities should on the one hand realise that they cannot exist except on the basis of the goodwill of the majority community and on the other the latter should so model their conduct as always to prefer them to themselves, merit and character being equal, and thus prove that there are no majorities and minorities in the State.

6. In my opinion the minorities should create that goodwill by relying on the good sense and spirit of fellowship in the majority community and thereby banish the doubts, fears and suspicions which exist in the minds of the minorities today. Public Service Commissions in every Province and the minority officer recommended by this committee at the Centre should be sufficient to safeguard their just rights and protect their interests. All else will not only not protect but will in the long run be harmful.

7. The field of service in India is very wide. All the manpower of the country has to be harnessed for service in nation-building activities. There can be no unemployment for anyone and I hold that it is through the service of the masses alone that every individual and community will find itself and merge into the larger whole.

24. Debate on the Council of Ministers in Independent India
Extract from the proceedings of the Constituent Assembly of India, 28 July 1947

CLAUSE 10

The Honourable Pandit Jawaharlal Nehru (United Provinces: General): This is a very simple clause, Sir: ‘10. There shall be a council of ministers with the Prime Minister at the head, to aid and advise the President in the exercise of his functions.’

I beg to move this.

Mr. President: There are a number of amendments of which I have got notice. Mr. Pocker Sahib Bahadur.

Haji Abdul Sathar Haji Ishaq Sait (Madras: Muslim): He has left and he has authorised me and one or two other members to move his amendments.

Mr. President: Mr. Ahmed Ibrahim Sahib Bahadur.
Haji Abdul Sathar Haji Ishaq Sait: Both of them have left. I do not know whether you can permit me to move it.

Mr. President: Any other member can move it. You desire to move it?

Haji Abdul Sathar Haji Ishaq Sait: I move: That for Clause 10 the following be substituted: '10. There shall be a Council of Ministers elected by the National Assembly by a system of proportional representation by single transferable vote and the council of ministers shall be responsible to the National Assembly.'

I do not think, Sir, any elaborate speech is required on this. The amendment is very simple and clear and I hope this will be accepted by the House. I move.

(Amendments Nos. 213 to 217 were not moved.)

Shri H.V. Pataskar (Bombay: General): I have given notice of this amendment in order to make it clear that the principle of collective responsibility will be applicable to the council of ministers to be appointed under this clause. As Sir N. Gopalaswami Ayyangar has given notice of another similar amendment in the supplementary list, I do not propose to move this amendment (No. 218).

Pandit Thakur Das Bhargava (East Punjab: General): Mr. President, Sir, the amendment which I want to move is this: That the following be added at the end of Clause 10: 'The Prime Minister shall select the other Ministers and the whole ministry shall be responsible to the legislature and act on the principle of joint responsibility in the discharge of the duties of the Ministry.'

I need not remind members that it has been laid down in the objectives Resolution that a democratic form of Government shall be established in the Indian Union. The question now is whether the democratic government should be of the Ministerial type or of the Presidential type as is the case in the U.S.A. So far as the provincial constitutions are concerned we have accepted the principle that responsible democratic government should be established except as regards a minor point about the powers of the government. The principle to be followed in the Union Government should be that the Prime Minister should be the pivot of the whole administration. He should have full powers, and the President would be merely a constitutional head; and he should be given no individual powers or discretion. Whatever the President will do should be on the advice of his ministers. This is a good principle and for this, the British model is regarded as an example by the whole world. This is a model of executive powers which leads to the good and welfare of the people. After great deliberation and mature consideration the Union Powers Committee did not adopt the Presidential constitution of the U.S.A. For this reason, this amendment is based on the British model, though the House is already committed to it. Even then, it should be clearly stated in the Union Constitution that the voice of the Prime Minister would be the final voice and the President will merely echo it. On no occasion shall the voice of the Premier be flouted. Secondly, the Prime Minister should have the right to choose his cabinet colleagues, and the principle of collective responsibility should be adhered to.

I need not emphasise this any more; I would like to say in the end that these three basic amendments, which are based on democratic principle, may be accepted by the House.

Mr. H.V. Kamath: Sir, my amendment is covered by the amendment of Pandit Thakur Das Bhargava. So I do not propose to move my amendment.
Kazi Syed Karimuddin (C.P. & Berar: Muslim): Mr. President, Sir, my amendment is:

That the following be added at the end of Clause 10:

‘That the Executive of the Union shall be non-parliamentary, in the sense that it shall not be removable before the terms of the Legislature and a member of the Cabinet or the Cabinets may be removed at any time on impeachment before a judicial tribunal on the ground of corruption or treason. The Prime Minister shall be elected by the whole House by single transferable vote. Other Ministers in the Cabinet shall be elected by single non-transferable vote.’

Sir, there was a discussion at the time of the passing of the recommendations of the Provincial Committee regarding this issue but that decision is not binding when we are considering the Union Constitution. My submission is that the parliamentary system which is functioning in India under the 1935 Act has miserably failed as far as the Local Self-Government, Local Boards or Municipalities are concerned. All over India you must have noticed that there have been deadlocks and as the worthy leader of the Muslim League said, it does not suit the genius of the people. As far as the Provincial Assemblies are concerned, there was success to some extent because the Congress was fighting the British Imperialism and all conflicting elements were reconciled on that issue. The Muslim League had an ideal of Pakistan and the majority of Muslim members were elected on the Muslim League ticket, but with the disappearance of British Imperialism, with the disappearance of the programme of liberating the Indian people, and with the attainment of Pakistan there will be a plethora of parties and groups. There might be communists, socialists, Muslim Leaguers and many others. To expect such a large majority as we had in the past will be an impossibility. There will be many groups and to expect that there will be a very solid and absolute stability for the Government will be a myth. We have seen in the past that in the working of the Provincial Constitution in the Provinces the Opposition was neglected, ignored and sometimes punished. We have also seen that the parliamentary system which is existing at present created favouritism and nepotism in regard to those people who were supporting the Ministry. The Ministers were serving the members of the party more than the people. A Minister was not a humble servant of the Nation but he was a humble servant of those who were supporting him in the Cabinet and therefore I say that this scheme has not worked well in the past. At a time when India is attaining the cherished goal of independence, what do we find around us—arson, killing and looting. Why, because there is weak executive manned by Ministers who depend for their existence on the support of those people who are interested in communal tension. Everybody is not Pandit Jawaharlal Nehru. Pandit Jawaharlal Nehru when he went to Bihar, announced that people would be bombed if they continued the rioting but there was not a single minister, either Muslim or Hindu in the whole of India who took this attitude. Diamonds are rare, stones are numerous. What we want today is a stable Government. What we want today is a patriotic Government. What we want today is a strong Government; an impartial and unbending executive, that does not bow before popular whims. Today there are weak and vacillating executives in all Provinces who are amenable to influence of the members of the Party and it is impossible for them to displease if they want to continue in the seats that they occupy. Now it is said that the parliamentary system of Government is democratic. America is a democratic country and the Constitution that is prevailing there is also democratic. We find that there is a non-parliamentary executive and the whole administration of the country is divided into 3 parts, one is the Judiciary, the other is the Executive and the third is the Legislature. It is impossible for the Executive to defy the policies laid down by the Legislature and there is the Judiciary to check the excesses of the Executive. Under the circumstances when there is communal tension everywhere, and when there are disruptive forces in this country, there is no other go except to have an Executive which is non-removable by the vote of the legislature. The other day when an amendment was moved at the time of the consideration of the Provincial Constitution, Dr. Pattabhi wanted to explain from a higher plane, although he was speaking under impulse, that the non-parliamentary executive was not suited to the conditions of India. Instead of that he argued about the separate electorates in India. He argued about the Communal Award which was beside the point. There is no communal question in America and in spite of that, this non-parliamentary executive has been adopted there. This is a country of different religions. This is a country of different ideologies. This is a country with different cultures. At a critical moment in the history of India when we do not want internal strife, when we want a formidable Government to be a bulwark against all aggression, it is necessary that in the interim period at least there should be a non-removable executive and non-parliamentary executive. The salvation of Indian people lies in this. There will be neither any favouritism nor nepotism and I plead with the House to accept my amendment.

Mr. D.H. Chandrasekharaiya (Mysore State): Mr. President, Sir, my amendment is to the effect that ‘provision should be made to give adequate representation to the States in the Council of Ministers’. Beyond suggesting that the point raised in this amendment be kindly kept in view at the time when the Ministry is actually formed, I do not propose to press it.

Mr. President: Mr. Gokulbhai Bhatt.

Shri Gokulbhai D. Bhatt (Eastern Rajputana States Group): Sir, Clause 10 lays down that there will be a Council of Ministers and a Prime Minister. But it does not state how the Ministers will be selected or approved. Will the Cabinet Ministers be members of the Parliament? What clauses lay down that they will be members of the Parliament? What should be their salary? Can any changes be made in it? There is no mention of this anywhere. I want to emphasise that it would be better to make all this clear here, as we have done in the draft constitution for the provinces. But our constitutional experts and people more conversant with law than myself say that this is a matter regarding the Union, the Centre, and that it is no use dilating on it because when the final draft will be prepared, the matter will be considered and everything will be clear. I think that it is very necessary to mention as to how the Cabinet will be formed. But we have been assured that all this will be in accordance with what has been laid down in the provincial constitution. With this hope and also in view of the opinion and advice that this amendment should not be moved, I do not want to place it before the House.

The Honourable Sir N. Gopalaswami Ayyangar: Sir, as the clause now stands in the draft, it does not say anything about the manner in which the Council of Ministers is to be chosen and the responsibility of that Council to the Legislature. A number of amendments have been tabled on this aspect of the matter and in order to cover the essentials in respect of these matters, I have given notice of this amendment, that at the end of Clause 10 the following be added: ‘The Prime Minister shall be appointed by the President and the other Ministers shall be appointed by the President on the advice of the Prime Minister. The Council shall be collectively responsible to the House of the People.’ Very few words are required from me to explain the content of this amendment. The Prime Minister is to be invited by the President to form a ministry and naturally by convention the President will invite the leader of the party which by itself or together with the support of other groups in the House is able to command a fairly stable majority. The other ministers will be chosen by the President on the advice of the Prime Minister. Provision is made for collective responsibility to the Lower House or the House of the People. Generally, the responsibility is only to that House, not to the Parliament as a whole. I notice that in one of the amendments it has been suggested that there should be both joint and several responsibility. I do not think in the case of a Government we need copy the practice which perhaps is common in the framing of ordinary private contracts between a Board of Directors possibly and other people. It is sufficient I think that we provide for the collective responsibility of the Council to the House of the People. Sir, I move.

Mr. President: These are the amendments of which I have notice. The clause as also the amendments are now open to discussion.

Mr. Tajamul Husain: Mr. President, Sir, Clause 10 says that there shall be a Council of Ministers with the Prime Minister as the Head to aid and advise the President in the exercise of his functions. Sir, there is no mention in this Clause as to how the Council of Ministers is to be created. Therefore I find, Sir, that an amendment has been moved to the effect that each Minister shall be elected by the Assembly by the principle of proportional representation by single transferable vote and the Council of Ministers shall be responsible to the Assembly. Now, Sir, we can safely divide this amendment into two parts; the first part is that the Ministers are to be elected by the Assembly; the second part is that the Cabinet of Ministers are to be responsible to the Assembly. As regards the second part, I entirely agree. If the Council of Ministers have no majority behind them in the Assembly they will not remain in office or if there is a vote of ‘no confidence’ against them, even then they will get out. Therefore this part of the amendment I can quite appreciate. But as regards the first part, namely, that the Ministers shall be elected by the Assembly, I am afraid, Sir, I have not been able to appreciate. If the Council of Ministers are to be elected by the members of the Assembly by proportional representation by means of the single transferable vote, then, Sir, what may happen? There may be a small party and if there is single transferable vote by proportional representation, that small Party may succeed in electing a Minister. Now, Sir, that party may not have the same political view as the majority party in the Assembly. Therefore in a Cabinet there may be Ministers with two divergent views and opinions. Now, Sir, if that happens there will be no team work in the Ministry and this cannot be called a stable Ministry. After all we have seen that the English system in this connection has been tried for centuries in England and it has worked well. What happens in England? The leader is summoned by the Head of the State, i.e. the King and is appointed Chief Minister or Prime Minister. This Chief Minister or Prime Minister has to submit the names of the other Ministers and in consultation with the Prime Minister the Head of the State or the King appoints all the Ministers. Then, in that case the ministry is stable; for when the Prime Minister has got the majority in the House, he will carry on, and if he has not, he will not. But to have two different kinds of ministers in the same Cabinet, I am afraid, I am not able to appreciate.

Now, Sir, another amendment is to the effect that the Union Executive shall be non-Parliamentary and should be irremovable, and that a member of the Cabinet may be removed at any time on impeachment before a judicial tribunal on the ground of corruption, etc., and that the Prime Minister shall be elected by the whole House by single transferable vote, while the other Ministers shall be elected by single non-transferable vote.

Now, this amendment too can be safely divided into four parts. The first part is that the Cabinet should be non-parliamentary—should be irremovable. That is a thing which I cannot appreciate—the non-parliamentary complexion of the cabinet. It appears to me rather anti-democratic. If the cabinet does not carry the confidence of the House it must be removed. It cannot remain even for one minute, after it has lost the confidence of the House.

The second part is that the Ministers may be removed by impeachment before a judicial tribunal. I am afraid I am not able to appreciate that point also. If a Minister does not have the confidence of the House, and if there is something against him, he can be removed by bringing up the matter before the Legislature. Why drag him before a judicial tribunal? I do not know how this is going to work in a democratic system, such as the one we are hoping to have for our country.

And the third part is that the Prime Minister should be elected by the whole House by single transferable vote, but the other members of the cabinet are to be elected by single non-transferable vote. I am not able to understand what advantage the Honourable Mover expects under this arrangement. If the whole House elects a person, the man who has the larger majority will be elected. Suppose there is a House of 150 and one party—I will not say the Congress or the League, because there will be no old Congress or old League in Hindustan, parties will be on different lines—that one party, say, the Socialists number 100 and the opposition number 50.

Kazi Syed Karimuddin: Sir, how does the Honourable Member know that there will be no League or Congress party?

Mr. Tajamul Husain: I am glad I have been asked that question. There should not be any such parties, Sir. The sole object of the Congress was to achieve complete independence, without the interference of a foreign power and it has succeeded. The Congress has achieved its object. The League's object was the partition of the country and have Pakistan and they have got that. Both the parties have achieved their respective objects and they have finished their work. What the Congress wanted, the Congress has achieved and what the League wanted, the League has achieved; now there is no difference at all between the two, we are all in India and are Indians but our rights must be protected.

Mr. President: The Honourable Member will please confine himself to the discussion of the point. The future of the Congress and of the League is not before the House for discussion.

Mr. Tajamul Husain: But the Honourable Mover had asked me to explain why I said there would be no League nor Congress Party as of old creeds and I thought I had your permission to explain; but now that I do not have it, I will not say anything more about that. I will only say that there will be no parties on the lines we have known them, because both the Congress and the League have achieved their objects. Both parties will have new creeds in future.

I was saying this. Suppose in a House of 150, one party has 100 members. That party will elect the leader who will be the Prime Minister. Suppose there are two candidates and the successful candidate gets 60 votes and the rest 40 oppose him. He still becomes Prime Minister. But what will happen if the opposition of 40 Members combine with the rest 50 in the House? Then the House will be divided as 90 against 60. The Leader cannot be chosen by the Party which has the largest majority in the House. It is just possible, in that case that the man who ultimately becomes the Prime Minister will be a man of the opposition. That is undemocratic and is against that system of democracy which I admire—the English system of democracy. I think that as far as possible, in order to suit our Indian ways, we should adopt as much of the English constitution as we can.

I oppose the amendment.
Lastly, there is the amendment moved by Sir N. Gopalaswami Ayyangar—which is also the same as that of Pandit Bhargava—providing for the selection of the ministers and the appointment of the Prime Minister. The Prime Minister, it says, should be appointed by the President who will appoint the other Ministers on the advice of the Prime Minister and the Cabinet shall be responsible to the whole House. That is the system which is prevalent in the House of Commons and I support this amendment. As I said, it has worked very well in England and there is no reason why it should not be equally successful in our country. I support the amendment of Pandit Bhargava also.

Mr. H.V. Kamath: Mr. President, Sir, this clause seeks to lay down the basis of our national federal executive. Two amendments have been moved to this clause, amendment No. 212 and amendment No. 221 which, in effect, seek to weaken this national executive. My friend Mr. Kazi and my friend Mr. Husain praised respectively the American model and the British model. Here, Sir, we are not concerned with which model or which type we are going to embody in our constitution, whether it is the British, American, Russian, Turkish or the French or any other for the matter of that. Here, Sir, we are concerned with the principles of a democratic, efficient and dynamic government. After all what is needed today is an efficient and dynamic government which will clear the mess that has been made in this country, which will lift this country of ours out of the rut into which it has fallen. The most elementary as well as the most fundamental principle, to my mind, of a democratic, efficient and dynamic government is that while every shade of political opinion and every school of thought should be adequately represented in every legislature,—because in a legislature two heads are better than one, twenty heads are better than two and two hundred heads are better than twenty—in the case of the executive, specially when we are planning a dynamic executive, the reverse is the case. Here, Sir, in an executive it should be that twenty heads are better than two hundred, two heads are better than twenty and in an emergency even one head is better than two. In an emergency where prompt action and quick decision is needed, dynamism is required, one head is better than two heads. But these amendments seeks to lay down a basis for the executive which if accepted would weaken the executive and would practically render it passive, unstable and static and render it unable to cope with the tasks that lie ahead of us. After all a cabinet or an executive is not a Shivaji ka Barat or an assorted museum piece or a mere Khitchri, but we want to make the executive a really dynamic executive. Here on the floor of the House my friend Mr. Kazi eulogised Pandit Nehru for what he had done in Bihar. I wish, Sir, that many of us were in a similar position to praise and eulogise the leaders of the Muslim League when similar and worse things happened in Bengal and some other parts of India. It is well known that when these outrages were committed in East Bengal and many other parts of India, when men were massacred, women were humiliated and children were burnt in fire and oil, no leader of the Muslim League raised his little finger nor did even one Muslim League leader go into those parts and do what Pandit Nehru did in Bihar. Is this the way in which we are going to build up a strong united India? Is this the spirit that is going to animate us in future? Only yesterday I read a statement from the head of the Muslim League where he mentioned Pakistan and Muslim India. I expected that at least after the division of India into Pakistan and India or Bharatvarsha on a communal basis the hatchet had been buried fathoms deep. But the same spirit is abroad and that spirit has not been stilled. People thought of Pakistan and the rest of India...

Mr. President: The Honourable Member should confine himself to the subject under debate.
Mr. H.V. Kamath: I was trying to make out that today what is needed is a dynamic spirit of unity, of action, of sacrifice and of faith. Let us not forget the grand, beautiful vision painted by our poet, Viswakavi Rabindranath in words of matchless beauty. That vision should animate us and guide us in our future labours so that we can all build up a great India worthy of our past and worthy of the sacrifices which our martyrs have undergone. Permit me, Sir, to quote those words which picture a vision of matchless beauty:

‘Where the mind is without fear and the head is held high,
Where knowledge is free,
Where the world has not been broken up into fragments by narrow domestic walls,
Where words come out from the depth of truth,
Where tireless striving stretches its arms towards perfection,
Where the clear stream of reason has not lost its way into the dreary desert sand of dead habit,
Where the mind is led forward by Thee into ever widening thought and action,
Into that heaven of freedom, my Father, let my country awake.’

Jai Hind.

Mr. President: I understand that Pandit Jawaharlal Nehru would like to accept some of the amendments. If so it might cut short the discussion to some extent. I should like him to make a statement before the discussion proceeds further.

The Honourable Pandit Jawaharlal Nehru: Sir, I venture to intervene in order to make clear which of the amendments I am prepared to accept and which not. Four amendments have been moved. I may say at the outset that I am prepared to accept Sir Gopalaswami Ayyangar’s amendment and not the others. Pandit Bhargava’s amendment is more or less the same; it is only a question of wording. The others raise entirely different issues; for instance, the issue of ministers being elected by proportional representation. I can think of nothing more conducive to creating a feeble ministry and a feeble government than this business of electing them by proportional representation; and I would therefore like the House to reject this amendment.
The other one raises a completely different issue, as to what the nature of the constitution should be. For instance, Mr. Karimuddin’s amendment says that ‘that executive of the Union shall be non-parliamentary, in the sense that it shall not be removable before the term of the legislature,’ etc. That raises a very fundamental issue of what form you are going to give to your constitution, the ministerial parliamentary type or the American type. So far we have been proceeding with the building up of the constitution in the ministerial sense and I do submit that we cannot go back upon it and it will upset the whole scheme and structure of the constitution.
Therefore I regret I cannot accept this amendment of Mr. Karimuddin or of Mr. Pocker Sahib.

As to the other point raised it is perfectly true that the original draft that I placed before the House was not at all clear on various matters. It was not clear because there was no intention of drafting it here. These are certain indications for future drafting and some things were obviously taken for granted. It was taken for granted that the Prime Minister would be sent for by the President because he happens to represent the largest party or group in the House; further that the Prime Minister would select his ministers and further that they would be responsible to the House collectively. All that was taken for granted, but perhaps it is better to put that down clearly and the amendment moved by Sir Gopalaswami Ayyangar puts that down very clearly. Therefore I accept that amendment and I hope the House also will accept it and reject the others.

The Honourable Mr. Hussain Imam (Bihar; Muslim): Sir, I had no intention of intervening in this debate because the subject matter of debate as to whether the executive should be parliamentary or non-parliamentary is one which though of great academic interest is not practical politics due to opinion in India being so much in favour of the British model that it is useless for any one to try and sing the praises of the American system and get it adopted. Constitutions are made—although there is an element of finality about them—only for a time; and I hope to live and see the British model dethroned, just as British power is being dethroned, and the better model adopted. But I have been forced to come here because of the speech of Mr. Kamath. Mr. Qazi spoke in praise of the activities of Pandit Nehru in Bihar. I was an eye-witness and saw his torn shirt and the amount of labour that he put in. When an opposite party man admires the other it is not an occasion to be utilised for maligning that party. The endeavour should not be to accentuate differences but to bring about greater unity.

Singularly ill-timed was the attempt of Mr. Kamath to state certain facts which were terminological inexactitudes. It is wrong to say that the League High Command never condemned the atrocities perpetrated on non-Muslims.

Mr. President: I am afraid we are straying into irrelevant discussion.

The Honourable Mr. Hussain Imam: I am not going to discuss this matter. I am simply mentioning that what he mentioned were not the facts. The fact that Pandit Jawaharlal Nehru went to Bihar was due to the reason that the Congress High Command was in control there, and the Congress High Command was in a position to intervene. But in Punjab the League was not the party controlling the Ministry: it was under section 93; in the N.W.F.P. the Congress was in power.

Mr. President: I would remind the Honourable Member that we are not considering the conduct of any Ministry or of Pandit Jawaharlal Nehru or of anybody else. We are discussing a simple clause of the Constitution. I would request him to confine himself to that.

The Honourable Mr. Hussain Imam: I hope you will not allow such digression to be made by others as well.

Sir, I was saying that the American system has got great advantages which are not appreciated at the moment. A few days ago I learnt that Harold Laski has written a book condemning the American system of having an irremovable executive. He has praised the British system which we are adopting. What are the facts of the British system? The fact that the executive is removable in Britain does not differ materially in the day to day administration from the irremovable character of the American system. The power of not voting supplies, which is the essential part of the Ministry’s working, is vested in the Legislature so that in the British system as well as in the American system the Legislature is absolute, though in the American Constitution there is the Presidential Veto. But there again they have provided so many checks and balances that the Presidential Veto can be overthrown by a two third majority of the House of Representatives and the Senate. So you find that the control of the purse by the Legislature is absolute practically in the Parliamentary system and in the non-parliamentary executive system of America.

Now, so far as legislature is concerned, the same thing applies. The Legislature is supreme with certain safeguards. Now, the very fact that a man is appointed who is not a member and the other man is appointed who is a member does not make any great difference in the day to day administration.

Some people have rightly opined that in times of crisis it is better to have one central control rather than a multitude of small minds working together and bringing about a kind of chaos. Well, if a system can work better in times of crisis, I do not understand why it should fail when there is no crisis. Crisis is an extraordinary state of affairs, a really complicated and difficult state of affairs. If a system can work at such a time, it stands to reason that it will work and work smoothly when the times are normal. I, therefore, am of the opinion that the non¬ parliamentary system by means of which the President who gets not less than 51 per cent of the votes of the entire Nation is a better custodian of the Nation’s interests than the Prime Minister who, after all, represents only one constituency and the majority of his own party members. The illustration which Mr. Tajamul Husain has given was a little amiss. He said that the Prime Minister can be elected by the Opposition and the Government party combined together. He gave an illustration that, if there are 100 men in one party and 50 in another, then at the time of electing the leader, 60 vote for one and 40 for another. The man who was rejected by his own party, and might have gone over to the other party, secures 50 votes from the second party and 40 from the first and gets elected in spite of the fact that the majority of his own party wasn’t with him. That apprehension is perhaps based on inexperience. In political parties the differences which exist inside are never ventilated outside. A man who will betray his own party and go over to the opposition will not get a single vote of his own party. In these days of democracy, such things are not possible. Rare instances of this nature may perhaps exist in one corner or other, but on broad outlines, you cannot have this kind of fissiparous tendency. Will the Opposition support a Quisling from the Government? How can that position be allowed? He is not a partyman. That is a contingency which will not arise.
But the possibility that a Prime Minister might represent only a minority of the House is worth considering. The system of party working is such that if you belong to one party and secure the votes you are likely and almost sure to get all the votes of the party. In the instance which Mr.
Tajamul Husain gave, what will happen is that the man who secures 60 votes out of 150 will ultimately be the Prime Minister. Now you ask the President to act not on his own judgment, but on the judgment of this man who secured a minority of the votes of the House. He gets 60 out of the 150 votes, or 40 per cent only.

I therefore regard that the system whereby discretion is left to the President to nominate his own Ministers is more democratic and based on better and sounder principles than the system of copying the British model. The British system was found unequal to the task when it was worked in France where the tendencies are to have small groups and parties. They found there ever and anon that the British system was unsuitable. U.S.A. has a different system giving the President perfect latitude to form a Government suited to the occasion. For instance, during the war President Roosevelt nominated two Members to his cabinet from the party in Opposition, and they were given very important portfolios. So you have the same system of coalition Government in America without any of the defects which a coalition presupposes.
A coalition is composed of divergent elements, each pulling in different ways. I personally think that the American system is not a quarter as bad as has been stated. It is said that the executive is not removable. But the fact is that the executive is more easily removable in the American system that in the British system. Many Members will remember the howl which was raised when Lord Templeton (Ex Sir Samuel Hoare) was turned out of the British Cabinet in the days of the Spanish crisis.
Towards Freedom: 1947 (Part 2)

But in America everyday you find one Secretary of State being turned out and another being appointed. General Marshall has just come in without any furore being made. There is no one to question the right of the President to select an executive head for the time being. I do not wish, Sir, to detain the House by making a long speech. I wish only to make my position clear. This is my personal opinion, not that of my party, but I thought that it would be better if I explained that the American system is not as bad as it has been painted by its traducers.

Mahboob Ali Beg Sahib Bahadur (Madras: Muslim): Mr. President, Sir, Clause 10 as amplified by Sir N. Gopalaswami Ayyangar introduces a type of executive which is British and which is commonly known as parliamentary. The amendment moved by Kazi Syed Karimuddin Saheb seeks to amend this clause by introducing a mixed type of executive, the Swiss type. Now, let us examine whether the type of executive contemplated by the amendment of Kazi Saheb is undemocratic, is impracticable and does not meet the present circumstances in the country.

Under these three heads it is necessary for this House to deal with this subject. Now, Sir, as you know, the British parliamentary system is not a statutory one. It is a historic growth covering several centuries of struggle between the people and the king, to snatch as much power as possible for the representatives of the people to administer the State. It is no doubt true that members of the Parliament are elected; and after the members are elected, the leader of the majority party is called by the Head of the State, viz., the King, to form the Government, i.e., he chooses his own ministers. Up to the stage of the return of the members to Parliament, it is democratic. From that stage, it ceases to be democratic, for the leader of the majority party may choose anyone he pleases. The ministers no doubt belong to the party which has been favoured by the electorate, but particular ministers are not chosen by the members of Parliament. Then, Sir, the Government is formed, and it is in the saddle so long as it carries the confidence of the Parliament. But take the case of a certain section of the Parliament not being satisfied with the executive but unable to throw out the Government. It may be that that small section are the people in whom the majority of the electorates have confidence. The anomaly is that the electorate, the real sovereign, is not in a position to throw out the Cabinet. You will therefore see, Sir, that the parliamentary executive ceases to be really democratic. In the first place, parliament does not choose the ministers; in the second place the electorate cannot turn them out. So, really, Sir, from that stage the parliamentary democracy obtaining in England which is sought to be introduced here is not democratic. Let us examine the position taken by Kazi Saheb. After the elections take place, the members of Parliament will elect their own ministers. So, Sir, it is more democratic than the British parliamentary type. There are two processes. One is that members of the Parliament are elected by the people, and the second is that the members of Parliament, the real representatives of the people, elect their own ministers. Let us see whether the system which is sought to be introduced by this amendment is practicable in the circumstances obtaining in the country. I once before said that the democratic system of election of members of Parliament and the election of the Cabinet must be one which will reflect all the sections of the country. It is no use being blind to the realities of the situation. It is no doubt true that people should not think in terms of sections, communities, and special interests. But every day we find that even the parties like the League and the Congress, both inside and outside this House, have always been saying there must be protection of minorities,—religious minorities, sectional minorities and the oppressed minorities and minorities belonging to different tracts of the country. These are facts. Let us not be blind to these facts. Now if the Leader of the party is called upon by the Head of the State, what he does naturally—and we expect him to do it—is that he would form a Cabinet of men consisting of persons representing some interests or some communities. He is going to do that. It may be by convention or good sense, but that is going to happen. But if that does not happen and he cannot be forced to do it, then, Sir, there will be a lot of discontent, distrust and all that sort of thing. So if we provide in the Constitution itself a democratic system of forming a Cabinet by electing ministers and you introduce a system of election which is called proportional representation by the single transferable vote for non-transferable vote as the case may be, then it will be satisfactory. It will be democratic and it will reflect all the sections of the people. Besides that, Sir, as I submitted, it is not possible for the people to turn out a reactionary Cabinet. The party in power may still consist of a majority of persons who are reactionary and in whom the electorate may have no confidence. But in any case the Cabinet will continue and is expected to continue for the full term of four or five years.

In this amendment you have the advantage of the democratic method of electing persons to your Cabinet and having elected them, you ask them to continue, while the person who is elected under the British type always stands in fear of being turned out. So, Sir, if you make this executive not removable for the period, he will be in a better position to work, develop schemes and see to their completion. So, Sir as I said, this Swiss type has got the advantage of being democratic at certain stages. It is possible for all sections of the country to be represented, it will work better and can complete its schemes and in the present circumstances of the country, is the most suitable and there is nothing wrong in introducing this system. Further, let us remember these systems—the Swiss and the American types—are the result of the experience gained by the other countries where democracy has worked, and it is the considered opinion of the Constitutionalists that the British system is not democratic. After all, who holds the power even in that democracy, in that Parliament? Virtually it is the Prime Minister or his executive; and on account of what is called the discipline in the Party what is considered to be good by that party, Cabinet or the Premier must be followed by all the Members or else disciplinary action will be taken against them. I therefore think, Sir, that the Swiss system that is contemplated by the amendment of Kazi Syed Karimuddin has much to commend it.

Mr. President: I think we have had enough discussion on this clause and I would like to put the amendment and the clause to vote now.

Mr. K.M. Munshi (Bombay: General): I move closure.

Mr. President: There is a closure moved by Mr. Munshi. I take it that the House accepts the closure.

The question is: That for Clause 10 the following be substituted: ‘There shall be a Council of ministers elected by the National Assembly by a system of proportional representation by single transferable vote and the council of ministers shall be responsible to the National Assembly.’

The amendment was negatived.

Mr. President: I will put the amendment of Kazi Syed Karimuddin to vote:

That the following be added at the end of Clause 10:

‘That the Executive of the Union shall be non-parliamentary in the sense that it shall not be removable before the term of the Legislature and a member of the Cabinet or the Cabinets may be removed at any time on impeachment before a judicial tribunal on the ground of corruption or treason.'
The Prime Minister shall be elected by the whole House by single transferable vote. Other Ministers in the Cabinet shall be elected by single non-transferable vote.’

The amendment was negatived.

Mr. President: I will now put Sir Gopalaswami Ayyanger’s amendment to vote:
That at the end of Clause 10, the following be added:

‘The Prime Minister shall be appointed by the President and the other Ministers shall be appointed by the President on the advice of the Prime Minister. The Council shall be collectively responsible to the House of the People.’

This has been accepted by the Mover.

The amendment was adopted.

Mr. President: There is another amendment by Mr. Thakurdas Bhargava. I think that is covered by this amendment and it is not necessary to take the vote of the House on it.

I will now put the original clause as amended by Sir Gopalaswami Ayyangar’s amendment.

Clause 10, as amended, was adopted.

25. Report on Minority Rights by the Advisory Committee

Letter from Vallabhbhai Patel to the President, Constituent Assembly, 8 August 1947

Constituent Assembly Debates, Vol. V, pp. 243-7

Council House
New Delhi,

From
The Hon’ble Sardar Vallabhbhai Patel,
Chairman, Advisory Committee on Minorities Fundamental Rights, etc.

To
The President,
Constituent Assembly of India

Dear Sir,

On behalf of the members of the Advisory Committee appointed by the Constituent Assembly on the 24th January 1947 and subsequently nominated by you, I have the honour to submit this report on minority rights. It should be treated as supplementary to the one forwarded to you with my letter No. CA/24/Com./47, dated the 23rd April, 1947 and dealt with by the Assembly during the April session. That report dealt with justiciable fundamental rights; these rights, whether applicable to all citizens generally or to members of minority communities in particular offer a most valuable safeguard for minorities over a comprehensive field of social life. The present report deals with what may broadly be described as political safeguards for minorities and covers the following points—

(i) Representation in legislatures; joint versus separate electorates and weightage.
(ii) Reservation of seats for minorities in Cabinets.
(iii) Reservation for minorities in the Public Services.
(iv) Administrative machinery to ensure protection of minority rights.
2. Our recommendations are based on exhaustive discussion both in the Sub-Committee on Minorities as well as in the main Advisory Committee. From the very nature of things, it was difficult to expect complete unanimity on all points. I have pleasure in informing you, however, that our recommendations, where they were not unanimous, were taken by very large majorities composed substantially of members belonging to minority communities themselves.

Joint versus separate electorates and weightage

3. The first question we tackled was that of separate electorates; we considered this as being of crucial importance both to the minorities themselves and to the political life of the country as a whole. By an overwhelming majority, we came to the conclusion that the system of separate electorates must be abolished in the new constitution. In our judgment, this system has in the past sharpened communal differences to a dangerous extent and has proved one of the main stumbling blocks to the development of a healthy national life. It seems specially necessary to avoid these dangers in the new political conditions that have developed in the country and from this point of view the arguments against separate electorates seem to us absolutely decisive.

4. We recommend accordingly that all elections to the Central and Provincial legislatures should be held on the basis of joint electorates. In order that minorities may not feel apprehensive about the effect of a system of unrestricted joint electorates on the quantum of their representation in the legislature, we recommend as a general rule that seats for the different recognised minorities shall be reserved in the various legislatures on the basis of their population. This reservation should be initially for a period of 10 years, the position to be reconsidered at the end of that period. We recommend also that the members of a minority community who have reserved seats shall have the right to contest unreserved seats as well. As a matter of general principle, we are opposed to weightage for any minority community.

5. For two reasons the application of the above principles to specific minorities was considered in detail by the committee. In the first place, it was known to us that minorities are by no means unanimous as to the necessity, in their own interests, of statutory reservation of seats in the legislatures. Secondly, the strict application of the above principles to a microscopic minority like the Anglo-Indians seemed to require very careful examination. We accordingly classified minorities into three groups ‘A’ consisting of those with a population of less than $1/2$ per cent in the Indian Dominion excluding the States, group ‘B’ consisting of those with a population of more than $1/2$ per cent, but not exceeding $11/2$ per cent, and group ‘C’ consisting of minorities with a population exceeding $11/2$ per cent. These three groups are as follows—

Group ‘A’—
1. Anglo-Indians.
2. Parsees.
3. Plains’ tribesmen in Assam.

Group ‘B’—
4. Indian Christians.
5. Sikhs.

Group ‘C’—
7. Scheduled Castes.
6. Anglo-Indians—The population of the Anglo-Indian community excluding the States is just over a lakh, that is, .04 per cent. Mr. Anthony, on behalf of the Anglo-Indians, contended that the census figures were inaccurate but even admitting a larger figure than the one given in the census, this community is microscopic, and to deal with it on a strictly population basis would mean giving it no representation at all. The representatives of the Anglo-Indians on the committee asked originally that they should have the following representation in the legislatures:—

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>House of the People</th>
<th>3</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>West Bengal</td>
<td>3</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Bombay</td>
<td>2</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Madras</td>
<td>2</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>C.P. &amp; Berar</td>
<td>1</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Bihar</td>
<td>1</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>U.P.</td>
<td>1</td>
</tr>
</tbody>

Subsequently they asked that they should be guaranteed two seats in the House of the People and one in each province in which they have representation at present, that is, a total of 8 altogether. After very considerable discussion, in the course of which the representatives of the Anglo-Indian community gave full expression to their views, the committee unanimously accepted the following formula, namely, that there shall be no reservation of seats for the Anglo-Indians but the President of the Union and the Governors of Provinces shall have power to nominate representatives of the Anglo-Indian community to the lower house in the Centre and in the Provinces respectively if they fail to secure representation in the legislatures as a result of the general election. We wish to congratulate the representatives of the Anglo-Indian community on the committee for not pressing their proposals which would not merely have introduced the principle of special weightage which was turned down as a general proposition by an overwhelming majority but would also have encouraged other small minorities to ask for representation wholly out of proportion to their numbers. We feel sure that by the operation of the formula recommended by us Anglo-Indians will find themselves given adequate opportunity effectively to represent in the legislatures the special interests of their community.

7. Parsees—In the Minorities Sub-Committee, Sir Homi Modi had urged that in view of the importance of the Parsee community and the contribution it has been making to the political and economic advancement of the country, Parsees should have adequate representation in the Central and Provincial Legislatures. The Sub-Committee were of opinion that this claim should be conceded. In view, however, of the opinion expressed to him by several members that an advanced community like the Parsees would be adequately represented in any event and did not need specific reservation. Sir Homi had asked for time to consider the matter.

When the issue came before the Advisory Committee, Sir Homi stated that though the committee had already accepted the Parsee community as a recognised minority entitled to special consideration on the same basis as other minorities in Group ‘A’, he had decided to follow the traditions which the community had maintained in the past and to withdraw the claim for statutory reservation. He assumed that Parsees would remain on the list of recognised minorities and urged that if, during the period prescribed in the first instance for the special representation of the minorities it was found that the Parsee community had not secured proper representation, its claim would be reconsidered and adequate representation provided, if the separate representation of minorities continued to be a feature of the constitution. The Committee appreciated the stand taken by Sir Homi and agreed to his proposal.

8. Plains' tribesmen in Assam—The case of these tribesmen will be taken up after the report of the Excluded and Partially Excluded Areas Sub-Committee is received.

9. Indian Christians—The representatives of the Indian Christians stated that, so far as their community was concerned, they did not desire to stand in the way of nation building. They were willing to accept reservation proportionate to their population in the Central Legislature and the Provincial legislatures of Madras and Bombay. In the other provinces, they would have the liberty of seeking election from the general seat. They were against any weightage being given to any community, but made it plain that if weightage was given to any minority, in Groups ‘B’ and ‘C’, they would demand similar weightage. As weightage is not being conceded to any community, this means that the Indian Christians are prepared to throw in their lot with the general community subject only to the reservation of certain seats for them on the population basis in the Central legislature and in Madras and Bombay.

10. Sikhs—In view of the uncertainty of the position of the Sikhs at present, pending the award of the Boundary Commission in the Punjab, the committee decided that the whole question of the safeguards for the Sikh community should be held over for the present.

11. Group ‘C’—Muslims and Scheduled Castes—The Committee came to the conclusion that there are no adequate grounds for departing from the general formula in the case either of the Muslims or of the Scheduled Castes. Accordingly it is recommended that seats be reserved for these communities in proportion to their population and that these seats shall be contested through joint electorates.

12. A proposal was made in the committee that a member of the minority community contesting a reserved seat should poll a minimum number of votes of his own community before he is declared elected. It was also suggested that cumulative voting should be permitted. The Committee was of the view that a combination of cumulative voting and a minimum percentage of votes to be polled in a community would have all the evil effects of separate electorates and that neither of these proposals should be accepted.

Representation of minorities in Cabinets

Some members of the committee proposed that there should be a Provision prescribing that minorities shall have reserved for them seats in Cabinets in proportion to their population. The committee came unhesitatingly to the conclusion that a constitutional provision of this character would give rise to serious difficulties. At the same time, the committee felt that the constitution should specifically draw the attention of the President of the Union and the Governors of Provinces to the desirability of including members of important minority communities in Cabinets as far as practicable. We recommend accordingly that a convention shall be provided in a schedule to the constitution on the lines of paragraph VII of the Instrument of Instructions issued to Governors under the Act of 1935 and reproduced below.

‘VII. In making appointments to his Council of Ministers, our Governor shall use his best endeavours to select his Ministers in the following manner, that is to say, to appoint in consultation with the person who in his judgment is most likely to command a stable majority in the legislature those persons (including so far as practicable members of important minority communities) who will best be in a position collectively to command the confidence of the legislature. In so acting, he shall bear constantly in mind the need for fostering a sense of joint responsibility among his Ministers.’

Representations in Services

14. A proposal was made to us that there should be a constitutional guarantee of representation in the public services of the minority communities in proportion to their population. We are not aware of any other constitution in which such a guarantee exists and on merits, we consider, as a general proposition that any such guarantee would be a dangerous innovation. At the same time, it is clear to us that consistently with the need of efficiency in administration, it is necessary for the State to pay due regard to the claims of minorities in making appointments to public services. We recommend, therefore, that, as in the case of appointments to Cabinets, there should be in some part of the constitution or the schedule an exhortation to the Central and Provincial Governments to keep in view the claims of all the minorities in making appointments to public services consistently with the efficiency of administration.

The Anglo-Indian members of our committee have represented to us that owing to the complete dependence of the economy of their community on their position in certain services and their existing educational facilities, their case required special treatment. We have appointed a sub-committee to investigate this question and to report to us.

15. The minorities' representatives in the committee naturally attached importance to the provision of administrative machinery for ensuring that the guarantee and safeguards provided for the minorities both in the constitution and by executive orders are in fact implemented in practice. After considerable discussion, we have come to the conclusion that the best arrangement would be for the Centre and for each of the Provinces to appoint a special Minority Officer whose duty will be to enquire into cases in which it is alleged that rights and safeguards have been infringed and to submit a report to the appropriate legislature.

16. We have felt bound to reject some of the proposals placed before us partly because, as in the case of reservation of seats in Cabinets, we felt that a rigid constitutional provision would have made parliamentary democracy unworkable and partly because, as in the case of the electoral arrangements we considered it necessary to harmonise the special claims of minorities with the development of a healthy national life. We wish to make it clear, however, that our general approach to the whole problem of minorities is that the State should be so run that they should stop feeling oppressed by the mere fact that they are minorities and that, on the contrary, they should feel that they have as honourable a part to play in the national life as any other section of the community. In particular, we think it is a fundamental duty of the State to take special steps to bring up those minorities which are backward to the level of the general community. We recommend accordingly that a Statutory Commission should be set up to investigate into the conditions of socially and educationally backward classes, to study the difficulties under which they labour and to recommend to the Union or the Unit Government, as the case may be, steps that should be taken to eliminate their difficulties and suggest the financial grants that should be given and the conditions that should be prescribed for such grants.

17. A summary of our recommendations is attached in the Appendix.¹

Yours truly,
The 8th August 1947

VALLABHBHAI PATEL,
Chairman

Chapter 26. Partition Award and After

1. HMG’s Statement of 3 June
   Official Statement, 3 June 1947
   India Office Records (hereafter IOR), L/P&J/10/80, Acc. No. 3652, NAI

INTRODUCTION
1. On 20th February 1947, His Majesty’s Government announced their intention of transferring power in British India to Indian hands by June 1948. His Majesty’s Government had hoped that it would be possible for the major parties to co-operate in the working out of the Cabinet Mission Plan of 16th May 1946, and evolve for India a constitution acceptable to all concerned. This hope has not been fulfilled.

2. The majority of the representatives of the Provinces of Madras, Bombay, the United Provinces, Bihar, Central Provinces and Berar, Assam, Orissa and the North-West Frontier Province, and the representatives of Delhi, Ajmer-Merwara and Coorg have already made progress in the task of evolving a new Constitution. On the other hand, the Muslim League Party, including in it a majority of the representatives of Bengal, the Punjab and Sind, as also the representative of British Baluchistan has decided not to participate in the Constituent Assembly.

3. It has always been the desire of His Majesty’s Government that power should be transferred in accordance with the wishes of the Indian people themselves. This task would have been greatly facilitated if there had been agreement among the Indian political parties. In the absence of such an agreement the task of devising a method by which the wishes of the Indian people can be ascertained has devolved on His Majesty’s Government. After full consultation with political leaders in India, His Majesty’s Government have decided to adopt for this purpose the plan set out below. His Majesty’s Government wish to make it clear that they have no intention of attempting to frame any ultimate Constitution for India; this is a matter for the Indians themselves. Nor is there anything in this plan to preclude negotiations between communities for an united India.

THE ISSUES TO BE DECIDED
4. It is not the intention of His Majesty’s Government to interrupt the work of the existing Constituent Assembly. Now that provision is made for certain provinces specified below; His Majesty’s Government trust that, as a consequence of this announcement, the Muslim League representatives of those provinces, a majority of whose representatives are already participating in it, will now take their due share in its labours. At the same time it is clear that any Constitution framed by this Assembly cannot apply to those parts of the country which are unwilling to accept it. His Majesty’s Government are satisfied that the procedure outlined below, embodies the best practical method of ascertaining the wishes of the people of such areas on the issue whether their Constitution is to be framed—

(a) in the existing Constituent Assembly; or

(b) in a new and separate Constituent Assembly consisting of the representatives of those areas which decide not to participate in the existing Constituent Assembly.

When this has been done, it will be possible to determine the authority or authorities to whom power should be transferred.

BENGAL AND PUNJAB

5. The Provincial Legislative Assembly of Bengal and the Punjab (excluding the European members) will therefore each be asked to meet in two parts, one representing the Muslim majority districts and the other the rest of the Province. For the purpose of determining the population of districts, the 1941 census figures will be taken as authoritative. The Muslim majority districts in these two provinces are set out in the Appendix to this Announcement.

6. The members of the two parts of each Legislative Assembly sitting separately will be empowered to vote whether or not the Province should be partitioned. If a simple majority of either part decides in favour of partition, division will take place and arrangements will be made accordingly.

7. Before the question as to the partition is decided, it is desirable that the representatives of each part should know in advance which Constituent Assembly the Province as a whole would join in the event of the two parts subsequently deciding to remain united. Therefore, if any member of either Legislative Assembly so demands, there shall be held a meeting of all members of the Legislative Assembly (other than Europeans) at which a decision will be taken on the issue as to which Constituent Assembly the Province as a whole would join if it were decided by the two parts to remain united.

8. In the event of partition being decided upon, each part of the Legislative Assembly will on behalf of the areas they represent, decide which of the alternatives in paragraph 4 above to adopt.

9. For the immediate purpose of deciding on the issue of partition, the members of the Legislative Assemblies of Bengal and the Punjab will sit in two parts according to Muslim majority districts (as laid down in the Appendix) and non-Muslim majority districts. This is only a preliminary step of a purely temporary nature as it is evident that for the purposes of final partition of these provinces a detailed investigation of boundary questions will be needed; and, as soon as a decision involving partition has been taken for either province. A Boundary Commission will be set up by the Governor-General, the membership and the terms of reference of which will be settled in consultation with those concerned. It will be instructed to demarcate the boundaries of the two parts of the Punjab on the basis of ascertaining the contiguous majority areas of Muslims and non-Muslims. It will also be instructed to take into account other factors. Similar instructions will be given to the Bengal Boundary Commission. Until the report of a Boundary Commission has been put into effect, the provisional boundaries indicated in the Appendix will be used.
SIND
10. The Legislative Assembly of Sind (excluding the European members) will at a special meeting also take its own decision on the alternatives in paragraph 4 above.

NORTH-WEST FRONTIER PROVINCE
11. The position of the North-West Frontier Province is exceptional. Two of the three representatives of this Province are already participating in the existing Constituent Assembly. But it is clear, in view of its geographical situation, and other considerations, that, if the whole or any part of the Punjab decides not to join the existing Constituent Assembly, it will be necessary to give the North-West Frontier Province an opportunity to reconsider its position. Accordingly, in such an event, a referendum will be made to the electors of the present Legislative Assembly in the North-West Frontier Province to choose which of the alternatives mentioned in paragraph 4 above they wish to adopt. The referendum will be held under the aegis of the Governor-General and in consultation with the provincial Government.

BRITISH BALUCHISTAN
12. British Baluchistan has elected a member but he has not taken his seat in the existing Constituent Assembly. In view of its geographical situation, this province will also be given an opportunity to reconsider its position and to choose which of the alternatives in paragraph 4 above to adopt. His Excellency the Governor-General is examining how this can most appropriately be done.

ASSAM
13. Though Assam is predominately a non-Muslim Province, the district of Sylhet, which is contiguous to Bengal is predominately Muslim. There has been a demand that, in the event of the partition of Bengal, Sylhet should be amalgamated with the Muslim part of Bengal. Accordingly, if it is decided that Bengal should be partitioned, a referendum will be held in Sylhet district, under the aegis of the Governor-General and in consultation with the Assam Provincial Government, to decide whether the district of Sylhet should continue to form part of the Assam Province or should be amalgamated with the new Province of Eastern Bengal, if that Province agrees. If the referendum results in favour of amalgamation with Eastern Bengal, a Boundary Commission with terms of reference similar to those for the Punjab and Bengal will be set up to demarcate the Muslim majority areas of Sylhet district and contiguous Muslim majority areas of adjoining districts, which will then be transferred to Eastern Bengal. The rest of the Assam Province will in any case continue to participate in the proceedings of the existing Constituent Assembly.

REPRESENTATION IN CONSTITUENT ASSEMBLIES
14. If it is decided that Bengal and the Punjab should be partitioned, it will be necessary to hold fresh elections to choose their representatives on the scale of one for every million of population according to the principle contained in the Cabinet Mission’s Plan of 16th May 1946. Similar elections will also have to be held for Sylhet in the event of its being decided that this district should form part of East Bengal. The number of representatives to which each area would be entitled is as follows:
15. In accordance with the mandates given to them the representatives of the various areas will either join the existing Constituent Assembly or form the new Constituent Assembly.

ADMINISTRATIVE MATTERS

16. Negotiations will have to be initiated as soon as possible on administrative consequences of any partition that may have been decided upon:

   (a) Between the representatives of the respective successor authorities about all subjects now dealt with by the Central Government, including Defence, Finance and Communications.
   (b) Between different successor authorities and His Majesty’s Government for treaties in regard to matters arising out of the transfer of power.
   (c) In the case of provinces that may be partitioned as to administration of all provincial subjects such as the division of assets and liabilities, the police and other services, the High Courts, provincial institutions, &c.

THE TRIBES OF THE NORTH-WEST FRONTIER

17. Agreements with tribes of the North-West Frontier of India will have to be negotiated by the appropriate successor authority.

THE STATES

18. His Majesty’s Government wish to make it clear that the decisions announced above relate only to British India and that their policy towards Indian States contained in the Cabinet Mission Memorandum of 12th May 1946, remains unchanged.

NECESSITY FOR SPEED

19. In order that the successor authorities may have time to prepare themselves to take over power, it is important that all the above processes should be completed as quickly as possible. To avoid delay, the different Provinces or parts of Provinces will proceed independently as far as practicable within the conditions of this Plan, the existing Constituent Assembly and the new Constituent Assembly (if formed) will proceed to frame Constitutions for their respective territories: they will of course be free to frame their own rules.

IMMEDIATE TRANSFER OF POWER

20. The major political parties have repeatedly emphasised their desire that there should be the earliest possible transfer of power in India. With this desire His Majesty’s Government are in full sympathy, and they are willing to anticipate the date of June 1948, for the handing over of power by the setting up of an independent Indian Government or Governments at an even earlier date. Accordingly, as the most expeditious, and indeed the only practicable, way of meeting this desire. His Majesty’s Government propose to introduce legislation during the current session for the transfer of power this year on a Dominion status basis to one or two successor authorities according to the decision taken as a result of this announcement. This will be without prejudice to the right of Indian Constituent Assemblies to decide in due course whether or not the part of India in respect of which they have authority will remain within the British Commonwealth.

FURTHER ANNOUNCEMENTS BY GOVERNOR-GENERAL

21. His Excellency the Governor-General will from time to time make such further announcements as may be necessary in regard to procedure or any other matters for carrying out the above arrangements.

2. Viceroy Meets Indian Leaders

Extract from minutes of meeting, 3 June 1947
IOR, L/P & J/ 10/81, Acc. No. 3653, NAI

...MR. LIAQUAT ALI KHAN said that he fully agreed that it might be possible to control the speeches of subordinate leaders. In addition, however, there should be a request for restraint on the part of ‘super leaders’—for example Mr. Gandhi at his prayer meetings. It was true that Mr. Gandhi preached ‘non violence’, but that many of his speeches could be taken as an incitement to violence.
THE VICEROY said that he had talked to Mr. Gandhi the previous day. He had laid before Mr. Gandhi, very clearly, the steps which had led up to the present situation. He had pointed out those steps taken as a result of Mr. Gandhi’s advice; those points on which it had not been possible to follow his advice; and the reasons for this. Mr. Gandhi’s emotions were those of a man who had worked, lived and prayed for the unity of India. He (The Viceroy) thoroughly understood and responded to Mr. Gandhi’s feelings. He had made clear to Mr. Gandhi the immense effect which the speeches at his prayer meetings had. It had been Mr. Gandhi’s day of silence but he had written a friendly note at the meeting. It was to be hoped that he would help the situation. He always made it very clear that he was not even a 4 anna member of the Congress Party.

MR. KIRPALANI said that he was surprised at Mr. Liaquat Ali Khan’s complaint, as all that Mr. Gandhi said was in advocation of non-violence. All members of Congress held to the idea of a united India. All Mr. Gandhi’s activities were non-violent.

THE VICEROY said that he was ready to agree with this if Mr. Gandhi’s speeches were analysed carefully. But surely the emotion engendered by Mr. Gandhi, particularly in the more unintelligent people, was to the effect ‘this partition is wrong; we must resist it; we must not give in’.

SARDAR PATEL said that he considered that, once the decision was taken, Mr. Gandhi would accept it loyally.

THE VICEROY said that he too was sure that Mr. Gandhi would re-emphasize the principle of non-violence, whatever the decision might be.

MR. LIAQUAT ALI KHAN pointed out that Mr. Gandhi had recently employed words to the effect that the people should not look to the Viceroy and the leaders for a decision. They were told instead to ‘do as they felt’. That kind of statement was bound to give an indication to the people that they should go ahead on their own lines if they personally felt that India should not be divided.

SARDAR PATEL thought that no such inference could be drawn.

MR. JINNAH gave his view that, if Mr. Gandhi went on with his present line, the impression would be created that the people should not submit to what was being decided by the present conference. He himself did not think that Mr. Gandhi’s intention were bad. They might be of the best, but in fact the language which he had adopted recently had insinuated that the Muslim League were going to get Pakistan by force. MR. JINNAH said that he had deliberately refrained from criticizing Mr. Gandhi in public.

THE VICEROY said that he thought that this particular subject had now been ventilated sufficiently. On the one hand he accepted the special position of Mr. Gandhi; but on the other he was sure that the Congress Leaders would see the point of what had been said and use their best endeavours....

3. ‘Watershed Dividing the Past from the Future’

Text of broadcast by Jawaharlal Nehru, 3 June 1947

IOR, L/P & J/10/81, Acc. No. 3653, NAI

Friends and comrades, nearly nine months ago, soon after my assumption of office, I spoke to you from this place. I told you then that we were on the march and the goal had still to be reached. There were many difficulties and obstacles on the way, and our journey’s end might not be near, for that end was not the assumption of office in the Government of India, but the achievement of the full independence of India and the establishment of a cooperative Commonwealth in which all will be equal sharers in opportunity and in all things that give meaning and value to life.

Nine months have passed, months of trial and difficulty, of anxiety and sometimes even of heartbreak. Yet, looking back at this period with its suffering and sorrow for our people there is much on the credit side also for India has advanced nationally and internationally, and is respected today in the councils of the world.

In the domestic sphere something substantial has been achieved though the burden on the common man still continues to be terribly heavy and millions lack food and clothes and other necessaries of life. Many vast schemes of development are nearly ready, and yet it is true that most of our dreams about the brave things we were going to accomplish have still to be realised. You know well the difficulties which the country has had to face—economic, political and communal.

These months have been full of tragedy for millions and the burden on those who have the government of the country in their hands has been great indeed. My mind is heavy with the thought of the sufferings of our people in the areas of disturbance, the thousands who are dead and those, especially our womenfolk, who have suffered agony worse than death. To their families and to innumerable people who have been uprooted from their homes and rendered destitute, I offer my deep sympathy and assurance that we shall do all in our power to bring relief. We must see to it that such tragedies do not happen again. At no time have we lost faith in the great destiny of India which takes shape even though with struggle and suffering. My great regret has been that during this period owing to excess of work I have been unable to visit the numerous towns and villages of India as I used to do to meet my people and to learn their troubles at first hand.

Today, I am speaking to you on another historic occasion when a vital change affecting the future of India is proposed. You have just heard an announcement on behalf of the British Government. This announcement lays down a procedure for self-determination in certain areas of India. It envisages on the one hand the possibility of these areas seceding from India; on the other it promises a big advance towards complete independence. Such a big change must have the full concurrence of the people before effect can be given to it, for it must always be remembered that the future of India can only be decided by the people of India and not by any outside authority, however friendly.

These proposals will be placed soon before representative assemblies of the people for consideration. But meanwhile the sands of time run out and decisions cannot await the normal course of events. While we must necessarily abide by what the people finally decide we have to come to certain decisions ourselves and recommend them to the people for acceptance. We have, therefore, decided to accept these proposals and to recommend to our larger committees that they do likewise.

It is with no joy in my heart that I commend these proposals to you, though I have no doubt in my mind that this is the right course. For generations we have dreamt and struggled for a free and independent united India. The proposals to allow certain parts to secede, if they so will, is painful for any of us to contemplate. Nevertheless, I am convinced that our present decision is the right one even from the larger viewpoint.

The united India that we have laboured for was not one of compulsion and coercion, but a free and willing association of a free people. It may be that in this way we shall reach that united India sooner than otherwise and that she will have a stronger and more secure foundation. We are little men serving great causes, but because the cause is great, something of that greatness falls upon us also. Mighty forces are at work, work in the world today and in India, and I have no doubt that we are ushering in a period of greatness for India. The India of geography, of history and traditions, the India of our minds and hearts cannot change. On this historic occasion each one of us must pray that he might be guided aright in the service of the motherland and of humanity at large.

We stand on a watershed dividing the past from the future. Let us bury that past in so far as it is dead and forget all bitterness and recrimination. Let there be moderation in speech and writing. Let there be strength and perseverance in adhering to the cause and the ideals we have at heart. Let us face the future not with easy optimism or with any complacency or weakness, but with confidence and a firm faith in India. There has been violence—shameful, degrading and revolting violence—in various parts of the country. This must end. We are determined to end it. We must make it clear that political ends are not to be achieved by methods of violence now or in the future.

On this the eve of great changes in India we have to make a fresh start with clear vision and a firm mind, with steadfastness and tolerance and a stout heart. We should not wish ill to anyone, but think always of every Indian as our brother and comrade. The good of the 400,000,000 of India must be our supreme objective. We shall seek to build anew our relations with England on a friendly and cooperative basis, forgetting the past which has lain so heavily upon us. I should like to express on this occasion my deep appreciation of the labours of the Viceroy, Lord Mountbatten, ever since his arrival here at a critical juncture in our history.

Inevitably on every occasion of [sic] our great leader, Mahatma Gandhi, who has led us unfalteringly for over a generation through darkness and sorrow to the threshold of our freedom, to him we once more pay our homage. His blessing and wise counsel will happily be with us in the momentous years to come as always. With firm faith in our future I appeal to you to cooperate in the great task ahead and to march together to the haven of freedom for all in India. Jai Hind.

4. Final Decision by League Council

Text of broadcast by M.A. Jinnah, 3 June 1947
IOR, L/P & J/10/81, Acc. No. 3653, NAI

I am glad that I am afforded the opportunity to speak to you directly through this radio from Delhi. It is the first time, I believe, that a non-official has been afforded an opportunity to address the people through the medium of this powerful instrument, direct, to the people on political matters. I hope that in the future I shall have greater facilities to enable me to voice my views and opinions, which will reach directly you, life warm rather than in the cold print of the newspapers.

The statement of Government, embodying the plan for the transfer of power to the peoples of India, has already been broadcast and will be released to the press and will be published here and abroad tomorrow morning. It gives the outline of the plan for us to give it our most earnest consideration. We have to examine it coolly, calmly and dispassionately. We must remember that we have to take the most momentous decisions and handle grave issues facing us in the solution of the complex political problem of this great sub-continent inhabited by 400,000,000 people.
The world has no parallel of the most onerous and difficult task which His Excellency had to perform. Grave responsibility lies particularly on the shoulders of Indian leaders. Therefore we must galvanise and concentrate all our energies to see that the transfer of power is assisted in a peaceful and orderly manner. I most earnestly appeal to every community and particularly to Moslems in India to maintain peace and order. We must examine the plan, its letters and spirit and come to our conclusions and take our decisions. I pray to God that at this critical moment He may guide us to enable us to discharge our responsibilities in a wise and as statesmanlike manner having regard to the sum total of the plan as a whole.

It is clear the plan does not meet in some important respects our point of view, and we cannot say or feel that we are satisfied or that we agree with some of the matters dealt with by the plan. It is for us to consider whether the plan is presented to us by His Majesty's Government should be accepted by us as a compromise or a settlement. On this point I do not wish to prejudge. The decision of the Council of the All India Moslem League which has been summoned to meet on Monday, 9th June, and its final decisions can only be taken by the conference according to our constitution precedence and practice.

But so far as I have been able to gather, on the whole reaction in the Moslem League circle in Delhi has been hopeful. But for us the plan has got to be very carefully examined in its pros and cons before a final decision can be taken. I must say that I feel that the Viceroy has battled against various forces very bravely—and the impression that he has left on my mind is that he was actuated by the highest sense of fairness and impartiality, and it is up to us to make his task less difficult, and help him, as far as lies in our power in order that he may fulfil his mission of the transfer of power to the peoples of India in a peaceful and orderly manner.

Now that the plan has been broadcast already, and makes it clear in paragraph eleven that a referendum will be made to the electorate of the present Legislative Assembly in the N.W.F.P., who will choose which of the two alternatives in paragraph four they wish to adopt. The referendum will be held under the aegis of the Governor-General in consultation with the Provincial Government. Hence, it is clear that the verdict and the mandate of the people of the Frontier Province will be obtained as to whether they want to join the Pakistan Constituent Assembly or the Hindustan Constituent Assembly. In these circumstances I request the Provincial Moslem League of the Frontier Province to withdraw the employment of peaceful civil disobedience which they had perforce to resort to, and I call upon all the leaders of the Moslem League and the Mussalmans generally to organise our people to face this referendum with hope and courage, and I feel confident that the people of the Frontier will give their verdict by a solid vote to join the Pakistan Constituent Assembly.

I cannot but express my appreciation of the sufferings and sacrifices made by all classes of the Mussalmans, and particularly the great part that the women of the Frontier played in the fight for our civil liberties. Without a personal bias, and this is hardly the moment to do so, I deeply sympathise with all those who have suffered and those who died and whose properties were subjected to destruction, and I fervently hope the Frontier will go through this referendum in a peaceful manner, and it should be the anxiety of everyone to obtain a fair, free and clean verdict of the people of the Frontier.

Once more I most earnestly appeal to all to maintain peace and order. Pakistan Zindabad.
5. ‘Country’s Fate Decided’

Extract from an editorial in Aaj, 3 June 1947

Today all countrymen are looking towards Delhi. The coming announcement is awaited expectantly. If it does not succeed in mitigating the violence and if the British follow a policy of appeasement towards the League then there will be no doubt that the British Government’s intentions are not right and it is still up to its usual tricks....

As far as the relations of India and Britain are concerned, today the basic question should not be whether India will remain one or will be partitioned. Indians will themselves decide this question right now or after the departure of the British. We just want the British to leave. They need not worry about how we will live or what we will do after their departure....

In these circumstances the Congress should not try to satisfy the League and should remain firm on the question of united India. It should make it very clear that whatever may happen the Congress is not going to accept Pakistan in any form.

If the Mountbatten plan is helpful in solving this question, only then could it be considered. If this does not happen and if, laying emphasis on the question of partition, it tries to satisfy the Muslim League, then it should be clearly understood that the motives of the British remain suspect....

6. Jinnah Accused of Making a Partisan Broadcast

Letter from Vallabhbhai Patel to Louis Mountbatten, 3 June 1947

Durga Das (Ed.), Sardar Patel Correspondence (hereafter SPC), Vol. IV, p. 125

New Delhi

My dear Lord Mountbatten,

I am deeply distressed at the abuse by Mr. Jinnah of the hospitality extended to him by All India Radio and his breach of the rules of broadcast which, as you are aware, are almost as inviolable as the laws of nature. I had not seen the script before the broadcast but I notice later that not only did he depart from the script but he has also committed a sacrilege by making a political partisan and propagandist broadcast. Had I known it in time I would certainly have prevented him from turning All India Radio into a Muslim League platform by not only justifying a movement which has resulted in so much bloodshed and destruction of property but also by appealing to Frontier voters to vote according to League persuasion.

I fully realise that you yourself did not expect, or had not sufficient notice to prevent it but I am really disappointed that he should have taken undue advantage of the courtesy and consideration extended to him by you, particularly on a solemn occasion when India and the whole world were watching us. I only hope that its consequences will not be equally mischievous and that he stood before the listeners self-condemned.

Yours sincerely,
Vallabhbhai Patel
7. ‘Crisis in the League Camp’
A cartoon in The Hindustan Times, 4 June 1947

CRISIS IN THE LEAGUE CAMP

Lord Mountbatten announces his plan for the partition of India and the transfer of power on August 15, 1947.

—June 4, 1947.

8. “‘Divide India’ Plan Announced: Churchill Supports Govt. on Partition Scheme”
Daily Worker, 4 June 1947

India is to be carved up into several separate states within the next twelve months, and the new Hindustan and Pakistan will become dominions of the British crown.

This historic announcement was made by Mr. Attlee to a crowded House of Commons yesterday. It marked the end of 89 years of direct British rule in India, which it was hoped, he said, to leave within 12 months.

The Cabinet Plan was warmly approved by Mr. Churchill and the Tories. Mr. Gallacher (Com.) declared that the solution was unsatisfactory.

According to Mr. Attlee, all communities in India appeared likely to accept the proposals, which concede practically everything demanded by the Right-Wing leadership of the Moslem League.
It is believed that in line with the partition, the Indian Army will be divided along religious lines, though the mixture of Sikhs, Moslems and Hindus in the same units will make this operation extremely difficult.

Legislation will be introduced in the present session of Parliament along the lines of the Prime Minister’s declaration.

It is pointed out that Hindustan or Pakistan will be able to renounce their Dominion status later on if they wish.

Details of the plan follow closely the forecast made by the Daily Workers’ New Delhi Correspondent on Monday.

CO-OPERATION

Hopes Failed

Making his statement Mr. Attlee said it had been hoped the major parties would cooperate in evolving a Constitution acceptable to all concerned.

This hope had not been fulfilled.

‘The British Government’ said Mr. Attlee, ‘wish to make it clear that they have no intention of attempting to frame an ultimate Constitution.

‘That is a matter for the Indians themselves.’

It was not the intention to interrupt the work of the existing Constituent Assembly, but the wishes of the people of certain areas would be consulted whether or not they would co-operate.

These included Bengal and the Punjab, where the provincial Legislative Assemblies without their European members would be asked to meet in two parts.

One would represent the Moslem majority and the other the rest of the province.

PARTITION

New Elections

They would decide whether or not partition was to be made.

Similar steps would be taken in Sind, and if the decision went in favour of partition new elections would be held.

British Baluchistan would also be given an opportunity to reconsider its position and agreements would have to be negotiated with the North-West Frontier tribes.

The Government’s policy toward the Princes’ States remains unchanged.

CHURCHILL AID

No Opposition

The opposition, said Mr. Churchill, would not oppose any Bill to confer Dominion status which might be presented by the Government.

They would reserve their full freedom to discuss points of detail.

The two conditions foreseen at the time of the Cripps Mission—agreement between the Indian parties and a period of Dominion status—seemed to have been fulfilled by the Government’s proposals, he said.

‘A carve up is not a very desirable solution’ said Mr. W. Gallacher (Com. West Fife). ‘I am the more suspicious of the solution because Mr. Churchill, who had a bad record in connection with India gives it such support’.
9. ‘Pakistan Zindabad: India to Be Divided into Two Sovereign States’
Excerpts from a report in Dawn, 4 June 1947

New Delhi, Tuesday.—The British Government’s new plan which was broadcast by the All India Radio at 7-10 p.m. on Tuesday following the Viceroy’s broadcast, finally concedes the Muslim demand for Pakistan, but provides for the ‘notional’ partition of Bengal, the Punjab and Assam. Specific procedure is laid down [as to] how and by which [means, the] future of the Muslim majority and non-Muslim majority areas is to be decided.

10. Jinnah and Congress Ought to Cooperate
M.K. Gandhi’s speech at a prayer meeting in New Delhi, 4 June 1947
CWMG, Vol. LXXXVIII, pp. 73–6

BROTHERS AND SISTERS,

You know that I am coming straight after meeting the Viceroy. Not that I had gone to get anything out of him. Nor had he called me in order to give me anything. Actually the talk between us was not even finished. But I excused myself saying to the Viceroy that I would not like to miss the prayer time so long as it was humanly possible. He appreciated my point and said that our talk could be resumed later.

I told you that we would not give even an inch of land as Pakistan under coercion. In other words, we would not accept Pakistan under the threat of violence. Only if they can convince us by peaceful argument and if their proposal appeals to our reason would we concede Pakistan.

I cannot say that this whole question has been treated rationally. The Congress Working Committee insists that they have not granted anything under duress. They are not scared because so many people are dying and property is being destroyed. It is not at all true that they have accepted defeat in the face of violence. I should not take them to be a timid lot. They have taken this course because they realized that it was not possible to get round the Muslim League in any other way. For, once the Muslim League agrees to at least some points, our task becomes easy. In short, the Working Committee claims that they have accepted the vivisection of the country into Pakistan and Hindustan not out of fear but after realizing the prevailing situation.

We do not wish to force anyone. We tried hard. We tried to reason with them, but they refused to come into the Constituent Assembly. The League supporters kept on arguing that they were afraid of the Hindu majority in the event of their joining the Constituent Assembly.

What can the Viceroy do under these circumstances? He says that whatever happens, he wants to quit by June, 1948. He would not like to stay beyond that date even if you wanted him to. He says they must grant full independence to India. Why he insists on this is another matter. You might say that the British have now become helpless because they are no longer the mighty power they used to be. We would want them to be a first-class power even now. It is true that they have tyrannized over us for 150 years. I also know that we have been fighting against their might for the last 32 years. But I never make an enemy of my opponent. I would still appeal to God and pray that He should be good to them. And whatever God does would be just.

I shall speak no more now about God’s infallible power. Let us realize this much that every human being is prone to commit mistakes. Hindus, Muslims and Sikhs all can say that the Muslims have committed a great blunder. But on what ground can we absolve ourselves of the blame? Let us leave it to God to pass judgment.

I would say this much, that it was wrong on their part to demand Pakistan. But they can think of nothing else. They say that they can never live where the Hindus have a majority. They are harming themselves by making this demand and I pray to God to save them in time from any harm coming to them. When my own brother, whether he follows my religion or some other religion, wants to harm me I cannot aid him. Even though he may not be aware that he is harming me. If I do it I am sure to be crushed between the two stones of a quern. Why should I not keep my own millstone apart?

And now I want to reassure you about the British. I want to tell you, not in the light of the Viceroy’s speech but in the light of my own talks with him, that the Viceroy has had no hand in this decision. The decision has been taken jointly by all the leaders in consultation. The leaders say that for seven years they insisted on the unity of India. The Cabinet Mission also gave a reasonable award. But the League went back on its assurance and now this course has had to be adopted. They (the Muslims) have got to come back to India. Even if Pakistan is formed, there will have to be mutual exchange of populations and movements to and fro. Let us hope that co-operation endures.

But now that this decision has been taken, should I say that we should all rebel against the Congress? Or, should I ask the Viceroy to intervene? The Viceroy says that he never wanted partition. Jawaharlal says on behalf of the Congress that he too does not approve of it. But they have all been obliged to accept it, not for fear of violence, but because of the circumstances. For the Hindus, the Sikhs, all say that would live in their own homelands, not in the Muslims’. The Hindus are willing to be under Sikh rule because they say the Sikhs never compel them at the point of the sword to bow before the Granth Saheb.

Master Tara Singh came to see me today. I told him that he should not remain a lone soldier, but become equal to one and a quarter lakh. The Sikhs should learn to die without killing and then the history of the Punjab would be completely changed. With it the history of India would change too. The Sikhs are few in number, but they are brave. That is why the British are afraid of them. If the Sikhs became truly brave, rule of the Khalsa would spread throughout the world.

I told you these things to relieve you of your pain. You should not feel sorry at heart that India is to be divided into two. The demand has been granted because you asked for it. The Congress never asked for it. I was not even present here. But the Congress can feel the pulse of the people. It realized that the Khalsa as also the Hindus desired it. You have lost nothing, nor have the Sikhs, nor the Muslims. The Viceroy has already stated in his speech and he has also assured me that when we approach him united this decision would be revoked. Only our united decision would be accepted. The Viceroy says that his task is merely to see that the British carry on their task honestly till power is transferred and then quit in peace. The British people do not wish that chaos should reign after they quit this country.

I had already said that they should not worry about anarchy. I am, after all, a gambler. But who would listen to me? You do not listen to me. The Muslims have given me up. Nor can I fully convince the Congress of my point of view. Actually I am a slave of the Congress, because I belong to India. I tried my best to bring the Congress round to accept the proposal of May 16. But now we must accept what is an accomplished fact. The wonderful thing about it is that we can undo it any time we want.
In the end, I would only say that you had better forget the Viceroy. It pains me that instead of having direct talks we should negotiate through the Viceroy as mediator. It does us no credit that the League should convey its point to the Viceroy who in turn conveys it to the Congress and the Congress again conveys its own view to the Viceroy. But what can be done when the Muslim League does not agree to anything at all? The Congress agrees to something and the Sikhs have joined the Congress. And the Viceroy then had to request Jinnah Saheb day and night to climb down a little. Thus he found this solution. Even while doing all this the Viceroy says that he is wondering what the League would say and what the Congress would say. But he goes on doing his work in the name of God. Let us therefore have trust in his honesty so long as we have no experience to the contrary.

But I would like to request Jinnah Saheb, implore him, to have direct talks with us at least now. Whatever has happened is all right, but now let us sit together and decide about the future. Let him forget all about the Viceroy now, and let him invite us to come to any understanding he wishes to have, so that it is in the interest of all of us.

11. Protest against the Creation of a Muslim State

Telegram from V.D. Savarkar to L.B. Bhopatkar, President, All India Hindu Mahasabha, 4 June 1947

S.S. Savarkar and G.M. Joshi (Eds), V. D. Savarkar—Historic Statements, p. 198

The following telegram has been sent by Veer Savarkarji to Sjt. L.B. Bhopatkar, President, All India Hindu Mahasabha, on the eve of the Meeting of the Working Committee and All India Committee of the Hindu Mahasabha, to be held in New Delhi on 6th, 7th and 8th June 1947.

‘MY PERSONAL VIEW IS THAT WE MUST VIGOROUSLY PROTEST AGAINST THE CREATION OF A MOSLEM STATE INDEPENDENT OF THE CENTRAL INDIAN STATE. WE WILL NOT SIGN WILLINGLY THE DEATH WARRANT OF THE INTEGRITY OF HINDUSTHAN. IF BRITAIN THRUSTS PAKISTAN ON US PER FORCE THAT IS ANOTHER MATTER. WE WILL IN SPITE OF IT CONTINUE OUR STRUGGLE TO RE-ANNEX THESE REVOLTING MOSLEM PROVINCES. SECONDLY TO REGISTER OUR PROTEST AGAINST PAKISTAN A BLACK DAY SHOULD BE OBSERVED THROUGHOUT INDIA ON A CONVENIENT DATE. THIRDLY PAKISTAN OR NO PAKISTAN THREE HINDU MAJORITY PROVINCES MUST BE FRAMED IN BENGAL, PUNJAB AND SINDH IN THE INTEREST OF AKHAND HINDUSTHAN ITSELF. LIKE THE DISTRICT OF SYLHET THE FOUR HINDU MAJORITY DISTRICTS IN SIND MUST BE ALLOWED TO DECIDE BY THEIR OWN SEPARATE VOTING TO JOIN HINDUSTHAN. FOURTHLY THE CONGRESSITE MINISTRY MUST BE CALLED UPON NOT TO ACCEPT PAKISTAN AND BETRAY THE HINDU ELECTORATE EVEN IF THEY CANNOT PREVENT BRITAIN FROM THRUSTING IT PER FORCE ON US.

LONG LIVE AKHAND HINDUSTHAN.

12. Suggestions regarding India Plan from Calcutta Muslim League

Letter from Raghib Ahsan to M.A. Jinnah, 4 June 1947

CORONATION HOTEL, DELHI

My dear Quaid-i-Azam,

1. I submit a few suggestions regarding the India Plan. The loss of Calcutta and Assam is terrible.
The Indian Act puts a legal and moral obligation on the British to protect the Tribal and Excluded Areas. If we get the Excluded Areas of Santhal Parganas, Khasi and Jaintia Hills, Lushai Hills and Naga Hills, we will get room for expansion.

2. The Calcutta Delegation is still waiting.

Yours sincerely,

RAGHIB AHSAN
Calcutta District Muslim League

Enclosure

SUGGESTIONS RE(GARDING) INDIA PLAN RIGHT OF OPTION FOR THE EXCLUDED AREAS OF ASSAM AND SANTHAL PARGANAS AND CHHOTA NAGPUR

1. Tribals and Backward Classes of the Excluded Areas of Chhotanagpur and Santhal Parganas (bordering Murshidabad) and of Assam, e.g. Khasi and Jaintia Hills, Garo Hills, Naga Hills, Lepcha Hills, Lushai Hills, etc., should be given the option to join either Pakistan or Hindustan.

   Firstly because the Tribals are not Hindus and Congress does not represent them and they are demanding separate electorate and they know that the tribes can get it only through the League.

   Secondly because the Excluded Areas and the Partially Excluded Areas under the Government of India Act, 1935, are special charge and obligation of the British Government, Britain owes it to the poor Tribals and civilization to give them protection. They are not chattels to be transferred to Hindustan without giving them any voice in the determination of their fate. The British Government is morally, constitutionally and legally bound to protect them. The Tribals are a trust of civilisation.

   The Tribals are 30 per cent in Assam. The Tribals are in majority in Santhal Parganas and Chhotanagpur. The Tribals hold strategic points on the frontier of East Pakistan.

2. All the Hindu Members of the Bengal Assembly, both of East and West Bengal, be given the right to decide by their combined collective majority vote to keep Bengal united and to prevent provincial partition.

   Similar right should be given to the non-Muslim Members of the present Punjab Assembly as a whole to rescind the proposed partition of the Punjab.

3. Every thana or sub-division be given the right of opting into and opting out of the contiguous Pakistan or Hindustan areas according to votes of the majority of its adult population. Every five years any contiguous thana or union [may] exercise this option.

4. Amritsar is a Muslim-majority town and Muslim sub-division and is a trump card of the League. Never surrender Amritsar town and the sub-division of Amritsar to the Sikhs who regard it as their Mecca.

   Try to effect bargain and compromise on the basis:
FREE CITIES OF AMRITSAR, DELHI, AJMER AND CALCUTTA
That Amritsar be declared a free city with equal Muslim and non-Muslim representation provided Delhi, Ajmer, Aligarh and Calcutta are [also] declared free cities with similar rights of equality for Muslims.

MINORITIES RIGHTS COMMITTEE
5. Minorities Rights Committee of the Pakistan Constituent Assembly should negotiate with the Hindustan Constituent Assembly for safeguarding the rights of Muslim minority in Hindustan. The Muslims of Hindustan be recognized as the co-nationals of Pakistan Muslims.

13. ‘The Hindustan–Pakistan Plan’
Editorial from The Tribune, 4 June 1947
The pride of Asoka and Akbar and of good and true Britons themselves, the unity of India, has been planned to be broken. The A.P.I.’s forecast of H.M.G.’s final Indian scheme implies the drowning of the joint disruptionist efforts of British Imperialism and Muslim Leaguism with success. India is to be split up. Our motherland, after centuries of able-bodied and full-blooded existence, is to be dismembered. And even we, who have been confirmed believers of the unity of India and enraptured dreamers of its future greatness and glory as a united liberated country, accept it as an alternative to continued communal wrangling and throat-cutting and confusion and chaos. But we must say that it offers no permanent solution of our problem and we must add that in our long and chequered history to-day is the worst and saddest day.

The position is this: British Imperialist Chanakya’s gain and we fools lose all along the line. They are in mortal dread of the deepening and expanding influence of the Soviet Union and Communism. They wanted to create a buffer State between them and the progressive forces in India and link up their reactionary Muslim allies in Egypt, Turkey, Arab countries, Persia and Afghanistan with those in this country. Pakistan would serve this particular purpose of theirs admirably. That is why the British plan is designed not only to bring it into existence, but also to strengthen it by compelling the Pushto-speaking area to join it. It was said that the Frontier Province would be permitted to become an independent and sovereign unit, if it so liked. But that choice has been denied to it. It must now join either Pakistan or Hindustan.

The decision made by the Pathans against Pakistanism on the occasion of the last general elections has been ignored and a referendum has been planned to be held. The influence of the British scheme, which has been cleverly framed and the force of the Jehadist fanaticism, which has been sedulously fomented and the pressure of the geographical factor, which has been greatly complicated by the Kashmir Government’s boycott of the Constituent Assembly—if Kashmir joined it the Frontier Province could be linked up with Hindustan through it—would be relied upon by British Imperialists to tilt the scale in favour of Pakistanists. It was not for nothing that the Frontier Governor, Sir Olaf Caroe, with the help of his loyal lieutenants patronised and pushed forward Pakistanism in his territory. Again it was not for nothing that the Viceroy included the debated and discredited Frontier Leaguer Mr. Abdur Rab Nishtar, among the leaders whom he invited to his house on Monday. The importance given to Mr. Nishtar shows that the British Pakistan scheme hinges on the frontier. If the Frontier Province elects to join Hindustan, Pakistan will practically collapse. But British Imperialists are confident that nothing of the kind will happen. The die is loaded. About the east they care a hang.

there is no Pakistan in the eastern region, but just a shadow of it—which indeed dismembered Bengal will be—they need have no sleepless night. They do not require a buffer State against a hamstrung Japan and a rehabilitated China.

The most interesting part of the scheme is the one which embodies the offer of Dominion Status to Hindustan and Pakistan. The followers of the Puran Swaraj ideal must now be saying to themselves:

If we had accepted Dominion Status at the very outset, the British Labour Government might have seen to it—separate electorates, bureaucratic machinations and League mischief notwithstanding—that the unity of India was not impaired and the future greatness and glory of the country were not imperilled. Then a different type of scheme might have emerged from British statesmen’s cogitations and conferences.

Now, Mr. Jinnah will jump at the Dominion Status offer. It is an open secret that he assured his British friends that he cannot contemplate any sort of Pakistan without some sort of British prop. As the Emperor or Fuehrer of Pakistan he may indeed invite the British Government to station troops in his territory and British businessmen to exploit his people in return for political gains. The leaders of Hindustan may hate doing any such thing. But with hardly any Navy to keep off foreign sharks and hardly any Air Force to keep off foreign vultures and with Pakistan perpetually stirred by vengeful feelings or expansionist ambitions as their neighbour, can they reject with contempt the idea of continued association with the British Commonwealth, which will mean many valuable political and military advantages to them. India is to be divided and divided on a Dominion Status basis and let alone Jinnahites, who have no abhorrence for Dominion Status, Congressmen, in whose nostrils it stings, might have no escape from it.

H.M.G.’s plan shatters everybody’s dream and yet everybody is reported to have accepted it. As we have said, we and the average man and woman accept it in a spirit of resignation. It is obviously an evil lesser than perpetual tension, murder and arson and therefore more acceptable. With its acceptance by the Congress, Muslim League and Panth the hatchet may be buried. But how long will it remain buried? The vision of a united India at the head of the comity of nations, fondly conjured up by the Congress, is gone. But the Congress is stated to have accepted the plan. It will perhaps live in the hope that the circumstances will gradually change and ultimately make it a reality. Mr. Jinnah will have nothing but ‘truncated, mutilated and moth-eaten Pakistan’. With Bengal cut up and Calcutta allotted to the non-Muslims what he will get in Eastern India will be sheer frustration. And in Western India too he will lose important and substantial chunks of earth. But he is also reported to be satisfied. His satisfaction is presumably founded on the conviction that what he gets now can be used as a springboard for Pakistan sallies and conquests after the consolidation and development of League Fascist power.

To Sikh solidarity the Mountbatten scheme will be what a knife is to a cheese piece—it will cut through it easily and definitely. And if the Panth accepts it, it probably does so in the belief that its appeal to the Boundary Commission will succeed. Even if that appeal does not succeed, it need not be tremulous, for another appeal lies—the appeal to cold steel. And every one of these parties appears to harbour the feeling that the State forces leaning towards it can be used by it to its advantage after their release from British overlordship. The party’s criticisms of the British Government’s Hindustan-Pakistan scheme, which may form the principal contents of the acceptance messages, will reflect how unpredictable the future is. All parties have undoubtedly got out of the cul-de-sac in which they had been colliding against one another and met on common ground and found peace. But the common ground, on which they have met, is no real peace. We still hope that the widely desired miracle will happen and all the Indian political parties will get together and march together to the goal of a Sovereign United Indian Republic.

(The above leader is based on the A.P.I.'s forecast of H.M.G.'s Scheme published on Monday.)

14. 'Division of India Is Better than Forced Union'

Dawn, 5 June 1947

RANGOON, Wednesday.—Burma will review its demand for complete independence if the Indian States of Pakistan and Hindustan accept Dominion Status, an informant told the Associated Press of America today.

U. Aung San, Deputy Chairman of the Governor’s Executive Council, discussed with his Cabinet colleagues the import of the British plan.

In a statement to journalists, Tin Tut, a Cabinet member described the Indian plan as ‘a triumph for the Viceroy and a clear sign that Indian leaders are now prepared to accept one another’s views for peace in the country’.

Tin Tut stated that the proposed division of India was ‘better than a forced union’.—APA.

15. Hope for Peaceful Nation-Building

Letter from Rajendra Prasad to Dr Sachchidananda Sinha, 5 June 1947

Valmiki Choudhary (Ed.), Dr. Rajendra Prasad: Correspondence and Select Documents, Vol. VII, pp. 46-7

1 Queen Victoria Road
New Delhi

My dear Sir,

I have not heard from you for a long time nor have I myself written to you. The reason undoubtedly has been great preoccupations. You must have followed the trend of events and the latest position. Things have been moving at a tremendous speed and by the middle of August next, we shall have what may be regarded as complete independence, albeit over a reduced area. Considering all that was happening, and viewing the future, we felt that there was no escape from division unless we were determined to have a long period not only of uncertainty and instability but of strife, conflict and even bloodshed spread over large tracts of the country. I do not know if that is altogether eliminated. That will depend upon the attitude of the League and its supporters. We hope, however, that we shall be able to carry on the great constructive work of nation-building in an atmosphere of peace, if not of goodwill. The task is tremendous but we have tried our best to clear the ground for undivided concentration on its performance and fulfillment. There are many difficult and intricate problems still to be solved. The division of assets and liabilities, of services, of armed forces and settlement or agreement regarding transport and communication, coinage and tariffs, legations and other international organisations in foreign countries and in this country are some of the obvious points which will require detailed examination and adjustment. The settlement of boundaries is another complicated affair. Above all, the task of framing a Constitution, which will be more or less of a permanent nature, still remains to be tackled, although we have been working in the Constituent Assembly for six months now.

By passing an Act giving the status of Dominion and thus legalizing and placing on a statutory basis the position of the Government in each of the two Dominions, the British Parliament will be in a sense providing for the interim period until our Constitution is framed. I was at one time thinking whether it would be necessary for us to pass a sort of a temporary Constitution, taking as our basis the Government of India Act, 1935, with appropriate amendments to enable us to run the administration until our permanent Constitution is framed. Along with that, we would be also working on the permanent Constitution so that even if the permanent Constitution is not ready when power will be transferred in June 1948, we would have a temporary Constitution to go by. But it seems they have relieved us of that burden and we shall have not only power transferred to us by August next, some 10 months before the date which they had fixed for it, but also a statute by which we could go until a permanent Constitution is framed.

In all this, we have not all that we wanted. That was not possible but I trust that, on the whole, we have got a workable plan on which we can proceed. I am feeling that Pakistan will soon discover the utility of a union with India and will reconsider its position, and when that happens, we shall all be happy, but whether it comes about or not, we have to go ahead with the present plan.

I am keeping well. I hope you are also well.

Yours affectionately,

Rajendra Prasad

16. Demand for Complete British Withdrawal

Letter from Sheelbhadra Yajee to J.B. Kripalani, 5 June 1947

All India Congress Committee Papers (hereafter AICC Papers), File No. G-56, Part I/1947, NMML

Patna, June 5.—Sheelbhadra Yajee, member of the All India Congress Committee has given the notice of the following resolution to be moved in the ensuing session of the All-India Congress Committee which is going to be held at Delhi on the 14th and 15th of June, 1947.

Rejection of the British award

‘The latest award of the British Government as announced on the 3rd of June, 1947 knocks at the very bottom of the triumphant Indian nationalism and seeks to disrupt and destroy India’s national unity which has been the rock-bottom of the freedom struggle of the Congress all these sixty years and more. The All-India Congress Committee believes that it is a diabolical imperialist plan to reconquer resurgent India and perpetuate her enslavement which otherwise was coming to its natural end’.

‘The A-I.C.C. also believes that so long as the third power in the form of British ruling class exists in India to encourage centrifugal tendencies, a settlement among the major Indian communities is well-nigh impossible of fruition. The essence of freedom lies in the right of the people themselves to freely shape their own destiny without the interference or dictation of any alien power and consequently the freedom loving people of India which can not tolerate that their fate which affects their whole future should arbitrarily be decided by the British Government as has been done in the latest British announcement’.
‘The A-I.C.C. affirms its faith in a free and united India based on the free and voluntary cooperation of the Indian people themselves, which will not be forthcoming till the Britishers stay here’.

‘In the circumstances, the A-I.C.C. rejects outright the latest British award and asks the Congress members in the Interim Government to withdraw their cooperation forthwith in protest against this infliction of national humiliation on the Indian people. This meeting of the A-I.C.C. also emphatically demands the immediate withdrawal of the British authority from India and calls upon the Indian people to forge necessary sanction to enforce this national demand’.

17. ‘Not Yet Too Late!’
Extract from an editorial in The Tribune, 5 June 1947

...While the Congress dream of a united India and the League dream of an ‘untruncated and unmutilated’Pakistan have been shattered, the very existence of the Panth has been placed in jeopardy. No wonder that a statement issued by the Panth leader, Master Tara Singh, from New Delhi says: ‘The British Government’s plan is unsatisfactory and disappointing. Even His Excellency the Viceroy in his broadcast, has felt obliged to admit that the solidarity of the Sikhs will be impaired.’ The Panth has now pinned its faith on the strictly impartial and just operation of the Boundary Commission, on which it will be incumbent to take into consideration not only the communal proportions in the population but also the communal shares in the income-tax, land revenue and property and the religious and geographical factors, for including more districts in the separated Eastern Punjab. But unless the demarcation line is drawn along the Chenab the Panth’s solidarity cannot be maintained....Let the Punjabis—Hindus, Muslims and Sikhs—pause and ponder. It is not yet too late. It is still in their power to save the Punjab and the rest of India. Does not Para 3 of H. M. G.’s proclamation say: ‘...Nor is there anything in this plan to preclude negotiations between communities for a united India?’ The Punjabis possess that magic wand by waving which they can dispel the clouds gathering on the Indian horizon and introduce sunshine in the whole country. Will they not use it? Para 7 says: ‘Before the question as to the partition is decided, it is desirable that the representatives of each part should know in advance which Constituent Assembly the province as a whole would join in the event of the two parts subsequently deciding to remain united. Therefore, if any member of either Legislative Assembly so demands, there shall be held a meeting of all members of the Legislative Assembly (other than Europeans) at which a decision will be taken on the issue as to which Constituent Assembly the province as a whole would join, if it were decided by the two parts to remain united.’ Some Punjabi M.L.A. should immediately demand that an early meeting of the Assembly should be held to decide which Constituent Assembly the Punjab should join in case it decided to remain united and that meeting should emphatically say: ‘The existing Constituent Assembly.’ Then Para 6 will become operative. It says: ‘The members of the two parts of each Legislative Assembly sitting separately will be empowered to vote whether or not the province should be partitioned. If a simple majority of either part decides in favour of partition, division will take place and arrangements will be made accordingly.' In the interests of their beloved province, as also in those of their beloved motherland the members of the two parts of the Assembly should separately give the same verdict: 'The Punjab shall remain united.' This patriotic verdict will render the proposed Hindustan-Pakistan referendum in the Frontier Province redundant.... If the Punjabis decide to remain united and join their countrymen at New Delhi in the common constitution-making work, the necessity on the part of the Pathans to reconsider their position will disappear and great and grand vistas will open up—the vision of a united, regenerated and revitalized India leading humanity to the goal of brotherhood, peace and prosperity will become a reality. Let the Punjabis, who are known all over the country for their sturdy common sense, be true to their reputation and rise to the occasion.

18. Indian Socialists Oppose Any Compromise Based on Country’s Division

Jayaprakash Narayan’s speech at a public meeting in Gorakhpur, 5 June 1947

I wish to make it clear today that Indian Socialists were always opposed to any compromise at the price of the country’s division. At present there are only three parties, who knows tomorrow there may be more. There is the rumour that the Pakistan area might like to remain within the British Commonwealth. The Britishers’ stay in any part of the country is perilous enough and it will not help us in achieving complete independence.

The question arises what are we to do then? Will Hindus and Muslims organize themselves separately for domination of each other? If we think on those lines there would be internecine civil strife not only between Hindustan and Pakistan, but in every village of the country. It is true that barbarities and brutalities practised in the Punjab know no parallel in the history of the world, but we must exercise caution and give the coolest possible consideration to the problems.

Our future lies only in making the masses of Hindustan realize that the basic problems of food, clothing, wages, etc., are the same, be they in Hindustan or in Pakistan and are not connected with communities and that their solution also is one and the same, that is elimination of exploitation when tension dies down. We should realize that programmes for the peasantry and labour of both Hindustan and Pakistan will be the same if we are able to convince our masses that their future can only be safeguarded by a non-communal, political and economic programme. But we must do so by peaceful means. The use of violence will land our country in utter chaos and reactionary forces may gain an upper hand.

I have had discussion with Mahatma Gandhi on these problems recently, and it is highly probable that he may assist us in our endeavours in this direction. If this happens what we might achieve in years, we can achieve in months.

I call upon all youngmen and particularly educated ones to join our ranks and become soldiers for establishing an ideal society in this country.
19. ‘Mandal Congratulates Jinnah on Unique Success in Achieving Pakistan’

Dawn, 5 June 1947

‘There has been at last a way out of the Indian deadlock and the long drawn-out controversy over the much agitated question of the division of India into Hindustan and Pakistan has come to an end’, says Mr. J.N. Mandal, in a statement to the press.

‘I offer my congratulations and felicitations to Qaed-e-Azam Mohammad Ali Jinnah and the Muslim League on their unique success in achieving their most cherished goal of Pakistan’. Mr. Mandal continued: ‘It is really rejoicing to know that the millions of Muslims of India have been liberated from the age-long domination of the Hindus. Muslim India will surely remember with gratitude and admiration the achievements of their great liberator—Qaed-d-Azam.’

He continued: ‘Although I am sanguine that the Scheduled Caste people living in Pakistan, whose number will be a little over 8 millions, will get adequate political rights and privileges, about 52 millions of them who will be in Hindustan under the Congress regime will be deprived of what little political powers they are enjoying now. Their future will rest on the tender mercies of the Congress leaders. As the day of final verdict on the attitude of the Congress and the British Government towards the Scheduled Castes has not yet reached, I must remain content for the time being with the expectation that good sense will eventually prevail on the Congress leaders like Mr. Gandhi and Pandit Nehru to do the same justice to the Scheduled Castes as they will receive at the hands of Mr. Jinnah in Pakistan.’

Untouchables Liberator

‘It will be extremely unfortunate and ignoble if the name of Mr. Gandhi, who has been declared to the world as the champion of the cause of the untouchables of India, goes down in history as one opposed to the legitimate hopes and aspirations and the onward march towards social and political emancipation of the sixty million untouchables, while the name of Mr. Jinnah, who does not profess the same faith and religion with the Scheduled Castes, will go down in history as their liberator.’

In another statement, the Law Member says:

‘It is unfortunate that the Viceroy has been so much obsessed with the views expressed by the Congress leaders that he has not cared a fig for the opinion of the Scheduled Castes people,’ said the Hon’ble Mr. J.N. Mandal, Law Member in the Interim Government and Scheduled Castes leader, in an interview to the Orient Press of India, giving his reaction to the plan for the transfer of power to Indian hands, announced by the British Government yesterday.

Continuing, he said: ‘In coming to a decision for the division of both the provinces, Bengal and the Punjab, the Viceroy has totally ignored the wishes of the Scheduled Castes1, especially in the district of Jalpaiguri and Khulna in West Bengal, where the Scheduled Castes form a major part of the Hindu community. The views of the Scheduled Castes in these districts should have been ascertained by a referendum or plebiscite, before they were allotted to West Bengal.

‘It is my firm conviction that the partition of the Punjab and Bengal will not be so much harmful to the Muslims as it will be to the non-Muslims. The division of Bengal would very adversely affect the interests of the Scheduled Castes and would equally be detrimental to the interests of the caste Hindus in that province. Bengali Hindus are destined to become non existent in the course of a few years. The Scheduled Castes in Pakistan, I am confident shall get their full political rights and privileges which their unfortunate brethren will be deprived of in Hindustan.’

Concluding, he said:

‘The Scheduled Castes in the Punjab have been almost equally divided into two parts and hence the partition of the Punjab will affect adversely the interests of the Scheduled Castes more than that of any other community in the province. While in Western Punjab they will get their full share in every field of life they will be deprived of the same in East Bengal’. — O.P.I.

1 A week earlier, other Scheduled Caste leaders from Bengal had expressed themselves in support of partition of Bengal and Punjab at the Bagerhat (Khulna) Partition Conference held on 28 May and attended by a large number of Scheduled Caste people. Ambedkar, too, had come out in support of partition of the provinces. Hindustan Standard, 30 May 1947.

20. Reactions to the Partition Plan from Assam Government

Extract from a letter from Akbar Hydari to Louis Mountbatten, 5 June 1947

GOVERNMENT HOUSE, SHILLONG

2. I am very sorry that what in recent months seemed inevitable, namely the rejection of the Cabinet Mission Plan, has in fact happened and the unity of India has at least for some time to come been broken; but my Ministers, while regretting in principle the partition of India, were relieved at the rejection of the Cabinet Mission Plan with the possibility of Assam having to join a Group with Bengal. They, both Hindu and Muslim (these belong to the Jamiat-ul-Ulema), were pleased with the Announcement and Assam’s share in it. Mookerjee, B.K. Das, Abdul Rashid and Abdul Matlib Majumdar, who all belong to the Surma Valley, are confident that Sylhet will elect to remain with the rest of Assam. Medhi and the others do not mind if Sylhet goes to Eastern Bengal; in fact I suspect that Medhi would be quite pleased if it did. I put the chances at fifty-fifty.

21. Gandhi Explains Why He Does Not Rebel against Congress

CWMG, Vol. LXXXVIII, pp. 84–5

...I would like to ask Jinnah Saheb, now that his slogan of Pakistan Zindabad has been realized, why he still goes to Lord Mountbatten. Why does he not go to the Congress? Why does he not invite Badshah Khan and Dr. Khan Saheb? Why does he not show them what a pretty rose Pakistan is?

But I have been receiving complaints about Pakistan. I have a letter today which says that a British firm will be going to Lahore to manufacture arms. It is also being said that the Muslim League has decided to remain in the Commonwealth, and that it will confine itself to the Dominion Status.

The Congress has committed no crime in accepting Dominion Status. It has accepted it provisionally, with a view to putting an end to the British rule immediately. It will opt for complete independence as soon as the Constitution is ready. Will the Muslim League still keep to the Dominion Status? Both our countries should have uniform Constitutions. Both have declared complete independence as their objective. Then it also becomes Jinnah’s duty to have nothing less than complete independence. That duty cannot be performed by indulging in mutual fights. All the Hindus got tired of persuading him, and they conceded Pakistan in the hope that at last they would have peace.

One may ask why I allowed such a thing to happen. But should I then insist that the Congress should do everything only after consulting me? I am not so mad. And, if I rebel against the Congress, it will mean that I am rebelling against the whole country, because the Congress belongs to the whole country. I shall do such a thing only when I find the Congress has gone over to the capitalists. But so far, I think, the Congress is working for the poor. It may be following a path different from mine and have its mind fixed on armaments, an army and factories but I have to convince them by arguments, not by resorting to a fast....

22. ‘U.K. Muslims Happy over India Plan’
Extracts from a report in Dawn, 6 June 1947

LONDON, Wednesday.—Mr. Saheb Dad Khan, President of the London Branch of the Muslim League, in a statement to the Press today said: ‘Muslim Residents of Great Britain are happy that our conception of two nations has been accepted and we have regained our independent status after a lapse of nearly two centuries. I am not quite happy over the details which seem to placate the Hindus, but I will appeal to Muslims in this country and India to maintain peace, stand firm and united and leave the details to Mr. Jinnah and our ‘Parliament’ which is meeting in Delhi on Monday next.’....

Mr. Z.A. Suleri, Secretary of the Indian Muslim Information Office, said: ‘Acceptance of the principle of partition by the British Government is smashing victory for the Muslim League. Two nations have now been established and the most important thing is that we can send our representatives to the United Nations and the Indian Muslim point of view will get full representation in world affairs. Indian Muslims will also be able to make their contribution to the future of the world.—Reuters.’

23. Bengal Reacts to the 3 June Plan
Extracts from a note by K.M. Ahmed, Director of Publicity, Bengal, 6 June 1947

IOR, R/3/1/156, Acc. No. 3470, NAI

With the exception of Dr. Shyama Prosad Mukherjee, the organiser of Bengal Partition Movement, and Mr. J.N. Mandal, Law Member in the Interim Government, the first reactions to H.M.G.‘s Plan have been voiced by the lesser leaders of both communities. The list includes Dr. S.C. Roy Choudhury, Mayor of Calcutta, Mr. D.N. Sen, President, Bengal National Chambers of Commerce, Mr. S.C. Majumdar, Managing Director of Hindustan Standard and Ananda Bazaar Patrika, Mr. S.K. Roy Choudhury, ex-Mayor and Vice-President of Bengal Provincial Hindu Mahasabha, Mr. A.C. Chatterjee, President, New Bengal Association, Mr. Muazzamuddin Hossain, Education Minister, Messrs. S.A. Salim and Abdul Karim, Parliamentary Secretaries and Mr. Habibulla Bahar, Officiating Secretary of Bengal Provincial Muslim League.

Dr. Shyama Prosad Mukherjee disapproves of the plan from the stand-point of India as a whole but prefers it to the Cabinet Missions scheme. In his view this has happened due to what he calls ‘unpreparedness of Hindus’. The acceptance of the principle of partition of Bengal and Punjab, in the opinion of Dr. Shyama Prosad Mukherjee, ‘marks out first victory’.

Mr. J.N. Mondal had congratulated Mr. Jinnah on the achievement of Pakistan where the rights of Scheduled castes will be protected. He, however, apprehends that the remaining 52 millions ofScheduled castes will lose ‘what little political powers they are enjoying now’, as they will be in Hindustan.

Mr. S.C. Roy Choudhury, the Mayor of Calcutta, has expressed disappointment at the division of India and has hoped for ultimate re-union. His emphasis is on a united Bengal within an Indian Unit. Mr. D.N. Sen, President of Bengal National Chambers of Commerce, has expressed the hope that the Boundary Commission would not fail to take note of the need for realignment of provincial and district boundaries on linguistic basis.

The statements issued by Muslim League representatives strike similar notes of satisfaction and dissatisfaction at the plan. On the eve of his departure to Delhi to attend the meeting of the All-India Muslim League Council, Mr. Habibulla Bahar acting Secretary of Bengal Provincial Muslim League, has thus commented on the Plan: ‘Though general reaction among the Muslims is hopeful, we do not like to conceal our disappointment’. According to Mr. Bahar, ‘There was no justification for inclusion of Khulna, Jalpaiguri, Darjeeling, Purnia, 24-Pargs. and Goalpara in non-Muslim areas without referendum’. Further in his statement Mr. Bahar has hoped that Bengali Hindu Congress leaders would for the last time try for a settlement before it is late. Messrs. S.A. Salim and Abdul Karim, Parliamentary Secretaries, have expressed satisfaction at the achievement of Pakistan. Mr. Muazzamuddin Hosain, Education Minister, has however, sounded a note of disappointment. He says, ‘H.M.G.’s announcement leaves an impression as if the Muslims of Bengal are being punished for asking a separate sovereign State as their homeland’. He adds, ‘We demand the whole of Bengal as a separate sovereign State as it is an economic unit by itself and any division of the unit will result in creation of uneconomic units and economic disaster’. Arguing that Calcutta’s prosperity has been built by jute growers of North and East Bengal, Mr. Hosain asserts that the position will be absurd on the face of it.

Broadly speaking opinions expressed in the press may be summed up as follows:

1. Papers with Congress leanings accept the Plan but regret the division of India.
2. Muslim League Papers are satisfied with the plan inasmuch as it gives freedom to Muslims. They are, however, perturbed over the financial and economic disabilities of ‘Truncated Pakistan’ in the East.
3. One section of the Hindu Press criticizes the Plan as a triumph of Britain’s diplomacy.
4. A Communist paper has suggested the revival of the Bose-Suhrawardy formula for retaining the unity of Bengal.
5. There is general recognition of the sincerity of Lord Louis Mountbatten.

Papers of Amrita Bazar Patrika and Hindusthan Standard school betray a tendency of avoiding discussion on Consequences of Dividing Bengal. The main purpose of their editorials, as at present, appears to be (1) to study and interpret the Plan, (2) to point out the disabilities of ‘Truncated Pakistan’ and (3) to hope for the ultimate unification of India.

Expressing regrets for the division of India Amrita Bazar Patrika (pro-Congress) fixes the responsibility for this division on Mr. Jinnah at whose ‘bidding’, says the paper, the British agreed to partition the country in spite of the wishes of the people. It argues that on the analogy of the procedure adopted for dividing Bengal and Punjab, Central Legislature should have been asked to say whether India should be divided or not. The paper further protests against referendum in N.W.F. Province. It demands that there should be no Ulsters in India and says that ‘there must be no pockets of British influence anywhere in this sub-continent either in Pakistan or any of the States’. The paper recognizes that the partition of Bengal is a settled fact and pleads that all concerned should vote for partition of the province.

_Hindusthan Standard_ thinks that Nationalist leaders have taken a wise decision in approving the plan as the best available solution in the prevailing circumstances. It hopes that division of India cannot, in the very nature of things, last for ever.

Some of the Hindu papers are still inclined to accuse the British. Thus according to _Nationalist_ the Plan is a triumph of British diplomacy. The paper distrusts the British professions that partition of India would be decided upon by the Indians themselves. It says, ‘The monstrosity of such a suggestion can hardly escape any unbiased political observer or a student of the past history of British rule in India. Only an unabashed hypocrite can utter such travesty of truth’. Commenting on the speech made by Prime Minister Attlee _Nationalist_ says, ‘Such belated attempts by false propaganda to shift the responsibility of partition in India on the Indian themselves will not deceive anybody’. This paper also accuses the Indian leaders, especially Pandit Nehru, for agreeing to a plan for the division of India and for playing into British hands. It calls upon the people to assert themselves and says that no surrender at the top can be binding on the people.

_Eastern Express_ says, ‘Mr. Jinnah’s ambitions stand fulfilled, thanks to the conspiracy and patronage of imperialist Britain[s] in and outside India, and the weakness of the British Labour Government to break this unholy alliance.’

_Morning News_ (pro-Muslim League) points out that Muslim India has reason to be disappointed at the truncated Pakistan vouchsafed to it under the Plan. But it adds that the Muslim will prefer to be poor but free rather than continue in his servitude and helplessness resulting from British methods of administration in India established by Empire-builders and their non-Muslim adherents in the country.

_Star of India_ voices the same opinion. The paper refers to some inequities in the Plan and pleads for the recognition of the rights of Scheduled castes. Referring to the truncated form of Pakistan the paper says that it would not be fair to put the entire blame on the architects of the plan. ‘A good portion of it ought to go to our friends of the Congress who did not favour a partition as between brothers but were actuated by the policy of grabbing as much for Hindustan as they could with any show of plausibility.’

_Ittehad_, a pro-Muslim League Bengali paper, refers to the victorious achievement of the Muslims but adds that the Imperialist British government and the Caste-Hindu Congress have stabbed the Muslim nation in the back. The paper is, however, convinced that with the help of people of other oppressed nations ‘this despicable conspiracy’ will be baffled.

_Swadhinata_, a Communist organ, strongly asserts that Lord Mountbatten’s announcement spells utter destruction for each race and community in India. This paper has pleaded for the revival of the Bose-Suhrawardy Pact for independent united Bengal.

In the opinion of _Statesman_ the Plan ‘is not the best arrangement that could be wished for, but it is perhaps the best that could be made.’ The paper advises optimists to look forward to the two fragments of hitherto unified India, spontaneously finding their way back to some amicable recombination for the good of the common people in each. To allow this last chance of fulfillment, the paper advises the Hindus to watch their step and warns them against wrong moves. Deprecating the tendencies to control Pakistan’s foreign relations and policies, the paper says, ‘Anything remotely suggestive of it on Hindustan’s part should be promptly checked, in these times of exceptionally delicate transition, if prospects of eventual Indian reunion are not to be extinguished for ever.'

24. ‘Joshi Indicts Britain on Partition’

Dawn, 6 June 1947

BOMBAY, Wednesday.—The British Government’s statement was a ‘desperate imperialist offensive against the freedom movement of the country,’ said Mr. P.C. Joshi, General Secretary of the Communist Party of India, in a statement today.

‘Having intensified Congress League differences to the pitch of a growing civil war, imperial policy has reached its culminating point in putting the onus for partition on Indian shoulders.’

Mr. Joshi said the ‘British planned partition will not mean peace, but more fratricide immediately.’

‘The Mountbatten plan,’ Mr. Joshi added, ‘blessed by his leader Churchill, is thus not a real quit-India plan but one that seeks to keep as many economic and military controls in its own hands as possible.’ The Communist Party’s effort in the coming months would be directed towards the single aim of ‘defeating at all costs the new and dangerous imperialist manoeuvres.’—API.

25. Secession, Not Partition

Extract from a letter from Jawaharlal Nehru to M. Chalapathi Rau, 6 June 1947

New Delhi

My dear Chalapathi,

I have not met you for a long time. I feel we should meet and have a talk about the new situation that has arisen. When it is convenient to you I should like you to come here.

2. There are one or two matters which, I think, should be stressed repeatedly. There is far too much talk of the partition of India. This may be correct in a way. The real position is and should be described as a secession from India of a certain part. India, in theory and in practice, nationally and internationally continues as an entity except for the fact that some parts go out of it. This aspect of the question should be frequently brought out as many people appear to be misled. The present Government of India continues even after the secession. The fact that there will be Dominion Status then does not affect the concept of India. Our Ambassadors, Ministers, etc., continue to represent us. Our membership of the U.N.O. continues as before.

3. On the other hand Pakistan has to be built up from the foundations. It may develop its external relations as it likes. Thus the existing State of India continues with necessary adaptations due to the secession. The Pakistan State, however, is something new which gradually takes shape.

4. Because of this viewpoint, which I think is correct and certainly desirable, I think it is unfortunate to talk of the division of India into Pakistan and Hindustan as if two new States came into existence.

6. There is some confusion in people’s minds about our accepting Dominion Status, and some people imagine that it is giving up of the claim for complete independence. This is absurd. The Constituent Assembly has declared our objective to be a sovereign independent republic. The British Government have announced their intention to quit completely by June 1948. Neither of these is affected by the proposed new arrangement. Dominion Status now or in August is really something more, during this interim period, than what the British said they would do. It is an ex-gratia gift, no doubt advantageous in the long run to Britain because it increases her prestige and helps to produce goodwill for her in India. It does not take away from our objective of independence which we shall, no doubt, declare when our new constitution is complete. Meanwhile the new arrangement is obviously helpful to us in many ways as an interim arrangement.

Yours sincerely,

Jawaharlal Nehru

26. Sindhi Muslims Pleased with 3 June Plan

Letter from Francis Mudie to Louis Mountbatten, 7 June 1947

GOVERNMENT HOUSE, KARACHI

Dear Lord Mountbatten,

I had hoped to be able to give you an account of the reaction to HMG’s latest statement, but I find it extraordinarily difficult to do so. The local press has been particularly futile. I think that it was just too much for them. Also they are not quite certain which way the cats of their respective High Commands are to jump. My general impression however is that the Sindhi Muslim is very pleased. Pirzada Abdus Sattar issued quite a good statement urging acceptance. There is some pro forma criticism of the partition of the Punjab and of Bengal, but Sindhis care little about the Punjab and nothing at all about Bengal.

The Hindus are, I think, resigned, a little hurt that the Congress has done so little for them. Their press is less truculent. I attach some significance to the fact that one or two prominent Hindus who had previously refused nomination to the Sind University Senate, in response to Congress agitation against it, have now accepted. There is some movement of bank balances to “Hindustan” and a certain fall in the value of real property in Hindu areas. There is also vague talk about emigration to Hindustan. Some Gujeratis, Kachchis and other non-Sindhis may retire to their original homes, but I don’t expect many real Sindhis to leave the Province. There are signs of a growing feeling that the proper line for the Hindus in Sind is to co-operate with and not to continue to fight the League on all fronts. There are some, though not very definite, signs of a response.

The British community and the Muslims are very pleased about Dominion Status. They recognise that it is the only possible alternative to the civil war, which everyone, until your latest announcement, assumed to be inevitable.

The great thing is that the tension is over. Some decision has been arrived at and the main political parties have agreed or at least acquiesced. No one is prepared to go back to the old state of affairs.
27. Congress Must Reconcile with Idea of Pakistan
M.K. Gandhi’s speech at a prayer meeting in New Delhi, 7 June 1947
_CWMG_, Vol. LXXXVIII, pp. 97–100

BROTHERS AND SISTERS,

I am telling you in all humility that it is improper to obstruct the prayer. I cannot stop the prayer. It will go on. But I find that every day there is some complaint or other. It pains me very much.

I want to continue with the same subject. I want to talk about what is in the air, because great pressure is brought to bear on me. I am being told that while I kept on opposing [the idea of Pakistan] till the Viceroy’s declaration and saying that we would not agree to anything under coercion, now I have become silent. I am being rightly told so. I must confess that I am not happy about this decision. But many things happen in the world that are not to our liking; and yet we have to put up with them. We have to put up with this thing in the same manner.

A newspaper has said that even now the All-India Congress Committee can reject the proposal. I also think that the All-India Congress Committee is fully entitled not to accept the proposal. But we should not suddenly oppose the Congress to which we have been loyal all this time and which has earned a reputation in the world and has also done so much work.

A large number of _Sanatanists_ believe in the monster of untouchability and think they are following their religion by clinging to this monster. But God alone will judge who is a true _Sanatanist_ amongst us. Similarly, if the Congress also puts a religious garb on irreligious practices, we shall have to wind up the organization. Who can kill the Congress? We shall all lay down our lives before it. We will do it not by committing suicide. But we shall continue to fight it and will not bow down to it till we bring it on to the correct path or die ourselves. But we shall do this when we find that the Congress is deliberately erring. In my view, it is not committing a deliberate blunder at present. Nor has it committed deliberate blunders earlier. Had it functioned so far by accepting irreligion as religion, it would not have risen to the position it has today.

It is not correct to say that the Congress Working Committee should have consulted the A.I.C.C. before taking this decision. The Working Committee cannot function if it has to wait for consultation at every step. Subsequently the A.I.C.C. can challenge the Working Committee and vote it out to form a new one.

When I was working regularly for the Congress and enjoyed the right to enforce the constitution of the Congress, I had said during one of the discussions that we could not collect 300 or 1,000 members of the A.I.C.C. every now and again. It would be impossible for the Working Committee to function in this manner. Of course, later on, the A.I.C.C. can certainly call for an explanation from the Working Committee. It can also remove the Committee by passing a vote of no confidence so as to make sure that it will not repeat its mistakes, and form a new Committee.

Supposing the Working Committee issued a _hundi_ of several lakhs in the name of the A.I.C.C. which the latter did not approve. The A.I.C.C. would still have to honour the _hundi_, but it could certainly dissolve the Working Committee and elect a new one so that the mistake was not repeated. In fact in such a situation the A.I.C.C. ought to take such a step.

The same rule applies in the case of its decision regarding the Hindustan-Pakistan affair. The division is now a _fait accompli_. But there is still ample scope for adjustment. We can make or unmake at will Hindustan and Pakistan or whatever else we call it. True, the Congress does not represent the League. But as I have looked at the Congress I feel that the Congress represents the entire Indian nation. On that account the Congress can never say that because the Muslims have done great harm to us it will also harm them in return.

The Congress would not remain what it is if it did that. Even when I went to the Round Table Conference I had said that I would do them a good turn even if they harmed us.

The Congress wants to establish democratic rule. It will not act against the interests of the Princes either. But the Princes will be able to retain their position only when they become the trustees of their subjects like the Raja of Oundh. A small principality like Oundh will be long remembered only because it bowed to the sovereignty of the people. As against this, the State of Kashmir, although it is worth millions, will be wiped out if it does not listen to the voice of its people. Hitherto these rulers may have behaved arrogantly with the support of the British authorities; but now they must realize that their authority issues from the people. I made a special mention of Kashmir because at the moment our eyes are fixed on it. But this applies to all the native States.

I talked at such length in order that the Congress may continue to belong to the people and the people may continue in the Congress fold, i.e., they may follow the Congress discipline. If we start having internal strife, the Congress is going to perish. If you do not approve of the decision of the Working Committee you can frankly say so at the next A.I.C.C. meeting. I have no intention to attend the session. I will attend if I am invited. But who is going to listen to my solitary voice? After all you are the people. You can convey it to the Congress in a civil manner whether or not you approve of what it has done.

Now it becomes the duty of the Congress to give up what has been granted as Pakistan and make its best efforts in the portion that remains with it. Let the people in Pakistan go ahead of the Congress in their efforts to bring progress to their land. If this happens the two can live in amity and happiness.

In the end Gandhiji repeated his appeal to Jinnah Saheb and called upon him to invite the Hindus, Muslims, Parsis and all others to come to a settlement and spare the Viceroy the trouble and the Congress leaders the needless running around. He appealed to Jinnah to build a Pakistan where the Gita could be recited side by side with the Koran, and the temple and the gurudwara would be given the same respect as the mosque, so that those who had been opposing Pakistan till now would be sorry for their mistake and would only sing praises of Pakistan.

28. Hindu Mahasabha Reacts to the Partition Plan

Resolution passed at the All India Committee of the Hindu Mahasabha meeting, 7–8 June 1947

All India Hindu Mahasabha Papers (hereafter AIHM Papers), File No. 162, NMML

The All India Committee of the Hindu Mahasabha met on the 7th June at 5 p.m. and on the 8th June '47 at 2 p.m. Mr. L.B. Bhopatkar presided ...

Dr. S.P. Mookherjee, in his speech, made an appeal, for accepting the main resolution which was carried by large majority. The resolutions [sic] run as follows:—

I. The codinal [sic] principle of the Hindu Mahasabha [has] always been the unity and integrity of India and under no circumstances could the Hind Hindu Mahasabha be a party to the vivisection of India in any shape or form. This Committee deeply deprecates that the Indian National Congress, after having given solemn assurance to the Hindu electorates that it stood by the unity of India and would oppose the disintegration of India, has betrayed the country by agreeing to the partition of India without a referendum. The Committee declares that Hindus are not bound by this commitment of the Congress. It reiterates that India is one and indivisible and that there will never be peace unless and until the separated areas are brought back into the Indian Union and made integral parts there of.

The Committee considers it its duty to warn the Hindus and unless they are more careful and vigilant in future and take immediate and effective steps to build up a real and powerful Hindu State, not only will their interests under the new proposed arrangements be unsafe but they may lose even what is left to them of India.

II. While this Committee recognize that the partition of Bengal and Punjab will rescue millions of Hindus and Sikhs from the clutches of the Muslim League and which was called for and inevitably irrespective of the integrity or division of India, it is strongly of the opinion that the tentative allocation of territories of the Hindus and Muslims in Bengal and Hindu-cum-Sikhs in the Punjab is unjust and unfair to the non-Muslims and strongly urges that in view of the economic, religious and cultural interests of the communities concerned the Hindus and Sikhs in Punjab and Hindus in Bengal are entitled to claim considerable additional territories.

III. This Committee demands that the same principle on which referendum is proposed in respect of Sylhet in Assam, be adopted with respect to Hindu majority areas in Sind and the Chittagong Hill Tracts in East Bengal.

This Committee urges the Constituent Assembly to devise a constitution of India with strong and powerful Centre with residuary powers vested in the centre, with joint electorates and no weightage in any shape or form. This Committee advises and appeal[s] to the Indian States to join the Indian Union without any delay.

IV. In view of the fact that the principle of partition has been accepted both for Bengal and the Punjab and the communal Ministry in Bengal has been pursuing a policy detrimental to the culture and interests of the Hindus, this Committee urges the Viceroy to immediately dissolve the League Ministry in Bengal and to promulgate Section 93 of the Government of India Act pending the appointment of two Regional Ministries, without which the free exercise of suffrage on the partition issue will be difficult.

Inasmuch as millions of Hindus and Sikhs will remain outside Indian Union, it will be the sacred duty and responsibility of this union, and indeed, of every Hindu living in Hindustan, to afford effective protection to them. It should be definitely declared that any torture or oppression of the Hindus in Hindu minority areas, shall be treated as an act of hostility against the Indian Union and shall be dealt with as such.

The Committee resolves that the 3rd of July next be observed as a Day of Protest throughout India by holding peaceful Hartal and complete suspension of business and public meetings wherever possible.
29. Congress’ Failure to Uphold ‘Akhand Hindustan’

Letter from the President, Students’ Association, Ghazipur, to J.B. Kripalani, President, Indian National Congress, 8 June 1947
AICC Papers, File No. CL-10/ 1946–7, NMML

New Delhi

Sir,

It is with heart laden with profound sorrow that I, on behalf of the association, proceed to convey to you our stern and bitter feelings over the proposed acceptance of the H.M.G.’s announcement of the June 3 about the vivisection of India by some of the top Congress leaders. In doing so, first of all, it becomes your bounden duty to drop the words, ‘Indian National’ from ‘Indian National Congress’ and to put any other prefix instead, signifying the nature of your organization—would-be. We feel pity to see the masses faith in the Congress shaken beyond measure as a result of the imprudent action of the Congress in the matter of its dealings with the British Plan. We are further devoured by curiosity to see the glory of the Congress crumbling down by deviating from its policy of ‘Akhand Hindustan’ which this national organization had the credit of upholding it till now. Our struggle against the division of India of any sort appears to be proving futile and the value of ‘Akhand Hindustan’ paling into insignificance.

This country, which cannot said to be divisible geographically, socially or economically, is going to undergo a division simply by the constant threats and haughtiness of Mr. Jinnah who seems to be emerging out victorious in his efforts merely by being resolute and determined in his aim without making any sacrifice for the cause of the Muslims. While on the other hand, the Indian National Congress appears to be failing in its aim ignominiously because it struggled hard for a long period of about 60 years, met with a crop of ups and downs and made enormous sacrifices at the altar of country’s freedom. The contrast is striking. I mean to say that the Congress is yielding to empty and unreasonable threats of Mr. Jinnah for the latter’s own interests.

The achievement of Pakistan however truncated means the establishment of an autocratic rule under Mr. Jinnah, who had already said to take the help of the Britishers in his administrative services. Thus the plan makes no contribution at all to the maintenance of peace but with the presence of the imperialist Britishers, it may give rise to the existence of a retaliatory position between Hindustan and Pakistan. That is to say that our cherished idea of the reunion of Hindustan and Pakistan completely falls to the ground. Further a objection may be raised in this connection that with the change of time the Hindus and the Muslims cannot live together but this objection is overruled if we turn back the pages of history where these two communities lived together so happily irrespective of caste, creed or religion. It is only the Britishers who have wrought such a great havoc. It must be the foremost aim of the Indian National Congress to establish a free and undivided India for which it has fought in the past. The strict adherence to this aim will eventually pave the way to success resulting in the attainment of our cherished goal.

Keeping the above facts in view, I, on behalf of the association, most earnestly appeal to you to see that the plan is in no way allowed to be passed by the Congress Working Committee and is rejected outright in the interest of the people of India.

I beg to remain,

Sir,

Your most obedient servant,

Sd/- President, Students’ Association,

Ghazipur.
30. League Council Reacts to 3 June Plan

Resolution passed by the Council of the All India Muslim League held at Delhi, 9 June 1947
IOR, R/3/1/156, Acc. No. 3470, NAI

The council of the All India Muslim League after full deliberation and consideration of the Statement of His Majesty’s Government dated the 3rd of June 1947 laying down the plan of transfer of power to the peoples of India, notes with satisfaction that the Cabinet Mission’s Plan of May 16th, 1946 will not be proceeded with and has been abandoned. The only course open is the partition of India as now proposed in HMG’s Statement of the 3rd June.

The Council of the All India Muslim League is of the opinion that the only solution of India’s problem is to divide India into two—Pakistan and Hindustan. On that basis, the Council has given its most earnest attention and consideration to HMG’s Statement. The Council is of the opinion that although it cannot agree to the partition of Bengal and the Punjab or give its consent to such partition, it has to consider HMG’s Plan for the transfer of power as a whole.

The Council, therefore, hereby resolves to give full authority to the President of the All India Muslim League. Qaid-e-Azam M.A. Jinnah, to accept the fundamental principles of the plan as a compromise and to leave it to him, with full authority, to work out all the details of the Plan in an equitable and just manner with regard to carrying out the complete division of India on the basis and fundamental principles embodied in HMG’s Plan including Defence, Finance, Communications etc.

The Council further empowers the president, Qaid-e-Azam M.A. Jinnah to take all steps and decisions which may be necessary in connection with and relating to the plan.

The Council of the All India Muslim League met on June 9th, 1947, at the Imperial Hotel in New Delhi at 10.30 a.m. under the Presidentship of Mr. M.A. Jinnah. After the recitation of some portions of the Quran by Maulana Abdul Hamid of Badaun, U.P., Mr. Liaquat Ali Khan asked the permission of the House to pass a condolence on the deaths of Begum Mohd. Ali, ... Mr. Ismail.

After this, Mr. Jinnah read out portions of HMG’s plan and said that the plan was being placed before the house so that if the house wanted to accept it, it may do so otherwise not. He added: ‘Those who want to have any points regarding this plan explained, are permitted to put questions’. Whereupon, the representatives from Orissa, the U.P., Bengal and Bombay questioned Mr. Jinnah regarding the powers of the proposed Boundary Commission and regarding the safeguarding of the rights of Muslims in Muslim minority provinces. In reply to these questions, Mr. Jinnah said that he could disclose nothing beyond his personal opinion that the safeguarding of the rights of Muslim minorities would depend upon the future relations between Hindustan and Pakistan.

The house requested Mr. Jinnah to permit the members, if any of them wanted to do so, to move a resolution regarding the acceptance or rejection of the plan. Mr. Jinnah said that the question of moving resolutions and debating upon them did not arise at all. He added that the question before the house was whether it wanted to accept the plan as a whole, and that if the house was agreeable a unanimous resolution, embodying the acceptance of the plan could be accepted by the house. The house agreed to this.
Speeches

Prof. Abdul Rahim (Bengal): He strongly opposed the resolution and said that the plan would ruin the Muslims of India, that as a result of which there could never be any lasting peace in the country, that Muslims would not benefit by it and that the proposed division of Bengal and the Punjab will always give rise to mutual quarrels between Hindus and Muslims. He added that the Eastern Bengal and the Western Punjab would be economically and industrially weak, and that the total income of Western Bengal is three times that of Eastern Bengal and went on to say that the eastern Punjab contained the best districts in the province. He exhorted the Muslims to continue to fight for their original conception of Pakistan and demanded that the plan be totally rejected. He said that the truncated Pakistan, which was being offered now, had been offered by the Congress leaders even four years back and that if the Muslims were willing to accept it now there was no sense in all the bloodshed which had taken place. He wound up his speech by a fervent appeal to the house to reject the plan.

Ghulam Hussain Hidayatulla, Premier of Sind: He dilated upon the existing internecine quarrels in the country and said that Pakistan was being offered in such a truncated form to them that there was no life left in what they were getting and added that from the geographical point of view the best and most prosperous portion of Pakistan had been taken away. He added: I have three main objects before me, on the basis of which I appeal to you to accept this plan: (1) that because of international considerations, the Britishers are quitting India and that they are bound to hand over power to some one before leaving the country. It is clear that after the British had left, we could have battled with an armed and powerful nation and wrested Pakistan, because it is not possible for any power to keep ten million men subdued for any considerable time, but there could be no guarantee that even then you could have obtained the full recognition of your demand even after bloodshed on a much more extensive scale. (2) On a matter of principle you can get only those areas in which Muslims are in a majority. You may acquire these areas either today or tomorrow after a fight. Even in the original resolution demanding Pakistan, it had been laid down that the Muslim majority areas should be included in the proposed Muslim State. This is true that the Pakistan which is being offered to you today is weak but you must remember that you have been acknowledged as a separate nation. Such a nation will be sovereign in its own country, and will solve its own problems. I wish to assure you on behalf of Sind that we have been working very hard to bring about numerous improvements in the province and vast constructive schemes are under consideration, as a result of which our province will soon become prosperous. I would also request that if any of you have any constructive ideas, you may let us know about them. We will rapidly industrialize our country and will provide a haven of refuge to Muslim traders and craftsmen who would choose to migrate into Sind from the Muslim minority provinces. We have removed the consideration of Sindhi or non-Sindhi from our province and we will see that Sind will soon progress far.'

Zahir-ul-Hasan Lari (U.P.): The plan which has been put before us is extremely disappointing. We should never accept it and if we accept it will be a major catastrophe. In our Bombay session, we had rejected the Cabinet Mission’s proposal only because the Congress had opposed grouping and had not accepted it in the sense in which the Cabinet Mission intended it to be implemented. The Congress has thereby insisted that Assam should not be included in the Pakistan and we never wanted that Assam should be separated from Pakistan. When we have once rejected the Cabinet Mission plan on this basis, the question now arises whether today we will get Assam according to HMG’s plan or not. I want to tell the house that not only not we get Assam but also that large portions of the Punjab and Bengal have been divided and they will be lost of [six] Pakistan, which will greatly weaken the proposed new State. In fact, the British Government have not accepted even one of our demands; they have all along tried to placate the Hindus. For instance, in the Gandhi Jinnah talks, in Rajagopalachariar's formula, in Dr Rajendra Prasad's book 'Divided India' a division of the country has been proposed on the same lines which have now been embodied in HMG's proposal. The Pakistan which is being offered to us will be from every point of view so weak that we will find ourselves in serious difficulties.

My second objection is that if on a matter of principle it is correct that Bengal and the Punjab be divided then the Muslims who oppose the Congress Government in Bombay Presidency and the U.P. should be similarly given a separate homeland, because they in numbers far exceed the Sikh community. We undertake to transfer population in such a way that we should establish our majority in all the districts which may be given to us in a divided U.P. The fact remains that the British Government has only tried to please the Congress. When we rejected the Cabinet Mission's proposal, it did not seem to affect the British Government, but as soon as the Congress demanded the division of Bengal and the Punjab, HMG's Government immediately brought out a proposal embodying their demands. This has happened in spite of the fact that some responsible Hindu leaders of Bengal have been agitating to retain the unity of Bengal. The Britishers have, however, chosen to disregard their agitation only because they are anxious to propitiate the Congress. The Muslim nation is being trifled with. If you were willing at last to accept this mutilated Pakistan, I put you the question why did you create so much agitation in the country; you could have arrived at a compromise with the Congress on the basis of what are you willing to accept now. The Britisher has befooled you. What safeguards are there for the protection of the rights of Muslims in minority provinces. Should we now form two Muslim Leagues, one for Pakistan and the other for Hindustan. I declare that the Mussalmans of Hindustan will establish a separate Muslim League and with the strength of the sacrifices on the basis of which they have helped you to get Pakistan, they will protect their rights themselves. I strongly oppose this plan.

Ghulam Ali (Amritsar): I oppose the ideas put forward by my predecessor, Mr. Lari, who is apprehensive about the safeguarding of the rights of Muslim minorities. I can quote the example of our Prophet who entered into even more unequal agreements with the infidels. This was opposed by the Muslims of that period but our Prophet had agreed to the compromise because on the basis of that agreement Muslims had been recognized as a nation. The plan which is before us for consideration should be viewed in the same light. Though this plan is defective and though it contains many features obnoxious to the Muslims, it is good in the sense that Muslims have been recognized as a nation and that they would get the opportunity to rule as a sovereign body over the country. Mr. Lari should not be so apprehensive, like him I also belong to a Muslim minority area and am a resident of Amritsar. In spite of this, I am not weak. The situation today is that if the Sikhs murder a few Muslims, we immediately take revenge and kill more Sikhs. I assure you that we have the best soldiers with us, we were only short of arms which has now been made good by the grant of Pakistan to us. I assure you that the Pakistan Government would always be ready to avenge wrongs of Muslims anywhere in India, and, if necessary, the Muslims will cross their frontiers to take revenge. We do not at all care for the portion of the Punjab which has been cut away from Pakistan; as soon as the British quit that area will either be voluntarily evacuated or it will be completely destroyed. I assure you that we will take the full revenge for all the operations which are being perpetrated on Punjabi Muslims by Hindu States, give us only the opportunity to breathe in the atmosphere of freedom once. When we have proved ourselves irresistible though we are in bondage, nothing would be able to stop us once we are free. I appeal to you to accept this plan.

Mazhar Ismail (Madras): I belong to a Muslim minority province. We have undergone sacrifices for the achievement of Pakistan and if Qaid-e-Azam thinks it proper that we should accept the plan, then we can have no objection to it. There is no communal quarrel in our province. The Moplas of Madras are organising themselves and there is no cause for worry on account of the Muslims of Madras.

Pir Sahib Zakoori Shariff (Frontier); I belong to the Frontier and I wish to speak to you on behalf of the Muslims of that province and on behalf of the Pir of Manki, who is sitting here. We are Pathans and are an intensely practical people. We do not know how to deliver long speeches like you do. We prefer to act. When I met Qaed-e-Azam after the League had been beaten in the elections by the Khan Brothers, he told me that he was ashamed of us. On hearing these words, I dared not show my face to Qaed-e-Azam and started working in the Frontier for all I was worth. In the beginning, the Khan brothers wielded much influence in the Frontier and we considered the Congress as our organisation while we thought that the Muslim League was a body consisting of the creatures of the British, but when we saw the atrocities which the Congress perpetrated on the Muslims, we were disillusioned and the spell which the Khan brothers had cast over us was broken. Even today we hate Congressmen so intensely that the more propaganda they do in the N.W.F.P. the surer we shall be of our victory in the referendum. We have to make sure that in the referendum, the Muslims of N.W.F.P. side with the League. My brothers here told me that the Hindus would try to corrupt the Pathans and would buy votes. Perhaps my friends do not know the Pathans yet. The Britishers poured money into the N.W.F. and tried to corrupt the Pathans but the Pathans are still bitter enemies of the British. Let the Hindus spend their money, we would accept the money yet we would vote for the League and we would be successful in the referendum. We know now what the Muslim League is and what the reality of the Congress is. The Muslim minorities should have no fears.
The Pathans are true to their worth and considered it a matter of pride to be able to sacrifice their life for the sake of their brothers. Today when Pakistan is being founded and when this session is being held in this room, I have come to make a promise to my brothers. I promise and declare that on the slightest hint from Qaed-e-Azam I would prepare an army of armed Pathans hundred thousand strong. They will be such brave soldiers that their names would be written in golden letters in the history of the world. I again assure the Muslim minorities that they should have no fears. It is premature to talk, but I have no doubt that the Pathan of the Frontier will translate into action whatever is in his heart now. We shall only need your moral support. We were prepared to shed our blood for the Congress, which was a foreign body, what would we not do to establish a Muslim kingdom and to establish the rule of our own race.

Maulvi Abdul Rahman (C.P): On behalf of the Muslims I request you to accept HMG’s plan. Even if the defects, which have been pointed out by the previous speaker, are embodied in the plan we should have no fears on that account. After all, we will have more land than what they have in Afghanistan, Iran, Arabia, Iraq, Yaman and Palestine. We have more wealth than they have. We have industry and agriculture, therefore if those countries can be happy and free, I have no doubt that Pakistan would also be prosperous and free. I appeal that this plan be accepted.
Abdul Hamid (Assam): I belong to a Muslim minority province and according to the new plan I will be a resident of Hindustan; yet I support the plan. If, according to this plan, the majority of the Muslims become free, I prefer to remain as a slave. I urge that the plan be accepted.

The meeting adjourned till 7.30 p.m.

The proceedings were resumed at 7.30 p.m. under the Presidency of Mr. M.A. Jinnah and Mr. Jinnah, in the course of his speech, stated that various points of view in favour of and against the plan had been put before the house. 16 speakers have yet been left out. If you want to decide the issue today, we will have to stop the debate; otherwise the session will have to continue tomorrow. I ask your opinion on this point. Upon this, the house gave a majority vote in favour of closing the debate. Following this, the proposal for the acceptance of the plan was put to vote. 8 men, including Maulana Hasrat Mohani, voted against the acceptance of the plan; while the remaining 460 voted for it. The plan was accepted. Therefore, Mr. Liaquat Ali Khan read out a resolution and obtained the approval of the President. According to this resolution, the plan was accepted under protest and Mr. Jinnah was authorised to take further necessary action.

In the end, Mr. Jinnah addressed the Muslim minority provinces and declared that it was only because of their sacrifices that Pakistan is being realised today. He said that the Muslim majority provinces had been oblivious of the issue. Now it is time that the provincial distinctions of Sindhi, Punjabi, etc. should be removed and the Muslims should pull their weight together. He said that his work had been completed, and that he had mainly to get a separate kingdom and separate army and a separate country for the Muslims of India. The secret of your progress lies in unity.

At this stage, some Khaksars who were said to be about 20 in numbers, attempted to enter the Imperial Hotel. The Police and the Muslim National Guards stopped them.

31. General Opinion Is Not with Me

...Lately I have been receiving a large number of letters attacking me. A friend points out how ineffective were my words when I said that vivisection of the country would be the vivisection of my own body and calls upon me strongly to oppose the partition of the country. But I do not think I am in any way to blame in this matter. When I said that the country should not be divided I was confident that I had the support of the masses. But when the popular view is contrary to mine, should I force my own view on the people? I have repeatedly said that we should never compromise with falsehood and wickedness. And today I can say with confidence that if all the non-Muslims were with me, I would not let India be divided. But I must admit that today the general opinion is not with me, and so I must step aside and stay back. The lesson which we have been trying to learn for the past 30 years and which we now tend to forget is that only through truth and non-violence can we triumph over untruth and violence. Impatience can be overcome only with patience and excitement with calm. Today we cringe before our own shadow. There is nothing in common between me and those who want me to oppose Pakistan except that we are both opposed to the division of the country. There is a fundamental difference between their opposition and mine. How can love and enmity go together?
Another friend writes that this Viceroy is even more dangerous that the other Viceroys; that whereas the others crushed us at the point of the sword this one trapped the Congress with his smooth talk. I can never agree with this opinion. The correspondent has unwittingly and unknowingly praised the Viceroy and has debunked the intelligence and efficiency of the Congress Ministers. Why can he not understand the simple thing that the general opinion, that is, the opinion of those who are fit to hold any opinion, is supporting the Congress leaders? The leaders are not fools. They too find the partition repugnant, but as representatives of the country they cannot go against public opinion. They derive their power from the people. The situation would have been different if the correspondent had the power. And under no circumstances would it be proper to criticise the Viceroy when the leaders are elected representatives of the people or when our own people betray the country. The saying 'as the king so the subjects' is not so apt as its reverse: 'As the subjects so the king'.

32. Pakistan of Little Use to UP

SECRET GOVERNOR'S CAMP

U.P. 83

... 2. You will wish to know, first of all, the local reactions to the 'plan'. I have not heard enough yet to be definite but so far, they seem to be very favourable indeed. Our Muslims had been getting very tough lately. They took a thoroughly belligerent line over our Panchayat Raj bill (para 4 of my letter of May 18th); there was much talk of fights to the death for Pakistan, much marching and counter-marching of National Guards, while communal tension was at a dangerous pitch all over the Province. I have no news from the districts yet, but our Leaguers in the Legislature have suddenly begun to coo like doves. Half a dozen of them have been to see me lately about various local matters; they were all smiles; seemingly the whole attitude now is that in the U.P. we must forget the past and become all brothers together. This is of course excellent and I have been careful to endorse every word so spoken. The truth is that, as I have often pointed out in these letters, Pakistan is of little use to the U.P. Our Muslim League leaders too are all right wing people and the last thing they want is real trouble. They have been pretending to show their teeth during the last months, I think, under Jinnah's orders. It had to be got across that the Muslim League everywhere was in favour of Pakistan and that nothing less than a 'national home' for the Muslims would meet the case. Now that the said home is almost certainly to be provided, our Leaguers quite obviously feel that they can drop out of the fight and look after their own local and more personal interests. Whether they will be able to persuade our urban and usually very low class Muslim populations to take the same line remains to be seen. Savage instincts have been aroused—on both sides—which it will take some time to still. Nevertheless I am very hopeful that this Province will stay quiet provided that events elsewhere do not upset us unduly. When I write next, I shall be able to give you a more accurate account of what the Province feels about the plan. For the moment the above is all that I feel able to commit myself to.
33. Public Opinion Is Most Powerful
M.K. Gandhi’s speech at a prayer meeting in New Delhi, 10 June 1947
_CWMG_, Vol. LXXXVIII, pp. 123-6

BROTHERS AND SISTERS,

Whatever I have said in connection with the decision of Bengal, I have not levelled allegations against any party. I have only repeated what I have heard. Who would not be happy if Bengal was spared partition and could remain one undivided whole? But I cannot join hands with anyone who talks of preserving unity through falsehood, fraud and bribery. Nothing need be said if no Bengali—either Hindu or Muslim—has done it. Why should anyone wear the cap if it does not fit?

But people do entertain suspicion that something wrong is being perpetrated in Bengal. Those who told me this also gave me their names and addresses. But I do not think it proper to disclose those here. If they have been telling me falsehoods, it is bad and they should be punished. But who am I to punish anybody? I have not the power to punish anyone.

But I have one great thing with me and that is public opinion. Public opinion has tremendous power. In our country the significance of this expression has not yet been fully realised. In the English language, however, the expression has a forceful connotation. Even the king is helpless in the face of what the English call ‘public opinion’. Even the redoubtable Mr. Churchill, scion of a great family, a powerful orator and erudite scholar—certainly not an ignoramus like me—could not save his office in spite of all his achievements. It only means that public opinion in England is highly awake, no one can do anything in opposition to it.

In India public opinion is not as vigilant as in England. Had it been so a worthless fellow like me would not have presumed to become a mahatma. And even after I became a Mahatma everything that I did would not have been put up with. As it is, in India anyone who is called a mahatma ceases to be answerable to the public, whatever—right or wrong—he might do.

Tolstoy had been a great warrior, but when he realised that war was not a good thing he gave up his life in trying to put an end to war. He has said that the greatest power on earth is public opinion and it is generated by truth and non-violence.

That is what I am trying to do. But nothing is going to come of my efforts unless public opinion in India is informed with courage and truthfulness.

But that is not the case today. The impression I have is that we do not want the Dominion Status that is to be granted to us on August 15. The reason is the public opinion that has been forming over the years in favour of complete independence. This talk of Dominion Status pricks the country. The feeling is justified and yet not quite right. It is not right because we are not aware of the potentialities of Dominion Status. First, with the coming of Dominion Status the British will quit India in two months. Secondly, we can shake off the Dominion Status whenever we want. Of course if we persist in our madness others are hardly to blame. Anyway, to return to the subject of public opinion, if it stays vigilant all will be well. If through public opinion, without any bribery, without any corrupt methods being adopted, Bengal decides to remain one, then it is well and good. But we have been cowards and slaves so long that we are unable to resist the temptation to do ignoble acts.

But if one has not acted wickedly and still people level charges against one, why should one feel unhappy? For instance, there are many high-placed officers who do not become corrupt, who remain clean; and yet allegations of corruption are made against them. This does not perturb them. If someone calls me a wicked and corrupt man, do I have to weep? Do I become wicked merely because someone calls me so? I do admit that false allegations are sometimes made against people out of malice and cowardice. We should not talk ill of anyone.

We should see good points of people. If we want to be free let us not find fault with others, let us look at their better side and try to encourage them.

I now assume that the division of India is a fact and the Congress has been forced to accept it. But if the partition cannot make us happy, why should it make us unhappy? Only we should not let our hearts be sundered. We must save our hearts from being fragmented. Otherwise Jinnah Saheb’s claim that we are two nations will stand vindicated. I have never believed in it. When we are descended from the same ancestors, can our nationality change simply from our changing our religion? When Sind, the Punjab and maybe the Frontier Province too go to Pakistan will they no more belong to us? I for one do not regard even Britain as an alien country, why should I then regard Pakistan as another nation?

It may be said that I belong to India and in India to the Bombay Presidency, there again to Gujarat, in Gujarat, particularly to Kathiawar, where again to a small town of Porbandar. But because I belong to Porbandar I also belong to the whole of India, that is, I am also a Punjabi and if I go to the Punjab I shall live there regarding it as my home and if I am killed I shall accept death.

I am happy that Jinnah Saheb has said that Pakistan will not belong to an emperor, but that it will belong to the people and the minorities too will get a square deal there. I would only like to add that he should put into practice what he says. He should also impress this upon his followers and tell them to forget all talk of war. We too will not think of suppressing the minorities in our part of the land. Even the handful of Parsis in India shall be our co-sharers. It would be bad if the Hindus and Muslims joined hands and threatened to annihilate the Parsis saying they were drink-addicts. The Parsis are my friends and I tell them that if they do not give up drinking they will kill themselves. But we shall not kill them. In the same manner Hindus and Sikhs should be protected in the Punjab. The Muslims should treat them kindly and in a brotherly way and reassure them. If the Muslims start tyrannizing over them, the Hindus and Sikhs should tell them, without fear of death, that they will not accept Islam under duress nor partake of [beef]. The Hindus should not think that they have become a new community which cannot accommodate Muslims. We are in a majority in this part of India. We must enlighten the majority and work with courage. Courage does not reside in the sword. We will become truthful, we will become servants of God and, if need be, we will lay down our lives. When we do this India and Pakistan will not be two separate entities and the artificial partition would become meaningless. If we fight among ourselves the charge of our being two nations will be proved. Let us all therefore pray to God that although India and Pakistan have become separate nations our hearts may not be divided.

34. Jinnah Must Take a Clear Stand

Extracts from a letter from Vallabhbhai Patel to Louis Mountbatten, 10 June 1947
SPC, Vol. IV, pp. 147–8

New Delhi

My dear Lord Mountbatten,

Perhaps you have already received a copy of the resolution passed by the All India Muslim League Council. In case you have not. I am sending a copy for your ready reference.
2. You will notice that the resolution is contradictory and there is studied evasion of straightforward acceptance. At one place, it says it cannot agree to the partition of Bengal and the Punjab or give its consent to such partition. At another place, it says it accepts the fundamental principles of the Plan of 3 June as a compromise. You have to judge the resolution in the light of the speeches at the Council meeting. I have been able to obtain a copy of the proceedings through a source of the Intelligence Bureau. I am enclosing a copy of the same. From these proceedings it is quite clear that the Pakistan of the statement of 3 June would merely be a springboard for action against Hindustan, and that there is no possibility of a settlement on this basis. The position is such as is bound to fill us with grave apprehension.

3. In these circumstances, unless Mr. Jinnah issues a clear statement accepting the Plan, there are bound to be difficulties at the AICC meeting.

Yours sincerely,
Vallabhbhai Patel

35. Jinnah Must Accept the Plan in Its Entirety
Letter from Jawaharlal Nehru to Louis Mountbatten, 10 June 1947
Mountbatten Papers, File No. 209, NMML

17 York Road,
New Delhi

Dear Lord Mountbatten,

I have just seen the text of the resolution of the All-India Muslim League. I am afraid this resolution is not at all satisfactory. It begins by saying that the Council 'notes with satisfaction that the Cabinet Mission's Plan of May 16, 1946, will not be proceeded with and has been abandoned'. It is true that this Plan has been modified to a large extent. But, as a matter of fact, we are still functioning in many ways in accordance with that Plan. Thus our Constituent Assembly has been meeting and will continue to meet under that Plan. The Muslim League members from certain Provinces are also now joining the Constituent Assembly. Thus it is incorrect to say that the Plan has been abandoned, and indeed the Muslim League is itself going to conform to it to some extent.

2. The second paragraph of the Council’s resolution is the most important one. It states that the Council approves of the division of India into two parts, and it proceeds to say that the Council cannot agree to the partition of Bengal and the Punjab or give its consent to such partition, though it has to consider H.M.G.'s Plan as a whole. Thus the Council has definitely rejected one of the basic provisions in the new Scheme.

3. In the third paragraph it is said that the Council accepts the fundamental principles of the Plan as a compromise. It is not clear what they consider the fundamental principles to be. They may consider the fundamental principle to be one of division of India and not of the division of Bengal and the Punjab. Whatever this may be, it is accepted as a compromise. Of course it is a compromise, but the point is whether it is accepted as a settlement or not. The reports of the speeches delivered at the Council meeting lead to the conclusion that this was looked upon as a step only to be utilised for enforcement of further claims.

4. The Council has given full authority to its President, Mr. Jinnah to take all steps and decisions which may be necessary in connection with and relating to the Plan. The position thus is this:—The Council itself has not accepted the Plan as a settlement but has given authority to the President to do so if he so chooses. This is leaving matters where they were. The least that can be done now is for Mr. Jinnah to accept the Plan in its entirety as a settlement on behalf of the All-India Muslim League. Unless this is done clearly and in writing, there is every likelihood of difficulties arising in the near future. We have had vague resolutions of the Muslim League in the past which were capable of more than one interpretation and many of our problems have been due to this fact. Very soon, as you know, the All-India Congress Committee will be meeting, and the fact that the Council of the Muslim League has not clearly accepted the Plan is sure to be pointed out and will affect people’s decisions. I trust that before that happens, Mr.

Jinnah will express his full agreement with H.M.G.’s Scheme as a settlement of our communal problems and that this will be done in writing. Unless this is done the presumption will be that he does not wish to commit himself to the Plan and does not wish to treat it as a settlement.

Yours sincerely,
(Sd/-) Jawaharlal Nehru

36. ‘Strong Centre’
Editorial in The Tribune, 10 June 1947

Now that the Cabinet Mission Plan of May 16 has been scrapped and the country is going to be divided into Hindustan and Pakistan, the demand for a strong and powerful centre for the Indian Union is gaining momentum. One of the most glaring defects in the May 16 plan was that it envisaged a weak and anaemic centre with residuary powers vesting in autonomous provinces.
In spite of the Congress advocating a strong centre it had agreed to the Mission’s Plan simply to placate Mr. Jinnah. With the announcement of the new British plan, things have absolutely changed; and today the Congress can revert to its original position that, in the interests of India as a whole, the centre should be a strong and dynamic centre. The All-India Committee of the Hindu Mahasabha, which is very critical about the new British scheme inasmuch as it affects the integrity and unity of this great land, has also called upon the Constituent Assembly ‘to evolve a constitution of India with a strong and powerful centre,’ which should be given all residuary powers. This view is generally shared by all sections of public opinion, for these sections feel that India’s political, military and economic interest imperatively demand that she should have a well-knit and powerful centre. There may be some difficulty in devising such a centre in view of the fact that certain States, which have joined or are likely to join the Constituent Assembly, may not agree to hand over residuary and other powers to it—powers which the provinces may agree to concede. If this difficulty arises and the States take up the definite position that they are prepared to give only a limited number of powers to the centre—powers that have been conceded under the Cabinet Mission’s plan—some sort of a formula can be devised by which the States can be treated on a different footing from that on which the provinces are treated. Certainly it is not beyond the capacity of statesmanship to evolve such a formula. The real need is that the Union Centre should be a living centre, making India prosperous and powerful, agriculturally, industrially, economically and politically.

37. ‘Mountbatten Award and After’

Extracts from Political Resolutions of the Central Committee of the Communist Party of India, 10-20 June 1947
File No. CPI-116, Archives on Contemporary History, JNU

The Mountbatten Award does not give India real independence but is the culmination of a double faced imperial policy which, while making concessions to the national demand to transfer power, sets in motion disruptive and reactionary forces to disrupt the popular upsurge, obstruct the realisation of real independence, throttle the growth of democracy and destroy the unity and integrity of India.

BRITISH IMPERIAL AIMS

The growing upsurge of the various sections of the Indian people, the States’ people’s struggles in State after State, the gigantic wave of working-class strikes and peasant actions, the brave anti-imperialist demonstrations of students and the militant mood of the armed forces brought the imperialists face to face with the unprecedented strength of the national liberation movement.

In addition, British imperialism emerged greatly weakened politically and economically out of World War II. Its main imperialist rival, the United States, vastly strengthened in the war, threatened to sweep it out of its traditional imperial bases.

At home, the British Labour movement would not back the reconquest of India. All over the world, democratic opinion, immensely strengthened with the defeat of Fascism, demanded Indian independence.

Hemmed in from all sides the imperialist rulers have been forced to enter into negotiations with Indian leadership, talk of agreeing to Indian independence while they seek new forms of indirect rule.

Disruption—Sole Purpose

This has been the central aim of British policy ever since the Cabinet Mission Plan and the Mountbatten Plan is its latest variant despite obvious differences. The sole purpose is to disrupt the people, strengthen reaction, get into alliance with it and thus make Indian independence formal.

(a) Control through partition. The British policy of divide and rule, exploiting Hindu-Muslim differences, produced an unprecedented civil war. It has now culminated in the final act of partition of the country into two hostile States which they plan to control by entering into new alliances with reactionary forces in the different partitioned areas.

The British imperialist aim is to influence the reactionary leadership of the League to keep Pakistan a British Dominion, to allow British capital to have almost undisputed sway over the undeveloped Muslim majority areas, to utilise the North-West as a strategic base and as a base for the domination of India as a whole.

British Big Business by entering into partnership with Indian Big Business aims to continue to dominate the economy of India.

- By its agreements with Indian capital it expects to preserve intact its capital and retain and extend its control over vital industries in India.
- It hopes to use its Indian partner as its tool to influence the military and foreign policy of the Indian Union despite its republican form.
It expects to achieve this aim through reliance on the great influence of Indian Big Business over the extreme Right-wing of the Congress leadership.

The Communist Party warns the Indian people that these are the new methods of control over India that British imperialism aims to employ in order to pressure its domination of India.

(b) Utilisation of Princely puppets. In the imperial plan for controlling the India of the future their traditional puppets the Indian Princes occupy a position of supreme importance.

The Plan by granting the Princes the option to stay away from the Indian Union gives them a weapon to drive a hard bargain with the forces of Indian nationalism, retain their feudal privileges as far as possible and act as a brake on the democratic movement of the entire people.

British Fifth Column

Thus imperialist strategy is one of putting checks and balances in the new State against the national leadership and attempting to circumscribe freedom and democracy to the utmost possible extent.

It is the selfish British imperial effort to place their fifth column inside all the organs of the Indian States of the future so that they can influence their foreign and internal policy in the interests of their British masters.

But at the same time British imperialism encourages in a subtle manner some of the big Princes to remain ‘independent’, in case they cannot get favourable terms from the Congress and the League, so that such ‘independent’ States can be used as its outposts on Indian soil.

Part of Same Struggle

The Communist Party is firmly of the opinion that the struggle against Princely autocracy is at once the struggle against British manoeuvres to limit and control Indian independence and democracy and for the full realisation of this independence and democracy....

DISRUPTIVE PROCEDURE

The procedure outlined by the Mountbatten Plan is as disruptive as the Plan itself and calculated to ensure its fulfillment through a series of British awards.

The Boundaries Commission and other Commissions dealing with financial and other aspects of division are only intended to worsen Hindu-Muslim-Sikh relations so that the British arbiters can give their awards intensifying the communal conflict still further.

NATIONAL STRENGTH

The very fact that British imperialism does not hope any longer to rule India directly is a recognition of the undisputed strength of the Indian freedom movement. Its desperate manoeuvres reveal not its strength but its utter weakness which has forced it to make important concessions to the urgent demands of the national liberation movement, such as, for example:

(a) Transfer of power to Congress and League Governments on Dominion Status basis by August 15.

(b) Assurance, though equivocal, that Britain shall not seek to establish independent relationship with the Princes.
(c) The Constituent Assemblies, despite their limitations, are free to declare for independence and make their own constitutions.

New Opportunities
The Communist Party is of the opinion that new opportunities for national advance have been won. The two popular Governments and Constituent Assemblies are the strategic weapons in the hands of the national leadership. It is the task of the national movement to ensure that they are used for the rapid realisation of national aims.

The concessions have not been voluntarily given by the British Government but extracted through the continuous pressure of the Congress leadership for transfer of power and the rising tide of popular struggles of the workers, peasants, students and States’ people, which grew despite British provoked civil war, despite all efforts to check and suppress them and which showed the new spirit of the people.

Last Desperate Step
The British Government agreed to these concessions because there was no way out for it and hence its desperate last step of partition.

The path forward is beset with difficulties. Sharp alternatives face the national movement and our entire people.

- EITHER imperialist manoeuvres succeed, exploiting all the fissures in our national movement, thus making Indian Independence formal—
  OR the national forces unitedly ensure that the Constituent Assemblies draft constitutions on the basis of independence of the country and the popular Governments firmly resist imperialist pressure to extort economic and military concessions.

- EITHER the Princes are appeased and the British fifth column is retained inside our country—
  OR with the support of the entire country and the popular Governments, the States’ people are actively aided to win their own liberation and bring one-third of our land under the banner of independent India.

In Whose Interests

- EITHER the anti-national and anti-democratic activities of the vested interests are checked and the task of nation-building is begun to ensure food, cloth, jobs, and a living wage, prospect of a new life to workers, peasants and the common people, by the joint efforts of the popular Governments and popular organisations—
  OR Indian economy gets mortgaged to British Big Business and the Indian people pass through bitter suffering.

- EITHER partitioned India grows into two hostile States with reaction strengthened within each—
  OR the progressive intervene and carry forward the struggle for reunion by demanding a complete break with British imperialism by their own States and friendly relations between them in mutual interest.

The Communist Party has consistently warned against the dangers of imperialist manoeuvres if the national movement fails to forge a united front.
• It warned against partition. It suggested recognition of the right of national self-determination and the immediate implementation of fundamental democratic measures to undermine communal separatism and to preserve and strengthen Indian unity on the basis of the unity and equality of every nationality.
• The Communist Party warned against the intrigues of vested interests with the popular Ministries. It demanded that the Ministries break the resistance of vested interests and meet the needs of the people.
• It warned against our political parties getting entangled in the imperialist plan and demanded a sharp break with it.

People's Vigilance

...The Communist Party is fully confident that imperialist intrigues can be decisively defeated. The allies of imperialism have a very narrow social basis. They are the enemies of our people who place profit and self-interest above patriotism and national interest. The very economic crisis that they are intensifying will move the common people against them. The national movement will not tolerate any compromise of real independence if it is kept fully informed and mobilised....

FOR BROADEST JOINT FRONT...

• Partition will not solve our problems. It will multiply them leading to conflicts on boundaries, border hostilities, oppression of minorities in each State, perpetuate all conflicts, strengthen reaction all round and thus create avenues for imperialist penetration.
• Appeasement of the Princes will only mean creating new centres of British political, economic and military influence inside our own country.
• Yielding to the pressure of vested interests will mean not only perpetuation but further strengthening of the imperialist stranglehold through new alliances and open our economy to the full impact of the fast-approaching world capitalist crisis.

We Pledge Anew

The Communist Party pledges itself anew to play its full part in carrying forward the battle for independence, democracy and unity to final victory in the new conditions....

Firm Initiative Needed

...The Communist Party appeals to all Left Organisations and elements to forget the partisanship and differences of the past and come together to fight the dangers and realize the possibilities of the present....

Constructive Effort

...In the coming critical transitional phase it will be the task of the Indian working-class and peasant movements to see that the fight for real independence, full democracy and Indian unity goes forward to final victory and they play their full part in forging the unity of the National Front shoulder to shoulder with all progressive and Left elements in our country....
38. Gandhi Asks Jinnah What Kind of State Pakistan Would Be

CWMG, Vol. LXXXVIII, pp. 73-5

BROTHERS AND SISTERS,

Although I have spoken to you about the impending division of Bengal, nevertheless I wish to speak to you about it again a third time. I have just received a letter. It is full of anger. As I have told you, anger is a kind of madness. The man who is a prey to anger loses all discrimination. The letter I received shows such anger. The writer says that I have caused great harm to Bengalis. In what way have I caused harm to Bengalis? I have said that I do not want that Bengal should be vivisected. It is true that I do not want that. If a just scheme were offered to us I would say that a Bengali is above all a Bengali, be he Hindu or Muslim or Christian. If he wants to uphold his mother tongue, uphold his country, who can interfere? I wish to tell you that even the Congress cannot interfere, nor can the League. It is very clear that if Bengal could remain united it would be a very good thing. But how is that to be? That is the question. If we wish to achieve something good but choose a method which is crooked we shall not reach our goal. If you adopt a wrong path and want to go east you will end up arriving in the west. We must therefore not choose a wrong path. We should take the right path. That is what I have been saying. But people get angry. I want to tell you that I stick to what I have been saying. I stand by what is right. If someone does not have right on his side, whether he is my brother or my son. I do not care. I therefore tell the Bengalis that if Bengal is to be divided it will be through their own decision and if Bengal is to remain united it will also be through them. So far nothing has happened. This much for Bengal.

But I have other matters brought to my attention, too. Today some friends from Campbellpur came to see me. They said that they were so far living happily there. They did not run away. But what were they to do? They are scared about what their plight would be in Pakistan and Campbellpur certainly would be included in Pakistan. I told them that whatever the situation might be in Pakistan they were after all living in India. If the map of India is divided in two, how can it affect them? I said, ‘You are brave people. You don’t fear anyone except God. Anyone who fears God need fear no one else in the world. I therefore cannot advise you to leave Campbellpur.’ They wanted to know how they could defend themselves if they remained there. I said I told the Hindus of Noakhali that they were not to move out from where they were. They wanted weapons. But what could they be doing with weapons? The Government had the weapons and if the Government could not protect them, they being in a minority, then the Government was incompetent. Such a Government should go and I told them to force such a Government to go. If a few Muslims are left behind here are they to be slaughtered and would the Government merely watch? Then the Government no longer remains a Government. It becomes a tyranny. And why should we live under a tyranny? We have been fighting the British for so many years. Must we now fall from the frying pan into the fire? Is it for this that we have undergone so much suffering, made so much noise and resorted to satyagraha and non-cooperation?

That will not be right. I said the same thing to the Muslims of Bihar. They said that I could talk in that way because I was a Mahatma, but they were traders and businesses and families and children to look after. I must show them a way. I said I was helpless. I could not change now in my old age.
What were they to say? They were good people and I was busy. I told them to go saying I could only advise them to be brave. I do not indulge in tall talk. Man is born to be brave. Man is not born to become cowardly or to become scared. Man is a part of God. He has in him the divine spark. I have not heard that a cow or a bullock or a horse partakes of the divine spark. It is true that as all creatures are creatures of God are more or less alike. But the difference between man and other creatures is that we do not say of the latter, as we can about men, that they have in them the divine spark. Then if we have the divine spark, is it so that we may become frightened of each other or is it so that we may love each other? So I tried to explain things to them. But how were they to understand?

Mr. Jinnah is doing something very big. Nobody had ever dreamt that in this day and age Pakistan would become a possibility. But today Pakistan is a reality. True, it has not yet come into being. But surely by the 15th of August it will be formed. When I think over the matter I tell myself that I should not grieve over it. The Congress says there was no alternative to division. Jinnah says that he will not rest till India is divided. So let there be division. But shall I throw up my hands and accept this division? I say that nobody can cut me into pieces. Therefore nobody can cut India into pieces. This is mere talk. I tell you that if you become truthful, then whether it is Pakistan or India or whatever other name you may choose, the task will be same. Who can tear asunder that which God has created one? But I can ask Mr. Jinnah what he intends to do with regard to those people. It is already agreed what parts are to be included in Pakistan. Campbellpur is so included. It cannot be shifted. What are the people there to do? Should they flee? Does he want that they should continue to live there? He says that all will get justice; that in Pakistan the same standard will apply to all and no one will be discriminated against merely on the ground that he is a Hindu or a Christian. He says that all will get the same justice.

Today my tongues, my words, have lost their power. But he still has that power. He is the ruler of Pakistan and nobody can deny it. So I ask the ruler of Pakistan, what he intends doing. He should make his intentions public. Let me now go a little further. Badshah Khan is a friend. Badshah Khan can go somewhere else. He can stay with Maulana Azad. He has a beautiful bungalow. He can eat there what he wants. He can put up with Jawaharlal. He has a huge mansion. It is not like my poor hut. And what would I offer him to eat? I cannot even provide meat. He agrees to take whatever I eat, cereals, a little fruit, and that is all. But he is happy with it and thus he is my friend. He is a fakir. Dr. Khan Saheb is his brother. Dr. Khan Saheb can do nothing without Badshah Khan’s help. Badshah Khan is a fakir. That is why he is ‘Badshah’ or king. He has become a king not through the sword but through love, through service. When I go there I never hear him called by any other name. It is here that he is called the Frontier Gandhi. There they do not even know Gandhi, to say nothing of Frontier Gandhi.

So Badshah Khan and others decided that there ought to be a referendum. Tempers have not yet cooled, for Pathans are hotblooded. What will be gained by a referendum? They will not all of them say that they want Pakistan or that they want Hindustan. Then there will be division among the Pathans. I should like to ask the leader of Pakistan if he wants a division among the Pathans. And will he compel one of the parts? Would it not be better for him instead to explain what Pakistan is?

Pakistan has been granted. The Congress has agreed, willingly or unwillingly. Now Punjab is to be divided, Bengal is to be divided. I tell you that it is in the hands of the leader of Pakistan to stop the division of the Punjab and Bengal. Why does he not say ‘I now have Pakistan.
Why do you fear? We have fought. Let us forget who has. I will not resort to a referendum.’ If Jinnah says that he will welcome all the Pathans, those who consider him their enemy and those whom he considers his enemies—the Khudai Khidmatgars, the Khan Brothers, the Hindus, the Sikhs, the Parsis and Christians—he will welcome all, then I will say that you lose nothing by remaining in Pakistan. Why should he not say this much? Why should he not say what shape Pakistan is going to take? If he says this everyone will be happy. Pakistan is not something imaginary. India is not something imaginary. I should ask the Congress also to explain. No poison must be spread. If poison continues to be spread, what will be the result? Then the Pakistan that has been formed will be a bad thing. The English will have gone, leaving the Indians, both Hindus and Muslims, to abuse them.

Pakistan was not inevitable. But when they saw that Hindus and Muslims could not make up their minds to work together in the Constituent Assembly, what could they do? Then they talked with both the parties and both agreed on Hindustan and Pakistan being separate entities. I am not concerned with what name you give it. But it should be done properly. If it is not done properly the poison will remain. I am sorry that Mountbatten has come today. He has not come with any wicked intention. But I have a fear that through him harm will come. Unless of course he stops doing what he must do, unless he pleads with the Congress, pleads with Mr. Jinnah, pleads with you and tries to satisfy everyone. But in this world nobody can please everybody. He who tries to please everybody always fails. This is the law of God. It is the experience of the whole world. So he cannot expect to please all. I would say that if the Congress is erring he should take it to task. He should say, ‘I have come here. I am an officer of the Navy and I like to talk frankly.’ He should say that what we do is not right, what the Congress does is not right. But why should we bother him? After all his dharma is different from ours. But why should brother fight against brother? Why now? When there was time we fought. We shed blood. What we were fighting for, we got.

I notice that Ibn Saud has sent a telegram to the Qaid-e-Azam. He says in it that he is not happy over what has happened. But he hopes that there will be peace in the world. The Qaid-e-Azam has said in reply that he also wants peace. But where is peace to come from? There is no peace in India today and if Hindus and Muslims continue to fight as enemies, how can there be peace? I shall say that all the telegrams addressed to me, all the anger directed at me, are futile. I say simply, where there is truth there is God. Where there is nonviolence, there is God. Where these are not, there is nothing.

I shall only say that Mr. Jinnah carries a great responsibility. He has to reassure the world. At any rate, he has to reassure those who are in Pakistan and those whom he wants to be in Pakistan. He has to draw them to him. If he cannot do so it is bad for India and it is bad for Pakistan. It is bad for the Hindus, and for the Muslims. I cannot wish anyone ill. My sole prayer is that we may do only what is right.

39. 3 June Statement Welcomed
Letter from G.E.B. Abell to W. Croft, 11 June 1947
IOR, R/3/1/156, Acc. No. 3470, NAI

My dear Croft,

Many thanks for your letter of the 4th June. I have sent on the enclosure to Terence Shone by hand.
The reception of the Announcement has been remarkably good, and it really is a triumph for the Viceroy and to a considerable extent for V.P. The fact that the more sane elements of the Congress, and especially Vallabhbhai Patel, were at this stage prepared to do business enable the Viceroy to use V.P. and his influence with Patel to a remarkable effect. The second point, of course, was that the moment the Muslim League definitely realised what was the maximum they could get out of H.M.G. they began for the first time to be sensible.

Yours ever,
GEORGE

40. ‘Socialists Against Partition’
The Tribune, 11 June 1947

New Delhi. June 10.—The National Executive of the Socialist Party of India in a resolution on H.M.G.’s plan, today expressed the disapproval of and grief at the proposed division of the country.

‘At the same time the Executive cannot fail to notice that this decision of such tremendous import has not surprised or shocked the people inasmuch as it has led them into a mood of reluctant acceptance,’ added the resolution.

It will be the duty of the Socialist party, irrespective of partition, said the resolution to lead the toiling masses to their destiny, i.e., to the establishment of a peasants’ and workers’ state. The executive is confident that in the course of the fulfillment of this destiny, communal illusions will vanish and fevers cool down and the toiling people of the land will realise their oneness and join together to march forward to higher goals of progress and happiness.

Referring to the proposal to confer dominion status, the party urged that under no circumstances must we falter away from independence. The coming into being of two dominions is a stopgap arrangement of a defined duration.

At the same time, the resolution stated, it is necessary to point at the dangerous possibility of the acceding areas continuing as a dominion and also to warn Great Britain that the acceptance of this position would be regarded as an unfriendly act. The people of Pakistan must never allow their Government to accept any status for their country that falls short of independence.

Referring to the states, the resolution said that the Constituent Assembly will be within its right if it sends for people’s representatives from all such states as fall within the areas of the Indian union if their princes are unable to make up their mind or have made it up the wrong way.

The resolution was passed after discussions lasting three days. Dr. Ram Manohar Lohia presided.

The party decision to withdraw from the All-India Trade Union Congress and not to join the Indian National Trade Union Congress was announced earlier by Mr. Jai Prakash Narain.

The Socialist Party will concentrate on ‘building up a sound healthy socialist trade union movement’ and will keep aloof from the three trade union organisations, the T.U.C., the N.T.U.C. and the Indian Federation of Labour.
41. Congress Acceptance of June 3 Justified

Note by Prof. Jwala Prasad Singhal, 11 June 1947
AICC Papers, File No. CL-10/1946-7, NMML

Prepare For Logical Consequences

The new plan of June 3 has created a babel of voices and it has become difficult for some to see clearly what has happened and what is to happen and to prepare for that. Even those who only a fortnight before were pressing for partition of the Punjab and the Bengal have now begun to accuse Congress of having betrayed the country by accepting partition. In fact the country was partitioned several years back when the Congress declared that it will not coerce any part to be within India against its will. Congress has done nothing new. Then the country was partitioned on Dec. 6, 1947 when the British Cabinet declared that it will not impose any Constitution on an unwilling part. The British would not compel such part by military expedition and Congress could not do it, then what was the alternative? The Congress have done the next best thing, it has saved non-Muslim populations in the Punjab and Bengal from Muslim tyranny, and for this it is being condemned by unthinking people or by shallow thinkers. There is an old Indian proverb that if you find the whole receding from your grasp then keep the half which you can hold. That is the part of a wise man, and this is how the Congress has acted, and not like the fly which to taste honey lost its life....

Reorientation of Congress

Willingly or unwillingly now the Congress has been forced into the position of the protector of Hindu interests. And all Muslims of whatever hue or colour will look to Pakistan for protection. Congress must change its policy accordingly or should dissolve and should hand over its work to Hindu Mahasabha. There are some signs of Congress complacency still. Mahatma Gandhi is still thinking of winning people by love. Probably he thinks that by treating Muslim minorities in Hindu provinces generously he will be able to win Pakistan back to the Indian Union. He has not been able to do so in the thirty years after his return from South Africa. He supported so whole heartedly the Khilafat agitation and what is the result? He has effaced himself completely in his meetings with Mr. Jinnah at his own house only to increase the latter’s stature and immobility. This is not how Lord Krishna worked. He went as a Pandava ambassador to Kauravas, shamed them by His dignity and reasonableness, but withdrew promptly when he saw His efforts were fruitless, Mahatma Gandhi has made the Bihar Hindus repent, but has not thereby affected the disorders in the Frontier or the Punjab. Muslims have been well treated in Hindu provinces, but Sind—the first clearly Muslim Province—has first begun the moves for discouraging and displacing Hindus. Sind has gone so far as to declare Urdu to be compulsory for all schools. Will U.P., C.P. and Bihar be allowed to make Hindi compulsory for all aided institutions? According to Mahatma Gandhi’s principles also only the very strong can be non-violent. This applies to individuals. States can be generous only when extremely strong. But today even Russia, America and Britain cannot afford such generosity. Hindustan has yet to prove its strength. Prithviraj the great Chauhan King is reported to have exercised great generosity in releasing Mohammad Ghori after capturing him, but he paid for that generosity with his life, and India’s slavery. Pakistan has not been motivated by any ungenerous treatment of the Muslims but by the desire to place a new sovereign Muslim State in the world map. Those who think otherwise only delude themselves. (Kings of Saudi Arabia and Trans-Jordan have congratulated Mr. Jinnah on this point). In all Muslims minority provinces the Muslims got weightage in representation and services. And yet those very Muslims of U.P. and Bombay lead the vanguard of the Muslim League. It is not generosity and sentimental love which is respected in political matters. It is strength which pays in this sphere.

A Dangerous Move

There is a dangerous move afoot. Mr. Lari the Muslim League leader in U.P. Assembly declared that as the question of nationalities has been decided on the all India basis the Muslim minorities in U.P. should throw in their lot with provincial majority and pleaded that as a minority it should be treated generously and should be allowed to retain its minority privileges. It is said that the Muslim League representatives of the provinces in Sec. A will be allowed to join the present Constituent Assembly so as to protect their minority rights. Even Sir Syed Wazir Hasan considers it rather anomalous that those very persons who formerly declaimed against the Constituent Assembly and wanted Pakistan ... should now join it and clamour for special rights. It is like the old story of ‘Heads I win tails you lose’. They cannot have it both ways. If Muslims form a separate nation, and they have won Pakistan on this basis, then they cannot claim political rights as members of the Hindustan nation. It will be suicidal to permit this. They have got their ‘homelands’ and let them enjoy their rights in Hindustan as may be permitted by that nation consistently with its own security and well being. Sind is riding rough ... Hindu rights. Even their landed property is affected. A Sind Minister proclaims that Hindus should quietly be governed and live as subjects or should go. But the Muslims in Hindu provinces have begun to talk sweetly. This also will be only temporary for gaining particular ends. Let the Congress Governments beware. If there is an attack by Pakistan on Hindustan then the Muslims in Hindustan—the same Muslims who have been shouting for Pakistan—cannot be and should not be expected to side with Hindustan. It will be simple foolhardiness to permit the Hindustan army or police or Hindustan executive or confidential services to be manned by Muslims. Some nationalist Muslims may take umbrage at this and may call those who should think Muslims in Hindustan to be alien as lunatics but the fact remains that such Muslims will be the fifth column of the attacking Pakistan. The nationalist Muslims were not able to prevent their coreligionists from working for Pakistan, and they will not be able to prevent them from working as fifth column in a future. Those who cried themselves hoarse in asking for a separate homeland in Pakistan cannot now turn round and claim their present residence as homeland. They may not be forbidden the residence in Hindu provinces, they may be given even representation in legislature, but they must not be allowed to form any part of the army, the police, the executive and political services. They may hold property and do trade on terms similar to those permitted to Hindus in Pakistan and no others....

Reorganize Army Immediately

But even before this exchange Hindustan must reorganise its army and police which must not contain any elements on whose loyalty there can be a suspicion even in a dream. These are matters which should have priority in the nation’s consideration. The definition of citizenship should have proper safeguards and should not allow rights of citizens to any person who sympathises with or owes allegiance to, or who has shown before such sympathy or allegiance to any body or state outside or antagonistic to Hindustan. Whether Muslim Leaguers of Section A attend the present Constituent Assembly or not there should be no compromise on this point. The Congress must give up further appeasement otherwise the next step from partition will be the effacement of Hindustan.

Such a stand may make the position of Hindus in Pakistan more difficult. In the first place this is bound to happen whatever the Congress may do or not do. But even if it accelerates the expulsion of Hindus from Pakistan, Hindustan should be ready to receive them in exchange for equal population of Muslims emigrating from Hindustan. If Pakistan finding its position weak desires to join the Indian Union then this can be arranged even though the population of the two areas has become homogeneous by exchange, and perhaps on a sounder and firmer basis. If Australia should desire to join the Indian Union, or Ceylon or Burma should do so, surely the Indian Union will not refuse. Therefore such an exchange will not militate against future union, and will perhaps bring it sooner.

42. Division of Country Should Not Mean a Division of Hearts

Extract from a letter from M.K. Gandhi to Munnalal G. Shah, 11 June 1947
CWMG, Vol. LXXXVIII, p. 130

DELHI

CHI. MUNNALAL,

...We may take it that physical division of the country is now certain. Since the Congress has accepted the plan, we must now look for another way. That way I have been showing. Just as land or other property can be partitioned, so also can men’s hearts. If, therefore, our hearts are true we can behave as if they had not been partitioned....

43. Need to Organize and Strengthen Hindus

Letter from L.B. Bhopatkar to Harilal K. Doshi, 11 June 1947
AIHM Papers, File No. C-146, NMML

Dear Mr. Doshi,

Your letter bearing no date to hand, and I have noted its contents.

Yours sincerely,
Sd/- L. B. Bhopatkar
Sir,

The hopes of the Hindus have been belied by the Congress. By an impulse of magnanimity, trust and it must be confessed, of weakness the Mahasabha stood aside and committed the destinies of Hindus to the care of the Congress. The Congress has been outwitted by the superior strategy of Britain and the strong purposive will of Mr. Jinnah. It has succumbed to both. It has woefully lacked in foresight. The causes are many and deep, but this is the time for remedies, not causes.

I read that the Mahasabha intends opposing the British plan of partition. It would be futile and therefore inadvisable. We must bow to the inevitable. But it is not safe to any more allow the Congress to control the destiny of Hindustan. A body only half believing in Hinduism is unfitted by its very constitution to take charge of Hindus. The Mahasabha must now come out and take control. Everywhere people are waiting for a sign of true leadership. Let the Mahasabha come out boldly. The dangers of not doing so are many and great.

Congress is undone by its unreal ideology. Left to itself, it would wage war against Hindu States and orthodox Hindus and their customs and the result will be a torn Hindustan added to a torn India. Hindustan at least will be over under its guidance. Even Nehru's ‘Discovery of India’ has not even half discovered the true India. Kashmir tears him even more than the hell let loose under his very nose and aegis.

But the Mahasabha must have a policy. I suggest the following.

1. Organising and strengthening the Hindus.
   In a way partition will be a blessing in disguise. If we organise and grow strong partition will disappear in ten years. Of course there will be bitter, but great and glorious struggle.
2. Safeguarding the defence of Hindustan. Army, Navy & Air.
3. Safeguarding the Hindus in Pakistan—Go so far as not to tolerate wrongs done to them. Strike when necessary and expedient.
4. Internally: Consolidate power, avoid conflicts of all kind.
   Put all the elements of life at their ease and let improvement come by winning persuasion—the good old sure Hindu way. It is called the indirect approach by Liddell Hart.

   e.g. (a) adopt a policy of non-interference in the states and at the same time persuade the rulers to adopt reforms. Time alone would do a great many things. The princes have been the victims of British terrorism. Now Congress terrorises them. The fearful man does the worst things. Dispel this fear and a fund of energy will come out the so-called medieval mummies. They will unite with Hindustan most readily.
   (b) Social customs.

The same way, not legislation. The Hindu way has been to take possession of the soul of a man and then let him shape his own conduct. It has been a historical success. It has stressed the informal. Europe's—at least modern Europe's way is the opposite. It compels conduct and not caring if the soul is smothered. The result is conflict in Western Europe and dead uniformity in Eastern Europe (Russia and its satellites). Its crowning philosophy is behaviourism. Imagine the way of making people happy by imposing upon them the way they don’t want—really subduing them! There is hope for the world only in Hinduism.
And so I might continue. I wait till I learn your mind. I shall only be too glad to work for this end. A full programme must be laid out and if need be the guidance and blessing of Shri Aurobindo be obtained.

Yours truly

44. Reflections on Hindustan and Pakistan
M.K. Gandhi’s speech at a prayer meeting in New Delhi, 12 June 1947
CWMG, Vol. LXXXVIII, pp. 138-41

BROTHERS AND SISTERS,

You see Khwaja Saheb sitting to my right. I told you earlier how I once went to his house with Swami Satyadev. At that time Swami Satyadev would not even drink water offered by a Muslim. But Khwaja Saheb was not offended and warmly welcomed him. He was then a trustee of the Aligarh University. Later he resigned the trusteeship to join the non-co-operation movement. I seem to remember that at the time I went to his house a meeting of the League was in progress there. Was there any satyagrahi in that assembly?—I asked. The Maulanas Mohammed Ali and Shaukat Ali were in jail and everyone was feeling discouraged. Khwaja Saheb told me that I could have two satyagrahis and a half. One was Shuaib Qureshi, who was a well-known and courageous young man. Then there was another gentleman, present there, who was a staunch satyagrahi. He had once been assaulted by a mob and injured in two places on his arm. But though he was strong he remained calm and did not offer physical resistance. Lastly, Khwaja Saheb said, he himself was half a satyagrahi. From then on he has been like a brother to me.

He did not want the country to be divided. Nevertheless it has happened and he has come to me to lament it. I told him that we would not weep and I made him laugh.

Sapru Saheb too has felt hurt by what has happened. Well, the League wanted it, but the Congress did not like it. How long can a thing over which the two are not agreed last? Geographically we may have been divided. But so long as hearts too have not been divided, we must not weep. For all will be well so long as our hearts remain whole. The country may well be divided today into Pakistan and Hindustan. In the end we have to become one. Not that they will come and join us through vexation. Our behaviour will be such that even if they want to they will not be able to keep themselves away from us.

It irks Jawaharlal that the rest of the country should be called Hindustan. When one part is now Pakistan, how can the other part be Hindustan, he asks. He is right. For it will mean that it belongs to the Hindus. What then would the Christians, the Jews and the Muslims left here do? Must they leave? Must Pantji ask Khawaja Saheb, who belongs to U.P. and is a friend of his, to leave U.P.? If this happens, Mr. Jinnah will have been proved right in his assertion that the hearts were already divided.

But this is not what history says. I told you about the letter I had from the well-known historian Shri Jai Chandra Vidyalankar. He says that even when Hindus and Muslims fought against each other they never killed in the name of religion. In our childhood also we never felt that we had separate identities. In days gone by when, accompanied by Hindus, Jainuluddin set out on a pilgrimage to Kashi, he got repaired all derelict temples he passed on the way. The name of Allah is inscribed on the Victory Tower of Chittor.

Why should our hearts now become so soiled that we cannot sit together or see each other with a kindly eye?

Assuming that a few Muslims have become wicked, shall we then also become wicked? This is not what Jawaharlal wants. He says that so long as Muslims were part of the country the name Hindustan was fine for the understanding was that anyone born in Hindustan belonged to Hindustan, whatever his religion. Now Hindustan will imply that the country belongs to Hindus. And who among the Hindus? Only the caste Hindus. But as I have said the caste Hindus—Brahmins, Kshatriyas and Vaishyas—are a very small part of the population. The vast majority consists of untouchables and Adivasis. Will they be ruled by the few caste Hindus? True, today it is they who rule the roost. But if the untouchables and the Adivasis are allowed to fall under the domination of the caste Hindus, Mr. Jinnah will have been proved right in saying that a handful of caste Hindus want to keep all the rest under their heel. Could we be such fools? Could we accept the two-nation theory of Mr. Jinnah? It would mean that if my son becomes a Muslim he becomes a national of another country. If we segregate three-quarters of our fellow country-men and keep them away from the governance of the country, our Hindustan will be just as Mr. Jinnah has pictured it.

Then there will be a Parsistan, a Sikhistan, separate bits for the untouchables, the Adivasis and so forth and Hindustan will no longer remain Hindustan. It will undergo Balkanization. If this is what the English desire there will be no place left in the world for them.

So we must not weep over what has happened. Jawaharlal has suggested Union of Indian Republic as the name for the country. That is, all will live together here. If a part wants to secede we shall not force it to remain, but those that remain shall live as brothers. We shall so treat them that they will not want to break away, they will not feel that they are separate. All will be loyal to the Union and serve it.

Today someone asked me why we should still continue with Hindustani. Such a question should not be raised. If we adopt the attitude that since Urdu will be the language of Pakistan we should have Hindi as our language then the charge of separatism against us also will be proved. Hindustani means an easy language to speak, read and write. It used to be one language at one time but lately we have Urdu loaded with Persian expressions which the people cannot understand and Hindi crammed with Sanskrit words which also people cannot understand. If we used that language we should have to eject from our midst people like Sapru. Although a Hindu, his mother tongue is Urdu. If I start talking to him in Sanskritized Hindi he will not be able to make head or tail of it. We should therefore continue the work of Hindustani—of the Hindustani Sabha—and prove our love for those whose language is Urdu.

I see God's will in what has happened. He wants to test us both to see what Pakistan will do and how generous India can be. We must pass the test. I am hoping that no Hindu will be so mad as to show inadequate respect for things the Muslim consider sacred or fail to accord the same status to the Aligarh University as he does to Malaviyaji's Hindu University. If we destroy their sacred places we shall ourselves be destroyed.

Similarly we should protect the fire temples of Parsis and the synagogues of Jews as we protect Hindu temples. I must also say that untouchables will be treated here on par with the people of the highest caste. True Hinduism embraces all religions.

We must see that we have a hundred per cent success in this. We cannot act on the principle of tit for tat. That is an obsolete principle. The times have changed. Now if someone abuses us we have to answer him by love. We have to answer lies with truth and meanness with generosity. Always and in every situation our eyes, ears and hands should remain pure. Only then can we save ourselves; only then can the world survive. I have not the least doubt of it. We must not run away with the idea that now that we have given the Muslims what they wanted we can do what we like.

46. Pakistan Has Not Spelt End of Conflict

Extracts from M.K. Gandhi’s speech at a prayer meeting in New Delhi, 14 June 1947
CWMG, Vol. LXXXVIII, pp. 152-3

Some friends have come from Rawalpindi with news of happenings there. Sucheta Kripalani also gave me the distressing report of the situation there. One thing made me very sad. When the Pakistan issue was still undecided the conditions there were tolerable but now the Muslims are on the rampage. They say that now that they have Pakistan, they will make slaves of everyone else. I mention this at the prayer meeting here so that what I say may reach the ears of the Muslims. It will certainly reach the ears of Mr. Jinnah. If what I say is wrong, let my Muslim brethren take me to task and say that it is not right. Let them invite me to Peshawar to see how happy Hindus, Sikhs, women and children are. But I have got the names. If some ordinary men had said such things, one need not have worried because there are always a few irresponsible people everywhere. But if all the Muslims think and express themselves in these terms then it is very bad.

Mr. Jinnah says that under the Muslim majority the minorities will live in peace. But what is in fact happening? If after Pakistan has come into being the conflict is further sharpened then it will only mean that we have been made fools of. It will mean that they will be masters and anyone following a different religion will have to stay there as a slave or a servant and admit that he is inferior to them.

I am eager to hear from them that all are well treated in Pakistan and that temples also are well looked after. When I see that I shall bow my head to them. But if that does not happen then I shall know that Mr. Jinnah was uttering a falsehood and I shall begin to suspect Lord Mountbatten who although a commander of such a high rank was in such a hurry. He could have allowed the carnage to go on, if it had to go on, and said that he would not bow before the sword.

NEW DELHI

I can see as through a crystal the sincerity and love in Jawahar. He has always argued with me and made me feel confused over so many issues. But today he hardly ever argues over anything that I say. He would be heart-broken if I hesitated to attend the A.I.C.C. He has made me a captive of his love. That is why I have proclaimed that I am at Jawahar’s and Sardar’s orders. He has the heart of a child. And yet he has the intellect, learning and power that only the greatest among intellectuals could boast of. He can renounce things as easily as a snake its slough. His tireless energy would put even a youth to shame.
48. ‘Resolution on H.M.G.’s Plan: Socialists Will Not Oppose It at AICC’

_The Tribune_, 14 June 1947

New Delhi, June 13.—Members of the Socialist Party will not oppose or table amendments to the resolution on H.M.G.’s plan, which will be placed by the Congress Working Committee before the A.I.C.C.

This was made clear at a press conference held to-day by Dr. Ram Manohar Lohia, who presided over the recent meetings of the national executive of the Socialist Party, and Acharya Narendra Deo, a member of the executive.

The members of the party, however, would explain the attitude of the Socialists in terms of the resolution adopted by the national executive.

Socialists, said Acharya Narendra Deo, were opposed to partition, but they would not oppose the plan, because it has become a fact. They would, however, work through peaceful methods for reunion by mutual consent.

There would be a Socialist single organisation for both Hindustan and Pakistan. There might be local variations but a common policy would be adopted for the whole country i.e., a policy aimed at the establishment of a Socialist State in India. Mentally Socialists did not recognise division of the country, but for all practical purpose they would have to.

‘We think’ said Acharya Narendra Deo, ‘that unity can be achieved only through Socialist programmes. The masses of both the parties have common interests and their integration is necessary in the interest of both’.

He foreshadowed swing to the left within the next ten years.

Acharya Narendra Deo said that Socialists would work for fundamental change in the social structure by peaceful means. ‘If the State is democratic and functions in a democratic manner, we can achieve our objective.’

49. “‘No Nationalist Can Be Happy”: Sir Tek Chand’s View’

_The Tribune_, 14 June 1947

LAHORE, June 3.—‘Balkanisation of India is complete. Millions of her people whose forefathers have, since the dawn of history, lived in this sacred land and who themselves had worked and suffered for its integrity will become aliens in their own home land.’ This comment was made by Sir Tek Chand, a former Judge of the Lahore High Court and a member of the Constituent Assembly on H.M.G.’s Plan regarding the transfer of power to India from the British hands, in the course of an interview with the ‘Tribune’ representative.

Sir Tek Chand said, ‘The fateful announcement has been made. Mr. Attlee’s award is before us. No true nationalist can be happy over it. Forces of reaction and fanaticism have won. The dream of a free and united India cherished by the generations of Indians has been dashed to the ground. Hindus and Muslims have been recognised as two separate nations. For the first time in the history of the world, the right of self-determination has been conceded in a religious community and foundation has been laid for the establishment of theocratic sovereign State or States in an age when the State should be divorced from religion.’
Sentence of ‘Quit India’

Balkanisation of India is complete. Millions of her people whose forefathers have, since the dawn of history lived in this sacred land and who themselves had worked and suffered for its integrity will become aliens in their own homeland. By a strange irony of fate a sentence of ‘Quit India’ has been passed on the faithful children of the soil and this sentence would be carried out by the British long before they themselves quit this unfortunate country.

The only redeeming feature of the proposed plan is that in this process of vivisection portions of the Punjab and Bengal may escape amputation and remain attached to the mother country. The provincial division based on admittedly inaccurate census figures is most unjust.

Let us hope that this injustice will not be perpetuated and the Boundary Commission will partially undo the wrong. Justice demands that Lahore, Gurdaspur and some of the Colony Districts should remain with those who have the largest stakes in them and to whose ceaseless efforts for generations these areas owe their existing prosperity and who have raised them to their present cultural, social and political level.

50. All India Congress Committee Accepts Mountbatten Plan

AICC Resolution, 14–15 June 1947
AICC Papers, File No. G-56 (Part 2)/1947, NMML

The AICC has given careful consideration to the course of events since its last meeting in January last and, in particular, to the statements made on behalf on the British Government on February 20, 1947, and June 3, 1947. The Committee approves and endorses the resolutions passed by the Working Committee during this period.

The Committee welcomes the decisions of the British Government to transfer power completely to the Indian people by next August.

The Congress accepted the British Cabinet Mission’s Statement of May 16, 1946, as well as the subsequent interpretation thereof dated December 6, 1946, and has been acting in accordance with it in the Constituent Assembly which was constituted in terms of the Cabinet Mission’s Plan. That Assembly has been functioning for over six months and has not only declared its objectives to be the establishment of an Independent Sovereign Republic of India and a just social and economic order, but has also made considerable progress in framing the constitution for the free Indian union on the basis of fundamental rights guaranteeing freedom and equality of opportunity of all Indians.

In view, however, of the refusal of the Muslim League to accept the Plan of May 16, and to participate in the Constituent Assembly, and further in view of the policy of the Congress that ‘it cannot think in terms of compelling the people in any territorial unit to remain in an Indian union against their declared and established will, the AICC accepts the proposals embodied in the announcement of June 3, which have laid down a procedure for ascertaining the will of the people concerned.

The Congress has consistently upheld that the unity of India must be maintained. Ever since its inception, more than 60 years ago, the National Congress has laboured for the realisation of a free and united Indian, and millions of our people have suffered in this great cause. Not only the labours and sacrifices of the past two generations but the long course of India’s history and traditions bear witness to this essential unity. Geography and the mountains and the seas fashioned India as she is and no human agency can change that shape or come in the way of her final destiny. Economic circumstances and the insistent demands of international affairs make the unity of India still more necessary. The picture of India we have learnt to cherish will remain in our minds and hearts. The AICC earnestly trusts that when present passions have subsided, India's problems will be viewed in their proper perspective and the false doctrine of two nations in India will be discredited and discarded by all.

The proposals of June 3, 1947 are likely to lead to the secession of some parts of the country from India. However, much this may be regretted, the AICC accepts this possibility, in the circumstances now prevailing.

Though freedom is at hand, the times are difficult, and the situation in India demands vigilance and a united front of all those who care for the independence of India. At this time of crisis and changes, when unpatriotic and anti-social forces are trying to injure the cause of India and her people, the AICC appeals to and demands of every Congress men and the people generally, to forget their petty differences and disputes and to stand by vigilant, disciplined and prepared to serve the cause of India's freedom and defend it with all their strength from all who may seek to do it injury.

51. Gandhi Appreciates Congress Acceptance of Partition Plan
M.K. Gandhi's speech at AICC meeting in New Delhi, 14 June 1947
CWMG, Vol. LXXXVIII, pp. 153–7

BROTHERS AND SISTERS,

I wish I had made some preparations for this meeting. Unfortunately I could not. You will no doubt agree that no one could be as much hurt by the division of the country as I am. And I don't think that anyone can be as unhappy today as I am. But what has happened has happened. You know of my efforts in the building up of the Congress.

Why was the Congress Working committee formed? When a government has to be run, even if it is a government of the people, a cabinet of ministers has to be appointed. Our Working Committee performs a similar function. It acts in your name. You have the power to keep it going or to dismiss it. The Working Committee has on your behalf accepted partition. Now we have to consider what our duty is. If you want to throw out the resolution you can do so. But you cannot make any changes in it. If the Congress Working Committee has done this, it has done so deliberately and for certain weighty reasons. And this decision has been taken jointly by the Congress, the Muslim League and the British Government. The Working Committee does not approve of the scheme in its entirety. But even so it has accepted it. The Cabinet Mission plan had been devised by the British Government, but not this new plan. Both the Congress and the League have a share in its formulation. If you reject it, the world will call you irresponsible. You must therefore go along with those who have acted on your behalf. If you want to reject it, you must remember that what the country needs most today is peace. If you are sure that your rejecting the scheme will not lead to further breach of the peace and further disorders you can do so. Whatever you decide to do, you must do after a great deal of deliberation.

So many things are happening today which bring to mind the English saying about swallowing a camel and straining at a gnat. The decision that has been arrived at has been reached with your complicity and yet you complain of the Working Committee, the Working Committee which has men of such great calibre on it. Those people had always said that the Congress would not accept Pakistan and I was opposed to Pakistan even more. However we may leave aside my position. The decision has not been mine to take and the Working Committee has accepted it because there was no other way. They now see it clearly that the country is already divided into two camps.

But our constitution permits it and your duty demands it that if you feel that the Working Committee is in the wrong you should remove it, you should revolt and assume all power. You have a perfect right to do so, if you feel that you have the strength. But I do not find that strength in us today. If you had it I would also be with you and if I felt strong enough myself I would, alone, take up the flag of revolt. But today I do not see the conditions for doing so.

We have great problems to tackle and mere criticism cannot help in the solution of great problems. It is easy to criticize but doing some work is not so easy. The Congress has to its credit some important achievement but the Congress so far has not borne the responsibility of Government. It has not even had a look at it. It was kept busy by work which was even more important. Everything cannot be done at the same time. When now the responsibility of Government has devolved on us we have gladly accepted it and we have detailed some of our best workers for the job. There they have to grapple with some very intricate problems. They have to attend to the affairs of the millions of our countrymen.

I criticize them, of course, but afterwards what? Shall I assume the burdens that they are carrying? Shall I become a Nehru or a Sardar or a Rajendra Prasad? Even if you should put me in their place I do not know what I should be able to do. But I have not come here to plead for them. Who will listen to my pleading? But the President said that I should at least show my face here. Hence I have come to show my face and to speak a few words.

It is most important that you should understand the times. The demand of the times is that we should bridle our tongues and do only what will be for India’s good.

You will have seen from the newspapers what I have been doing these days. But you may also hear it from me. If through me something has been spoiled then it is my duty to use all my power for putting it right. It is open to me whether to spoil it further or to mend it. I shall cite here the example of Rama. His father went mad and his mother became foolish and Rama was exiled. The people of Ayodhya were grieved but it all led to something glorious coming out at the end. I do not consider the Ramayana as history but the lesson that is to be drawn from it is of daily use. It would be wrong to believe that Ravana had ten heads. But there was a Ravana that was adharma. It was this Ravana that Rama killed during his exile and saved dharma.

This is what we have to do today. We have to draw something good out of this bad thing. I am not the one to be upset by defeat. From my childhood up I have spent my life fighting and my struggle has been to extract good from evil. If there is gold in mud, even if there is a lot of the mud and very little gold it should not be thrown away. We should draw out gold and diamonds even from mud.

This decision puts both our religions on trial. The world is watching us. In the three-quarters of the country that has fallen to our share Hinduism is going to be tested. If you show the generosity of true Hinduism, you will pass in the eyes of the world. If not you will have proved Mr. Jinnah’s thesis that Muslims and Hindus are two separate nations, that Hindus will for ever be Hindus and Muslims for ever Muslims, that the two will never unite, and that the Gods of the two are different. If, therefore, the Hindus present at this meeting claim that India is their country and in it Hindus will have a superior status, then it will mean that the Congress has not made a mistake and that the Working Committee has only done what you secretly wanted. But if you want to save dharma you must be true Hindus. There are only a hundred thousand Parsis in India. Our ancestors gave them shelter and set an example in world history. Must we now kill them? And what shall we do with the Jews? We must so treat them that they will enjoy perfect freedom here. And what about the untouchables? It is said that Islam has risen to abolish untouchability. If you say that untouchables are nothing, the Adivasis are nothing, then you are not going to survive yourselves. But if you do away with the distinction of savarna and avarna, if you treat the Shudras, the untouchables and the Adivasis as equals then something good will have come out of a bad thing. There should be no distinction of high and low in a democratic polity. But if we oppress them and oppress those following other faiths then it will mean that we do not want India to survive, that we are out to destroy it. It does not matter if the land is divided. But if we divide the hearts then what the Congress Working Committee has done has been well done.

It is not a small thing that some States should secede from India. It is a very serious thing. Today and yesterday at the prayer I said a great deal about the States. I shall briefly repeat here what I have been saying. I myself come from a native State. Time was when I myself used to be severe with the States’ people telling them not to force their burden on the Congress for we were fighting against a third power and the States’ people also were giving us help in our fight. I had wanted them to consolidate that strength. But now with the British gone, we cannot let the Princes do as they please. Those of them who now want to be independent should ask themselves what good the British ever did them. They were content to be vassals of a foreign government, the British Government, for so many years, but now that the millions of India are going to have the reins of power in their hands the Rulers refuse to be subservient to the people’s government. I must tell the Diwans of all the States that if they do not advise the rulers to join the Constituent Assembly, they would be showing disloyalty to the Rulers. We do not want to be enemies of the Princes. If they want to be independent they may be independent. We shall not imprison them. If they want to stay on in the country, they must understand that their subjects are with us. If they do not want to stay in the country they may go and settle down in Paris or elsewhere. But if they want to remain in India they must remain as servants of the people. They must understand the implications of democratic government. They must concede that all men are created equal. They must not don the mantle of superiority. Only then can they survive for ever. They must recognize the paramountcy of the people as they recognized the paramountcy of the British Government. Then they can freely carry on in their own States. Only they cannot carry on as they did during the days of the British regime, plundering the people. They must dedicate themselves to the service of the people and become their true friends.

52. ‘The Unavoidability of Partition’
   Extract from Jawaharlal Nehru’s speech at AICC meeting in New Delhi, 15 June 1947

Friends and Comrades, Jai Hind!

India’s heart has been broken but her essential unity has not been destroyed. How will you repair the broken heart? It can be only on the basis of a programme.
The horrible riots in the Punjab, Bengal and elsewhere were no isolated riots. They were planned attacks. It seemed the administration had broken down and there was no authority left in the country to enforce order. How is it that the British officers who coped with the civil disobedience movements in the past were unable to cope with the present disturbances? Where there are Congress Ministries, disturbances were brought under control, but where the British exercised authority, there was chaos. In the Punjab where there was cent percent British officers in charge and divisions under the control of either Hindu or Muslim officers were comparatively quiet. The Interim Government was able to do nothing to protect the people.

Now it would be a futile controversy to go into the merits of Dominion Status versus independence. The most urgent task at present is to arrest the swift drift towards anarchy and chaos. Disruptive forces are at work and the most important disruptive force is that of the Muslim League. Our first task should be the establishment of a strong Central Government to rule the country firmly and to assure the individual’s liberty and life. All other questions are of secondary importance.

There is no question of any surrender to the Muslim League and what myself and my colleagues have agreed to is that the issue of partition should be referred to the people for a verdict. There is nothing novel in the plan for partition. The House will remember Rajaji’s formula on the basis of which Mahatma Gandhi carried on negotiations with Mr. Jinnah. At that time myself and my colleagues were in the Ahmednagar Fort. We discussed the question in prison. While we disagreed with the approach to the whole question, there was no disagreement on the fundamentals of the formula. It must be realised that it is not possible to coerce even with swords unwilling parts to remain under the Indian domain. If they are forced to stay in the Union no progress and planning will be possible. We must take the warning from China. Continued internal strife and turmoil will bring the progress of a nation to a standstill. In arriving at a decision we must look at the international context as well. The picture of the world today is one of destruction and impoverishment which by itself may prevent an immediate war but one can never say what will happen in the future.

The Congress cannot afford to act in an irresponsible manner by passing high-sounding resolutions. A responsible body must not think in terms of today only, but there is a tomorrow and a day after that. It will be ridiculous to suggest that the British would do everything before they quit. The June 3 statement could not have come about had there been no agreement. It is not an imposed award. Circumstances were such that the Congress agreed to it. It is not like one of those old decisions of the British Government which we could accept or reject. The acceptance for which I am wholly responsible does not mean that I agree to every word in the statement but I agree with the fundamental principles therein.

The riots in Rawalpindi, Multan, Amritsar, Calcutta, Noakhali, Bihar and elsewhere present the situation in a different light. To suggest that the Congress Working Committee took fright and therefore ‘surrendered’ is wrong. But it is correct to say that they are very much disturbed at the prevailing madness. Homesteads burnt, women and children murdered; and why are all these tragic and brutal things happening? We could have checked them by resorting to the sword and the lathi but would that solve the problem? Some people from the Punjab said that the Congress had let them down. What did they want me to do? Should I send an army? I am sad and bitter and India’s heart is broken. The victims in Rawalpindi said that they were being killed in order that the League might rule. The wound must be healed. With whatever we are able to salvage, we must plan out a programme on the basis of partition....
It is wrong to suggest that I and two others have decided the fate of millions. The Bengal Provincial Congress Committee and other responsible organisations in the province strongly supported the partition proposal.

The next question that arose was, having divided the Punjab and Bengal, has the Congress abandoned the Sikhs and the Hindus? An answer should be found. By high-sounding resolutions the Congress will not be able to help them. Even when the Punjab was one they were not able to help the people. An answer to this problem will no doubt be found. However, there is no reason why the minorities there should be tyrannised and persecuted. There may be individual cases of rioting but there is not much room in future for organised attacks on the minorities. I have nothing much to say about Sind and, so far as Sylhet is concerned, there is to be a referendum and I cannot forecast the result. I am much worried about the N.W.F.P. If Bengal and Punjab went out, the Frontier would be isolated. The question is now the subject of consultation between the Committee and the Frontier leaders.

The present, perhaps, is the most difficult period full of trials and tribulations. Today we have to shoulder responsibility. The first thing we have to do is to establish the independence of India firmly and set up a strong Central Government. Having established strong and stable government, all other programmes will not create much difficulty. The Congress has a heavy responsibility. You must bend all your energies to strengthen the Congress organization. We have to face dangers, both external and internal, and if we are not strong we will go down.

As for the Indian States, I will have something to say on the subject when the next resolution comes up for discussion. However, I am confident that the Congress will be able to deal with and solve the problem of the States. And if we proceed on the right lines the seceding provinces will also rejoin the Union.

I would ask the A.I.C.C. not to vote for the resolution out of any sympathy for the Working Committee but they must do so out of conviction.

53. ‘Traditions of Wholesome Nationalism to Be Followed’

Extracts from a report in The Tribune, 15 June 1947

New Delhi, June 14. The All-India Congress Committee commenced its session at 2.30 p.m. in the Constitution Club here to-day. There was a fairly good attendance of members and a small number of visitors were also present.

Armed guards stood outside as the members arrived. The proceedings commenced with the singing of ‘Vande Mataram’ after which the Congress President, Acharya J. B. Kripalani, addressed the session.

Congress acceptance of H.M.G.’s plan was already implied in the declared policy of the Congress that it ‘cannot think in terms of compelling the people in any territorial unit to remain in an Indian union against their declared and established will,’ said Acharya Kripalani, the Congress President addressing the A.I.C.C. today. Stating that this principle had been accepted by the Congress Working Committee in its resolution passed in September, 1945, Acharya Kripalani said: ‘If the majority of the people in Bengal, the Punjab, N.W.F.P. and Baluchistan wished to secede, we could not consistently with our principles, compel them not to do so. All that we could do was to see that the will of the people in those areas was clearly ascertained and further to see that in those districts of Bengal and the Punjab where the majority of people did not wish to secede, they were not compelled to do so. This the Congress has succeeded in doing.’
‘Though we have accepted the possibility of partition under certain circumstances,’ Acharya Kripalani said, ‘we have in no way given up our faith in the unity of India, which the Congress has cherished and worked for ever since its inception. This unity is both a geographical fact and a historical necessity. Indians are one people and one nation and no amount of political bargaining or bickering can undo the basic ties of kinship of blood, race and the heritage of a common culture. Though we may have to part company now, sooner or later this basic unity will assert itself and those who are anxious to break away now will be equally anxious to return to the common lap.’...

Resolution moved

Pandit Govind Ballabh Pant, moving the resolution, accepting H.M.G.’s Plan of June 3, said that this was the only way to achieve freedom and liberty for the country. It would assure an Indian union with a strong centre which could ensure progress and help the country take her rightful place in the world. In the Indian union the two-nation theory would not be tolerated and every citizen would have to give absolute and implicit loyalty to the state. Otherwise he would have no place in this country and would become an alien.

Congress, Pandit Pant said, had made every possible effort to come to an agreement with the Muslim League. Mahatma Gandhi had tried to negotiate with Mr. Jinnah. The Congress Working Committee, in its March resolution, invited the League for consultations. The Constituent Assembly, on numerous occasions, had invited the League members to help in the shaping of the future constitution of the country. But the League had ignored all these appeals....

Warning to Unpatriotic Forces

Concluding, Pandit Pant said that it was better to accept the statement of June 3 rather than fritter away their energies in trying to keep unwilling people in the Union. He urged Congressmen to bear in mind the directive to the country in the resolution to maintain a vigilant and united front when unpatriotic and anti-social forces were trying to injure India and her people. Congressmen should forget their differences and stand united and disciplined to fight such disruptive forces....

Azad Differs

Maulana Abul Kalam Azad, seconding the resolution, disagreed with Pandit Pant that the June 3 statement was superior to the Cabinet Mission’s proposals. He had all along held the view that the May 16 statement was the best solution of our problem. To that view he continued to adhere.

At his very first meeting with Lord Mountbatten, Mr. Azad said, he was asked if the country could wait for some time so that an agreement could be arrived at. He (Maulana Azad) told the Viceroy that the situation in the country would brook no delay and the question should be settled either way at once. He did not think that the present decision was the right decision but the Congress had no alternative. The choice before the Congress was not which plan to accept and which to reject but whether the present state of indecision and drift should continue. There was the only fortunate problem of internal disorder and strife and there was the obstinacy of the Muslim League. Taking into consideration all factors the Congress Working Committee came to the decision that an immediate settlement was urgently required and accepted the June 3 statement.

It might be argued, Maulana Azad said, that since the Congress had already accepted the State Paper, they should have stuck to it and declined to do anything further, but such a stand would hardly be the correct one under the present circumstances. The Congress stood by the ideal of a united India, but it was also committed to the principle of self-determination and was against coercing any unwilling areas to join the union.

Maulana Azad pointed out that even at this stage the State Paper had not been shelved. The people of the areas had to decide whether the State Paper proposals should continue or not. If by a majority they decided not to join the union then the Congress could not force them into the union. Whatever might be the result of the referendum or the decision of the Punjab and Bengal legislatures, he was sure that those provinces which now sought to...themselves away from India would in the very near future, hurry back to the union. 'The division is only of the map of the country and not in the hearts of the people and I am sure it is going to be a short-lived partition,' he said. The Maulana was confident India would soon emerge as a powerful and strong nation.

Having accepted a defective plan it should be our endeavour now to put it into practice in such a way that its defects were minimised. 'Our attitude towards our countrymen,' he said, 'should not undergo any change by the reason of the facts that certain parts had elected to secede.'

Mr. Rajkumar Choudhry from Noakhali moved an amendment seeking to add a new paragraph to the main resolution running as follows: 'In view of the desired goal of India's unity, the A.I.C.C. directs all Congress Committees in the country, including those in the areas to be partitioned, to so frame their policy and programme that the divided Indian of today may become united tomorrow by our mutual treatment of confidence and honourable co-operation.'

Mr. Choudhry realised that the Congress Working Committee had accepted H.M.G.'s Plan owing to inevitable circumstances and possibly because they had no other alternative. 'Let us accept what we have got,' he added, 'but let us direct Congress Committees inside Hindustan areas and also in the Pakistan areas to try for the re-union of Bengal and the Punjab with a view to achieving the final unity of India'.

Mr. Choudhry appealed to Pandit Nehru, Sardar Vallabhbhai Patel and Acharya Kripalani to get elected—at least one of them—to the Eastern Pakistan Constituent Assembly to ensure confidence among the Hindu minority in the Eastern Pakistan zone. He also made an appeal to the Hindus of the Indian union to treat the Muslim minorities in their areas fairly and properly. This would be one of the ways of safeguarding the Hindu minorities in Pakistan.

The President announced at the stage that he had received notice of an amendment from Mr. Sushil Chandra Dev to the effect that 'Sardar Patel should join the Pakistan Constituent Assembly with a view to making it effective in framing the future constitution of Pakistan and also to fight the battle with Mr. Jinnah (Laughter).'

The President ruled it out of order but announced amidst a roar of laughter: 'If you can induce Sardar Vallabhbhai Patel to go to Pakistan and fight with Mr. Jinnah I have no objection.'...

Injustice

Mr. Abdul Ghani moved an amendment suggesting to make it clear that the Congress was accepting the plan 'despite the fact that the procedure adopted for ascertaining the will of the people in the Frontier Province is deplorable'.

Mr. Ghani said he was sorry the Congress had let down the Pathans and Nationalist Muslims who had fought Pakistan. Why was a referendum not demanded in the Punjab and Bengal also? He was prepared for civil war but not injustice. Do not give victory to Mr. Jinnah and those who say Hindustan for Hindus and Pakistan for Muslims. You will create a lot of aliens among you....

Surrender to Brute Force

Mr. R.K. Shidhwa urged that the A-I.C.C. should unequivocally repudiate the two-nation theory.

Mr. Choithram Gidwani, the Sind Congress leader, in a forceful speech asserted that whatever might be the merits of the June 3 plan—and of course the Indian Union could have a strong Centre for which the Congress has been striving for it, cut at the very root of the unity of India. Despite the weakness of the May 16 plan it at least preserved the unity of India, an ideal which the Congress had cherished all these years.

But now that unity had been broken up. Already many of us princes were claiming absolute sovereignty and there were signs of India being broken into fragments. The unity of India was much more precious than the advantages of a strong Centre. He characterised the resolution as downright surrender to brute force and violence.

Acceptance Shows Weakness

Mr. Purushottamdas Tandon, the principal opponent to the resolution, in an impassioned speech said that the A.I.C.C. must reject it and that it was not sufficient for acceptance to say that an adverse vote would hurt the prestige of the Working Committee.

Mr. Tandon said: ‘The Working Committee is made by you who have been chosen by the people. The Working Committee may make a mistake but you must give your decision. I appeal to you to perform your duty. Compared to the people and to the country the Working Committee is a small thing. ‘Acceptance of the resolution will be abject surrender to the British and to the Muslim League. The Working Committee has failed you, but you have the strength of millions behind you and you must reject this resolution.’

The decision of the Working Committee was an admission of weakness. He said that the reasons, which even on their own admission, had persuaded the Working Committee to propose the resolution were that they were faced with difficulties, difficulties of administration due to the obstructive tactics of the League, to the large scale disturbances that had taken place in the country and to the fact that no agreement could be reached with the League.

But other countries had to encounter similar obstacles on the road to freedom, particularly the United States. We would have to face many greater difficulties than had come up hitherto. The Working Committee had accepted the plan in weakness and out of a sense of desperation.

At the same time they expressed the hope that they would later unite. That was dishonest. Those who had fought many a battle for India’s freedom were not frightened and they must be strong and resist. Those that were weak deserved no sympathy. They had resisted the British before and they could do so again.

In support of the resolution it had been said that Congress could not go back on its policy of non-coercion. If that was so, what would they say to the States who expressed their intention to remain independent. There would be numerous pockets of Muslims in India who would say they wanted to go to Pakistan. What would they say to them?

Concluding his eloquent plea for the rejection of H.M.G.’s plan of June 3, Mr. Tandon said the Congress had always talked of the people and never of Hindus and Muslims as it was doing today. But accepting the offer would not benefit either—Hindus in Pakistan would live in fear and Muslims in India would do the same. The Congress hope of building up a new synthesis of Hindu and Muslim culture would be shattered if the resolution were accepted....

54. Kripalani Comments on the Communal Situation in the Country
Extracts from the concluding speech by J.B. Kripalani at AICC Session,1 15 June 1947
AICC Papers, File No. G-47 (Part 1)/1946, NMML

When I became President of this great organisation Gandhiji in one of his prayer speeches said that it was not only a crown of thorns that I would have to wear but that I would have to lie on a bed of thorns. I did not realise then that it would be literally so. On the 16th October 1946 my name was announced as the president and on the 17th I had to fly to Noakhali. After that I had to go to Behar and now recently to the Punjab. These visits were a succession of shocks, one greater than the other. It is not only that many innocent lives are lost. Much more than the massacre of the innocent, what has affected me profoundly is the fact that our respective religions are being degraded. Both the communities have vied with each other in the worst orgies of violence, so that in the latest communal frenzy more cruel and heartless things have been done than at any previous time. I have seen a well where women with their children, 107 in all, threw themselves to save their honour. In other place, a place of worship, 50 young women were killed by their menfolk for the same reason. I have seen heaps of bones in a house where 307 persons, mainly women and children, were driven, locked up and then burnt alive by the invading mob.

These ghastly experiences have no doubt affected my approach to the question. Some members have accused us that we have taken this decision out of fear. I must admit the truth of this charge, but not in the sense in which it is made. The fear is not for the lives lost or of the widow’s wail or the orphans cry or of the many houses burnt. The fear is that if we go on like this, retaliating and heaping indignities upon each other, we shall progressively reduce ourselves to a state of cannibalism and worse. In every fresh communal fight the most brutal and degraded acts of the previous fight become the norm. So we keep on degrading each other, and all in the name of religion. I am a Hindu and am proud of the fact. But this is because Hinduism for me has stood for toleration, for truth and for non-violence, or at any rate for the clean violence of the brave. If it no more stands for these ideals and if in order to defend it people have to indulge in crimes worse than cannibalism then I must hang down head in shame. And I may tell you that often I have felt and said that in these days one is ashamed to call oneself an Indian.

I have been with Gandhiji for the last 30 years. I joined him in Champaran. I have never swayed in my loyalty to him. It is not a personal but a political loyalty. Even when I have differed from him I have considered his political instinct to be more correct than my elaborately reasoned attitudes. Today also I feel that he with his supreme fearlessness is correct and my stand is defective. Why then am I not with him? It is because I feel that he has as yet found no way of tackling the problem on a mass basis. When he taught us non-violent non-cooperation he showed us a definite method which we had at least mechanically followed. Today he himself is groping in the dark. He was in Noakhali. His efforts eased the situation. Now he is in Behar. The situation is again eased. But this does not solve in any way the flare-up in the Punjab. He says he is solving the problem of Hindu-Muslim unity for the whole of India in Behar. Maybe, but it is difficult to see how that is being done. There are no definite steps, as in non-violent non-cooperation, that leads to the desired goal.
And then unfortunately for us today though he can enunciate policies they have in the main to be carried out by others and these others are not converted to his way of thinking.

It is under these painful circumstances that I have supported the division of India. You know I belong by family and birth to the Pakistan area. My relatives and friends yet live there. When as back as 1906 I began my political career I never thought that I was working for the liberty of any particular portion of India. It was for the whole of India. Every nook and corner, every stream and mountain of the land is sacred for me. It shall so remain even after this artificial partition that separates brother from brother. Already in my opening speech I have said that in India at least one must not think in communal terms but in terms of India [sic] citizenship and in this respect I command Mahatmaji's advice given to us yesterday. If there is to be a united India again his policy alone will work.

The fear has been expressed that this decision does not and cannot stop communal rioting. This fear may be well or ill-founded. For the time being the prophets of evil seem to be in ascendancy. How are then future riots to be tackled? Will the vicious wide revolve, as it has revolved recently, on the basis of retaliation? This question I had already answered in my presidential address at Meerut. I said then that as the centre had refused to function the provinces became virtually independent. The Government in Behar should have given a warning to the Government of Bengal that if the Hindus who were living in Bengal were cruelly treated the Behar Government with the best will in the world could not be able to protect the lives of the Muslims resident in Behar. This would have meant that the issue had been raised to the international plan where organised governments deal with each other. The issue would have been taken out of the hands of the excited mob fury that knows no morality, no law, no restraint. Mob fury is always blind. International violence has at least some system and method about it. I am sure that those who hold the reins of authority after August 15th in India will make it their duty to see that justice is done to the Hindu minorities in Pakistan. If my words could carry weight with the Pakistan section of India I would say: 'Let the two Constituent Assemblies appoint a Joint Committee to go into the matter of the minority rights.' This may insure us against individuals and excited and fanatical mobs from taking the work of vengeance that is outside political moral law, in their own hands....

56. ‘Oude Should Constitute a Separate and Independent Unit’
Letter from Bahram Ali Mirza to M.A. Jinnah, 15 June 1947
Jinnah Papers, Vol. II, pp. 212–21

Golagunj, Lucknow

LONG LIVE THE QUAID-I-AZAM, LEADERS OF THE MUSLIMS AND BENEFACCTOR OF ISLAM!

Sir,

We hope to be excused for an intrusion upon your valuable time. But the nature of our mission which relates to the restoration of Oude is such that it cannot be deferred and compels us to bring the matter to your notice before it is too late.

Since your good self is the supreme commander of the Muslims of India, we implore you to intervene on our behalf and see that our wrongs are redressed and for this the present is the most opportune moment.

The Oude State was never conquered by the British and it can be proved on unimpeachable authority that the British took over the management of the Kingdom of Oude by assuming the role of a curator. They had also taken huge sums of money on loan from the Kings of Oude and interest on some of those securities is being paid by them monthly to the descendants of the Kings of Oude even to this day.

We are in possession of all relevant papers justifying our claim for the retrocession of Oude and we shall feel highly obliged if your good self condescends to grant us an opportunity of placing those facts before you for consideration.

In this connection, we further request you to go through a small book entitled Dacoity in Excelsis or The Spoliation of Oude, written by Major R.W. Bird, the last Assistant Resident of Oude, which will give you a clear insight into the pitiable case of the Oude State.

It must have also come to your knowledge through the papers and other channels that we have been demanding from time to time the restoration of Oude to its rightful claimants as an essential obligation long overdue. But it has proved a cry in the wilderness for want of influential support and powerful backing. Now that a statesman of your caliber has unfurled the banner of Islam and is at the helm of its affairs by the grace of God, our waning hopes have been revived and our energies have received a fresh stimulus.

The papers have hinted upon the determination of some members of the League High Command to demand the establishment of Oude as a separate province and the eviction or migration of its non-Muslim population. Politically it is an admirable counter-move to the agitation for the partition of the Punjab and Bengal besides its being otherwise a sound and sensible proposition.

We are ready to place all necessary documents in your hand, as stated before, so that you may be able to examine them in the light of law, equity and justice. Apart from the need for the emancipation of Oude on political grounds, it is imperative that Oude should constitute a separate and independent unit in accordance with treaty obligations and other commitments made by the British.

Again from Pakistan’s point of view, it is expedient to secure Oude to serve as a corridor between the Punjab on the west and Bengal in the east. A reference to the map of Oude will make it abundantly clear that Oude affords the main coign for such enterprise. Nay, it is not only essential to aid in the establishment and linking up of Pakistan territories but is replete with opportunities for developing ultimately into a Pakistan province.

In any case the restoration of the erstwhile Muslim State of Oude will be a priceless acquisition conducive to the fulfillment of the aims and objects of Pakistan—a valuable asset for our creed and our nation.

Your good self has condescended to advocate the cause of the Kalat State in Baluchistan and we are confident that the case of Oude will be found equally strong and just if handled by you. Perhaps the time has come for the resuscitation of the once fertile and vast Kingdom of Oude.

We pray to God Almighty for your long life and prosperity so that the prestige, lives and properties of the Muslims of India may be preserved.

We are anxiously waiting for a favourable reply from you.

We beg to remain,

Sir,

Your devoted servants and ardent admirers,

(Prince) Bahram Ali Mirza

Secretary,

Oude Restoration Mission

57. Reactions to the 3 June Plan from Bombay

Extract from a letter from John Colville to Louis Mountbatten, 16 June 1947

GOVERNMENT HOUSE, BOMBAY

My dear Dickie,

Thank you very much for your letter of 9th June, also for your reply to my telegram of congratulations. I was so stirred when I heard all the broadcasts on 3rd June that I could not refrain from sending you a joyful message. Whatever may be ahead it was a wonderful achievement and you have now got final Muslim and Congress acceptance.

2. On the whole the plan has gone well here though a section of the Press is still attacking it. Official Congress circles take their cue from the Centre and accept with some reluctance but in a realistic spirit; Socialists and the Mahasabha oppose and Communists violently attack it. Mahomedans on the whole are pleased, and with the idea of Pakistan conceded do not appear inclined to quarrel over the arrangements for division. The Prime Minister when he read the statement shortly before your broadcast was obviously pleased at the prospect of immediate Dominion Status. So I think are my other Ministers although they are less outspoken. Kher observed to me that he had fought all his life for freedom and he believed that Dominion Status in fact gave full freedom. The prospect of splitting the Army is causing real concern to the more thoughtful and the hope is expressed that out of that headache will come a common defence policy which could retain co-ordinated services.
58. Tit for Tat Will Destroy Both Islam and Hinduism

Extract from M.K. Gandhi’s speech at a prayer meeting in New Delhi, 16 June 1947

CWMG, Vol. LXXXVIII, pp. 163-4

BROTHERS AND SISTERS,

...If I can thus make myself heard by even the Hindus alone, you will see that India holds her head high in the world. I say nothing of the Muslims. They think I am their enemy but the Hindus and the Sikhs do not consider me their enemy. If the Hindus will heed my advice regarding the non-violence of the brave I shall tell them to throw their arms into the sea; I shall show them how the brave can rely on non-violence.

The Congress Working Committee consists of only a handful of men. I have seen that some of them are narrow-minded, as I could gather from one or two speeches. But I have information from all over India. They say, ‘Where will the Muslims now go? What the Muslims can do we can do, for we are in a majority. After the British leave we shall rule over them. We consider ourselves rightful rulers because we went to jail and submitted to beatings and whippings.’ It does not become us to talk in this way. This is violence. If you do not wish to listen to any talk of non-violence, if you are predisposed towards violence it is a matter of shame. If you go by the principle of tit for tat, you can take it that both the faiths will be destroyed. Islam will be finished, as also Hinduism.

If we practise the non-violence of the strong, the Pakistan that they have secured will only remain a plaything. We shall lose nothing through non-violence.

I do not consider Pakistan and India as two different countries. If I have to go to the Punjab, I am not going to ask for a passport. And I shall go to Sind also without a passport and I shall go walking. Nobody can stop me. They might say I am their enemy but if I went I would go not to become a member of some Assembly but to serve and it would not be for the first time in my life. I went to Noakhali and let no one imagine that, because it is now to be included in Pakistan, I would not go there again. A part of me lies there. I shall tell the Hindus there that if they are true Hindus they should not fear anyone even if they are surrounded by murderers.

I shall consider myself brave if I am killed and if I still pray to God for my assassin and I shall utter the name of God not with my lips alone but seeing Him in my heart. I shall not go to temples and mosques looking for God.

Today Badshah Khan, who has been so brave, is not able to show bravery. For years he has been instructing the Pathans in ahimsa. But today he says he cannot declare allegiance to India. If he did that there would be a carnage ten times as bad as in Bihar. What is he to do? Ahimsa is not a commodity which can be bought in the market. If we could display true ahimsa, the Frontier Province alone could save the whole of India.

The Muslims cannot drive a bargain with us. They cannot have all that they were given under the British regime. They cannot be given separate electorates if they ask for them. Separate electorates were a poisonous weed planted by the British but we shall be just to them. Their children will have as much opportunity of education as other children. In fact if they happen to be poor, they will have even more facilities. If we show such justice the people of India will have proved their courage....
59. ‘Swift Drift to Anarchy Must Be Checked—Disruptive Forces at Work, Warns Nehru’

Extracts from a report in The Hindustan Times, 16 June 1947

The A.I.C.C. on Sunday passed the Congress Working Committee’s resolution accepting H.M.G.’s June 3 statement by 157 votes to 29. Two hundred and eighteen members were present and 32 members did not vote.

Pandit Jawaharlal Nehru and Sardar Vallabhbhai Patel wound up the debate on the resolution which lasted nearly eight and a half hours. Both Pandit Nehru and Sardar Patel bluntly told the Committee that the alternative before them was either to accept partition or to be faced with complete ‘balkanisation’ and anarchy.

Both the leaders declared that today there was no responsible authority in India to maintain order. Their first concern should be the establishment of a stable Government in India which could ensure peace and progress.

The A.I.C.C. resumed its session at 2-30 p.m. on Sunday and continued the debate on the Working Committee’s resolution.

Swami Sahajananda, the Bihar kisan leader, opposing the resolution, said that the Congress had always stated that it would be no party to a division of the country and it would not use force to keep within the Indian Union any unwilling part. The present resolution, however, put a premium on division. The British could do what they liked, but the Congress could not cut up a living body, for India was not yet dead. There would not be just two parts of India but many more. Since Mr. Churchill had agreed in this plan and he was no friend of India there was bound to be something sinister about the plan.

Better Than May 16 Plan

...Mr. Ansar Harwani opposed the resolution and characterized it as a surrender to Mr. Jinnah’s obstinacy. The situation, he said was identical with that of Britain in 1939 when Chamberlain had adopted a policy of appeasement.

Mrs. Aruna Asaf Ali, President of the Delhi Provincial Congress Committee, said that some of those who were vigorously opposing the resolution today had on all previous occasions accepted the decisions of the Working Committee. They forget, however, that the resolution that was before the House was the logical consequence of those earlier resolutions to which, they had assented.

Joint Conspiracy

The Socialists, she said, do not oppose the Working Committee decisions just for the sake of opposition but because they had known that the British were planning to shackle the revolutionary urge in India. The present situation was created as a result of a joint conspiracy between Mr. Jinnah, Mr. Churchill and Mr. Amery. The Congress had expressed its readiness to accept Dominion Status, but this was a far cry from the Congress demand of complete independence for the whole of India.

India had been caught in the British trap. She said that she would have agreed to Pakistan if it could solve the present problem, but unfortunately it did not put an end to communal strife in the country and at the same time divided the country into two. Concluding, Mrs. Asaf Ali said that she would ask them to vote one way or another. They must exercise their own judgement....
SARDAR PATEL’S APPEAL

Following Pandit Nehru, Sardar Vallabhbhai Patel in a vigorous speech extended his full support to H.M.G.’s statement of June 3. Looking at the Cabinet Mission’s proposals today in the light of his experience in the Interim Government during the last nine months, he was not at all sorry that the State Paper had gone. Had they accepted the State Paper the whole of India would have gone the Pakistan way. Today they had 75 to 80 per cent of India which they could develop according to their genius and make it strong. The League could develop the rest of the country.

The League Council which met in camera evidently nursed the ambition to capture the whole of India after August 15. It was the duty of every Congressman to work unitedly to make India strong, to build up an efficient army and strengthen her economic position.

The House had listened to their leader, Pandit Nehru. Never in the history of the Congress before the A.I.C.C. had to take a decision on such an important issue. He fully appreciated the apprehensions of his brothers from Sind and Punjab. Nobody liked the division of India and his heart was heavy. But there were stark realities of which they should take notice. The choice was whether there should be just one division or many divisions. The fight today was not against the British. The British have no desire to stay on in India and if they wished to stay they desired to do so only with India’s consent. And definitely they had no desire to govern this country....

Chance for India

... Further, taking any other course other than the one which the Working Committee had suggested would not only be injurious but would also make the Congress the laughing stock of the world. Here was a chance for India to attain her independence. Was she going to throw it away? It would be incorrect to say ‘first let the British go away, then all questions could be solved.’ How were they to be solved and what would happen afterwards?

His nine months in office, Sardar Patel said, had completely disillusioned him of the supposed merits of the State paper. He had noticed that Muslim officials right from the top down to the ‘chaprasis’ except for a few honourable exceptions, were all for the Muslim League....

No Room for Groups

Sardar Patel said that they had now a great opportunity to develop over three-fourths of India. They had not much time to waste. There was food shortage. There was labour unrest. In Multan and D.I. Khan food and cloth had been burnt. He had been told that for another four years we could not expect any import of textiles, and if so even the small ration of 12 years per head could not be kept up. Conditions were such that everyone should apply himself to his work energetically. He had heard many complaints against the Congress. The criticism should be met.

Freedom was coming. Congressmen should work hard to make that freedom a living thing and to make India strong. They might have a five-year plan and work it to schedule. They must build up industries. They must build up the army; make it strong and efficient.

It would serve no purpose indulging in vague criticism of the Congress. Nor would it do as was the case with the Communists, who alternately backed the British and then the League, to denounce the Congress. The Working Committee had not placed the resolution before the A.I.C.C. in a light-hearted manner but did so with a clear conscience.
Warning to Travancore

On the question of Indian States, Sardar Patel referred to Travancore, and said he would like to know how that State could become a sovereign State. Probably the statesmen who made declarations of independence and sovereignty did not understand the implications of those terms. So long as the Congress continued to have a foothold in Travancore, there was no question of independence and sovereignty....

Pandit Govind Ballabh Pant then wound up the debate and the A.I.C.C. carried the resolution of the Working Committee by 157 to 29 votes. On the first count the votes were 153 for and 29 against, but after a recount the President Acharya Kripalani, announced that the resolution had been carried by 157 votes and 29.

Before the resolution was put to vote those amendments that had not been ruled out of order were either put to vote and lost or withdrawn.

The house then adjourned for tea after which the resolution on Indian States was taken up.—A.P.I.

60. Publication of Objectionable Articles

Letter from Vallabhbhai Patel to Louis Mountbatten, 17 June 1947

SPC, Vol. IV, pp. 149-51

New Delhi.

My dear Lord Mountbatten,

You will recall our previous correspondence regarding the omission to accept the announcement of 3 June in a straightforward manner on the part of the League. The promised statement by Mr. Jinnah has not yet come out. In the meantime, the Dawn has been indulging in editorials which are hardly indicative of the peaceful intentions of which we have heard so much in private, or consistent with the impression gained by you that the League has accepted the announcement as a settlement and has no further claims to make. The articles which it has been publishing are similarly open to objection. As a sample, I would invite your attention to two news-items [see enclosures] which have appeared in today’s Dawn. One relates to Moplahs’ demand for a separate homeland and the other demands the dissolution of the Assam Ministry and the recall of the Governor. You will note that both the news-items have been sent by Dawn’s own reporter.

Yours sincerely,

Vallabhbhai Patel

ENCLOSURE I

MOPLAHS’ DEMAND FOR SEPARATE HOMELAND IS BASED ON FACTS – MR. ISMAIL

New Delhi, Monday.—‘The Moplahs are racially different from the Hindus of Madras, being mostly the descendants of Arabs,’ said Mr. Mohd. Ismail, MLA, President, Madras Provincial Muslim League, explaining the resolution passed by the Madras Provincial Muslim League about Moplastan on 27 May.

‘Their religion, culture, civilisation, aspiration and outlook of life,’ he continued, ‘are different from those of the other inhabitants of the west coast of Madras. The Moplahs form the majority of the population in a considerable area of the west coast. The islands lying off the coast are populated exclusively by Moplahs.'
Towards Freedom: 1947 (Part 2)

The area in question is about 3,000 square miles in extent with a total population of 15 lakhs of whom about 9 lakhs are Moplahs.

In the matter of population and area Moplastan is bigger than Cochin, a neighbouring Indian States, and larger than many other Indian States; and is considerably larger than European States like Albania.

In the new orientation of the country and the provinces, the Muslims want that Moplastan must be treated as a separate entity. The Moplahs have been demanding it for some time now. There is no doubt that they are on a firm and just ground in this demand of theirs and the Muslims of the province unequivocally support the demand.'

A Moplastan convention is going to be held at Manjeri which is in the heart of Moplastan and necessary arrangements are afoot for making the convention a success.

ENCLOSURE II

IMMEDIATE DISSOLUTION OF ASSAM MINISTRY DEMANDED

Shillong, Monday.—'Immediate dissolution of the Congress Ministry in Assam in the interest of a free and fair referendum proposed to be held in Sylhet district to determine whether it should be amalgamated with Eastern Pakistan as envisaged in HMG’s Plan of 3 June’ has been demanded by Mr. M.H. Siddikie, Secretary, Muslim Chamber of Commerce and Industries, Assam, in a statement to the Press on Sunday.

‘The question of Immediate release of political prisoners, now that the civil disobedience movement is no more,’ Mr. Siddikie said, ‘has greatly agitated the Muslims of Assam. Taking advantage of the forced absence of our leaders, arch Muslim baiters like Mr. Basanta Das have set out on a whirlwind tour of Sylhet at the expense of public money for propagation of the caste Hindu view and this is being done under the very nose of Governor Hydari who has not kept it a secret that his sympathies are with the Hindu Congress.’

‘What’s the reason,’ he asked, ‘for keeping leaders still under duress particularly when a referendum knocks at the door? The reason appears to be that the enemies of Muslims are afraid of the tremendous popularity that our leaders enjoy among the people. They are afraid that once they are released all machinations and manoeuvres of the caste Hindu junta would miserably fail and ramshackle the structure of the house of Basanta Das which will fall into pieces.’

Continuing, Mr. Siddikie said that the Muslims of Sylhet will not grudge Mr. Das and his friends' political harakiri they have preferred to commit by [alienating] Muslims still further. He will never be able to keep Muslim Sylhet under caste Hindu domination. Instead of trying to create a rift in the ranks of the Muslims, Mr. Basanta Das will be well advised to keep his hand off from the land of Hazrat Shah Jalal.

‘Muslims need hardly be told,’ Mr. Siddikie added, ‘what Congress domination means to them. Fifteen months of Congress rule that has brought death and destruction to thousands of innocent Muslims is still fresh in the public mind. The Muslims and Scheduled Castes are determined to wipe out the rule of tyranny at least from the district of Sylhet and other non-Hindu districts.’

In conclusion, Mr. Siddikie appealed to the Viceroy to dissolve the present Ministry and recall Sir Akbar Hydari, else it was feared that the Muslims will be denied their legitimate role in the impending referendum.
My dear Shahrir,

... As you know, we have been intensely occupied here ever since Mountbatten came. As a result of numerous talks we have agreed to a division of India, that is to say to allow certain provinces and parts of provinces to vote themselves out of India if they so choose. Probably this process of voting, etc. will be completed within a month from now. The other process of a division of assets is a much more complicated one and will take longer. But the main picture should be clear enough by the end of July. You will appreciate that the division of the Army officers is a formidable difficulty....

About the 15th August there will be a major change in our constitutional position. The British Parliament is passing legislation to confer both upon India and the seceding part of it, Dominion Status. How does this Dominion Status fit in with our ideal of an independent Republic? As a matter of fact we adhere as before to our ideal of an independent Republic and our Constituent Assembly has already declared that in a Resolution of Objectives. When our new constitution is ready and we can give effect to it, I have no doubt that we shall declare India to be a sovereign independent Republic. Even Dominion status gives that right to complete independence and severance of any connection with Britain. We want to have close relations with Britain in many ways, but we do not want to give up the idea of the Republic. Indeed we could not do so because of the very strong public sentiment in regard to it.

Dominion Status is thus a temporary phase for an interim period to give place to other arrangements later. We have accepted this not in place of the other arrangements but only for the interim period.

Conditions in India have been very peculiar of late. In effect there is no real stable and final authority, although in law there is such an authority. The British Government which is still legally supreme cannot function satisfactorily and the administrative structure is breaking down. On the other hand no new authority can function. Thus there is deterioration and conflict in many places. It has become essential to get over this intervening period by the establishment of full authority in Indian hands. Every day’s delay adds to the confusion. Dominion Status, which will give us full authority by August next, will help us to meet these present conditions and to prepare the ground for a final changeover. What exactly our relations will be with the British Commonwealth I cannot just say now. But whatever they may be, I am sure that India will function as an independent Republic.

Perhaps you know that even in the British Dominions there is a strong tendency to loosen the present bonds that exist within the British Commonwealth. Canada and Australia object even to the words ‘Dominion’ and ‘Dominion Status’. It is clear that England has to face a very grave situation both in its domestic sphere and internationally. She cannot carry on an empire in any way. She seeks therefore friendly arrangements. The English people have shown better sense in this respect than the Dutch, for the Dutch really are much feebleler, and it is fantastic for them to think of holding on to an empire in any way. So also the French who are in trouble everywhere.

I have given you above some brief and rough idea of conditions in India at present so that you may be able to follow events here. We are going to have a difficult time during the next months, but we are determined to face every difficulty and to overcome it.
62. ‘At the A.I.C.C.’

Extracts from an editorial in Dawn, 17 June 1947

The decision of the All-India Congress Committee endorsing the Working Committee’s resolution on the British Plan of June 3 finalises the process of its acceptance by the Hindus of India. No one had doubted what the AICC’s verdict would be and therefore the floodgates of oratory need not have been so widely opened during its two-day session.... Not to speak of the lesser men and women who participated in the debate, some of them in a bitterly anti-Muslim mood, even Pandit Nehru, Mr. Patel and Mr. Kripalani said things that had better been left unsaid. Some of these unfortunate utterances cannot be allowed to go unchallenged.

These Congress leaders considered it necessary to refer to the communal disturbances which have tarnished the fair name of this sub-continent during the past nine or ten months, and in doing so they regrettably laid emphasis on the wrong places thereby painting the Muslims as the greater villains. The most heart-rending of all tragedies, the most brutal of all atrocities were those that were committed in Bihar, and to a lesser extent at Garhmukhteswar. But, to Bihar the Congress leaders made only passing references while of Garhmukhteswar they made no mention at all. Typical of this attitude was that passage in Pandit Nehru’s speech in which he mentioned ‘the riots in Rawalpindi, Multan, Amritsar, Calcutta, Noakhali and elsewhere’—as if Bihar was the least of all!...

The language of the Congress resolution and Pandit Nehru’s speech also show that the Congress is still obstinately and perversely holding fast to the illusion that India continues to remain one. The resolution speaks of ‘the essential unity of India’ and Pandit Nehru said: ‘India as an entity continues to exist except that certain provinces and parts of certain provinces now seek to secede.’ If this were only a case of men clinging pathetically to dreams and ambitions that have been shattered, in order today what Shakespeare called ‘the flattering unctions’ to their souls, we need have taken no notice of it. But there is a design underlying this attitude which is decidedly not honest. It is intended thus to continue to deceive foreign countries by keeping up the pretence that India as it has been known throughout the world since the days of British ascendancy still remains the same India and that the Hindus are about to become rulers of that India in succession to the British. We regret to have to use a strong expression, but to our mind this is no better than an attempt by the Congress to put across a diplomatic swindle on the world. Most foreign countries however have eyes and ears of their own, and we refuse to believe that this attempt to keep alive the fiction of an Akhand Hindustan that is dead will succeed in preventing the Chancellories of the world from recognizing a historic fact which is taking shape before their very eyes. Although Pandit Nehru would give Pakistan no better status than that of mere ‘seceding areas’ and although he would still have the world believe that ‘the Government of India is intact,’ it will not be long before he discovers that Powers greater than Hindustan have accorded to the great new country of this sub-continent, which is to emerge in two months’ time as the Sovereign State of Pakistan, the same recognition as to Hindustan. Indeed, this little bubble of the Pandit was pricked on the spot by none else than Mr. Patel who spoke on this particular point with greater realism. He said: ‘Today we have 75 to 83 per cent of India which we can develop according to our genius and make it strong. The League can develop the rest of the country.’ We would ask the unarithmetical Pandit Nehru to think it over!

Mr. Patel’s speech, however, contained certain passages which cannot but create concern in the minds of Muslims who will be living in Hindustan as a minority. He spoke of eradicating what he called the plague of communalism, weightage, etc., and he significantly added: ‘Now no more weightages.’ Is this a threat that the Muslims in Hindustan cannot expect from the Government a just and equitable deal? Is it a threat that the constitution of Hindustan will provide no safeguards whatever for the Muslims and that the Government of Hindustan will consider itself free to ignore all Muslim rights and interests?...

The question of the minorities will undoubtedly loom large in the very near future and will have to be settled. Mr. Kripalani has suggested that the two Constituent Assemblies should appoint a Joint Committee to go into the matter of minority rights. The suggestion does not represent any new idea, because it has always been understood that when the two sovereign bodies come into existence, perhaps the most important treaty which they will have to negotiate will be on the question of the minorities. We trust that these negotiations when they take place will lead to a satisfactory understanding. As far as Pakistan is concerned, the minorities can rest assured that the Government of Pakistan would not approach their problem in the same callous and cavalier fashion as Mr. Patel has referred to the Muslims in Hindustan.

63. Efforts for Consolidation of Army and Central Government Letter from Vallabhbhai Patel to K.C. Neogy, 18 June 1947
SPC, Vol. V, p. 72

My dear Neogy,

I have received your letter of 7 June.

2. You must have seen the proceedings of the AICC which has taken the final decision. We are now free to develop about 80 per cent of our country in our own way. If we can consolidate our forces, have a strong Central Government and a strong army, we can, during the course of five years, make considerable progress. If we can only make substantial progress in the development schemes that are pending, it would give great hope to the country.

3. In Bengal, the decision for a division will be taken on the 20th when there will be election for the Constituent Assembly. I know that you have no place [in] the future legislature unless you are accommodated somewhere in the Western Bengal elections. I will try my best to see that a place can be found for you.

4. Regarding the division of Bengal there seem to be no doubt now, and all bluffs and threats or inducements and offers of bribes have disappeared. Things are progressing smoothly.
Hope you are doing well.

Yours sincerely,

Vallabhbhai Patel

64. Relations with Hindustan and Pakistan as Commonwealth Nations
Letter from F.F. Turnbull to Ronald Harris, 19 June 1947

Mr. Harris’s note below refers to paragraph 4 of the Viceroy’s private letter of the 12th June, copy attached.

2. I think we should be very wary about this. Obviously one of the objections to partition which the Congress have always felt strongly is the possibility that Pakistan will fortify itself against Hindustan with the assistance of foreign powers, including in that term this country, the Americans and the Muslim States of the Middle East. Having been forced to agree to partition the Congress are now trying to re-insure themselves against such a possibility by giving it out that anyone who tries to give military or other assistance to Pakistan on a larger scale than to Hindustan will incur the displeasure of Hindustan. But they would not make so much noise about it if they were not frightened of the consequence.

3. We want good defence arrangements with Hindustan and Pakistan and good economic arrangements too. Just as this business of Congress suddenly coming round to Dominion status is partly due to the fear of Pakistan remaining in the Commonwealth and so getting the kind of advantages now in question, so it may turn out to be the case that we shall get much better arrangements with Hindustan by keeping open the possibility that if Hindustan does not give us good arrangements we shall come to more favourable ones with Pakistan. In short, to give the kind of assurance Mr. Gandhi wants might smite out of our hands the best negotiating weapon that we have or are ever likely to have, and moreover one which may be singularly effective for a long time to come.

4. Therefore, I think we should consider very carefully before making any statement of the kind the Viceroy propose. It may be desirable to make some such statement but I think it should be a little less pro-Gandhi than the Viceroy’s formula. I suggest it should begin by saying that we want friendly and close and effective arrangements with India in all fields, and particularly in the defence and economic field, on a basis of free negotiation, and that what we should like best is to have equally good arrangements with both parts. I certainly would not say that there can be no question of any differentiation. That would simply mean that, however uncooperative the Congress were, Pakistan could get nothing better however willing it might be. Also I would not say anything about a tripartite arrangement. The agreement itself is not by any means the whole of the matter. You can have an agreement which is worth very little if the other party does not cooperate in the proper spirit, and worth a lot if they do. If the agreement were tripartite everything that was done under it would require the assent of the new Dominion of India as well as of Pakistan. If it were not tripartite, we might be able, if it suited us, to do all sorts of things with the cooperation of Pakistan within the agreement which we could not do in Hindustan.

5. Surely the time has come when we can begin to consider British interests on their merits. Every opportunity should be given to Hindustan to cooperate on a friendly basis in the Commonwealth, but not on a basis which precludes somebody else from cooperating better. It will be remembered that the Chiefs-of-Staff recently took a strong view that if Pakistan or even Travancore or Hyderabad wanted Dominion status with the Commonwealth and Hindustan went out, it would be to the advantage of Imperial defence to allow them to have it.

65. ‘Illusions Bursting about Peace Resulting from Partition’

Extracts from a report in a Delhi newsletter by A.S.R. Chari in People’s Age, 22 June 1947

The week that opened with the Muslim League acceptance of the British plan of dismemberment has closed with the Congress leadership’s pressure on the AICC to accept the plan trusting in the wisdom of their leaders.
In both the League Council and in the AICC there was very strong dissatisfaction and a desire to reject the plan. But in both organisations the choice placed before the members was either to accept the plan or repudiate the leadership which had already agreed to the plan in its main essentials before Mountbatten went to London.

While Mr. Jinnah choked all criticism and thus secured overwhelming majority support for the plan, inside the Congress with its strong democratic traditions the process was more difficult.

Socialist Neutrality
The Socialist Party leadership which had all along bitterly opposed partition and abused Mr. Jinnah most unrestrainedly now decided to take up a neutral attitude on this issue, and Sj. Lohia who spoke in the AICC explained this stand by saying that once the AICC had given its assent to all the previous steps taken by the Working Committee it could not now reject the step which inevitably followed from all the past policies.

The argument, however, did not cut much ice and I heard some persons remarking that the Socialist Party had sold its soul for just two or three seats more in high places. Characteristically enough, Sj. Jaiprakash Narain was away and did not attend the AICC at all.

This attitude of the Socialist Party left the opposition in the hands of the Mahasabha-minded Congressmen, the Muslim Nationalists and the non-Muslim minorities from Pakistan areas.

Nevertheless, the opposition speeches so strongly echoed the widely resident sentiment in the AICC that despite the threat given at the very outset by President Kripalani that ‘if you reject the resolution you will have to relieve us of our responsibilities and choose another Working Committee’, the House cheered the opposition speakers repeatedly....

Time for Building
The fact of the matter is that on both sides the leadership believes that this partition solves the main conflict and that now each can rule his area in peace little realising that the very manner in which these two States are coming into birth lays down the basis of the relations between them as the British imperialists would like to have them.

I have asked Congressmen and Leaguers whether they believe that this plan will lead to peace, but I have come across not a single person who really feels that the communal bitterness will now end.

Mr. Jinnah in the League Council Session assured the minority Muslims that a strong Pakistan State would “step in” to aid them.

There are rabid Leaguers who say that just as Islam was born in the deserts of Arabia and grew and spread rapidly so also the Pakistan State will expand.

Master Tara Singh quite undeterred by the immense sufferings of the Sikh community in Amritsar and other places in the Punjab and the NWFP, still sabre-rattles declaring that the Khalsa will extend its sway up to the Chenab if not right up to Kabul.

Lust for Territories
Communal-minded Congressmen still talk of how in the days of Ashoka even Afghanistan was part of Hindustan.

Such is not yet, it is true, the way of thinking of dominant sections, but it indicates how the poison of extending territories is beginning to spread.

Sardar Patel in his speech in the AICC appealed to all groups in the Congress and outside to close up the ranks, co-operate in strengthening the Government, and rapidly industrialise the country so that the 75 to 80 per cent of territory that remains in India might be strong and prosperous enough to attract the parts that had seceded. This would also be able to check the expansionist ambitions of Pakistan if they ever chose to try it as they were threatening to do.

Acharya Kripalani in his closing speech said that if after separation the minorities in Pakistan were ill-treated, then the Government of India would serve a notice that if such things were allowed to go on, then the Government of India would not be able to hold back the people of Hindustan from wreaking their vengeance on the Muslims here.

It will be clear from all this that the leadership on both sides while talking and being desirous of peace, does not really believe that peace is won by this partition. The slogan is ‘Build your State, rapidly strengthen it so that while you are engaged in the arts of peace you are preparing for the aggression by the other side.’

The problem of minorities is also viewed as an issue that can only be settled by pressure tactics, by the theory of hostages.

On neither side is there a clear recognition of the fact that only the stopping of communal pressure tactics, the full democratisation of the State in both parts of India, the rapid abolition of landlordism and the nationalisation of key industries will make the friendly relations between them.

British Prop Them Up

It must be obvious that reactionary vested interests alone are interested in setting sections of people against each other and a system that leaves them in power will strengthen not the forces of peace and friendly relations but those elements that want communal discord and hostility and war between the two States.

The British who are quitting as rulers only to stay longer as “friends” of both the States will play a large part in the encouragement of these forces.

On the most important question as to what are the immediate propose as far as communal peace is concerned, the arson and murders that are now still going on in Lahore, Amritsar, Calcutta and even in Bombay and Cawnpore with days-long curfew are an obvious pointer.

‘Prophets of Evil’

Acharya Kripalani told the AICC that the Working Committee had accepted division to put an immediate stop to these savageries, but that there were ‘prophets of evil’, some in revolutionary groups, who said that this could not be achieved in this manner and it seemed that these prophets were right.

If this is so when both sides have accepted the Mountbatten Plan and issues appear to be ‘settled’, one can easily imagine what the position would be like when all the unsettled issues, and there are scores of them, come up shortly....

Boundary Commission

...Even if terms of reference and personnel are settled the fixation of boundaries is not likely to be done without big trouble in the areas concerned. For it is a fact that all sides to the dispute are thinking in terms of adopting a scorched earth policy if each does not get the town or area that it demands.

For instance, the Punjab Muslims say, that they would see Amritsar in ashes before they hand it over to the Sikhs, and what is going on now there is nothing but this policy in practice because it is felt that Amritsar will without doubt go out of Pakistan.
The Akalis declare that if they do not get the rich colony areas in Montgomery and Lyallpur as they have demanded as pioneers who developed the area, they would far rather blow up the irrigation dam-head rather than hand over the fruit of their efforts to the Muslims.

Battle for Calcutta

In regard to Calcutta, the position is very similar. The Muslim Birla—Ispahani—has all his property and interests in the city. Muslims in Calcutta do not want to lose Calcutta which is not only a growing port, but is regarded by all Bengalis as the very heart of Bengal.

Today, Calcutta is under threat of destruction. A prominent Muslim League Minister is reported to have told a Hindu coal magnate that he should write off Calcutta from his sphere of operations. If Pakistan got it, then the Hindu capitalists will have no place in it, and if it did not get it, then Calcutta will not be worth having because nothing will be left of it.

It is a shameful fact that everyone has showered compliments on Mountbatten though he has followed the traditional British game of promising every party that it will get final boundaries which are nearer to its heart’s desire. This is probably why everyone is lost in admiration of Mountbatten, for he smiles and talks nicely and is all these to all men. A very successful Viceroy indeed!

66. India Faces the Threat of Balkanization

M.K. Gandhi’s speech at a prayer meeting in New Delhi, 24 June 1947

_CWMG, Vol. LXXXVIII, pp. 204–5_

Brothers and Sisters,

This bhajan dwells on the piteous plight of Rama in the story. Here is Rama, about to be crowned but ordered to go to the forest as an exile! Can there be anything more pitiable? Something similar is now happening before our eyes. There is on the one hand rejoicing everywhere in the world at the British Government’s decision to grant Dominion Status to India. On the other hand we are engaged in a fratricidal strife in the name of defending religion. I receive many letters every day attacking me. Some say I have destroyed the Hindus, some others that I have been appeasing the Muslims. They make no impression on me. I seek to appeal to no one except God, for we are all His creatures, His servants. And why should I allow myself to be annoyed by these letters? How have I offended? I only say that no one can protect his religion by doing sinful things or by committing atrocities on others. This applies to Hindus and Muslims alike. That Pakistan is a bad thing, I agree. What is there to rejoice over it? Our country has been divided. What is there to celebrate? For the last sixty years, since I was a schoolboy, I have believed that all Indians, be they Hindus, Muslims, Parsis or Christians, are brothers. Now that our land has been divided, does it mean that we should divide our hearts? How can the people of a country become two peoples? India can have only one people. When I say this they abuse me. Shall I listen to them and become a murderer? By so doing I shall only be harming myself. One is one’s own foe as well as one’s own friend. Hindus alone can destroy the Hindus and no one else.

Today flames are raging everywhere. Hinduism will be saved only if we can save ourselves from these flames. My physical powers are waning. I am no longer strong enough to put up with this heat. It is a permanent law that truth ever triumphs and falsehood perishes. What I say is not addressed to the feeble of heart but to those who are brave and unselfish, those who know how to die defending their mother, their daughter and their religion. The man who can die happily is more courageous than the man who kills. I want the whole of India to rise to this standard of valour.

I shudder to see what is going on everywhere around me. With whom must I argue? We are looking up to the British. How long must we? After the fifteenth of August the British will have left. Whom shall we look up to then? It has been suggested that Punjab should be placed under martial law. I have seen Punjab once placed under martial law. I know what martial law means. It cannot change men’s hearts. I shall still say that if Muslims want to save Islam, Hindus Hinduism and the Sikhs their Gurudwaras, they must together resolve that they will not fight. If there is a dispute over division it should be settled not through resort to force but through arbitration.

Sir C.P. says that Gandhi and the Congress are all too willing to grant independence to N.W.F.P. but not to Travancore. How can a learned man like Sir C.P. say such a silly thing? If Travancore becomes independent then Hyderabad, Kashmir, Indore and other States will also declare themselves independent and India will be Balkanized. Then Badshah Khan does not want to secede from India. He says that he will not join Pakistan. Must he then be a slave of the Hindus? It is said that the Congress has been bribing him. If the Congress had resorted to bribery to gain support of people it could not have survived. Badshah Khan tells us to frame our Constitution first. In the meanwhile he will have come to some decision. But what Sir C.P. says is something quite different. In N.W.F.P. it is the voice of the people. But in Travancore it is a Maharaja and his Prime Minister speaking on behalf of the Hindus. Sir C.P. cannot throw dust into people’s eyes by advancing the example of N.W.F.P. I would suggest to Sir C.P. that Travancore should come into the Constituent Assembly.

67. ‘Sind League Welcomes Delhi Decision’

Extract from a report from Dawn, 24 June 1947

KARACHI, Monday.—Plans to prepare the people of Sind to receive power when transferred by the British were discussed by the Council of the Sind Provincial Muslim League which, at its meeting today passed a resolution welcoming the decision of the Muslim League High Command to accept HMG’s June 3 Plan.

Mr. Yousuf Abdullah Haroon, President of the Provincial Muslim League presided over the meeting.

The Council called upon the Muslim members of the Sind Assembly to vote for the resolution that Sind should enter the Pakistan Constituent Assembly. Moving the resolution Mr. M.A. Khuhro, a member of the Working Committee of the All-India Muslim League gave them the background of the talks at New Delhi and said that Sind Muslims will greatly benefit and they had a bright future in Pakistan particularly when Karachi became the capital of the Pakistan Dominion Government. The resolution was unanimously passed.

Another resolution moved by Mr. M.H. Gazdar expressed ‘grateful appreciation for the magnificent services rendered by Mr. Jinnah to the Muslims of India.’

The Council assured Mr. Jinnah that Sind Muslims would undergo all sufferings in order to build-up a peaceful, progressive and happy Pakistan. Mr. Gazdar in a forceful speech paid tributes to the services of Mr. Jinnah and said that but for Mr. Jinnah’s efforts the ideal of Pakistan would have remained but an empty dream....
68. ‘Strong Centre Will Emerge out of Division’
The Tribune, 25 June 1947

Cuttack, June 24.—‘The settlement of the Bengal partition issue and the decision of the Hindu majority section of Bengal to join the existing Constituent Assembly will enable the emergence of a strong Union Centre,’ said Mr. Jai Prakash Narain the Socialist leader, in the course of an interview here. Mr. Jai Prakash Narain explained that though the continuity and structure of the Constituent Assembly might not violently be disturbed, henceforth it could not function under the terms and restrictions of the Cabinet Mission’s Plan. It would have to think in terms of a strong centre in respect of provinces and a loose one in respect of states. If states like Travancore felt so sure of her people’s support for the rulers’ move to declare independence, let a referendum on the issue be made and a verdict of the people obtained.

Asked about his reaction to the antagonistic attitude of official Congressmen towards the Socialist Party, Mr. Jai Prakash with warmth said: ‘If they want to cut their noses let them do so. We cannot act foolishly; we are Congressmen and will continue to remain in Congress so long as unsettled political conditions prevail and independence is not attained’—Globe.

69. ‘H.M.G.’s Plan “Unacceptable”—Defects to Be Removed’
The Tribune, 25 June 1947

Amritsar, June 24.—The Working Committee of the Shiromani Akali Dal, after several hours’ discussion in its meeting with Giani Kartar Singh, M.L.A., as President, passed a number of important resolutions, including one on the June 3 plan of H.M.G., which was declared as ‘unacceptable to the Sikhs’ and asked the Sikhs to put in all-out effort to have the defects of the plan removed. The resolutions are as under:

1. The Working Committee has, after deep deliberation, come to the definite conclusion that the latest plan of H.M.G. and subsequent developments are detrimental to the Sikh interests and as such unacceptable to the Sikhs.

It gives no political power or status to the Sikhs nor any means for the protection of their interests in either of the areas, despite the fact that their demand for partition of the Punjab was made to have an area where they could preserve their entity and develop their culture unhampered. The Shiromani Akali Dal profoundly feels that the time has come for the Sikhs to put in all-out effort to have the above defects of the plan removed.

2. After mature consideration, the Working Committee has reached the definite conclusion that it is essential that Sikh States should form a union of their own within India, to achieve a distinct position for themselves in the constitutional set-up of the country, thereby strengthening the Panth.

3. This meeting has learnt with great pain and sorrow that the N.W.F.P. Government has taken no steps for the maintenance and protection of Gurdwaras left by the Frontier Sikhs, who have been forced to migrate from the province. This meeting calls upon the provincial Government to take measures for the protection of Gurdwaras in N.W.F.P. till the return of the Sikhs.
70. Shock Expressed at the Congress Acceptance of Partition

Letter from J.K. Dutt to P.D. Tandon, 26 June 1947
P.D. Tandon Papers, File No. 42, Microfilm Acc. No. 369, NAI

Dear most respected Mr. Tandon,

Your address at Swami Ji Ka Mandir at Yehiapur is definitely one of the most immortal truths ever uttered by real patriot of our country. I have never taken part in politics of our country and yet I thoroughly agree with you when you say that the Congress, the Muslim League and the British Government—all have committed the greatest blunder in agreeing to partition India, although the motives of the three parties are quite different.

I am a Bengalee by birth but a true cosmopolitan in ideas, and that is why, I have been bitterly shocked to find that the Congress, which has been fighting for the unity of India, has at last become a party to the division of India, whatever may be its apology. You must pardon me for the remark that Mahatma Gandhi alone is responsible for the emasculation of the Hindus. His creed or policy of non-violence is a direct challenge to the teachings of the Gita and to the whole history of the human race. I have been thoroughly convinced that unless the political leaders of our country are thoroughly rid of the influence of Mahatma Gandhi in the political field, our country shall have to pay much dearer penalties in the near or distant future. I must say at the same time that for our social reforms Mahatma Gandhi can remain our eternal guide. If you just think of Mr. Jinnah, you will find him a man of action. He has actually achieved what he could never dream of, whichever party may have been at his back. Mr. Jinnah never yielded a single point to any body, and that is why, he has won the battle. But Mahatma Gandhi has been bartering away his body and soul in order to conciliate his enemy, and he has achieved nothing but complete defeat and also lost the confidence of the vast millions.

This letter to you may appear to be quite uncalled-for. I am an educationist and a penman. By holding jobs in colleges I have not been able to serve my country. Of course, I have written a few political books besides more than one hundred educational books. But I have been feeling as a penman that unless one can flatter a particular school of thought, one is sure to be ranked with a fool or a lunatic. I have been rather very free and bold with my pen, and that is why possibly, I have not been heard at all inspite of the widest publicity of some of my books. I do not regret in the least on that account, because broadcasting my own independent views to the world is my hobby.

I once approached you for a little contribution from your pen to one of my books and you very kindly sent me your blessings, but unfortunately, that book did not see the light. I still possess your letter as a precious autograph.

If you think, I can be of any service to my country at this psychological moment, I am ready to be guided by you. I have got only two weapons—my pen and my tongue. If you have any solid and constructive scheme for working out the unity of India and re-generation of the Hindus, and if you think that my tongue and my pen can be helpful to that scheme, I would not mind working under your .... But I have got certain handicaps, which I must tell you plainly. I have got heavy family liabilities, being the father of six school-and-college going children. I need at least Rs. 500 per month for the maintenance and education of my children. You must not think that I am begging any job from you. I am already on a permanent job as Principal of an affiliated and Government-aided college. Of course, I am thinking of shifting to some other province and I have got one or two offers, which I may accept. But my ambition is no longer to merely hold jobs, and that is why, I am seeking your advice and help. This is a big moment for India and a big moment for the constructive talents too. You can give a serious thought to my proposal and see how far it is possible for you to utilize my services in any of the big centres in U.P., by putting me in charge of a responsible organization under your guidance to help the unity of India and the regeneration of the Hindus. At present, I am in full sympathy with the ideas and programmes of the All-India Hindu Mahasabha organization.

If you kindly reply to my letter, please direct your reply to 1, Cooper Road, Lahore, which is my present address.

With great regards,

Yours most respectfully

Sd./-

71. Congress Will Not Subjugate Minorities
Letter from M.K. Gandhi to Louis Mountbatten, 27/28 June 1947
CWMG, Vol. LXXXVIII, pp. 225–7

Dear Friend,

I sent you a note in the afternoon. The time after the evening prayer and walk I wish to devote to talking to you on certain matters I was able to touch but could not develop when we met.

I told the Parliamentary Delegation that heralded the Cabinet Mission and the Cabinet Mission itself that they had to choose between the two parties or even three. They were doomed to fail if they tried to please all, holding them all to be in the right. I had hoped that you were bravely and honestly trying to extricate yourself from the impossible position. But my eyes were opened when, if I understood you correctly, you said that Qaid-e-Azam Jinnah and the League members were equally in the right with the Congress members and that possibly Qaid-e-Azam Jinnah was more so. I suggested that this is not humanly possible. One must be wholly right in the comparative sense. You have to make your choice at this very critical stage in the history of this country. If you think that Qaid-e-Azam Jinnah is, on the whole, more correct and more reasonable than the Congress, you should choose the League as your advisers and in all matters be frankly and openly guided by them.

You threw out a hint that Qaid-e-Azam might not be able to let you quit even by 15th August especially if the Congress members did not adopt a helpful attitude. This was for me a startling statement. I pointed the initial mistake of the British being party to splitting India into two.
It is not possible to undo the mistake. But I hold that it is quite possible and necessary not to put a premium upon the mistake. This does not in any way impinge upon the very admirable doctrine of fair play. Fair play demands that I do not help the mistaken party to fancy that the mistake was no mistake but a belated and only a partial discharge of an obligation.

You startled me again by telling me that, if the partition had not been made during British occupation, the Hindus being the major party would have never allowed partition and held the Muslims by force under subjection. I told you that this was a grave mistake. The question of numbers was wholly untenable in this connection. I cited the classic example of less than one hundred thousand British soldiers holding India under utter subjection. You saw no analogy between the two instances. I suggested the difference was only one of degree.

I place the following for your consideration:

(a) The Congress has solemnly declared that it would not hold by force any Province within the Union.

(b) It is physically impossible for millions of caste-ridden Hindus to hold well-knit though fewer millions of Muslims under subjection by force.

(c) It must not be forgotten that Muslim dynasties have progressively subjugated India by exactly the same means as the English conquerors later did.

(d) Already there has been a movement to win over to the Muslim side the so-called scheduled classes and the so-called aboriginal races.

(e) The caste Hindus who are the bugbear are, it can be shown conclusively, a hopeless minority. Of these the armed Rajputs are not yet nationalists as a class. The Brahmins and the Banias are still untrained in the use of arms. Their supremacy where it exists is purely moral. The Sudras count, I am sorry, more as scheduled class than anything else. That such Hindu society by reason of its mere superiority in numbers can crush millions of Muslims is an astounding myth.

This should show you why, even if I am alone, I swear by non-violence and truth together standing for the highest order of courage before which the atom bomb pales into insignificance, what to say of a fleet of Dreadnoughts.

I have not shown this to any of my friends.

If I have misunderstood you in any single particular you have only to correct me and I shall gladly accept the correction. If I am obscure anywhere, I shall try to remove the obscurity either by letter or by meeting according to your wish.

My anxiety to save you from mistakes as I see them is the sole excuse for this letter.

Yours sincerely,

M.K. Gandhi
72. Report from Madras

Extract from the fortnightly report for Madras for the first half of June 1947, 28 June 1947

Home Poll (I), File No. 18/6/47, NAI

...POLITICAL:—His Majesty’s Government’s proposals for the transfer of power have been on the whole well received. There is satisfaction and relief that all the principal Indian parties have accepted the new plan although it does not fully satisfy the demands of any one party. People have been quick to reconcile themselves to a partition of India which they have come to recognise as inevitable on account of the resolute Muslim League stand. The opposition to a partition of the country has been to some extent disarmed by the proposal to partition the Punjab and Bengal provinces—a proposition which was considered a natural corollary to the demand for Pakistan. There is less satisfaction over the decision to hold a referendum in the North West Frontier Province and it is argued in some quarters that there were not sufficient reasons for differentiating between that Province and the Punjab and Bengal provinces in the method of eliciting their decision regarding their future constitutional position and status. The chief merit of the new plan, however, is that it promises to call a halt to the blood shed and devastation which have cast such a dark shadow on recent Indian history, and it is earnestly hoped that that promise will be fulfilled. The future of the Indian States as to which the British Government’s Plan is silent has naturally evoked much discussion. The decision of Travancore and Hyderabad to stay out of the Constituent Assembly and declare their independence has been attacked as short-sighted and retrograde.

Typical of Communist reactions to the Plan was the speech of S.M. Kumaramangalam at a meeting in Madras on 4-6-1947. He condemned the division of India and characterised the entire plan as a subtle and cunning device of the British to continue their hold on India and to deny to India its exalted position in the comity of nations. Muslim League reactions are not yet clearly evident, but it is interesting to note that the Provincial Muslim League at a meeting on 29-5-1947 resolved that when Britain parts with power in India, the territories of the Nawab of Carnatic, taken over by the East India Company in 1801, should be restored to the original owners, the present descendants of the Nawab. ...

73. External Cooperation to National Government

Extracts from M.K. Gandhi’s talk with Prabhavati Narayan and others, 30 June 1947

CWMG, Vol. LXXXVIII, p. 247

And it is possible that the experiments which were successful there may be quite unsuitable for this country and we may as a result find ourselves in the plight of a washerman’s dog. If you listen to my advice the best course, and the only course, for all of us is to extend as much co-operation to the National Government as we can. If you are opposed to certain things, if you do not like a particular policy, then you only have to...They are all very wise men. They will certainly listen to you if you try to explain to them your point of view. Give them as much active help as possible. We are all one body. If there is a thorn in one foot the whole body suffers for it. One feels relieved only when it is taken out. Similarly, we all have to suffer for the mass-slaughter going on in the country. What can Sardar and Nehru alone do? There are only a handful of such wise men in the country today. Do not let your abilities be frittered away when the National Government is about to be formed. Utilize them in useful activities. It is not as if politics were the only field of service. There are so many others which are untrodden. Take up the one in which you are interested. Bear in mind the welfare of the country. I do not wish to say anything more.

74. Protest by Savarkar against the Vivisection of India
Statement by V.D. Savarkar, 1 July 1947
Savarkar and Joshi (Eds), Historic Statements — V.D. Savarkar, pp. 201–4

The following message was delivered by Veer Savarkarji for 3rd July 1947, a day which was observed by the Hindus as the Black Day and the Day of Protest against the vivisection of Hindusthan.

My message to Hindudom even on this Black Day in our History is to assure it once more, “Despair not!—a glorious future awaits the Hindus—if only they do not betray themselves!!”

This is not a mere rodomontade I am indulging in. Taking stock of all things past and present it amounts almost to the certainty of a law.

For, all laws are but generalizations primarily based on detailed observations. The detailed observation of the history of Hindus through centuries on centuries points incontrovertibly to the fact that the Hindu Nation is imbued inherently with such an amazing capacity for resurrection, of renaissance, of rejuvenation that the Black Day which finds them completely overwhelmed by anti-Hindu forces is precisely the moment which ushers in the Day of their Deliverance—to quote the Pauranic style—of the birth of an ‘Avatar’!! It was in the Darkest hour of the Night that Shri Krishna was born. It is the indomitable spirit of inherent vitality that has enabled our National Being to prove almost immortal in relation to other races or nations—ancient or modern and invested it with that strength which ultimately demolished and swept away all anti-Hindu forces which raised their head from time to time against us.

Where are the Greeks who accompanied Alexander and his successors right down to the Ganges and were driven back by the triumphant Hindu forces under Chandragupta beyond the ranges of Hindu-Kush! Not only that race of the Greeks but even the gods they worshipped are dead and gone! Dead, gone and forgotten are also the Huns who overran all Europe but were smashed in the battlefield by Hindu sword and surrendered or got converted to Hindudom through the Baptism of our Sacrificial Fire. Where are the mighty hordes of the Shakas? Defeated, driven out of Hindusthan and effaced so completely as an alien race that their very identity has become a matter of mythological conjectures. Then came almost within living memories, speaking historically, the Moslems!—What about them?

The Moslems are never tired of asserting that they came to India as conquerors and subjugating all Hindusthan raised up a mighty Moslem empire there. But they fight shy to tell the sequence. They shudder to revise the end of that story and try to hide it even from themselves! True it is that the Moslems came to India as conquerors but they stayed out too long to hold out against the marvellous capacity of the Hindus to stay out in the field and win in the long run. To validate this historical fact just look at the following two pictures.

This Picture and That
Just take up the map of Hindusthan about 1600 A.D. The Moslems ruled all over Hindusthan unchallengeably. It was a veritable Pakistan realized not only in this Province or that but all over India. Hindusthan as such was simply wiped out. Then open out the map of India about 1700 to 1798 A.D. and what do you see? Beating the Moslem Army to a chip in hundreds of battlefields the Hindu forces are marching triumphantly throughout India. The very Moghal throne at Delhi is smashed to pieces literally with a hammer by Sadashivrao Bhau, the Generalissimo of the Marathas.

Our Hindu-Sikh Brotherhood does ultimately deliver the Punjab and Kashmir from the Moslem yoke and rules supremely from the borders of Tibet to the banks of the Kabul River;
Our Gurkha Hindus ruling Nepal, while the Marathas from Delhi to Rameshwari have planted the Hindu Flag from Capital to Capital, from temple to temple. The Moslem Empire which rose like a rocket fell like a stick and on its ruin rose up once more the Hindu Hindusthan resurrected and victorious.

It will do good even to the Moslems if they realize the import of this historical truth. The fate which overtook them when they had succeeded in converting the whole of Hindusthan into an actual and factual Pakistan led by the might of an Aurangzeb cannot but overwhelm the puny Pakistan of to-day led by Mr. Jinnah! If they still want to try again let them try to do their worst.

And let the Hindus too rise up and try again. Nothing has happened in the meanwhile so detrimental to Hindu Strength as to make us doubt our fitness to survive in the struggle for existence. The undying spirit of renaissance, of rejuvenation so inherent in our race shall assert itself once more and out of the very womb of the darkness of this Black Day in our History shall burst out the Golden Dawn of a triumphant To-morrow,—if only O Hindus, you do not betray yourselves.

In this faith let the Hindus rise and renew this vow,—

1. that we Hindus are a nation by ourselves,
2. that Hindusthan, this Bharat Bhoomi from the Indus to the Seas is our Fatherland and Holy Land,
3. that in spite of the treacherous betrayal by the Congressite pseudo-nationalism in its abetting the crime of vivisection of our Country and our State, we Hindus shall continue to resist the revolting Pakistani areas till they are forced to get re-annexed to our Central and Sovereign Akhand Hindusthani State.
4. That to achieve this consummation we will HINDUISE ALL POLITICS AND MILITARISE HINDUDOM.

76. Congressmen Should Muster Support against Partition of India
Letter from Jugal Kishore to Ram Ratan Gupta, 7 July 1947
AICC Papers, File No. G-6(II)/1947, NMML

G-6/385

Dear Mr. Gupta,

I was in receipt of your circular letter dated June 7th. I am sorry I have not been able to acknowledge it earlier. We are all sorry that there should have been partition of India. We made our best efforts to prevent it but force of circumstances and urgency of the situation demanded that we should make some decision unless we allowed things to drift further into chaos and anarchy. The British Govt. having decided to leave India by a certain date, we could not allow things to drift without coming to some decision. So now the question of partition is a settled fact. What its results will be remains to be seen. We need not be very pessimistic about it. It has its advantages and disadvantages. I hope the advantages will outnumber the disadvantages. We should at least strive to make the best of it.

It will not be possible through this letter to discuss all the points you have raised in your circular. They are debatable points and must need discussion. They have been discussed recently in the various papers and what is to be said for and against it has not been missed. It is only hoped that the fears of many people will not come true. We have to face them in any case and do our best to meet the situation as it develops.

Yours sincerely,

Dear Comrade,

I am addressing this letter to you in the capacity of one who has had the privilege of being one of you for the last 25 years, an unflinching believer in and unstinted adherent of the principle of independent and united India, which the Congress has ever been vigorously advocating and to which it is solemnly wedded.

Let me state at the very outset that my conception of the obligations and responsibilities of a Congressman is that he must faithfully represent and voice the feelings of the dumb masses, regardless of any considerations, and express his honest opinion, in a democratic fashion and without any fear of contradiction, in regard to all those matters which affect the country and particularly the teeming millions who have watered with blood and tears the plant of our organization in the hope that in the end they would be enabled to get rid of all the miseries and hardships and to live a free, peaceful and happy life.

I believe you will certainly agree that the division of British India into two Sovereign States is a total denial of our demand for a united India, and the acceptance of this proposal by the Congress High Command is a sheer repudiation and negation of our avowed principles and a gross betrayal of the pledge we have given to the electorate on whose strength is based the edifice of our organisation.

Apart from ideological consideration we have to see whether the division will solve our problems or it will endanger the peace and progress of our country. Obviously, with the acceptance of the principle of partition new and more formidable problems connected with it will arise. In accordance with the theory of self determination the Muslim States in Hindustan Zone can and may choose to join Pakistan, sooner or later. And this may naturally give impetus to the demand for Muslim corridor. We may call it an absurdity. But, did we not call the demand of Pakistan and transfer of population as absurd in the past, while today we are accepting them without demur? And again when in the Hindustan, as situated at present, there will be left 45 million organised and armed Muslims concentrated in strong pockets in the various cities and towns and having 75-80 per cent representation in the Police service, what effective means will be available to us to check this menace? The Muslim Leaguers even in their existing position are much more armed and organised and capable of launching the offensive any moment. And they may do anything when the Sovereign State of Pakistan is established.

It is indeed fantastic and incredible to say that there will be friendly relations between Hindustan and Pakistan and that a peaceful era will usher in as a result of the establishment of a Sovereign Muslim State. When we accepted the communal electorates, we had entertained the same hope that Muslims would be pleased with this concession and there would be no communal trouble. And, ultimately, the circumstances could not but make us admit that we had committed a Himalayan blunder. That blunder delayed our freedom by 25 years, and one simply shudders to think of the incalculable harm that this greater blunder is bound to result in.

With the inclusion of the N.W.F. Province in the Pakistan, which is an undoubted certainty in view of the fact that there is to be a plebiscite on the clear issue of Hindu Raj or Muslim Raj, the whole of northern and north-western India including Baluchistan will be a Muslim State having direct and close contact with Afghanistan and Middle East which will provide a direct route to have communications with the European countries. The deep port of Karachi and the geographical position of the Eastern Bengal will further add to the already strong bargaining position of Pakistan State.

In the present state of rabid power politics raging in the Middle East, where it is said the seeds of the third world war are being sown, the Pakistan State which will be the biggest and strongest Muslim State under the leadership of no other person but the same Mr. Jinnah, with his ambition to dominate whole of India, will be capable of doing immeasurable mischief which may surpass all the bestialities and barbarities to which the innocent masses were subjected by the Muslim Leaguers during the past months.

The existence of about 45 million strong Muslims in the Hindustan provinces, still owing allegiance to Pakistan who are in a position and rather sure to act as Gestapo and frustrate the administration of those provinces, will certainly be a great advantage to the Pakistan Government which may ultimately be utilized for creating a chaos in the Hindustan and thus seeking the opportunity to dominate the whole of India by force. The traditional submissiveness of the Hindus and the declared policy of our leaders in regard to our relations with the Mussalmans will be a guarantee to Pakistan that it can play the aggressor with impunity, and succeed in dominating and retaining its hold on Hindustan.

Precisely the acceptance of the principle of partition will hardly put an end to our problem. In fact it is bound to give rise to various manifold difficulties which may deteriorate our social and economic conditions instead of ameliorating them.

The belief that the Pakistan will be economically poorer and weaker and will thus be compelled to have friendly relations with and seek assistance from Hindustan is nothing but a misconception and betrays sheer ignorance of facts and economic statistics. This is quite obvious that the largest, the best and rich cotton and jute producing areas with world monopoly and wheat growing area have gone to the Pakistan along with rich mineral wealth of the Punjab and Baluchistan, while the number of people to be fed is comparatively lesser in that area. And therefore economically, Pakistan will be a stronger state than visualized by many of us. And India’s most important industries being those of cotton and jute, the Pakistan Government far from being in a submissive mood will dictate their terms to the Hindustan. Precisely it is vain to suppose that Pakistan will submit to Hindustan on economic grounds.

The Pakistan Government may well desire to grab other resources of Hindustan. And, obviously they would do it only by an act of force which we may be quite unable to resist, unless there is a revolutionary change in our temperament, tradition and every conviction in our being.

The argument of self determination derived from a Russian slogan also does not stand scrutiny because Russians adopted this slogan only when their revolution was successful and when the Soviet Government was fully armed with power. And then, in Russia this slogan remained only a slogan and was never put to practice. We must also remember that America went into war with revolting units and preserved the unity of the country and the outcome of this policy is evident by the very might of U.S.A.

Was the division of India inevitable? Certainly not! The argument that the British would not transfer power to the Union Centre is absolutely untenable and smacks of a lack of political farsightedness. Surely, in spite of the stubbornness and intransigence of the Muslim League, which was also the natural result of the appeasement policy of the Congress, the British Government could not concede Pakistan and spurn the demand of the nationalist India, if we would have made it felt with equal stubbornness that India would not and could not be divided come what may. Ours would have been quite an honourable stand to stick to the May 16 proposal to which the British Government was irrevocably committed and which they could not abandon without the consent of Congress. Apart from that, according to a long-term British Plan they had to keep India strong and friendly on which depended their whole scheme of relinquishing their active participation in Asiatic politics. This plan of theirs could not be fructified if they antagonised nationalist elements of this country. Moreover it was not in consonance with the strategic plan of Britain to erect such a strong state of Muslim India which is likely to encourage the pan Islamic movement in Middle East. We also ignored the fact that international opinion is deadly against the division of India which is bound to weaken its war potentiality.

However the conclusion is irrefutable that but for the climb down of the Congress Britain could never have forced this partition and Mr. Jinnah would never have got this unexpected gift.

That there would be anarchy and bloodshed if the Pakistan would not be conceded or that the recent riots has shown that no organized defence in Muslim dominated areas could be possible is yet another argument that can hardly stand on the grounds of practical politics.
Although it is a fact that the minority pockets in the Pakistan area are not strong enough, and this is also due to our negligence and self-complacency, yet here again one feels extremely sorry that a mighty organisation like the Congress, having adequate resources at its disposal should have felt so helpless and succumbed to the bullying tactics of the Muslim League.

It is indeed a queer corollary that the Muslim League has been mustering thousands of armed and equipped men for enforcing its policy of coercion and aggression and the Congress leaders have been merely bandying words and proposing soulless panaceas and ineffective remedies.
Apart from the blood-curdling holocaust of the East Bengal, the butchery of the Punjab and the blitzkrieg of the Frontier Province, the invasion of Assam, the armed onslaught in Gurgaon and the secret organisation of the combatant forces of Muslims concentrating in well fortified pockets in various towns and districts of U.P. should indeed serve as an eye opener to those who visualise peace and harmony after the establishment of Pakistan.

Whereas we are proud that the Congress leadership has eminently succeeded in the political battles against the British Government, we cannot escape the painful fact that it has utterly failed in dealing skillfully and judiciously with the internal elements, and the result is too obvious. The Muslim League which was a powerless body a decade ago, has cleverly exploited the appeasement policy of the Congress and has ultimately emerged triumphant, while the position of the Congress today is simply precarious.

Surely, the present executive of the Congress having secured the vote of the electorate on the clear issue of united India, it was their bounden duty, and the democratic principles certainly demanded to take a referendum from the public on the question of the division of the country. And having failed to do so and accepted the Pakistan against the wishes of their electors their action is certainly unconstitutional.

Let me bring it home to you that the masses and even younger elements in the Congress are utterly disgusted with the policy of the people at the helm which has resulted in such a tragedy as the acceptance of the division of India. And if we do not voice their feelings with all the emphasis at our command and take such concrete steps whereby we can offer a bright prospect to this vocal section we shall have to be sorry to find in the near future our organisation bereft of this element, the stamina, and the consequences are too obvious.
Comrade, being a member of the Nation’s Parliament the destiny of the millions of dumb-driven masses is in your hands. I hope you will agree that we cannot afford to be swayed by the sentiments of party prestige when broader issues are involved and the interests of the whole nation are at stake. Indeed, loyalty to the country is far more sacrosanct a thing than loyalty to the party. And it is your sacred duty to champion the cause of the common man with all your might, and express your strong opposition to the division of our motherland in most emphatic and unmistakable terms, and thus demonstrate to the world that the Congress is really a living democratic organisation where even the decisions and recommendations of the High Command are overthrown when they do not meet with the approval of the people’s representatives.

Verily, if the A.I.C.C. votes against the division of India and refuses to accept the latest British announcement, it will simply be keeping aloft the banner of democracy and vindicating the prestige and honour of the Congress and of the whole Indian Nation.

It is my fervent hope that you will leave no stone unturned to canvass and secure maximum possible support against the division and for the unity and integrity of our motherland.

Yours fraternally

R. RATAN GUPTA

77. Acceptance of Partition Means Suicide for Congress
Letter from R.S. Vidhyarthi to J.B. Kripalani, 10 July 1947
AICC Papers, File No. G-18/KW-I (Pt-II)/1947–8, NMML

Respected Acharyaji,

I am enclosing herewith my views on the question of partition of India with a request to very kindly express your detailed comments upon it which would determine the position of the congress men [sic] of my way of thinking.

It is needless to say for me that I have been a loyal congressman since 1920.

With best respects,

Yours sincerely,

(R.S. Vidhyarthi)

The Congress & the Partition of India

The Indian National Congress stood for undiluted nationalism and represented India as a whole in her political ideals and aspirations. It was the Congress which rightly claimed to represent all the communities of India. A reactionary section of the Muslim led by the Muslim League and similarly a few Hindus under the Hindu Mahasabha ventured to oppose the Congress but both were doubted as communal organizations and the congressmen were prohibited to join them.

The Congress fought the battle of freedom of India in August 1942 with its slogans of ‘Quit India’. All attempts of British Govt. to suppress the Congress and to create communal disturbances in the country totally failed. The war ended and the world situation demanded the solution of the Indian question. At such a juncture Lord Wavell, the Viceroy of India, and the Labour Government in Britain were themselves anxious to move in the matter. At this point some of the Indian leaders, who did not join the 1942 movement, at their own responsibility and initiative negotiated with the Viceroy and the Muslim League to have an agreement. The Muslim League leader from the very start refused to accept the position of the Congress as that of representative of the Indians as a whole. He emphatically refuted the Congress claim of representing Muslims and arrogated himself and his league, the position of sole representative of the Muslims of India. He nicknamed the Congress, Muslim leader Maulana Abul Kalam Azad as a ‘show boy’. He even dwarfed the Congress and minimized its position by declaring it to be the representative of caste-Hindus only. In spite of this position Gandhiji virtually knocked at the doors of Jinnah for compromise. Indian Congress leaders came out of the jails and met in conference convened by Lord Wavell and even accepted the position of the Muslim League as the representative of the majority of the Muslims. But even at that Jinnah did not feel appeased. Hence general elections were held and the Congress did not prove that the League was not the sole representative of the Muslims. The Muslim League could not form a ministry in any other province except Bengal & Sind where it was backed by the Governors and the Europeans. Even at that the Congress ignored the direct mischief of the British Government and its agents in India. In a way it played the British game so blindly that to-day every thinking-minded person in India feels pity at the plight of the Congress.

When the Congress placed one wrong step on the prespice [sic] it actually proceeded on the path of self extermination rapidly. To-day it can be said that Congress has committed suicide. It is a great wonder as to how Congress has taken up the position of negotiating with a communal organization like the ‘Muslim League’ and agreed to the partition of India by allowing a fairly big portion of the country, consisting of parts of the Punjab and Bengal & Assam and Frontier. This means the Congress has reduced itself from the position of a national organization to that of a communal one by conceding to a community a part of India which is populated by all communities in the country without any right to do so.

The Congress position could only be one of national body as such it could not allow any vital and fundamental concessions to any one or the other community at the cost of others. The question of partition of India could never be decided in between the two organizations or even by many organizations of the country, it is a matter which concerns every individual living in the country. The representatives elected by the country were given a clear mandate of undivided India. Even they were not consulted on the question of partition of India. So logically and justifiably the question of partition of India must be decided by referendum throughout the length and breadth of India with a right to vote to every adult.

Without that any decision of the partition of the country is not binding on the people of India. They have a right to revolt against such a decision. It is the time that every Indian individually and unitedly must rise in revolt against the decision of the partition of India in the supposed interest of a single community of the country. If the representatives elected on the basis of limited franchise want the partition of a province or India it is not justifiable to let them have it. Life or death, peace or war India must not submit to the decision of the partition of the country.

It is no doubt most regrettable that the Congress should have submitted to the decision of the partition of the country without any authority, to that effect from the people whom it claims to represent. But any way by accepting the decision of partition of India in favour of Muslim League, a communal organization in the country, the Congress has committed suicide. Now the people of India are left with no other option but to take up the lead themselves. As the Congress declared in 1942 August that everybody should feel to be his own leader stands more true to-day. It is now time for the Indians to meet and decide their future. The voice of all the individuals is the voice of the people and is the ‘general will’ which is not being represented to-day fairly by any organization in the country. As such the people must assert themselves and must find out leaders from amongst themselves who can express ‘their will’ and see that it is carried through. This way alone lies salvation of the country otherwise with the suicide of the Congress India Stands [sic] betrayed to-day and the future of the country is in absolute dark.

78. No Way Out of Partition
Letter from Vallabhbhai Patel to G.S. Bozman, 11 July 1947
SPC, Vol. 4, p. 469

New Delhi

My dear Bozman,

Thank you for your letter of 1 July 1947.

2. I am sorry to hear that your domestic circumstances make it incumbent on you to ask for leave preparatory to retirement. It is a pity that India should lose the services of an able officer like you.

3. I fully appreciate your reasons for disliking the decision to divide India. Frankly, speaking, we all hate it, but at the same time see no way out of it. We nurse the hope that one day Pakistan will come back to us.

4. I hope you are having a pleasant holiday. Here we are all preoccupied with partition. When you return in November you may find things quite different in several respects.

With kind regards,

Yours sincerely

79. Gandhi Has Surrendered India’s Freedom
B.S. Moonje’s statement to the Press, 12 July 1947
B.S. Moonje Papers, Subject File No. 41, NMML

Nasik

Dr. B.S. Moonje has issued the following statement to the Press:

News of high level importance, though unexpected, has been announced. Mr. Jinnah becomes His Excellency the Viceroy of Independent Pakistan and the Congress, elated with joy and satisfaction at the completion of its political mission under the inspiring leadership of Mahatma Gandhi have, ignoring the rights and privileges of the Hindus, selected Lord Mountbatten, an Englishman, a foreigner, as their Viceroy under the independence of Hindusthan which now under the circumstances deserves to be described as faked.
We must therefore heartily congratulate both, that is, Mr. Jinnah as well as Mahatma Gandhi, as Dictators respectively of the Muslim League and the Congress. We welcome Mr. Jinnah in right royal Nazi fashion by shouting 'Heil Hitler' and we cannot similarly welcome Mahatma Gandhi otherwise than by shouting 'Heil Non-Violence.' Quite like Hitler, Mr. Jinnah proved to demonstration the efficacy of his planned violence which has terrified Mahatma Gandhi into submission and surrender and has now received the sanction and imprimatur of His Imperial Majesty the King Emperor of India in his appointment with the consent of the Congress as the first Viceroy of Pakistan. But why is a Bhangi girl as proposed by Mahatma Gandhi not selected as the first Viceroy of Hindusthan? But perhaps she is reserved to be the President of the Republic whenever, if at all, it will be established.

According to Mahatma Gandhi’s arguments, since the time the ‘Quit India’ slogan was invented, Independence was coming. Independence has now come but the best and the most cherished part of it, has been conferred on Pakistan and it is only the second best of it which has fallen to the lot of Mahatma Gandhi’s Hindusthan. Would it be a Truth to say that Pakistan got the best part because organized violence deserved it and it was the non-violence that deserved the second best? But who can say that, as it is, it is not a great victory for non-violence? Otherwise how should it have been possible for an Englishman, the top most representative of His Imperial Majesty, to become with the consent of Mahatma Gandhi, both the Viceroy of Hindusthan as well as the Chairman of the Joint Defence Council? Could a more brilliant victory be conceived of to both violence and as well as to Non-Violence?

Previously England alone was the Imperial Ruler and now it has been so ordained that the Anglo-Moslem alliance should be the Ruler of India though divided into two Dominions within the British Commonwealth.

The Prime Minister, Mr. Attlee, says—‘British Rule which has endured so long, is now, at the instance of this country (England) coming to an end.’ Is it a Truth or [sic]; or is it more true to say that it is the result of Mahatma Gandhi’s slogan of ‘Quit India’?

The Prime Minister further says that it is however more because of the desire of ‘millions of Indians’, divided by race, caste, language and religion as they were who ‘shouted [sic] under our aegis justice and quiet life’, ‘the peace and security which had been denied to them during the anarchic period which followed the break-down of the Moghul Empire’, that they established the British Empire in India, having carried on to a successful issue their ‘Contest with the French for the mastery of the Peninsula, India.’ In this narration of historical events, the wars waged by the Sikhs and the Marathas against the Britishers are however quietly conveniently forgotten when the break down of the Moghul Empire is purposefully emphasised.

But who can deny that the present kind of Independence is not a real victory to non-violence, when there is the emblem of the British might, Lord Mountbatten installed as Governor-General, being the living guarantee for peace and security to Mahatma Gandhi, the prophet of non-violence, in rivalry with the violence of Mr. Jinnah, the Viceroy of Pakistan.

Such is the unique method of Mahatma Gandhi’s warfare in Non-violence [sic] to conquer hate by love, untruth by Truth and ambition by humility. Mahatma Gandhi has thus signed away and surrendered a part of Hindusthan and also the fate and fortune of the valiant [sic] soldierly community of the Sikhs in their very Homeland, the Punjab. But has he purchased Peace and security from the planned violence of his Quaid-e-Azam, Mr. Jinnah?

80. Passive Resistance Only, Not Non-violent Satyagraha

Extracts from M.K. Gandhi’s discussion with visitors, 17 July 1947
CWMG, Vol. LXXXVIII, pp. 356-7

That is what you think. I tell you that I can show you the miracle today if Hindus maintain peace and show courage. But with what face can I tell the League not to indulge in atrocities? You say that if I give you the lead you will follow me. Have you ever thought against whom and to whom I can give the lead? The British have not partitioned the country. It has been done with the consent of the Muslim League and the Congress. Isn’t that so? The leaders had no other alternative. They thought it was better to partition the country so that both the parts could live happily and peacefully rather than let the whole country go to pieces. About this I did hold a different view. My view was that no one could take an inch of land by resorting to violence and murder. Let the whole country be reduced to ashes. They could take the whole country by friendly negotiations and peaceful methods. But though non-violence is a creed with me, it is not so with the Congress. There is only one other person in the country who has accepted non-violence as a creed and he is Badshah Khan. It is true that I had believed that our satyagraha struggles were based on non-violence. Only lately I realized that it was not true. I admit my mistake. I first started the satyagraha struggle in South Africa. At one of the meetings Mr. Hosken said that Gandhi was fighting a weak man’s battle. I strongly contradicted him and proudly said that what was needed for satyagraha was spiritual strength and not physical strength, and that we were fighting with soul-force. As you know we were quite successful in that struggle. Immediately after that I came away to India. I employed the same method here. At the time I did believe that people were fighting with genuine spiritual strength. I would not have launched the struggle if I had then realized that it was only ‘passive resistance’. But God had willed to use me for this mission and so he blurred my vision. And because our fight was not one of non-violence we see the result today. There is arson, murder, loot and chaos all around.

81. A Call for a Stand for United India

Extract from a bulletin on All Bombay Anti-Pakistan Conference, 19 July 1947
AIHM Papers, File No. M-18, NMML

DEAR SIR/MADAM,

From the previous bulletin issued by the Reception Committee on the 17th inst. you will have gathered that this Conference is going to be held in Bombay, on Saturday, the 26th inst. at the Blavatsky Lodge from 12 noon to 7 p.m.

The Conference is not intended to be a gathering of any party or any particular section in the City, it is rather a meeting place for all communities and all parties who are advocates of a United India and who are determined to fight Pakistan or any other separatist move and to fight it to the last ditch. No one who is not determined to fight Pakistan and to restore our Motherland to her territorial integrity has a place in the Conference: such men are not wanted. All the rest are cordially welcomed. Their services India needs most now. There is no party ban either. Hindus, Mohamedans, Christians, Parsees and all other communities in the City, are cordially requested to become members of the Reception Committee or delegates. Members of the Congress Party, the Muslim League, Hindu Mahasabha, the Liberal Party, the Forward Bloc—no matter what party or association it is—if you are prepared to fight Pakistan, you are one of us. Chambers of Commerce, Trading Associations, Literary Societies, Trade Unions, Students Organisations, Women’s Associations, Learned bodies, clubs—in short all organised bodies, whatever their views in other matters, if they stand for United India—they are welcome.

There is no time to be lost. Our enemies are working hard day and night to meet us with a Fait Accompli and if we want to resist them successfully, we have to work without respite, without rest to make the Conference successful. We must remember that eternal vigilance is the price of liberty. We need not emphasise the importance or the urgency of the Conference, we want that the voice of Bombay should be heard in no uncertain terms on Saturday at the Blavatsky Lodge. That voice should be a warning to the cliques engaged in cutting India to pieces, that the people are wide awake, that the clique has no authority or mandate for doing what it has done, that the indecent hurry with which it is proceeding to complete its handiwork is, to say the least, disgusting and despicable. The people won’t stand this betrayal of their vital interest, before long, at the bar of public opinion, these traitors will be judged at their proper worth and will be awarded a punishment for their crime against the nation, so fitting that it will be a warning to all traitors for all time.

You are therefore once more requested to register your name as a member of the Reception Committee by paying Rs. 5/- . Delegate’s fee is Rs. 2/- and visitor’s Re. 1/-.

Special seats are reserved for ladies.

Yours sincerely

ENCLOSURE

All Bombay Anti-Pakistan Conference

Arya Bhavan, Sandhurst Road
Bombay-4
17 July 1947

DEAR SIR/MADAM

Overleaf you will find a copy of the main resolutions unanimously adopted at a public meeting held at Blavatsky Lodge on Sunday the 13th inst. ‘pledging those present not to rest until the partition of India had been undone and the integrity of our Motherland was restored.’

A Committee was appointed at that meeting to hold a Conference before the end of this month where representatives of all Associations as well as individual citizens will be collectively voicing their protest against Pakistan and declaring their unswerving allegiance to United India....

The basis of the Conference is:

1. Complete democratic independence for the country in an undivided India.
2. Equality and social justice for all.
3. A truly internationalist outlook on world events and problems.

Yours faithfully
R.K. Tatnis,
U.K. Oza

Hon. Secretaries

RESOLUTIONS

Passed at the public Meeting held at the Blavatsky Lodge on the 13th July 1947.

1. This preliminary meeting of those who loyally adhere to the fundamental principle of Indian unity and who stand for the democratic freedom of the Indian Nation based on social justice declares its considered and emphatic opinion that the Mountbatten Plan of 3rd June 1947 is a mere consummation of the crooked diplomacy of the British Imperialist and is in no sense a liberation of India from his stranglehold, it carries no support of the people of India who were not consulted in the last elections on this issue of Pakistan. On the contrary, the Congress party in particular over and over again assured the voters that they would resist Pakistan at all costs. The Sikhs did the same. The Plan of June 3rd therefore has no mandate of the people. In the name of the country therefore we totally repudiate this conspiracy of a clique for disintegrating and weakening India and we hereby pledge ourselves not to rest until India irredenta is once more restored to its integrity.

2. This meeting is fully convinced that the Congress party who surrendered to Pakistan in defiance of their election pledges to the nation, have committed a grievous breach of faith towards the people of this country and forfeited all their confidence. Their conduct amounts to a most shameful betrayal of the vital interests of hundreds of millions of people, they have exposed not merely the people of India but of the whole world to the dangers of chaos and anarchy. After their reprehensible conduct they do not deserve to hold power in this country and we hereby call upon them to resign forthwith.

3. This meeting declares that a nation-wide action to consolidate the resistance to Pakistan is urgently called for and to that end resolves to convene a Conference in Bombay of the members of all Associations and other citizens who agree with the programme set out above for the purpose of concerted and organised action.

4. ...

5. A most shameless attempt is being made by the Congress Party to represent its abject surrender to naked violence by means of which Pakistan has been forced on the people, as a triumph for the country and the establishment of Indian independence. Dishonest and hypocritical propaganda has been started to celebrate the partition of India as the day of India’s liberation. This meeting therefore earnestly appeals to the people not to allow the Congress to throw dust in their eyes. Instead the people should observe that day as the Day of Humiliation by putting black flags over their houses, observing hartals, closing all schools and business places and by a total boycott of all the hypocritical pretences of joy by which the Congress hopes to conceal its ghastly failure.
Gandhiji referred to a countryman from the South who had asked several questions which the latter invited him to answer as had become his wont of late, in his post-prayer speeches.

As the writer did not know the national language and as he rightly thought that he (the speaker) would not read Tamil with facility, if at all, the question was thus put in English:

'George Bernard Shaw has remarked that “an Englishman is never in the wrong. He does everything on principle. He fights you on patriotic principles; he robs you on business principles; he enslaves you on imperial principles; he supports his King on loyal principles and cuts off his King's head on republican principles.” I am eager to know from Gandhiji under which of these principles the Englishman is now quitting India. Is the Englishman glad over the present economic and political condition of our beloved country? Does he feel satisfied in the secession of Travancore and Hyderabad States from the Indian Union? Has he any axe to grind in scrapping the “May ’46 Paper” and bringing forward in its place the recent “Partition Plan”? Does he feel for the horrible happenings in Noakhali, Bihar and the Punjab—which happenings have forced the Congress to accept that Plan? What can be the reason or the idea behind Mr. Churchill and his company endorsing the Plan? Gandhiji has often said that he knows the mind of an Englishman better than any other Indian, and has repeatedly been advising us in his post-prayer speeches to trust the faith, sincerity and good intentions of the Englishmen in transferring power to our hands. I, therefore, believe that he should be in a position to make matters clear. He alone can dispel our doubts in a convincing manner.’

He (Gandhiji) could only paraphrase the idea in his speech. Bernard Shaw’s banter was by no means exhaustive nor were Englishman’s resources. He had no doubt that he was quitting India on principle. Man had the supreme knack of deceiving himself. The Englishman was supremest among men. He was quitting because he had discovered that it was wrong on economic and political grounds to hold India in bondage. Herein he was quite sincere. It would not be denied, however, that sincerity was quite consistent with self-deception. He was self-deceived in that he believed that he could not leave India to possible anarchy if such was to be India’s lot. He was quite content to leave India as a cockpit between two organised armies. Before quitting, he was setting the seal of approval on the policy of playing off one community against another. And he lacked the courage to do the right so far as the States were concerned. Gandhiji hoped that before he finally left on the 15th August, he would bring the two parties together, now that one had got all it wanted. He could do so, if he willed it, Travancore and Hyderabad had not yet become independent States. He, the speaker, admitted freely that if the Englishman left India in an uncertain condition and left the possibility of several warring States, all independent of England and, therefore, of one another, he could not conceive a greater reflection on the British name than this would be. Dominion Status would then stink in the nostrils. But he had not given up hope that British statesmanship would not have declared utter bankruptcy before August 15th. Till then he preferred to defer judgment in spite of the correspondent’s profound distrust of British declaration however high-minded they might be to read. Let their acts be the real judge of their words. He would believe a man’s word unless he had good reason to doubt it. That Mr. Churchill & Co. were disposed to bless the Bill for Indian Independence proved that they had realized the economic and political necessity of the step. He, however, had no hesitation in admitting that recent signs were portentous enough to rouse suspicious. He did not, however, believe in dying before his death.

83. Boundaries Must Be ‘Natural’ in View of Defence and Administration

Extracts from a statement by B.R. Ambedkar, undated (c. 20 July 1947)

Hari Narake and others (Eds), Dr. Ambedkar Speeches & Writings, Vol. XVII, Part Two, pp. 355–7

New Delhi

Dr. B.R. Ambedkar, in a statement today said that the partition of the Punjab and Bengal was not a local problem to be left to the people of these two provinces, but an ‘All India problem’ for it involves the fixation of the Frontiers of Pakistan and India and must be determined primarily by ‘considerations of facility of defence and administration.’

Dr. Ambedkar said: ‘From the reports of controversies going on in the newspapers regarding the fixation of the boundary line between the West Punjab and the East Punjab and between West Bengal and East Bengal and of the gists of the memoranda submitted to the Boundary Commission by the Muslims and Non-Muslims, it becomes clear that the results of the Boundary Commission may be disastrous to the country.

‘In the first place, the problem is treated as though it was a local problem, to be left to the people of the Punjab and Bengal to fight among themselves. In the second place, the problem is regarded by the local people as one of land-grabbing. In this scramble for land, a frantic search is being made to find out Muslim enclaves in Non-Muslim areas and Non-Muslim enclaves in Muslim areas with a view to push the national boundaries backwards and forwards and to bring as many Muslims from Non-Muslim area to Muslim area and as many Non-Muslims from Muslim area to Non-Muslim area.

Both these methods of approach are, to my mind, wrong and misleading. The shifting of national boundaries with reference to enclaves could have been justified if it was accepted that Pakistan and Hindustan should be homogeneous states. This has, however, not been the basis of partition, as is clear from the fact that neither the Congress nor the Muslim League has stipulated for transfer of population. No matter how the national boundaries are chopped and changed, a large number of Non-Muslims will remain in Pakistan and an equally large number of Muslims will remain in India. Consequently, the attempt to shift boundaries merely to include more of one’s fellow members is, I think, utterly misdirected.

Defence

Secondly, the problem would have been local, if Pakistan and India were not two Sovereign Independent States. The fact, however, is that they are, and each will have to defend itself against encroachment or invasion, should an occasion arise....

In the light of these considerations, the Government of Pakistan and that of India would not only be the proper parties before the Boundary Commission, but they will be the necessary parties. The boundaries between Pakistan and India being the frontiers of India, it was for the Defence Department of the Government of India to have insisted that the Boundary Commission should have military officers as assessors which is always done in the settlement of frontiers between two States.
Not only has the Defence Department of the Government of India failed to do so, it has not even cared to appear before the Boundary Commission to present the case from defence and administration points of view. It seems to have forgotten that the maintenance of the frontier will not be the responsibility of the East Punjab or West Bengal. From first to last, it will be the responsibility of the Government of India and it was, therefore, the primary concern of the Defence Department to have its say in the fixation of the frontiers.

Natural Boundaries

No one can deny that from the point of view of defence and administration, boundaries between Pakistan and India must be natural boundaries, i.e. they must run along a river or a mountain. From the nature of contentions raised in the memoranda submitted to the Boundary Commission, it is clear that these factors will not receive the considerations they deserve.

They are slurred over and not even mentioned. The danger is that the frontiers between Pakistan and India that are likely to emerge from the labours of the Boundary Commission, however satisfactory they may be from the standpoint of the communities immediately affected, will be most unsatisfactory from the point of view of India.

If my fears come true and the boundary drawn by the Commission is not a natural one, it needs no prophet to say that its maintenance will cost the Government of India very dearly and it will put the safety and security of the people of India in great jeopardy. I hope, therefore, that late as it is, the Defence Department will bestir itself and do its duty before it is too late.’

84. Mazdoor Raj Answer to Partition

Jayaprakash Narayan’s address to students in Bombay, 21 July 1947

We can reclaim Pakistan to the Indian Republic by the establishment of workers’ rule in both the States, for, the workers will vote for unity, but all thoughts of seizing power through terrorist activities must be given up. So long as we have a Constitution which guarantees democracy, it is possible to establish the government we want by peaceful means. It is the vote of the people that can bring in a change of government.

There is not a single patriot in the country who can express satisfaction and be happy over what has happened to our country. This is not the dream of freedom we had dreamt all these years. The picture as a whole has been shattered to shreds. Then you might ask me why the Socialist leaders were silent all along when important happenings were taking place. You might ask me whether our promise of revolution has gone into thin air.

When we did not oppose the resolution on Partition at the last A.I.C.C. meeting some people said we were bribed with promises of ministries and such other offers. If we wanted to go into the Government, we could have done so much earlier. Holding high office is not the aim of the Socialists. Revolution at that time was out of the question. Developments in the Punjab and Bengal and all over the country had reached such a crisis that bloodshed had to be ruled out as a method to achieve unity. But the responsibility for the acceptance of the partition plans lies entirely on the shoulders of the rightist elements in the Congress. What the Socialists stand for and what they have done to the country are facts which would convince the people of their bonafides.
August 15 cannot be said to bring freedom to India, for on that day India will not remain as one whole. Even after India becomes a Republic, there will be existing independent States and Pakistan. Where there is any kind of Government other than formed by the workers, freedom will not be complete.

There are two ways of bringing about unity—to muster an army in Hindustan and march upon Pakistan or to conquer it by the establishment of the rule by workers in both the States. The first, suggested by the Hindu Mahasabha, has to be ruled out. We have not fought the battle for freedom to install in power fattened capitalists and opportunists. There shall be equality of all men and no difference of religion, and no class privileges. There shall not exist opulence and abysmal poverty. When we establish the rule by workers in Hindustan and Pakistan, we will have proved our bonafides to the Muslims who will, in that case, cease to fear the possibility of domination by the Hindus. There can not be unadulterated freedom as long as India is divided and torn. A weak and vivisected India would be an invitation to the greedy powers of the world. What the Indian people had achieved after twenty-five years of struggle and sacrifice would be lost in five years. The cry of Hindu Raj raised by the Hindu Mahasabha and other communalists would lead to internecine communal warfare. If the Mahasabhaites were aspiring to bring back Pakistan by force there were imperialist minded Muslims in Pakistan who were dreaming of installing a Muslim Raj all over India.

The Muslims who voted for the League will realize when the State of Pakistan is established that it will be a Raj of Nawabs and Nawabzadas. The Muslim youths in Sind have started realizing the implications of Pakistan. The only way of winning the confidence of the Muslim peasants and workers of Pakistan is to establish a socialist society in the Republic of India and demonstrate to the Muslim brethren in Pakistan that it is not a Hindu Raj but a Government of the people. Only when the Muslim proletariat in Pakistan find out that they have been betrayed by their leaders there, they would ask for reunion with India. As the Socialist Party has failed to turn the Congress into a socialist organization, we have to decide after August 15, whether to remain in the Congress or to quit it and go ahead with our socialist programme. I see that the Congress becoming a socialist party is a remote possibility under the present circumstances.

The Socialist Party was so far small because it had remained within the Congress. The present leaders of the Congress are in league with capitalists and most of them seem to have abandoned the aims and objects which the Congress stood for. They have forgotten the workers and the poor. Day by day the capitalists get fattened. They wear Khaddar, stick up the Congress flag in front of their motor cars, and earn enormous black-market money. We find it impossible to stay within the Congress which supports such people and has forgotten the workers.

We have a plan which will change the face of the country in the next five years. We hope to make marked and immediate improvements especially in agriculture. Industries will be nationalized, but for sometime controlled capitalism will be allowed. There shall be cooperatives, but landlords will be allowed to hold limited land and be given compensation, if necessary.

The Socialist Party will gain enormous strength in the country. The Kisan, the worker in the factory, and other people are behind the party. But, I would like to make it clear to you that all our programmes for the achievement of the socialist State are to be of a purely non-violent nature. The Burmese episode should not be attempted here to finish a leadership, we do not want such things here. At present, it is the votes that decide who shall govern you. It is by mass awakening and support that we can establish the Mazdoor Raj.
It is not by shooting Pandit Nehru that you can establish a mazdoor government. Any party that aspires to form a government through terrorist activities clearly shows that it has no support of the people. So long as we have a constitution, which guarantees democracy, we need not resort to violence in order to establish a Government we want.

85. ‘CONGRESS MUST GIVE UP ONE NATION IDEA’
Article by Prof. Jawala Prasad Singhal in The Tribune, 23 July 1947

Every one desires unification of the country. The desire is laudable and praiseworthy. Unification is the genius of the country, the historical, the geographical, the economic, the political need of the country, for which so much has been sacrificed. The hearts of patriots are heavy because there has been partition. They are not happy, they are grieved, and they hope, they wish unity to come soon. But unity will not come by harping upon it, or by grieving for it. If this was going to be the attitude of the Congress leaders, then why did they declare years ago that Congress will not coerce unwilling parts to remain in a union? Was there a reservation in their mind that the Muslims will ask something which will be absolutely to their liking or did they expect them (the Muslims) to fall at their feet in admiration and respect and accept merely a dish of pudding. What has happened? How often it happens in the world that the elder brother earns a great deal of wealth for the joint family with a little intermittent half-hearted co-operation of the younger brother but when they come to partition the younger brother takes more than could be his share of earnings. Congress has won freedom. The fruits are shared by others also.

It is time to stand up and face realities. The danger now is not in the partition but in the continuance of that attitude of appeasement, of humility, of great goodness, of impartiality, of generosity, of cosmopolitanism, which has brought about this partition ultimately.

When the Congress was fighting the British Government its attitude was ‘whatever the British may do or say we need not care, we must look to ourselves.’ Why should not the Congress adopt the same attitude towards the League instead of waiting always for its sweet will?

Partition and Foreign Policy

It is manifestly wrong to consider partition as an unmixed evil and to be disheartened thereby. A fat bloated man without much internal strength is weak and a burden even to himself. On the other hand a lean and thin person with a wiry body and tough muscles is an asset to friends and a terror to enemies. Even if India were kept united with a weak centre it would have been a house divided against itself, and its influence in international affairs would have become weak. But now India can have a well knit strong centre and its views will be heard with respect in the comity of Nations. India will no longer be restrained from presenting impartial and fair viewpoints in international matters by delicate considerations of not displeasing the Indian Muslims. Take for instance the question of the Jews. If there is a certain area of Palestine legally occupied by the Jews alone then there is no reason why in such a homogeneous part of the country the Jews should not have their own independent Government. The matter must be looked at from the point of view of doing justice both to the Arabs and the Jews. Neither of them can be thrown out of the country. Then why should not the same remedy which has been found useful in India be applied to Palestine also? India could not present such a point of view so far because of the fear of displeasing Indian Muslims and to that extent India was not acting a honest and fair part but as a partisan. There will be numerous other occasions on which this freedom from restraint will enable India to play her real part of an impartial adjudicator between warring nations, a part to which India will surely be called to play so as to produce peace and prosperity in a torn and lacerated world. And for this a homogeneous India with a strong Central Government will be a tower of strength for the U.N.O.
Towards Freedom: 1947 (Part 2)

One or Two Nation?

But for this India must give up sentimentalism and look hard realities in the face. There is no use now in clinging desperately to the ‘One Nation’ theory of the Congress. The very acceptance of the June 3 plan has thrown that ‘One Nation’ idea overboard, and we differ most respectfully from Mahatma Gandhi when he says that the right action on the part of Hindus could be ‘acting as one nation by refusing to treat the Muslim minorities as aliens in their own homes.’ It is useless to cherish the hope that by such action the Pakistanis will again become Hindustanis.

Pakistan may join Hindustan or India if Pakistan finds that this will help the Muslim cause in international matters, otherwise it may not. Or it will join if it finds that the nationality of Hindustan means better and more comfortable life and it cannot be obtained without Pakistan becoming a member of the Indian Union.

Today the Cairo Press in Egypt is reported to be featuring the fact that Pakistan will emerge as ‘the world’s greatest Muslim State.’ While King Ibn Saud of Arabia congratulates the Indian Muslims, King Abdullah hopes for ‘the creation of a grand Muslim family extending from Tibet to Casablanca.’ Prof. Abdul Kadir-et-Samahy of Royal Military College, Cairo, considers the separation of Hindustan and Pakistan ‘a good and logical’ thing and hopes that collaboration of ‘kindred cultures and civilizations such as European, American, and Muslim’ will lead to ‘universalism’. Of course Hindustan has no place in this vision, and can not have one, for Hindus are neither Americans nor Europeans. But instead of noting these significant events the nationalist press in India would splash all over the statements from some Afghans that they are not interested in Pan-Islamism or from Azam Pasha that Pakistan cannot be admitted to the Arab League. People so easily forget the negative statements in diplomacy have no value at all, while positive statements are significant pointers.

Nationals or Aliens

Why do the Hindus insist upon claiming the unwilling Muslims as part of themselves? Surely, because they belong to the same country but now they have got their country separated. By what logic, by what considerations can Muslims be now said to have the same nationality as Hindus?

Whether Hindus will be destroyed or not if untouchability persists amongst them, we are certain that they will be destroyed if they do not give up their complacent attitude. We are certain that the Congress will be destroyed if it does not reorient its policy completely and stand out as a frank, honest, and strong protector of Hindu interests all over the world.

Socialists and Communists

There are other dreamers of unity. Mr. Jaya Prakash Narayan is going to raise a magic wand and a Kisan Mazdoor Raj will be established uniting the kisans and mazdoors of Pakistan and Hindustan and abolishing the partition now created. We wish him all success, but we will request him very kindly to try his magic in Pakistan first and to refrain from disrupting any further the already torn and tattered society in Hindustan. We crave from him the indulgence of letting Hindustan consolidate and become strong. A unified revivified Hindustan will react well to his wand when he raises it from Pakistan areas. Similarly we request the Communists to spare Hindustan. Pakistan is nearer Russia and so is better ground for their operations.

In Sind the prospective Pakistanis are driving out Hindus from services, trades, ration shops, and even landed property. All the big posts in the Sind Educational Department are manned by Muslims. Urdu is being made compulsory and educational institutions built up by Hindus are threatened. Even houses in Karachi are ordered to be allotted to Hindus and Muslims in the communal ratio. Mr. Suhrawardy is trying to disrupt Hindus to Eastern Bengal by offering them separate electorates. Mahatma Gandhi wonders whether this is an insidious way of inviting them to become Muslims, and yet he advises one nation treatment in Hindu provinces.

Some Partition Problems

There are numerous problems from the partition already settled to be decided. Do not increase them. Besides the exchange of population and the question of treating Muslims in Indian Union, there is the immediate problem of partitioning assets. Some experts are opining that the division should be according to the population of Pakistan and Hindustan. But this is wrong. The division should not be according to population, but according to the taxes paid by that population. Assets are built up with the help of funds and not by the number of persons irrespective of what they pay. Therefore their ownership also can be only according to the contribution made to their development. When two partners separate then the division is not according to the height or stature of each of them, but according to their contribution to those assets. If this contribution cannot be exactly calculated, surely the proportion and their ratio to each other can be easily found out even from the present day figures of tax revenue.

The Congress should also take care that the actual boundaries—both Eastern and Western—that may be settled by the Boundary Commission are strategically sound. Military advice should be taken and merely population considerations should not be the criterion but all necessary elements should be given due weight.

86. ‘Rest of My Life Is Going to Be Spent in Pakistan’

Extracts from a report in The Tribune, 8 August 1947

Lahore, Aug. 6—‘The rest of my life is going to be spent in Pakistan, may be it is in the East Bengal or the Western Punjab or perhaps the North-West Frontier Province which, because of the result of the referendum, is stated to be the future part of Pakistan.’ Thus observed Mahatma Gandhi while replying to a number of questions which were asked from him by a number of Congressmen who met him at the residence of his hostess Shrimati Rameshuri Nehru this evening before he left Lahore for Patna on his way to Noakhali.

Gandhiji added, ‘I am grieved to learn that people are running away from the West Punjab and I am told that Lahore is being evacuated by the non-Muslims. I must say that this is what it should not be. If you think Lahore is dead or is dying, don’t run away from it but die with what you think is the dying Lahore.’

Gandhiji had agreed to meet all those persons who wanted to come and meet him and was with them for about an hour and a half in an over-crowded room. In spite of the fans it was terribly hot inside the room but Gandhiji, who was sweating, continued sitting in the midst of that crowd of men, women and children listening to questions patiently and answering them.
He also made collections for the Harijan Fund by giving autographs and asked 'You give me as much money as you can.' One of the autograph-takers presented two pictures for his autographs and gave Rs. 5 along with them. Gandhiji said, 'I will sign only one and unless you pay for the other I won't do it.' The young enthusiast emptied his pocket but was not able to complete the sum of another Rs. 5. Gandhi reconciled himself to this and humorously remarked. 'I wish each one of you present here will empty his or her pocket before going away' (laughing).

Miss Indira Kohli, the blind daughter of Professor Ganga Ram Kohli, who came forward to pay her respects to Gandhiji and offered some money, got Gandhiji’s blessings. When told by Rameshuri Nehru that God had denied her light, Gandhiji said, 'I hope God has given her mind’s eye.'

Replying to a question put to him by Dr. Lehna Singh, General Secretary of the Punjab Provincial Congress Committee, Gandhiji said that if the Pakistan flag was such as would ensure equal rights and full protection to the minorities, they should all accept and honour the flag and have absolutely no hesitation in saluting it. 'I would ask you not to disown the Pakistan flag merely on the ground that it bears the Crescent.' He added, 'I must, however, say that in case no assurance of the kind I have mentioned is forthcoming, at least I will refuse to salute that flag.'

Gandhiji, while replying to a question in the same connection with regard to the flag of the Indian Union said, 'I must say that if the flag of the Indian Union will not contain the emblem of Charkha, I will refuse to salute that flag. You know the national flag of India was first thought of by me and I can't conceive of India's national flag without the emblem of Charkha. We have, however, been told by Pandit Jawaharlal and others that the sign of wheel or “Chakar” in the new national flag symbolises Charkha also. Some describe the wheel mark as “Sudarshan Chakar” but I know what “Sudarshan Chakar” means.'

My Heart with Punjab

'My heart has always been with the Punjab and the sad tales of woe of the sufferings of the Punjab which I had been hearing have made me always think of the Punjab. Don’t think that I had ever forgotten your province,’ said Mahatma Gandhi while replying to a question asked by Mr. Dev Raj Sethi, M.L.A. who suggested to Gandhiji that in view of the developments that had taken place in the country, more particularly in the Punjab, Gandhi should come to the Punjab to stay there.

Gandhiji said that he was fully aware of the sufferings of the Punjab and he had been yearning to come to the Punjab ever since he came to Delhi but there were certain forces, which he said were against his coming to this province. He had desired to come to the Punjab but he had been waiting for a call. He, however, said that his present place was in Noakhali and he would go there ‘even if I have to die. But as soon as I am free from Noakhali, I will come to the Punjab and I hope to be free from Noakhali very soon.’

Panic

Referring to the panic which prevailed in the West Punjab, Gandhiji asked people not to suffer from panic and he asked them to be brave and courageous people. ‘When you suffer from fear, you die before death comes to you. That is not glorious. I will not feel sorry and will not agree if I hear that people in the Punjab have died not as cowards but as brave men.’ He was not prepared to submit to any kind of compulsion or any interference with religion. He would refuse to stop saying ‘Ram’ if he was forced to do so and would prefer to be murdered. Similarly he could not be forced to salute any flag. But if in that act he was murdered, he would bear no ill will against any one and he would rather pray for better sense for the person or persons who murder him.

Brave Sikhs

Referring to the Sikhs, Mahatma Gandhi said that his conception of a Sikh had always been of a brave person who did not fear death but who would not do any harm to any innocent person. When people said that a Sikh was equal to ‘Sawa Lakh’ he always looked at it from the point of view that a Sikh would not take up his sword unless he was faced with ‘Sawa Lakh’ opponents. The Sikhs, therefore, were really brave people but modern fashions and the ways of life which many of them were said to be leading had weakened them very much.

Ch. Sunder Singh asked what should be the attitude of the Harijans and other minorities if in Pakistan separate electorates were introduced. Gandhiji, replying to the question, said vehemently, ‘You must never accept separate electorates for they are the real cause of mischief.’

Referring to some demonstration against him at Rawalpindi where some young boys shouted, ‘Hindustan for Hindus, let Hindi be the “lingua franca” of our country and let “bhagwa” be the national flag of our country.’ Gandhiji said he was amazed why all this was shouted into his ears. He was incorrigible in that respect. He had still firm faith in India being the home of all Indians and Hindustani with Dev Nagari and Urdu scripts as the language of the country and the tricolour being the flag of the people. He thought that those persons who preached otherwise were doing wrong to Hinduism which they wanted to serve.

Gandhiji further said that if the present painful quarrel between Hindus and Mussalmans and Sikhs continued, it would serve an invitation to any foreign power to come and invade India. When he said any foreign power he made it clear that he did not mean British because he said the British have finally decided to quit India and they were doing it for good. He, therefore, made an earnest appeal to put a stop to the present quarrel which did credit to neither Hinduism nor Islam.

‘Act like Sita’ said Mahatma Gandhi replying to a question put to him by a lady worker who said ‘We don’t fear death but how to save our honour from the hands of goondas at the time of turmoil.’ Gandhiji added that if a woman was prepared to die then no one dare touch her honour.

One of the audience had sent him a written question in which Gandhiji was asked to explain if his policy of non-violence was not contrary to the philosophy of Gita.

Gandhiji, replying to the question, said that it was not so and those who thought otherwise, in his opinion, were not interpreting the teachings of the Gita correctly. Gandhiji added, ‘I must say that I am trying to write new history and I don’t follow old history’....

87. Why Congress Accepted Partition

Extracts from Jawaharlal Nehru’s speech at a public meeting, 9 August 1947

...Seeing the situation in India I can say that our joy on the present occasion is mingled with sorrow. I am happy that the ‘Quit India’ movement which started five years ago has terminated successfully. But I am sad that the picture of the free India has not come out as I had hoped it would. The British authority is departing, no doubt, but it is leaving in its wake problems of great magnitude. The division of India is a great shock to all those who have worked for a strong united India. But the Congress has to agree to it because there is no other alternative. I would not have minded so much if the country had been divided politically, but unfortunately division has taken place in the hearts of the people of India.

It was India's misfortune that during the last few years of her life, some leaders had widely preached the gospel of hate and had incited innocent people to commit acts which brought nothing but degradation to the country. This was serious because feelings of hatred and distrust cannot be overcome easily.

Various reasons had forced the Congress to accept the division of India. We accepted partition so that India may be free. The demand for partition was strong from Bengal and the Punjab. The people said that to end the massacre that was going on in these two provinces it was essential to divide them. No Bengalee or Punjabi would have said this unless he was forced to do so. The very same people who vigorously opposed the partition of Bengal about 40 years ago, asked us to divide the province. Secondly, the Congress has to face the fact that certain sections of the people do not want to remain with the rest of India. Unity is a good thing but it cannot be achieved merely by resolutions. Men and women must accept it too, and the Congress has realised that division is better than a union of unwilling parts. Now that Bengal and the Punjab are being partitioned there are people who say that we should not have agreed to division. There are occasions when we have to choose between the lesser of two evils.

So far as I am personally concerned, I take full responsibility for all that I did during the past 16 months. Circumstances forced me to do what was very painful.

The use of violence at this time to maintain Indian unity will have disastrous results. Civil war will check the progress of India for a long time to come and the problem before India is of such a serious nature that no delay can be tolerated.

I hope that new relations will be established between the two divided parts of India and a better understanding will ultimately mitigate the evils of division.

During the last one year, the people of India have lost considerably in prestige as a result of the communal frenzy and they have now developed a narrow sectarian outlook. The Government have extensive plans before them for the development of the country, but that narrow outlook has prevented those plans from being put into practice....

88. ‘Congress Policy Implies No Surrender to League’

Extract from a report in The Tribune, 13 August 1947

New Delhi, Aug. 11.—‘Our first task is to stabilise, consolidate and strengthen ourselves and the rest can have only a secondary priority’, declared Sardar Vallabhbhai Patel addressing a mass meeting here today. The meeting was held in connection with the ‘Liberty Week’ celebrations.

The Sardar warned Indian States against the policy of standing aloof from the rest of the country.

Sardar Patel emphatically denied that he and his colleagues agreed to the partition of the country either because of fear or out of a sense of defeat. Under the prevailing conditions in the country, partition was the best thing possible and he had no qualms about it.

In a matter of weeks they had divided the country, the army, the services, etc., and this indeed was a colossal task performed. He, however, strongly believed that those who had seceded today would be disillusioned soon and their union with the rest of India was assured.
The Sardar made an earnest appeal to the people to rub out from their minds the memories of the past two years, thinking it was a terrible nightmare and forget it, and to look forward with single-minded purpose to make India strong, prosperous and happy. This could only be done by hard toil. A socialist Government in Britain was calling upon the workers to sweat an hour more a day and the strange contrast here was that our socialists and others preached strikes and encouraged wage boosts.

Sardar Patel said that he would make no efforts to explain away the responsibility of the Congress to divide the country. 'We took these extreme steps' he said 'after great deliberation. In spite of my previous strong opposition to partition, I agreed to it because I felt I was convinced that in order to keep India united, it must be divided now.'

Experience in office during the past year showed that it was impossible to do anything constructive with the Muslim League. The League representatives during their continuance in office did nothing but to create deadlocks and their role was entirely an obstructionist one.

No Surrender to League

The only way out of the sickening situation, the Congress realized, lay in the elimination of the third party, the British power. The British on their part had declared that they would quit by June 1948. But the period was long. Also their statement promising to hand over power to the authorities in the provinces gave rise to a vigorous effort to dislodge the ministries in Assam, the Punjab and in the Frontier....

80 Per Cent of Country With Us

Most of the opposition to the Congress in this partition had gone from quarters who had never in the past given evidence of any strength. Despite the division it must be remembered we had 80 per cent of the country with us which was a compact unit with great possibilities. Twenty per cent had gone over to Pakistan and he wished that state all success and prosperity. He wished them to be strong because then alone there could be friendly relations and amity between two states. There could be no friendship between a strong unit and a weakling. India harboured no ill-will against Pakistan and would, in fact, do all in her power to help the new state.

The main task before India today was to consolidate herself into a well-knit and united Power. The obstacle of foreign domination was now gone but there were serious problems that confronted us. Economically India was in a sad plight. The war had resulted in making India a creditor nation but that did not mean much. The United Kingdom was our debtor and owed us a huge amount but they did not appear to have anything to pay us now. In fact the big powers had so arranged their economies that smaller and poorer countries remained at a disadvantage.

Appealing for a concerted effort for the economic regeneration of the country, Sardar Patel said that the socialists in India were always talking of a Socialist Republic. Instead of restricting their activities to more agitation, he would ask them to take over the administration of one province and solve the problems which had arisen in the wake of a prolonged war. In contrast to their counterparts in Great Britain the Indian socialists were pursuing an opposite course. Strikes were encouraged and higher wages demanded. If there was no water in the well, none could draw any to drink. By all means let them take away the wealth of a few rich in the country but to what extent would this afford any relief to the teeming millions of the poor? The need of the hour was to increase the wealth of the country and this could be done by only putting in more and more work and thus increasing production. This required the maintenance of peace in the country. For one year now there was disorder in the country. Now that Pakistan had been established, there was no more fight between Hindus and Muslims, if unfortunately there should be a recurrence of this internal strife, it would not be the cowardly killings of innocent people, but would be between two armies of the two states. He appealed to the people not to indulge in mutual strife but to create a calm atmosphere and engage themselves in constructive activities which were essential for the building up of a new India.

Indian States

Dealing with the Indian states question, Sardar Patel said that the co-operation of all the Rulers was necessary to consolidate and strengthen the Indian Union. When the foreign power was eliminated the Princes would have to adjust themselves to the new democratic order. The days of those rulers who did not command the confidence of their subjects were numbered. The majority of the states had acceded to the Union and he appealed to the rest to join the Union before August 15. States which did not come now but might decide to join at a later date would have to accede on different terms. These days no state could afford to live in isolation.

He cautioned the people to exercise reserve in judging the role of the Princes at the present juncture. The rulers were not free up till now and many of them did not even now believe that paramountcy was lapsing on August 15. Many of them being descendants of great and benevolent Rulers of the past ages, he had no doubt that they would not hesitate in pursuing a correct policy and become popular rulers.

Have Strength to Defend Yourself

Continuing, Sardar Patel said that our problems were mainly domestic. Ever since he was released from prison he had been saying that imperialism was on its last legs not only in India but in all Asia. The British were quitting India and he thought that Dutch imperialism would meet its end in Indonesia.

In dealing with our domestic problems Sardar Patel said, there could not be in the future, any more separate electorates or weightages and special treatment. Every community must get what was its due but if a community which formed 15 per cent of the population had 60 per cent representation, say in the Police Department, it undoubtedly created a problem.

Referring to the agitation for cow protection, Sardar Patel said that he agreed with the demand but asked why no such agitation was sponsored in the past. In countries where cows enjoyed no legal protection they were looked after better and yielded more milk. But at a time when the Government was faced with the problem of protecting human beings the question of protecting cows would not have priority.

He deprecated attempts which were supposed to unite the country but in fact divided the Hindus. Nobody today, except the Congress could undertake the task of uniting the country.

Concluding, Sardar Patel said that India had nothing but goodwill towards all but if her safety was endangered, she must have the strength to defend herself and for this people must work.
89. Reaction of ‘Mother’ and Sri Aurobindo to the Declaration

Press release from Shri Aurobindo Asram, Pondicherry, Undated
AIHM Papers, File No. M-18, NMML

This is the Word that came to the Mother when she heard on the radio the declaration of June the 2nd Issued by the Viceroy to the leaders of the Indian Parties; it has been approved by Sri Aurobindo.

A proposal has been made for the solution of our difficulties in organising Indian Independence and it is being accepted with whatever bitterness of regret and searchings of the heart by Indian leaders. But do you know why this proposal has been made to us? It is to prove to us the absurdity of our quarrels.

And do you know why we have to accept these proposals? It is to prove to ourselves the absurdity of our quarrels.

Clearly, this is not a solution, it is a test, an ordeal which if we live it out in all sincerity, will prove to us that it is not by cutting a country into small bits that we can bring about its unity and its greatness, it is not by opposing interests against each other that we can win for it prosperity; it is not by setting one dogma against another that we can serve the Spirit of Truth. In spite of all, India has a single soul and while we have to wait till we can speak of an India one and indivisible, our cry must be:

‘LET THE SOUL OF INDIA LIVE FOR EVER.’
Chapter 27. Interim Government

1. Dissolution of Interim Government Imperative—Demands Nehru

Telegram from Louis Mountbatten to Earl of Listowel, 27 June 1947
IOR, R/3/1/160, Acc. No. 4938, NAI

Immediate

Secret

No. 1616-S. At the meeting of the Indian/Burma Committee on 28th May the future of the present Interim Government was considered in the light of papers by the President of the Board of Trade and the Secretary of State for India, and I was invited to discuss this question with the Indian leaders and keep you informed.

2. I had hoped that it would be possible for the present Interim Government to carry on for the 7 weeks that remain until the transfer of power, since any change must inevitably distract Departments from their all important task of partition. Congress have, however, been insistent and have reminded me that they only agreed to partition in the belief that I would dismiss the Interim Government at the earliest possible date after the decision of the Provinces became known.

3. We had a long discussion on the problem at the Partition Council yesterday. Congress being represented by Patel and Rajendra Prasad, and the League by Liaquat and Nishtar. The discussion was inconclusive and I sent them away with three alternative solutions and the request that they should let me know which they preferred today. It was clear that the League would not commit themselves without consultation with Jinnah.

4. I had arranged a meeting for 10.00 a.m. this morning with the same party, except that Jinnah was to come in place of Nishtar. Before the meeting started, however, I got an urgent telephone message from my own sources that Nehru had blown up and was determined to resign unless the Interim Government were dismissed.

5. I postponed the meeting an hour and saw Patel and Jinnah separately. I got the former to agree to the following draft announcement: Begins: Now that Bengal and the Punjab have voted for partition, and East Bengal, West Punjab and Sind have voted to form a separate Constituent Assembly for Pakistan, the question of the Governments of the Centre and the partitioned Provinces arises. The Viceroy has called for the resignation of all Members of the Central Government and is asking the leaders each to nominate their own future Governments. Legally these will form Committees of the Cabinet, and Cabinet meeting will be attended by all members of both Governments.

In view of the fact that the Government of the Union of India will continue in Delhi whilst the Government of Pakistan will move to Karachi, the Union of India Members of the Cabinet will hold the portfolios but be responsible only for their own future areas. The League Members holding corresponding portfolios will have overriding powers both to refer to the full Cabinet and in event of disagreement to the Viceroy for his own decision, any proposal which solely or predominantly affects Pakistan and to which they object, and also to initiate any action required for the Pakistan areas, which must be acted upon by the Member concerned. Ends.

6. I propounded the scheme to Jinnah in my private talk with him, but the above statement had not been typed before it became necessary to start the meeting.

7. When I unfolded the plan Jinnah resisted it on grounds of equity and legality. As regards equity, he said that the Congress Ministers would hold the actual portfolios and sign all the orders, while the Muslim members would be merely watchdogs. This was not a position which he could possibly accept with honour and he would have nothing to do with it. I argued that whatever the façade, Pakistan's interests would, in fact, be completely safeguarded and new Pakistan Ministers would have a chance of learning their business.

8. At this point the draft statement appeared and was circulated. Jinnah gave me the impression of being slightly less dissatisfied, and in the ensuing discussion he concentrated more on the legal aspect of the case. He contested that I had no right in law to do this. I countered by saying that I had taken the precaution of consulting the Cabinet Committee when I was in England, and that they had, on advice, assured me that my proposition was entirely legal.

9. Mr. Jinnah said that legal opinions were often influenced by the manner in which a problem was presented. I therefore told him that if he would present his case, I would submit it to you for legal opinion. He agreed to do so and has undertaken to let me have a paper tomorrow night. I will telegraph this to you at once, and I shall be most grateful if you could let [me] have a reply as a matter of the greatest urgency.

10. The next meeting of the Cabinet is at 10.00 a.m. on Wednesday, 2nd July. This will be the last meeting of the present Cabinet. I shall call for their resignations and inform them of the new arrangements. It is therefore most important that I should have the legal opinion by Monday night at latest, so that I can inform Jinnah on the Tuesday. I cannot help hoping that if this is favourable, Jinnah will reluctantly accept and in any case he has no other choice.

11. Both parties agreed to the reconstitution of the Bengal Government on the lines proposed for the Centre in para. 5 above, and both also agreed that the Punjab Governor should appoint two groups of advisers representing East and West Punjab respectively. Action is being initiated at once in Calcutta and Lahore by the Governors.

2. Congress Wishy-Washy over June 3 Plan

Extracts from minutes of Viceroy's forty-eighth staff meeting, 28 June 1947
Mountbatten Papers, File No. 202, NMML

Secret

Mr Gandhi

HIS EXCELLENCY THE VICEROY read out a letter which he had received that morning from Mr Gandhi. He stated that throughout this letter Mr Gandhi had completely misinterpreted what he had said at his meeting two days previously. In fact, he had told Mr Gandhi that he was finding increasing difficulty in helping to get matters connected with Partition settled. He had pointed out that it was for Congress not a question of fair play to ensure that the various issues were settled speedily, but of sheer expediency. If Congress took the line that they were not going to help, Mr Jinnah would point out to the world at large that Congress’s acceptance of the Statement of 3rd June had not been honest. He had told Mr Gandhi that it would be very foolish of Congress to give Mr Jinnah any excuse for not being ready to take over power on 15th August. He had assured Mr Gandhi that he intended in any event to hand over power on that date, but had explained that Congress would be put in a very poor position in the eyes of the world if they made it difficult for Mr Jinnah to take over. Mr Gandhi had stated that the words ‘fair play’ did not exist in any Hindustani dialect. He (The Viceroy) had reiterated that he was not expecting or demanding fair play; all that he was requesting was a degree of common sense so that Congress would not put themselves in the position of wrecking an agreement which had been honourably reached.

HIS EXCELLENCY THE VICEROY:
directed P.S.V. to draft, for his approval a reply to Mr Gandhi’s letter.

3. Nine Congress Members Resign
Telegram from Louis Mountbatten to Earl of Listowel, 8 July 1947
Mountbatten Papers, File No. 82B, NMML

Ismay from Mountbatten
I have now received resignations from the nine Congress Members. The five Muslim League Members have for the present refrained from handing in theirs, and Liaquat has written asking for details of my plan of reconstitution because the Muslim League can only decide whether to send in their resignations when they know the full proposals.

2. I fear this may be the beginning of a further obstructive move by Jinnah and have sent for him this afternoon.

3. Meanwhile I saw Nehru this morning, who agreed that I need take no steps to reconstitute the Government until the normal Cabinet meeting on 23rd July, but he said he could not possibly afford to allow it to be held beyond this.

4. Of course the later I could put this off the easier for Jinnah but the worse for Nehru. I shall therefore probably have to fix on the 23rd July and hope the Bill will be through by the 21st or 22nd. You will realise that it would be an embarrassment if it went through much earlier.

4. League Members Resist Dissolution of Interim Government
Telegram from Louis Mountbatten to Earl of Listowel, 8 July 1947
Mountbatten Papers, File No. 82B, MMML

Ismay from Mountbatten.
Further to my telegram 1832-S of 8th July. I have had a very long and rather difficult interview with Jinnah on the subject this evening. He says that all League Members of Cabinet are extremely bitter at this deliberate humiliation being inflicted on them in the last three weeks by the Congress and they have not yet decided their course of action.

2. They are considering refusing to resign in order to force me to dismiss them, and refusing to accept fresh portfolios in order to indicate that they have been deliberately deprived of their fair share of government in the last three weeks.

3. Liaquat went so far as to say to Jinnah that he presumed that this was a manoeuvre to enable Congress to pull a fast one over Pakistan, in removing assets.
4. I think I persuaded Jinnah that this was not the case and got him to see why Congress were so keen to be masters in their own house at the earliest possible moment.

5. I pointed out how I had fought his battles step by step, how I had prevented this issue from coming to a head before I went to London; that I had on return postponed the date from June 4 to July 4 and finally to July 23. This final date was within three weeks of the setting up of the new Government in Karachi and I suggested that most of the three weeks would be required for the move. I appealed to him that his Members should resign and that he and I could together phrase an announcement which would take the sting out of this reconstitution and make it appear a reasonable move.

6. He said he could not give me an answer until all his Members returned from the referenda on the 17th.

7. He then said in that affectionate tone which he has recently begun to use with me: ‘I appreciate your difficulty and you can rely on me to make everything in your path as smooth and easy as possible.’

8. It has however occurred to me that this matter might arise in the debate, and in my next following telegram I am transmitting a possible question with a suggested reply. In view, however, of the prospects of my getting Jinnah to accept this peacefully I would prefer that this measure should not be used unless a genuine question arises or I telegraph at a later date asking for the question to be asked.

5. Both Nations Must Remain in the British Commonwealth

Extract from the record of interview between Louis Mountbatten and M.K. Gandhi, 9 July 1947
Mountbatten Papers, File No. 194, NMML

I think and hope that I have satisfactorily cleared up the misunderstanding referred to in his letter of the 27th/28th June, 1947. I told him that my sole object up to 15th August was to ensure a peaceful and efficient transfer of power to the two Dominions in accordance with the will of the people of India and their respective future Governments. He next raised with me the fear which he had expressed consistently in his recent post prayer meetings that the British would leave a legacy of war, and that the partitioned armies would be left in a state in which there was every likelihood that they would be used for making war on each other.

2. I told him that of course I shared his view that nothing should be left undone which would ensure the removal of the threat of war between two neighbouring members of the British Commonwealth.

3. I told him in confidence that Lord Ismay was this day seeing the British Chiefs of Staff to discuss the future Commonwealth defence arrangements with particular reference to India. While I could not prophesy what would be the outcome of those discussions, I hoped that they would result in defence discussions between the United Kingdom, Pakistan and India taking place after the 15th August and before 31st March.

4. I pointed out that the institution of the Joint Defence Council which would last until at least that date, would remove all risk of war before that date, and that this gave us eight months in which to arrange some form of agreement which would reduce the chances of the two Countries fighting each other.
5. I pointed out that the greatest guarantee for the future peace of the Indian Sub-Continent lay in both nations remaining members of the British Commonwealth. He reproved me for using the word ‘nations’ and invited me to use States or Countries instead.

6. I further pointed out that so long as Pakistan and India remain within the Commonwealth, there was no reason why a Commonwealth Conference should not be called to Delhi since this was the most central capital in the whole Commonwealth, and at such a meeting arrangements could be discussed which would ensure other members of the Commonwealth devising means to prevent Pakistan and India from making war on each other.

6. Report from Viceroy

Extracts from Viceroy’s personal report, 11 July 1947

TOP SECRET AND PERSONAL

This has been another busy week, as, in addition to the usual Cabinet meeting, there have been two meetings of the Partition Council as well as a meeting with the Hyderabad delegation, and I have also been considerably occupied with the question of the reconstitution of the Interim Government and the nominations for Governors-General of the two new Dominions. I will refer to these matters later on.

4. I have just sent Abell down to Calcutta to ascertain how the reconstituted Cabinet there is working and to enquire about the progress of partition work. It is rather early as yet to judge the success of the arrangement by which the Congress have been put in office as a sort of ‘Shadow’ Cabinet. Nevertheless, the start has been propitious and Burrows reports that at present there is plenty of goodwill. The Congress are pressing to be allowed to see all papers that go to their opposite numbers and it is not certain that the Muslim League will consent to this since the basis of the request is that the existing Ministers cannot be trusted to show their new colleagues papers which do, in fact, concern Western Bengal.

5. If a difficulty arises in the Cabinet it is more likely to arise over law and order policy in Calcutta than over anything else. The Governor has, however, taken certain action in regard to the posting of Police Officers in the last few days which has given satisfaction to the Congress and he thinks that, with good luck, he will be able to jolly along his odd Ministry until the 15th August.

6. The partition work in Bengal is not going ahead very fast. The Congress are at present being quite co-operative but the main burden falls on the Muslim League, who have to set up a new capital at Dacca and start a new administration. The resources of Dacca are small and the time available is very short. The Muslim League High Command themselves take a good deal less interest in East Bengal than in Western Pakistan and I am afraid East Bengal is at the bottom of the priority list. The attention of our Steering Committee here in Delhi has been drawn to the importance of giving certain priorities to Dacca and possibly things will improve. I am writing to Jinnah about all this.

10. I saw the Maharaja of Patiala yesterday, and impressed on him once again that if the Sikhs showed any sign of fight they would have the Armed Forces of India against them and would be crushed. He fully realised this and undertook to do everything in his power to try and steady them. He had brought ten retired Sikh officers as a delegation to see me about the Boundary Commission; I refused to see them and turned them over to the Chief of the General Staff (in the absence of the Commander-in-Chief) to explain to them that the terms of reference of the Boundary Commission had been settled by the leaders, that I had nothing more to do with the Boundary Commissions, and that they must address themselves to the Sikh Judge on the Punjab Boundary Commission. Patiala agreed that this was the right decision....

16. The Cabinet Meeting on Wednesday the 9th July was a very tame affair. There was a very short agenda as the routine business of the Government of India has practically come to a standstill. Much of the time was taken up by a discussion, in which there was a distinct note of acerbity, between the Congress and Muslim League over the final destination of 22 million ounces of silver, now lying in the Mint in Lahore. There had been an administrative decision last March that this silver should be moved to Bombay, but for one reason or another it has not yet got under way. It is required ultimately to repay the loan of silver from the United States, and is not required for monetary nickel. Although no Congress member actually said so, the fear was quite obvious that Pakistan would use this treasure to finance itself, and if 15th August arrived before the silver was in Bombay, that would very likely be the last of it which India would see. Finally the matter was shelved by calling for a report of the full facts involved; this is supposed to come up next week....

20. Now that advice has been so unanimous and strong that I should accept the Governor-Generalship of India and the Chairmanship of the Joint Defence Council, my mind is fully made up and I shall carry on and do my very best. I must however record the feeling which I cannot altogether dismiss that it is a tragedy that I have had to take a position with one side when hitherto I have managed to retain my complete impartiality. I must also point out that this will be an extremely difficult position for Congress leaders to put over on their back-benchers; for Jinnah scores an undoubted victory over Congress from a psychological point of view in having an Indian Governor-General for Pakistan.

21. The one bull point in the favour of the Congress leaders is that by my continuing as Governor-General the continuity entity of India as opposed to Pakistan is more firmly established in the eyes of the world. The second is that I have only accepted for the ‘transition’ period—probably about eight months—so that it cannot be looked upon as establishing permanent inequality between the two Dominions....

35. I thought it might amuse the members of His Majesty’s Government to know that a manifesto was recently issued in Bihar announcing the formation of a Muslim League Left Wing. In laying down the proposed rules of the new party, the first principle was ‘The Left Wing will always uphold the cause of the right’.

7. Division of Portfolios between Congress and League

Extract from a letter from Louis Mountbatten to Jawaharlal Nehru, 11 July 1947
IOR, R/3/1/160, Acc. No. 4938, NAI

Personal

As you know, before Krishna left he helped us both to clear up the muddle I had got myself into about the reconstitution of the Government.

2. You will remember that I promised you that I would give all the portfolios for India territories to the Congress as soon as I could legally do so.
3. You have always very honourably upheld the view that you did not wish the Congress to interfere with the Pakistan territories. Krishna had always meant to work out a scheme along these lines, but I am afraid I rather got off the lines, and he tells me that he recently discussed the matter with you and came to the conclusion that the best solution would be to give all the portfolios to Congress Ministers for the India territories, and the portfolios for the future Pakistan territories to the League.

4. Sardar Patel has written to me saying that he wished me to arrange matters that all those Muslim officials who had opted to go to Pakistan could be removed from their present offices in the Government of India, since their continued presence was nothing but an embarrassment....

6. Furthermore, I do not propose to wait until 23rd July, since this date is based on the Bill not being through until the 21st.

7. It seems certain that the King’s assent will be given on the 17th, and I therefore propose to reconstitute the Government along these lines on the morning of the 18th.

8. If therefore you accept my wording, I shall immediately send for Mr Jinnah and hand him the Communiqué.

9. As soon as this has been done, I would suggest that you should consider who is to hold the five League portfolios in the Congress India Cabinet.

10. I would also suggest that when this is done, I should issue orders concerning the posting of India and Pakistan officials in sufficient time to enable the detailed posting to be prepared to be implemented on the morning of the 18th....

Draft Communiqué on the Reconstitution of Government

In order to facilitate the setting up of the new administration of Pakistan His Excellency the Viceroy has decided with the concurrence of the party leaders that the Interim Government should be reconstituted on the following lines.

The Government will consist of two groups representing the two successor Governments. There will be nine members from India and nine from Pakistan.

The two groups will meet separately to consider matters concerning their own territories, and jointly under the chairmanship of the Governor-General to consider matters of common concern.

The personnel who have chosen to serve in Pakistan will be withdrawn from existing departments, and will staff Pakistan departments which will be organised at once in Delhi and will serve the Pakistan members of the Cabinet.

There will thus be what amounts to provisional Governments, one for India and one for Pakistan, each dealing with its own business and consulting the other on matters of common concern.

8. On Interim Government and Official Appointments in Pakistan

Extract from record of interview between Louis Mountbatten and M.A. Jinnah, 12 July 1947
Mountbatten Papers, File No. 194, NMML

I discussed the Reconstitution of the Interim Government with him and gave him a copy of the draft communiqué. He did not appear particularly grateful and said in his usual manner ‘I will consider this with my people’. I pointed out the only alternative was the scheme I had previously described to him, of giving all portfolios to Congress and giving only a Shadow Cabinet to the Muslim League. He told me that he had considered this with his Members of the Executive Council and they had decided that they would in no circumstances co-operate with or even accept such a scheme. I pointed out to him how lucky he was that I had been able to find an alternative, as it was no longer in his power to prevent me putting through any scheme I liked under Clause 9 of the Bill. I informed him of my interview with the Hyderabad Delegation, and told him of the lines I was working on. He informed me that if Congress attempted to exert any pressure on Hyderabad, every Muslim throughout the whole of India, yes, all the hundred million Muslims, would rise as one man to defend the oldest Muslim dynasty in India...

Mr. Jinnah then informed me that he was considering making Nishtar Governor of Baluchistan. I suggested that he should not take any such step until he had discussed the matter with Sir Conrad Corfield, on the basis of obtaining his advice as to whether a Pathan from the North-West Frontier like Nishtar, would be acceptable to the tribes of Baluchistan, and alternatively discussed which of the British political officers would be the most suitable to put there. I gave him a copy of the Secretary of State's telegram No. 8962, announcing the acceptance by Sir George Cunningham of the governorship of the N.W.F.P., subject to certain conditions. I asked him to let me know as soon as possible that he accepted the conditions.

I informed him that the Foreign Office had now authorised negotiations to begin with Lord Killearn, and that I had that day telegraphed him to Singapore to come and stay with me at Delhi to discuss the governorship of East Bengal and Sylhet with Mr. Jinnah.

I then handed Mr. Jinnah the original letter, D.O. 201 of the 11th July, from Vice-Admiral Miles, concerning candidates for the future Flag Officer, Royal Pakistan Navy. I invited Mr. Jinnah to send for Admiral Miles and discuss this letter with him, and if necessary, subsequently to arrange for the two officers concerned to come and see him. I asked him whether he had made up his mind about the Pakistan Dominion flag, and he told me that it was his great personal regret that he had been unable to find one single supporter for the idea of having a Union Jack in the upper canton of the Muslim League flag. He explained that it would be repugnant to the religious feelings of the Muslims to have a flag with a Christian cross alongside the crescent. I told him that so far as the Navy was concerned, I considered that they would have to fly the British Commonwealth white ensign at the ensign staff, but that they could fly their Pakistan flag (whether it had a Jack in it or not) at the Jack staff. I told him that this was the custom throughout the navies of the Commonwealth, and I hoped he would agree so that I could give Admiral Miles the necessary instructions. He replied ‘Certainly’. He then raised with me the question of his G.C.M.G., and said that he had been surprised to find the strength of the opposition among his party to accepting this honour. He pointed out that the Muslim League had only recently passed a resolution rejecting all British honours and that his followers considered that he would put himself in an impossible position if he now accepted a British honour.

He wished me to know how much he personally regretted this, and how much he hoped that the time would come in the not too distant future when he would be able to bring about a change of heart among his followers, and when not only he, but he hoped others in Pakistan who might have rendered distinguished service, would be prepared to accept British honours and decorations. I told him I would raise this with him again at a later date, wherever I might be. He then went on to say that although there might be these apparent rebuffs of the British, such as the Governor-General, the G.C.M.G., the flag, etc., they would find that Pakistan intended to be a loyal and permanent member of the Commonwealth whose friendly relations with the rest of the British Dominions would improve year by year, until all feeling of bitterness had passed and they could regard themselves as truly a member of the British family.

I asked him whether he would agree to fly the generally accepted flag of a Governor-General, namely a dark blue flag with the letters ‘Pakistan’ in yellow and a yellow crown above, both for Government House and his car, and hoist in a warship if he went afloat, he said he would be honoured to do this and I undertook to supply him with his first flag.

(NOTE:—The question of what flag the Governors in Pakistan are to fly, was not discussed but will require urgent consideration.)...

Finally, I discussed with him the question of the King's signature. I told him that I had felt that he had acted rather ungraciously at the Partition Council in opposing the suggestion which I had put up and which had already been privately agreed to by the Congress Leaders. Namely, that the King should continue to sign ‘George R.I.’ after he had dropped the title ‘Emperor of India’. Mr. Jinnah said that he was the last person to wish to dictate to His Majesty how he should sign his name and if the King elected to continue to sign his name ‘George R.I.’ no one in Pakistan would object. If, however, it was a question of asking Pakistan to agree to invite the King to continue with a legally incorrect signature, that was another matter and one on which he hoped I would not press him. We therefore mutually agreed that I would recall the Minutes of the Partition Council dealing with this matter and that I would inform the Congress Leaders what had occurred and suggest that they also take no further action and leave it to His Majesty to continue to sign in any way he pleased.

9. Setting Up of New Governments for India and Pakistan

Record of interview between Louis Mountbatten, M.A. Jinnah, and Liaquat Ali Khan, 15 July 1947

SECRET

I kept them back after the meeting of the Partition Council, from 11.30 to 12 noon. I first handed them both a copy of the Order I proposed to make reconstituting the Government on the 19th July.

Mr. Jinnah did his usual business of demurring and saying he would have to give it due consideration. I told him that that was quite unnecessary since this was not an Order in Council on advice but an Order from myself made legal under clause 9 of the Bill, and that I proposed to circulate it to the Cabinet the following morning as an act of courtesy prior to making the order.

I pointed out that resignations were not required under this Order, and that I, on the contrary, required a Pakistan Council for two vital purposes: (a) to be the Council to advise me on the Orders in Council for the amendment of the 1935 Act as required by the future Pakistan Government; and (b) to advise me if the present Government in the N.W.F.P. refused to resign after having lost the Referendum.

Finally I pointed out the immense advantage to Pakistan in being able to set up their own departments with their own officials as well as Ministers well in advance of the move to Karachi.

(As they were leaving I kept back Mr. Liaquat Ali Khan for a moment to make it quite clear that I could not make the Orders in Council for Pakistan on the advice of Mr. Jinnah, since he was going to become the constitutional Governor-General of Pakistan and should therefore no longer give me advice on this matter. I had not wished to rub this point in to Mr. Jinnah, but I wished Mr. Liaquat Ali Khan to be under no illusions that I would take no advice whatever from Mr. Jinnah on this matter from now on, which would have to be submitted through the Pakistan Council. Mr. Liaquat Ali Khan appeared to see the point, as he nodded and said ‘Thank you very much’.

Item 2. I referred once more to the question of flags and expressed renewed regret that Pakistan would not accept a small Union Jack on the Dominion flag. This gave Mr. Jinnah the chance of saying that the last thing he wished to do was to sever his connection with the Commonwealth in any way, and in fact he was looking forward to building up an ever closer connection as time went on. I told him that flags were an important outward and visible symbol and I hoped that he would at least adopt the custom of hoisting the Union Jack alongside the Dominion flag, either on the same pole or on two separate poles, on all special occasions such as birthdays of the Royal Family, Dominion Days of other Dominions (and presumably their own on the 15th August each year), and in general on as many occasions as possible. He replied: ‘Certainly, if you will give me a list of the days on which the Union Jack should be hoisted throughout Pakistan, I will see that it is done’.

Item 3. I urged him to make up his mind on the Army Commander-in-Chief of Pakistan and told him he could not possibly do better than appoint General Messervy; he was already in command at Rawalpindi with his H.Q. Staff and to that extent Pakistan would have an advantage over India, who would have to set up a new Headquarters for the new C-in-C India. I told him General Messervy was coming here for our Silver Wedding and he would have an opportunity of seeing him again in the next two or three days. Mr. Jinnah said he would like to talk it over with General Messervy and would let me know his decision immediately afterwards.

Item 4. I asked them both whether they thought any useful purpose would be served by keeping Lord Ismay on, on my staff (paid by HMG), with a view to keeping liaison with Mr. Jinnah and Mr. Liaquat Ali Khan. Both of them became excited and enthusiastic and said that they considered it absolutely essential that Lord Ismay should stay, and indeed that this would be the perfect solution to the problem of liaison between the two Governments in the early days on high level policy questions, and would reduce the chance of friction to a minimum. I told them that I could not guarantee that Lord Ismay would accept, but that I knew that the opinions they had both expressed would weigh greatly with him.

Item 5. Mr. Liaquat Ali Khan was anxious to know whether I had had a reply from Sir Patrick Spens yet about the Arbitral Tribunal, as they had selected their candidate and were anxious to discuss the matter with him. In fact they wanted to ask their candidate to come up to Delhi to meet the Chief Justice. I advised against this as it might make the Chief Justice feel that his hand was being forced. I told them that Sir Patrick Spens was expected in Delhi within the next day or two.

Item 6. Mr. Liaquat Ali Khan then asked what successor body I intended to establish after the 15th August to take the place of the Partition Council. I said I had not yet given this matter much thought, but would now consider it and let him know.

Item 7. He asked me whether I thought I could use my well known persuasive powers to get the Congress to agree to let the Pakistan High Commissioner and his Staff be housed in the Red Fort. I said I would go into this.
10. Provisional Arrangements in View of the Reconstruction
Letter from Jawaharlal Nehru to Louis Mountbatten, 19 July 1947

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS DEPARTMENT
NEW DELHI

Dear Lord Mountbatten,

In view of the reconstruction of the Government that has taken place, I have consulted my colleagues and we are of opinion that at present only provisional arrangements should be made. We shall undoubtedly have to add to the number of members of the Government, but we do not wish to do so immediately. We may be able to suggest names for additional members in the near future. Meanwhile, all arrangements are strictly provisional and subject to change.

We propose that the following existing members of the Cabinet should continue:

Sardar Vallabhbhai Patel,
Maulana Abul Kalam Azad,
Dr. Rajendra Prasad,
Dr. John Matthai,
Sir Rajagopalachari,
Sardar Baldev Singh,
Mr Jagjivanram,
Mr C.H. Bhabha and
Jawaharlal Nehru.

These existing members will continue to hold their present portfolios and will, in addition, take charge of the five portfolios and departments vacated by the Muslim League nominees. This will be done in the following manner:

Finance: Mr C. Rajagopalachari
Communications: Dr. John Matthai, Commerce: Mr Bhabha,
Health: Mr Jagjivanram,
Law: Jawaharlal Nehru.

As Mr Jagjivanram has not returned yet and it is not quite clear how soon he will be able to take charge of his injury, I am prepared to take temporary charge of the Health Department, till Mr Jagjivanram can do so, or till some other arrangement is made.

These arrangements, I would repeat, are provisional only and subject to change in future.

Yours sincerely,
Jawaharlal Nehru

My dear Mr Liaquat Ali Khan,

This morning you gave the distribution of portfolios in the provisional Government of Pakistan to H.E., and he asks me to write to you as was arranged at the meeting for your confirmation that the list enclosed is correct. Could your reply please be telephoned.

Yours sincerely,

12. British Governor Will Maintain Good Relations with India and Pakistan
Extract from a telegram from G.E.B. Abell to A. Carter, 20 July 1947

Immediate
Confidential
NO 2052-S. Your 9262 July 18th. Cunningham.

2. Viceroy has had further talk with Jinnah. Jinnah is most anxious to have Cunningham, but is genuinely embarrassed at any suggestion that one Government should be treated in a special way. He points out that concession would not remain secret and have three other British Governors are involved.

6. H.E. is most anxious that Cunningham should accept, and hopes Secretary of State will appeal to him to do so. He would also be grateful for a very early decision so that Cunningham’s name may be submitted to the King.
7. The need to seize every vacancy for Governorships offered to the British seems to all of us out here of paramount importance for future good relations. The prospects of Pakistan remaining within Commonwealth may partly depend on this.

13. We Owe a Great Deal to Imperial Influences

Extracts from a letter from Tej Bahadur Sapru to Sita Ram, 22 July 1947
Sir Sitaram Papers, File No. 29/121, NAI

My dear Sir Sita Ram,

...Thank you very much for congratulating me on the advent of the new Constitution. Generally I am in agreement with the provisions of the Constitution which have appeared this morning but there are some features of it which I do not like and I think they will lead to great corruption in future, e.g. election of Governors. However, I have kept all my ideas to myself. I know nothing as to whether the Indian Republic will be on Irish model or a complete severance from old moorings. Whatever you may say of the British, the British Constitution, or the English language, in your cooler moments you must admit that you owe a great deal to these influences. The word ‘Republic’ does not frighten me. Ireland is a Republic but in many respects very British in its constitutional problems. It is a tribute to the British Constitution that it can stand any strain. It is my misfortune that I should have been disabled from rendering service to the country at the last stage of my life. I have, therefore, refrained from expressing any opinion publicly, but I may tell you that I have been feeling very unhappy since yesterday morning when I read about the outrage committed in Burma. I fear it foreshadows a similar misfortune in India. Some people are talking wildly. Assuming that the Congress has gone wrong in accepting the partition what is it they wanted the Congress to do?—resign office, start Civil Disobedience and leave it to be dealt with by the Muslim League. It is a practical question which ought to be answered in a practical manner. You will pardon my saying so that these critics always appear on the scene when some important event is to happen but the brunt of the fight is always borne by Congressmen. That is the reason why these critics have not acquired any influence so far. For a few days there will be much flutter in some districts and then things will quiet down. If my estimate of the future is wrong then trouble will continue long and probably it will not be trouble between Hindus and British but between Hindus and Mohammedans who, on such occasions, are much more prepared in many ways. This does not at all mean that I approve of what Jinnah has done or of the attitude of the Mohammedans during the last one year. To my mind nothing could be more unpatriotic. We must not however lose our heads in regard to practical questions....

Yours very sincerely,
Sd/ Tej Bahadur Sapru

14. ‘Naga Leaders Claim Independence’
The Tribune, 22 July 1947

New Delhi, July 20.—A delegation of Naga leaders arrived at New Delhi by air to discuss with appropriate authorities and leaders what they described as ‘their claim for independence’ after the British withdrawal, from India on August 15.

It is understood the delegation has already met Mahatma Gandhi and Mr. Jinnah and placed before them their viewpoints.

They are likely to meet Mr. Jaipal Singh, Adibasi leader, and members of the Tribal Sub-Committee of the Constituent Assembly today.

The delegation will also meet Pandit Jawaharlal Nehru and other officials of the External Affairs Department, U.P.

15. Statement by the Partition Council

Telegram from Louis Mountbatten to Earl of Listowel, 24 July 1947

IOR, L/P&J/10/82, Acc. No. 3654, NAI

MOST IMMEDIATE

No. 2916-S.

Press note at their meeting at 5 p.m. on Tuesday, July 22nd 1947. The members of the Partition Council (which included Sardar Baldev Singh for this item) decided to issue the attached statement. Those present were, in the Chair, His Excellency the Viceroy, for the future Government of India the Hon’ble Sardar Vallabhbhai Patel and the Hon’ble Dr. Rajendra Prasad, for the future Government of Pakistan Mr. Jinnah and the Hon’ble Mr. Liaquat Ali Khan, and on behalf of the Sikhs—the Hon’ble Sardar Baldev Singh.

2. Statement by the Partition Council. BEGINS: Now that the decision to set up two independent Dominions from the 15th August has been finally taken the members of the Partition Council on behalf of the future Governments declare that they are determined to establish peaceful conditions in which the processes of partition may be completed and the many urgent tasks of administration and economic reconstruction taken in hand. Both the Congress and the Muslim League have given assurances of fair and equitable treatment to the minorities after the transfer of power. The two future Governments re-affirm these assurances. It is their intention to safeguard the legitimate interests of all citizens irrespective of religion, caste or sex in the exercise of their normal civic rights. All citizens will be regarded as equal and both the Governments will assure to all people within their territories the exercise of liberties such as freedom of speech, the right to form Associations, the right to worship in their own way and the protection of their language and culture. Both the Governments further undertake that there shall be no discrimination against those who before August 15th may have been political opponents. The guarantee of protection which both Governments give to the citizens of their respective countries implies that in no circumstances will violence be tolerated in any form in either territory. The two Governments wish to emphasize that they are united in during the determination to safeguard the peace. In the Punjab, during the period of changeover to the new conditions, both Governments have together agreed on the setting up of a special military command from the 1st August covering the civil districts of Sialkot, Gujranwala, Sheikhpura, Lyallpur, Montgomery, Lahore, Amritsar, Gurdaspur, Hoshiarpur, Jullundur, Ferozepore and

Ludhiana. With their concurrence Major General T.W. Rees has been nominated as Military Commander for this purpose and Brigadier Digambar Singh Brar (India) and Colonel Ayub Khan (Pakistan) have been attached to him in an advisory capacity. After August 15th Major-General Rees will control operationally the forces of both new states in this area and will be responsible through the Supreme Commander and the Joint Defence Council to the two Governments. The two Governments will not hesitate to set up a similar organization in Bengal should they consider it necessary. Both Governments have pledged themselves to accept the awards of the Boundary Commissions whatever these may be. The Boundary Commissions are already in session. If they are to discharge their duties satisfactorily it is essential that they should not be hampered by public speeches or writings threatening boycott or direct action or otherwise interfering with their work. Both Governments will take appropriate steps to secure this end and as soon as the awards are announced both governments will enforce them impartially and at once.

16. Nehru Invites Patel to Join His New Cabinet

Letter from Jawaharlal Nehru to Vallabhbhai Patel, 1 August 1947

As formalities have to be observed to some extent, I am writing to invite you to join the new Cabinet. This writing is somewhat superfluous because you are the strongest pillar of the Cabinet.

Yours sincerely,
Jawaharlal Nehru

17. Patel Affirms His Loyalty to Nehru

Letter from Vallabhbhai Patel to Jawaharlal Nehru, 3 August 1947

My dear Jawaharlal,

Many thanks for your letter of the 1st instant. Our attachment and affection for each other and our comradeship for an unbroken period of nearly 30 years admit of no formalities. My services will be at your disposal, I hope, for the rest of my life and you will have unquestioned loyalty and devotion from me in the cause for which no man in India has sacrificed as much as you have done. Our combination is unbreakable and therein lies our strength. I thank you for the sentiments expressed in your letter.

Yours sincerely,
Vallabhbhai Patel
18. Induction of Non-Congressmen in Cabinet

Extracts from Viceroy’s Personal Report No. 16, 8 August 1947

TOP, Vol. XII, pp. 594–606

Top Secret and Personal

...20. Gandhi’s absence from the celebrations in Delhi on the 15th August is, of course, intentional. He has never given the 3rd June plan his unqualified blessing and his position might be difficult. He also realises that it would not be possible to fit him into the programme in the way to which he would feel himself entitled. Arrangements for these celebrations are going well; and I think they will be worthy of the occasion.

21. Gandhi has announced his decision to spend the rest of his life in Pakistan looking after the minorities. This will infuriate Jinnah, but will be a great relief to Congress for, as I have said before, his influence is largely negative or even destructive and directed against the only man who has his feet firmly on the ground, Vallabhbhai Patel.

22. The astrologers are being rather tiresome since both the 13th and 15th have been declared inauspicious days, whereas the 14th is auspicious. I was not warned that I ought to consult the astrologers before fixing the day for the transfer of power, but luckily this has been got over by the Constituent Assembly deciding to meet before midnight on the auspicious 14th and take over power as midnight strikes which is apparently still an auspicious moment.

23. They then proposed to send a delegation to Viceroy’s House (which a few minutes previously will have become Government House) to invite me to accept the Governor-Generalship of India. The fact that the King will already have legally appointed me had been overlooked, but a formula has been found to overcome this and I gather the resolution will merely be to endorse what has already been done.

24. One or two of the more superstitious members of the Cabinet wished to have all the ceremony done at midnight in the Durbar Hall, but as, fortunately, the older members of the Cabinet usually go to bed at 9 o’clock, Sleep won the swearing-in battle over Superstition; and we are now going to have the swearing-in ceremony in the presence of 500 people at 8.30 on the morning of the 15th, after which we will all proceed to the Constituent Assembly which I am to address in their new capacity as the Legislative Assembly for India.

25. It has been very difficult to find a Governor for East Bengal, owing to both Killearn and Rowlands turning down Jinnah’s invitation. But Bourne, the Governor of the Central Provinces, in a very public-spirited way, responded to my personal appeal to oblige Jinnah by taking over East Bengal temporarily on the 15th.

26. When I saw Mr. Pakwasa, Bourne’s relief in the Central Provinces, yesterday, I asked if he would mind flying from Bombay to Nagpur on the 13th to enable Bourne to fly to Dacca on the 14th. He regretted that the astrologers would not permit him to undertake any journey on the 13th, so is now going to fly to Nagpur on the 12th for turnover discussions with Bourne, and fly back that evening to Bombay, and then fly over on the 14th again to Nagpur, thus spending the inauspicious day at home....

29. I have previously reported to the Secretary of State that the Indian leaders agreed that the Union Jack should be flown together with the Dominion flag on public buildings on certain days of the year. I now attach as Appendix II a list of the agreed dates. This list, when it came up for discussion at the Partition Council meeting, included Anzac day. The reason for the deletion of this day, which I and my staff did not previously spot, is of course that it commemorates a victory over the Turks, a Muslim nation whom Pakistan naturally does not want to embarrass in any way. I also originally had ‘Empire Day’ down against 24th May. There was unanimous feeling among all the leaders that this was an unfortunate expression so far as India is concerned, but they would accept the date if the title were changed to ‘Commonwealth Day’. I had put down the 15th August as Independence Day for India and Pakistan; but Nehru wrote pointing out that this was the least suitable day in the year to fly the Union Jack. Liaquat suggested that each Dominion might fly the flag of the sister dominion on this day. Congress would not give an immediate agreement, but undertook to consider the matter in the summer of 1948...

48. It is of course admirable that they should have got an important member of the Hindu Mahasabha to join the Government, and Mukerji is an intelligent man (whom they wanted to remove from Bengal); but Burrows, who knows him well, described him to me recently as being so low that a snake could not crawl under his belly. I therefore felt that this would be going out of the frying pan into the fire and, fortified by the reconciliation between Auchinleck and Baldev Singh, I had no hesitation in eating my words about the latter. It now appears certain that Baldev Singh will be Defence Member. He seems slow in the uptake, but he has had a hard row to hoe, and I am inclined to think that he means well.

49. Nehru has now sent me his proposed list of Cabinet Ministers. I attach a copy of this as Appendix IV. He has taken my advice (which I outlined in paragraphs 36 to 39 of my last Report) so far as new members of the Cabinet are concerned, having changed four of them since I spoke. I understand that Gandhi has written to Maulana asking him as a gesture to Congress to make way for a younger man; but the old Maulana has not yet taken the hint and they cannot drop him until he does. Gandhi’s secretary, Rajkumari Amrit Kaur is a delightful person, included at Gandhi’s insistence. She is earmarked for Health. She admits she knows nothing about health, and I rather doubt her competence as a Minister. But she is a great friend of my wife’s and has written asking if she may lean on her. The full allocation of portfolios has not yet been decided; but Nehru says that he does not intend to make any change among the eight members of the existing Cabinet who will continue in office.

50. Of the new members, Sir Shanmukham Chetty is a man of great administrative experience and was until recently President of the Tariff Board. I did not expect Ambedkar would find a place and his selection has given me great satisfaction. Gadgil is a Congressman and a student of economics, and people think highly of his abilities. Rafi Ahmad Kidwai is now a Minister in the United Provinces.

51. The Cabinet is still far from being an ideal selection but the requirements of party politics could not entirely be done away with. On the whole, it must be conceded that Congress have been very generous and have included as large a proportion of non-Congressmen as one could possibly expect. Sir Shanmukham Chetty in particular has been a bitter critic of the Congress for a long time. He will probably hold charge of the portfolio of Finance.

52. The appointments of Governors, which have been officially announced this week, have, on the whole, been welcomed. The only exception to this is an attack by Sarat Chandra Bose (brother of the I.N.A. leader) on the appointment of Rajagopalachari as Governor of West Bengal, as ‘an insult to West Bengal and her people and indeed to all fighters for freedom in the country.’ This attack is mainly founded on the accusations that Rajagopalachari advocated at one time that Bengal and the Punjab should be ‘forsaken’ on the ground that these two Provinces were obstacles in the way of the rest of India attaining independence; that his record as an administrator is bad; and that his record as a Congress-man during the war period was ‘miserable’. On the other hand, I am delighted with this appointment; for I think he will make a much better Governor than a Minister.

53. I referred to the problem of the North-West Frontier Province in paragraphs 19 to 23 of my last Report. Just before Jinnah left for Pakistan (in my aircraft) he and Liaquat asked me what I was doing about the N.W.F.P. Ministry, as they were getting very worried. I replied that I had referred the matter to London as I did not wish to act in an unconstitutional manner. Liaquat then told me that he had evidence that Khan Sahib intended to declare the independence of ‘Pathanistan’ on the morning of the 15th if still in power; but I have not heard any supporting evidence of this from any other source. I told them that I had it in mind to tell Lockhart to call on the Ministry to resign on the 11th and that if they failed to do so to dismiss them on the 12th. The new Governor, Cunningham (who was of course the Governor up to 1945) is seeing Jinnah in Karachi on the 11th, and me in Delhi on the 12th, and arrives at Peshawar on the evening of the 12th. He will be sworn-in on the morning of the 13th and his first act can be to form a new Ministry in accordance with Jinnah’s instructions in anticipation of the transfer of power on the 15th August. This proposed has been telegraphed to the Secretary of State for approval. Jinnah did not like this delay, but finally shrugged his shoulders and said ‘I am in your hands in this matter.’...

19. British Quitting India Only Way to End Deadlock

Vallabhbhai Patel’s speech during Liberty Week celebrations, 11 August 1947

I make an earnest appeal to people to wipe out from their minds the memories of the past—trea ting it as a terrible nightmare and look forward with single-minded purpose to make India strong, prosperous and happy. This can only be done by hard work. A Socialist Government in Britain is calling upon workers to sweat an hour more and a strange contrast here is that our Socialists and others are preaching strikes and encouraging wage-boosts. This will only end up in a serious trouble.

I wish Pakistan all success and prosperity. I wish her to be strong because then alone could there be friendly relations and amity between the two States. India harbours no ill-will against Pakistan; and, indeed, it will do all in her power to help the new State.

I am sure all the Indian States will join the Indian Union as none can afford to keep out and live in isolation. First thing should be done first; and the first job is to get the States to accede to the Union and consolidate it. The demand of people in the States for a democratic regime raises an entirely different issue. I cannot see how an Indian ruler exists with his subjects in hostility and clamouring for popular government!

The Congress had pledged to rid the country of foreign domination; and, after making considerable sacrifices and bearing prolonged sufferings, it has now succeeded. But the Congress has also strived for United India and a union of all communities. Unfortunately, it could not lay claim to success on that count. This was due to factors beyond its control. Their joy on August 15 would have been fuller and greater had not India been divided!

I would make no efforts to explain away the responsibility of the Congress to divide the country. We took these extreme steps after great deliberation. In spite of my previous strong opposition to partition, I agreed to it because I was convinced that in order to keep India united it must be divided now.

My experience in office during the past year showed that it was impossible to do anything constructive with the Muslim League in. The League Representatives during their continuance in office did nothing but to create deadlocks and their role was entirely an obstructionist one. Besides, I found that the Muslims, save for a few exceptions, engaged in all capacities in the Government, were with the Muslim League. Thus the rot that had set in could not be permitted to prolong any longer except at the risk of a disaster for the whole country. Indeed, at one stage, things had become so bad that with the killing at Calcutta riots spread all over and it became a perilous adventure for Hindus and Muslims to visit one another’s localities. The economic life of the country was paralysed and there was little security of life or property.

The only way out of the sickening situation, the Congress realized, lay in the elimination of the third party—the British Power. The British, on their part, declared that they would quit by June 1948. But the period was long. Also their Statement promising to hand over power to the authorities in the Provinces gave rise to a vigorous effort to dislodge the Ministries in Assam, the Punjab and the Frontier Province. The League succeeded in the Punjab. Even though they failed in the Frontier Province and Assam, the League movement caused great misery and bloodshed.

In order to settle the issue immediately and prevent the slaughter of innocent people, the Congress decided to agree to the division of the country and demanded the partition of the Punjab and Bengal. This was no surrender to the League threats or the policy of appeasement.

Today the partition of India is a settled fact and yet it is an unreal fact! I hope, however, that partition would remove the poison from the body-politic of India.

India is one and indivisible. One cannot divide a sea or split the running waters of a river. The Muslims have their roots in India. Their sacred places and their cultural centres are located in India. I do not know what would they do in Pakistan and it would not be long when they would like to return.
Despite the division, it must be remembered, we have 80 per cent of the country with us which is a compact unit with great potentialities.

The main task before India today is to consolidate herself into a well-knit and united power. The obstacle of foreign domination has gone but there are serious problems that confront us. Economically, India is in a sad plight. The War has resulted in making India a creditor Nation but that does not mean much. The United Kingdom is our debtor and owe us a huge amount. But they do not appear to have anything to pay us now. In fact, the Big Powers have so arranged their economies that smaller and poorer countries remain at a disadvantage.

The need of the hour is to increase the wealth of the country and this can only be done by putting in more and more work and thus increasing production. This necessitates preservation of peace in the country. For one year now, there has been disorder in the country. Now that Pakistan has been established, there should be no more fights between Hindus and Muslims. If unfortunately, there would be a recurrence of strife, it would not be the cowardly killings of innocent people, but it would be between two armies of the two States.

I appeal to people not to indulge in mutual strifes but create a calm atmosphere and engage themselves in constructive activities essential for the building up of a new India.

With the exit of foreign power, the princes will have to adjust themselves to the democratic order. The days of those rulers who do not command the confidence of their subjects are numbered. The majority of the States have acceded to the Union and I appeal to the rest to join the Union before August 15. The States which will not come in now, but might decide to join at a later date, would have to accede on different terms. These days, no State can afford to live in isolation.

I should also warn the people to exercise reserve in judging the role of princes at the present juncture. The rulers were not free up till now and many of them do not even now believe that Paramountcy is lapsing on August 15. Many of them are descendants of great and benevolent rulers of the past ages, and I have no doubt that they will have no hesitation in pursuing a correct policy and become popular rulers.

Essentially, our main problems are domestic. Ever since my release from prison, I was saying that Imperialism was on its last legs not only in India but in all Asia. The British are quitting India and I hope that Dutch imperialism will also meet its end in Indonesia.

In future, there would not be any more separate electorates or weightages and special treatment. Every community must get what is its due.

India has nothing but goodwill towards all. But if her safety is endangered she must have strength to defend herself; and, for that, people must work hard.

Chapter 28. Indian Independence Bill

1. British Claim on Islands Will Lead to ‘Flare-up’ Extract from Viceroy’s Personal Report No. 9, 12 June 1947

...25. It is, however, becoming increasingly clear to me that any attempt by His Majesty’s Government to claim the Andaman Islands as colonies, to be treated in the same way as Aden, will cause an absolute flare-up throughout the length and breadth of India, and will probably call forth violent opposition from Pakistan as well as from the rest of India. My own position would be permanently undermined if I were to act on behalf of His Majesty’s Government in this matter; it will therefore have to be left to the High Commissioner or some other authority. But I believe that the only reasonable solution would be to suggest some form of joint control or a leasing of the naval and air bases under a treaty. Yet another alternative might be to refer the case of these islands to U.N.O. or some form of arbitration. The one thing I am quite certain about is that any high-handed action by His Majesty’s Government about these islands at this moment will destroy all the good feelings which now exists between the two countries, and that we must be careful to avoid dealing with any items appropriate for a treaty in a piecemeal way...

2. Raising Andaman & Nicobar Issue Will Adversely Affect Negotiations
   Telegram from Louis Mountbatten to Earl of Listowel, 12 June 1947
   Mountbatten Papers, File No. 3, NMML

Ismay’s top secret and personal letter of April 12th to Monteath.

A statement appeared in the Times of India on June 9th saying that it is reliably understood that the Andaman and Nicobar Islands are to be ceded to the British Government under the new arrangements.

2. This has brought a sharp rejoinder in the Hindustan Times on June 11th, probably inspired, to the effect that the British Government have not raised the question of the future of these Islands with the Interim Government, and that if any suggestion of the type motioned is made hereafter, it will be surely rejected. In my opinion there can be no question of raising this controversial subject at the present delicate stage of our political negotiations. It is a matter on which Indians feel deeply and if we were to raise the question now of being allowed to use the Islands as a naval or air base, which is about all we can hope for, we should ruin our chances or success.

3. The line that I propose to take, if this question is raised by either side, is that it is one of the very many problems which will have to be settled by negotiation when we are framing the treaties or agreements with the two new Dominions which will be the natural result of their assumption of Dominion Status, and that it would be wrong to take up any of these points in isolation.

3. Avoid Including Andaman & Nicobar Islands in Either Dominion Telegram from Earl of Listowel to Louis Mountbatten, 12 June 1947
Mountbatten Papers, File. No. 3, NMML

Future of the Andaman and Nicobar Islands.

Cabinet Committee considered yesterday evening your 1423-8 of June 13th, and views expressed in paras. 24 and 25 of your personal report No. 9 of June, 12th.

2. Minister of Defence represented to Committee strong view fully supported by Chiefs of Staff as to strategic importance of the Islands and their great value to Commonwealth defence on which great emphasis was laid in your discussions with them, the sea and air landing facilities there are essential to our imperial defence communications and it is vital that we should not be deprived of them. Committee however appreciated danger that arbitrary retention of the Islands as British territory would severely damage our future relations with India.

3. Committee felt that Clause 16 of the Bill in its existing form would be to be omitted but if no other provision is inserted the Islands automatically become part of the new Dominion of India by virtue of Clause 2 (1) of the Bill. We note that the Muslim League claim that they are entitled to a share in the Andamans as an all-India asset. Committee thought that we should avoid if possible including the Andamans in either Indian Dominion pending discussions about them. They would be glad to have your views urgently as to whether a clause could be included in the draft Bill in the sense that the Islands should continue to be governed by the Chief Commissioner under the Governor-General until agreement has been come to about their future.

Committee felt that in any such negotiations some account might have to be taken of the Burmese interest.

4. Demand for Two Acts for India and Pakistan
Letter from Jawaharlal Nehru to Louis Mountbatten, 26 June 1947
IOR, R/3/1/153, Acc. No. 3467, NAI

New Delhi

Dear Lord Mountbatten,

It has been announced in the press and on the radio that legislation is going to be introduced in Parliament in regard to amending the Government of India Act on or about July 7th. You were good enough to inform us that before any legislation was so introduced we would have an opportunity of examining it. It would be unfortunate if the draft was finally prepared and there was something in it to which we took strong exception. Although the main lines have been agreed upon, it is a matter of vital importance what the approach should be.

The question is not one of repealing the Government of India Act but of amending it. Any repeal would create grave difficulties and would leave us without any kind of a constitution. In fact, you mentioned in your broadcast that one of the reasons for giving Dominion Status was to enable India to have a constitution until the Constituent Assembly made a new constitution.
The amending Act would confer Dominion Status on India and delimit the territory of India by the exclusion of the seceding areas. It would constitute the Constituent Assembly into a sovereign legislature with power necessarily to amend the Constitution Act as it thought fit. It would thus bring this Act into line with the Statute of Westminster. The Act would apply to all the territories of India, with the exception of those that have seceded, which territories would be dealt with separately and constituted into a Dominion.

There would thus be two Acts. If there is only one Act dealing with these processes in India and in Pakistan then there will be a great deal of confusion and the status of India would be affected. We are naturally interested in the continuing entity that is India. As regards Pakistan, though we may be interested, it is for the representatives of Pakistan to say what they want and how they want it. Mixing up the two will lead to obvious difficulties. Parliamentary legislation will embody our constitution till such time as our Constituent Assembly draws up another constitution. If that parliamentary legislation deals with Pakistan also it will mean that our constitution is contained in a Statute which also contains the constitution of another country. That would not only be incongruous but legally and constitutionally inadvisable.

The two processes of creating a Dominion of India and a Pakistan Dominion are not simultaneous, even though they might follow each other in quick succession. The Pakistan Dominion follows the secession of certain areas. Therefore, the Act for creating the Pakistan Dominion has to be a new and separate Act following the constitution of India as a Dominion.

There may also be other practical difficulties in the way of dealing with India and Pakistan together in the same legislation. India is not only a continuing entity but also a running organisation. Pakistan as a state is starting from scratch. Any attempt to tie them up legally will mean putting two things together which are dissimilar and which are functioning differently. That would not be good either for India or for Pakistan. The legislation, therefore, has to deal with each separately and on merits.

These are some points that I should like to place before you again, as I am anxious that parliamentary draftsmen should not ignore them at this stage. If a single bill is drafted for parliamentary legislation dealing with all these processes, it will raise all manner of complications and difficulties and it would be unfortunate if we have to raise objections at that stage.

Yours sincerely,
Jawaharlal Nehru

5. Britain’s Relations with the Two New Dominions

Extract from a letter from Earl of Listowel to Louis Mountbatten, 27 June 1947

Private and Secret

Dear Mountbatten,

I have no letter from you to answer this week—not that I was expecting one after what you said in the last paragraph of your last letter.

2. In paragraph 4 of your Private and Top Secret letter of the 12th June you said that Gandhi was pressing for an announcement to be made to the effect that H.M.G.’s wish was either to enter into tripartite arrangements with both the new Dominions or to have similar bilateral agreements with each of them and that in any event there would be no question of differentiation. You suggested that this might be referred to by the Prime Minister in the House of Commons in his speech on the Second Reading of the Bill.

3. This proposal of Gandhi’s seems to me to be of such importance that I have put the matter before the India Committee. We all felt strongly that we should be extremely guarded in dealing with it.

Clearly one of the main objections to partition from the Congress point of view has been the danger that Pakistan would fortify itself with outside assistance from ourselves, the Americans or others. It seems to have been the fear of this happening through Pakistan remaining in the Commonwealth which in the end brought Congress to agree to temporary Dominion status and several utterances have been made to the effect that anyone who indulges in giving support to Pakistan will incur the hostility of Congress. The Congress would hardly pay so much attention to this point if they did not regard it as a serious danger.

4. Our position is that we want good defence arrangements with India as a whole and from our point of view it would be much best if they were on the same basis with both the Dominions and if the Commonwealth relationship provided the nexus between the two. But we feel that we should be very careful not to say that we shall not in any circumstances have closer relations with Pakistan than with India. Once we have said that, it will be open to the Congress to refuse any definite arrangements with us in regard to defence and other matters and then to say that we are precluded from having any better relationship with Pakistan. The best hope of getting an effective relationship with the Congress derives from their fear that if they do not play up we shall have differential and better relationships with Pakistan and possibly with non-acceding Indian States. The probability is that this is the strongest bargaining point we have with the Congress and it is one that may continue to operate for a substantial period. We feel that we should be very ill-advised to throw it away.

5. Further we do not think that we should say at this stage that it is our wish to enter into tripartite arrangements. Of course, if all parties were co-operating fully a tripartite arrangement would be the best but there can be a great deal of difference in the way in which an identical agreement is operated by two different parties. If we had a tripartite arrangement all the arrangements under it would require the assent of the three parties. If, on the other hand, we had separate agreement with Pakistan and India we should be free, even though the agreement were in identical terms, to develop our relations with Pakistan under agreement without India having the right to object. In practice, formal agreement about defence matters cannot contain more than general principles and what really matters is the kind of arrangements which are reached between the Chiefs of Staff or between the Governments in implementing the general agreement. Clearly Gandhi’s idea is that we should commit ourselves before we even begin to negotiate not to have any arrangements with Pakistan different from those which we have with Hindustan. Once we have said that, Hindustan can decide what arrangements, if any, we shall be committed to have with either of the new Indian Dominions.

6. At the same time we recognize that it is of immense importance to have, if possible, good and close relations with the new India and we agree that the Prime Minister in the Debate on the India Bill should refer to our desire to have close and effective arrangements with both the new Dominions in all fields and particularly in the defence and economic field on a basis of free negotiation. It might be added that what we hope for is to have equally good and close arrangements with both the new States in India....

Yours sincerely,

Listowel
6. Draft Bill to Be Shown to Congress and Muslim League
Letter from Louis Mountbatten to Vallabhbhai Patel, 29 June 1947
SPC, Vol. IV, pp. 182–3

Dear Sardar Patel,
I hope shortly to receive from London copies of the draft ‘Indian Independence Bill,’ which is going to be introduced into Parliament next month.

2. His Majesty’s Government has agreed that I should show you copies of this draft. In doing so, they have pointed out that it is completely contrary to usual parliamentary practice to show texts of Bills to other parties concerned before publication.

3. His Majesty’s Government has therefore insisted that I should not give you copies of the draft Bill for retention. I am sure that you will appreciate the reasons for this.

4. I invite you to come to the Viceroy’s House at 10 a.m. on Tuesday, 1 July, to study this draft. I would propose that the representatives of the Congress and of the Muslim League should sit in separate rooms for two hours and read the draft through. The Muslim League representatives would be in Her Excellency’s sitting-room and the Congress representatives in my study. I shall be obliged to withdraw copies of the draft Bill after you have studied them.

5. I am also inviting

Pandit Nehru
Mr. Jinnah
Mr. Liaquat Ali Khan.

6. I suggest that Sir B.N. Rau should be available to give you any assistance you require when you read through the draft. Mr. H.M. Patel will be present in any case as Secretary. I am similarly suggesting to the Muslim League representatives that Mr. Justice Rahman and Mr. Mohammed Ali should be available for them. My Reforms Commissioners will also be in attendance, ready to be summoned by either party to elucidate any points.

7. I myself will be available towards the end of the morning to hear any points which you might wish to suggest that I should take up with HMG.

8. Let us arrange, on Tuesday morning, any further meetings that are required—either that evening or on Wednesday evening, perhaps.

Yours sincerely,
Mountbatten of Burma

7. Nehru Emphasizes Careful Consideration of the Bill
Letter from Jawaharlal Nehru to Louis Mountbatten, 29 June 1947
IOR, R/3/1/153, Acc. No. 3467, NAI

Dear Lord Mountbatten,
Thank you for your two letters of today’s date. I shall come as suggested on Tuesday the 1st July at 10 a.m.
Towards Freedom: 1947 (Part 2)

2. I am not competent to say anything about the procedure in regard to draft Bills for Parliament. But we are naturally deeply concerned with any legislation which is going to affect the future of India vitally. Indeed this Bill is likely to be the basis for the interim constitution of India. It will not only define the relations of India to the United Kingdom but also to Pakistan. It may deal with the position of the States in India. All these are highly intricate and sometimes controversial matters and require the most careful consideration.

3. So far as I know, any Bill establishing Dominion Status has not only originated in the Dominion in question but has also received full consideration there before it became a Bill for Parliament. The procedure being adopted here is entirely different and the whole drafting of the Bill takes place without any reference to us and we are only given a chance to see the draft and perhaps suggest some amendments at the last stage. I am afraid this will prove very unsatisfactory. Sir, B.N. Rau’s presence will, no doubt, prove helpful and we would welcome it. But we would like to consult a number of other eminent lawyers, experts and constitutionalists such as Sir Alladi Krishnaswami Aiyer, Sir N. Gopalaswami Aiyengar, Mr. K.M. Munshi and possibly others who may be available here. In any complicated piece of legislation it is desirable that several minds view it so that no important matter is overlooked.

4. I should particularly like Gandhiji to see the draft Bill and to advise us in regard to it. His advice is especially valuable in such matters as he has considerable experience of this kind of thing and is interested in it. For him to see it after it has been finalized and then to point out some deficiencies would be unfortunate.

5. It is your desire, as it is ours, to have a Bill which carries with it the willing assent of all parties concerned. If this is not obtained, then the object of the Bill is somewhat nullified.

6. I would, therefore, earnestly request you to consider this matter afresh and, if necessary, consult HMG in regard to it so that we may have the fullest opportunities of consulting our colleagues and our advisers.

Yours sincerely,
Jawaharlal Nehru

8. Need to Preserve Confidentiality
Letter from Louis Mountbatten to M.A. Jinnah, 30 June 1947
IOR, R/3/1/153, Acc. No. 3467, NAI

New Delhi.

Dear Mr. Jinnah,
I am so glad to know that you are satisfied with the composition of your party for considering the Indian Independence Bill tomorrow, for I feel that the fewer people who are in the know the less chance there is of leakage. You with your great experience with the Privy Council in London will realize what great importance H.M. Government attach to there being no leakage; and I am therefore appealing to both leaders to ensure that there will be no leakage from their teams.

I also thought it would be advisable to authorize Congress to bring Mr. Gandhi if they wished to; for although, of course, he does not as a rule attend such meetings, I particularly do not wish any difficulties caused through his omission.

You will find that the new Bill includes a provision for each Dominion to have a separate Governor-General and a clause making it lawful for one person to hold both appointments for such period as may be determined by either dominion after 15th August. I therefore trust that you will be able to let me have a letter by Wednesday morning informing me whom you wish to nominate as the first Governor-General of Pakistan, so that I may communicate this to the King. Congress, as you know, have already sent me their nomination.

Yours sincerely,
Sd/ Mountbatten of Burma.

9. Opposition Leaders React to the Bill
   Telegram from Earl of Listowel to Louis Mountbatten, 1 July 1947
   IOR, R/3/1/153, Acc. No. 3467, NAI
   Secret.
   1949-S

   MOST IMMEDIATE.
   PRIVATE. Discussion with Opposition leaders from both Houses took place this afternoon. In general their attitude was helpful and Bill was on the whole well received. There was however, not unnaturally, a general undercurrent of anxiety though this did not crystallise in any form of counter proposals. Only two points appeared likely to give rise to any considerable criticism. These were

   (a) Use of title India for Hindustan. There was a certain uneasiness about this based on a feeling that it would antagonize the Moslems and was not justified on merits. There was however a feeling that 'Union of India' should be kept for any organisation wider than either Dominion which may develop.

   (b) Strong feeling was expressed by Conservatives against title 'Independence Bill' and we were pressed to agree to 'Indian (Self Government) Bill' and to substitute 'two self governing dominions' for 'two independent dominions' in long title and in clause 1. We put all arguments and finally pointed out that time factor made it impossible to alter Bill on this point before it was shown to Indians. Opposition to this title was not withdrawn but we are not disposed to alter it.

   2. There was general feeling that it would be suitable to have a preamble to Bill but proposal was not pressed for in view of difficulty of finding a form of words which would command general assent.

10. Churchill Objects to the Title of the Bill
    Letter from Winston Churchill to Clement Attlee, 1 July 1947
    Premier 8/541, Part 11, Acc. No. 4046, NAI
    28, Hyde Park Gate,
    London. S.W.7

My dear Prime Minister,

I am much concerned to hear from my colleagues whom you consulted yesterday that you propose to call the India Bill, 'The Indian Independence Bill'. This, I am assured, is entirely contrary to the text, which corresponds to what we have previously been told were your intentions. The essence of the Mountbatten proposals and the only reason why I gave the support to them is because they establish the phase of Dominion status. Dominion status is not the same as Independence, although it may be freely used to establish independence. It is not true that a community is independent when its Ministers have in fact taken the Oath of Allegiance to The King. This is a measure of grave constitutional importance and a correct and formal procedure and nomenclature should be observed. The correct title would be, it seems to me, 'The Indian Dominions Bill'. I should however be quite willing to support it if it were called, 'The India Bill, 1947' or 'The India Self-Government Bill'.
Towards Freedom: 1947 (Part 2)

I am glad to hear you are considering such alterations.

Believe me,

Yours sincerely,

Sd/- Winston Churchill

11. Need for Status Quo in the Interim Government for Smooth Passage of the Bill

Telegram from Earl of Listowel to Louis Mountbatten, 1 July 1947

IOR, R/3/1/153, Acc. No. 3467, NAI

MOST IMMEDIATE

Private. Following personal from Sir Stafford Cripps BEGINS. Following is message from me to Nehru BEGINS. I have not worried you with any letters because I know how desperately busy you must be with all the changes that are taking place but I want now to ask you to help us in getting through necessary legislation before the beginning of August. You will realise we can only do this on the basis of an agreement here with Opposition to facilitate passage of Bill. This depends very largely upon continuance of agreement in India upon all major steps that are taken. This applies particularly as regards the question of Interim form of Government up till August 15th next. If there were to be a major dispute upon this it would most seriously jeopardize our chance of getting legislation through in time.

I understand there is a strong difference of opinion as to steps if any which should be taken to reconstitute present Indian Government for short period that will elapse before coming into force of new legislation. I am sure that you will realise our difficulties especially in view of all that Viceroy and Government here have done to meet you and to facilitate your most difficult task and that is why I make strongest personal appeal to you to help us at this critical moment.

It seems to me that as you will be realising your independence on August 15th if all goes well it is hardly worthwhile to jeopardise that date by insistence upon a particular form of Interim Government for intervening few weeks.

Would it not be possible for you to leave matters as they are for the present and until major change is made.

This would certainly be most helpful to us in our task here. If this cannot be done for some reason which I do not at the moment appreciate then is it not possible to arrive at the same method of sharing power with Muslim League which will enable them to retain at least the appearance of effective administrative control over some of the portfolios. It does not seem quite fair that in this interim period all portfolios should pass to your party in view of what is to happen immediately afterwards. We have got so far together along the road we have (gr. cor) been seeking out that I hope you will feel able to give us your help to complete the final stages of journey smoothly and safely.

You know how passionately I wish for independence of India and how I and others at this end have worked for it. It would indeed be tragic if some incident were now to make it impossible for us to complete the final stages by the time fixed. Please do all you can to help.

When you see Vallabhai [sic] will you pass on a message from me to him in the above sense.

I send you all my very best wishes and godspeed in your difficult and trying times and when August 15th comes and with Indian independence I shall indeed have a song in my heart. Stafford. ENDS.

12. Congress Unwilling to Compromise

Telegram from Louis Mountbatten to Earl of Listowel, 2 July 1947
Mountbatten Papers, File No. 82B, NMML

MOST IMMEDIATE

PERSONAL. Please pass following to PRIME MINISTER.

Most grateful for your telegram No. 77. Situation here incredibly explosive and more dangerous than any I have seen to date. Have been using Krishna Menon as contact with Nehru and V.P. Menon as contact with Patel, and had a meeting with them today at which both agreed that all Congress leaders are firmly united in their complete refusal to be dictated to by Jinnah any longer. Disastrous consequence of withdrawal of Muslim League on chances of getting Bill passed unopposed through Parliament this session were fully explained. Both Nehru and Patel said they would face any consequences rather than yield once more to Jinnah which they consider would be quite fatal to their standing with their own followers.

2. They point out that in that case they will in any event hold all the portfolios for India and that this will suit them quite well.

3. My private opinion is that Gandhi is adopting his usual Trotsky attitude and might quite well like to see the present plan wrecked, so he is busy stiffening Congress attitude.

4. I am advised that no compromise on any different system will be accepted.

5. In these circumstances the legal objections contained in Secy of States’ telegram 8453 have come as a Godsend, since I now propose to take up the line that I cannot legally put this through until the Bill has been passed in Parliament giving me necessary legal cover. I am advised that Clause 9(C) may not give me necessary cover and if so it will help us to be able to say that Bill is being modified for the purpose.

6. I have pointed out that July the 4th was always the date on which I proposed to call for resignations of the Cabinet, and that I proposed to adhere to this date and ask them to carry on provisionally. To adhere literally to my word would involve setting up the new form of government before next weeks’ Cabinet meeting about 9th or 10th July.

7. Since it now transpires that the legality of such action can be challenged I propose to say that Government will not permit me to put this new procedure into effect until the Bill is passed.

8. Krishna Menon has stressed the great urgency of getting the date on which the Bill becomes law advanced as far as possible. He feels that if we could give a target date of the 20th July Congress might accept with good grace, but if it were put off much later they would feel that they had been cheated out of the reconstruction.
9. If therefore you could send me a most immediate telegram undertaking to use your best endeavours to get the Bill passed by the earliest possible date and that you were enquiring whether it could be as early as July the 20th, I could use this to show to Nehru and Patel when I meet them on Thursday prior to the Cabinet meeting on Friday.

10. As regards Jinnah, I understand that he proposes to start moving the League members of his Government to Karachi on 7th August, and the League Members of the Interim Government will therefore presumably start winding up their Cabinet activities a few days before this. If therefore the reconstruction of the Cabinet does not take place before the 20th July, there would only be approximately a fortnight left for the Muslim League to have to serve under the new conditions which they so dislike.

11. Observing that Congress accepted Jinnah’s exactly similar proposals for Bengal when he refused to give them regional ministries or a coalition, and observing that Jinnah would very well say that he was setting up his new Ministry on the 20th July and that they would be as busy organising their secretariat and getting ready for the move that they did not wish to be burdened with the responsibility of a few more days in the Central Government, I have a feeling that this really is a compromise which might prove equally acceptable to both sides. It would certainly be fair to the League.

12. At any rate this is what I am aiming at and a telegram from you along the lines of my immediately following telegram would be of the utmost help.

13. ‘Congress Amendments to India Bill Handed Over to Mountbatten’
   National Herald, 4 July 1947

New Delhi, July 3.—Congress leaders met the Viceroy this morning and are believed to have conveyed to him their suggestions on the draft India Bill.

Pandit Jawaharlal Nehru, Sardar Vallabhbhai Patel, Dr. Rajendra Prasad, Mr. C. Rajagopalachari, Sir. N. Gopalaswamy Ayyangar, Mr. K.M. Munshi and Sir B.N. Rau met the Viceroy this morning.

It is understood that this conference was preceded by prolonged discussions among the legal advisers of the Congress including Sir Allady Krishnaswamy Iyer, when the draft Bill was scrutinized. As a result of this study it is believed the Congress has suggested a few amendments to the bill. At the conference with the Viceroy, the draft of the proposed amendments was formally handed over to Lord Mountbatten to be communicated to the British Cabinet before they finalised the draft bill and present it to Parliament.

Mr. Jinnah and Mr. Liaquat Ali Khan also met the Viceroy today and are believed to have conveyed to him their observations on the draft bill.

The absence of any reference to the visit of the leaders to Viceroy’s House, including that of Mahatma Gandhi and Mr. Jinnah who hold no official positions in the daily court circulars is ascribed to the complete ‘off the record’ nature of the discussions on the draft bill the publication of which before presentation to the Parliament would involve a breach of the privileges of the House of Commons.—API.
14. Congress Rejects League’s Claim on Islands

Extract from Congress’ comments on the Bill forwarded by Jawaharlal Nehru to Louis Mountbatten, 4 July 1947

SWJN, Vol. III, p. 128

... Clause 2:—

The Dominion of India does continue the international personality of the existing India, retaining whatever is not specifically transferred to Pakistan. We cannot possibly agree to any amendment which will throw doubt in this position. On the contrary, we have proposed amendments designed to confirm it beyond any possibility of doubt.

As regards the Andaman and Nicobar Islands, their total population, according to the census of 1941, was about 34,000, of whom about 12,000 were Hindus, Sikhs and Buddhists; about 11,000 aboriginal tribes; about 8,000 Muslims; and about 3,000 others. It will thus be seen that they are very predominantly a non-Muslim area; it is not even correct to say that the majority of the population consists of tribes. In the judicial sphere, their administration is for certain purposes linked with the High Court at Calcutta. In other respects they are administered as a Chief Commissioner’s province.

The islands do not lie on the direct route between the two parts of Pakistan. If they are of strategic importance to Pakistan, much more so are they to the Dominion of India. The claim that these islands should be allotted to Pakistan is therefore wholly untenable. There can be no question of their being allotted to or forming part of Pakistan; only such areas can be included in Pakistan as have expressed a wish to that effect; the rest remains with India....

15. Jinnah Protests at the Inclusion of Andaman & Nicobar Islands in India

Letter from M.A. Jinnah to Louis Mountbatten, 5 July 1947

IMMEDIATE/MOST URGENT

Dear Lord Mountbatten,

I am enclosing herewith the draft [of a] telegram and request you to communicate it to the Prime Minister and also to the Leader of the Opposition. I did not like to send the telegram direct without informing you about it, but if you find any difficulty in doing so, I hope you will not mind letting me know so that I can then send it on directly today to the Prime Minister and the Leader of [the] opposition.

There is one more matter which I am examining and that is the authority or sanction behind who would be able to execute and enforce the partition award in terms of the decision of the comtemplate[d] Arbitral Tribunal. I shall sent that on to you on Monday. But if you are unable to send the enclosed telegram today, it follows that I shall similarly have to communicate the other matter directly on Monday.

Yours sincerely,
M.A. JINNAH
Clause 2 of Indian Independence Bill allots Andaman and Nicobar Islands to Dominion of India. These islands have never formed subject of discussion or agreement between parties at any time. Their sudden inclusion in India raises very grave issue. They are not part of India historically or geographically. They were British possessions administered by Government of India and are not in same category as other Chief Commissioners' Province being reserved to Governor-General under Constitution Act 1935. Majority of population consists of tribes who are not connected with peoples of India by ethnic, religious or cultural ties. Pakistan's claim to these islands is very strong since only channel of communication between eastern and western Pakistan is by sea and these islands occupy important strategic position on sea route and provide refueling bases. Dominion of India have no such claim. They should form part of Pakistan.

I pointed out above facts on seeing Bill and suggested that if no immediate decision was feasible islands should be excluded from scope of Bill and dealt with separately. Surprised to find no alteration in Bill as published this morning. Urge most strongly this grave injustice to Pakistan be rectified in Parliament.¹

¹ In a telegram to the Viceroy dated 5th July, the Secretary of State said 'Geographical position of these Islands makes it impossible to assign them to Pakistan, nor did any form of joint control by both Indian and Pakistan Governments seem to us practicable. We felt that to exclude Islands altogether from either India or Pakistan would not be acceptable.' The islands were finally allotted to Indian by the India Independence Act. 16. The Bill Certainly Contains the Poison

M.K. Gandhi's speech at a prayer meeting in New Delhi, 5 July 1947

Brothers and Sisters,

Lady Mountbatten has been to see me today. She had no particular business with me. I even told her on the telephone not to take the trouble to come and see me. But she said that since I had gone and seen them so many times she felt bound to return the visit. I pointed out that I only went to see the Viceroy on business. But she was firm and she came. She has simple ways. She came and squatted down as we are squatting here, and enquired after everything. She asked how we find it here and listened with interest. I told her that I lived here among the sweepers. I also told her that I lived in a temple which was clean as it ought to be. If she wanted to see the living conditions of the sweepers she should visit their quarters which were nearby. She visited the sweepers quarters and inspected the condition there with much interest. I did not go with her because crowds might have collected. Then she went to Harijan Nivas where Harijan boys are given training. She was very happy to see it.

I have today received a letter which I had not intended to deal with here. But now I feel that I should not keep it over till tomorrow. What has happened among the Sikhs on the issue of division of the Punjab is distressing. Formerly there was no distinction between the Hindus and Sikhs. All the poison was spread by Macaulay who wrote the History of the Sikhs. Since Macaulay was a well-known historian, everyone swallowed what he said. The Granth Sahib of the Sikhs is actually based on the Hindu scriptures. Sikhs are a brave community. But their number is small. If the Punjab is divided Sikhs must be divided too. The letter says that the Sikhs who have now come over to East Punjab will be all right. But what will happen to the Sikhs in West Punjab, he asks. Will the Congress help if they find themselves in trouble? I can only say that those who are brave do not need anyone’s help. They should only look to God for help. And why must you assume that the Sikhs in West Punjab will find themselves in trouble? If something happens to them, do you imagine that the vast masses of people in India will look on indifferently and do nothing? The Sikhs therefore should not worry.

The Bill that has been introduced in the British Parliament will very soon be enacted into law. India will then be divided into two Dominions, that is to say, the British Commonwealth will have two new members. The Bill has 20 clauses which I have read. I cannot say that it has any ambiguity or that the English have used a language which can bear different interpretations. No Englishman wants to deceive us. But the Bill certainly contains the poison. That poison we have drunk and so has the Congress. The British carried on their rule in India for 150 years and the British Government accepted the fact that politically India was one nation. They also tried to develop it as a nation and to some extent they succeeded also. Before them the Moguls had made a similar effort but they were less successful.

Having first unified the country, it is not a very becoming thing for them to divide it. I do not say that was their intention. The Cabinet Mission too had treated India as one single country and had produced arguments in support of this assumption. Today those arguments have become irrelevant. Thus the Bill in creating two Dominions gives us poison. It is true that both the Congress and the Muslim League gave their assent to the Bill. But accepting a bad thing does not make it good.

What the Quid-e-Azam used to say has come to pass. I think one can say that he was won complete victory. In my view the Bill puts to test all the three parties including the British. It makes us a Dominion but that is only a temporary phase. The Governor-General will have to put his signature to the Constitution that the Constituent Assembly has framed. He cannot change even a comma of the document. The same thing will happen in Pakistan. If after the constitution comes into being the two Dominions proclaim their independence from the British Commonwealth, nobody can stop them. It seems to me that is what they will do. Of course all these things belong to the future and nothing definite can be said at present. What is clear at the moment is that India is now broken up into two self-governing Dominions.

The British have also given rise to a situation which will be yet another test of their bona fides. All the various Princely States in India ought to have been brought within the Indian Union. The present dangerous situation should not have been allowed to remain.

The supporters of Pakistan have now got what they wanted. It may not be very much in terms of land area but they have been brought on a footing of equality. Till recently when the fight for Pakistan was on I was unable to understand what Pakistan meant. Even today I cannot understand it. The outline of Pakistan will emerge after its Constituent Assembly gives shape to its Constitution. But the real test of Pakistan will be the way it treats the nationalist Muslims, Christians, Sikhs and Hindus in Pakistan. Then Muslims themselves have various sects; there are Shias and Sunnis and various others. It is to be seen how these various sects are treated. Will they be friends with the Hindus or will they declare war against them? Will they perhaps take it into their heads that they are masters and all the rest are slaves? They will have to furnish answers to these questions in their Constituent Assembly.

India too has to show whether the Muslims in India will be treated as friends or as enemies. To me all religions are one. They are branches of the same tree. All religions worship the same
God. Formerly there used to be wars over religion in Europe too. But there is a new climate in the making. People have got so fed up with such strife that they are even giving up God. If this is the way the world is moving, how long can India be kept behind?

To those who consider India one nation the question of majority or minority does not arise at all. This Bill in a way is a test for all the parties. If we pass the test, we can accept it as a godsend. If not it will act as a noose for us.

17. Nehru Asks for Amendments in Indian Independence Bill
Telegram from Louis Mountbatten to Earl of Listowel, 5 July 1947
IOR, R/3/1/154, Acc. No. 3468, NAI

IMMEDIATE
CONFIDENTIAL

No. 1767-S. Following is text of note received from Nehru about Indian Independence Bill. Nehru says Congress recognize that nothing should be done to delay passage of bill but are strongly of opinion that changes suggested should be incorporated.

2. Note Begins. While some of the suggestions have been accepted, the more important amendments required have not been given effect to. We think that the non-inclusion of these amendments is very unfortunate and likely to lead to grave difficulties.

2. Even if there were no two Bills, as suggested by us, it should have been made perfectly clear that the international personality of the existing India continues and that India continues to be the parent state exercising all its rights and performing all its obligations under international treaties, etc.

3. In the Bill the argument might be advanced that the Dominion of India is only one of 564 major and minor fragments into which the Bill has divided India. This argument may be met by adducing various considerations, but the definition should have been so clear as to prevent the possibility of doubt or argument.

4. In clause 7(i)(b) and (c) a proviso has now been inserted. But this does not go far enough and even this is subject to unilateral denunciation by any party. The effects of this are very difficult to foresee. We think it essential that the proviso should be in the form suggested by us previously.

5. The proviso to clause 19(3) has been retained almost in its original form. The change made does not go far enough and the difficulties pointed out in our previous note remain. We think it necessary that the proviso should be as suggested by us in our previous note. It must be made perfectly clear that the powers of the existing Constituent Assembly are in no way reduced by this Bill. Ends.

1 Pandit Nehru sent copies of his note to Lord Mountbatten and Lord Ismay. In a covering letter to Lord Ismay, Pandit Nehru wrote: ‘I have purposely only referred to three matters which we consider very important ... I should like to emphasise that we attach great importance to these proposed changes.’
18. Withdrawal in Peaceful Conditions Likely

Extract from a letter of J.D. Tyson, 5 July 1947

TO.P., Vol. XI, pp. 939–41

Government House, Calcutta

Dear Folk,

The news of the week is that contained in today’s papers—the publication of the ‘India Independence Bill’—as I see it is now to be called. I have not had time to examine the cabled version of the Bill in its present form (i.e. in its final form as a Bill for introduction in Parliament) but I saw an earlier draft and I gather the changes are not numerous. From our own point of view the important thing is that Dominion Status, in the Bill, is to be conferred on the 15th August.,—whether or not they have partitioned Bengal, the Punjab and India by that date. Hitherto we had always understood that the date would be ‘by Oct. 1st at the latest, and earlier if the Governor General so decided’. We knew that the G.G. himself was aiming at August 15th, but whether that was an early date selected to bring a sense of urgency to the Indian leaders and in the hope of ensuring that we really did hand over by August 31st (say) or September 15th or, in the last resort, by 1st Oct. was for some time in doubt. There has been no doubt at all, of late, that the Viceroy, by sheer persistence and by talking of no other date, had induced what I may call a ‘15th Aug.’ complex and people were definitely working to that date: but so far we have always had the feeling that if we were not ready (or if the Punjab was not ready, or some other part of India was not ready) to be left on its own on the 15th Aug., there might be a short postponement, say to the 31st. This has made all planning of a private character difficult. From this point of view the great thing about today’s announcement is that it settles the date of Dominion Status (and of the British handing over of power) as August 15th irrespective of the success of Bengal, the Punjab and the Central Government in ‘partitioning’ themselves by that date. Assuming that Parliament passes the Bill in its present form—as no doubt it will—British power in India will cease on the night of the 14th/15th August. It is satisfactory to know where we are. I must say, Mountbatten is a hustler: ever since he came out he has pursued shock tactics—well, at all events after his initial month of reconnaissance (seeing Gandhi, Jinnah, Nehru and Co. interminably, which some Indians seemed to think was a waste of time!! Curious people: they would have been furious if he had gone ahead without doing so). After this rather prolonged and very intensive reconnaissance, he made his plan. He put this in embryo form before the Governors’ Conference that I attended. Even then there was no talk of our being out before June 1948: but it was from that date or soon after that the blitz began. And since the time when he launched his blitz he has given no one any rest—the Indian leaders least of all. He has kept them so busy—so much on the run—that they have not had time to draw breath and criticise. Before they know where they are we shall be out—and I believe, now, we shall withdraw in fairly peaceful conditions—whatever may happen after we have gone. If we can withdraw in peaceful conditions, it will makes things better for the Europeans who remain and it will make for better feelings between great Britain and India in the future—the two Indias, that is. I think there will be very unsettled conditions in India for some time to come, especially in places like Calcutta where the two communities meet: but the trouble will be primarily between Hindus and Muslims—not anti-European. The Europeans will suffer discomfort and, at times, the danger inseparable from disturbed conditions, but they will probably not be the main target as they would undoubtedly have been if we had been pushed out by force even partially successful.
Things here are getting more and more difficult in every way and we shall be glad to go. I would not have said this two years ago, but I say it whole heartedly now. We have had about enough and the India of ‘after August 15th’ will not be the kind of country I should want to serve or live in.

19. Bill Provides No Authority for Enforcing Arbitral Awards
Letter from M.A. Jinnah to Louis Mountbatten, 7 July 1947
IOR, R/3/1/154, Acc. No. 3468, NAI

MOST URGENT AND IMMEDIATE

10 Aurangzeb Road,
New Delhi

Dear Lord Mountbatten,

Thank you for your letter of 5th July informing me that you have sent my telegram dated the 5th July, which I requested you to send to the Prime Minister and the Leader of Opposition, to the Secretary of State asking him to communicate it to the Prime Minister and also the Leader of Opposition. I shall feel grateful if you will now similarly send the second telegram, copy of which I am enclosing herewith, with regard to another matter which was under my consideration and which I promised to let you have today at the latest and was indicated in my letter of 5th July.

Thanking you,
Yours sincerely,
M.A. Jinnah

Enclosure

TELEGRAM

There is one most serious omission in Indian Independence Bill which might vitiate whole scheme of partition. This is lack of provision for setting up an authority with sanction behind it which could enforce arbitral awards that may be made by Boundary Commissions and the Arbitration Tribunal. I impressed its vital importance upon Viceroy before he went to the U.K. in May and have repeatedly urged its necessity on him ever since I have seen the Bill.

A complete division and transfer and delivery of property equitably between two Dominions by 15th August 1947 is a physical impossibility. It will take many months for Arbitration Tribunal to give its awards. The act of partition is not complete until the award has been executed and physical possession of property taken over by rightful party. Until then assets in question cannot rightfully become property of either Dominion but must remain vested in Crown. A fallacious proposition is advanced that in whichever Dominion property is situated [it] belongs to that Dominion and if that Dominion refuses to carry out terms of the award there is no way of forcing defaulting Dominion to give delivery of property to the Dominion to whom it should be transferred in terms of the award. This, I submit, is opposed to every principle and canon of jurisprudence of every country and particularly of Britain and India. The mere situ of property in one or other Dominion cannot make it belong to that Dominion but must be delivered to one or other Dominion in terms of award. Almost all assets are located in Dominion of India which could thus not only deny their use to Pakistan until award is given.
but could refuse to carry out the award if dissatisfied with it. Adjustment of financial liability between two Dominions would provide a poor solution indeed since grave injury to Pakistan from lack of assets which cannot be had in the market for love or money owing to extraordinary conditions created by war would be of most dangerous character affecting and obstructing stability and whole economic structure and progress of this Dominion. An exceedingly serious situation would thus be created and very grave consequences would follow if there would be no means left to enforce execution of terms of award. Same situation would arise if the awards of Boundary Commissions are not given till after 15th August and the dissatisfied Dominion refuses to comply.

Muslim League consider that H.M.G. alone is appropriate authority that should undertake and guarantee that awards are given effect to and carried out in all respects. This guarantee will only remain in force till such time as partition is finally and completely effected.

Provision to this effect should be made in the Bill by amending proviso (b) to clause 8(2) and other relevant clauses. It would also be necessary to provide that these provisions cannot be amended or deleted by either Constituent Assembly.

If H.M.G. find it absolutely impossible to amend the Bill in the above sense, an authoritative declaration should be made by them in the course of the debate in Parliament that they are responsible for execution and carrying out terms of arbitral awards in all respects. This is the least that should be done in the name of fairplay and justice and in fulfillment of their clear responsibility.

20. Only God Can Undo What Man Has Decided to Do
M.K. Gandhi’s speech at a prayer meeting in New Delhi, 7 July 1947
CWMG, Vol. LXXXVIII, pp. 296–7

BROTHERS AND SISTERS,

Last evening I told you why it was that the prospect of freedom that is about to be ours did not fill me with joy. Today I wish to tell you how you can turn a bad thing into a good thing. What has happened has happened. Nothing is to be gained by brooding over it or blaming others. In legal terms it will be only a few days before freedom comes into effect. All the parties have arrived at an agreement and they cannot go back upon their word. Only God can undo what man has decided to do.

The easiest way would be for the Congress and the League to come to an understanding without the intervention or the help of the Viceroy. In this the League would have to take the first step. I do not in the least imply by this that the decision about Pakistan should be undone. It should be taken as final, no more open to discussion now. But if ten representatives of either party sit together in a mud hut and resolve that they will not leave the hut till they have arrived at an understanding, then I can say that the decision they arrive at will be a thousand times better than the present Bill which is before the British Parliament and which envisages the setting up of two Dominions. If all the Hindus and Muslims who come to see me or write to me do not deceive me, then it is clear that no one is happy with the division of India. They all accept it against their will.

There is also another method, perhaps as difficult. The army is going to be divided—the army which so far had one single purpose—whatever that purpose might have been. This division of the army certainly fills the heart of every patriot with fear and misgivings. Why are two armies being created? Are they to defend the country against foreign aggression or are they to fight against each other and prove to the world that we are good only for fighting and killing each other?

I have deliberately painted before you this frightful picture so that you may be warned. The way to escape this is, at any rate in my view, attractive. Will the Hindu masses and all those who have taken part in the struggle for freedom pass the test today? Will they rise up and say that they have no need for an army or at least take a pledge that this army will not be used against their Muslim brethren whether they be living in India or Pakistan. By saying this they will turn their thirty-year-old weakness into strength. Maybe the method I suggest will be considered foolish. However, I must say that God has the power to turn foolishness into wisdom as He has done so many times in history. Those who have set out on the dangerous course of dividing the army should pay heed to what I say.

21. ‘Balance Sheet of Indian Independence Bill’

Extract from an article by P.C. Joshi in People’s Age, 13 July 1947

The Indian Independence Bill does nothing more than give a legal and constitutional garb to the Mountbatten Plan. In legal jargon, unintelligible to the common man, the Bill at once embodies the concessions the British are forced to make to the Indian national movement as it provides for the play of disruptive forces through which the British hope to make Indian independence formal.

The concessions to Indian strength are two:

1. Establishment of the two Dominion Governments on August 15. Under the chairmanship of Sardar Patel, the Reforms Commissioner Mr. V.P. Menon, at his Press Conference, explained their powers thus:
   ‘The new Bill will transfer full sovereign powers to the two Dominion Governments on August 15 and they will be able to do anything except make a man a woman and a woman a man.’

2. Recognition of the sovereign character of the two Constituent Assemblies. Explaining the provisions of the Bill concerning the same, Mr. Menon said:
   ‘It established beyond doubt or dispute the sovereign character of the legislatures of both the Dominions and gave them absolute independence.
   Every possible element of subordination or dependence on the British Parliament had been removed and the provision laying down that the power of repealing or amending “this or any existing or future Act of Parliament” in so far as it effected the two Dominions constituted a complete and unreserved transfer of power.’

British Counter-Strokes

The British counter-strokes to nullify the above constitutional concessions and safeguard their imperial interests are also two:

1. Partition. The British Government resisted what would have been genuine transfer of power to the Interim Government and recognise the sovereignty of the Constituent Assembly. It is carrying out the traditional strategy of divide and rule by being formed to be able to extract maximum concession for itself from both.
(2) Princes. The Indian States have been declared independent. Five hundred and sixty-two British puppets have been declared the equal of the representatives of 400 millions so that they can dictate their, i.e. the British masters, terms inside the Constituent Assemblies.

The British game is to plant their own Fifth Column inside the State structure of the Indian Union and Pakistan and also retain one of the States as their independent bases inside our country. Such is the purpose, Princely ‘Independence’ to attack Indian independence and democracy both from within and without.

Only the Communist Party has come out with a realistic estimate of British imperial policy as ‘double-faced’ which at once recognises the new opportunities India has won to go forward and also lays bare the new round of British manoeuvres that is being set afoot.

There is no going forward for our people unless it is fully realised how the British are plotting to push us backwards. The way to go forward is to beat back British intrigues all along the line.

Gandhiji has noted that ‘the reason for lack of enthusiasm that should accompany such a great event as the imminent advent of full freedom, was the division of the country into two States which were to be turned into two armed camps.’ But he expects the initiative to come from the League!

Sardar Patel has declared the Independence Bill ‘unique in the history of Parliament’ but also admitted that ‘there are some difficulties and doubts, there are many circumstances that will create difficulties.’ But a power-politician as he is, he has not stated them.

The League leadership after the first glorification over the establishment of Pakistan has been keeping scrupulously silent.

There is urgent necessity for rank-and-file opinion to assert itself and ensure the adoption of policies that will mean realisation of common independence and building of common prosperity.

Partition Plan

The two Dominion Governments will get established by August 15 but all vital matters will remain pending till March 31, 1948, by which date partition has to be completed.

The Bill makes Lord Mountbatten the pilot of the Partition Plan with supreme authority over all issues where differences may arise between the two Governments, i.e., the real dictator of our future if he is not faced with a Joint Front.

He is already reported to have got from the League leadership as the price of partition the pledge that Pakistan will be a British Dominion. He will utilise the very concessions the British secure within Pakistan to get similar concessions from the Indian Union as the price of being fair between the claims of the two States against each other!

Communal peace, economic welfare and political independence are at stake at Mountbatten’s hands.

Either a consistent implementation of the very principle of Hindu and Muslim majority areas which both the Congress and the League have accepted or a new round of riots which will not remain confined to the border areas but spread throughout the country as a retaliatory wave, which will endanger not only the very life of minorities in the two zones but influence the relations between the two States.
Assets
While the most unseemly wrangling is going on in dividing up the files and typewriters in New Delhi, the British have managed to postpone the issue of Sterling Balances, on which depends the urgently needed industrialisation of the country as a whole, for at least one year more.

The country expects the Congress leadership, as the major leadership of our country, to offer all help in the establishment of the newly-born Pakistan State, win the confidence of the Muslims and demand that the Pakistan Government join hands with it in immediately claiming from the British what they owe us both.

Military
By exploiting Hindu-Muslim differences the British are out to create not only two hostile States on communal lines but also give them two communal armies against each other. This is the meaning for us of the way they have divided up the army. And in the bargain, they have strengthened their own position.

The nationalisation of the armed forces has been postponed for a year, both the armed forces will be led by British chiefs, and the Supreme Commander, too, will be a Britisher. Retention of British troops has been provided for.

The British are creating the nuclei for what they consider ‘Joint Defence’ of two hostile armed forces separately held together by British Commanders but jointly led for Britain’s imperial needs.

The alternative is a common declaration to enter into no military alliance with Britain, negotiate the closest possible military alliance between Pakistan and the Indian Union for the common defence of the country, and rapidly nationalise and democratise both the armed forces....

Princely Independence
By declaring the Indian Princes independent the British have let loose their puppets and all the grim warnings that the Communist Party had been giving are coming true. Gandhiji, who is not prepared to doubt British bonafides, has declared—‘the relations of the Princes remained in a most unsatisfactory condition’....

Way Forward
The British would desperately manoeuvre through Lord Mountbatten in this crucial transitional year as the umpire between Pakistan and Indian Union to turn them hostile to each other and the Indian Princes will be desperately used as British pawns against Indian independence. These intrigues can and must be defeated. The Communist Party puts forward the following proposals:

1. Send Mountbatten back to England after August 15 and demand from the British Government the appointment of Congress-League Governor-Generals who will help to build friendly relations between our two States and not set them against each other.
2. Establishment of a Joint Congress-League Commission for the following:
   - Formulate common democratic rights for the minorities to be embodied in the constitutions of the two States.
   - Retain closest economic cooperation in the transitional period and formulate the basis for closest economic relations in the future in our mutual interest.
Negotiate a close military alliance between the two States and jointly demand withdrawal of British troops and liquidation of all traces of British military control.

3. All-out support to the States’ people’s movement to scotch all British conspiracies to retain their footholds on Indian soil, and carry forward the battle of Indian independence, democracy and unity.

4. Start nation-building on the basis of a plan to abolish landlordism and nationalise key industries to save our country from worsening crisis and guarantee food, cloth and human life to the common people.

Mass Pressure Needed

The Communist Party will rouse Congress and League opinion to demand such a policy from the two Dominion Governments. Immense mass pressure would be needed before the protagonists of Dominion Status being the same as independence, inside the League, and the appeasers of the Princes and friends of vested interests who occupy strategic places both inside the Congress and the League, are defeated and we can all say now the British are on the run, we are fighting our real enemies and building our own future.

Such a necessary turn in our political life will never come unless the Congress as the main national organisation takes the initiative and goes ahead irrespective of the attitude of the League.

In fact, a firm and fraternal lead from the Congress will strengthen pro-unity and anti-imperialist elements inside the League.

The responsibility of the organised working-class and peasant movements who have kept alive Hindu-Muslim unity under the Red Banner is decisive to rally and unite the people behind the urgent tasks of the hour.

22. ‘Commons Pass Independence Bill’

Extract from a report in National Herald, 16 July 1947

London, July 15.—The Indian Independence Bill, which will create the two Dominions of India and Pakistan on August 15, was given its third reading without division in the House of Commons tonight after just over three and three-quarter hours of debate. It will now go to the House of Lords for debate tomorrow.

Members of all parties in the house joined Sir Stafford Cripps who moved the third reading, in wishing success and pledging future assistance to the new dominions.

Introducing what he called ‘the last debate in this house on Indian affairs’, Sir Stafford declared that it would do more to create ‘a real and living friendship with India than any other action which this country has ever taken’.

Sir Stafford added that by giving independence to India Britain was establishing her ‘honesty of democratic purpose’.

Mr. R.A. Butler, head of the Conservative Committee on Indian Affairs, in his turn, emphasised that with this move Britain was showing that she was practicing as well as preaching the principle of self-government...
23. ‘Britain Pleads for Friendship with India’

Extract from a report in The Hindustan Times, 17 July 1947

London, July 16.—‘We are at the end of one epoch and the opening of a new one—an epoch of co-operation.’ This was the keynote of speeches made in the House of Commons last night when the Indian Independence Bill was given its third reading.

Members representing different sections of the House expressed the hope that the interdependence of Britain and India would be stronger than in the past.

Replying to the debate, Mr. Attlee, Prime Minister, expelled the misgivings with which some members approached the question of division of India. He believed that the long course or time in which Indians of different creeds and castes and from different parts of the country had worked together in Government had brought about real unity of India and that ‘this division will not man [sic] disruption.’

An Era of Pride

Mr. Clement Davies, Leader of the Liberal Party, said this was a deeply emotional moment. Today the members of the British House of Commons would give a third reading to this Indian Independence Bill without a single dissentient voice. So would end an era.

‘It has been an era upon which we and the generations which follow can look back with justifiable pride,’ he declared. The British people had striven conscientiously and loyally for the welfare of the peoples of India. There had been many mistakes; there had been on occasions bad mistakes; but they had, so far as they could, brought peace from external sources and had established a system of law and administration and justice.

Britain would wait with anxious pride and throbbing hope the efforts which the Indian people would make in reaching forward to those things which were before them. It would be for the new India and Pakistan to decide what that new structure would be. Each had colossal tasks and among those was an immense economic task.

Britain wished them well and a true and real success and would do all she could to help at any time....

End of a Chapter

British administration in India had caused a great increase in human happiness and a great mitigation of human misery. It had set up in India standards never known there before. But there was much hope in the chapter which was being closed. The curtain was being rung down upon a scene of the most colourful drama ever witnessed and it was being rung up upon another drama....

Future Relationship

He believed that the inter-dependence of Great Britain and India might be even stronger than in the past. The responsibility on a brother was no less heavy than that of a proprietor or trustee, and Britain’s relationship in the future would be that of a brother.

The approach to the peoples of India must be through the heart and not through the head. In the last 30 or 40 years Britain had lost touch with the great heart of India. There was increasing loss of contact between administrators and those whom they ruled....
Economic Problem

The great difficulty in India was going to be economic. It had been overshadowed by the political question, but their economic position would have to be taken into account. Three hundred million people lived on the land and great strides would be necessary in scientific development of agriculture before the Indian people could support themselves on a reasonable basis.

Lord John Hope, Conservative, and son of the former Viceroy, Lord Linlithgow, said he hoped the House would tolerate a brief intervention from one closely associated with a Viceroy who had something to do with the later stages towards the goal of independence.

An Objective Analysis

He wondered whether the House as a whole realised the gravity of the hour. Although he had supported the policy of the British Government all through he felt that support for a measure was really no excuse for shirking an objective analysis of the situation.

Stripped of all sentimental embroidery what would this Bill do? It enabled Britain to leave India, and a fundamental factor in the whole Indian situation would have been irrevocably removed—British responsibility.

In spite of communal dissension in the past, the British gave to India political unity and by the desire of the Indians that unity went at a stroke. Britain could not help this, but she could say that she regretted it....

No Civil War

Sir Walter Smiles, Conservative, did not believe that either the Prime Minister or Sir Stafford Cripps was feeling elated. They were feeling responsible and praying in their hearts for the success of the great work they had done.

There was a certain danger of the House of Commons turning itself into a mutual admiration society, he said, ‘We must not cheer until we have got out of the wood. Everyone prays there will be no civil war in India.’

Tribute to Attlee

Lord Winterton winding up for the Opposition, said they should all pay tributes to the persuasive patience which the Prime Minister had shown in all these negotiations....

He asked the House not to ignore the immensity of the racial and religious problems facing India. For a long time past, he had thought partition was inevitable. The highest form of statesmanship was to accept the inevitable and not try to get round it; that was why he welcomed the Bill.

It was difficult for the British people to understand the religious fervour in India, but in the past Europeans had killed thousands of people in religious wars that should help in understanding how this sub-continent of, on the whole, kindly people sometimes engaged themselves in what were euphemistically called communal riots, but which were really religious civil wars.

Partition May Bring Peace

Partition may bring peace to these warring people because it gave security and hostages to both. He thought partition would continue, but that the whole trend of events showed there was a real chance of the closest co-operation in the things which really mattered between the two Dominions—provided only that they kept a separate identity as they did under the Bill.

In a tribute to the Viceroy, Lord Winterton said that with the possible exception of Wellington, no man in British history had been given such twin gifts of leadership in the military and constitutional field....

Attlee’s Reply

The Prime Minister, who was greeted with loud cheers, said he had really little to add to what he had said on the second reading of the Bill....

Break as Friends

‘We extend a warm friendship to the Indian people. Many of us have close friends amongst them. I have friends who are Muslims, Hindus, Sikhs and who belong to the Depressed Classes. I see them from time to time and we are able to talk together as friends. Now that this big idea of domination is being removed, we must break as friends and equals. We can help India and India can do a great service in helping the world.

‘I would draw the attention of the House to the magnitude of this experiment. This concerns 400 million human beings. To expect to get complete agreement amongst them is really a dream.’

No Disruption

‘Some people do suggest we should bring the great masses in Europe into one polity. In India the unity was brought about because it was superimposed. When that was taken away old rivalries appeared again.

‘But I believe this long course of time in which Indians of different creeds, castes and from different parts of the country have worked together in the Government, side by side in campaigns, has brought about real unity of India and this division will not mean disruption.

‘But building up a federation is very difficult,’ Mr. Attlee added. ‘It has seldom been done by splitting a unitary Government into federation. It has come about by the union of separate partners who, having felt their own independence have then felt the need for collaboration. I am hopeful that in course of time this separation will come into a larger unity, a federation in which the partners will have full scope and at the same time unity.’

Good of India

‘In parting with this Bill from this House, I do it not with a feeling of elation but with a feeling of responsibility and some feeling of anxiety, but also with an unquenchable hope that things will work out for the good of all the people of India.’ There were loud cheers when the Prime Minister sat down.

The Speaker then put the question that the Bill should be read a third time and this was carried without a dissenting voice. Cheers were renewed when the Prime Minister and Sir Stafford Cripps left the Chamber.—Reuter.
24. Any Demand Leading to Balkanization of India Unwelcome Letter from Krishna Menon to Louis Mountbatten, 18 July 1947

47 Strand, London, W.C. 2

PERSONAL

My dear Lord Mountbatten,

I hope you feel a slight sense of relief that the Bill has become law and that your efforts have been successful. H.M.G. have been better than their word on time-table. The Lords were particularly tame, and cooperative. The under-current of opposition in the Commons did not come to much, though obviously the Opposition had been briefed. Some of the ‘efforts’ of those who must have thought they are being helpful to us (and are our side) to ‘organise’ public opinion were not very helpful—particularly letters to the Times and circularisation of back bench M.P.’s! However, it is all over, even though there is little of enthusiasm anywhere. Partition and strife cast their shadows dark and long.

Your letter and a personal note from Jawaharlal which I brought were sent to Downing Street on Sunday last when I arrived here. It was at once sent on to Chequers, where the P.M. was. His secretary telephoned me before six and the P.M. saw me at 10 the next morning. You have educated them all in hustling! The P.M. was glad to see me and hear about you and about all the news. I then tried to put our case about the States. He called in the Law Officers and Henderson, and we had about seventy minutes over it. Mr. Attlee was anxious to help. We went over the amendments to Clause 7, and even tried some other devices. The Law Officers, who appear most crusted, were stogy [stodgy], and the P.M. felt unable to do anything beyond saying something in speeches. They were all of opinion that Mysore and Benares could not revert to pretreaty positions as they had acquired sovereignty under British suzerainty. It is all an odd kind of constitutional theory and will not hold good outside Whitehall, but there it was. There was not lack of desire on the part of the P.M. to be of assistance.

I found there and everywhere else that the ‘Fuhrer’ had overplayed his hand. Mr. J’s last effort smells very badly, and even the man in the street has begun to understand the business. I rather suspect it helped the speedy passage of the legislation in the Commons and unnerved the Opposition.

I have also seen Listowel, Henderson and Cripps, all of whom promised to do what they could in speeches to indicate that H.M.G. would not welcome Balkanisation or Dominion Status for Princes. All of these were very cooperative. Altogether there is a new atmosphere in this country. One could not help wishing that it were so in India also. But I am afraid that this won’t be the case, and I have done my best to indicate fully to all concerned this aspect of the situation and its reasons—which I thought desirable.

Affectionate regards,
Krishna
Chapter 30

26. ‘India Bill Becomes Law’

The Tribune, 20 July 1947

London July 18.—Precisely at 10.40 (G.M.T.) today 4.10 P.M. (I.S.T.) the great new Dominions of India and Pakistan were born and the 400 million people of India came into their inheritance of full political freedom, when the British House of Lords, a Royal Commission of Peers with ceremony and ritual, dating back to William the Conqueror’s time, announced the Royal assent to the Indian Independence Bill, writes Fraser Wighton, Reuter's political correspondent.

‘Roile Eult’—in the Norman French of 1066 A.D., the Clerk of Parliament, Sir Henry Baddeley, uttered the fateful words—‘The King wishes it.’ In this single pregnant phrase was the birth and the inheritance.

The ceremony which transferred Britain’s 200-year old responsibility for India to the people of that country took barely 15 minutes. The Royal Commission, indeed within the brief space of time, passed 18 bills, of which Indian Independence, sandwiched between a penicil in measure and a National Service Act authorising peacetime compulsion came third.

The little Chamber of the Lords, normally the king’s ‘robing room’, and functioning as the Upper House only because part of the Houses of Parliament were bombed during the war, held a mere handful of Peers, though many public spectators, when, on the stroke of 10-30 (G.M.T.) a Royal Commission of five Peers, magnificently arrayed, entered the Chamber and sat on the Chancellor’s seat.

Heading the Commission was Lord Chancellor, Lord Jowitt, in crimson-gold-black-and ermine robes, full bottomed wig and a three corner silk hat surmounting it. The Commissioners were Secretary of the State for India, Lord Listowel, the Earl of Lytton, Lord Stansgate, formerly, Mr. Wedgewood Benn, and Lord Lewelly, a conservative Peer. Similarly garbed but with cocked hats, they wore no wigs. At a sign, High Lords Official Black Red Admiral Sir Geoffrey Blake stepped towards them. He was garbed in his black court dress with knee breaches [sic], silk stockings and buckled shoes. Around his neck was the gold chain of the Order of the Garter and on his breast glittered the bejewelled badge of the Commandership of the Bath.

Clasped in one hand was his famous rod of office, an ebony staff with gold tip and extremity, the tip fashioned in the shape of the lion, shield and the crown of the Garter. He bowed to the Royal Commission.

Gravely the Lord Chancellor rose and addressed Black Rod desiring him to ask the Commoners’ ‘immediate attendance in this House to hear the Commission read.’ Black Rod bowed in reply and departed through the corridors to summon the Commons in the Lords’ Chamber with its mellow gold and red beauty and colourful murals of the knights of the round table, no one stirred.

Meanwhile zealous Commons attendants on the watch for strangers espied the approach of Black Rod and slammed the great oak brass door of the Commons in his face to re-affirm the liberty and independence of Commons.

Three raps of his Rod on the door secured Black Rod admittance, however, and walking up the Chamber towards the chair with measured tread, passing occasionally to bow, he at length delivered his message.

‘Mr. Speaker,’ he said. ‘The Lords, who are authorized by virtue of His Majesty’s Commission to declare his Royal assent to Acts passed by both Houses desire the presence of this Honourable House in the House of Peers to hear the Commission read.

The begowned and bewigged Speaker Colonel Clifton Brown nodded assent and climbed down from his Chair. The Chief Commons Officer, the Sergeant-at-Arms-Sir Charles Howard grapped the great Gold Mace from the clerk’s table, and proceeded by attendants in court dress and followed by Black Rod, the Speaker, the Speaker’s Secretary and the chaplain formed the head of a procession.

Behind formed up in double file the Prime Minister Mr. Clement Attlee partnered by Opposition Acting Leader Mr. Oliver Stanley, the Commons Ministers and rankers following two by two. This solemn procession walked to the Lords. In the procession were other Cabinet Ministers—Chancellor of the Exchequer Hugh Dalton, Food Minister, Mr. Stratchey, and Under Secretary of State for India Arthur Henderson, Commonwealth Relations Secretary of State Lord Addison, was already in the chair. Amid the grandeur and panoply of the Royal Commission the Commons’ delegation seemed a colourless visitation, apart from its vanguard of office bearers, yet in this little crowd huddled at the back of the Chamber taking a merely nominal part in the proceedings was the man who by general consent of British political quarters has in the long-term sense been the main architect of the Indian settlement, Prime Minister Clement Attlee.

The opposition Leader Mr. Winston Churchill, Attlee’s frequent partner in Royal Commission, was not present. None of the Indian Cabinet Mission members indeed were discernible.
At the call of the Lord Chancellor a clerk of Parliament arose and read the Royal Commission a lengthy document.

Then solemnly the Lord Chancellor spoke the fateful words that immediately proclaimed the freedom of India. They were: ‘In obedience to His Majesty’s commands and by virtue of the Commission which has now been read, we do declare and notify you the Lords Spiritual and Temporal and Commons in Parliament assembled that His Majesty has given his Royal assent to the several acts in the Commission mentioned, and the clerks are required to pass the same in the usual form and words.’

With the end of the Chancellor’s words two officials arose gowned bewigged. One was Sir Henry Baddeley, Clerk of the Parliaments, the other his assistant.

The time was 10.39 (G.M.T.). A long list of the bills was in the assistant clerk’s hands. In a sudden stillness he called out the name of a bill. Sir Henry turned and cried out ‘Le Roi le Veult’ and bowed to the Commoners. A second bill was called and the procedure repeated. Then in loud tones the title of the Indian Independence Bill was read. Sir Henry turned again and in a firm voice declared: ‘Le Roi Le Veult.’ In that moment the two dominions were created.

Rapidly the other bills were named and the King’s assent given.

27. ‘Future of India League’

National Herald, 30 July 1947

LONDON, July 29.—The passing of the Indian Independence Bill meant considerable change in the outlook of the more important Indian societies, operating in Britain. Principal among these is the India League, for so many years associated with the name of Mr. V.K. Krishna Menon, which had as its main objective the securing of independence for India. Now that this has been achieved the question arises as to what shall be done with the League’s most considerable organisation extending to most major towns and cities in the British Isles.

A meeting is to be held in the Caxton Hall on August 6 when the future work and functions of the League will be discussed. Many associated with the League feel that much useful work remains to be done.

On the immediate political side there is the position of Indians in South Africa, on whose behalf the League has been conducting a vigorous campaign.

Later, and because of India’s greater participation in international affairs, other political issues may well arise in which a powerful non-official organisation could take a useful part. On the social and cultural side there is ever present the problem of the welfare of Indian students and the desirability of providing Indians with opportunities to gather together.

One such occasion is being provided on August 9, when at the Friends House, Lord Listowel, Mr. Julius Silverman and Mr. Krishna Menon will speak on Tagore. There will be readings from Tagore’s works and Indian songs and also Indian dances.—Globe.
Chapter 29. Boundary Commissions

A. Punjab*

1. Boundary Demarcation: Claims of the Sikhs
   Letter from Evan Jenkins to Louis Mountbatten forwarding a note of his interview with Giani Kartar Singh, 10 July 1947
   Lionel Carter (Ed.), Punjab Politics, Vol. V, pp. 143-7

   Secret
   No. 694

   Dear Lord Mountbatten,

   I think Your Excellency may be interested in the enclosed record of a conversation I have just had with Giani Kartar Singh. The Giani was extremely frank about the intentions of the Sikhs, and what he said confirms my view that they mean to make trouble if the decision based on the Boundary Commission’s report is not to their liking, or if the new Governments are set up before the decision is given. According to a recent Press report, Baldev Singh is taking the same line in public, which seems odd in view of his acceptance of the Plan.

   2. My personal view is that the Boundary problem cannot be solved in any rational way, and that the only solution which will give the two new Provinces a peaceful start will be one negotiated by the Parties—in other words a settlement out of court. I believe that there is quite a lot in the claim of the Sikhs—and for that matter of other residents of the Eastern Punjab—for a share in the canal colonies, and the Giani’s idea that the Montgomery district should be allotted to the East is by no means as ridiculous as it sounds. The district, if so allotted, could be ‘recolonized’ so as to concentrate the non-Muslims there and to transfer Muslims to Lyallpur, which is agriculturally on the whole a better proposition. But with the Sikhs demanding the Chenab as the Western boundary and the Muslims hoping to stretch their tentacles as far east as Ambala, and everyone behaving as though they had just been at war and were going to have a new war within a few weeks, I see little hope of any solution of this kind.

   Yours sincerely,
   E.M. JENKINS

NOTE BY JENKINS

July 10th, 1947

Giani Kartar Singh came to see me today at 4.45 p.m. at his request. He was to have come at 3 p.m., but he seems to have had some trouble with his car driving in from Nankana Sahib.

2. He said that he had come to see me about the Indian Independence Bill and the Boundary Commission. The Bill made it clear that if orders were not passed on the recommendations of the Boundary Commission by 15th August, two new Governments would be set up on the basis of the 'notional' boundary. The Sikhs did not believe that fresh orders about the boundary would be enforced after 15th August, and wanted to know what the enforcement arrangements would be. The Sikhs would not accept the ‘notional’ boundary even provisionally, and if an attempt were made to set up two new Governments on the basis of this boundary on 15th August, the Sikhs would refuse to join the Government of the Eastern Punjab and would refuse also to have anything to do with the Union Government of India. They would have to take other measures.

3. Proceeding, the Giani said that there must be an exchange of population on a large scale. Were the British ready to enforce this? He doubted if they were, and if no regard was paid to Sikh solidarity, a fight was inevitable. The British had said for years that they intended to protect the minorities, and what had happened now was a clear breach of faith by the British....

6. The Giani then elaborated the Sikh claim. He said that they must have at least one canal system; they must also have Nankana Sahib; finally the arrangements must be such as to bring three-quarters or at least two-thirds of the Sikh population into the Eastern Punjab. An exchange of population on a large scale was essential—he thought that at least 400,000 Sikhs should be moved to the East and 400,000 Muslims were to the West (later in the conversation he said that the number of Sikhs would be 500,000 or 600,000 and the number of Muslims about one million. Property as well as population should be taken into account in the exchange, and the Sikhs are on the whole better off than the Muslims). The Giani asserted that unless it was recognized by H.M.G., the Viceroy and the Party Leaders that the fate of the Sikhs was a vital issue in the proceedings for the transfer of power there would be trouble.

7. I asked how the Giani proposed to effect his large transfer of population, and what he meant by ‘one canal system’. Did he mean in concrete terms that if the Sikhs got a part of the Montgomery district, from which Muslims could be transferred to Lyallpur and to which Sikhs could be transferred from Lyallpur, the Sikhs would be content? The Giani said that the Sikhs would be content with the whole of the Montgomery district and Nankana Sahib, and that if this could be effected, the exchange of population would be more or less automatic. On my pointing out that the inclusion of Nankana Sahib in the Eastern Punjab would be an extremely difficult operation, he gave me a long and rather involved account of the communal distribution of population in parts of the Lyallpur and Sheikhupura districts, and said that the transfer of Nankana Sahib to the Eastern Punjab was practicable....

9. I then reverted to the somewhat minatory remarks of the Giani about the attitude of the Sikhs should the new Governments be established on the basis of the ‘notional’ boundary. I asked exactly what he meant by ‘other measures’. The Giani replied that the Sikhs would be obliged to fight. I retorted that this would be very foolish and enquired how they expected to fight against trained troops. The Giani said in quite a matter of fact way that the Sikhs realised that they would be in a bad position and would have to fight on revolutionary lines—by murdering officials, cutting railway lines and telegraph lines, destroying canal headworks, and so on. I reiterated that this seemed to me a very foolish policy, to which the Giani retorted that if Britain were invaded, he had no doubt that my feelings would be much the same as his.

10. I enquired when the fight would begin. The Giani said that protests would continue from now on. The Sikhs felt that it would be useless to wait for two or three years before taking violent action, and the execution of their plan would start with the departure of the British.

11. I pointed out that violent action would hardly endear the Sikhs to the Congress, with whom the Panthic Party was now allied. The Giani replied that he had never trusted and did not now trust the Congress. Rather illogically he added that Mahatma Gandhi and Sardar Patel had been sympathetic to the establishment of a Sikh homeland with the Jat districts separated and joined to the U.P. For such a homeland the Sikhs must have a reasonable boundary in the west and their population mainly concentrated east of that boundary. He saw the final Sikh State as a kind of buffer-state between Pakistan and the Union of India.

12. I said that the real solution was a reasonable settlement between the representatives of the future Governments of the West and East Punjab. I asked whether such a settlement was quite out of the question (I have always felt that the boundary problem is really a political problem which can be settled only 'out of court'). The Giani said that there was no one among the Muslims big enough to take a decision that might seem detrimental to the Muslim community. Personally he thought any discussion with a view to a settlement quite useless. The Sikhs would not abate their claim, and the Muslims would go on hoping to secure territory as far east as Ambala. The Muslims were now putting out some conciliatory propaganda but their intention was that of a sportsman who is careful not to disturb the birds he intends to shoot. He believed that the Muslims would try to make the Sikhs in the Western Punjab feel secure and would then set about them in earnest.

13. Finally, the Giani appealed to me to do all that I could to help the Sikhs during a period of great trial. Having served in the Punjab for so many years, I could not wish to abandon it to misery and bloodshed; but there would be misery and bloodshed if the boundary problem were not suitably solved.

14. The Giani was matter of fact and quiet throughout our conversation, but wept when he made his final appeal. This is the nearest thing to an ultimatum yet given on behalf of the Sikhs. They are undoubtedly very puzzled and unhappy, but I see no reason to suppose that they have lost the nuisance value which they have possessed through the centuries.

Memorandum submitted to the Boundary Commission on behalf of the Depressed Classes of the Punjab through their representatives

The total population of the Scheduled Castes in British India, as indicated in the census enumeration of 1941 is 3,99,20,807 and they constitute 13.5% of the total population of the country. They are, however, unequally distributed in different provinces as is evident from the statement given below:—

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Province</th>
<th>Scheduled Castes</th>
<th>Percentage</th>
</tr>

<tbody>
<tr>
<td>U.P.</td>

<td>13.3</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Central Provinces &amp; Berar</td>
<td>30,51,413</td>
<td>18.1</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>
From the table given above, it is evident that the vast majority of the Scheduled castes exist in Hindu majority provinces.

A reference to the appendix at the end of Government of India Act 1935 shows that out of a total number of 808 general territorial seats in the various provincial Legislative Assemblies, 151 seats have been reserved for the Scheduled Castes. In the province of the Punjab, out of 42 general territorial seats, the Scheduled Castes have been allotted 8; but in the last elections they won two more additional general seats from the purely Hindu constituencies. Thus their present strength in the Punjab Legislative Assembly is 10.

Ever since the question of dividing India into Hindustan and Pakistan became a live issue, a large majority of the representatives of the Scheduled Castes have been opposing such a division and have been backing up the case for united India. Now when division of India has become a settled fact, the Scheduled Castes of India in general and of the Punjab in particular, are keen that as great a bulk of them as possible should be included in India rather than in Pakistan. When on 23rd of June 1947, the question was put to vote on the floor of the Punjab Legislative Assembly whether the Punjab, in case it remained united, should join India or Pakistan, all the 9 Scheduled Caste members who were present voted in favour of the Union of India.

The Scheduled Castes feel that their number in Pakistan will be so small that they will not be able to safeguard their rights and interests effectively. The table below will elucidate the point:

North West Zone of Pakistan

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Name of Province</th>
<th>Total population</th>
<th>Population of the Scheduled Castes</th>

<td>3,36,779</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Total population</td>
<td>2,49,45,606</td>
<td>5,33,779</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

From the statement given above, it is evident that out of a total population of 2,49,45,606 in the North West Zone of Pakistan the Scheduled Castes will number 5,33,779 i.e. 2.14 per cent.
of the population. In the Union of India, however, they will constitute about 10 per cent and will thus be in a better position to have an effective voice than in Pakistan.

In the Punjab, the total population of the Scheduled Castes is 15,92,320 including Ad-Dharmis and is distributed as per table below:

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Division</th>
<th>Population</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>

<tr>

</tr>
<tr>
<td>Multan</td>
<td>1,48,801</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Rawalpindi</td>
<td>21,341</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

From the statement given above, it is evident that the Scheduled Castes are concentrated in the divisions of Ambala and Jullundur where their total strength comes to over one million. If Amritsar district is added on to these divisions then their total strength comes to 12,55,377 i.e. 78% of their total strength. The representatives of the Scheduled Castes are anxious that their solidarity should be maintained and as many of them as possible should be included in the Eastern Punjab.

It is an admitted fact that the members of the Scheduled Castes are part and parcel of the Hindu community, their culture, customs and traditions are common; their political, social and economic interests are inter-linked with the rest of the Hindus.

Having regard to the recent happenings in the Rawalpindi and Multan Divisions of the Punjab and Noakhali and Tipperah districts of the Eastern Bengal, the members of the Scheduled Castes have begun to entertain serious misgivings if their life and property will ever be safe and honour of their women-folk protected in Pakistan where religious considerations would reign supreme. Being educationally backward and economically depressed, they feel diffident if they will be able to resist on-slaughts on their religion and culture.

It may be pertinent to remark in passing that the Scheduled Castes as a rule do not own any agricultural land. They generally work either as tenants at will or as un-skilled labourers or as menials. Some of the members of the Scheduled Castes, however, have been allotted squares of land in the colonies of Montgomery, Sheikhpura and Lyallpur in recognition of military services rendered by them in the last two Great Wars.

Taking into consideration the solidarity of the Scheduled Castes as well as their economic interest, we respectfully submit on their behalf that the Chenab should be the boundary line between Eastern Punjab and Western Punjab. This will have the effect of not only placing 97% of the Scheduled Castes in the south-east zone of the Punjab but will also include the districts of Montgomery, Sheikhpura and Lyallpur in which they own landed property in the Eastern Punjab.

The view put forward in the Memorandum is supported by resolutions passed at numerous meetings of the Scheduled Castes in various parts of the province. These resolutions will be produced before the Commission.
3. Muslims Threaten Sacrifices to Achieve Desired Boundary

Letter from Vallabhbhai Patel to Louis Mountbatten, 19 July 1947
IOR, R/3/1/157, Acc. No. 3820, NAI

New Delhi

My dear Lord Mountbatten,

You will recall that, the other day, in the Partition Council Mr. Jinnah made much of the so-called ‘intransigence’ of the Sikhs towards the decisions of the Boundary Commission, in case they were adverse to their demands. I would invite your attention to the attached cutting from today’s Dawn, which shows how Muslim opinion practically all over the Punjab has been roused, probably on an organized basis, in favour of an extreme and impossible demand for boundaries, and threats have been held out that all sacrifices shall be made for its achievement. The warning is addressed to His Majesty’s Government, yourself and the Boundary Commissioners.

Yours sincerely,
Vallabhbhai Patel

PUNJAB MUSLIMS WILL NOT YIELD AN INCH OF PAKISTAN
HENDERSON’S STATEMENT, AN AFTERTHOUGHT

Delhi, Friday

Muslims all over the Punjab are unanimous in their demand that all contiguous Muslim majority areas extending up to the River Jumna must be included in Pakistan and warn the British Labour Government, the Viceroy and the Boundary Commissioners that the award of the Boundary Commission will be acceptable to the Muslims only if the demand mentioned above is fully and unreservedly met. They are, however, determined to achieve their objective irrespective of whatever sacrifice, they have to offer for its achievement, as is indicated by the hundreds of telegrams that ‘Dawn’ is daily receiving from the Punjab.

In a cable sent to the British Premier Attlee, copies of which have been sent to the Quaid-e-Azam, Lord Mountbatten and Sir Cyril Radcliffe, Sheikh Sadiq Hassan, Vice-President, Punjab Muslim League and President, Anjuman Islamia says: ‘India Under-Secretary, Mr. Henderson’s latest interpretation of “Other Factors” that the “Sikh religious shrines will be taken into account” in determining the boundaries between East and West Punjab is sheer injustice, partiality and a belated discovery. The declaration in fact renders the Boundary Commission a farce. If the “principle” enunciated above is to be applied, it should be applied to all historic Muslim mosques and the holy shrines lying in Hindustan.’

AMRITSAR

Mir Anwar Saeed Mahmood, General Secretary, City Muslim League, Amritsar, in a similar cable sent to Mr. Attlee, copies of which have also been forwarded to the Quaid-e-Azam, Lord Mountbatten and Sir Cyril Radcliffe, states: ‘Amritsar City Muslim League is shocked at India Under-Secretary, Mr. Henderson’s unjust and partial interpretation of “Other Factors” concerning the consideration to be given to the Sikh religious places....'

SIALKOT

By a resolution adopted at an emergency meeting held on July 15, the Working Committee, Muslim League, Sialkot, demands that all the Muslim majority areas of Jullundur, Ferozepore, Amritsar, Hoshiarpur, Gurdaspur, Ludhiana, Ambala and other districts be included in Pakistan and that population be the only criterion in the demarcation of boundary lines between Pakistan and Hindustan. ‘Any deviation from this principle will be resisted to the utmost of our capacity.’...

LAHORE

‘The Punjab Muslims are greatly concerned over the non-Muslim attempts to influence the Boundary Commission findings by threats of force or other underhand means ... says the General Secretary, Anjuman Moghlia, Tarn Taran, in a telegram sent on behalf of the Anjuman....’

FEROZEPORE

While the President, Muslim League, Ferozepore, wires: ‘It will be a sheer injustice not to include the Muslim majority areas of Ferozepore, Zira, Muktesar and Fazilka in Pakistan. The Ferozepore Muslims will shed their last drop of blood for their inclusion.’...

JULLUNDUR

The President, Muslim League, Jullundur Cantonment, demands inclusion of the whole of Jullundur Division extending east of Sutlej and other areas up to River Jumna in Pakistan. ...

DHANDAURA

...The Salar, Muslim National Guards, says that Jullundur and Nakodar Tehsils and greater parts of other Tehsils up to River Sutlej are Muslim majority areas and taking other factors into consideration the whole of Jullundur district is naturally a part of Pakistan....

BAHADUR GARH

The Secretary, Muslim League, Bahadur Garh wires: ‘The demand for inclusion of every single village of Muslim Majority areas of the East Punjab in the Western Punjab is based on justice and Muslims demand nothing but justice and fairplay. Any unfair deal about the demarcation of the boundary lines will nullify the June 3 Plan.’

AMBALA

The Secretary, Muslim League, Ambala, says: ‘Muslims of Ambala demand demarcation of boundary lines on population basis. Any departure from this fundamental rule will be fought tooth and nail.’

LUDHIANA

‘Ludhiana town and Bet area have an overwhelming Muslim population. Muslims demand their inclusion in Pakistan and they will certainly resist any injustice perpetrated on them,’ says the Secretary, Ward No. 7, Muslim League, Ludhiana....
JHANG
Muslims will shed their last drop of blood in retaining the Muslim Punjab. Let British Government beware of it, declare Muslims of chak 168, Jhang, in a telegram.

MIANWALI
There are numerous telegrams from Mianwali; as many as 47....

RAWALPINDI
No trampling upon of Muslim rights in the fixation of the boundary lines will be tolerated. Muslim majority areas must be included in Pakistan, demands Mr. Mohammad Amin, Secretary, Sheikh Youths’ Association, Rawalpindi in a telegram....

SAJHOWAL KOT KHAN
‘We will shed our last drop of blood in retaining Muslim Punjab’, declare the Musalmans of Sajhowal Kot Khan in a telegram.

4. ‘Punjab Leaders Warn Boundary Commission’
Extract from a report in Dawn, 21 July 1947

Lahore, Saturday.—Khan of Mamdot, Mian Mumtaz Daultana, Sardar Shaukat Hyat Khan, Malik Feroze Khan Noon, Begum Shah Nawaz, Sheikh Karamat Ali and Mian Iftikharuddin in a thousand word statement to the Press have defined their attitude towards the Punjab Boundary Commission.

They say: The time has come when we, who have the honour to represent the Muslims of the Punjab must give a clear and unqualified expression to our attitude towards the Boundary Commission. Our position admits of no equivocation or misunderstanding.

We accepted the decisions of His Majesty’s Government contained in their statement of policy of June 3, 1947, because they were based on certain democratic principles which we recognised to be in accord with the spirit of the times and an expression of the ideals for which India’s long and glorious struggle for freedom had been fought.

HONEST ACCEPTANCE

We accepted the mechanism suggested for working out the detailed application of these principles to the concrete set up in India, and our acceptance was without reservation the honest and straightforward sense, that we were prepared to submit to the results of this procedure based on these principles, whether in any particular detail it worked to the advantage or disadvantage of the Muslims....

The principle we accepted was that no large section of the peoples of India who were populous enough to form an absolute majority in any appreciable territorial area were to be coerced against their will to remain under the domination of another people.
This democratic principle was to imply the right of the Musalmans to form an independent State in the regions of their majority, and at the same time to permit such non-Muslims’ concentrations of population as formed a majority in any particular portion of the Muslim majority provinces to exercise their option between joining Pakistan or Hindustan, so long as they were contiguous to the Hindu majority provinces.

PRINCIPLE REITERATED

...Today the time has come when this principle is to be worked out in the delimitation of the boundary between Pakistan and Hindustan. But at this time, we find that a deliberate and mischievous confusion is being created which strikes at the very root of the principle on which the whole superstructure of India’s freedom is based, considerations which are the exact antithesis of democracy and the freedom and dignity of the individual human soul are being imported to rob a people of their heritage.

Attempts are being made to enslave and strangulate Muslims in areas which of right belong to them by the very definition evolved by Mr. Attlee, announced by Viscount Mountbatten, and ratified by the unanimous acceptance of all the people of India, because in these areas the Muslims are in an absolute majority contiguous to the uncontested territories of Pakistan.

The very arguments which would sanctify a peoples’ heroic struggle against economic exploitation, against slavery under a dominant and ruthless minority, against oppression and want, are being employed to justify the continuance of this oppression and exploitation for all times to come.

So long as these delightful ratiocinations proceeded from the lips of our Sikh brethren alone we were no more than amused, because we were aware of the quality of the logic familiar to them, and of the impasse [sic] in which a benighted leadership had led them.

FIRST AXIOM OF JUSTICE NOT HONOURED

But when these arguments are used by people in authority close to the British Government and when it is not made clear that ‘other factors’ may be employed only to round off the angularities of a boundary strictly drawn according to principles of democracy and self-determination or to vary in a slight degree, but not to an extent to enslave masses of people who have the opportunity to exercise the right to be free, a line so fixed also as to accommodate unalterable economic facts, etc., and when this first axiom of justice is not clearly honoured that each and every criterion laid down for boundary demarcation shall apply in equal degree to the advantage or disadvantage of each party, we begin to have doubts as to the very basis on which we all agreed to accept the plan and procedure of His Majesty’s Government.

The Muslims of the Punjab therefore give final warning. We are loyal to our great leader Mohammad Ali Jinnah and to the word given by him on behalf of the Muslim people, and the principles and procedure of the British plan as accepted by him. Beyond that, therefore, we claim not an inch, but of that we will yield not an inch.

Therefore, we formally declare with the fullest sense of responsibility and of consequence that every man, women and child in Muslim Punjab will fight to the bitterest end, if a single man or a single acre of land, which properly falls within Pakistan and must belong to us, is kept away from us.
We have not threatened when others have raved, but we are as well prepared, as determined, as wholly resolved as anyone else, to protect, to guard and, if need be, to snatch what rightfully is ours to claim and to possess.

Let those who might plan to deceive and betray, to brow beat and threaten, take nose [sic] of the aroused might of a united people.

It is not necessary to call upon our people to prepare themselves, if need be, for the final struggle and the final sacrifice. We know that the call is already in every Muslim heart. (A.P.I.)

5. Government to Curtail Large Demonstrations

No. 189-G

Sikh Political Conference to press usual Boundary Claims is announced to be held Nankana Sahib, Sheikhupura District on Sunday July 27th. Poster which is general encouragement to resist unfavourable award purports to come from 22 members of Punjab Assembly. Actual organiser is almost certainly Giyani Kartar Singh (one of 22) and intention is that large jathas should converge on Nankana from Lyallpur and Sheikhupura village. If we take repressive action morcha will be established at Nankana. If not, further mass meetings will be held with a view to disturbances later.

2. Public meetings are banned in Sheikhupura District and this meeting which does not come within religious exemption is illegal. I have taken following action. First, Swaran Singh informed that meeting is illegal and will be dealt with unless stopped. He has promised to do what he can but is not one of 22 signatories of poster. Second. Special forces consisting of Headquarters and one Squadron 18th Lancers and one Battalion 3rd Baluch Regiment being sent by Lahore Area to Nankana in addition to Gurkha Company already in district. Force will be under command of 23 Bde. and will be in position morning July 25th. Third. Police and troops will make every possible effort to discourage attendance by control posts on roads and railways and by patrolling. Railway bookings to Nankana and adjacent stations will be suspended.

3. Mass demonstrations on Boundary question are most dangerous and we will do all we can to stop this one. But we must if possible avoid large-scale clash with Sikhs within precincts of Gurdwara and I am instructing officials concerned to bear (?) this in mind in handling situation on spot.

ENCLOSURE

...Census 6. The Census taken periodically is generally considered the most accurate record of the number and composition of the population of a country. In the Punjab, however, certain unusual factors have in recent times come into play and have seriously affected the accuracy of the census. Though a rough enumeration of the population of the Punjab was made as far back as 1855, no regular census giving the figures for different communities was taken until 1881. The censuses of 1881, 1891 and 1901 showed that in the Punjab, including the States, non-Muslims were in a majority. The percentage of the non-Muslim majority appears from the table given below:—

If the States were excluded, the Muslims were in a small majority. The table given below gives the Muslim percentage of the population in the British Punjab:—

Since 1909, a political interest has come to be attached to the census because of the introduction of separate electorates with reservation of seats and this development has vitiated the accuracy of all the subsequent censuses. In 1911 the Superintendent of Census, Punjab, observed as follows at page 97 of his Report (Vol. XIV):

‘The members of the depressed classes, i.e., Chuhras, Sansis, etc., who did not profess to belong to Islam or Christianity were returned as Hindus in the three previous censuses and similar instructions were issued in the recent census. Nevertheless, a number of Sansis and Chuhras residing in Mohammedan villages were returned as Mohammedans, as some Chuhras living in Sikh villages were returned as Sikhs.’

In 1920, i.e., a year before the census of 1921, the Montagu-Chelmsford reforms were introduced and emphasis was laid on the numerical strength of the communities as a basis of their political representation. This became an incentive for exaggerating the numbers in order to gain political advantage. About this time, however, certain events happened which led the Hindus and Sikhs to abstain from offering co-operation to the Census authorities. On the 1st August, 1920, the non-co-operation movement was launched by Mahatma Gandhi. It covered a wide range and involved the withholding of co-operation from all governmental activities including the census operations. In the case of Sikhs, the spirit of non-cooperation was further stiffened by reason of the notorious Nankana massacre which took place on the 20th February 1921, about four weeks before the day of enumeration for the Census of 1921, namely, the 18th March, 1921.

The census operations of 1921 in the Punjab were carried on under the supervision of Mr. Middleton, I.C.S. and Mr. Jacob, I.C.S. as Superintendents. At page 106 of the Report (Vol. XV, Part I) they observe:

‘Evidence as to the unreliability of the census of the number of inhabitants per building carried out in Lahore, Amritsar, Rawalpindi and Jullundur, though, of course, the accuracy to be expected is much less than that of the census proper, is afforded by the statistics themselves. Thus by adding up the number of buildings with the specified number of inhabitants per building, it is found that in the case of Wards 1—6 of the Lahore City, there must be no less than 1,17,140 inhabitants as against 92,533 enumerated in the census. The difference of over 24,000 cannot be accounted for except by the inaccuracy of one or other of the enumerations. In the case of Ward 3 of Rawalpindi City the discrepancy is even more marked.’

Before the Census of 1931, there was a recrudescence of the boycott movement started as a protest against the appointment of the Indian Statutory Commission, known as the Simon Commission. This was intensified by the Civil Disobedience Movement launched by the Indian National Congress in 1930. At that time the Muslim Community had at the Round Table Conference in London demanded the extension of the system of separate electorates and it was generally known that the new reforms would give effect to the demand. While, therefore, the politically-minded Hindus and Sikhs kept aloof from the census operations of 1931, the Muslims fully availed themselves of the opportunity afforded to them. The following remarks of Khan Sahib Ahmad Hussain Khan, Superintendent, Census Operations in the Punjab at page 80 of his Report (Vol. XVII, Part I) throw a revealing light on the situation:—

‘Another factor came into play on the present occasion and deprived the census operations of the calm atmosphere, which is essential to the obtaining of correct returns. The people had realised that their political rights depended upon the census figures. The new constitution for India was to be framed at no distant date, and value attached to the communal figures brought out by the census was greater than ever. Consequently the atmosphere was surcharged with propaganda, carried on through various agencies, and attempts were made in some places by enumerators to swell the figures of their communities by means of bogus entries, or to curtail the strength of a rival community by scoring out persons who were actually present in their houses on the final census night. There were also some cases, in which the residents of houses returned bogus names with the same motive. This mostly took place in certain urban areas, the worst offender in this respect being the city of Amritsar.

‘It may also be remarked that while bogus entries were made to swell the figures, in some of the large towns the apathy on the part of the enumerators was responsible for certain cases of omission. For example in Lahore several cases came to notice in which whole families were left unenumerated.’

At page 81 of the Report it is stated that while the number of houses recorded in the province during the preliminary enumeration was 8,167,739, on the final census night 5,943,652 houses only were found occupied.

Conditions deteriorated further in the years preceding the next Census of 1941. In the year 1935 the Government of India Act was passed, which confirmed and elaborated the system of separate electorates. On the 23rd March 1940 the Muslim League passed a resolution demanding separate autonomous States in the north-east and the north-west. These factors influenced the Census of 1941 about which Mr. Yeatts, Census Commissioner, has observed at page 9 of Vol. I (Tables) as follows:—

‘1940–41 saw also political influences on the census but in the opposite direction, since whereas the difficulty in 1931 had been to defeat a boycott, the difficulty in 1941 was to defeat an excess of zeal.’

It is well-known that at the time of the 1941 Census, communal passions ran high in the Punjab and very little value can be attached to the enumeration records.

The late Diwan Bahadur Raja Narindra Nath, Retired Commissioner, and the then President of the Punjab Hindu Mahasabha, made a statement in this connection to the Press, dated the 5th of March 1941, which is published in the Tribune of the 6th of March. He stated:

‘I have received numerous complaints from different places in the Punjab bringing it to my notice that the enumeration of Hindus in several tracts has been omitted and that in most places, false entries have been made with regard to the language spoken. Those who have brought to my notice the omissions and false entries have asked me to intervene.'
'As regards places other than Lahore Municipality, I have brought these irregularities and omissions to the notice of the Deputy Commissioners concerned. About Lahore the complaints have been forwarded to the Administrator of the Municipality. In many places in Lahore the enumerators were not supplied with the requisite number of pads with the result that the enumeration could not be done. A large number of complaints are to the effect that no enumerators came to them to take their returns. From Lahore alone more than 20,000 cases have been brought to the notice of the Administrator through me and there is a regular stream of such cases coming to me even now. This being the plight of Lahore, the seat of Government and a place with an awakened population, one can imagine the conditions in the districts. It seems to me that in the Punjab census has been vitiated by communal bias of enumerators and others. The vital statistics collected will have no value. I have sent the following telegram to the Census Commissioner and the Home Member to the Government of India:—

‘Complaints being received from all over Punjab regarding deliberate omission of enumeration of Hindus and false returns with regard language and script. Complaints founded on good evidence. Census made absolutely unreliable. Please fix another date for fresh census.’

On the 15th of March, 1941, a public meeting of the Hindus of Lahore was held at Lahore under the presidency of Diwan Bahadur Raja Narindra Nath at which the following resolution was passed (reported in the Tribune dated the 16th of March, 1941):—

‘In the opinion of this meeting of the Hindus of Lahore convened under the auspices of Hindu Young-men’s Association, the statistics collected in the Punjab in the last Census held on the 27th and 28th of February are absolutely unreliable and that either a fresh census should be held on another date or if this be not practicable figures collected should not be made the basis of any change in the representation of various communities either in the Legislature or Local Bodies or in the services.’

The Census Sub-Committee of the Sikh Gurdwara Prabandhak Committee, Amritsar, also passed a resolution on the 19th of March 1941 in which the grievances of the Sikhs against the enumerators of the 1940-41 Census were set out in extenso.

The Census Authorities realised the situation and refused to act on the enumeration record in several places, for example in Lahore, and arrived at their computation by relying on the 1931 census figures as adjusted by the vital statistics for the years 1931 to 1941. Such a computation would obviously not represent the true figure of the population as, apart from other considerations, it omitted to take into account the large influx of population into Lahore from outside areas since 1931.

It is noticeable that the recorded rates of increase of population have been much higher in the Punjab and Eastern Bengal and much higher during 1921 to 1941 than in the previous decades. The following are the figures relating to the Punjab:—

In this connection the following remarks of Mr. M.W.M. Yeatts, I.C.S. at page 23 of his Report on the 1941 census (Vol. I—Tables) are significant:

'The increase is by no means uniform, although a greater figure than for the previous decades is practically universal. Rates are noticeably larger in the north than in the south and have two distinct peaks in the extreme west and northwest and in the east. In fact we have in the Punjab and Eastern Bengal two swarming areas.'

It is obvious, therefore, that the census records have been vitiated and do not afford reliable data for computation. This feature of the recent census returns greatly emphasizes the danger of relying on these figures for the purposes of the demarcation of boundaries.

Terms of Reference of the Boundary Commission for the Punjab

9. The terms of reference of the Boundary Commission for the Punjab were published on the 1st of July, 1947. They provide as follows:

'The Boundary Commission is instructed to demarcate the boundaries of the two parts of the Punjab on the basis of ascertaining the contiguous majority areas of Muslims and non-Muslims. In doing so, it will also take into account other factors.'

It will be noticed that the Commission is instructed to demarcate the boundaries of the two parts on the basis of the ascertainment of the contiguous majority areas of Muslims and non-Muslims and that, in doing so, it has to take into account other factors also. It is submitted that on a true construction of these terms of reference, the Commission in demarcating the boundaries is not to be guided solely by the basis of contiguous Muslim and non-Muslim majority areas, but that it has also to consider and weigh other factors which would naturally have importance in demarcating the boundaries of two different States.

It has to be remembered that the Punjab has been a homogeneous province where the population of the two communities is closely interspersed and it has for about a century been governed as one entire provincial unit, all communities in the province joining in one common effort for its development and prosperity. This feature of the province would make a division solely on the basis of contiguous majority areas highly inequitable. It is with a view to avoiding this inequitable result that the terms of reference have specifically provided that in demarcating the boundaries the Commission is to proceed not merely on the basis of contiguous majority areas, but is to have regard... to the other factors which by reason of their importance, may well over-ride the considerations arising from particular areas having a Muslim or a non-Muslim majority.

Other Factors

10. It will be out of place to enumerate all factors of importance which have to be taken into account in the demarcation of boundaries. But some of these which have a special relevance in reference to the Punjab and their relation to the two parts of the Province as shown in the notional division, may be briefly stated:—

(a) In order to appreciate the position of the Sikhs in the Punjab, a brief historical survey of the rise and growth of the Sikhs in the province is essential.
Originally founded as a reformed sect of the Hindus by Guru Nanak at the end of the 15th century, the Sikhs were organised into a powerful military group by the later Sikh Gurus on account of the policy of religious persecution pursued by the later Moghals towards them. This transformation was completed under the leadership of the tenth Guru, Guru Govind Singh, and from that time onwards, the Sikhs made a bid for political power which they regarded essential for the preservation of their faith and freedom. The confusion which followed the decay of the Moghal Empire and the invasions of Nadir Shah and Ahmad Shah Abdali, gave the Khalsa their chance to establish their power in the land of their birth. A map of the Punjab in 1760 reveals that the Sikh territories at that time extended from the Sutlej to the Chenab, while their sphere of influence went beyond to the Jumna and the Indus. The authority of the Sikhs during this period extended up to Multan and the foot of the Siwalik hills and their power based on the active support of the people of the area was so well entrenched that Abdali and the Afghans found it impossible to subdue them. Subsequently, the conquests of the Sikhs were consolidated into the powerful kingdom of Maharaja Ranjit Singh who extended the Sikh dominion upto Peshawar and Kashmir in the north and Bannu and Dera Ismail Khan in the west. South of the Sutlej were situated a number of Sikh principalities which embrace the present districts of Ferozepore, Ludhiana, Ambala, Karnal and the present Sikh States of Patiala, Jind, Nabha and Faridkot. The whole of this territory which corresponds to the whole of the present Punjab and most of the present North-Western Frontier Province passed from the Sikhs to the British in the later forties of the last century.

The rise of the Sikhs with their social, political and cultural institutions effected the solidarity of the Punjab to a degree which it had never attained before. The Sikhs sprang from the central and middle-eastern parts of the Punjab and this region may well be described as their homeland. They own the major part of the agricultural land in the Central Punjab and they have contributed their very best to the development of this region. The Sikhs have very little to look forward to outside the Punjab. Out of a total number of a little over 41½ lakhs in the whole of British India, 37½ lakhs live in the Punjab. It is not merely that they have their homeland and holy places in the Punjab; they are rooted in the soil and their destinies are interwoven with the destinies of the Punjab. The intimate association of the Sikhs with the Punjab through long years of rule and residence entitles them, at any rate, to resist their being uprooted and dislodged from their homelands.

The historical events referred to above and the recent happenings at Rawalpindi and elsewhere show that it will be impossible for the Sikhs to live peacefully and with honour and in enjoyment of their religious freedom in the Western Punjab. It is, therefore, essential as much to the peace of the two divisions of the Punjab as to the protection of Sikh culture and solidarity that they should not be divided and that as many of them as is feasible be brought into the eastern part of the province.

One of the chief occupations of the Sikhs is military service. Having regard to the relations which have, for generations, existed between the Sikhs and the Muslims, it is obvious that the Sikhs, retained in the western part of the province, will be altogether denied this occupation.

The special position of the Sikhs in the Punjab was recognised by the Cabinet Mission in their proposals of May, 1946. It was also referred to by Lord Wavell, the then Viceroy in his broadcast of the 17th of May, 1946 and by Lord Pethick Lawrence, the then Secretary of State, in a letter dated the 1st of June, 1946. His Majesty's Government's Statement dated the 3rd of June and the Press Conference by His Excellency the Viceroy following upon it have also recognised the special position of the Sikhs in the Punjab.

Under the notional division the Sikh community will be completely torn and mutilated and all its economic, cultural and other interests totally destroyed. Such a division will result in splitting the community into almost two equal divisions between the western and the eastern parts of the province.

The Sikhs form a fairly large group in some of the districts in the western part, e.g., Lyallpur, Montgomery and Sheikhupura. In Lyallpur particularly, they form, along with other non-Muslims, a majority in a large tract. If this tract is included in the eastern part along with Sheikhupura and Montgomery, the solidarity of the Sikhs can in the main be preserved. The inclusion of these districts in the eastern part will also satisfy the strong religious sentiments of the Sikhs by bringing in the holy shrine of Nankana Sahib in the eastern area.
The contribution made by the Sikh colonists to the growth of the colonies in Lyallpur and Montgomery and the fine qualities of colonists as cultivators have been frequently eulogised. These constitute additional grounds for not disturbing the Sikh peasant proprietors from their colony homelands.

A very important consideration to be borne in mind is the situation of the holy shrines of the Sikhs. Among these may be enumerated the Nankana Sahib, the birthplace of the founder of the sect and Khara Sauda in Sheikhupura district; Kartarpur, Derababa Nanak and Sri Gobindpur in the Gurdaspur District; the Golden Temple, the Gondwal shrine, Khadur Sahib and Tarntaran in the Amritsar District, the shrines connected with Guru Arjun Dev in the Lahore district and Shahidganj in the city of Lahore. Any demarcation of the boundary which places these shrines in the western part of the province, would be unjust.
Consideration of strategy and defence

(b) It has to be remembered that the boundary between the eastern and the western parts of the Punjab is not to be a boundary merely between two provincial zones. The boundary line to be demarcated by the Commission will form the north-western boundary of the Indian Union, separating it from the territory of the Pakistan Government. In the circumstances, all considerations applicable to the fixation of a suitable international boundary will have to be taken into account. It will have to be a boundary which will give a natural and defensible frontier to the Indian Union in relation to Pakistan and to Pakistan in relation to the Indian Union. It is obvious that the boundary line cannot be a zigzag, straggling line with wedges or tongues of the territory of one state running into the territory of the other. Having regard to the physical features of the Punjab, a suitable and natural boundary line would be one of the larger rivers of the Punjab. A boundary line drawn along the Chenab, or, at any rate, for the greater part along that river will have the advantage of providing a suitable defensive line both to the Indian Union and the Pakistan Government. Apart from the considerations mentioned above, even for the maintenance of the peaceful and friendly relations between the Indian Union and the State of Pakistan, it is essential that the boundary should be drawn in such a way that the possibility of border raids, frontier incidents, smuggling and other like troubles may be eliminated.

Movement of population consequent on the partition

(h) Having regard to the circumstances which have brought about the partition of the Punjab, a considerable section of the non-Muslim population which will be left in the western part of the province will, in order to safeguard its person and property migrate from the western part to the eastern part. Further with the colonization of the new areas there has always been a movement of population from the over-populated and old colony areas. There has already been some movement of population for the development of the Haveli Colony in the Montgomery and Multan districts which is still in progress. Further, the Thal canals having been opened, it will be necessary to find a large number of suitable colonists for the new colonies which are springing up. This will mean a movement of population to the extent of about 10,00,000, which, in the circumstances, will consist mainly of Muslims. Having regard to the density of population in the eastern part and the large number of non-Muslim immigrants who are sure to migrate to the eastern part, it is essential that large tracts should be available to the eastern part in which these immigrants can be settled. These considerations strengthen the claim of the eastern part to have allotted to it the districts of Lyallpur and Montgomery.

Extent of the area claimed for the eastern part of the province

11. The area claimed for the eastern part of the province comprises

1. Ambala Division ... (Gurgaon, Rohtak, Hissar, Karnal, Ambala and Simla districts).
2. Jullundur Division ... (Ludhiana, Ferozepore, Jullundur, Hoshiarpur and Kangra districts).
3. Lahore Division ... (Gurdaspur, Amritsar, Lahore, Gujranwala, Sialkot and Sheikhupura districts).
(4) Lyallpur district, and
(5) Montgomery district.
(6) Such other adjoining parts as may be necessary from canal or colony considerations.

This is a compact contiguous non-Muslim majority area. It has a substantial majority of non-Muslims. The placing of the whole of this area in the eastern part of the province has the great advantage of ensuring mainly the integrity of the canal systems and reducing the split of the Sikhs to the minimum. Out of a total population of 37,57,401 Sikhs in the British Punjab, there will be included in this area about 34 lakhs. The further advantage of constituting this area as the eastern part of the province will be to give the Indian Union a firm and suitable frontier which is a matter of importance for the purposes of strategy and defence.

12. We will now proceed to examine each of the divisions and the districts above-mentioned with a view to show that the claim that they should be included in the eastern part of the province is well-founded....

Conclusion.

It is imperative to remember that the boundary to be demarcated is an international boundary being the boundary between the Pakistan State and the Indian Union. It is obvious that such a boundary cannot be settled solely on the basis of ascertaining the contiguous majority areas of Muslims and non-Muslims. In order that the Commission may be free to consider all aspects of the matter, the terms of reference clearly provide that in demarcating the boundary it has to consider other factors also. It is clear that in demarcating a boundary between the two States, considerations may arise which may entitle the Commission to altogether over-ride the population factor. The detailed review in the foregoing pages of various parts of the province discloses the existence of very vital and important factors in regard to those parts which, it is submitted, clearly require the Commission to disregard the population basis in deciding whether those parts should or should not be put on the one or the other side of the boundary line.

The claims of the eastern part of province to the Ambala and Jullundur Divisions and to the Amritsar district are supported as much by the population basis as by every other factor of any importance. In regard to the district of Gurdaspur the facts stated disclose that the eastern part is entitled to that district even if the matter were considered solely on the basis of the population of the district. However, numerous other factors have been shown to exist in the case of that district which clearly require the inclusion of that district in the eastern part of the province. The Lahore district has a small Muslim majority, much smaller than the one disclosed by the Census figures of 1941. However, there exist a large number of considerations which clearly fall within the sphere of other factors mentioned in the terms of reference and which entitle the eastern part to claim that district notwithstanding the small Muslim majority. In the case of the city of Lahore, the true position as to population reveals an equality of the Muslims and the non-Muslims. From the facts set out in reference to the city of Lahore, it is abundantly established that the present city of Lahore in all its aspects, economic, cultural, and educational, is the creation almost entirely of non-Muslims who have for about 150 years laboured in every way towards its growth and development. No factors stronger than those which have been mentioned can exist for the inclusion of this city within the boundaries of the eastern part of the province.

The colonies are a special feature of the Punjab and form a class by themselves because they have been the single largest source of the prosperity of the province and are its most valuable economic asset. The official records referred to demonstrate beyond doubt the great part played by the non-Muslims in their development and the preponderatingly large economic interests of the non-Muslims in the colony areas. Substantial tracts in the colony areas have a non-Muslim majority. The facts in regard to the growth of the colonies and their present economic structure in relation to the non-Muslims, are factors of overriding importance, strong enough to out-weight considerations arising by reason of there being a majority of Muslims in some parts of the colony areas. The districts of Sheikhupura, Gujranwala and Sialkot, though each of them contains a Muslim majority, should, by reason of the very cogent considerations already mentioned, be allotted to the eastern part of the province.

It is appropriate that attention should finally be drawn to a most important consideration governing the demarcation of the boundary. This consideration is the preservation of the solidarity of the Sikhs, a consideration which has been referred to on numerous occasions in documents of State by persons in high authority. As has been pointed out, modern Punjab owes its rise, growth and integrity as a province, in no small measure, to the valiant Sikh community. This small, but brave people, have a religious history of their own and their holy shrines, spread over the central parts of the Punjab, mark their rise and growth. It is but just that every effort should be made in demarcating the boundary to preserve the solidarity of the Sikhs. This solidarity can be preserved in a great measure by demarcating the boundary of the eastern part of the province along the Chenab river.

5. As contemplated in Paragraph 9 of the Announcement of 3rd of June, 1947, this Boundary Commission has been setup with instructions to ‘demarcate the boundaries of the two parts of the Punjab on the basis of ascertaining the contiguous majority areas of Muslims and non-Muslims. In doing so, it will also take into account other factors.’

6. To give an exhaustive account of factors which may be included in the phrase ‘other factors’ referred to in the announcement of His Majesty’s Government dated the 3rd of June, 1947, may not be possible. Whenever, however, the question of a boundary line between two states has arisen in the recent past in Europe or other countries, race, religion, language, history, economic considerations, geographical contiguity, influence of national prejudice and the needs of national defence have been taken to be some of the factors that conspire to indicate the best frontiers of any state. It will not be out of place to refer in this connection to the terms of reference of Orissa Boundary Commission. The Commissioners, in their Report at page 2 of Volume I, observe that they ‘agree with the Statutory Commission that the question of boundaries cannot be settled by any single test. Language, race, the attitude of the people, geographical position, economic interests and administrative convenience are all relevant factors, and in framing the proposals we have taken account of all of them.’

The Punjab

7. Originally, the Punjab or the ‘Land of the Five Rivers’ is the country enclosed and watered by the Jhelum, the Chenab, the Ravi, the Beas and the Sutlej, but the Province as now constituted includes also the table-land of Sirhind, between the Sutlej and the Jamna to the south of the former river, the Sind Sagar Doab or wedge of country between the Jhelum and the Indus and West of the latter river, and the two tracts which form Dera Ghazi Khan and Isa Khel sub-district of Mianwali District. The British Punjab has an area of 99,089 square miles, and its population as recorded in 1941 was 28,418,819.

8. The Isa Khel sub-district of the Mianwali District, Dera Ghazi Khan District and the Baloch Trans-frontier Tract are overwhelmingly Muslim. This area lies across the Indus River and is more properly a part of the Frontier Province. The area of Isa Khel sub-district of the Mianwali District, Dera Ghazi Khan District and the Baloch Trans-frontier Tract is 8,728 square miles with a total population of 699,466. Out of this population 625,304 persons profess the Muslim faith.

9. The Punjab proper extended to the banks of the Jhelum, excluding Jhang and Multan districts and the trans-Jhelum area. The tract comprising the present Jhang and Multan districts and the trans-Jhelum area, were added by conquest by Maharaja Ranjit Singh and retained by the British as an integral part of the British Punjab for administrative convenience.

10. From the boundary of Delhi to the banks of the Jhelum river, excluding the Multan and Jhang districts, the population is divided as under:

<table>

<tr>

<th>10,761,560</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>Sikhs and other non-Muslims</td>
<td>11,184,866</td>

11. From the boundary of the Delhi Province to the banks of river Chenab, excluding Multan and Jhang districts, the population is divided as under:

</tr>
</thead>

<tr>
<td>Sikhs and other non-Muslims</td>
<td>10,885,844</td>

</tbody>

The Population and the Census Operations

12. The Muslim population of the Punjab at the census of 1931 was 14,929,896, of this population 4,659,957 was divided as under:

| Faqirs (or mendicants) | 256,533 |
| Julaha or weavers    | 612,579 |
| Herdsmen             | 421,347 |
This part of the Muslim population is not rooted in the soil of the Punjab and is essentially of a floating character. The floating population amongst the Hindus and Sikhs, according to the census returns, is almost nil.

In the Punjab, including the Punjab States, the Muslims have been returned as under in the various census operations:

<table>

14. Between the years 1881 and 1901, the Muslims in the Punjab, including the Punjab States, were in a minority. It is only after the census enumeration of 1911 that they appear in a small numerical majority. The Superintendent of Census Operations, 1911 at the page 97 of the Report gives an explanation of this rise in the Muslim percentage: ‘The members of the depressed classes, i.e., Chuhras, Sansis, etc., who did not profess to belong to Islam or Christianity were returned as Hindus in the three previous censuses and similar instructions were issued in the recent census. Nevertheless a number of Sansis, the Chuhras residing in Mohammedan villages were returned as Mohammedans.’ Full details are given at page 100 of the same Report. The census figures of 1911, as compared with the census figures of 1901, show that in the 1911 Census the Hindus lost 158,806 Chuhras and 179,103 Chamars. The Mussallis in the Province numbered 57,410 in 1901, and this figure rose to 309,568 in 1911. ‘The abnormal rise of 252,158 i.e. about 39% in the number of Mussallis,’ observes the Census Superintendent, ‘would indicate that in some places Chuhras have been returned as Mussallis at the recent census.’

16. As regards the census operations of 1931, Khan Sahib Ahmed Hassan Khan, Superintendent of Census Operations, Punjab at page 79 of his Report, observes: ‘Under the circumstances it is not surprising that, while some people complained of omissions in enumeration, some asserted a swelling of figures of the community other than their own by means of bogus entries.... Another factor came into play on the present occasion and deprived the census operations of the calm atmosphere which is essential to the obtaining of correct figures. The new Constitution for India was to be framed at no distant date and value attached to the communal figures brought out by the census was greater than ever. Consequently, the atmosphere was surcharged with propaganda carried on through various agencies and attempts were made in some places by enumerators to swell the figures of their communities by means of bogus entries or to curtail the strength of rival community by scoring out persons who were actually present on the final census night. There were also some cases in which the residents of houses returned bogus names with the same motives. The non-Muslims figures of 1931 were also affected by the boycott of the census by the Congress.

17. The census figures of 1941 were notoriously affected by political motives. The census was taken in March, 1941. The Muslim League had already proclaimed the enormous importance to be attached to a numerical majority, by its Lahore Resolution of the 23rd of March, 1940. Mr. M.W.M. Yeats, C.I.E., I.C.S., Census Commissioner for India at page 9 of his Report admits: '1940-41 saw also the political influences on the census.' At page 23 of his Report he states: 'The increase is by no means uniform, although a greater figure than for the previous decades is practically universal. Rates are noticeably larger in the North than in the South and have two distinct peaks in the extreme West and North-West and in the East. In fact, we have in the Punjab and Eastern Bengal two swarming areas.' Apparently, therefore, there are good grounds for doubting that the census figures possess the accuracy which is claimed for them.

18. The variation percentage in the total population of the Punjab during the decennial periods beginning from 1901 gives point to the observations of the Census Commissioner set out in the preceding paragraph. The variation percentages are:—

...Historical Background of the Sikh Case

21. It will not be possible to appreciate the Sikh Case without knowing the past history of the Sikh-Muslim relations. Emperor Jehangir in his Memoirs, called the Tuzk-i-Jehangiri, writing about Guru Arjan, the Fifth Guru of the Sikhs, stated in 1606 A.D.:

'So many of the simple-minded Hindus, nay, many foolish Muslims too, had been fascinated by his ways and teachings. He was noised [sic] about as a religious and worldly leader. They called him Guru, and from all directions crowds of fools would come and express great devotion to him. This busy traffic had been carried on for three or four generations. For years the thought had been presenting itself to my mind that either I should put an end to this false traffic, or he should be brought into the fold of Islam.'

Emperor Jehangir further recorded: 'I fully knew of his heresies, and I ordered that he should be brought into my presence that his houses and children be made over to Murtza Khan, that his property be confiscated, and that he should be put to death with tortures, for State reasons.' This order was fully carried out, and Guru Arjan was placed in boiling cauldrons of water, and was made to sit on red hot iron sheets, and was then drowned in the River Ravi. Dera Sahib at Lahore, one of the more sacred temples of the Sikh nation, commemorates the Martyrdom of the Guru. Emperor Jehangir was determined to exterminate the Sikhs, and he threw into the fort prison of Gwalior, the Sixth Guru of the Sikhs, Guru Hargobind, for a period of twelve years. The famous Persian traveller, Mohsin Fani, a contemporary of Guru Hargobind, in his Travel
Notes, Dabistan-i-Mazahib, records that the Moghal Emperor ‘did not allow Guru Hargobind to eat salty food during his incarceration in the Gwalior prison.’ The Seventh and the Eighth Gurus of the Sikhs fared no better at the hands of Muslim Emperors, and Aurangzeb, the last of the Great Moghals, ordered the Ninth Guru of the Sikhs, the saintly Guru Teg Bahadur, to be beheaded at Delhi, again for ‘State reasons.’

James Brown in his History of the Sikhs, published in 1787, has observed: ‘This is most barbarous and outrageous of all the instances of cruelty exercised on the propagators of a new doctrine. Defenceless women and children have usually escaped even from religious fury.’ After the death of Aurangzeb, a period of almost half a century of ruthless persecution of the Sikhs follows in the Punjab under the direct orders of the Muslim Emperors.

Sayed Muhammad Latif, in The History of the Punjab records: ‘Abdul Samed Khan, (the Military Governor of Lahore) having humiliated the Sikhs and caused the destruction of their leader Banda, now took vigorous steps to destroy their power and to extirpate the race. A Royal edict was issued to put all who professed the religion of Nanak to the sword, and a money reward was offered for the head of every Sikh. The infuriated Muhammadans gave them no quarter, and wherever a Sikh was found, he was butchered without mercy. In order to give full effect to this Royal Mandate, Muhammadans and Hindus were strictly enjoined to clip their hair short. The Hindus were ordered to shave their heads, and any Hindu found with long beard or hair was immediately slain. The extreme measures of persecution spread terror and consternation throughout the whole Sikh nation.’ Again, according to Muhammad Latif, ‘the Governor Yahya Khan of Lahore issued a proclamation for a general massacre of all Sikhs, wherever they could be found. Death was to be the punishment of all persons who invoked the name of Guru Govind Singh, and a reward was offered for the heads of Sikhs. Thousands were put to death daily and their heads brought before the Military Governor of Lahore for reward.’ Again, writing about another Military Governor of Lahore, Mir Muin-ul-Mulk, alias Mir Mannu, Abdul Latif records in The History of the Punjab: ‘Firmly established in his authority, Mir Mannu considered the best mode of chastising the Sikhs. He then stationed detachments of troops in all parts infested by the Sikhs, with stringent orders to shave their heads and beards wherever they might be found. These measures being rigorously enforced, checked the progress of Sikh proselytism, and compelled the votaries of the Guru to conceal themselves in the mountains or jungles. Mir Mannu issued strict orders to the hill Chieftains to seize the Sikhs and send them in irons to Lahore. These orders were obeyed, and hundreds of Sikhs were brought daily to Lahore and butchered at the Horse Market, the Nakhas, now known as the Shahidganj, outside the Delhi Gate, in sight of multitudes of spectators. The young Mannu became an irreconcilable foe of the Sikhs, and was determined to extirpate the nation. ‘It was to meet this situation that the Sikh people rose in rebellion, and after four generations of hard struggle succeeded in establishing their supremacy in the Punjab.’

22. The well-known book The Confederacy of India, was published by the late Nawab Sir Muhammad Shah Nawaz of Mamdot in 1939. The author of the book at page 187 observes: ‘In the past there have been very grave political differences between the Muslims and the Sikhs. They revolted against the Moghal Government and the hostilities exchanged in those times form the respective traditions of the Sikhs and the Muslims in the Punjab. Then again during the period of the Sikh Rule in the North-West, the Sikhs showed religious intolerance towards the Muslims on account of which distrust of the Sikhs was born amongst them. These sad past relations are responsible for the antagonism which they show against each other at times.... Past political rivalries dominate their minds and they mutually seize upon the provocation caused by Jhatka and cow slaughter respectively to give vent to them.' The Muslim attitude always and since political power passed into their hands in the Punjab in recent times, their well planned policy, towards the Sikhs has been regulated by these historical considerations. The Muslim policy has all along been directed at breaking the moral backbone of the Sikhs. The planned and inhuman massacre of Sikh minority conclaves in the dominantly Muslim majority areas of Rawalpindi and Multan Divisions since March 1947 has been a natural and logical outcome of this policy. The Cabinet Mission had possibly a vague premonition of Rawalpindi and Multan happenings, when it frankly admitted that the division of the Punjab on a mere population basis would not afford an acceptable solution of the communal problem.

23. The reason for which partition of the country is sought is the solution of the communal problem. The Creed of the All India Muslim League since 1940 has been that democracy is not suited to India and for that reason the League has wanted the division of the country into India and Pakistan. The reason for it, according to the Muslim League, is that the Muslims constitute a separate nation and as such differ from all others inhabiting this country in culture, social life, outlook and religion; and they should, therefore, have a separate homeland in which they would be free. The inclusion of any considerable number of Sikhs in the North-Western Pakistan, particularly when they are concentrated on its Eastern Frontiers, is thus bound to interfere in and obstruct the free growth and development of the Muslims in Pakistan and defeat the very purpose for which Pakistan is sought to be created. If by reason of separate religion, and consequently separate culture, national life and outlook, a Muslim majority has a right to a separate homeland, a strong non-Muslim minority concerned [sic] on the Eastern Frontiers of Pakistan, cannot, in justice, be coerced to go into Pakistan....

The Sikh Homeland

25. As mentioned above, the claim of the Muslim League to Pakistan proceeds upon the assumption that the Muslim community, being a separate nation, must have its own National Home. That is the Creed of the Muslim League as embodied in Article 2 of the Creed of the League Constitution. This claim of the Muslim League came up for consideration before the Sapru Conciliation Committee in 1945. Paragraph 176 of the Constitutional Proposals of the Sapru Committee states: 'The Hindus claim the Punjab to be as much their homeland as of the Muslims. The Hindus have been there since the dawn of history. As for the Sikhs, if a community can lay special claim to the Punjab as its homeland, it is they. They were the last rulers of the Punjab and their most important shrines stretch from Sirhind on the one side to Panja Sahib on the other, with the Golden Temple in Amritsar in the centre of the Province. It is not only the homeland but the holy land of the Sikhs, to which they are attached by all the intimate bonds of religion, history and tradition. The Sikhs number a little less than six millions. About five millions are settled in the Punjab where lie all the Sikh States.'....

Economic Interests

27. The factor of economic interests has always been considered as one of the most important factors in the demarcation of boundaries. The Sikhs are mainly concentrated in the two central Divisions of the Punjab and the colony districts of Montgomery and Lyallpur. In this area the Sikhs have vital essential agricultural interests. In fact the agricultural economy of the Jullundur and Lahore Divisions of the Punjab and colony areas depends very largely upon the labour that the Sikhs have put in this area.
....It is clear that the Jat Sikh from the central districts of the Punjab has been very largely responsible for the building up of the colony areas of Lyallpur and Montgomery in the Punjab, which form the granary of a large part of India....

The Sikhs & the Indian Army

28. The part that the Sikhs have played in the defence of the country is well known. The Military strength of the Sikhs is derived mainly from the Jats of Majha or those of the Central Bari Doab and Malwa....With the partition of the Punjab the Eastern Punjab becomes the frontier Province of India and the Sikhs become literally the gate keepers of the Union of India. Long before the Announcement of the 3rd June, 1947, the Sikhs had declared their irrevocable opposition to the State of Pakistan. When under the Announcement of the 3rd of June, 1947, the non-Muslim legislators were required to record their vote for or against Pakistan the Sikh representatives en bloc from both parts of the Punjab recorded their vote in favour of the Constituent Assembly of India. That being so, any division of the Punjab which does not maintain the solidarity and integrity of the Sikh community in the Eastern Punjab will be highly prejudicial to the best interests of the community as well as the country....

Language

30. Language has always played a forceful and determining part in the political coherence of a people and establishment [sic] of the States. Language statistics have not been tabulated in the census of 1941....For the language statistics, therefore, we have to go back to the Census Report of 1931, compiled by Khan Ahmad Hassan Khan, Superintendent Census Operations, Punjab and Delhi, 1931. The Census Superintendent deals with the language question in Chapter X of his Report. At page 272 of the Report he observes:—

‘There is no doubt in my mind that many persons returned Urdu or Hindi as their mother tongue in place of Punjabi, and thus the figures of Hindustani have been unduly swollen at the expense of Punjabi.’ Table XV, Part II, Volume 17, of the Census of India, 1931, gives the linguistic figures for the Punjab. Figures for the Jullundur Division show that Punjabi was returned as the language of 3,684,755 persons out of the total population of 4,606,466 of this Division. The population of Kangra District in Jullundur Division was 801,312 at that census, and out of this population 13,137 persons returned Punjabi as their language. The language returns for Hoshiarpur, Jullundur, Ludhiana and Ferozepur districts show that out of a total population of 3,805,134 as many as 3,671,618 persons returned Punjabi as their mother tongue at the census of 1931. Again in Lahore Division, 5,463,825 persons returned Punjabi as their mother tongue out of a total population of 5,879,075. Obviously, Punjabi is the language of Hoshiarpur, Jullundur, Ferozepur and Ludhiana districts of the Jullundur Division, and Gurdaspur, Amritsar, Lahore, Sheikhupura, Gujranwala and Sialkot districts of the Lahore Division. In Rawalpindi and Multan Divisions we find that Punjabi was returned as the language of 2,498,016 persons out of a total population of 9,017,766. The language statistics further shows that the majority of the Punjabi speaking persons in these two divisions reside in Gujrat District, and colony districts of Shahpur, Montgomery, Lyallpur and Multan. According to Sir George Grierson, who has examined the question in The Linguistic Survey of India, the dividing line between the Lehnda language and Punjabi language passes through the districts of Gujrat, Gujranwala, Sheikhupura and Montgomery....
The linguistic requirements also necessitate that the Eastern Punjab must extend up to the bank of the river Chenab and include in it the whole of the Punjabi-speaking tract in the Rachna Doab of the Punjab.

The Sikh Colonists

31. As already shown the colonists of Lyallpur and Montgomery districts were mainly recruited from the Eastern Punjab, namely the districts of Ludhiana, Ambala, Jullundur and Amritsar. These colonists have their homes in their parent districts and have as well acquired land in the Lyallpur and Montgomery districts. The colonists from the Eastern districts of the Punjab have put up new villages which are named after the names of villages in the Eastern Punjab. In actual practice, these colonists spend part of the year in the colony areas and part of the year in their original homes. In the interests of efficient cultivation families are divided up, some members living in the colony area and others in their original homes. With the partition of the Punjab, in case the colony areas are not included in the Eastern Punjab, great complications including that of nationality in the same family are bound to arise. Two sons of the same father may come to belong to two different nationalities. This aspect of the question does not affect the Hindus or Muslims to any appreciable extent, as there are not colonists in the Eastern Punjab from the Western Zone. The colonists in the Lyallpur and Montgomery districts are very largely Sikh Jats of Ambala, Jullundur and Amritsar Districts of the Punjab. Sir Malcolm Darling at page 143 of The Punjab Peasant writes: ‘Lyallpur is the daughter of the Central Punjab as Shahpur is of the North and of the West, and its influence is felt accordingly. From Amritsar alone, over 100,000 have migrated to the Bar.’

Non-Muslim Population

32. The non-Muslim population of the Punjab, according to the census of 1941, is 43% of the total. The population in the Ambala and Jullundur Divisions and Amritsar District of the Lahore Division, hereinafter called the Eastern Part, is 40.6% of the total population whereas the area of this part of the Province is 35.6% and the canal irrigated area in this part is 22.1% of the total. It is obvious that any division of the Punjab on the basis of Muslim and non-Muslim majority districts in the Punjab would be unfair to the non-Muslim communities.

The Sikh Claim

51. An attempt has been made in the preceding paragraphs to set out some of the important considerations that must govern the demarcation of the two parts of the Punjab. In the House of Commons debate on the 15th of July, 1947, Mr. Richard Butler stressed the imperative necessity of so defining the boundary ‘that the maximum portion of the Sikhs should be included within one conglomerate whole.’ Mr. Arthur Henderson speaking on the same occasion is reported to have said that amongst ‘other factors’ the Boundary Commission ought to take into account the location of the Sikh religious shrines. The Sikhs claim the tracts mentioned below for the Eastern Punjab:

(i) Ambala Division;
(ii) Jullundur Division;
(iii) Lahore Division;
(iv) Lyallpur Division;
(v) Montgomery District and Khanewal, Vihari and Mailsi sub-districts of Multan Division.

8. Muslim League Memorandum to Punjab Boundary Commission

Extracts, undated (c. July 1947)

1. In carrying out its very responsible and delicate functions the Boundary Commission will no doubt regard itself bound by its terms of reference and the statement of His Majesty’s Government, dated the 3rd June, 1947, which is the authority under which the Commission has been set up. It will also keep in view the larger background which has necessitated the division of India and ultimately in consequence the partition of the Punjab.

2. The main territories comprised within the Province of the Punjab have over a very long period constituted not only a Province for administrative purposes but also a broadly homogeneous, cultural and linguistic area. It also forms a compact economic unit, the various parts of which are inter-dependent upon each other for their prosperity and, indeed, for the maintenance of even such standards of living as have been attained during the first half of this century.

3. The division of the Punjab, therefore, is a step which is fraught with the gravest consequences to the economy of the province as a whole and the welfare and prosperity and the prospects of progress and advancement of all sections of its peoples.

4. The partition of the province was resolved upon the [sic] His Majesty’s Government not because they themselves desired it or were not conscious of the gravity of the consequences likely to flow therefrom, but because political parties in India had arrived at a deadlock which made a division of India inevitable and His Majesty’s Government felt that in consequence a partition of the Punjab and Bengal could not be denied or avoided. Whatever the degree of political urgency which necessitated this division, the Commission in carrying out the duty of demarcation of boundaries laid upon it must take note of the particular features of the situation. Some of these are set out in the broadcast of His Excellency the Viceroy, made on the 3rd June, 1947, as a preface to the statement of His Majesty’s Government of the same date....

5. ...the partition of the Province has been resolved upon on account of the reluctance of the non-Muslims to consent to the continuation of such areas in which they are in a majority to form part of the Province in which the Muslims have an overall majority in the population. The non-Muslims desire that in the events that have happened, contiguous areas in which they form a majority of the population should be separated from the rest of the Province. His Excellency has explained that the demand on behalf of the Congress for the partition of certain Provinces was based upon the same arguments on which the demand of the Muslim League was based for the partition of India. The League demanded a partition of India on the basis of the separation of those provinces in which the Muslims were in a majority from the rest of India. No claim was made by the League for the allotment of areas to Pakistan on the basis of religious sanctity, historical associations, sentimental attachment, proprietary interests, cultural considerations, educational facilities or any other similar factor. In making its demand for partition and basing it on the single consideration of majorities in the populations of certain Provinces it confined itself to the democratic principle of a single human soul having a value which could not be estimated in terms of property or of any of the other factors set out above. In taking its stand upon this principle the Muslim League was conscious that it must reconcile itself to leaving out of Pakistan its great religious and historical monuments like the Juma Masjid, the Red Fort, the Qutab Minar, Tughlaqabad, the shrines of Hazrat Nizam-ud-Din Aulia and other great saints, the tombs of Humayun, and other great Muslim Emperors who reigned over the greater part of India before and after him and numerous other monuments which cluster in and around Delhi, the Taj Mahal, which by virtue of its splendour, its beauty and its pathos ranks not only as one of the great wonders of the world from the point of view of architectural proportion, perfection and magnificence but also operates as a powerful spiritual magnet giving tangible expression to many aspects of the secret yearnings of the human soul; the tomb of Akbar, the greatest secular ruler that the world has so far produced, at Sikandra, that glory of the art of mosaics on the left bank of the Jamna, i.e., the Tomb of Aitmad-ud-Daula; the imperial city of Fatehpur Sikri, the fort, palaces and mosques and many other monuments of religious and historical association in and around Agra; the similar monuments in and around Lucknow, the Shrine of Hazrat Moin-ud-Din at Ajmer around which cluster the tombs and mausoleums of a large number of Muslim saints; the mosque of Aurangzeb at Benares; the numerous religious monuments in Patna and at Bihar Sharif; the Muslim University at Aligarh and many other monuments, places of learning, sacred shrines and other institutions, which have throughout the centuries shone as jewels in and shed their lustre upon the pattern of the history of Muslims in India and with which the deepest sentiments of Muslim hearts and the highest aspirations of Muslim souls are indissolubly intertwined. Nor was the stand taken by the Muslim League affected by less sentimental and more material considerations of a nature upon which a good deal of insistence from the non-Muslim side has been noticed in the press ever since the question of partition of the Punjab has become one of the principal topics of discussion. Muslims own large and valuable blocks of property of various kinds in different parts of India noticeably in the shape of Taluqas in Oudh which are in themselves reminders and witnesses of the position that the Muslims for centuries occupied in the political history of India and yet the Muslims and the Muslim League representing them, adhered to the truth that men are infinitely more valuable than money and that human souls and the care of them are of infinitely greater importance than property and material possessions. Whatever the attitude of the League towards these factors and considerations, it is undeniable that the whole case of the League with regard to the measure to be adopted for the partition of India was based upon the factor of population, and as His Excellency stated that the same arguments were used for demanding the partition of certain provinces, the conclusion is inevitable that the non-Muslim case for the division of these provinces was also based upon the population factor alone. This is put beyond any shadow of doubt and, indeed, outside the pale of argument or controversy, by the statement of His Majesty’s Government dated the 3rd June, 1947, and the terms of reference of the Commission.

6. The function of the Boundary Commission described in this paragraph is to demarcate the boundaries of the two parts of the Punjab on the basis of ascertaining the contiguous majority areas of Muslims and non-Muslims and in demarcating the boundaries the Commission may take into account other factors and make local adjustment in the boundary so, however, that no considerable section of the population in a local area is transferred from a majority area to a minority area. This has been made more precise in the terms of reference of the Commission which run as follows:

'The Boundary Commission is instructed to demarcate the boundaries of the two parts of the Punjab on the basis of ascertaining the contiguous majority areas of Muslims and non-Muslims. In so doing, it will also take into account other factors.'

The obvious interpretation of which alone these terms are susceptible is that the Commission should proceed to demarcate the boundaries of the two parts of the Punjab and for this purpose should ascertain the contiguous majority areas of Muslims and non-Muslims. Once it is determined which are the contiguous majority areas of Muslims and non-Muslims it shall proceed to draw the boundary line between the two parts of the Province on that basis, but in doing so, that is to say, in demarcating the boundary line on this basis, it will also take into account other factors. This can only mean that if the boundary line based upon the division of the Province into contiguous majority areas of Muslims and non-Muslims should encounter some other relevant factor, the Commission may take it into account, and if the taking into account of such factor necessitates a local deviation of the boundary line so as to secure an equitable adjustment of such factor such local deviation shall be permissible. It is clear that the consideration of other factors and taking them into account in demarcating the boundary can only arise after the contiguous majority areas of Muslims and non-Muslims have been ascertained and a boundary line on the basis of this ascertainment has first been demarcated. Local adjustments in the boundary line may be made in deference to other factors which must be taken into account and must be equitably adjusted. Other factors, whatever character they may possess, cannot be taken into account in ascertaining the contiguous majority areas of Muslims and non-Muslims. Such ascertainment is the determination of a question of fact and the determination must be based upon the data available. It is true that the Commission must adopt some definition or test of contiguity, but in determining the definition of contiguity it can take into account only what contiguity does mean or should mean in the determination of boundaries between Provinces or parts of a Province. Other factors would have no relevancy at this stage. Once the definition of contiguity has been determined the ascertainment of contiguous majority areas of Muslims and non-Muslims becomes a question of pure fact, which should be capable of easy determination on the basis of figures of the 1941 Census. As has been submitted, other factors, whatever they may be, if relevant, have only to be taken into account in demarcating the boundary line which must be done on the basis of contiguous majority areas.

7. The Commission will be under the necessity of laying down some definition or measure for the purpose of determining contiguity. In one sense the whole of the Province is a contiguous majority area of Muslims. It is obvious that if a Province were to be taken as a unit, the whole of the Punjab and the whole of Bengal would be adjudged Muslim majority Provinces. Partition of these Provinces having, however, been decided upon, a smaller unit must be adopted as a measure for determining contiguity. The notional partition adopted a District as a unit, as it was the easiest and readiest measure available by which contiguity could roughly be determined. This was, however, not intended to be final. Had this been final, there would have been no need to set up Boundary Commissions for demarcation of actual boundaries, as the actual boundaries of districts are nowhere in doubt. In adopting a definition of contiguity or a measure or standard by reference to which contiguity is to be determined one paramount consideration will of necessity be borne in mind by the Commission. The statement of His Majesty's Government, as well as the terms of reference of the Commission, lay upon the Commission, the duty of demarcating the boundaries of the two parts of the Punjab. This means that the Commission should for the purpose of demarcating the boundary adopt a standard which should result in the drawing of what would amount to a boundary between two parts of the Province, each of which is expected to function separately as a Province. In other words, the boundary should be a workable and practicable boundary from the point of view of administration and should be capable of fulfilling the functions of a boundary between two neighbouring States. It should not be a crazy line running backwards and forwards over the areas of several districts and in and out of every village in those districts so as to result not in the separation of two parts of a Province which might each be constituted into a Province but, into a nightmare tapestry of a futurist design. It is inevitable, therefore, that the Commission must adopt some sort of administrative unit as a standard for this purpose. The district being ruled out, the only other administrative unit which could be adopted would be a Tehsil....
10. If these principles are accepted, it will be found that, subject to considerations arising out of other factors, the Pathankot Tehsil of the Gurdaspur District, would be detached from the West Punjab and included in East Punjab. In every other Tehsil of the Gurdaspur District, and in every Tehsil of the remaining sixteen districts at present included in West Punjab, the Muslims have an overall majority. The Ajnala Tehsil of the Amritsar District, which has a majority of Muslims in its population and is contiguous to the Lahore, Sialkot and Gurdaspur Districts, will be included in the West Punjab.

11. It will also be found that the Jullundur and Nakodar Tehsils of the Jullundur District, which are contiguous to each other and are in their turn contiguous to the Zira and Ferozepore Tehsils of the Ferozepore District, have like the last two mentioned Tehsils a majority of Muslims in the population.

12. There is a compact majority area of Muslims contiguous to the Ferozepore Tehsil running along the left bank of the River Sutlej through the Mukhtar and Fazilka Tehsils up to the border of the Bahawalpur State. This area also includes the Sulemani weir of the Sutlej Valley Project, the canals taking off from which furnish irrigation to the Montgomery and Multan Districts of Western Punjab and the Bahawalpur State. This area is also contiguous to the Montgomery District on the opposite bank of the Sutlej. Both sides of the river along this stretch are populated by the same Muslim tribe, viz. the Wattus.

13. Starting from a point between the Nakodar Tehsil of the Jullundur District and the Zira Tehsil of the Ferozepore District on the River Sutlej a compact Muslim majority area runs along both banks of the Sutlej up to and including the town of Ruper and ending on the boundary between the Punjab and Nalagarh State. This area is inhabited by homogeneous Muslim tribes.

14. At the opposite end of Jullundur Tehsil there is a contiguous compact majority area of Muslims in the Dasuya and Hoshiarpur Tehsils of the Hoshiarpur District, part of which runs along the river Beas opposite to the Batala and Gurdaspur Tehsils of the Gurdaspur District, and is thus contiguous both to the Jullundur Tehsil and to the Batala and Gurdaspur Tehsils.

15. Apart from the consideration, of other factors, which will presently be adverted to, the boundary line between West Punjab and East Punjab should, therefore, run as shown from point ‘A’ along line ‘B’, ‘C’, ‘D’, ‘F’, ‘G’, ‘H’, ‘I’, ‘J’ and ‘K’ up to the point ‘L’ marked in green on map I attached to this memorandum.

16. According to this demarcation, the Tehsils of Amritsar and Tarn Taran in the Amritsar District which have a non-Muslim majority in the population would be blocked by Muslim majority areas and would not be contiguous to East Punjab. The same would, however, be the case with the Ferozepore Jhirka and Nuh Tehsils of the Gurgaon District which have a large majority of Muslims in the population and which are contiguous to each other but not contiguous to the West Punjab. The Muslims must, therefore, reconcile themselves to these two Muslim majority Tehsils being left in East Punjab, while the non-Muslims must reconcile themselves to leaving Amritsar and Tarn Taran Tehsils of the Amritsar District in West Punjab.

18. It has been urged on behalf of the Sikh Community that several of their shrines are situated in various parts of West Punjab, though it is not yet known what precise argument is based upon that factor. Surely, it could not be contended that the whole area of the Province comprising the towns and villages where any of these shrines may be situated should be included in East Punjab. This would mean that West Punjab as far as the district of Campbellpur, which includes the town of Hasanabdhal where the Panja Sahib is situated should be included in East Punjab. This is not a factor which could under any circumstances be taken into account in demarcating the boundary line between East and West Punjab. There are Sikh shrines at Patna (the birth place of Guru Gobind Singh) and at Nandher (the last resting place of the remains of the same Guru) within the dominions of His Exalted Highness the Nizam and at several other places outside the Punjab with regard to which Sikh sentiment is presumably as strong as it is with regard to shrines situated in West Punjab, yet it has never been suggested that the towns and places where these shrines are situated should form part of or be in any manner attached to the Punjab. This applies with particular force to the shrine at Nandher which is within the dominions of the premier Muslim ruler in India. No complaint has at any time been made with regard to any prejudice that may have resulted to the Sikh community or any injury that may have been inflicted upon Sikh sentiment in consequence of the fact that the shrine at Nandher is situated within the dominions of His Exalted Highness the Nizam.

19. If, however, the question of shrines belonging to one community is a factor which must be taken into account in the demarcation of the boundary line the Muslims claim that all the districts of East Punjab should be included within West Punjab as they are dotted with tombs and shrines of Muslim saints and heroes who are held in great veneration by the Muslims and with mosques and monuments possessing great historical importance and significance to which Muslim sentiment and tradition are strongly attached. At many of these shrines fairs are held at various times of the year to which Muslims resort in large numbers. In several instances holidays are observed in local Government offices in honour of these saints. Muslim sentiment is not less deeply attached to these saints and their shrines and the mosques and other monuments than Sikh sentiment may be alleged to be attached to Sikh shrines in West Punjab.

20. A persistent campaign has been and is being carried on in the press that the partition of the Province should be based upon the proportionate amount of landed and other property and interests owned by the Muslims and non-Muslims. Here again the precise formula which may be derived from such considerations is not yet known and, therefore, cannot be dealt with in the memorandum, but it is perfectly obvious that having regard to the background of the whole problem and the terms of reference of the Commission no such consideration can be taken into account in demarcating the boundary line. In any event this factor was ruled out of consideration by His Excellency the Viceroy during his press conference on 4th June, 1947. His Excellency observed in this connection that ‘His Majesty’s Government could hardly be expected to subscribe to the thesis of landed property’ ...
it would be the height of irony to deprive Muslims of areas in which they constitute a majority of the population on the basis that the non-Muslims had in the past successfully carried out exploitation of the wealth and resources of the Muslims in that area. It is a fact of which the Commission would take judicial notice that the colony areas of the Shahpur, Lyallpur, Sheikhupura, Montgomery and Multan districts were all owned by Muslim tribes whose principal source of wealth lay in cattle and constituted their grazing lands. With the advent of canal irrigation in these areas the greater part of the land of these areas was declared to be Crown waste and was sold or granted to people from other districts of the Punjab. This was a feat of expropriation which has always constituted a serious grievance on the part of the expropriated Muslim owners. Many of the non-Muslims who purchased proprietary rights in these areas paid for them out of the resources which had been accumulated as a result of money lending operations, the nature of which may be gathered from administration reports and other relevant documents which dealt with the whole problem of the indebtedness of the peasantry in this Province towards the end of the last century. These disclosed so deplorable a state of affairs that Government was compelled to intervene and passed a restrictive piece of legislation known as the Punjab Alienation of Land Act, 1900. Even this failed to check the evil and the problem of the indebtedness of the peasant, particularly the Muslim peasant, continued to cause grave anxiety to the administration. More recent investigations made by Mr. Calvert and Sir Malcolm Darling disclosed that the problem was still an acute one. Only a few years ago as the result of this investigation, the Punjab Legislature was forced to put through several relief and remedial measures of legislation. In this state of affairs it would be heaping injustice upon injury to take into account the property factor in demarcating the boundary line.

26. There is no question of any kind of expropriation of either one community or the other in West Punjab. There is no proposal to interfere, with the full exercise of proprietary rights. It is not understood, therefore, on what basis it is sought to make ownership of property a factor in determining the boundary line between the two parts of the Province.

27. In this connection the Commission must be reminded that partition is not being forced either upon the Sikh community or upon the non-Muslims as a whole. The Sikhs and the Hindus have joined together in the demand for partition of the Province and as explained by His Excellency the Viceroy the basis of the demand is the factor of majority areas of non-Muslims in the Province. Having themselves demanded a partition of the Province the non-Muslims cannot further seek to prejudice the Muslims by dragging into the question of the determination of the boundary line factors that have no relevance thereto.

28. It must further be borne in mind that East Punjab has decided to form part of what is described in the Indian Independence Act as India, that is to say, it will become a unit of India, which in the matter of population, resources, compactness, coast-line and every factor which may be expected to contribute towards the security, welfare and prosperity of a state would occupy a situation of far greater advantage than would be the case with either or both sections of Pakistan. From this point of view also it would be highly unfair to press in aid irrelevant factors in order to augment the boundaries of East Punjab, that is to say, of India, at the expense of Pakistan. If any considerations of a general nature were relevant to this question the overriding consideration should be that the much larger and much more advantageously situated State i.e., India should not gain any advantage at the expense of the much smaller and much more precariously situated State i.e., Pakistan.
29. A peculiar feature of the position adopted by the Sikh community is that for all purposes of partition it has chosen to merge itself into the Hindu community, from which the conclusion must follow that its interests are identical with those of the Hindu community and yet it continues to press for special consideration. If partition had been forced upon the Sikhs and they had found themselves in the position of a helpless minority, which had perforce to submit to partition against its will, there might have been something to be said in favour of its interests being specially safeguarded in carrying out the partition. But the Sikh community have themselves been foremost in urging the partition of the Punjab and have for this purpose secured the support of and made common cause with the Hindus. They must, therefore, be treated for the purpose of all questions arising in connection with partition as being part of one community composed of both Hindus and Sikhs.

30. The boundary line suggested in the earlier part of this memorandum is based upon percentages of Muslims and non-Muslims in the various Tehsils of the Province. It is understood that the Christian organisations in the Province are anxious that as large a part as possible of the Christian population of the Province should be included in West Punjab. They view with apprehension the prospect of any considerable numbers of their people being included in East Punjab. This means that so far as the factor of population is concerned, the Muslim claim is supported by the Christian community. The net effect of this on the population figures would be as follows:

<table>

| Ferozepore| 55.2 p.c.| 1.9 p.c.   | 57.1 p.c.

31. In one respect, however, this consideration would make a practical difference to the boundary line. In the case of the Dasuya Tehsil of the Hoshiarpur District, the total population is 273,246 out of which 132,105 are Muslims. This gives a percentage of 48.4. The number of Christians in this Tehsil is 4,729. The total number of Muslims and Christians thus is 136,834 which is just above one half, i.e., just over 50 per cent of the population. On this calculation the whole of the Dasuya Tehsil must be included in West Punjab.

32. In brief the Muslim League case is that the Commission should proceed to demarcate the boundary between East and West Punjab in strict conformity with its terms of reference uninfluenced by any extraneous considerations based upon factors that have no relevance to the terms of reference. The terms of reference require the boundary to be based upon the ascertainment of contiguous majority areas of Muslims and non-Muslims. Any ‘other factors’ that may be relevant can only be taken into account if they involve no more than a local adjustment of the boundary line and do not lead to a contravention of the principle that no large area in which one community has a majority is to be compelled to live against its will under a Government in which another community has a majority. In other words, in attempting an adjustment of ‘other factors’, the Commission must safeguard itself against falling into the error of contravening the over-riding directive contained in its terms of reference and against inflicting an injury upon or doing an injustice to a community any portion of whose majority area would as the result of the adjustment of the boundary line be transferred to the majority area of the other community.
33. These are the considerations on the basis of which we invite the Commission to demarcate the boundaries of East and West Punjab, but we place our trust in the righteousness of our cause and the Benevolence and Providence of Almighty God, who is the Master of the East as well as of the West and humbly pray to Him and beseech Him so to direct the hearts of the Members of the Commission and of all those who will take part in its proceedings and deliberations as to inspire them with the single purpose of achieving that which shall afford the maximum of ultimate satisfaction and happiness to all His Creatures in this Province as well as outside of it and shall serve to usher in an era of peace and goodwill among different sections and to cause His Holy Name and His Glory to be exalted above everything else. Amen.

9. Demand of Ahmadiyyas for Inclusion of Their Headquarters in West Punjab

Memorandum submitted by the Ahmadiyya community to the Punjab Boundary Commission, c. July 1947

MEMORANDUM ON BEHALF OF THE AHMADIYYA COMMUNITY, WITH HEADQUARTERS AT QADIAN, TEHSIL BATALA, DISTRICT GURDASPUR AND BRANCHES ALL OVER THE WORLD

Main Features

Being the Headquarters of the Ahmadiyya Community, Qadian should be placed in the Western Punjab, because:

1. It is the living centre of the world-wide Ahmadiyya Movement in Islam.
2. Its sanctity is greater than that of any other shrine in India.
3. People flock to it from all over the world seeking religious instruction and missionary training.
4. Most of the basic Ahmadiyya literature written by the Holy Founder of the Ahmadiyya Movement is in Urdu which is the language of Pakistan and which is being discarded in Hindustan.
5. 74% of the branches of the Ahmadiyya Community lie in Pakistan.
6. Most of the financial assets of the Community lie in Pakistan.
7. The District in which Qadian lies has a clear Muslim majority and is contiguous to Western districts.
8. The services of the Community in Peace and War are second to none. Its interests, therefore, should not be sacrificed to those of any other community.

The Headquarters of the Ahmadiyya Community, an important religious section of Muslims having branches all over the world, is situated in the district of Gurdaspur. In the tentative division between West and East Punjab this district is situated on the frontier between the two parts of the province. In the controversy over the boundary line this district is being claimed by both parties. For safeguarding their legitimate rights, therefore, the Ahmadiyya Community deem it necessary to submit their views before the Boundary Commission.

Before, however, we give an account of the special circumstances in which our community (vis-a-vis their Headquarters in the Gurdaspur district) is placed, we wish to put before the Commission some basic points, bearing on the demands which we propose to submit hereunder.

We believe that the function of this Commission is to divide areas on the basis of Communal populations of the Punjab. It is not among its functions to attempt a political or economic division of the province. If that were so, then among its terms of reference we should have had a special emphasis laid on natural boundaries and economic resources; or we should have had a stress laid on the administrative division of the province. But neither in the tentative division which has already been made, nor in the reference made to the Commission, is there any mention of any primary factor other than the factor of population. In the tentative division, the unit of division is the district. Districts in which Muslims are in a majority have been put in the Western Punjab, while districts in which non-Muslims are in a majority have been put in the Eastern Punjab. If administrative factors had been in view, the district of Amritsar would have gone to Western Punjab. For in the tentative division Amritsar is the only district west of the river Beas which has been placed in the East Punjab Section in spite of the fact that in administrative divisions natural boundaries such as rivers and hills must have a preponderating importance. Similarly, if economic factors had been in view, the district of Kangra would have gone to Western Punjab. The Railway connects Kangra with Western Punjab. Its trade also is connected with Western Punjab. The fact that both Amritsar and Kangra districts have been placed in East Punjab shows that in the division of Punjab the factor of population is the major factor in view.

There is no doubt that the Commission’s Terms of Reference contain the words ‘other factors’. But these ‘other factors’ clearly occupy a place subordinate to the factor of population. They do not constitute a second or a parallel factor, but only a factor subordinate to the first. These ‘other factors’ can become relevant only when Muslim and non-Muslim populations are evenly balanced, or when the contiguity of the population of one community is interrupted by the emergence of a small area of population of another community, when the interruption in the contiguity of one by the presence of another is so slight that the interruption cannot be regarded as a serious one.

If ‘other factors’ were intended as being equal in importance to the factor of population, then they should have been kept in view even in the tentative division of the province. Instead, they have been included only in the reference to the Commission, and that also as a factor subordinate to the factor of population. This shows that ‘other factors’ pertain only to small matters which may have to be taken into account while shaping the boundary line, it being understood that the question of population will always have a priority of consideration. The Commission is concerned primarily with the question of population and its contiguity. To ignore this question or for that matter to give any other factor equal importance is beyond the powers and scope of the Commission....

After submitting these general considerations we turn to the question in which the Ahmadiyya Community is specially interested, the question which relates to the special circumstances attaching to Qadian and areas around, which should be taken into consideration while settling the boundary line between Eastern and Western Punjab. We beg to submit the following points in this connection:—

1. Qadian is situated in Thana Batala, Tehsil Batala, District Gurdaspur. We submit that the claim that the district of Gurdaspur should form part of Western Punjab is so clear and well founded as to make a discussion of it virtually outside the scope of the Boundary Commission. There is no doubt that at the Press Conference the Viceroy said that in this district Muslims had a majority only of 0.8% and that therefore parts of Gurdaspur would necessarily have non-Muslim majorities. We submit, however, that the Viceroy is not correctly informed on the point. In the 1941 Census Report, the Muslim population of the District of Gurdaspur is 51.14% of the total. This gives it an excess of 2.8% and not 0.8% over the rest.

Muslims have this excess of 2.8% over non-Muslims, only if we assume that Scheduled Castes and Indian Christians are in political alliance with Hindus and Sikhs. We should remember, however, that the Christian leader Mr. S.P. Singha (who belongs to Batala in the Gurdaspur District) has declared unambiguously that his community will prefer to live in Pakistan. The Central Christian Association has since expressed confidence in Mr. Singha’s leadership.
Christians in the district of Gurdaspur are 4.46%. If we add the Christian to Muslim population, then those of the Gurdaspur District who wish to go into Pakistan rise to a percentage of 55.60. This difference is indeed very considerable. In the H.M.G. Plan, the district of Jullundur has been included in Eastern Punjab even though Jullundur has a non-Muslim majority only of 54.74%. Is it not strange that the District of Gurdaspur having a majority of 55.60% in favour of Pakistan should be considered to be a disputed area? If it is said that the views of Christians cannot alter the decision to bracket Christians with Hindus and Sikhs, then we should submit that nothing can alter facts. If Christians declare that they wish to go into Pakistan, no one can say that Christians do not wish to go into Pakistan. The Government can no doubt say that they do not care where Christians wish to go, that in determining the boundary between the two Dominions, no regard will be paid to the views of Christians; but it does not stand to reason that the Government should treat the pro-Pakistan attitude of the Christian community as anti-Pakistan. Even if we exclude Christians the Muslim population of Gurdaspur still has an excess of 2.28%. This clear excess of the Muslim Population should undoubtedly have the importance which is its due.

2. We must also remember that if the Muslim majority in the district of Gurdaspur is slight it is because one of its tehsils viz. Pathankot, has a Muslim population of only 38.88%. If we look at the other three tehsils, we find that the tehsil Batala has 55.07% Muslims, tehsil Gurdaspur 52.15% and tehsil Shakargarh 53.14% (Census Report, 1941). According to these figures, it is evident that even if we bracket Batala tehsil Christians with Hindus and Sikhs, Muslims in tehsil Batala have an excess of 10.14%, in tehsil Gurdaspur an excess of 4.30%, in tehsil Shakargarh an excess of 6.28%. If the number of Christians is added to the number of Muslims then those who wish to live in Pakistan in tehsil Batala have a majority of 60.53%, the percentage of those wishing to go into Hindustan is reduced to 39.47. In tehsil Gurdaspur, the collective Muslim-Christian population acquires a majority of 59.24% and the rest become reduced to a minority of 40.76%. In tehsil Shakargarh, Muslim-Christian population rises to 54.84% and the rest drop to 45.16%. If we keep these figures in view and leave Pathankot out of consideration for the present, it becomes obvious that there can be no question of separating any part of the remainder of Gurdaspur and joining it on to Eastern Punjab. Taking the three tehsils together the Muslim-Christian population has a majority of 53%. It follows that according to the Viceroy’s declaration none of the three tehsils (Batala, Gurdaspur and Shakargarh) can be separated from Western Punjab and joined on to Eastern Punjab. It would be utterly unjust and unconstitutional to do so.... his spiritual disciple and Successor Ahmad, the Holy Founder of the Ahmadiyya Movement to serve the cause of Islam. The Founder of the Ahmadiyya Movement who declared Qadian to be the Headquarters of the Movement is according to Ahmadis the Great Reformer of the latter days fulfilling in his person the prophecy regarding the second advent of Jesus Christ. He is also the spiritual disciple and God-appointed Khalifa of the Holy Prophet of Islam and fulfills in his person the prophecies of all previous prophets of the world relating to the latter days. No other Indian shrine therefore can compare with the sanctity of Qadian. Other communities are of course at present greater in number but the principle on which they base the sanctity of their shrines is entirely different from that on which the sanctity of Ahmadiyya Headquarters is based. This is why no other Community is drawn to its centre as the Ahmadiyya Community is drawn to Qadian....

10. From certain declarations of responsible British authorities, it appears that the words 'other factors' have been used to benefit the Sikhs specially, who have rendered great services for the British Government. We admit that the Admadiyya Community is very small in numbers compared with the Sikhs, but in respect of services unselfishly rendered by the Community in World Wars it is in no way behind the Sikhs taking into consideration the proportional strength of the two communities. Qadian with its population of about 14 thousand supplied more than 1400 recruits to the Army which fought on behalf of the Allied Nations in World War II. The Ahmadiyya Community is still a very small community, yet more than two hundred Ahmadis attained the King's Commission (See Appendix No. III) and in this respect the community undoubtedly occupies the first place among all Indian Communities taking into consideration the proportional strength of the communities concerned....

Next we wish to take up the question that in addition to the right of Gurdaspur District being placed in Western Punjab on the basis of the majority of its population, there are other factors as well which support the same view.

1. For one thing the principle of natural boundaries has been ignored to place Amritsar in Eastern Punjab. There can be only one reason on the basis of which this has been done, and that is consideration for the wishes of the majority of population of the District. But this has given to Eastern Punjab an opportunity to push its military organisation beyond the river Beas—i.e. into an area which rightfully belongs to Western Punjab. In case Gurdaspur too or portions of it, are handed over to Eastern Punjab, in spite of the fact that the majority of the population is Muslim it would not only involve a sacrifice of the wishes of the majority, but also secure the flank of the spring-board of Eastern Punjab, viz. Amritsar, against Western Punjab. All this would be tantamount to Western Punjab being delivered to Eastern Punjab bound hand and foot.

Of course both Hindustan and Pakistan are proclaiming their intention to live like peaceful neighbours; but there can be no guarantee against future complications between the two. The possibility of war between them should not, therefore, be ignored or overlooked. If Gurdaspur District, or any portion of it, be apportioned to Eastern Punjab, then, in the case of hostilities between the two, Amritsar would be a big centre of military activity; and the tip of its territory being about 18 miles from the capital of Western Punjab, it would be admirably placed for exerting pressure against Western Punjab. For the proper defence of Lahore from this point of view and of Western Punjab of which this town is the capital, it is necessary that Gurdaspur District should be placed in Western Punjab. Should Gurdaspur belong to Western Punjab, portions of Eastern Punjab lying this side of the Beas would not be left free to attack Western Punjab any time they liked. But the situation would change radically from the military point of view if Eastern Punjab should also hold Gurdaspur District in addition to Amritsar. In that case not only would Eastern Punjab be able to maintain strong garrisons almost at the throat of Lahore, and therefore of the whole of Western Punjab, but also have elbow room for them in the adjoining territory of Gurdaspur district; and this would constitute a military threat to Western Punjab which would be well able to paralyse its entire defensive system. Therefore, Gurdaspur being a Muslim majority district (and this majority is desirous of being included in Western Punjab) Western Punjab has a right to insist upon getting this territory which is essential for its defensive system against an attack from the east.

It is an accepted canon of justice in the settlement of boundary disputes that where a disputed territory happens to be so situated as to have strategic value in the defensive plan of one claimant to its possession on the one hand, and a similar importance for offensive purposes in the case of the other community claiming it, ‘other factors’ being equal, the claim of the community is given preference in the case of which it has a value for defensive purposes.

2. Among the Gurdaspur Muslims, the majority are Jats, of which tribe the greater portion lives in the Western districts like Sialkot, Sheikhupura, Lyallpur and Lahore. Gurdaspur Muslims therefore should not be cut off from areas inhabited by the larger body of the tribe to which these Muslims belong. Jats are no doubt to be found in the Ambala Division as well, but, for the greater part, they are Hindu Jats; and they have moreover, no connection with the Jats of the Gurdaspur district. Thus, to cut off Gurdaspur from Western Punjab would raise insurmountable difficulties in the social life of the Gurdaspur Muslims.

3. The dialect spoken in Gurdaspur closely resembles the one spoken in Lahore, Sialkot and adjoining parts of Sheikhupura and Gujranwala districts; while it does not at all resemble the one spoken in the eastern districts. As the larger number of people using this dialect would be living in Western Punjab, the Gurdaspur Muslims too should be apportioned to the same side.

At the end we wish to say something in regard to the advantages and disadvantages of natural boundaries. For, whereas they constitute natural barriers and can be easily held, in many cases experience has also shown them to be a constant source of awkward disputes. For instance, when a river forms the boundary line between two countries, every time it changes its course, or floods the countryside, disputes arise as to the ownership of strips of territory affected. Great difficulty is also experienced when the question of erecting local dams arises. Fishing and navigation rights are some of the other factors which often breed long drawn out feuds. We therefore recommend that if and where a river is decided to be the boundary line then, instead of being partitioned lengthwise, it should be apportioned breadthwise, for this would minimise the chances of disputes of this kind.

Finally, we pray to God Almighty that He be pleased to guide the members of the Boundary Commission to a decision that should satisfy all sections of the population of the areas concerned; and that He should also be pleased to guide all those, including ourselves who are trying to help the Commission by placing their views before it. God grant that the aim of all of us in this crisis be to win the approbation of God, to establish peace, and to serve mankind. AMEN

10. The Boundary Award and the Sikh Situation

Extract from a letter from Major Short to Stafford Cripps, 3 August 1947
T.O.P., Vol. XII, p. 492

17 Tughlak Road, New Delhi,

Things here go on apace. By God’s grace they will prosper.

But J. has, I think, made his first major blunder—looking for the G. Gship. This has certainly complicated the Sikh situation. Now he, and he alone, can draw them in: and then only by offering extravagantly generous terms. Of course that miracle may yet happen. That failing, the nature of the award will determine events. If it meets the least the Sikhs think fair, peace will reign—and prosper. If it does not, in ratio to the extent that it offends Sikh sentiment, peace will be a calm before a growing guerilla situation. For, unless it flagrantly affronts Sikh feeling, I doubt an immediate really dangerous reaction except in one quarter. The armed forces massed to keep peace on the border. There, and not in the Sikh country, is, I feel, the powder magazine. I am v. much alone in this view. But I seen [sic] no reason yet to depart from it. But come what may, the most delicate factor is the obstinate popular belief that Radcliffe will award as H.E. dictates. And this is a truly popular belief. Whatever any Indian may say to H.E., I living here, with Indians, am all too aware that nothing will shake their conviction that this is so. Which means—well, you will draw all the conclusions.

However, this is a temporary assessment. And necessarily based on instinct more than anything. I must not [?] move about to test my antennae. So maybe my next letter may say something different.

11. Report of Mr. Justice M.C. Mahajan to the Punjab Boundary Commission

Extracts, 3 August 1947

A.—REPORT OF NON-MUSLIM MEMBER

(a) Report of Mr. Justice Mehr Chand Mahajan

This Commission has been constituted to divide a Province which is really incapable of a satisfactory division. Those who made the present day Punjab never imagined that a situation would arise when it would have to be split into two parts. But however difficult the task may be, it has to be done. It is certain that however honestly and conscientiously the border is demarcated, for the time being it will not give satisfaction to any of the communities concerned, though it may eventually lead to the contentment and happiness of them all and the individuals residing in East Punjab and West Punjab.

The major parties to this dispute have claimed the maximum area that they could possibly do for their respective Provinces on any interpretation of the terms of reference most favourable to them. These claims are supported by several associations having a common interest with them and by a number of individuals who have submitted memoranda to the Commission. The two States of Bahawalpur and Bikaner have also supported the claim of the community to which the rulers of these states belong, though on grounds affecting their own States. It has been contented [sic] by these States that if the headworks of the Ferozepore canal which irrigates their respective States are included in the Province of the community to which the rulers belong, it would safeguard their rights in that work.

The claims put forward can be stated in the form of the following issues:

(1) Whether on the terms of reference, the Muslims are entitled to claim for Western Punjab, besides the 17 districts (minus a part of the Pathankot Tehsil) allotted to it in the notional division, the following areas:

(a) Ajnala Tehsil of the Amritsar district.
(b) Majitha Zail of the Amritsar Tehsil of the same district.
(c) Portions of Fazilka and Muktsar Tehsils of the Ferozepore district.
(d) Zira and Ferozepore Tehsils of the Ferozepore district (excepting the Nathana Sub-Tehsil which is not claimed).
(e) Jullundur and Nakodar Tehsils of the Jullundur district.
(f) Parts of Dasuya and Hoshiarpur Tehsils of the Hoshiarpur district.
(g) The area along both banks of the Sutlej upto and including the town of Rupar and ending on the boundary between the Punjab and Nalagarh State, including the town of Ludhiana. (Parts of various tehsils of different districts including the district of Ambala are also claimed?)
(2) Whether any reasonable grounds exist for splitting up the Pathankot Tehsil which is admittedly a non-Muslim area?

(3) Whether the Amritsar and Tarn Taran Tehsils of the Amritsar district constitute a non-Muslim pocket in a Muslim majority area and, therefore, should be included in the Province of West Punjab?

(Under these issues the point to decide would be whether 19½ districts should go to West Punjab and East Punjab should consist of 9½ districts, and if so, whether on this basis a just and equitable boundary line can be drawn between two sovereign States?)

(4) Whether on the terms of reference non-Muslims are entitled to claim for East Punjab the following areas over and above the 12 districts allotted to it in the notional division and whether on this basis a just and equitable frontier can be delimited separating the two Provinces:

(a) The whole of the Gurdaspur district.
(b) Lahore district including the city of Lahore.
(c) Lyallpur district.
(d) Montgomery district.
(e) Sheikhpura district.
(f) Sialkot district.
(g) Gujranwala district.
(h) Parts of Multan district?

This claim means the addition of seven districts to East Punjab, reducing the West Punjab to 10 districts.

(5) If neither of these claims can be held valid, partially or wholly, what is the proper boundary line between East Punjab and West Punjab, keeping in view the terms of reference of the Commission?

Before deciding these points it is necessary to apprehend clearly the scope of the reference. It seems to me that those responsible for the draft of the reference left the matter of demarcating the boundary entirely to the discretion of the Commission, subject of course to the direction that the primary consideration on which the Commission is to proceed is to ascertain the contiguous majority areas of Muslims and non-Muslims. In other words, the Commission was instructed to keep in the forefront the communal population consideration, but it was also told in clear terms that in demarcating the boundary it may take into account other factors. In other words, its discretion in making the delimitation was not necessarily limited to majority population consideration. The question what those other factors would be was left open, obviously for the reason that these factors are bound to vary according to the facts disclosed in regard to each area. The view that I have expressed about the terms of the reference finds support in the speech made by the Under Secretary of State for India in the House of Commons on the 14th of July, 1947. He said that 'the primary basis of demarcation must be majority of population. In certain cases there may be factors which justify departure from that principle'. In other words, a departure from the population factor may be justified if other factors justify it. This interpretation has been vehemently contested by the learned counsel for the Muslim League. I shall deal with his contention and give my reasons for not accepting it in a later portion of this opinion....

It is obvious from the above quotations that what has to be demarcated by the Boundary Commission is predominantly Muslim areas and that a bare majority of Muslims or non-Muslims in any area may well be ignored in view of other factors, in order to avoid a boundary line which may run in a zigzag shape like the claws of a crab or which may be indefensible on strategical grounds. It has been very aptly pointed out in the Muslim League Memoranda that ‘the boundary should be a workable and practicable boundary from the points of view of administration and should be capable of fulfilling the functions of a boundary between two neighbouring States. It should not be a crazy line running backwards and forwards over the areas of several districts and in and out of every village in those districts so as to result not in the separation of two parts of a Province which might each be constituted into a Province, but into a nightmare tapestry of a futurist’s design’. The Congress and the Sikhs fully subscribed to this view.

Having stated my views about the scope of the reference, I now proceed to examine the contentions raised by Sir Mohammad Zafarullah Khan and give my reasons for not agreeing with them.

In a forceful argument the learned counsel urged that partition must be made on the population factor alone and that the scope of the words ‘in doing so the Commission will also take into account other factors’ was limited to taking into account local factors only, but that such factors cannot override the primary principle of division, namely the population basis. It was stressed that the only principle on which the partition was agreed upon by the parties and was accepted by His Majesty’s Government was based on the principle of non-coercion enunciated by the Congress, namely that large areas in which there was a substantial preponderant population of one community could not be coerced to live in an area in which the other community had a majority. It was said that the economic factor urged by the counsel for the Congress and for the Sikhs overlooked this point and was contrary to the interpretation that His Excellency the Viceroy placed on the wording of paragraph 9 of His Majesty’s statement of the 3rd of June, 1947, which statement in substance employed the same phraseology as was contained in the terms of reference. Reference was made to the words used by His Excellency in the broadcast of the 3rd of June, 1947, in which mention was made of the principle that there was no question of coercing any large areas in which one community had a majority to live against their will under a Government in which another community had a majority and that this principle could not justify taking into account of economic, agricultural, industrial and commercial considerations or the factor of maintaining the integrity of the Sikhs. It was emphasized that if this attitude had been taken by the Congress or the Sikhs, the Muslim League would never have agreed and that if these factors were to be taken into consideration, the whole of the Punjab might well have been allotted to the Indian Dominion. Next, reference was made to the paragraph dealing with the partition of the Punjab. It was demanded by the Congress at the instance of Sikh community. It was said in the resolution that the partition of India necessitates the division of the Punjab into two Provinces so that the predominantly Muslim part be separated from the predominantly non-Muslim part. In other words, the population factor was put in the forefront and any area in which one community has predominance over the other could not be kept in one or the other Dominion as the case may be. It was observed that in the broadcast His Excellency reviewed the Sikh position and noticed that they were equally divided as a result of their own request and that he was unable in spite of his best efforts to solve this problem. In view of these observations the point was made that if the phrase other factors contained in paragraph 9 of His Majesty’s statement of the 3rd of June, 1947, was intended to include the factor of the integrity of the Sikhs then His Excellency need not have been shocked or surprised and he could have easily said that the matter can be solved by the Boundary Commission, and His Excellency need not have expressed any regret. In my opinion these contentions do not in any way affect the interpretation that I have placed on the terms of reference. My reasons are these:

(1) The population factor undoubtedly is the main factor in the division, but I cannot agree that in no circumstances can it be overridden. Suppose, for instance, that the boundary on this basis cannot be laid satisfactorily in view of strategical grounds or because of the situation of the headworks of a canal, this factor shall have to be overridden. The Muslim League themselves have suggested that in the Pathankot Tahsil the majority factor be ignored owing to the situation of the headworks of the canal. We are told that before the Bengal Boundary Commission the Muslim League is claiming predominantly non-Muslim areas on the ground of economic factors.

(2) Whether any other factors, including the factor of the integrity of the Sikhs, will override the population factor, will, in any case, depend on the circumstances of each area. Suppose, for instance, the population factor is not predominant but there is a meagre majority of one community over the other. Such a case cannot fall within the resolution of the Congress which was sponsored by them at the instance of the Sikhs and which was agreed to by the Muslim League. The resolution clearly said ‘any areas in which there is predominance of one community over the other’. Those words cannot include cases of meagre or bare majorities in the population. In those cases other factors may override the population factor. A nominal majority was not the majority contemplated in any of the statements that have been placed on the record. The words used there are ‘substantial areas’ and ‘substantial population’ or ‘predominant population’. The only question to decide is whether any large areas are left in which one community has a predominant majority over the other under the rule of the other community.

(3) His Excellency the Viceroy never gave any exhaustive definition of the phrase ‘other factors’ in any of his statements or speeches.

(4) Whatever His Excellency said about the Sikhs was said before the terms of reference were finally settled and strictly speaking it is not relevant when the Commission is called upon to interpret the terms. That interpretation is not binding on the Commission, on the same line of the argument that was adopted by the learned counsel that the interpretation of the terms of reference after they had been accepted by the Under Secretary of State at the committee stage of the India Bill in the House of Commons was not relevant. In my opinion, strictly speaking, neither the interpretation of the Under Secretary nor the interpretation of His Excellency the Viceroy about the terms of reference is relevant. It is, however, open for the members of the Commission to place their own interpretation and then say that their interpretation is the same as was put by either of these high personages.

(5) If the population factor was really the sole basis of division, I do not see what necessity there was of employing the phrase ‘in doing so the Commission will take into account other factors’. It seems to me that both parties who were represented in the committee to settle the terms of reference kept a mental reservation. The Muslim League did not at that stage say that other factors should be defined and it should be clearly stated that these can in no case override the population factor but that they are only intended to be contained in the terms of reference for settling locally the boundary. Had they raised that point, possibly the Congress or the Sikhs may not have agreed. Similarly the Congress and the Sikhs did not give any definition of the words ‘other factors’ by clearly including in them the case of the integrity of the Sikh community or other economic factors now mentioned by them, as obviously the League would not have agreed to their inclusion in the terms of reference. The result was that phraseology was employed which both could later on interpret in the manner most convenient to their contentions.

(6) Construed according to ordinary canons of interpretation, the phraseology in the reference cannot lead to the meaning that in demarcating the boundary the Commission cannot take into account other factors and that it is bound to give effect to the population factor and can never ignore it. The reference only says, ‘ascertain the populations and then proceed to demarcate the boundary after that ascertainment has been done, by taking into account other factors as well.’ I cannot read in this phraseology that other factors mean merely local and subsidiary factors....

(8) In considering the line of demarcation it must be borne in mind that no ethnic and linguistic differences really divided the people of the Punjab from one another. The factor of religion must, in the light of history in Europe, be regarded as an unfortunate incident in all probability of a temporary nature. With the spread of modern ideas, this factor will recede into the background and other factors economic and ideologic will tend more and more to supersede it as governing factors in the life of the state. If this is so, and there seems no good reason to doubt it, far greater importance must be attached to ‘other factors’ in the final definition of the boundary, even though for the present the population basis, based on the religious factor, must be given predominance.

In demarcating the boundary line it has to be prominently borne in mind that the partition is being done on the basis of communal and religious considerations. The Western Punjab is to be a part of the Pakistan Dominion, a Muslim State, and for the time being there is no love lost between the Muslims on the one side and the Sikhs and Hindus on the other. The historical background shows antagonism between them and the recent events in the various Provinces of India, and particularly in the Punjab, have demonstrated that they are willing to fly at one another like wild beasts and, in some cases, even in worse manner than those beasts. If any doubt existed on the point, the lengthy address of the counsel for the League on this point amply proves it. It is immaterial which party was blameworthy in the matter. Any boundary line between Provinces which have to be carved out for such parties cannot ignore this state of feelings between the two communities. The line must be one which avoids frequent and daily border incidents resulting in communal fights and reduces the contact between the two to a minimum. It should again be one which is capable of being defended on either side conveniently and at the least possible cost. In other words the line should not be such as would lead to the construction of numerous cantonments and army stations. Any line which projects from one area into another with a slight gain to one side or the other cannot be justified. Its length should be reduced to the minimum between the two parts and, if possible, it should follow a natural boundary either of a river or of a hill or some other natural configuration....

Having regard to the principles enunciated in the above quotations the question is what other factors can be properly considered by the Commission in the present instance. I am of the opinion that the Commission will have to take into consideration historical associations of the various communities residing in different tracts, economic life of these people and their economic stability, the geographical situation of the various tracts, the factor of the lines of communication, markets, etc., and the extent of their economic interests in the lands of the different tracts and, most important of all, strategical considerations. Where ethnological consideration is indefinite and inconclusive, these other factors, if predominant, will override it. In the peculiar position of the Province of the Punjab, the position of the Sikh community is a very important factor. It is not at all a moot point and is not seriously disputed even in the Muslim League memoranda that the Sikhs are an important community in the Province and have special interests here. That the Central Punjab is their homeland is a matter which has been admitted in all historical documents written during the last hundred years. That their main occupation is agriculture and military service, again, is not a matter which requires any discussion. It is plain that by the notional division their population has been split in almost equal halves in the two sovereign States of India and Pakistan. According to this division, about 21 lacs of Sikhs are in the Eastern Punjab and about 16 lacs in the Western Punjab. Any boundary to be satisfactory, should at least be such as does not keep this population on either side of this line equally divided and, if possible, their desire to be consolidated as much as possible in the Eastern Punjab should be kept in view in marking out the boundary. In my opinion, it is in the interests of peace and good government of both the parts that the split in the community is reduced to the minimum. They will then be able to safeguard their religion and culture and will develop as a community in one Province. I do not think it is seriously disputed even by the Muslim League that administrative convenience, geographical situation, the integrity of the canal system and economic considerations are factors for consideration by the Boundary Commission, and that, so far as possible, the boundary should be such as avoids inter-statal and daily skirmishes and that it should be one which does not economically jeopardize the life of those residing in one part or the other and contributes to the economic stability of both the Provinces.

I have already pointed out the instance of the Upper Bari Doab Canal in which the League themselves have overridden the population factor. I fully sympathise with the Sikh demand for a homeland in the Central Punjab, if it can be found for them within the terms of the reference. The districts of Gurdaspur, Amritsar and Lahore have been described by several writers as the ‘home districts’ of the Sikhs. They are mostly found in the two divisions of Jullundur, Lahore and owing to the colony policy of the Government a substantial number of them are found in the colony areas. A community may claim a homeland even if its population is small as compared to the other people residing in certain regions. If I may say, their claim for a homeland can only be raised as regards the tract of Majha which is said to be their principal home with their religious metropolis in Amritsar. Of course the Sikh claim is that the whole tract from Beas to Chenab is the original Sikh land or the country of Baba Nanak and the cradle of their faith and the nursery of chivalry of the followers of the Gurus. This feature is a special feature of this Province and cannot be ignored in the delimitation of the boundary. It has been pertinent to point out that the Sikh soldiers and other non-Muslim soldiers who had been promised grant of land owing to war services, will not be able to get what they have been promised if the Province of the Eastern Punjab gets no colony lands, it being admitted that the whole of the unallotted area in the colony lands which is considerably over 18 lacs of acres is situated at present in the Province of the West Punjab.
It may also be observed that the area of the Province to be divided according to survey figures is 99,000 square miles though according to revenue papers it is 91,000 odd square miles. In partitioning this huge area into two parts, in my opinion, it will not be proper to take into consideration small areas of 50 or 100 square miles on the strict theory of contiguity of Muslim or non-Muslim population. Similarly nominal contiguities will have to be ignored and unless the areas are substantially contiguous to one another, they will have to be left out of consideration. If these small matters are taken into consideration, it will lead to the creation of numerous wedges and tongues in the area of either zone and this will be repugnant to all the principles on which a boundary between two sovereign States has to be demarcated.

Before proceeding to examine each item of the claim made by the major parties, I would like to point out that on a fair and just view of the whole matter, the dispute between the contestants should have been narrowed down to the central districts of the Punjab. The two divisions of Ambala and Jullundur in the east have admittedly a preponderant non-Muslim majority. In both these divisions it is over 65 per cent of the total population. One of these tracts is situated between the rivers Jumna and the Sutlej and the other between the Sutlej and the Beas. The population of each tract is more or less homogeneous. Beyond the Sutlej the language is different and social customs and habits are different. In the Doab between the Sutlej and the Beas, the people residing in the districts in that Doab are knit up together by all kinds of ties. Their social life is the same; their economic life is knit together; their markets are common; the communications are intermixed and in all manners they are the same people. The non-Muslims’ interest in the commercial, economic and industrial life of these tracts as well as in the agricultural life is predominant, and, therefore, they are predominantly non-Muslim areas. Similarly, the two divisions in the west, Rawalpindi and Multan, should have been entirely left out of the contest. In those two divisions the Muslim population is predominant and the population majority factor cannot be overridden by other considerations, though the non-Muslims have considerable economic interests in those areas both commercially and industrially and from the agricultural point of view. But as the dispute is raised even as regards parts of these divisions, the matter will have to be decided....

The boundary line suggested by me fully supports the fundamental idea underlying this division. The total population of the Province 28,418,819, out of which 16,217,242 are Muslims, is divided into three blocks:—(i) a block of 99 lacs of Muslims goes in West Punjab, (ii) a block of 93 lacs of non-Muslims goes in the East Punjab, and (iii) a block of 92 lacs of population is split up into two parts, 29 lacs non-Muslims going in West and 63 lacs Muslims going in East. As Muslims are in a majority in the whole Province, this result to a certain extent is bound to follow. The total population of the west will be 12,800,000, while the area assigned to it will be much larger in ratio to the population....

For the reasons given above I am of the opinion that the only frontier between the sovereign State of India and the sovereign State of Pakistan is the frontier indicated by me. Though, as already stated, I am quite positive that the line indicated by me will, for the time being, give no satisfaction to the contending parties, but I have a feeling that this line, if adopted, would eventually contribute to the happiness and contentment of the respective communities residing in the two different parts demarcated by this boundary.

Mehr Chand Mahajan

The 3rd August, 1947.
12. Report of Mr. Justice Teja Singh to the Punjab Boundary Commission

Extracts, 4 August 1947

(a) Report of Mr. Justice Teja Singh.

...Different motives underlay the demand of the Muslims for the vivisection of India and that of the Sikhs for the division of the Punjab into two parts. The Muslim League depended solely upon the fact that they formed the majority of the population of the Provinces which they desired to be made into an independent State. The Sikhs, on the other hand, not being in majority in any district of the Punjab demanded that the part of it in which the bulk of them lived and which they claimed to be their homeland, be separated from the rest of the Province so that they might escape the communal rule of the Muslims. They knew that unlike the Muslims they could not have a State of their own but they preferred to live in that part of the Punjab which would join the Indian Union rather than Pakistan. They never relied upon their numerical strength, but stressed that because of certain factors they occupied a special position in the Province and were consequently entitled to a special consideration on that account. These factors are inter alia—

1. that they were rulers of the Province immediately before it was annexed by the British Indian Empire;
2. that the Central Punjab extending from the boundary of the Ambala Division right up to Chenab was their homeland;
3. that the most important of their sacred Gurdwaras were situated in this tract;
4. that they owned and tilled the bulk of the land in this part of the Province and paid the largest amount of land revenue; and
5. that they had largely contributed in money as well as in labour in the development of the colony area, which was the main source of the wealth of the Province, and they occupied bulk of the land in that area.

They demanded that their solidarity and integrity should be preserved. His Majesty’s Government appreciated the attitude taken up by the Sikhs in principle and hence appointed this Commission to demarcate the boundaries of the two parts in which the province is to be divided after taking into account the population factor as well as other factors.

In formulating the terms of reference in the manner they did His Majesty’s Government did nothing unusual or extraordinary. History bears testimony to the fact that whenever countries were divided and boundaries were demarcated a large number of factors, such as ethnological, geographical, economic, strategic and linguistic were taken into consideration. My learned brother Mr. Justice Mehr Chand Mahajan has referred to a number of authorities and precedents on this point and it is not necessary for me to recapitulate them. The nature of factors to be considered must naturally vary with the circumstances and requirements of each case. What factors are relevant in the present case it is for us to decide. All that I wish to emphasize at this stage is that in view of the fact that the partition of the Punjab has been taken in hand at the desire of the Sikhs and because of their refusal to live in a purely Muslim state the factors of the first rate importance that demand our attention in this case are the position of the Sikhs in the Province and the effect that the demarcation of boundaries is going to have upon their solidarity. The total population of the Sikhs in the British Punjab according to the census figures of 1941 is 3,757,401. Out of this 1,683,855 live in the seventeen districts, which according to the notional division form the Western Punjab, and 2,073,546 in the Eastern Punjab.
This means that if the notional division is adhered to, and the boundaries are demarcated according to it about 17 lacs, i.e., a million and above seven hundred thousand of Sikhs would be left stranded in the Western Punjab. Of these 1,368,962 belong to the districts of Gurdaspur, Lahore, Gujranwala, Sheikhupura, Lyallpur and Montgomery which will be the border districts just on the frontier of the two States that are to be sovereign States. To perpetuate this state of affairs would very materially weaken the position of the Sikhs, inasmuch as it would make them politically impotent in both the parts and would be highly unjust to them....

We are all aware that unlike the Muslims and the Hindus, the Sikhs are confined to the Punjab where they were born and flourished and which is their homeland in the literal sense.
If any Hindu faces any difficulty in one part of India he can move to another part. The same is the case with the Mussalman. But as far as the Sikhs are concerned whatever might happen to them they cannot leave the Punjab. Accordingly, if the partition of the Punjab into two parts is to do the least injustice to the Sikhs, it is imperative that it should be carried out in such a manner and the boundary of the two parts should be so demarcated that the solidarity of the Sikhs should be maintained and as few of them as possible should be left in the Western Punjab.

The contention that boundaries should be demarcated merely on population basis runs counter to the very reasons for which partition of the Punjab has been conceded. It is mentioned in paragraph 9 of the Statement that the Commission is to make a detailed investigation of boundary question. Had the intention been to demarcate the boundaries merely on population basis no detailed investigation by a Commission was necessary and the words that the Commission will also take into account other factors would be simply redundant. I am inclined to think that in that case the whole thing would have been left over to a surveyor and it was not necessary to appoint a Commission at all, much less a Commission consisting of five persons possessing considerable judicial experience. Learned counsel for the Muslim League referred us to the Press Conference held by His Excellency on the 4th June, and he urged that if the solidarity and integrity of the Sikh community and the inclusion of the Sikh shrines in the Eastern Punjab were the factors to be taken into account by the Commission in demarcation of boundaries this would have been clearly stated by His Excellency but he did not do anything of the kind. Now, a perusal of the statement made by His Excellency in the Press Conference and the questions put to, and the answers given by him in that Conference go to show that he did not take it upon himself to elucidate what factors the Commission would take into account in addition to the population. He left the whole matter to the Commission, and said nothing from which it can be inferred that the solidarity of the Sikh community and the situation of their shrines were not included among the other factors. It is true that he observed that when the resolution of the Congress demanding the partition of the Punjab was brought to his notice he sent for a map with the population of the Sikhs marked and he was astounded to find that the plan which they had produced would divide the Sikhs into almost equal halves and he had not been able to find any solution to this difficulty. But he also added that he hoped that the leaders of the respective communities would appoint a committee to draw up the terms of reference of the Boundary Commission which should have representatives of the interested parties on it. It is admitted that the terms of reference as given in His Majesty's Order appointing the Boundary Commission were approved by the parties and since the terms lay down that the Commission is instructed to demarcate the boundaries not merely on the basis of ascertaining contiguous majority areas but also by taking into account other factors, it follows that all points urged by the Sikh community in support of their special position have to be considered. If the intention was that they were not to be taken into account this should have been made clear either in the terms of reference or in the Press Conference. The words are ‘other factors’. They include all factors relevant to the question, and it cannot be urged with any show of reason that the necessity of preserving the solidarity and integrity of the Sikh community and the situation of their shrines are not relevant.... It is a pity that the terms are rather vague and the phrase ‘other factors’ has not been defined, but it appears to me that it was designedly left vague so that the Commission after hearing the principal parties might decide what factors other than population it would take into account. I also venture to think that it is not open to the Commission to reject any factor put forward before it unless it is totally irrelevant and has no bearing upon the demarcation of boundaries. It is interesting to note that the Ahmadiya community who supported the stand taken by the Muslim League and to which community belongs the learned counsel (Sir Muhammad Zafarullah Khan) who argued the Muslim League case before us stressed the necessity of preserving the solidarity of that community as one of the factors, though at the same time it urged that no other factor excepting the population should be taken into account. It may further be added that while arguing the case for the Bahawalpur State which has also submitted a memorandum to the Commission and urging that the boundaries of the two parts of the Punjab be so demarcated as to safeguard the rights of the State in the waters of Sutlej, Sir Mohammad Zafarullah Khan solely relied upon factors other than those of population....

Of the other points urged before us in this connection mention need be made of only one, namely, that if the partition of the Punjab results in any kind of injustice to the Sikhs they must put up with it, because the Punjab is being divided at their instance and not at the instance of the Muslims. If a clear view of all that has happened be taken the argument would be found wholly devoid of force. It is correct that Sikhs insisted upon the division of the Punjab, but they adopted this attitude only when the British Government conceded the demand of the Muslims that India be divided into two sovereign States. It is common knowledge that despite the fact that their numbers are very small the Sikhs all along supported the position taken up by the Congress that there should be no vivisection of India and the country should be kept intact with a Central Government in charge of vital departments such as Defence, Communications, etc. The Muslims did not agree to this and insisted that India should be divided and a separate sovereign State consisting of the Provinces in which they were in majority should be carved out. The Government, though at first opposed to the Muslim demand, ultimately gave in and conceded the principle underlying the creation of a Muslim State. It was then that the Sikhs realizing that if the whole Punjab formed part of the Pakistan they would be doomed, inasmuch as they would be wholly at the mercy and under the heels of a communal Government of the Muslims, of which they had sufficient experience, started agitating for the division of the Punjab. It is, therefore, wrong to lay the responsibility for the partition of the Punjab upon the shoulders of the Sikhs. Division of the Punjab is a corollary to the division of India and if there is any community responsible for this it is the Muslims. Furthermore, I cannot understand why the division of the Punjab should necessarily be carried out in such a manner that it must split the Sikh community in almost two equal parts when it can be avoided, and in view of our terms of reference that factors other than population basis must be taken into account we are competent and even expected to avoid it.
As regards the Sikh shrines the argument put forward on behalf of the Muslim League is that if the situation of shrines of communities be regarded as a factor for demarcation of boundaries the Muslims can lay claim to the whole of India because their religious places and shrines are spread throughout the length and breadth of the land. I am afraid the Muslim League has either not cared to understand the sacred character of the Sikh Gurdwaras or it has deliberately ignored it with a view to place them on the same footing as their religious places situated in different parts of India. In ordinary parlance, the term ‘Gurdwara’ means any place used by the Sikhs for worship. But the Gurdwaras, the situation of which is sought to be used as a factor for demarcation of boundaries, are those places of worship which were either founded by the ten Gurus or were established long ago to commemorate particular incidents that happened during their lives and with which they were connected. It may be pointed out that though the founder of Sikhism was the first Guru (Guru Nanak) and it was the tenth Guru who gave birth to the Khalsa, the Sikhs make no distinction between them and the other eight Gurus, and the cardinal principle of Sikhism is that the same spirit worked in all of them, that is to say, each of the subsequent nine Gurus was the incarnation of the first Guru, and accordingly they occupy the same position in the eyes of the Sikhs. Now, to the Sikhs the ten Gurus are what Christ is to Christians, Hazrat Mohammad is to Muslims, and the principal gods who are believed to be incarnations of Vishnu are to the Hindus. For this reason, the Gurdwaras that were founded by the Gurus themselves or which commemorate incidents connected with them are a class by themselves. It is a mistake to put them on the same footing as the religious places founded by or associated with saints or other religious men howsoever prominent or respected they might be. There are hundreds of Gurdwaras that were established by the Sikh saints or which were built in the memory of Sikh martyrs, but none of them enjoys the sacred character that is reserved for the Gurdwaras of the class mentioned above, and the only shrines of the Muslims that in respect of sacredness and importance can compare with the Gurdwaras of that class are the shrines that stand in Mecca and Madina. There is a not a single shrine of the Muslims in India that was founded by their prophet or which was built to commemorate any incident in his life, for the simple reason that he lived, worked for his whole life and died in Arabia. Then it should be remembered that it is not merely because of the situation of these shrines that the Sikhs claim the inclusion of certain districts in the Eastern Punjab, but they maintain that there are many other factors that support their case, the most important of them being that these districts are contiguous to the districts which are without doubt non-Muslim majority areas, and the total non-Muslim population of these districts taken along with that of the contiguous districts is more than that of the Muslims. This explains the reason why the Sikhs have laid no claim to the districts of Gujarat, Rawalpindi and Attock in spite of the fact that in the first two districts are situated Gurdwaras commemorating the visits of the sixth Guru and in the third district is situated the Panja Sahib, the well-known Gurdwara constructed at the place where Guru Nanak spent some time when he went there to visit a Muslim saint of the name of Wali Kandhari and at which is preserved a mark of a palm made by him on a slab of stone. None of these districts is contiguous to the non-Muslim majority areas and the Sikhs cannot very well lay any claim to it. The learned counsel for the Muslim League waxed eloquent over the situation of monumental buildings and places of art and historical importance built by various Muslim kings at different places in India. None of them can be regarded as a shrine in the sense in which Gurdwaras of the kind with which we are dealing now are, because in spite of the fact that some of them are mosques, a mosque even though built by a powerful and famous
The number of such Sikh Gurdwaras is fairly large but the most important of them are situated in the districts of Sheikhupura, Gujranwala, Gurdaspur, Lahore and Amritsar. The Janam Asthan Gurdwara at Nankana Sahib in the district of Sheikhupura commemorates the birth-place of Guru Nanak, the first Guru. Guru Nanak, as already stated, is the founder of Sikhism, and as regards sacred character this Gurdwara enjoys a unique place among the Sikhs. It is considered holy of holies. Roundabout that Gurdwara and within the area of Nankana Sahib there are many other Gurdwaras built to immortalize several incidents that happened during Guru Nanak’s early life. All these Gurdwaras have vast landed estates attached to them, the biggest estate being that of the Gurdwara Janam Asthan and around these estates have settled a large number of Sikhs....

In laying emphasis upon the solidarity of the Sikhs and the location of their sacred shrines I should not be taken to mean that if the boundaries of the two parts are to be demarcated on the population basis the non-Muslims have a weak case. This aspect of the matter has been exhaustively dealt with by Mr. Justice Mehr Chand Mahajan and I do not propose to cover the same ground, because I entirely agree with the conclusions that he has reached. I will, however, add a few words but before I do so I would like to emphasise two points: one is that the word ‘area’ used in the terms of reference should not be narrowly construed and, secondly, that it should not be lost sight of that the mere fact that an area happens to be a majority area of a particular community would justify its inclusion within the part of the Province in which that community is in majority, unless it is also shown to be contiguous. The relevant words of the terms of reference are ‘on the basis of ascertaining the contiguous majority areas of Muslims and non-Muslims’....

...I would draw the north-western boundary of the Eastern Punjab along the river Chenab from where it enters the Punjab, go right up to Khanki and from there turn to the right bank of the lower Chenab Canal upto Nanwana, then follow the bank of the Rakh branch upto the place where it enters the Lyallpur District, go along the present boundary between the Districts of Sheikhupura and Lyallpur right up to the point where Deg Nala joins the Ravi river, then follow the Ravi river and the present boundaries between Lyallpur and Montgomery Districts, turn to Channu, then following first the present Western boundary of Montgomery District and then up the banks of the river Sutlej and the present southern boundary of Montgomery District come to Sulemanki where meet the districts of Ferozepur and Montgomery and Bahawalpur State. This will leave a part of Gujranwala District and some part of Sheikhupura District in which the Muslims are in majority to the west and would at the same time bring Nankana Sahib along with the whole of the tract surrounding it, which is a part of the Shahidi Bar mentioned above, in the eastern Punjab. I have not calculated the figures but I believe that it would raise the number of the Sikhs in the Eastern Punjab to about 31 lacs out of the total population of above 37 lacs in the whole of the British Punjab....

Before concluding I wish to mention one other fact the leaders of the Muslim community who are in a position to speak on behalf of the future Government of Pakistan and the various Provinces that are to constitute that state have given assurance that the minorities will be given every protection and their religious rights, culture, customs, etc. will be safeguarded. I have no reason to think that these gentleman are not sincere and I hope that they will make every effort to translate their words into action and they would succeed in this. At the same time I cannot very well ignore what has happened only recently and what is happening even now. The mentality of an average Muslim towards his non-Muslim compatriot has undergone a change and this with the background of the events narrated by me above has created a genuine feeling of insecurity among the non-Muslims in the parts of the country which are to form the Pakistan. The result is that a large number of non-Muslims, rich and poor, have deserted their homes and have migrated towards the East. One cannot describe the hardships to which the refugees—men, women and children—with practically nothing to live upon, have to suffer, but instinct for life is so strong that they have all borne it with resignation. This exodus continues unabated and will surely increase after the 15th August when the Punjab will have been permanently divided as a result of the boundaries to be demarcated by this Commission. It is our bounden duty to take notice of this fact and try our best to alleviate the consequences that must result there from. This aspect of the matter was discussed before us in the course of arguments. The only answer that the learned counsel for the Muslim League had to it was that there might be a similar exodus of the Muslim population from the Eastern Punjab to the West. I have no hesitation in saying that this apprehension is unfounded, first because not only past history but even what has happened since March last has demonstrated that the non-Muslims in the Punjab are either by nature reluctant to indulge in doings of the kind that were witnessed in the districts of Rawalpindi, etc. or they are incapable of doing so. We were referred to Bihar, but it is a far cry from Bihar to the Punjab and in no districts in the Punjab where the Sikhs and Hindus are in majority have the Muslims been molested. It is for this reason that the Muslims are living peacefully in their homes and they will continue to do so in spite of what might happen in the Muslim Province. Accordingly, while demarcating boundaries we must include sufficient parts of the country in the Eastern Punjab wherein the non-Muslims of the Western Punjab might come and settle down, but according to the notional division the area of the eastern Punjab is not even proportionate to its present population, the ratios being as follows:

<thead>
<tr>
<th></th>
<th>Population</th>
<th>Area</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td>41%</td>
<td>35.6%</td>
</tr>
</tbody>

It may also be noted that apart from high density of population, with which the eastern Punjab is suffering, there is also scarcity of food and the conditions must grow worse to the detriment of the entire population if no provision is made for more space....

As regards the Christians, Anglo-Indians and depressed classes Mr. Justice Mehr Chand Mahajan has dealt with them and I have nothing to add to what he has said on the point except that they are all non-Muslims and according to our terms of reference the areas inhabited by them must be considered non-Muslim areas for purposes of allocation of boundaries.

13. Report of Mr. Justice Din Muhammad to the Punjab Boundary Commission

Extracts, 5 August 1947

B—REPORT OF MUSLIM MEMBERS

(a) Report of Mr. Justice Din Muhammad

...For the Punjab the Boundary Commission is instructed to demarcate the boundaries of the two parts of the Punjab on the basis of ascertaining the contiguous majority areas of Muslims and non-Muslims. In doing so it will also take into account other factors.

....The principal task of the Boundary Commission, therefore, is to ascertain the contiguous majority areas of Muslims and non-Muslims.

Turning now to the main problem, we find that so far as the Districts Attock, Gujrat, Jhelum, Mianwali, Rawalpindi, Shahpur, Dera Ghazi Khan, Jhang, Muzaffargarh and the bulk of Multan are concerned, the Indian National Congress has laid no claim to them: nor has the Muslim League challenged the right of non-Muslims to hold the Districts of Rohtak, Hissar, Karnal, Gurgaon, Simla and Kangra together with some parts of Ambala, Ludhiana, Ferozepur, Jullundur, Hoshiarpur and Gurdaspur. The dispute on behalf of non-Muslims, therefore, is confined to the Districts of Gurdaspur, Lahore, Gujranwala, Sialkot, Sheikhupura, Lyallpur and Montgomery, and on behalf of Muslims to the Districts of Amritsar, Ludhiana, Ferozepur, Jullundur, Ambala and Hoshiarpur.

Now even a cursory glance at the population figures reveals that the Districts of Lahore, Gujranwala, Sialkot, Sheikhupura, Lyallpur, Montgomery and Multan can in no circumstances either in whole or in part be taken out of the category of Muslim majority areas, and that the District of Gurdaspur too must remain in West Punjab, even if the non-Muslims have a majority in the Pathankot Tehsil....

It is true that under the terms of reference the Commission is instructed to take into account other factors but before such factors are defined and discussed it will be necessary first to determine in the light of the terms of reference their nature in general, their relative importance and the occasion when they are to be taken into account. As stated above, under the terms of reference the main function of the Commission is to demarcate the boundaries of the two parts of the Punjab on the basis of ascertaining the contiguous majority areas of Muslims and non-Muslims and this can only be done on the basis of population and on no other basis. After, however, such areas have been ascertained on that basis and a line of demarcation is actually to be drawn, factors other than the principal factor of population are also to be taken into account. Such factors cannot, therefore, in the very nature of things convert a Muslim majority area into a non-Muslim majority area and vice versa but may induce the Commission to place an area in spite of the majority of one community in the zone of the other. The nature of those factors would, therefore, be only such as may somehow or other relate to the demarcation of the boundaries and not such as has no connection whatever with this process. Their importance too is not to be exaggerated. They are merely to be taken into account which evidently means that we are not necessarily to be carried away by them. If a factor is pleaded, we must consider it, discuss both its pros and cons in our minds and then determine whether in view of its emergence the boundary line which on the basis of population should have been drawn in one direction was to be deviated there from and drawn somewhere else. No higher claim can be made on behalf of other factors, nor can they on any account be allowed to override the principal factor of population except to the extent indicated above.

Counsel for the Indian National Congress however argues that other factors do not occupy a subsidiary position but are no less important than the factor of population. In support of his assertion counsel urges first that the boundaries are to be demarcated not between two Provinces of one State but two Sovereign States and secondly that if the work had been so simple, to use his words a Commission of ‘weight and importance’ should not have been appointed. He also refers in this connection to the broadcast of His Excellency the Viceroy where he affirmed that the boundaries to be demarcated by the Commission ‘will almost certainly not be identical with those already laid down’ and that the exact degree in which the Sikhs will be split up will be determined by the Boundary Commission. These arguments are not in my view sound. So far as the remarks of His Excellency the Viceroy are concerned, they merely emphasize the fact that the notional division is not unalterable if a detailed investigation into the figures of population suggests a different course and it will be seen that its alteration on that basis has been claimed by both sides. As regards the rest of the arguments, suffice it to say at this stage, that had the intention of His Majesty’s Government been such as is stressed by counsel, the terms of reference would have been formulated differently. Matters extraneous to these terms, matters which cannot even remotely be covered by them are therefore obviously excluded from consideration.

I do not, however, mean that no factor other than that of population is to be considered at all by this Commission. In drawing notional boundaries questions of defence, administrative convenience, control of customs, etc., may arise and the Commission may have ‘to cut out corners’ or ‘flatten out pockets’ with a view to avoiding a rugged zigzag boundary line which may otherwise result on the basis of population alone. In doing this mutual adjustments will be necessary between the two Sovereign States, and some majority areas of one community may thus happen to be placed along with those of the other.

Faced with the obvious difficulty of meeting the Muslim case on the score of population, the Indian National Congress has chosen to throw serious doubts on the correctness of the census figures not only of 1941 but also those of 1911, 1921 and 1931. The Census Superintendents no doubt have in their reports dwelt on the tendency of the various communities inhabiting this Province to swell their numbers in view of the important constitutional changes anticipated by them, but in the first place proper steps were taken by the Superintendents themselves to foil these attempts and secondly in this respect too the Hindus and Sikhs being more educated more shrewd and more influential both on account of wealth and high official position scored over poor resourceless Muslims and this fact is amply established from the confidential records placed at our disposal....

Be that as it may, in order to calculate population with a view to ascertaining the majority of Muslims and non-Muslims we shall have to depend on some figures and there being no other means available to make an authentic estimate of our own, the figures officially collected in 1941 shall be the sole guide in this respect.

Having thus disposed of the question of population which inevitably entitles the Muslims to all the areas claimed on their behalf, I would now proceed to examine the other factors stressed by the Indian National Congress. The foremost among these is described by the Congress as ‘the solidarity of the Sikhs and the protection of their cultural and religious life.’
Boundary Commissions

I need not, however, expatiate further on this matter as the Sikh case is being separately dealt with by my learned brother Munir J. Suffice it to say that the Sikh claim is most ridiculous, most unjustifiable and most unreasoned.

The second factor dealt with by the Indian National Congress is what is described in the memorandum as ‘considerations of strategy and defence’. I am prepared to concede at once that in demarcating boundaries between two Sovereign States such considerations cannot altogether be ignored. But here too I may emphasize that under the cloak of strategy and defence substantial areas of one community cannot be assigned to the zone of the other. These are the days of automatic rockets and atom bombs and who knows what weapons far more destructive than even these can be devised by human ingenuity and human labour. The Indian National Congress has stated that a suitable and natural boundary line would be one of the large rivers of the Punjab and suggested in this connection that ‘a boundary line drawn along the Chenab or at any rate for the greater part along that river will have the advantage of providing a suitable defensive line both to the Indian Union and the Pakistan Government.’ Sir Mohamad Zafrullah Khan has on the advice of a British expert placed a map before us explaining what from the point of view of strategy and defence should be the boundary line between the two Sovereign States and has taken pains to elucidate that taking all the pros and cons of the matter, the most protective and the most effective boundary line will be the one chalked out in the strategic map (Map No. 5) submitted by the Muslim League. Mr. Setalvad tried to meet the argument advanced by Sir Mohammad but in my view he signally failed to rebut the case made out against him. This boundary if adopted will remove all complications relating to Railway and the Canal system.

The third factor dealt with is what is called economic security. It is urged that a division solely on the basis of contiguous Muslim and non-Muslim majority areas will leave the eastern part of the Province absolutely insecure in the matter of food and clothing and in this connection reference has been made to the total production of wheat, rice and cotton in West Punjab as against the production of these commodities in East Punjab. It is true that the figures given there are not far wrong but that does not necessarily mean that East Punjab does on that account become so economically paralysed as not to be able to pull on at all. In the first place, East Punjab does not stand alone. It is a part of India which is undoubtedly far more extensive and far more productive than the whole dominion of Pakistan taken together. Secondly, as would appear from a recent resolution passed by the Partition Council of the Punjab, East Punjab also abounds in some commodities in which West Punjab is deficient and shall have to come to its rescue to that extent. It is impossible to imagine any country which may be self-sufficient in all those articles which are necessary to keep the soul and life of the communities together and it is clear that on such grounds West Punjab cannot be robbed of any of its fertile districts. The partition of the Punjab is not taking place with the object of leaving the Muslim poor as a mouse nor for making the non-Muslims as rich as Croesus and if once this fact is appreciated arguments advanced on the basis of these facts and figures carry no conviction at all....

The last matter dealt with by the Congress is headed ‘Movement of Population consequent on Partition.’ It is observed that ‘having regard to the circumstances which have brought about the partition of the Punjab a considerable section of the non-Muslim population, which will be left in the Western Punjab of the Province will in order to safeguard its personal property migrate from the western part of [sic] the eastern part.’ Under the notional division the total population of the Sikhs and Caste Hindus combined in West Punjab is 37 lacs and of the Muslims in East Punjab is 38 lacs odd. Moreover, their population in the rest of India runs into several crores. They are feeling equally apprehensive of the Sikhs and Hindus and if the question of migration of population from one State to the other ever rises, West Punjab will have to accommodate far more people than East Punjab. Further under the plan put forward by Hindus and Sikhs as many as 96 lacs of Muslims will be placed in a hostile territory and the truncated West Punjab that will remain will be expected to accommodate at least 150 per cent of its total population. A greater absurdity than this can never be conceived.:

The miserable plight of the Muslims and the reasons behind their insistence on division could not be expressed in better, clearer and more forcible terms and it is apparent that even the whole memorandum of the Indian National Congress has been drafted with the mentality exposed by Mr. Casey. There is the same insistence on wealth, on mills, on workshops, on houses, on taxes and such like things. Their philosophy is akin to that of a robber who first deprives his unfortunate victim of the bulk of his property and then claims the rest on the strength of his possessing the bulk. And it is clear that such arguments cannot be allowed to prevail. The Province of the Punjab was once before partitioned by the British Government and five districts in which the Muslims were overwhelmingly in majority carved out into a new Province called the North-West Frontier and now the Muslims of the Punjab have again been deprived of a substantial part of the Province where even under the notional division as many as four millions of them reside and earn their livelihood. And if the case now presented by the Hindu-Sikhs is accepted to any extent, it would again tell heavily on the unfortunate Muslims.

The Hindus and Sikhs are born and brought up in an atmosphere of hatred towards the Muslims and this Muslim hatred on their part is at its peak today. A well-known and leading institution of the Sikhs at Amritsar known as Shiromani Akali Dal has very recently issued instructions to the Sikhs to carry out the following programme:—

1. No purchase should be made from Muslims.
2. No Muslim should be employed as a labourer.
3. No alms should be given out of pity to Muslim faqirs as they are the agents of the Pakistanees and convey news.
4. No house or shop should be rented to a Muslim.
5. No Muslim lawyer or doctor, etc., should be engaged.
6. In our shops, mills and factories and other commercial institutions, no Muslim should be given service.
7. The Muslim vegetable-sellers, milk-selling Gujjars and tonga drivers should be boycotted.
8. No Muslim tenant should be kept and where any such are employed they should be evicted gradually.
9. No Muslim washerman, tailor, barber, weaver, potter, dyer, qaarigar, Mirasi, Musalli, ironsmith, workman, midwife, etc., should be given any employment.

The leaders of the Sikhs and Hindus have as recently as February and March, 1947, given expression to the following public utterances:—

1. ‘The Sikhs had the ability to keep the Muslims out of Eastern Punjab. But why should we stop there? We would drive them out of the Punjab entirely.’ (MASTER TARA SINGH, February, 28).
2. ‘Khalsa: Rise and gird up your loins. The momentous hour has approached. May God be our guide and guide us.’ (Master Tara Singh, March 3).

3. ‘The time has come when the might of the sword alone shall reign. The Sikhs are ready. We have to bring the Muslims to their sense [sic].’ (Master Tara Singh, March 4.)

4. ‘O Hindus and Sikhs, your trial awaits you ... Our motherland is calling for blood and we shall satiate the thirst of our mother with blood. We crushed Mughlistan and we shall trample Pakistan ... I have sounded the bugle. Finish the Muslim League.’ (Master Tara Singh, March 4).

5. Our battle-axe shall decide if the Muslims shall rule. (GIANI KARTAR SINGH)

6. ‘Jats embraced the Sikh cult to put an end to Muslim rule and the same Jats will once again fight with their lives.” (CHAUDHURI LAHRI SINGH, an ex-Minister, March 4).

Is this the purpose with which the Hindus and Sikhs have now combined to drag at least 96 lakhs of Muslims within their Province and will any reasonable person blame the Muslims if they refuse to be entrapped in their snare. The Sikhs both here and in England have started on a programme of intimidation on all sides. They are everyday proclaiming from the housetops that they would not accept any award that does not fully comply with their demands. May God grant us fortitude enough to ignore such threats and may He so guide us in our present deliberations that we may be able to do justice to a righteous cause.

14. Report of Mr. Justice Muhammad Munir to the Punjab Boundary Commission

Extracts, 6 August 1947

...If either the Congress or the Muslim League had demanded partition of the Province on the basis of contiguous Muslim and non-Muslim majority areas, the Sikhs could have opposed such partition on the ground that it would adversely affect them, and perhaps His Excellency the Viceroy himself who has a great admiration for this community, in order to preserve their solidarity would have refused to be a party to any such partition. But that is not the position. The Sikhs themselves asked for partition and that too on the principle of contiguous majority areas of Muslims and non-Muslims. If the Sikhs’ claim as pressed before us had been put in a Court of Law, they would have found themselves estopped from agitating the matter on the lines they have done before us. They themselves sought partition on the basis of the division of contiguous Muslim and non-Muslim majority areas, and siding with the Hindus in this demand deprived the Muslims of several districts in the Punjab in which the Muslims constituted a single majority community. In some districts where the disparity between the Muslim and the Hindu population was not much, they turned the scale in favour of the Hindus by being counted together and Solidarity of the Sikhs Whether a Factor

The Sikh claim is founded on the assumption that just as the Muslims have been allowed a homeland by the June 3 Plan, the Sikhs are also entitled to demand a homeland for themselves before the Commission. It is contended [sic] that on grounds, historical, geographical, economic and religious, they are entitled to a separate land of their own, and that since they have decided to join the Eastern Punjab, those of them who reside in the Western Punjab must be separated from the Muslim zone and attached to the Eastern Punjab. Neither in the events that preceded the June 3 Plan nor in the terms of reference from which we derive our jurisdiction can any warrant be found for the assumption on which this claim is based. Every argument that has been addressed to us on this part of the case is an argument against partition and the Sikhs' position virtually comes to this that they must have all the advantages of unity without having any of the disadvantages of partition and that, even though they themselves demanded and agreed to a partition, they should be permitted to use every argument against partition with a view to claiming an area which on general principles was not partible, on the ground that their so-called solidarity and integrity must be preserved. Put somewhat differently, the argument is that all areas where Sikhs are to be found in any number or where their shrines are located must be exempted from partition irrespective of its effect on the Muslim community and that since they have chosen to remain in the Eastern Punjab all such areas must be attached to that part of the Province. In urging this claim they completely ignore the essential fact that the Province has to be partitioned and that their claim for the preservation of their solidarity and integrity should have been made and recognized before the announcement of the June 3 Plan. If any such demand had been made and recognized before the Plan of June 3 was announced, the terms of our reference would have been differently worded and given us a larger discretion....

It is obvious to any one who gives any importance to the Sikh shrines that demarcation of the boundary on this principle would lead to anomalous results. In the short span of history during which the Sikhs were a factor in the Punjab they produced no less than ten Gurus, and most of the shrines were built to commemorate the most insignificant incidents in their lives. If demarcation was to proceed on the location of the shrines, the Sikhs would be entitled to claim not only the whole of the Punjab but also the Province of Bihar and the dominions of the Nizam. The claim of the Sikhs, therefore, on the ground of the location of their shrines is wholly untenable, and we would be flagrantly departing from our terms of reference if we attached any importance to it. As already pointed out, if the Sikh shrines could be considered as a factor in favour of the non-Muslim case, the claim of the Muslims on this ground could not be ignored and would almost extend to every part of the country over which they ruled for several centuries and which contains the shrines of many renowned Muslim saints who spread Islam to this country where that faith still claims ten millions of followers. Mr. Henderson, as reported in the newspaper of the 31st July, had to admit the logicality of this position when questioned whether demarcation of the boundary on the shrine principle was confined to the Sikhs or extended to other communities as well.

I have already said that the Sikhs cannot, according to the terms of our reference and the events that preceded it, be considered among other factors so as to make it an important consideration for the Commission to consider the preservation of their solidarity and integrity by bringing them into one region as a conglomerate whole in contravention of the contiguous majority principle. A fortiori we cannot make the location of the Sikh shrines a material factor in the distribution of territory. These shrines are scattered not only throughout the area that was once occupied by the Sikhs in the Punjab but also in other parts of the country outside the Province of the Punjab. The Sikh shrine at Patna in the Province of Bihar and that in the Nizam’s dominions in the Deccan rank in their sanctity and authority with the Akal Takhat—this is different from the Golden Temple—at Amritsar. According to the memorandum submitted on behalf of the Sikhs to the Sapru Conciliation Committee which was a one-sided affair as the Muslim League had nothing to do with it, by Sardar Harnam Singh, the learned counsel who has addressed us on behalf of the Sikhs, ‘there are over 700 shrines hallowed by the touch of the feet of the Sikh Gurus in the Punjab’ and besides these there are numerous other Gurdwaras. In the course of arguments before us when the learned counsel was questioned about the correctness of the number of these shrines, he admitted that the figure 700 given by him was not correct, and he mentioned to us several other shrines which were not included by him in his memorandum to the Sapru Committee. It is, therefore, clear that for the purposes of grabbing a portion of the Punjab, the Sikhs can increase and decrease not only the number but also the importance of their shrines....

The first Guru was born in 1463 and the last Guru died in 1708. Thus the history of the ten Sikh Gurus ranges over a period of 245 years but it must be borne in mind that during this period the Sikhs were never an established or recognized political power and owed allegiance to the Imperial throne at Delhi, the last Guru, namely, Guru Gobind Singh, being himself an officer in the army of Bahadur Shah, the Moghal King at Delhi. The first Sikh Maharaja of Lahore took possession of Lahore and claimed allegiance from the other petty Chiefs on the authority conferred on him by Shah Zaman, the grandson of Ahmad Shah Abdali, the Pathan King of Afghanistan, who in appreciation of the services rendered by Ranjit Singh in having some sunken cannon taken out of the Jhelum made him Governor of the Punjab. During the period of the Sikh Gurus, not only were the Sikh shrines protected by the Muslim Kings but they made large grants of land to some of them. The foundation stone of the Golden Temple at Amritsar was laid by a Muslim saint, Hazrat Mianmir Sahib, and the shrines at Nankana Sahib and Sri Hargobindpur received grants from Muslim Zamindars. If, therefore, the Sikh shrines were safe during the time of the Muslim Emperors of Delhi, there is no reason to suppose that these shrines will not receive due protection in Pakistan and their votaries not permitted to worship there.

Another fact that has to be considered in reference to the Sikh shrines is the comparative effect of their location in the Eastern Punjab and the consequent effect on the Muslim interests. The Sikh interests in this connection must be considered vis-a-vis the Muslim interests. The Sikhs cannot say that having decided to join the Eastern Punjab, the limits of the Eastern Punjab must be extended at the cost of the Muslims so as to include in it as many Sikhs and as many Sikh shrines as possible. The likely effect on the Muslims of adopting any such course cannot be ignored, and in making such comparison the Sikhs cannot add the other non-Muslims to their own number. If on this principle the districts of Amritsar, Gurdaspur, Lahore, Sialkot, Gujranwala and Sheikhupura—the Attock district is not claimed because of the location of the Panja Sahib in that district—are included in the Eastern Punjab, it would amount to coercing 4,199,658 Muslims to live under foreign domination with a view to giving to 1,442,006 Sikhs the satisfaction of having their shrines in the eastern Punjab. This in my opinion would not only be contrary to the terms on which partition was agreed but a clear violation of our terms of reference.
The Language Factor

The language factor is not peculiar to the Sikhs. The Punjabi is not a language but only a dialect. Though it is written in two scripts, the Persian and the Gurmukhi, the words and their punctuation are the same. Between the Sutlej and the Jhelum people speak the same dialect, i.e., Punjabi, and what has been described as Lehnda (trans Western Punjabi) is only a slight variation of the Punjabi. Throughout the Punjab the language spoken is territorial and not tribal and the Sikhs can advance no higher claim on this ground than any other community....

Trade, Commerce and Property (Lahore, Amritsar and other towns)

The Hindus and the Sikhs have called for certain information to show that in the districts claimed by them, both in the towns and the country, they are vis-à-vis the Muslims in a stronger economic position because in the towns they own more property, pay more taxes, have more joint stock companies and business houses and control trade and commerce while in some of the districts they pay more land revenue and own more land than the Muslims. It is surprising that this information, which was collected at considerable expense and inconvenience, should have been considered by anyone as a relevant factor in influencing our decision. It is perfectly clear from the principle upon which partition was agreed to by the parties, and from the history of the events that led to it, that the object in demarcating the boundary of the new two Provinces is to separate the contiguous Muslim majority areas from the contiguous non-Muslim majority areas....

Conclusion

A spirited but bitter and acrimonious argument has been addressed to us from both sides about the past and present relations of the Sikhs and the Muslims. The point is not really material as partition has been decided upon and we are not concerned with the reasons that led to it except in so far as they help to explain the terms of our reference. But since undue emphasis has been laid on this aspect of the case, a word on the subject becomes necessary.

Guru Nanak, the founder of the Sikh religion, was born in 1469 in the reign of Babar. Though born in a Hindu family, he preached the unity of God and in his teachings emphasized the higher and spiritual aspect of Religion. His doctrines which were characterized by simplicity and directness were more akin to Islam than Hinduism which believes in idol worship, and easily appealed to the masses. His life was a model of piety and devotion to God and his denunciation of dogma and convention bears a close analogy to the poetry of the late Doctor Sir Mohammad Iqbal, the greatest modern Muslim poet and the founder of the idea of Pakistan, who has emphasized the practical aspect of the religion of Islam. Several contemporary Muslim Sufis (mystics) who came in closer touch with Guru Nanak believed, and many a Muslim still believes, that in every sense he was a Muslim. Evidence of Guru Nanak’s friendship with the Muslim saints is still preserved in Gurdwara Dera Baba Nanak in the form of a garment that was, according to modern Sikh writers, presented to him by a Muslim saint and which has several verses of the Holy Quran written on it. When Guru Nanak died, none was sure whether he had been a Hindu or a Muslim and adherents of both faiths claimed his body, one asserting the right to bury him as a Muslim, the other the right to cremate him according to Hindu rites.

None of the first four Gurus came in conflict with the Mughal Emperors of Delhi. Guru Arjan, the fifth Guru, was put to death by Chandu Lal, a Hindu Officer of Emperor Jehangir, because the Guru had espoused the cause of Prince Khusro when he fled to the Punjab and... attempted to plan a rebellion against his own father. Some historians say that Chandu Lal had Jehangir’s orders to put Guru Arjan to death and that the reason for killing him was Jehangir’s religious intolerance. Assuming this to be the true reason for the Guru’s death it must be borne in mind that the incident relates to a time which in Europe was the time of the Huguenots and Jesuits and the massacre of St. Bartholomew and we cannot judge the parties involved in the light of the religious freedom of the 20th century.

It was the sixth Guru, Guru Hargobind, who for the first time demanded political allegiance from his followers when in 1607 at the Akal Takhat Bunga at Amritsar he declared that henceforth he would wear two swords, one of peace and the other of war. The activities of Guru Teg Bahadur, the 9th, and Guru Gobind Singh, the 10th Guru acquired an exclusively political complexion. Not only did they foment discontent and rebellion among their followers against the established political power, but they also engaged in open warfare with the Imperial forces. Aurangzeb remained engaged in his wars in the Deccan for fifteen years and during his absence from northern India the Sikhs found time and opportunity to consolidate their power. They further strengthened their position when the Mughal throne at Delhi received a shock by Ahmad Shah Abdali’s invasion from the north. Ranjit Singh himself entered Lahore and took possession of the Punjab in the name of Shah Zaman, the grandson of Ahmad Shah Abdali, who had appointed him Governor of the Punjab by a sanad granted to him in appreciation of the services rendered by him in taking out from the Jhelum 10 guns which on his way back to Kabul had sunk in the river. A painting is still preserved in Government archives portraying Ranjit Singh paying his homage to Shah Zaman.

Even during the time of Ranjit Singh the roving Sikhs were a menace to the peace of the Punjab and the accounts given by several European visitors of the time abound with tales of atrocities committed by the Akalis who had been taught to consider plunder, murder and disobedience to established authority as the necessary attributes of the Khalsa. The following by Guru Gobind Singh and other Sikh preceptors may be perused with interest:

1. ‘A Sikh is he who creates disorder. A Sikh is he who stakes his head (in doing so)’

2. ‘The Sikhs say ‘Why should we stop creating disorder’. This is our creed and the Guru created us for this.’
3. ‘Creating disorder is the caste and creed of the Sikhs. This is the very aim and object of the Sikhs. The Sikh cannot exist unless he creates disorder. A Sikh is he who encourages disorderliness.’

4. ‘Disorder is the caste and creed of the Sikhs. They asked their Guru to permit them to create disorder. They cannot digest food until they have created disorder. They feel uneasy until they have created disorder.’

(Panth Parkash by Giani Gian Singh.)

Guru Gobind Singh’s sayings:

‘The Guru (Guru Gobind Singh) then told his followers not to be ashamed of plundering and swallowing whatever they could get hold of.’ (Panth Parkash, Bhangu Ratan Singh, page 37.)

Bhai Gurdas, a companion of Guru Gobind Singh says:—

‘The Sikhs then got up shouting and the world trembled. They destroyed tombs, mosques and Mandirs and converted them into fields.’

‘They destroyed the Ved, the Quran and the Shastras.

The Muslims were killed while calling for prayers and while saying prayers.’

‘The followers of Mohammad were destroyed for ever and no Muslim for fear of the Sikhs could get themselves circumcised.’

‘None could say the Kalima (Muslim article of faith), nor the prayers, nor observe other tenets of religion, nor get his penis cut (contemptuous reference to circumcision).’

(Varan Bhai Gurdas Var 41.)

Comment on these attributes of the Khalsa is superfluous. There was actual demonstration of this creed when Banda, the disciple of the last Guru, put ten thousand Muslims to death in the town of Samana alone. The word ‘Sikhashahi’ (Sikh-like rule), an expression with which everyone is familiar in the Punjab, is still used every day to indicate a rule without law or liberty.

Some of the important shrines in the memory of the first Sikh Guru were founded by the Udasis who are not followers of Guru Gobind Singh. Both the shrines in the district of Sheikhupura, namely, Nankana Sahib and Sacha Sauda, were founded by the Udasis who were also in possession of several other shrines. In 1920 the Akalis formed a committee called the Gurdwara Parbandhak Committee, the object of which was to take forcible possession of the Gurdwaras from those who had been in peaceful possession of them for centuries. In prosecution of this object they seized the Janam Asthan at Nankana Sahib, the Sacha Sauda at Chuharkana, the Panja Sahib at Hassan Abdal, the Gurdwara at Chola and another Gurdwara at Tarn Taran (see the judgment reported in All-India Reporter, 1922, Lahore, page 1). This movement which was based on the doctrine of force proved successful and later on legislation by a Muslim minister who was anxious to retain for his party the support of the Sikhs was put through enabling the Sikhs to acquire control over other Gurdwaras which were still left with the Mahants. In the Punjab Legislature the Sikhs have been a balancing factor between the Muslims and the Hindus and this peculiar position has given them a definite advantage in bargaining with the Muslims on the one side and the Hindus on the other. Thus during the time the Muslim Unionist Ministry was in power, the Sikhs at every step struck a hard bargain with them. This has led them to go on adding more and more to their demands and the present claim of their leaders is that the Punjab should be handed over to the Khalsa and the Muslims driven beyond the Jhelum. There is little reason in their politics and their first and last argument is force. If the Sikh leaders had given a moment’s thought to their peculiar position in the Punjab, they would have had little difficulty or doubt in arriving at the conclusion that if the Sikhs have any future in the Punjab, it must depend on their relations with the Muslims. In the past they had always had more than their share but when in March, 1947, they found for the first time that power in the Province might pass to the community that by reason of its majority and importance is entitled to it, they started a campaign of bluff and intimidation in the belief engendered perhaps by their past experience that their bellicose utterances and display of chauvinism would overawe the Muslims. They were, however, disappointed by the result and wherever they started aggression they found that the stuff they had to deal with was not the meek and helpless stuff of pre-Ranjit Singh times but a stuff determined to resist any unlawful aggression on the Muslims’ rights. Having got the worst of the trouble they themselves started, they at once thought of demanding a partition of the Province. But after partition was decided upon they realized the gravity of the blunder they themselves had committed and the prospect of their being cut in two and being finished for ever as a political factor in both the provinces stared them in the face. They have, therefore, again started in their usual way a systematic campaign of intimidation and have foreboded dire consequences if the Muslims are not driven beyond the Chenab. They are refusing to accept the inevitable which has been brought about by their own politics. The parties concerned including the Sikhs had agreed that partition was to be effected on the principle of separating contiguous majority areas of the Muslims from those of the non-Muslims. But because in the application of this principle the Sikhs can come in nowhere their last argument again is force. The complex Indian problem is almost at the point of solution and if in working out its last step the principle on which it has been decided to solve it is materially departed from and settled issues are re-opened, a grave position will arise and all that has been done so far will be undone.

The Sikhs need have no apprehension in Pakistan as Islam knows no peregrines and treats all citizens alike. Having something to do with the administration of justice in the new Province I may for my part assure the Sikhs that they will have perfect justice. What they get on the political side would depend upon the attitude they themselves adopt but if they take into their head the notion to which their leaders have often given expression that the world has always been ruled by minorities, they might find in the majority with which they may have to deal a minority that will not accept the truth of this maxim.

1. ‘Division of Bengal: Our Readers Discuss Question of Boundary’

A few letters to the editor in Amrita Bazar Patrika, 7 July 1947

...‘Partition and Satkhira’

Sir,—It is reported that the local Leaguers—one of whom happens to be an M.L.A.—have been trying to have Satkhira Sub-Division included in the East Pakistan area.

But how is that possible? Satkhira is a sub-division of the district of Khulna which is a Hindu majority district. All the H.E. and M.E. schools, with the solitary exception of one or two, have been established and maintained by Hindus. The newly-started Satkhira college is mainly maintained with the charities of the Hindus. This Sub-division is hallowed with the memory of Pratapaditya the Great, the last and independent Hindu King of Bengal.

We do not understand how the Leaguers may claim Satkhira for their Eastern Pakistan.—A Public Voice.

...Nadia and Murshidabad

Sir,—In support of the inclusion of the districts of Nadia and Murshidabad in the new West Bengal Province to be formed after H.M.G.’s latest plan as announced on 3rd June, 1947, by the Viceroy, the following may be considered as one of the most important points for just and equitable partition of this province.

The deterioration in the Nadia rivers i.e. Bhagirathi, Bhairab-Jalangi and Mathabhanga-Churni will vitally affect the navigability of the river Hooghly and, therefore, Calcutta cannot continue to be an important port in future.

Nadia rivers which have jutted out from the river Ganges and which flow through the Districts of Murshidabad and Nadia, are the main feeders of fresh water of the river Hooghly.

During rainy season when the level of the Ganges rises, the Hooghly is sufficiently flushed with the fresh water that come through the Nadia rivers in consequence of which the depth of the Hooghly is increased and the navigability of ships of considerable draft is maintained in natural course rather than by continuous dredging. Experts opine that this annual flushing is the life blood of the Hooghly from a navigational point of view as it removes the shoals that form during summer. This achievement of Nature is significant from every respect.

Accordingly in order to kept the Hooghly navigable for ocean-going vessels it is absolutely essential that her channels should be cleaned by fresh water discharge through the Nadia rivers otherwise silt brought up during summer season would ultimately raise the bed of the river to such an extent that the very existence of the port would be threatened notwithstanding expensive dredging.

It is also a matter of sound opinion that if by some scientific means adjustment of fresh water during monsoon and increase during dry season could be effected, the Hooghly will be enormously benefited from navigation as well as costly dredging point of view, thereby maintaining Calcutta as an important centre of trade with minimum expenditure.

Under the circumstances the control of the Nadia rivers should be in the hands of the Government under whom the port of Calcutta will come.—Shyama Charan Biswas, Calcutta
A True Solution

Sir,—The boundary must be definite, permanent and easily discernible physical reality—either a mountain range, water course or river. It should be continuous unbroken entity, if possible, without other considerations; if a mountain, it is better it should be the whole mountain range; if a river, the flowing course of it...out of interruption; part in mountain...other permanent land mark and...water of sea or river is always...advantageous kind of...boundary...should be avoided, if possible.

On those methods of approach,...reasonably certain that the lay out of the Gangetic delta rules out in limits all other kinds of boundaries except the flowing rapid rivers that checkers this plain. What river system then gives you a logical division of the plain in the proportion of area nearest to the proportion of the population statistics?

Let us take a priori method, and test the two alternative river systems that naturally suggest themselves.

(I) Atrai-Sib-Padma-Garai-Madhumati line that meets the sea at Haringhata.

(II) Atrai-Baral-Jamuna-Padma-Bhubaneswar-Arialkhan-Biskhali line that passes just by the east of Barisal town and meets the sea at Haringhata.

It gives the nearest approximate equal proportion of land and of population. While that is true, it could not have but been noticed that from the Atrai bend at Manda in Rajshahi district down to Padma near Rajshahi town, the thin Sib river only offers a chance of a river line and that even does not give a continuous river—a break of about 20 miles of land. Again river Sib depends not on the water of the hills but on the meagre flow from the ‘Bil’ near Manda, with the result that Sib is not a river of proportions suitable for an international boundary nor is it a flowing water course throughout the year. Good reason for its rejection. It will give but a small proportion of the deltaic Bengal south of Padma, which is essential for production of staple food of the Province—paddy.

Now compare with that the results of II

On the points of area and population this line certainly gives a little more to West Bengal than East Bengal, but the difference in that respect between I and II is slight. As to land it adds only the western portion of Rajshahi and Pabna districts to West Bengal on the north of Padma and on its south thin strips of western portion of Faridpur and Barisal districts. But if we remember that the Sylhet district of present Assam is very likely to be added to Eastern Bengal, this disproportion is cured and the two Bengalis become near equals. This river line gives to West Bengal a fair share of the delta so very necessary for food production. The river line is a continuous and definite flow of rapids that do not fail in any part of the year and have all the attributes of a water course that would suit any international boundary between two states.

In consideration of all these factors, we commend this river line as the boundary between the two States and we invite the attention of our scientists and expert countrymen to examine this line with their technical knowledge of river engineering, public health, economics and to help the boundary commission to find a logical and real boundary in preference to a hypothetical and ‘notional’ one.—Ananth Bandhu Chakravarty, Rai Bahadur, Calcutta.
2. ‘Physical Continuity by Land or River Must Be Ensured: Sir Jadunath Enunciates Principles for Redrawing Map of Bengal’

Amrita Bazar Patrika, 8 July 1947

‘The eastern boundary line of West Bengal should be drawn from Darjeeling through Dinajpur district to Patnitala (Nurpur) at the north end of the Rajshahi District, then run due south along the Atrai River, and from Vidyapur along the Siva-Nadi branch of the Atrai, through the Manda Swamp, southwards by the Kumari Beel to meet River Padma’, thus observes Sir Jadunath Sarker in the course of a statement on the basic principles of the formation of the West Bengal province.

Sir Jadunath says:—It should never be forgotten that the frontier question between the Indian Union and Pakistan, as far as Bengal is concerned, is in no respect akin to the International frontier problem, like that between Poland and Russia, or between Greece and Albania. Curzon’s Romance Lecture on Frontiers deals with a different world altogether. In Bengal, it is more like the legal partition of the landed estate between two brothers for ensuring more efficient and peaceful management. Here in the two halves of Bengal the population is absolutely one by race, language, and manner of life, they differ only in religion. But a Hindu in East Bengal will have the same relations with the Muslims there as his brethren in West Bengal have with the Muslims of that half. Hence the difference is simply a matter of geography and ought to be solved by administration.

Religion keeps the people of East Bengal internally divided, exactly the same way as in West Bengal by forbidding dinner, marriage and worship together. But both sects in both areas, speak the same language write the same alphabet (which is different from those of Western Pakistan and of Central Hindusthan), and have so long read and composed the same literature. The Hindus and Muslims of Bengali origin have lived together side by side in peace for so many centuries in their villages that it is now impossible to draw a clear-cut geographical line which would separate the Hindus from the Muslims, without leaving any large pocket of the one sect in the territory of the other.

Therefore, in every conceivable plan of partition, some pockets must have to be conceded, and our concern is to find out a line that causes the least amount of (religious) isolation while ensuring the greatest compactness and administrative convenience and economy. Without such compactness no State can come into existence and no State can do any good to its people.

Hence, three principles must be accepted before the map of Bengal can be redrawn to any useful purpose, or such a partition can last.

1. (a) Physical continuity by land or some big river, between the different parts of the same demi-province must be ensured, and
(b) the frontier between the two halves of Bengal should, where possible, be some river or hill. Otherwise it will be impossible to prevent smuggling, escape of criminals, hatching of gang conspiracies, except at a cost to the two administrations that is impossible (e.g. the smuggling of liquor and opium from French Chandernagore). To ensure this ‘Sine qua non’, some concession will have to be made on both sides, and some pockets of one sect allowed to remain in the territory of the other. The problem for statesmanship is how to reduce the number of such pockets to a minimum, while securing the maximum of administrative efficiency and future peace. This makes a continuous stretch of territory of West Bengal between Darjeeling and Calcutta necessary. Such a frontier will make this territory administratively workable and give its government a fair chance of progress.
2. Where there are Hindu parganas or thanas in a district classed as a Muslim-majority district according to its present boundaries, with many Hindu parganas or thanas in the next district, either adjacent to the former Hindu tracts or separated by only a Muslim pocket, these Hindu areas may fairly claim to be joined to the Hindu district, and the intervening Muslim pocket or two will be included in the Hindu district so expanded. Similarly Hindu pockets in the heart of predominantly Muslim districts must remain there. The same option should be given to Muslim pockets in Hindu districts if they lie on the frontier of any Muslim district.

III. Mere count of heads is not the chief consideration in deciding the future of any area. For the country’s progress and even future peace, we must see to it that where any compact Hindu (or Muslim) pargana or thana, within the existing limits of a Muslim (or Hindu) district has developed nearly all the institutions and business concerns with the Hindus, own factory and enterprise [sic] these people’s stake in that area should be safeguarded by its being tacked on to Hindustan (or Pakistan), if it can be done by the separation of a few Muslim (or Hindu) pockets from Pakistan (or Hindustan) as the case may be. For example, the Boalia thana is a Hindu sub area and all its institutions are due to Hindu generosity. If it be not ominous to refer to the partition of Sudeten area from Czeche-Slovakia, the principle of ‘stake in the land’ was admitted by both Chamberlain and Hitler.

In view of the above facts, it is suggested that the eastern boundary line of West Bengal be drawn from Darjeeling through the Dinajpur district (88.45 east longitude) to Patnitala (Nurpur) at the north end of the Rajshahi district, then run due south along the Atrai river, and from Vidyapur along the Siva-nadi branch of the Atrai, through the Manda Swamp, southwards by the Kumari Beel to met the river Padma.—(A.P.)

3. Demand for Inclusion of Khulna in Eastern Pakistan

KHULNA (BENGAL),
9 July 1947

Dear Quaid-i-Azam,

I am sending herewith a copy of memorandum dealing with the case of Khulna for inclusion in Eastern Pakistan, for your kind perusal. The census operation of 1941 and all the previous census were conducted on Union basis. A copy of Union-wari [sic for wise] census figure[s] of 1941 of Khulna District and a map showing Khulna’s position in the Gangetic delta are also enclosed herewith....

With best regards,

Yours sincerely,

EASTERN PAKISTAN AND KHULNA

INTRODUCTION

PHYSICAL FEATURES

...Coming to consider the physiography of the land, we find that Khulna is a part of big Gangetic delta which contains 6 other districts namely Murshidabad, Nadia, Jessore, Faridpur, Bakarganj and 24-Parganas. Geologically all the seven districts have got a common origin. They are the result of the land building processes of the mighty rivers of the Ganges system. In the upper and naturally the older belt, the deltaic formation is complete, while in the lower, the process still continues. Very naturally the component parts of this vast deltaic region are interdependent and they cannot be separated, one from the other, without committing a crime against nature. All the districts of the deltaic block except Khulna and 24-Parganas have been included into Eastern Pakistan. The simple arithmetic of an imperfect and inaccurate census cannot and should not be allowed to break this geographical and geological unity. Should this geographical unit be broken, it will create, apart from the problems of strategy, defence and communications, a hundred other issues connected with the social, economic and cultural life even of the common man.

It is therefore urged that Khulna and 24-Parganas should not be snatched away forcibly from the Pakistan Zone where nature has allotted their seat [sic].

Another salient feature of the geography of the Districts of 24-Parganas, Khulna, Jessore and Faridpur is that a long chain of beels forming part of a depression, extends over a part of the 24-Parganas and Khulna on one side and south-east Jessore and Faridpur on the other. This chain of beels is almost continuous and is inseparable from the land system of the districts. It is, therefore, evident that none of the districts can be separated from the other without seriously disturbing the natural arrangement and physical disposition of the flora and fauna and their importance in the rural economy of the adjoining areas. Cultivators with their plough and fishermen with their nets from the contiguous Districts of Jessore, Faridpur, Khulna and 24-Parganas work together in some part or other of these beel areas, come in constant touch in their daily occupation and earn their daily bread. Now if they are told that for going to their fields and fishing tanks and pools, they would require a passport and have to cross the barrier of currency and exchange, they, without knowing the real issue, will simply curse their lots and slowly die out.

AREA AND POPULATION

The District of Khulna is bounded by Jessore on the north, Bay of Bengal on the south, Faridpur and Bakarganj on the east and the 24-Parganas on the west. Thus we see that out of the four adjoining districts, 3 belong to the Pakistan Zone. So there is no logic in Khulna being left out. The area of the district is 4,805 square miles of which 2,314 square miles are reserved forest. If we follow the map a bit closely, we find that Khulna has got a complete natural boundary only in the south. In the north, east, and west the district is interlocked in places with the neighbouring Districts of Jessore, Bakarganj and 24-Parganas by land masses. The position does not matter much when districts interlocked with each other remain within the same State. But at the time of fixing boundaries of States, such interlocking of lands should be avoided as far as practicable. If we take Baleswar and Kacha Rivers beyond Morrelganj P.S. in the east and Ichamati River beyond Satkhira and Kalaroa P.S. in the west, we get natural boundaries for the east and west of the district but we do not get such a natural boundary for the entire northern limits.

Khulna has got three sub-divisions under it, namely (1) Bagerhat (2) Sadar and (3) Satkhira. All the sub-divisions run length-wise from north to south. Bagerhat lies in the east, Sadar in the centre and Satkhira in the west. The following table will show areas and distribution of population in the sub-divisions according to Castes as per Census of 1941:

Even if we accept 1941 Census as correct it becomes clear from the above table that out of the three sub-divisions of the district, Muslims are in majority in two, viz. Bagerhat in the east and Satkhira in the west. Only Sadar sub-division has got a Hindu majority, but here also there is a substantial part of Hindu population namely Scheduled Castes who are in favour of remaining within Eastern Pakistan on various grounds, particularly on the ground that they will be in a position to continue their unity with their own kith and kin only in the Pakistan areas....

CENSUS FIGURE WRONG

It is common knowledge that during the Census operation of 1941 a vigorous propaganda was started by the Hindu press inviting the attention of the Hindus to the importance of the census and they were indirectly asked to augment the figures. The result was that the Hindus who are the most politically conscious and educated people of the province, left no stone unturned to show an inflated figure of population. Muslims, illiterate as they are in the rural areas, were fully ignorant of the implications of the census and as such did not record their figures in many cases. The Hindu District Magistrate and the Hindu District Census Officer of the time, overlooked the excesses committed by the Hindu officials and Hindu public during the census. It is not the time to raise objections regarding the census but it has got to be noted that objections though raised [at the] proper time were not heeded to [sic] in most cases. A glaring instance of such excesses is found in the census figures of Unions in Dacope P.S. Anybody having a knowledge of this area knows it to be a Scheduled Caste and Muslim area. But under the Census of 1941 there are 41,113 other Hindus (Caste Hindus) in this P.S. This is an absurd figure. A reference to the number of Caste Hindu voters in this P.S. will clarify the matter. According to the Assembly voters list of the last election there are 236 Caste Hindu voters in this P.S. and this bears no ratio with the inflated figure of Caste Hindus shown in the census figure of 1941. That the census figure is false can be proved by verification even now. When important decisions are going to be taken regarding the fixation of state boundaries, such false figures of the census cannot be allowed to decide the fate of the Muslims of this district....
ADMINISTRATIVE INTERDEPENDENCE

For administrative convenience Khulna is inter-linked with some of the neighbouring districts of the deltaic region. Khulna is jointly administered with Jessore by the Postal, Commercial Taxes, and Income Tax Departments with their headquarters at Khulna. The jurisdiction of the Agricultural Income Tax Department extends over Khulna, Jessore and Faridpur Districts consisting a unit. All the water transport and carrier companies having transport business in goods and passenger traffic in the Districts of Khulna, Jessore, Faridpur and Bakarganj, run their administration with headquarters at Barisal. All these facts go to prove how interdependent Khulna is in the matter of administration either [with] Government Departments or commercial companies. If Khulna is separated from these adjoining areas which belong to Pakistan, the administrative machinery will be rudely disturbed.

CONCLUSION

The 3 June Plan of His Majesty's Government has been accepted by all the main political parties of India. The Muslim League has however accepted it as a matter of compromise and hopes that the injustice done to the Muslim cause by partitioning Bengal and the Punjab will be substantially compensated by the Boundary Commission of the Provinces affected by partition. Our grievances are many and only some of them have been narrated above. We look up to the Boundary Commission with the fervent hope that our points of view will get due consideration at their hands. When it has been decided that India should be divided into Pakistan and Hindustan States, it is the responsibility of the Commission to fix such boundaries as should be short, strong, straight and natural. Other factors relating to distribution of economic resources, Governmental assets, lines of communication, coastlines, high seas and air [space] should also be taken into consideration. Khulna's position together with that of 24-Parganas in the lower belt of the great Gangetic delta is particularly important from the points of view of strategy and defence of Eastern Pakistan. The history, geography, distribution of population, natural resources, culture, communication, and administration of Khulna are so closely interlinked with those of the neighbouring districts of the Pakistan Zone that she cannot be separated from this natural region. The common man of the district simply wonders when he hears that Khulna has been declared as a Muslim minority district and he is not going to have her in Pakistan, his cherished goal. He asks within [sic] himself, 'Why is it so? I go to the fields, rivers and jungles, markets, courts, and offices and find that most of the people who go there are Muslim'. He does not understand that the mischief was done much earlier by his more enlightened brethren professing other faith during the Census of 1941. He does not find any solution and his spirit revolts. The sentiment of the common man, the tiller of the soil of Khulna, should be respected and considered by those on whom the great responsibilities of shaping the State boundaries have fallen. These and many other considerations as stated above imbue us with strong hope that no injustice will be done to the Muslims of Khulna who produce the major part of the wealth of this district. We approach the Boundary Commission with the hope that Khulna together with 24-Parganas will be placed in Eastern Pakistan where nature has ordained their seat [sic]. This will, to a certain extent, atone for the territorial loss of Eastern Pakistan and give her a short, straight and natural boundary along the Hoogly on her south-western border. This is reason [sic] and let us pray that it will prevail. Pakistan Zindabad.

4. Khulna to Be Included in ‘New Bengal’
Memorandum by Birendranath Dutta, Pleader, Khulna, 10 July 1947
S.P. Mookerjee Papers, Subject File No-138, Instalments II to IV, NMML

A MEMORANDUM
Morrelgunj P.S.—an inseparable part of Khulna and of New Bengal.

There is a widespread suspicion, restlessness and discontent among the public of Khulna District arising out of the strong rumour that Khulna is going to be sacrificed from Nationalist Bengal in exchange of a connecting link covering portions of Dinajpur, Maldah and Murshidabad between the two districts of North Bengal and the rest of New Bengal as envisaged in the interim plan of partition. There is a further rumour that the Bengal Congress is agreeable to it. If it be true, although we hope it is not, the entire nationalist elements of the districts as well as those of the country who have the least sense of justice and fairness in them cannot and will not surrender to this externally imposed arrangement, whatever may be the price. When I speak this, I speak this with the background of the firm and unanimous stand that the people of this district have taken of [sic] themselves though without much agitation.

Apart from the depth of feeling of the people of this district, it will not be a very fortunate and wise decision for the interests of the Province of New Bengal also. Khulna is not only better placed economically and a center of trade and commerce, than many other districts allotted to the new province but is potentially far wealthier for the bright prospects of afforestation and growth of jute. Leaving alone the matter of afforestation as well as the rich fertility of the general land of the district—Khulna soil being perhaps the richest in fertility of all the lands in New Bengal districts, I would like to dwell at some length on the importance of this part of the country as a potential source of jute cultivation. The district as it is now does not grow much jute because the yield in paddy per bigha here is far greater than in most districts of Bengal as a whole and certainly all of New Bengal. Here we have great many tracts of land that can not only grow jute, but grow jute which can stand competition with jute of any district of East Bengal in respect of quantity and quality both.

In view of the unique importance of jute both in peace and war, it will be a very poor compensation to the new province if this district is paid as price for getting the northern districts connected to the rest of New Bengal, and correspondingly, Pakistan Bengal which is already very rich in jute will monopolise this commodity and will be richer still in all respects if Khulna is cut off from New Bengal. It is a well known fact that Khulna being a hot bed of Congress-politics the Census was boycotted in toto at the biddings of the Congress in 1931 and Hindu public in general remained inactive during Census of 1941 and as a result thereof the number of Hindus was not rightly recorded and that of the Muslims was greatly swelled. Still the Census report shows a majority in the number of Hindus.

Khulna's Central position, its communications both by river and land by steamers and train and lorries, its capacity to supply betel-nuts, co-coanuts [sic] and paddy to rest of Bengal, make it unavoidable in the interests of New Bengal to keep her attached to the province.

Now to be more specific I come to the question if any part of the Muslim majority areas of this district may be separated from the mother district and attached to the Pakistan Bengal.

Khulna district is bounded on its East by the big rivers Haringhata and Baleswar. If these two rivers are taken as the Eastern Boundary between New Bengal and Pakistan Bengal, the matter ends there. But the ever-increasing greed of the League wants to swallow the areas within the jurisdiction of Morrelgunj and Sarankhola in Bagerhat Sub-Division on the strength of Muslim majority in these areas. True that the incorrect Census report of 1941 shows a vast majority of Muslims in these Police stations but I would like to draw the attention of the Boundary Consultative Committee and all other allied Committees to the other factors which are certainly much more essential than the sheer question of majority in population.

Khulna is a surplus district due to its rich fertility of soil but if we go deep into the matter we may ascertain that the Morrelgunj P.S. alone supplies 70% of its produce. Cocoanuts, betelnuts and paddy are chiefly grown in Morrelgunj area and it is Morrelgunj that can produce jute which is in no way inferior in quality and quantity to that grown in East Bengal. In other words Khulna becomes certainly a poor district and deficit area if Morrelgunj P.S. is cut off from it.

Apart from the reasons iterated above which are strong enough to keep the district in its entirety inside New Bengal the question of boundary unavoidably comes in, as soon as the problem of the elimination of the above mentioned two police stations is placed before us. These two areas as a whole connected to the predominantly Hindu-inhabited parts of the Sub-Division without any other possible boundary standing between are separated from the Buckergunj district by the Baleswar in the East leading to the Bay of Bengal. The position of P.S. Morrelgunj is peculiar. It is divided into two parts by the Western branch of the two mouths of the Baleswar leading to the Bay of Bengal. The part of this P.S. on the Western side of the Western branch of the Baleswar is by far a predominantly Hindu area whereas that between the two branches, the Western and the Eastern of the Baleswar is predominantly Muslim in population. If these areas are to be made over to Pakistan on the principle of communal majority at any cost, then Western part of P.S. Morrelgunj contiguously attached to P.S. Kachua by lands except for the Bishkhali, once a river and now is at most as big as an extremely narrow canal or a drain so to say which can be jumped over without any strain and has been silted up at places and as such can not be a boundary between two dominions or independent countries, must be allowed to remain in the New Bengal Province. This part of Morrelgunj can not be given over to Pakistan without violating the right of self-determination of a fairly large population, sufficiently self-supporting in every respect to make and maintain a P.S. of their own. Besides, in respect of normal transactions of registration and many other things it is practically more a part of Kachua than of Morrelgunj P.S. In annexing the P.S. Morrelgunj with its Western part to Pakistan Bengal, Kachua P.S. too which is Hindu majority can not be kept inside New Bengal for want of a natural boundary which is simply absurd. The question of natural boundary here is all the more important and perhaps the most important factor because of its being the south-eastern frontier of the New Bengal province.

In respect of communal strength we challenge the validity of the 1941 Census as I have stated above in having acceded the numerical majority to the Muslims. The people of the western part of Morrelgunj being mostly inhabited by upper middle class having fair education and comparatively affluent circumstance, are in great numbers living outside for service, profession, business, and education and being under the influence of the Congress directions to boycott the Census and are not therefore included in the Census of the area. Actually the communal ratio between Hindus and Mahomedans of the entire P.S. must be 50:50, if the balance be not in favour of the Hindus.
If however, we consider the stake of the Hindus in this P.S. in terms of landownership and business or their contributions towards education, irrigation, health, or construction of tanks and roads and of other works of public utility, the question of its elimination from the district of Khulna becomes absolutely irrelevant.

I would, therefore, request all concerned to measure all the relative factors and then decide and would also warn against the catastrophe that would surely overtake this part of the land in case of proper justice being not meted out to the Hindus already beginning to seethe with discontent and it would be a rude shock to the sentiments of all the lovers of the country who may revolt under external calm.

MEMORANDUM
ON THE PARTITION OF BENGAL PRESENTED ON BEHALF OF THE INDIAN NATIONAL CONGRESS

Before the
BENGAL BOUNDARY COMMISSION
(Filed on 15th July, 1947)

...Guiding Rules

1. The two parts respectively to contain as large a proportion as practicable of the total Muslim and non-Muslim population of the Province of Bengal.
2. The boundary, being the boundary between two States, must be continuous; and necessarily the existence of many pockets and areas containing a majority of Muslim population in the Western part, and a majority of non-Muslim population in the Eastern part will have to be accepted.
3. If without substantially affecting Rules 1 and 2 there could be found any natural boundary, e.g., rivers over any portion of the boundary line that should be adopted.
4. Subject to the above rules and without affecting Rule 2, any special reasons for any area to be incorporated either in the western or in the eastern part should be considered.
The Census of 1941 has very often been attacked and is being attacked as inaccurate. But in the absence of any better or later census of population of Bengal or of any part of it, it has perforce to be adopted as the basis for the partition.

Following the principles and rules stated above a scheme of partition is submitted to the Boundary Commission for its consideration. This scheme is simple, convenient and carries out satisfactorily the purpose of the partition. One other possible plan of partition is produced for the purpose of showing the unsatisfactory nature of other possible schemes of partition, exclusively on the basis of contiguous majority areas varied as little as possible by other compelling factors. The scheme and the plan are each accompanied by a map showing the proposed boundary line and an explanatory index. To each is attached a short statement explaining the general scheme of the partition and notes on special points requiring elucidation.

It is to be noted that, in the scheme of partition and in the plan, the District of Chittagong Hill Tracts has been kept out of consideration. The area of this district is 5,007 sq. miles. Its total population is 2,47,053, of which only 7,270, i.e. 2.94 per cent are Muslims. The vast majority of non-Muslim population are hill and tribal people akin to the people in the adjoining Tripura State and to the people of the excluded and tribal areas of the Lushai Hills in Assam. This district of overwhelming non-Muslim majority population should naturally form a part of the Indian Union. But in the present scheme of partition this district has been kept out of the calculations.

The northern boundary of the District of Mymensingh is made up of 6 police stations, constituting a territory of 'partially excluded areas' under the Government of India Act, 1935. This territory is contiguous to the Garo Hills in Assam. The tribal people in this area have a close affinity with the people of the Garo Hills. A separate representation has been made, on behalf of the tribal people, for amalgamation of some portion of this area with the Garo Hills in Assam and forming a part of that Province.

A statistical summary of population and area, which may have to be referred to in the course of discussion and decision, is appended.

NOTE ON SPECIAL POINTS OF THE SCHEME

(1) That this scheme is much the simpler of the two schemes is apparent. And it is possibly simpler and less complicated than any other scheme that could be devised.

(2) By placing 73.00 per cent of the entire Muslim population of Bengal in the Eastern part, and 70.67 per cent of the entire non-Muslim population of Bengal in the Western part it fulfils, as far as practicable, the main purpose of the partition better than any other scheme.

(3) The fact than in this scheme the percentage of the total Muslim population of Bengal in the eastern part and the percentage of the total non-Muslim population of Bengal in the Western part are very nearly equal shows that this scheme is the most equitable. It satisfies the main purpose of the partition of equable division of Muslim and non-Muslim areas and should be adopted.

(4) The chief feature of this scheme is that practically the entire Presidency Division has been placed in Western Bengal. This has been done not merely or primarily because the Presidency Division is an administrative unit, or because in the Division taken as a whole the non-Muslims form a majority, and that majority would somewhat go up by the exclusion of a portion of the Sub-division of Kushtia from Nadia District, of Police Station Alfadanga and a part of Police Station Muhammadpur from Jessore District and of 2 Police Stations from Khulna District (which are heavy Muslim majority areas) and the inclusion of some parts from Districts of Bakarganj and Faridpur (which are fairly big non-Muslim majority areas) as suggested. This has been done primarily because the territory within the Presidency Division forms a geographical unit and owing to that reason an economic unit of such a nature that its division between two independent States will tell heavily against its present prosperity, and much more heavily against its future possibilities. This part of Bengal was formerly a most prosperous territory due to the fact that from the river Ganges a number of rivers besides the Bagirathi like Kumar, Bhairab, Chitra, Navaganga, Kopotakshi, Mathabhanga, and Jalangi flowed as distributaries and these spill channels fertilized the territory and kept back the encroachment of salt in the estuarian areas. With the dying condition of most of these rivers the territory has become impoverished, and is yearly growing more so. The territory has also become malarious and its population is dwindling. The only way to restore this territory to prosperity and health is to resuscitate these dying rivers. But it is impossible to do it piece-meal in a portion of the territory. The territory of the Presidency Division which has been kept in Western Bengal in this scheme of partition must be treated as a whole for achieving any result.

These considerations are at the root of placing practically the whole of the Presidency Division (excluding some portions only) in Western Bengal. The Police Station of Boalia in Rajshahi District included in West Bengal is a non-Muslim majority area contiguous to Murshidabad. [See, Ancient System of Irrigation in Bengal (1930), By Sir William Willcocks: specially Arts 104 (p. 108–9), 114 (p. 122–3) and the map at the beginning of the book; Rivers of the Bengal Delta (1942), By S.C. Majumdar, Chief Engineer, Bengal, specially pages 75–86.]

It may be noted that in the portion of the Presidency Division placed in Western Bengal the number of Muslim and non-Muslim population and their percentages are shown below:

Muslims: 5503037, i.e., 43.94 per cent of the total population
Non-Muslims 7022015, i.e., 56.06 per cent of the total population

(5) The areas which have been included in or excluded from the Divisions and the Districts are on the basis of majority of the respective populations except for the three Districts of Murshidabad, Nadia and Jessore in the Presidency Division which had to be differently treated for reasons just discussed in (4).*

III

THE PLAN: GENERAL OUTLINE

This plan is strictly on the basis of ascertaining the contiguous majority areas of Muslims and non-Muslims, varied only by taking into account some very important factors.

Where present Districts or Sub-divisions have been partitioned between the West and East, the Police Stations have been taken as units of partition because they are the smallest units for which there are published census figures on the basis of 1941 Census.

In this scheme the following have been placed in West Bengal, the rest being in East Bengal:

1. Burdwan Division (whole)
2. District of Darjeeling (whole)
3. District of Jalpaiguri (whole)
4. District of Rangpur—only two Police Stations—Dimla and Hatibandha on the north and one Police Station on the north-east, viz., Bhurangamari.

7. District of Murshidabad—The entire district, and Police Station Boalia in District Rajshahi lying to the south of the main channel of the Ganges.

8. District Nadia—that portion of the District which lies to the West of the river Mathabhanga and Churni, as well as the five Police Stations in the sub-division of Ranaghat, and Krishnaganj Police Station.

9. District of 24 Parganas (whole)

10. City of Calcutta (whole)

11. District of Khulna—the whole of Khulna District excluding the two Police Stations of Morelganj and Sanakhola forming a block in the south-east of the District adjoining the District of Bakarganj.

12. District Jessore—the four Police Stations of Abhoynagar, Kalia, Narail and Salikha.

13. District of Faridpur—the whole of Gopalganj sub-division and the Police Station of Rajair in the Madaripur sub-division.

14. District of Bakarganj—the four Police Stations of Gourmid, Nazirpur, Swarupkati and Jhalakati.

APPENDIX 2: A NOTE ON THE POPULATION AND AREA OF THE SUNDARBANS

According to the records of the Forest Department (1944-45) the area of the Sundarbans is as follows:—

- District of Khulna: 2316 sq. miles
- District of 24-Parganas: 1630 sq. miles
- Total: 3946 sq. miles

But the Census Report of 1941 shows the areas as follows:—

- District of Khulna: 2314 sq. miles
- District of 24-Parganas: 4 sq. miles
- Total: 2318 sq. miles

In the data for the district of Khulna there is a discrepancy of 2 sq. miles only. This may be ignored. But the difference in the case of the 24-Parganas is 1626 sq. miles. Obviously this requires an explanation. In the Census Report the populations of the thanas in the above two districts have been shown separately from the populations of the Sundarbans. 1626 sq. miles of the Sundarbans in 24-Parganas have not been included under the Sundarbans as such because these lands are situated in settled areas. These have been treated in the Census Report in the same manner as the forest areas in Jalpaiguri, Darjeeling, Mymensingh, Chittagong Hill Tracts etc.; that is, these have been shown under the thanas. But it was found necessary to treat the 2514 sq. miles in Khulna as well as the 4 sq. miles in the 24-Parganas differently because these lands are not situated in settled areas. It is presumed that no one is permitted to live in these lands and therefore these must be regarded as uninhabited land. A handful of population is shown under the Sundarbans in the Census Report namely 3315 non-Muslims and 5418 Muslims, a total of 8755, of which only 93 are females. The very fact that the density of population is less than 4 persons per sq. mile and that there are hardly any women would indicate that the above assumption is correct. The Census Report merely took into account the residents of the place who were physically present there temporarily at the time. They were probably fisherman, woodcutters and other persons of similar occupation whose trade occasionally takes them into the Sundarbans. It would, therefore, be totally wrong to assume that these are Muslim majority areas. The only reasonable way of dealing with this area is to treat it as uninhabited. Therefore, these areas should go with the immediately contiguous areas on the north which they separate from the sea on the south....

SHORT CRITICAL NOTES BY THE CONGRESS ON MEMORANDUM PRESENTED BY THE MUSLIM LEAGUE ON PARTITION OF BENGAL

(Filed as required by the Bengal Boundary Commission on 22.7.47.)

1. The Scheme of partition put forward by the Muslim League in its Memorandum does not merit serious consideration. Of the five Divisions of Bengal it claims for East Bengal three Divisions in their entirety (Chittagong, Dacca and Rajshahi Divisions) and practically the whole of another Division also, viz., Presidency Division including the City of Calcutta. Of this last Division, which even as a Division contains a majority of non-Muslim population (55.44%), it gives to West Bengal areas of only three and a half Police stations in Murshidabad with an area of 408 sq. miles and with a population of 37,804 out of the total area of the Division, 16402 sq. miles, with a population of 1,28,17667 of which 57,11,354 (44.56%) are Muslims and 71,057,33 (55.44%) are non-Muslims. The fifth Division only (Burdwan Division) in which the percentage of Muslim population is 13.90 in a total population of 1,02,87,369 it leaves for West Bengal, except that the areas of one Police station and nearly seven eighths (7/8th) of another Police station it gives to East Bengal.

The result of this Scheme of Partition on the distribution of Muslims and non-Muslims and of areas over West and East Bengal (excluding Chittagong Hill Tracts) is seen from the following table:—

As the above Table shows according to this Scheme of Partition, of the total area of Bengal 19.72% only goes to West Bengal and 80.28% to East Bengal. Of the total population of Bengal 17.36% only goes to West Bengal and 82.64% to East Bengal. Non-Muslims form 45.06% of the population of Bengal numbering 2,70,61,308, the Muslims forming 54.94% numbering 3,29,98,164, that is exceeding the non-Muslims by 59,36,956. (See Congress Memorandum p. 2).
The partition is for the purpose of dividing this population according to Muslim and non-Muslim areas on the fundamental supposition that it is possible so to divide them fairly, otherwise there would have been no partition and no Commission for effecting it just as there is none, e.g., in Bihar or Madras. That such a partition is possible is shown by the Congress Scheme of Partition (See Congress Memorandum p. 4).

But of this non-Muslim population of Bengal the Muslim League Scheme of Partition places only 33.11% in West Bengal and 66.89% in East Bengal.

Such a Scheme is absurd on the face of it. All arguments and reasons in the Muslim League Memorandum which lead to such a result stand self-condemned.

II

It is not necessary to criticize their arguments in details but their general nature may be shortly noted.

(I) Union-wise Division of Bengal

The Memorandum says that Union should be taken as units for partition.

(i) There are no Union-wise published maps of Bengal available to the public. There are no published census figures of Unions available to the public.

(ii) It appears that the Muslim League Government of Bengal were preparing such maps and collecting such figures for the purpose of their being used by the Muslim League before the Boundary Commission. When getting that information the Congress and some other organizations applied to the Board of Revenue for such maps, etc., they were told as late as 28th June, 1947, that such maps etc., are not available to the public.

Some correspondence relating to this matter has been filed by the Congress and some requisition also placed before the Commission. They make it patent that these maps and figures made and collected for the occasion, which no others, with the probable exception of the Muslim League (which is identified with the Government in Bengal), had any opportunity of seeing or testing or working upon before they field their Memoranda, should not be accepted or looked at by the Commission.

These maps and figures are not above the suspicion of being cooked for supporting the Muslim League case.

(iii) No Union-wise map of Bengal has been filed by the Muslim League with their Memorandum and it does not profess to show what would be the result if whole Bengal was partitioned Union-wise.

(iv) The only practical use the Memorandum makes of Unions is to assert on many occasions that non-Muslim majority areas are cut off by Muslim majority Unions and have no contiguity and therefore should go to Pakistan. It seems that not by any chance non-Muslim majority Unions ever cut off Muslim majority areas. There is no realization that if such were the case the Muslim majority Unions should be disregarded and the whole area of non-Muslim majority population should be given to West Bengal.
(II) Sub-divisions as units

(2) In the alternative the Memorandum says that Sub-division should be taken as Unit of partition.

(i) Why that should be so is not clear. The Sub-divisions are administrative units like Districts, Divisions or Provinces of British India. The Memorandum speaks of economic and cultural unity of Sub-divisions which is pure fiction. They cannot be taken as indivisible units for purposes of partition having regard to the object of partition. British India or Bengal administrative units, but they are being partitioned.

(ii) The smallest units for which there are published Census figures can only be taken as units of partition. They are the thanas or Police station jurisdiction areas. Police station-wise maps of Bengal are published maps and the Census Report of 1941 gives the population figures of these thanas and their classification on the basis of religions of the people.

(3) If the result of Union-wise or Sub-division-wise partition of Bengal be what the Muslim League Scheme of Partition shows, that is proof positive that they are not proper basis for the partition, and partition on these footings is wholly unacceptable....

Re: The Scheme

(a) The Muslim League Scheme of Partition of Bengal

Burdwan Division less P.S. Murarai and 7/8 P.S. Nalhati of District Birbhum plus P.S. Bharatpur, Burwan, Khargram and ½ P.S. Kandi from District Murshidabad of Presidency Division to constitute West Bengal: the rest of present Bengal (including Chittagong Hill Tracts) to constitute East Bengal.

6. ‘League Memorandum to Commission—Fantastic Claim to Calcutta’

Hindustan Standard, 18 July 1947

The Muslim League has claimed Calcutta in its memorandum to the Bengal Boundary Commission on various grounds enumerated in the memorandum, some of which are that ‘it has been built mainly by the resources of Eastern Bengal, and nearly half of its population are engaged in industries maintained by East Bengal. It is the only usable and sizeable port for trade and commerce of the entire province. Chittagong cannot serve the same purpose of East Bengal because of the difficulty of communication with it. The City is situated within that part of the country which Nature has made one where the Muslims are in majority.’

‘The Muslim League has suggested that the river Hooghly and Bhagirathi up to Katwa and the river Brahmani thereafter should form the boundary line between the two territories of Muslim majority areas and non-Muslim majority areas.

The following is a summary of the Muslim League memorandum:

‘Contiguity and majority are the determining factors. The Boundary Commission will demarcate the line between the two territories the nature of which has been described in the Statement of June 3. They are to ascertain which are these two territories. Each part as described is contiguous Muslim majority areas and non-Muslim majority areas. The Muslim League, therefore, accepts contiguity and majority as the determining factors. Other factors mentioned in the Statement according to the terms of reference will be taken into consideration for minor adjustment and simplification.

The biggest non-Muslim majority contiguous area is the South-West Bengal and opposite to it is the Muslim contiguous majority areas. The Boundary line demarcating the boundary of these two areas must be drawn up between these two areas after demarcating the contiguous non-Muslim areas and contiguous Muslim areas facing each other and separating them thereafter. Jalpaiguri and Darjeeling as also Chittagong Hill Tracts which are depicted as non-Muslim majority areas in the map, become mere pockets in the Muslim contiguous majority areas having no contiguity to majority non-Muslim areas. The League has urged that the smallest territory unit should be adopted for ascertaining the respective areas and determining the boundary.

‘Khulna District which has a slight non-Muslim majority falls on the border of Muslim majority areas. The major part of this district is covered by Sundarban forest and this is a single administrative unit and is shown as the Muslim majority area. The rest of the district also become contiguous Muslim majority areas and Hindu areas become mere pockets. Similarly the northern part of 24-Parganas becomes Muslim majority contiguous area attached to the rest of the Muslim block.

The memorandum says that the Province of Bengal has five natural divisions based on its river system which has made the province physically and economically what it is. They are as follows:

‘(1) The area known as the Gangetic delta served by the river Ganges and its tributaries and is consisting of the districts of 24-Parganas, Khulna, Faridpur, Bakarganj, Jessore, Nadia and Murshidabad.

(2) The area served by water of the Teesta and the river system flowing through the districts of Jalpaiguri and Darjeeling. It consists of the districts of Jalpaiguri, Dinajpur, Malda, Rajshahi, Bogra, Pabna and Rangpur.'
(3) The area served by the rivers having their origin in the Choto-Nagpur hills. It consists of the districts of Midnapore, Howrah, Hooghly, Bankura and Birbhum.

7. Memorandum of the Calcutta District Muslim League to the Bengal Boundary Commission

Extracts from a letter from Raghib Ahsan to M.A. Jinnah, and from the enclosed memorandum, 20 July 1947

30 Queensway, New Delhi

My dear Quaid-i-Azam,

I have the honour to forward to you the enclosed Memorandum of the Calcutta District Muslim League which was submitted to the Bengal Boundary Commission, Calcutta, on the 14th of July 1947. Similar Memoranda have been submitted by the 24-Parganas District League and the Scheduled Castes Federation. I understand that the Calcutta Anglo-Indians have pressed similar views.

I was directed to forward its copies to

i. Quaid-i-Azam,

ii. H.E. the Viceroy, and

iii. Sir Cyril Radcliffe, K.C.
INTRODUCTION

The problem of Calcutta is the knottiest and most complex before the Boundary Commission. Calcutta is not only the political capital and industrial centre of the entire Presidency of Bengal; in fact, the metropolis is the outcome and product of the total economic power of Bengal. It epitomizes the sum total of the life, talents, resources and progress of Bengal from 1757, the birth of the British Raj in India. Division of Bengal has done good neither to West nor East Bengal. It is detrimental to all communities: Muslims, Hindus, Depressed Classes, Tribals, Anglo-Indians, Europeans and Christians. But it is calculated to do greatest harm to East Bengal and the Muslims of Bengal. The new State of East Bengal and Sylhet shall be the most thickly populated State in the world and the provincial division of Bengal is designed to strangulate from its very start the rapidly growing population of East Bengal by denying it all legitimate avenues of expansion and natural scope of development and growth. It is essentially an unnatural anti-social division. But of all the evils of division, the proposed lopping of Calcutta from East Bengal is like chopping off the head and crown from the body of Bengal. It is the unkindest cut which Muslim Bengal will never tolerate. It is a wrong which will never be righted. The communal forces are so distributed in Calcutta that if no fair solution is forthcoming for the problem of Calcutta and the Boundary Commission fails to do justice to it, its bound to torpedo the entire work of the Indian settlement and land the whole country in the bloodiest of civil wars.

Like the Treaty Ports of Tangier, Shanghai and Trieste, the Port of Calcutta is of international importance and should be viewed and tackled in the same perspective. The claim of the major division of Bengal, viz. East Bengal, on its capital is based, among others, on the following grounds;
Calcutta is the capital of Bengal; and East Bengal represents the major part of Bengal covering 4 crore 7 lakh out of 6 crore 3 lakh of the total population of Bengal and it is but fair that the capital should go to the major part of the Province.

Bengal is a one-city province and the city should go to the main division of the Province as the loss of the only city by the major Bengal will mean the loss of modern amenities of civilization to the largest number of the people of the Province.

Calcutta represents all the commerce, all the industry, all the economic prosperity, all the scientific and cultural progress, all the technical developments, all the engineering advancements, all the social and urban amenities of the life of Bengal which have been built up largely by the natural resources and raw materials and labour of East Bengal. It will be the height of social injustice and a great cultural wrong if the major part of the Province representing more than two-third of the total population of the Province is absolutely cut off from all these amenities of life and is practically rusticated and condemned to a primitive backward State to start life afresh. It is West Bengal which has demanded partition of the province. It is not fair that the seceding part should rob the main and major part of the Province of the capital itself.

Calcutta has been made the city of palaces and mills by East Bengal. Mountains of money has been made in Calcutta, all born of East Bengal. The business of Calcutta with West Bengal is nothing in comparison with its business with East Bengal. Thousands of buildings, mills, factories, port-establishments, capital plants and equipments worth crores and crores of money, derived all from the rich commerce and raw materials of East Bengal, are inextricably sunk and invested in Calcutta. Is it fair that the land of its origin which gave it birth should be totally deprived from it? It will be sheer economic injustice and pure financial brigandage if the whole of Calcutta, with all its scientific and industrial plants, financial institutions and capital equipments which have risen and thrived out of the primary productions of East Bengal, is given to West Bengal, which on principles of origin, primary production and social justice, least deserves it.

The first and foremost factor in the making and the make up of Calcutta is jute. Calcutta is pre-eminently the 'City of Jute'. Calcutta is undoubtedly the 'Port of Jute'. Calcutta has been made the city of palaces by the jute of East Bengal. Historically, Calcutta is the by-product of the marriage of the Hooagly River with the jute of East Bengal, united in holy wedlock by the British matchmakers. And jute is 90% the product of the Muslim peasants of East Bengal. The jute growers of East Bengal are the primary builders of the City and the real progenitors of the prosperity of Calcutta and as such they have the largest claim on Calcutta after the British quit Bengal. The jute growers and the seamen of Bengal and not the non-Bengali exploiters and floating population are the legitimate inheritors of Calcutta.

The second factor in the making and the make up of Calcutta are the seamen of East Bengal, who have made Calcutta famous all over the globe as the home port and the home city of the Lascars [Sailors]—the best first class seamen of the East. Over 55,000 seamen are engaged in and through Calcutta port. And 100% Lascars and seamen of Bengal are Muslims from East Bengal and Sylhet. It is inconceivable that the Lascars and seamen of Bengal, the real builders and up-keepers of the port and the sea front of Calcutta, should be made aliens and slaves in their own home port.

The third important factor in the making and the make up of Calcutta is the inland shipping and inland river navigation, which connects all parts of riverine Bengal and Assam with the port of Calcutta and maintains its national and international commerce and prosperity. The inland and coastal shipping companies of Calcutta are mostly British but they are manned and officered wholly and solely by Muslims from Captains to Sarangs [Headmen of launches]. They control and conduct the entire river front and the entire traffic in the trade and commerce of Bengal and Assam specially of jute and tea. The 36,000 inland navigators must have a say in the determination of the future status of Calcutta.

The fourth factor in the making and the make up of Calcutta are the port workers and dockers of Calcutta who operate the port.

The Port of Calcutta employs 22,000 workers and out of this 17,000 are Muslims and 5,000 are non-Muslims....

From the view point of historical associations Calcutta is associated with, among others, the memories of:

1. Siraj-ud-daulah Shaheed [1727-57], the last independent sovereign of Bengal
2. Tipu Sultan Shaheed [1750-99], his family and descendants
3. Wajid Ali Shah [1827-87], and his Court
4. Bahadur Shah Zafar [1775-1862], the last Mughal Emperor of Delhi
5. Syed Ahmad Shaheed Brelvi [1786-1831], and Ismail Shaheed Dehlavi [1779-1831], the founder of the Wahabi Movement.

In 1757 Siraj-ud-daulah Shaheed, the beloved ruler and hero of Bengal, conquered and liberated Calcutta. He renamed Calcutta as Alinagar and appointed Raja Manik Chand as his first Governor of Calcutta. Muslims have not forgotten that the last independent ruler of Bengal—the beloved Siraj-ud-daulah, christened Calcutta as Alinagar as a Muslim city.

In 1799 Tipu Sultan, the hero of Islamic independence and glory in India fell fighting as a martyr and all his family including his sons with all the remains of his magnificent court were brought to Calcutta. His great library was removed from Sringapatam to Calcutta. Many of his sacred remains are still preserved in Calcutta. His sons lived and died in Calcutta, and are buried in cemeteries of the Tipu Sultan royal family. They wrote and published many books on Tipu Sultan from Calcutta. They built special type of mosques in gardens in Calcutta which still adorn the City and are popularly called Tipu Sultan Shahi Mosques. One of these command the Esplanade Maidan. One [sic for once] they held very extensive properties in Calcutta. They are still called the Tollyganj Shahi Family.

In 1857 [sic for 1856] Wajid Ali Shah, the popular last king of Oudh refused to sign a treaty of submission to the British and was brought by the British from Lucknow to Matiaburuj (Calcutta). The Court of Lucknow with all the splendour of Lucknow culture was transplanted in Calcutta. Many hakims, 'alims, fazils, poets and men of art and craft from Oudh came and settled in Matiaburuj. The Shah and his nobles purchased extensive properties on the eastern bank of the Hoogly. They built mosques, imambaras, Sibtainabad and also laid out beautiful gardens.

Prince Afsarul Muluk, the son of the Shah, died in Calcutta only a few years ago. The proud prince died a bachelor. He refused to marry and said that he was born a free Prince but he did not want to procreate sons who would be slaves to a foreign power. Descendants of Shah and his monuments are still in Matiaburuj. Prince Yusuf Mirza and Mr. Unsud Dawla, Bar-at-Law, ex-Chairman Matiaburuj Municipality are the leaders of the Calcutta Branch of the Oudh Family.

In 1858 Bahadur Shah the saintly Mughal Emperor of Delhi, after the mutiny of 1857, was arrested by the British and brought over to Calcutta and kept as a prisoner at Dum Dum.
Muslims have not forgotten this and regard Calcutta as hallowed by the footsteps of the saintly Bahadur Shah—the last relic of Muslim sovereignty in India.

In 1820 Hazrat Syed Ahmad Brelvi and Shah Ismail Dehlavi the founders of the Wahabi Jehad Movement launched their Bay’it, Jehad, and Haj from Calcutta. They with the kfela stayed in Calcutta for three months, met sons and grandsons of Tippu Sultan Shaheed and converted them to his Silsila [Sufi order] by taking formal Bay’it (pledge of allegiance) from them. The Syed and the Shah by their preachings in Calcutta converted thousands of Hindus and Muslims to his Order. A Hindu merchant prince of Sylhet came to Calcutta to see the Syed and embraced Islam. Titu Mir of Jessore also came to Calcutta and became a disciple of the Syed and pledged himself for Jehad. The Syed and the Shah were sent off to Haj most enthusiastically by thousands of people [who] thronged the roads and the Maidan of Calcutta.

In 1831 Syed Ahmad Brelvi and Shah Ismail fell fighting against the Sikhs at Balakot in the North West Frontier and his Bengalee Khalifa, Titu Mir, at the same time led a powerful attack on Calcutta, reached the outskirts of Barrackpore defeating waves after waves of British forces sent to check his march on Calcutta. Calcutta was saved for the British with greatest difficulty by a total mobilization of British forces.

After the martyrdom of Syed Brelvi and Titu Mir in 1831, Bengal became the centre of the Wahabi Movement in whole of India. The seeds of this mighty renaissance of Islam[ic] Movement were sown in Calcutta by the Syed and Shah in 1820.

Historically the original settlers of Calcutta were Muslims. Nikaripara (village of Nikaris—the fishermen) at Baghbazar in North Calcutta, on the bank of the Hoogly River, is the oldest settlement in Calcutta. In fact Nikaripara is older than Calcutta itself. It dates back from the days when Calcutta was nothing but a collection of fishing villages on the eastern bank of the Hoogly River.

It may be noted that a Hindu landlord, Radha Nath Das, instituted many cases for the ejectment of the Nikaris but the Calcutta High Court rejected his case on the ground that the Nikaris were oldest inhabitants of Calcutta. The Nikaris are Muslim fishermen. The landlord conspired to destroy the Nikaripara during the Great Calcutta Killing of August, 1946. Hundreds were killed and the bustee was wiped out. The process in the making of Calcutta has been as under: First come the Muslim fishermen, boatmen, manjhees, seamen, rajmistris, artisans and traders, etc. They fill up ponds and tanks and reclaim land for rehabilitation from marshes, swamps and malaria infested lakes. Bustees or collection of hutments spring up. Mohallas are built up. Bazars and roads are constructed. Second come the Permanent Settlement Zamindars (1793), with pattas of ownership of reclaimed land who charge exorbitant rents on original settlers and reduce them to thika-proja or tenants at will. Third comes the Corporation of Calcutta and the Calcutta Improvement Trust. The zamindars combine, capture and convert the Corporation and the [Improvement] Trust into weapons of the landlords, alien marwaris and mahajans (money-lenders) monopolize all business, industry, lands and buildings in Calcutta and conspire to oust and drive the Muslim bustees and mohallas from the heart of Calcutta....

8. ‘Partition of Punjab and Bengal Is an All-India Problem’
Amrita Bazar Patrika, 22 July 1947

Dr. B.R. Ambedkar in a statement to-day said that the partition of the Punjab and Bengal was not a local problem to be left to the people of these two provinces, but an all-India problem ‘for it involves the fixation of the boundaries of Pakistan and India and must be determined primarily by considerations of facility of defence and administration.’
Towards Freedom: 1947 (Part 2)

Dr. Ambedkar said ‘from the reports of controversies going on in the newspapers regarding the fixation of the boundary line between the West Punjab and the East Punjab and between West Bengal and East Bengal and of the gists of the memoranda submitted to the Boundary Commission by the Muslims and non-Muslims, it becomes clear that the results of the Boundary Commission may be disastrous to the country.

In this view of the matter, the partition of the Punjab and Bengal is not a local problem but an All-India Problem, for it involves the fixation of the frontiers of Pakistan and India and must be determined primarily by considerations of facility of defence and administration.

TASK OF DEFENCE DEPT.

In the light of these considerations, the Government of Pakistan and that of India would not only be the proper parties before the Boundary Commission but they will be the necessary parties. The boundaries between Pakistan and India being the frontiers of India, it was for the Defence Department of the Government of India to have insisted that the Boundary Commissions should have military officers as assessors, which is always done in the settlement of frontiers between two States.

If my fears come true and the boundary drawn by the Commission is not a natural one, it needs no prophet to say that its maintenance will cost the Government of India very dearly and it will put the safety and security of the people of India in great jeopardy. I hope, therefore, that late as it is, the Defence Department will bestir itself and do its ... before it is too late.’

9. ‘Transport and Communications Problem of Bengal’

Excerpts from a report in Hindustan Standard, 22 July 1947

Dr. Nalinaksha Sanyal has submitted the following memorandum on behalf of joint committee of Indian commercial organisations to the Bengal Boundary Commission.

The present memorandum is prepared with a view to invite particular attention to certain problems of transport and communications that should receive due consideration in the determination of the ‘boundaries’, or more appropriately ‘frontiers’, demarcating Eastern Bengal Pakistan State from the West Bengal province of India.

Many considerations go to determine frontiers—race, religion, population, language, tradition, cultural affinity, commercial inter-dependence, geographical cohesion, access to sea and security—internal and external. And above all, transport and communications have played and can play an important part as much in the scientific delimitation of frontiers as in the proper maintenance of good international relations.

TRANSPORT & FRONTIERS

The creation of new frontiers or any substantial changes in existing ones are rarely brought about except as a result of war and in fixing frontiers various principles have been given the seal of international recognition though conventions and treaties such as the Berne Conventions, Barcelona Conference, Paris Peace Treaties and League of Nations Transit Organisation. Although, on ultimate analysis, States can maintain their frontiers either because they are strong enough or because they are powerful States sufficiently interested in the maintenance of particular lines of demarcation, attempts are always made to determine frontiers in such a way as to ensure [sic] unimpeded movement of traffic nationally and easy flow of goods and passengers internationally. Moreover it is important that new frontiers should be so selected as to make for greatest possible future stability and peace.

In many cases, the transport aspects of frontier-fixing are derived from some of the other important considerations, but purely from the transport point of view the line of demarcation should be at the place which, to use a technical term, forms the ‘traffic watershed’ between two areas, that is to say, where, due either to natural geographical considerations or to commercial and economic reasons the density of cross-over traffic is the lowest....

DIVISION OF ASSETS

Provisions relating to cession of ports, waterways and railways situated in territories that go over to one country from another take into account the requirements of respective areas for dealing with the nature and amount of traffic in each part and, unless penal imposition on a vanquished country is desired, the division of assets is determined by mutual agreements, International Tribunals or Commission of Experts. Treaties and conventions of long-term or temporary duration are also often entered into for working agreements permitting direct passage of trains and vessels of one country through the territory of another, joint user of junctions, ports and frontier stations, maintenance of through services and avoidance of customs formalities or other restrictions.

EXISTING COMMUNICATIONS

Before submitting specific suggestions as to the manner in which particular lines of communication should be dealt with and the claims for the inclusion or otherwise of specified areas within one or the other new State of East and West Bengal, in consideration of the general principles enunciated above, it is advisable to give a brief outline of Bengal’s existing means of communication and to indicate how these are divided up on the basis of the ‘notional’ division of Bengal as per the announcement of June 3, 1947.

The ‘navigable waterways’ of the province may be grouped under three classes, viz., (a) those navigable throughout the year for all types of vessels, including steamers and flats; (b) those navigable throughout for country-boats of all sizes but can be negotiated by steamers only when in flood or high-tide; and (c) those navigable only for smaller type country boats during the greater part of the year and can be negotiated by bigger country boats or steamers only for a few weeks during the rains. In addition to these there are a number of khals, beels, rivulets and streams that provide facilities for moving rafts and small crafts within limited ranges and afford, in some parts of the country, the main, if not the only means of local transportation.

The routes over which steamer services ply have a total length of about 2,750 miles... Padma, Brahmaputra, Jamuna, Meghna and Rupnarain, the river estuaries in the districts of Midnapur, 24-Parganas, Khulna Bakarganj, and Chittagong.

From a broad review of the existing means of communication it is readily noticed that while the riverine districts of deltaic Bengal depend mostly on waterways, West Bengal and parts of Central and North Bengal are largely dependent on roads and railways. In the determination of the boundaries, therefore, larger proportionate allocation of railways and roadways to the West Bengal State may reasonably be claimed....

Many wars have been fought only to secure rational frontiers and to preserve lifelines of transport. It is earnestly hoped that the Bengal Boundary Commission will very carefully weigh the claims of sections, will not be unduly swayed by the artificial and perhaps short-lived demand for dividing Bengal principally on the ground of Muslim and non-Muslim majority areas, and will earn the gratitude of posterity by determining the most logical and scientific line of frontier between East and West Bengal that will make for peace, security and progress of all children of Bengal.

10. Report of the Muslim Members to the Bengal Boundary Commission

Extracts, 28 July 1947

REPORT OF MUSLIM MEMBERS.

Mr. Justice A.S.M. Akram.

and

Mr. Justice S.A. Rahman.

The terms of reference are as follows:—

‘The Boundary Commission is instructed to demarcate the boundaries of the two parts of Bengal on the basis of ascertaining the contiguous majority areas of Muslims and non-Muslims. In doing so it will also take into account other factors.’

This clearly means that the basic factors in effecting the division of Bengal would be: (1) the continuity of areas, and (2) the majority of population in such areas. No guidance is available from the terms of reference as to the scope of the ‘other factors’ that have to be taken into account while demarcating the boundaries. It seems to us, however, that these ‘other factors’ must be of a compelling character if they are to override the basic factors of contiguity and majority of population.

There is some difference of opinion among the members of the Commission as to the exact scope of the term ‘contiguity’. In our view this term can only refer to areas within the Province of Bengal, and not to areas outside the Province. To take a concrete instance, in our view the Chittagong Hill Tracts would not be contiguous to any non-Muslim majority area contemplated by the proposed division merely because on one side it adjoins a part of the Assam Province (a non-Muslim majority area) which may be included within the Dominion of India. In this respect the terms of reference in our judgement preclude us from viewing the matter in the larger context of India as a whole. Since the division is to be confined to the Province of Bengal we have to limit ourselves to areas within the Province for the purpose of determining contiguity.

The idea underlying the terms of reference seems to be that Bengal should be divided into two compact blocks—one being the Muslim majority area and the other the non-Muslim majority area. In order to arrive at such blocks it is necessary to start with two undisputed nuclei, each comprising a majority of the population of one community or the other. The position that has emerged after hearing the arguments of the parties is that the districts of Midnapore, Bankura, Hooghly, Howrah and Burdwan should admittedly form part of West Bengal, and similarly, the districts of Chittagong, Noakhali, Tippera, Mymensingh (subject to the exclusion of partially excluded areas in the north of the district), Bogra, Pabna and Dacca should admittedly form part of East Bengal. The former districts are non-Muslim majority areas contiguous to one another and form a compact block. Similarly, the latter districts are Muslim majority areas forming a compact block. The parties are at issue over the distribution of areas comprised within the remaining 15 districts of the Province, including Calcutta.

The next point to be considered is, what unit of area should be adopted for determining the contiguous majority areas of Muslims or non-Muslims to be attached to their compact blocks mentioned above. The existing ‘notional’ division of the Province was on the district basis. As is apparent from His Majesty’s Government’s statement of the 3rd June, and His Excellency the Viceroy’s broadcast speech made on the occasion of its announcement, that division was merely for the purpose of ascertaining the opinion of the representatives of the Province whether there should be a partition of the Province at all. For the purpose of having a more detailed investigation of the boundary it would be imperative to go to a unit of area lower than the district. In this Province a district consists of one or more sub-divisions, each sub-division comprising several police-stations or thanas, and each thana including within its area several unions. A union is a conglomeration of villages.

The population figures for any unit of division can only be taken from the census report of 1941. All the parties have cast doubt on the accuracy of the census figures, but there is no alternative to the acceptance of those figures as a working basis in the present case. The population figures for villages in the Province do not specify the proportions of the communities included in the villages. The choice of a unit therefore lies between a sub-division, a thana, and a union.

It would have simplified matters a good deal if we could have come to an agreement on the selection of a proper unit. Unfortunately this has not been found to be possible. The two non-Muslim parties, namely, the Congress and the Hindu Mahasabha purport to base their claims on the thana basis, but in actual fact they have departed radically in their schemes from the boundary which would result from the thana basis. The principal Muslim party, namely, the Muslim League, has put forward its claims on the basis of the union, though they have also indicated what the position would be on the sub-division basis....

As for choice between a union and a thana, it is clear to us that the union would be a more satisfactory basis than the thana inasmuch as it is an administrative unit, and the population comprised within a union is knit together as one entity by social, economic and administrative ties. (Annexure II)

On the other grounds, however, we are inclined to take the view that neither the thana nor the union would yield a satisfactory boundary between the two parts of Bengal. This boundary, it has to be remembered, will also be the boundary between two independent Sovereign Dominions of Pakistan and India. It is consequently imperative that the boundary should be continuous, clear and as short as possible so as to avoid the chances of future friction between the two States. The thanas as well as the union yield boundaries which are long, zig-zag and serpentine. Such a boundary would lead to great administrative difficulties even from the points of view of police administration and customs. We are therefore inclined to say that these two units should be discarded in favour of the sub-division, which is a self-contained administrative unit. The headquarters of a sub-division have a Sub-divisional Magistrate, a Police Officer, and a Munsif to look after the criminal and civil administration of the area. All departments of Government are represented in the sub-division, and its headquarters can be regarded as a cultural and commercial centre of the area binding together the residents of the sub-division by close ties of economic inter-dependence and joint interests. The most important consideration in this regard is the fact that if the sub-division is adopted as the unit, the resulting boundary yields two compact Muslim and non-Muslim blocks, and the intervening boundary is free from the difficulties noticed in the case of the other two units. A glance at the maps prepared in accordance with the three units would at once make the position absolutely clear. Of course, the boundary arrived at on the basis of the sub-division would be subject to such adjustments as may be found necessary on the ground of 'other factors'....

After making the adjustments mentioned above, the boundary that emerges would almost approximate to the river boundary contended for by the League, except in the lower reaches of the Hooghly where a major portion of the district of 24-Parganas stands out from East Bengal.

It is thus clear that by following the river Bhagirathi as the boundary from the point where it enters Bengal, the League will be deprived of some Muslim majority areas in the Murshidabad district, and will be compensated accordingly in the districts of Nadia and 24-Parganas up to Calcutta. Out of the remaining area of the 24-Parganas shaded yellow in Map No. II² of the League, the thanas Swarupnagar, Baduria and Basirhat, are also Muslim majority areas. The 24-Parganas are really part of the integral unit of the Presidency Division served by an interlinked system of rivers, we feel that the economical and geographical integrity of this region should not be broken, and therefore the boundary line even below Calcutta should follow the Hooghly river up to the sea. The result is that from all points of view the Bhagirathi and the Hooghly provide us with what may be described as the most satisfactory line between the two parts of Bengal. We are consequently of the opinion that this river should be adopted as the boundary line between the two States from its outlet into the sea up to the point where it emerges from the Ganges, and thenceforth the Ganges in its north-westernly direction to the point where it enters Bengal.

11. Report of the Non-Muslim Members to the Bengal Boundary Commission

Extracts, 29 July 1947

Report of Non-Muslim Members.

Mr. Justice B.K. Mukherjea

and

Mr. Justice C.C. Biswas.

...5. We examined the written memoranda filed by different parties and heard arguments advanced by the lawyers appearing for some of them. The principal parties we heard were, on the side of the non-Muslims, (1) the Indian National Congress and (2) the Bengal Provincial Hindu Mahasabha jointly with the New Bengal Association, and on the side of the Muslims, the Muslim League. No witness was examined; in fact, we could examine none as we were not given the powers of a Court. No document was formally proved or exhibited before us, but there was a large mass of statements filed by different parties and organizations. We wish we had more time at our disposal, so that we could sift the materials with greater care and thoroughness.

6. After the sittings were concluded, there was a discussion amongst the four members of the Commission. We regret that no unanimous decision could be arrived at. We could agree so far that the districts of Chittagong, Noakhali, Tippera, Dacca, Mymensingh, Pabna and Bogra should be assigned to East Bengal, and the districts of Midnapore, Bankura, Howrah, Hooghly and Burdwan should go to West Bengal. We could not agree as to the other areas and as to how or where the boundary line or lines should be drawn to separate the two parts of Bengal.

7. In these circumstances, it has become necessary for us to embody our views in a separate report.

8. At the outset we should like to indicate the general principles we have endeavoured to keep in view. As the terms of reference quoted above will show, our task is, first, to ascertain the areas in which either community, Muslim or non-Muslim, is in a majority, and then, after these majority areas have been so determined, to consider the question of linking up the majority areas of either community into large compact blocks. In doing so, the element of physical contiguity will doubtless be an important consideration, but ‘other factors’ will also have to be taken into account.

9. It is needless to point out that the terms of reference merely indicate the procedure to be followed in effecting the division and relate only to what may be called the ‘mechanics’ of partition. They do not purport to set out the objective of the partition. The main objective, as we conceive it in the context of the events that led up to the proposal for the partition of Bengal, is to divide the Province into Muslim and non-Muslim zones. This does not mean that any of the zones should contain a population belonging exclusively to one community; it merely implies that one zone should be predominantly Muslim and the other predominantly non-Muslim in character. We think, therefore, that there is considerable force in the Congress contention that one of the cardinal principles to be followed in making the division should be that either of the zones into which the Province is divided should contain as large a proportion as practicable of the total population of Bengal belonging to the particular community which is predominant there. In other words, the partition must be so effected that there may be as many non-Muslims as possible in West Bengal, and as many Muslims as possible in East Bengal....

10. We venture to think that every conceivable scheme of partition that may be formulated must be ultimately judged by reference to these tests, and a scheme that fails to satisfy any of them should be rejected straightaway.

11. Coming back to the terms of reference, the first point we desire to emphasise is that these must be interpreted with reference to the objective of partition as outlined above. There is little difficulty in understanding the meaning of the expression ‘majority areas of Muslims or non-Muslims’, which obviously refers to areas the majority of the population wherein are Muslims or non-Muslims, as the case may be. The important question that arises is as to the unit of area with reference to which the majority factor is to be decided. In our opinion, this unit must be one which is the most convenient and practicable index for the purpose of judging the distribution of the Muslim and non-Muslim population within the area in question. In selecting such a unit, there are three fundamental postulates which can at once be laid down and which admit of no controversy:

(i) that none of the present administrative units in which the Province is divided is to be considered either sacrosanct or indivisible;
(ii) that whatever unit is selected, it must be one for which authentic official data in the shape of census figures and survey maps are available; and
(iii) that the unit should be as small as possible.

15. There is no denying that the union is a smaller unit than the police-station, and if by adopting the union as our unit, we could get a clear-cut picture of the distribution of population in Bengal, there could perhaps be no objection to selecting this unit in preference to the ‘police-station’. But a mere look at the maps prepared by the Muslim League on union basis would convince anybody that the union cannot possibly be our unit for studying the distribution of population, which after all, is our main purpose. It brings in a chaotic mass of details which serve only to confuse the picture. On the other hand, if we look at a map in which the next larger unit is selected, i.e., the police-station, we get a clear-cut picture showing large and compact blocks in which the Muslims or the non-Muslims are in a majority.

19. We may state that there is some amount of suspicion regarding the reliability of the union figures that have been placed before us. There is a letter, dated the 18th July, 1947, addressed by the Collector of 24-Parganas, to the Secretary of the Board of Revenue, in which the following statement occurs:

‘There are a number of cases and containers in this District Record Room which are supposed to contain the census enumeration slips of 1941, but since the census operations there has been no occasion to open or examine any of them except that a few days ago an officer was brought along by the Secretary of the Board of Revenue who had some boxes opened out.

20. It is alleged on the non-Muslim side that these figures might have been tampered with. If we are to accept these figures as correct, it would be necessary, according to the ordinary law of evidence, to examine the officers from whose custody they were brought, or who opened the boxes and allowed them to be cross-examined by the parties who impeach the genuineness of the figures. Quite apart from any rule of evidence, we think that it would be a gross travesty of justice to allow them to be used against parties who have been given no opportunity to prove that these figures and maps were not correct and have been got up for the purpose of inflating the claim of the Muslim League before the Boundary Commission. In these circumstances, we think that it would not be proper to rely on the union maps at all for the purpose of demarcating the boundaries of the two parts of Bengal.

24. Having now disposed of the question as to how majority areas are to be determined, we have next to consider the principles according to which such majority areas are to be amalgamated community-wise. As we have already pointed out, the terms of reference indicate that this is to be done on the basis of contiguity, which means physical contiguity, as well as ‘other factors’. The mention of ‘other factors’ makes it clear that contiguity is not to be the only determining principle: it may well happen that ‘other factors’ will override the claims of contiguity. What these ‘other factors’ are has not been specified in the terms of reference, nor do we think are they capable of specific enumeration. Undoubtedly, they would include matters relating to strategy and defence, to historical and cultural associations, and to economic requirements considered from the standpoint of modern industry and commerce, as well as to other considerations which, to borrow the words used by His Excellency the Viceroy in another context, may aptly be summed up as ‘Geographical compulsion’. The river system in Bengal as well as the means of communication between different parts of the Province would certainly be pertinent factors for consideration.

25. In this connection there is one important fact which we must not lose sight of, namely, that the division that is to be made is not an administrative or internal division between two Provinces, or between two units of a Federation. The boundary will be an international boundary, separating two independent sovereign States. Such boundary marks the limits of the region within which a State can exercise its sovereign authority, and with its location, various matters relating to immigration and restriction on visitors, imposition of custom duties and prevention of smuggling and contraband trade, are bound up. The boundary should undoubtedly be drawn up in such a manner as would obviate chances of friction and clashes in peace time. In addition to these peace-time functions, the requirements of military defence will also have to be considered. Natural boundaries are certainly to be preferred, but when they are not available recourse cannot but be had to artificial boundaries.

26. As regards the relative weight to be attached to ‘other factors’ we cannot lay down any hard and fast rules. The task of weighing and appraising the merits of different factors is by no means easy, and the difficulty is obviously greater when conflicting considerations arise. In such cases, all that can be said is that the rule of justice, equity and fairness should prevail. Thus, for example, in our opinion, no factor should be allowed to operate in such a way as to militate against the fundamental rule of equity which we have emphasised before, that the proportion of Muslims in East Bengal to the total Muslim population of the Province should not be unduly lower or higher than the proportion of non-Muslims in West Bengal to the entire non-Muslim population of the Province....

100. Our conclusion, therefore, is that leaving aside the Chittagong Hill Tracts, the following areas should be included in and constitute West Bengal:

The entire Burdwan Division; Calcutta; the whole of 24-Parganas, the district of Khulna minus the police-stations of Morelgunj and Sarankhola; the sub-division of Gopalgunj and thana Rajair in the district of Faridpur; the seven police-stations of Bakarganj including the town of Barisal; 12 thanas of Jessore as indicated in our report; the sub-divisions of Ranaghat and Krishnagar off the district of Nadia and all the police-stations of that district which lie on the west of the river Matabhanga or through which the river passes, and the whole of the district of Murshidabad. As regards North Bengal, it will include the whole of Darjeeling and Jalpaiguri districts, two police-stations of Rangpur and the portions of Dinajpur and Malda as have been indicated already. To these, is to be added the police-station of Rampur Boalia in the district of Rajshahi.

The rest of the Province would go to East Bengal....

105. Before we conclude, we deem it necessary to say a few words about river boundaries upon which considerable stress seems to have been laid by the Muslim League. We cannot help feeling that the supposed anxiety for natural boundaries which has led the Muslim League to fix upon the Bhagirathi and the Brahmani as most suitable boundaries between the two parts of Bengal, is only a pretext for depriving West Bengal of more than four-fifths of the territory of the Province. The Brahmani is a thin rivulet which more or less serves the purpose of a natural drain for the rain-water which collects in the rice fields. The Bhagirathi is undoubtedly a well-known river, but everybody knows that in its upper reaches it is neither wide nor deep, and remains dry for nearly 8 months in the year. The absurd result that will be produced by accepting these rivers as natural boundaries, we have indicated already. Nearly 67 per cent of the non-Muslim population would have to settle in Muslim Bengal, and only about 33 per cent of them would have a chance of living in West Bengal.

106. It is a fact that there are no natural boundaries in Bengal except rivers. But if we have got to make rivers the natural boundaries for purposes of delimitation as well as for defence, the rivers Padma, Brahmaputra and Meghna would undoubtedly be an ideal selection. The adoption of these boundaries would, however, result in almost as grossly unfair a division of the population as the selection of the Bhagirathi, for this would compel a considerable body of Muslim population to live under non-Muslim rule. To ensure as fair and equitable a division as is possible in the circumstances, we have, therefore, not thought it right to give undue preference to natural boundaries. According to the scheme that we have adopted, there would be river boundaries in certain parts only, namely, where we have taken the Padma, the Mathabhanga and the Barisal rivers as the limits of particular areas. If, however, natural boundaries are deemed to be essential, then we would and do recommend that the rivers Atrai, Boral, Padma, Madhumati, Kumar Arialkhan, Barisal, Baleswar and Bhola should be taken to be the boundaries of West and East Bengal, and they will form nearly one continuous dividing line.

12. ‘Whole of Surma Valley Claimed for East Bengal’

_The Statesman, 5 August 1947_

Inclusion of the whole of the Surma Valley, comprising the districts of Sylhet and Cachar, in East Bengal was claimed on behalf of the Muslim League before the Bengal Boundary Commission yesterday.

A similar demand was also made on behalf of the East Bengal Government.

Besides this, they wanted the Commission to consider the question of incorporating some other parts of Assam adjoining East Bengal. In this connexion, a point was raised regarding the terms of reference of the Boundary Commission under which ‘the Commission is to demarcate the Muslim majority areas of Sylhet district and the contiguous Muslim majority areas of the adjoining districts of Assam.’

The members of the Commission were divided in their interpretation of the words ‘adjoining districts’ and referred the point to the Chairman, Sir Cyril Radcliffe, for direction.

While Mr. Mohammed Wasim (for the Muslim League) was arguing the point, a telegram was received from the Chairman stating that the ‘adjoining districts are adjoining districts of Assam which adjoin Sylhet and not any district of Assam that adjoins East Bengal.’

When the Commission met, replying to Mr. Justice C.C. Biswas, Mr. Hamidul Huq Chowdhury (for the East Bengal Government) said that they claimed the whole of Goalpara district, three thanas of Kamrup district, the whole of Garo and Lushai Hills, Sylhet district, three sub-divisions of Cachar and fringes of the Khasi and Jaintia Hills.

Mr. Justice Mukherjea said that this raised a question about the interpretation of the terms of reference. Members of the Commission held different views on the matter.

Mr. Wasim referred to the June 3 plan and the terms of reference of the Boundary Commission and argued that the words ‘adjoining districts’ meant the ‘Muslim majority districts of Assam which are contiguous to Sylhet and East Bengal.'
Mr. Justice Mukherjea observed that if there were known Muslim majority areas, what was the necessity of appointing a boundary commission for Sylhet.

Mr. Wasim reiterated that the word ‘districts’ meant the contiguous Muslim majority areas of Assam adjoining East Bengal.

Mr. Justice Biswas said if what counsel was submitting was correct it would have been expressly mentioned in words.

Mr. Wasim said that it was left out for reasons which he did not know.

At this stage Mr. Justice Mukherjea intimated that the Commission had just received a directive from the Chairman (to the effect stated above).

Mr. Hamidul Huq Chowdhury regretted that the Chairman had given a direction without giving them a hearing.

Mr. Justice Biswas said that the question was raised by the four members of the Commission before the Chairman.

Mr. A.K. Fazlul Huq (representing Goalpara) said that the Chairman should have heard their arguments.

Mr. Justice Mukherjea said that they might put in their arguments in writing which would be forwarded to the Chairman.

Mr. Wasim then presented the Muslim League case for the inclusion of the Surma Valley, containing Sylhet and Cachar districts in East Bengal. He said that Assam stood on an entirely different footing from Bengal which had one language, one culture, one civilization but two religions. The only difference was in regard to carving out portions between East and West Bengal. But in Assam there were three physical portions absolutely different from one another.
There was the Surma Valley, Khasi and Jaintia Hills on the north, the Naga Hills on the east and Tipperah and Mymensingh on the west. The Surma Valley was absolutely different in culture and language from the Assam Valley. The Surma Valley differed from other portions of Assam province and should be dealt with as one unit.

Referring to the 1931 census report he maintained that linguistically and socially the Surma Valley was connected with Bengal and there were few points of contact between the dwellers of the Surma Valley and the Assam Valley. The former had nothing in common with the rest of Assam.

The population in the plains was Bengali speaking consisting of Muslims and Hindus. Tea garden coolies who came from Bihar, the C.P., Madras and Orissa had nothing in common with the people of the plains. They had no vote and were not allowed to take part in the Sylhet referendum. They came there under a contract system and were treated distinct from the general population. Even if they calculated the population of the Surma Valley including the tea garden coolies, Muslims would still be in a majority. Logically, the Surma Valley was a part of Bengal and should be restored to her.

Enunciating the principle that a State should be self sufficient and should have strategic positions of defence, Mr. Wasim said that they were claiming the North Cachar Hills to be included in East Bengal. It was of strategic importance. They were not contemplating any war between East Bengal and Assam. But armies or bandits from other territories might try to attack East Bengal. Therefore, Assam should be responsible for the defence of the territory up to the Naga Hills. Then there was the Manipur State and the Muslim League would be responsible for the territory under it.
Mr. Hamidul Huq Chowdury maintained that after the declaration of the result of the Sylhet referendum, the Boundary Commission had to decide which were the other contiguous Muslim majority areas to be included in Pakistan and for that purpose they should take Sylhet district as a unit. Cachar and Sylhet formed one natural unit and were a part of Bengal. There was intense rivalry between the Surma Valley and the Assam Valley. There were also other factors why the Surma Valley should be a part of East Bengal. There were on its north a whole range of hills about 400 miles in length and 100 miles in width. Similar was the case on the south also. It had got the only exit on the Bengal side and none on the east.

Mr. Huq had not concluded when the Commission rose for the day.

Mr. Atul Gupta with Mr. C.K. Sen, Mr. S.K. Ghose and Mr Rohini Kumar Chowdhury MLA Central, instructed by Mr. P.D. Himatsinghka appeared for the Assam Government; Mr. N.C. Chatterji, instructed by Mr. A.K. Dutt, for the Sylhet Congress Committee; Mr. Santosh Kumar Basu with Mr. S.R. Dutt for the Cachar District Congress Committee, the Cachar District Jamiat-ul-Ulema and other organizations.

13. Assam Requests Road to Cachar and Lushai Be Allotted to It

Telegram from S.A. Hydari to Louis Mountbatten, 10 August 1947

Most Immediate
Confidential

No. 175-MSG. Sylhet Boundary Commission. If I am in order please consider the following representation from my Government. Begins: The road to Chachar and Lushai Hills from Khasi Hills skirts northern fringe of Sylhet District. Unless we build an alternative route through difficult hilly country which will be expensive this road is Assam’s only present means of communication to these two districts. Assam should therefore under term ‘other factors’ mentioned in terms of reference be allotted this road with a narrow strip on either side sufficient to enable road being kept in operation. This narrow strip of territory inhabited predominantly by non-Muslims. Ends. My personal view is that this road is so vital to Assam’s communications that if Government’s request granted by Chairman of Boundary Commission. I would be able to persuade my Ministers to abate (gr: cor:) their claims to some other parts of Sylhet District. Such concession would also I think assist growth of good feeling between Assam and East Bengal which it is in economic interests of both Provinces to foster.

14. Chittagong Hill Tribes Apprehensive of Their Position in East Bengal

Letter from Vallabhbhai Patel to Louis Mountbatten, 13 August 1947

MOST IMMEDIATE AND PERSONAL

A deputation of the Chittagong Hill Tribes saw me this morning and expressed to me their grave apprehension that their area was going to be included in East Bengal under the Boundary Commission award. I am unaware of the source of their information, but they seemed to be well-convinced that this was going to happen. I have told them that the proposition was so monstrous that if it should happen they would be justified in resisting to the utmost of their power and count on our maximum support in such resistance.

2. Personally, I feel it is inconceivable that such a blatant and patent breach of terms of reference should be perpetrated by the Chairman of the Boundary Commission. We have all along felt that the future of this area was not at all in doubt. No fair reading of the terms of reference or appreciation of the factual position could make a ninety-seven per cent non-Muslim area a part of the award relating to the boundary of East Bengal. Such a decision would also jeopardize the position of the adjoining Tripura State which is a Hindu State with predominantly Hindu population, and which has acceded to the Indian Dominion and has joined the Union Constituent Assembly.

3. I, therefore, feel bound to draw your attention to the serious consequences which would follow such a manifestly unjust award. There is no doubt from the report of the Tribal Areas Committee who collected unimpeachable evidence on the spot and whose views I represented to the Chairman of the Commission in a letter (copy enclosed) which I sent to him as Chairman of the Advisory Committee of the Constituent Assembly, that the entire population of this area is in favour of remaining in the Indian Union.

4. Any award against the weight of local opinion and of the terms of reference, or without any referendum to ascertain the will of the people concerned must, therefore, be construed a collusive or partisan award and will have, therefore, to be repudiated by us. I make this statement with a full sense of responsibility as one who was party to the setting up of the Commission. But you cannot clearly expect us to submit to a proceeding which would be in violation of the basic conception underlying the Commission's terms of reference.

5. I must also point out that public reaction would wholly and overwhelmingly support us in such repudiation. Already there is considerable doubt whether they would get an impartial award under the novel and strange procedure adopted by the Chairman of not even hearing the arguments. Many persons have come and complained to me that he has rendered himself liable, by this means, to being influenced by circles in your Secretariat whose antipathies to India and sympathies with the League are well known. The selection, as Secretary of the Commission, of one of the European officers of the Punjab, who are generally associated in public mind with pro-League sympathies, had not mended matters. I have generally adopted an indifferent attitude to these complaints, but if the award confirms the worst fears entertained by the public, it is impossible for me to predict the volume of bitterness and rancour which would be let loose and I am certain that this will create a situation which both you and I may have to regret.

Yours sincerely,
VALLABHBHAI PATEL

Enclosure

Copy of letter No. CA-38-COM-47, dated the 25th July, 1947, from the Chairman, Advisory Committee on Minorities, Fundamental Rights, Tribal and Excluded Areas, Constituent Assembly of India, Council House, New Delhi, to The Chairman, The Bengal Boundary Commission, Calcutta.
Subject:—Chittagong Hill Tracts

I have the honour to address you on behalf of the Advisory Committee set up in pursuance of paragraph 20 of the Statement of the 16th May 1946 by the Constituent Assembly of India. A Sub-Committee was set up by the Advisory Committee to report on a scheme of administration for the Excluded Areas. This Sub-Committee visited the Chittagong Hill Tracts, which is an Excluded Area, in April 1947 and took the evidence of local officials, non-officials and associations who were interested in the future administration of the area. The Sub-Committee have recently considered the future administration of the Chittagong Hill Tracts and although they are not in a position to send their complete report yet, they have pointed out that the people of the Chittagong Hill Tracts were unanimously against the Tracts forming a part of Bengal (as it then was) and that in view of the predominantly non-Muslim character of its population the area should in no circumstances be included in East Bengal. They have also pointed out that the Tracts adjoin and form part of the Lushai Hills of Assam and that communication exists between them.

2. I have the honour to bring the views of the Sub-Committee on behalf of the Advisory Committee to your notice and to say that I am fully in agreement with them. A copy of the evidence recorded by the Sub-Committee is enclosed herewith.

15. Memorandum Presented by the Bengal Provincial Hindu Mahasabha

S.P. Mookerjee Papers, 1st Instalment, File No. 17, NMML

FOR THE BENGAL BOUNDARY COMMISSION

Submitted By
The Bengal Provincial Hindu Mahasabha
And
The New Bengal Association

The fixation for the boundary between two States is not the work of a surveyor or statistician but it demands the insight of a statesman [sic]. The division of Bengal into two States will not merely affect the lives of 60 millions of people living in Bengal but it will influence the destiny of the whole of India. It is really an All-India problem. We should remember that this partition is not like the partition of Bengal into two Provinces as was done during the regime of Lord Curzon in 1905. Two Provinces were then constituted but both were under one strong Central Government and under one Sovereign power. Now the East Bengal State will not be a subordinate Province under one Central Government but it will be a sovereign independent State detached from the Indian Union owing no allegiance to the Government of India. The boundary of West Bengal shall also be the boundary of the Indian Union. In the demarcation of that boundary line will lie the safety and security, the peace and prosperity as well as the economic and social interests of 40 crores of human beings.
Under the notional partition of Bengal which has been declared to be of a purely temporary nature, West Bengal has only got a population of 1,95,88,799 and an area of 31,919 sq. miles including the Chittagong Hill Tracts. The total population of Bengal is 6,03,06,525 and that of non-Muslims in Bengal is 2,73,01,091 according to the census of 1941. We do not accept the census figures as correct. There is a widespread suspicion that they were manipulated at the instance of a party which was then in power. Even on the basis of these census figures we have got a truncated Province which can not accommodate the entire non-Muslim population of the whole of Bengal. From the calculation of the figures and the necessary data it will be clear that West Bengal has not been given either the population or the territory which is justly due to it. The total number of Muslims in this area is about 43 lakhs out of a total of about 330 lakhs of Muslims in Bengal, i.e. about 13%. On the other hand the number of non-Muslims left in East Bengal is 120 lakhs out of a total of 273 lakhs, i.e. about 44%. The present division must be radically altered.

In the British Government’s Declaration of the 3rd June the Boundary Commission has been called upon to take into account ‘other factors’ which should over-ride contiguity and communal majority. Geographical features, river systems, historical and cultural associations and economic considerations as well as social customs and manners should be taken into account. ....The actual utility of any given territory depends on many factors besides the characteristics of the territory itself—its resources, population and defensibility. Mere communal strength and territorial contiguity must yield place to other vital considerations. In choosing the area and population for West Bengal an endeavour should be made to bring within the compass of that Province all the non-Muslim majority areas keeping in mind compactness, homogeneity, similarity of manners and customs, natural boundaries and cultural and historic association.

However fantastic or untenable the two-Nations theory propounded by the Muslim League may appear, the demand for Pakistan was based on the acceptance of that theory. From the tragic happenings in the past it is advisable that the number of non-Muslims forced to live under Pakistan rule should not exceed the number of Muslims living in West Bengal. One of the leaders of the Muslim League has declared that the constitution of the Pakistan State would be based on the principles of Islam. The future of the Hindus and other non-Muslims in the Pakistan State will be extremely uncertain and difficult and they may suffer from various disabilities. As a matter of fact there has been large scale migration of population from some of the Eastern Districts within the past ten months and the possibility of mass migration is almost imminent. The new State of West Bengal should be in a position to provide for the inclusion and accommodation of immigrants from Pakistan.

....Taking Divisions as units, the whole of the Burdwan Division is predominantly non-Muslim and the districts comprising the said Division belong to the same cultural area. The non-Muslim population in the Division is 86.10%. The whole of the Presidency Division has all along been taken as one administrative unit and it has been a non-Muslim majority area though some parts of it have majority of Muslims. Past precedent is in favour of the inclusion of the whole Division as was done by Lord Curzon when he partitioned Bengal. Tradition and culture throughout this Division are similar. Manners and customs also bear remarkable similarity. People use the same language and same dialect. People of West Bengal Districts of Burdwan, Howrah, Hoogly and 24 Parganas are generally tied by social relationship with the people of Nadia, Jessore, Murshidabad and Khulna.
Calcutta is a predominantly Hindu city and must be the capital of West Bengal. The life and prosperity of West Bengal State will depend on Calcutta. The non-Muslim population of the city of Calcutta is 76.4%. 91.55% of the premises of Calcutta are held by non-Muslims. Out of the city's rates and taxes, 93.8% are paid by non-Muslims. The intellectual and cultural life of the city is predominantly Hindu. The contiguous territory of the district of 24 Parganas is also non-Muslim majority area. The Muslims there are in a minority of 32.47% of the population.

The peculiar position of the Scheduled Castes in Bengal is another important feature which ought to be taken into consideration by the Boundary Commission. It is the supreme task of the State to work for all round upliftment of the Scheduled Caste Hindus. After all they are an organic part of the great Hindu Society. It will not be proper to allow the Scheduled Caste Hindus who are clustered in certain well defined regions to be cut adrift from the predominantly Hindu population of West Bengal. All their traditions and sentiments are bound up with West Bengal. All the Scheduled Caste Members from West Bengal voted for the partition of Bengal and the inclusion of West Bengal into the Indian Union. It is the universal desire of all sections of Scheduled Castes to remain as citizens of that Union. The recognised leaders of the Scheduled Castes have in unequivocal terms demanded their inclusion in the West Bengal Province and declared their unwillingness to join the Pakistan State. It is for that reason that we demand the inclusion of the Sub-Division of Gopalganj which is a predominantly Scheduled Caste area as well as the adjoining territory in the districts of Faridpur and Bakarganj as parts of West Bengal, all such territory being contiguous non-Muslim majority area.

The territory which we claim for West Bengal will have predominantly Hindu centres of culture which have played a prominent part in the history of Bengal. That is why Nadia, the birth place of Sri Chaitanya and the seat of Sanskrit learning and Vaishnavite culture as well as Barisal, one of the strongholds of nationalism should remain within West Bengal. The cultural landscape of this area reveals that the folk culture has been predominantly built up by the Hindus. From this point of view one needs consider history, tradition and cultural institutions. The number of schools, colleges, educational and cultural institutions which are supported in this region primarily by the Hindus play a dominant part in shaping the cultural character of the region. The Muslims, although they form a bare majority in some parts, have a very small share in the cultural make-up of the area.

The question as to how the Chittagong Hill Tracts should be treated in the matter of partition requires serious consideration. The said area is 5007 sq. miles and out of its total population of 2,47,053 only 7,270 are Muslims. The non-Muslims therefore are in the majority of 97.04%. The area should form a part of the Indian Union according to the desire of the population of this area.

   1. Mr. Jinnah came to see me last night and told me that he wanted to be Governor-General of Pakistan from the date of the transfer of power.
   2. I have spent four hours since then trying to make him realise the advantages that Pakistan would gain from having the same Governor-General as India for the initial period, until partition is complete. He is so adamant that he openly says that he would prefer to lose the crores’ worth of assets which he would get in a fair partition, under my supervision, than share a Governor-General.
   3. I now am faced with the appalling problem of whether to accept Nehru’s offer to stay as Governor-General of India or whether to pull out on August 15th.
   4. I will telegraph Jinnah’s full points of view and arguments and my recommendations later. This is intended to give you a preliminary indication of this unexpected course of events, as I realise that it may result in amendments to the Bill. But I would suggest that you take no action until I inform you further.

   Dear Lord Mountbatten,

   Mr. Jinnah has received your letter of the 4th late in the evening at 6.30 and I am authorised to inform you that the All India Muslim League, the successor authority, tender advice to His Majesty the King to accept the name of Mr. M.A. Jinnah as the Governor-General of Pakistan.
We understand that the Congress desire that you should be the Governor-General of India Dominion, and if you decide to accept it, we shall be glad and feel that the two Governors-General will work in harmony and co-operation to effect equitably final and complete partition.

Yours sincerely,

3. Viceroy Surprised by Jinnah’s Decision

Extract from the minutes of Viceroy’s fifty-second staff meeting, 4 July 1947
IOR, R/3/1/162, Acc. No. 3639, NAI

ITEM 2. GOVERNOR-GENERAL
(V.C.P. 107).

The Meeting considered a paper prepared by the Conference Secretary, putting forward the reasons, as brought out in an unrecorded discussion the previous day, why His Excellency should accept the appointment of the Governor-General of the new Dominion of India alone. This question has arisen because of Mr. Jinnah’s intention, first declared two days previously, to put forward his own name for the post of Governor-General of Pakistan.

HIS EXCELLENCY THE VICEROY said that his conscience was clear that he had taken every possible step of which he knew, in order to put clearly before Mr. Jinnah the advantages of Pakistan having the same Governor-General as India during at least the initial period after the transfer of power. The final step which he had taken had been to send for the Nawab of Bhopal and ask him again to point out the advantages to Mr. Jinnah. This step had been unsuccessful. His Excellency said that to him the most painful part of all this was that he had, though unintentionally, deceived Congress. They had made their offer that he should remain as Governor-General of the Dominion of India on the understanding that he would be Governor-General of Pakistan also. HIS EXCELLENCY emphasised that Mr. Jinnah’s decision had come as a complete surprise to him. For example, Mr. Jinnah had not told the Nawab of Bhopal, when he had seen him four days previously, that was in his mind.

THE VICEROY stated that the Nawab of Bhopal had given his opinion that the only hope for Pakistan now was for him (His Excellency) to stay on as Governor-General of India. The Nawab of Bhopal had said that he considered that this was the only hope for the States too. He had added that from the personal viewpoint he thought that the decision was much more difficult and had suggested that three days would be required in order to make it.

RAO BAHADUR MENON stated that Mr. Mohd. Ali had told him that informed Muslim League opinion shared the Nawab of Bhopal’s view that it would be in the interests of Pakistan for His Excellency to remain as Governor-General of India.

A separate part of the paper before the Meeting dealt with the question as to whether, in the light of Mr. Jinnah’s decision, it would be desirable to amend the proviso to the Indian Independence Bill which allowed the same person to be Governor-General of both Dominions. HIS EXCELLENCY decided that it would be best to leave this proviso as it stood.

HIS EXCELLENCY THE VICEROY:

(i) took note of V.C.P. 107;
(ii) approved a draft telegram to the Prime Minister, handed round at the Meeting, informing him of the latest situation;
(iii) directed Prin. Sec. to draft a telegram to His Majesty the King to inform him of the course of events;

(iv) decided to ask Mr. Jinnah, when next he saw him, whether he would accept a G.C.M.G. or similar decoration.

4. Mountbatten’s Position as Governor-General of India

Viceroy’s Conference Paper 116, 5 July 1947
Mountbatten Papers, File No. 212A, NMML

REASONS FOR AND AGAINST LORD MOUNTBATTEN STAYING ON AS GOVERNOR-GENERAL OF THE DOMINION OF INDIA

1. Attached are

(a) A paper setting out the reasons against Lord Mountbatten’s staying on as Governor-General of the Dominion of India. This was prepared by the Personal Secretary.

(b) A paper setting out the reasons in favour of Lord Mountbatten staying on as Governor-General of the Dominion of India. This was prepared by the Conference Secretary.

2. These papers were taken as a brief by Lord Ismay on his visit to London.

V.F. ERSKINE CRUM
Conference Secretary

Enclosure 1

REASONS AGAINST LORD MOUNTBATTEN STAYING ON AS GOVERNOR-GENERAL OF THE DOMINION OF INDIA

1. If H.E. accepts the appointment of Governor-General of the new Dominion of India alone it will have a mixed reception in the Indian Union. It must be remembered that the invitation has been extended by the Nehru/Patel clique; in other words the conservative element of the Party who are now old enough and wise enough to know that they need some help during the coming months.

2. But there is a large body of opinion in the Indian Union, including the Socialists and the Communists, who want all the British to leave on the transfer of power and Gandhi in particular has often said that the British should quit and leave India to work out their own salvation. It will thus undoubtedly be said in many circles in the Indian Union that the British are attempting to retain a hold on the country.

3. The effect of H.E. staying on with the Indian Union alone is bound to have a depressing effect in Pakistan in spite of the unassailable position which Jinnah holds in the minds of the Muslims. Certain organs of the Congress press will undoubtedly write up H.E.’s decision in big headlines and the impression on the Muslims will inevitably be that H.E. has deserted them and joined the stronger side.

4. As regards world opinion, there will be considerable criticism by thinking men of H.E.’s acceptance of the post. There is a big volume of opinion all over the world that ways and means should have been found to keep India united and grave doubts have been expressed about the necessity for partition. As far as the world is concerned partition will have been effected on the 15th August 1947 and two new Dominions set up. The question is bound to be asked why H.E. should stay on at all, and in particular why he should stay on with the bigger and stronger side. There will also undoubtedly be criticism that the smaller Muslim Dominion is being abandoned.

5. At the time when the possibility of H.E. staying on as Governor-General of both Dominions was being considered a very strong point was made of how advantageous this would be from the point of view of completing partition in the months after 15th August, 1947, and it has been suggested that he could equally well carry out this function as Governor-General of the Indian Union also. But as Governor-General of one Dominion only it is illogical to suggest that he can be expected to act impartially when partition matters are being discussed. Nor would it be reasonable to ask the Indian Union to allow him to be impartial at any meeting he might attend on Partition matters. In fact it would be impossible for him to take any part in partition were he to remain as Governor-General of the Indian Union alone, apart from the advice which he might give to Ministers in the ordinary way as Constitutional Governor-General.

6. It is, therefore, quite illogical to suggest he could be of any real help to partition by staying on as Governor-General of one side only.

7. It will be recollected that when Jenkins and Burrows decided not to stay on in any capacity with either part of their partition provinces, their decision was applauded as correct and honourable and there is nothing different in the present case which is being considered. H.E. has accomplished all that he was sent out here to do in that he has effected a settlement of the Indian problem and has retained the new Dominions within the Commonwealth after the transfer of power. It would be undignified and morally wrong for him to stay on with one side only after the 15th August 1947 and he should accordingly quit India on that date.

Enclosure 2

REASONS IN FAVOUR OF LORD MOUNTBATTEN STAYING ON AS GOVERNOR-GENERAL OF THE DOMINION OF INDIA

1. Mr. Jinnah has now confirmed his wish to have his name submitted to His Majesty for the post of Governor-General of Pakistan. There are many reasons why the present Viceroy should accept the appointment of Governor-General of the new Dominion of India alone. It is emphasised that it would, primarily, be H.E.'s personality rather than his appointment—his personal relationship with the leaders rather than his position—which would act as a general stabilising influence.

2. Field Marshal Auchinleck has clearly stated that, if Lord Mountbatten left, he himself would resign. The Commanders-in-Chief of the other Services and Army Commanders have expressed similar intentions. The vast majority of British officers as a whole would, in such circumstances, indubitably fail to volunteer to remain. This would lead to the nationalisation of the Indian Armed Forces taking place at the same time as partition. Opinion is unanimous among all, including the Indian political leaders, who have any knowledge of the problem, that this would lead to disastrous results. The one stable element in India, namely the Indian Army, might well disintegrate; and riot and bloodshed on an appalling scale would result.

If, on the other hand, H.E. remained, British officers and officials as a whole, in both new Dominions, would be more likely to volunteer to remain themselves. They would feel, after their experience in S.E.A.C. and latterly in India, that there was someone to look after their interests. The result would be that partition of the Armed Forces would go through smoothly; and chaos would be avoided.

3. If H.E. were to stay as Governor-General of India, the Partition Council and Arbitral Tribunal decisions would stand a far better chance of being implemented, whether or not H.E. personally remained as Chairman of the Partition Council or whatever body takes its place.

4. Smooth partition and H.E.’s general personal influence on other matters, would mean that the relations between India and Pakistan would stand a good chance of being friendly. The first object of India’s foreign policy must of necessity be the maintenance of good relations with Pakistan—and vice versa.

If H.E. were to go, one of the main reasons which would lead to deterioration of relations between the two Dominions would be that the Congress Leaders would feel that it was because of Mr. Jinnah’s attitude that H.E. had not stayed on, and that he had again sabotaged their plans. The patience of the Congress Leaders with Mr. Jinnah’s interference in their plans is well-nigh exhausted.

5. In the Dominion of India itself there would be a greater chance of stability if H.E. remained. Although there is still some communal tension, the situation has been improved out of all measure over the last three months because of H.E.’s presence. The advantages to the new Dominion herself are surely most apparent in the fact that Pandit Nehru and Sardar Patel, who are the best judges, have themselves asked H.E. to remain.

6. The situation in India after the transfer of power and the state of relationship between the two Dominions is going to have the greatest effect on the situation in S.E. Asia and indeed on the world as a whole.

7. There will be very real need, after 15th August, for some independent agency capable of resolving the difficulties which are bound to arise between India and the States. H.E.’s advice to the Indian Government on how to deal with the States, and to the rulers themselves on how to deal with the Indian Government, would be invaluable. The Nawab of Bhopal has said that the continued presence of H.E. is ‘the only hope’ for the States.

8. Although the reactions of the ‘Westminster Front’ are unpredictable from this distance, it is felt that the Opposition would be unlikely to oppose the passage of the Indian Independence Bill if they knew that H.E. was going to stay on. It must always be borne in mind that the Opposition, if they turned sour at the prospect of two Indian Governors-General in the new Dominions, could still so delay the passage of the Legislation that it would not be possible to transfer power on 15th August.

9. Mr. Jinnah has stated that he would welcome H.E.’s appointment as Governor-General of India. This has been confirmed in writing by Mr. Liaquat Ali Khan. All informed Muslim League opinion, which it has been possible to obtain, agrees. The Nawab of Bhopal has given his opinion that Pakistan itself would benefit enormously.

10. It is self-evident that all the advantages quoted above would be to the benefit of the Indian people themselves. It is also apparent that there would be considerable advantages from the purely British point of view, although these also, in the long run, will doubtless favourably affect the welfare of India.

11. From the British point of view, it would be of the greatest prestige value that Congress, after so long a fight for independence, should ask that their first Governor-General and two of their Governors should be British. It is doubtful whether these two Governors, Sir John Colville and Sir Archibald Nye, would stay on if H.E. did not. If H.E. remained, India would be much more likely to remain within the Commonwealth for a long period or even permanently. The change of heart (so evident during the last three months) of Indians towards the British would not be reversed. And the prestige of the Commonwealth, and all that it stands for, would be increased.

If H.E. were to go, and if the Indian Government were thus turned down in their application for a British Governor-General, they would be as a lover scorned. The relations between India and Britain, which had improved so miraculously in the last three months, would again deteriorate at an unforeseeable rate.

12. Finally, surely world opinion will be in no mood to criticise H.E.’s acceptance of the post. Indeed, if he went, it is likely that there would be a considerable volume of criticism, both immediate and long term, that he was leaving the job half done and making a ‘quick get-away’.

5. Relations with India and Pakistan

Draft note by Campbell-Johnson, undated
Mountbatten Papers, File No. 62, NMML

With regard to the Conference Secretary’s note, the following are my views on the publicity implications of the three courses proposed.

1. I consider that while Course C is the most desirable from every point of view, Course A would be favourably received in the British and World Press, while Course B would not avoid serious criticism.

2. Left Wing expectation has always been that Pakistan would be the last outpost of British imperialism and that the anti-British bias of Congress would quickly prevail. Congress invitation to H.E., Colville and Nye knocks that criticism on the head. From the view point of British prestige it is a tremendous thing that Congress at the moment of victory in its 70 years’ struggle with the British should go out of its way to invite Englishmen to stay on in this way.

3. Such an invitation can hardly be criticised by the Right Wing either, for it gets our relations with the new India off to a start good beyond all expectations. At the same time the suggestion that H.E. has sold out to the Congress is met by obvious evidence that Pakistan and Jinnah have got exactly what they asked for. In fact H.E.’s presence at the head of the new Indian State would naturally be interpreted as the best guarantee that its relations with Pakistan would be carried on in a friendly and constructive manner and as a buffer against excessive Congress claims.

4. The argument that with Jinnah in his present mood and enjoying full powers and with H.E. simply as a constitutional Governor-General, H.E. would not be able to exercise any substantial influence on Pakistan-Indian relations is a major issue but not directly a publicity problem. While no doubt it would be a limiting factor to H.E.’s usefulness, I think it would be widely realised that no-one else would be able to do more, and in view of H.E.’s close association with Jinnah at this critical time no other Governor-General would be likely to be in a position to do as much.

5. If the choice is between Jinnah as Governor-General or President, Governor-General is surely preferable. He gives his prestige inside Pakistan to a title which is peculiarly associated with Commonwealth status and in the last analysis—however dictatorial or Fascist inclined he may be—with constitutional government. At least it gives his successors good grounds for becoming constitutional.

6. The argument that a climb down is involved from Viceroy of all India to Governor-General of India less Pakistan cannot I submit be sustained nor would it be strongly stressed. Climb down from what? The whole emphasis of H.E.'s mission here has been the future—on the beginning of a new chapter in our relations with Indians and not on 'the last Viceroy'.

7. When one considers Course B, it is obvious that H.E. would be leaving on the crest of the wave but once it is known that H.E. had been invited by Congress and had turned down their invitation I believe there would be a considerable volume of criticism, both immediate and long term, that he was leaving the job half done and making 'a quick getaway'. Congress publicity would certainly interpret it as capitulation to Jinnah.

8. I therefore submit that Course C offers the best solution but there are positive advantages in Course A which outweigh those of Course B while on the negative side criticisms arising from Course B are likely to be more serious and widespread.

6. 'A Dangerous Impasse'

Letter from Louis Mountbatten to Clement Attlee, 5 July 1947

THE VICEROY’S HOUSE, NEW DELHI

PERSONAL AND CONFIDENTIAL

My dear Prime Minister,

I hope you will not mind my sending Pug Ismay home. But I have reached a dangerous impasse. As you know, it was Jinnah who always begged me to stay as Viceroy or overall Governor-General, or in some capacity over the two Dominions until the partition was complete; and it was Congress who were unwilling that I should have anything to do with the League. It took me quite a bit of persuasion, when Nehru asked me to become the first Governor-General of the Dominion of India, to get him and Patel to agree that I should also be allowed to act in the same capacity for Pakistan in order to retain my impartiality.

Ever since my return no efforts on the part of Ismay, Mieville and myself, have ever elicited from Jinnah the smallest hint of what was in his mind; even his closest advisers like the Nawab of Bhopal and Liaquat Ali Khan appeared to be seriously under the impression that he would accept me as common Governor-General. Indeed at a meeting of the Partition Council this week he referred to there being only one Governor-General for the two Dominions. You can imagine therefore what a bombshell it was when he suddenly announced his intention of being the Governor-General of Pakistan himself.

I have always held, and frequently stated my view, that it would be morally indefensible for me to stay with one side alone after having dealt impartially and justly with both sides for so long. I still adhere to that view.

There is, however, another moral consideration, which is that, through Jinnah having misled us, we have quite unintentionally misled Congress. There is no doubt that from mid-May up to this moment it has never entered their minds that I would not stay with them. Further, if I now refuse, they will say that Jinnah has secured his last triumph over Congress and through me.

I do not want to conceal from you that I consider the whole of this situation to be my fault. I should have foreseen it, and have cleared the position with both Jinnah and the Congress one way or the other three or four weeks ago. As it is I am painfully aware of having put the British in an impasse, for whichever way the decision goes it can rightly be held that I shall have let down one side or the other.

I feel that I must seek a decision from the King based, of course, on your advice. I hope also that you may feel it right to consult the Opposition. If it is your wish that I should be Governor-General of the Dominion of India, at all events till partition is over in April, then I trust that you will be able to make that clear in the debate. If on the other hand it is your wish that I should refuse, I am of course prepared to take full responsibility on my own shoulders, since it would embarrass H.M. Government with the Government of the future Dominion of India if they were to refuse to allow an Englishman to accept the position of first Governor-General.

I have put some of this background in my Personal Report, so that the Cabinet Committee may know the situation, but only Pug Ismay can give you the full background since fortunately he was present when Jinnah begged me to stay with the Dominion of India in the interests of Pakistan!

I can only say how sorry I am to have produced this situation.

Yours very sincerely,

DICKIE MOUNTBATTEN

7. Edwina Mountbatten Comments on the Viceroy’s Position
Letter from Edwina Mountbatten to Louis Mountbatten, 5 July 1947
Mountbatten Papers, File No. 113, NMML
SECRET

1. The first essential will be to discuss freely and openly with Pandit Nehru, Sardar Patel and the Congress Leaders the new situation which has arisen and this must be done before Lord Ismay’s departure for London. In this discussion presumably it will be necessary to tell them frankly of Mr. Jinnah’s attitude and decision and to ascertain whether their offer to you to become Governor-General of the Union of India be once again confirmed in the light of more recent developments.

2. It is also essential I feel that Congress should be in complete agreement with the time limit which is being proposed for your appointment, i.e. approximately mid-April 1948. This factor seems important as it may well be that the situation in India and in Pakistan may still be very serious at that period, and Congress may well feel that they could not accept a Governor-General who would be pulling out at a time when the position in India was still a very grave one and when it would be extremely difficult to appoint a high powered successor to deal with Mr. Jinnah. Partition may not even have been effected by mid-April and I think that if any question of accepting the Congress offer is considered one will have to face up to the fact that, even if now they agree to the provisional date, they may come and ask for an extension and it may be equally difficult to pull out then as it would be now.

3. There is another factor which worries me and that is that if Mr. Jinnah adopts the complete Hitler attitude, even if that attitude were to be for the destruction of Pakistan and remove the chance of getting the assets he so badly needs, you will find yourself placed in a very difficult position and might, as a constitutional Governor-General to Congress, possibly prove a liability more than an asset. I think this is most unlikely but it should be borne in mind.
4. Finally there is the factor that if the Congress offer is accepted one will have both mentally and practically to be prepared to serve their interests completely, excepting in those cases where approval will have been received for your services to be used for the best interests of both communities in connection with taking the Chair at Meetings, etc. If Congress felt that you were accepting the offer with the intention of seeing that Pakistan got a square deal from Congress, I sincerely think they would decide they would sooner be served by someone else.

Two personal views I would add are these:

A. I have read carefully the papers prepared by and discussed with your staff on all the various schemes formulated, and particularly the advantages and disadvantages existing if, as now, you are placed in the position where the offer of the Governor-Generalship comes only from Congress. I am afraid that I find the arguments they put forward in most cases contradictory in themselves such as the point in one paper that if you accept office you and the British would certainly be open to the criticism of partiality, while at a later stage the views expressed indicate that the feeling is there would be no criticism of this kind.

I feel however that they are right in trying to make the course as fair and as easy as possible in what is an almost impossible situation, and in the decision on which we must all sympathise with you, stand by you, and advise in the best practical manner.

B. One thing that weighs heavily with me on this whole question and makes me consider that you have a real duty to Congress is the fact that you are in some ways I think in honour bound to them by having let them understand that you would remain here to give your support after the 15th August, and although this was only a verbal assurance and had important qualifications they would, I am certain, feel you had broken faith with them. This however will be cleared up presumably by your talk with them.

E.M. of B.

8. Modalities of Jinnah Assuming Office of Governor-General

Record of interview between Louis Mountbatten and M.A. Jinnah, 5 July 1947
Mountbatten Papers, File No. 194, NMML

Mr. Jinnah came to see me at 6.30 p.m.

I told him that I had a letter from Dr. Ingram asking whether he (Mr. Jinnah) would be prepared to denounce the Poona Pact as far as Pakistan was concerned.

2. Mr. Jinnah said that he intended to see that the Scheduled Castes in Pakistan received really fair treatment and that the Poona Pact as such would certainly not operate in Pakistan. However, he could not give me any details as to what the future position of the Scheduled Castes would exactly be until the Constituent Assembly had discussed the matter.

3. I asked him whether he would like me to submit his name to the King to receive the customary GCMG bestowed on Governors-General on appointment in the Dominions. I also pointed out to him the desirability of reopening to citizens of Pakistan eligibility for decorations. I added that the Orders of the Star of India and of the Indian Empire would, in their very names, be unsuitable; but that the Order of St Michael and St George, which was the customary Order for the Dominions, appeared to me to be eminently suitable. I promised to convey his views on this subject to H.M. Government. He thanked me and said he would like to consider the matter carefully before letting me have an answer.
4. I asked him whether he still wished me to be the Chairman of the Joint Defence Committee if I remained as Governor-General of the Dominion of India; and he confirmed that this was what he wanted. I asked him to let me have a letter to this effect. He promised to send me such a letter.

5. I next asked him whether he had made up his mind about the Dominions flag and whether he liked the design I had sent him. I pointed out that the Union Jack in the upper canton was only one-ninth of the whole area instead of one quarter as in the case of other Dominions. I also told him that I thought the Congress were likely to agree to a similar flag though it was not yet settled. He promised to let me know in good time to have a flag made before the 15th August.

6. I asked him whether he would like me to come down on the 14th August for a farewell ceremony at Karachi, since the Pakistan areas would pass out of my control on the 15th. He said this would give him great pleasure. I promised to go into the details and discuss them with him later.

7. I asked him when and where he was going to call the Constituent Assembly for Pakistan, and he said probably in Karachi at the end of July or beginning of August. We agreed that it was my responsibility to call the Constituent Assembly and he said he would let me know when he wished me to do so.

8. I discussed with him the names of suitable candidates to be Heads of the Defence Services in Pakistan. He said he wanted all three to be British and would like me to provide him with some more particulars of the alternative candidates and possibly to give him an opportunity of seeing the candidates. I promised to do this.

9. He handed me a telegram addressed to the Prime Minister and the Leader of the Opposition, protesting against the exclusion of the Andamans from the Bill. I promised to transmit this. He said he would have a further protest to make on there having been no provision of machinery to ensure that the assets were fairly divided and that their transfer was correctly implemented.

10. I told him that I had been informed that he had recently sent a letter to the Maharaja of Kashmir urging him to joint the Pakistan Constituent Assembly and promising him every sort of favourable treatment if he would do so including the continuation of autocratic government within the State. He absolutely denied having written and said that what was more he had no intention of writing, though he would have liked an opportunity to discuss matters with the Prime Minister, Mr. Kak, next time he came to Delhi. I told him I would ask the Political Department to put him in touch with him when he arrived about the 25th July.

11. We discussed the reconstitution of the Interim Government. I reminded him that the only way I could get Congress to accept partition was to undertake to reconstitute the Government along the lines that Mr. Jinnah had himself accepted for Bengal, at the earliest possible moment. I pointed out that the earliest possible moment had been June 4, but that I had persuaded Congress to wait one month. Now on the 4th July I had again succeeded in making them wait until the passage of the Bill; but I warned him that after July 20 I should be compelled to carry out the reconstitution, and that so far as I could see—as there would be less than four weeks left before partition was complete and power transferred—this could be explained in a communiqué in such a manner that it would in no sense be derogatory to Pakistan. He still expressed his regret but did not seem to be completely against it.
9. Cabinet Discusses Viceroy’s Situation

Extract from minutes of a meeting of Cabinet India and Burma Committee, 7 July 1947

...Confidential Annex

The Governors-General of the two Indian Dominions

THE PRIME MINISTER invited Lord Ismay to make a general statement.

LORD ISMAY said that the Viceroy, before his recent visit to London, had taken the initiative in suggesting to both the Congress and the Muslim League leaders that, in the event of power being transferred in India on the basis of the creation of the two Dominions, there would be obvious advantages in the appointment of a common Governor-General. This idea had been acceptable to Pandit Nehru, but not to Mr. Jinnah, who had put forward the alternative suggestion that there should be two Governors-General and a Supreme Arbitrator to adjudicate on such matters as the division of assets. Nevertheless, Mr. Jinnah had not definitely rejected the idea of one Governor-General, and the Viceroy had certainly been under the impression until quite recently that this arrangement would ultimately be accepted by the Muslim League. In spite of repeated pressure, the Muslim League had avoided making any definite statement of their views on the subject, until the recommendation that Mr. Jinnah should be appointed was made formally on behalf of the Muslim League in the previous week. The present position was, therefore, that the Muslim League had definitely nominated Mr. Jinnah to be Governor-General of Pakistan. Pandit Nehru and Sardar Patel had been informed by the Viceroy of this development; they had been greatly surprised but had renewed their invitation to Lord Mountbatten to serve as Governor-General of India. Furthermore, the Muslim League had definitely stated in their letter recommending Mr. Jinnah as Governor-General that they would welcome Lord Mountbatten’s acceptance of the Governor-Generalship of India....

THE PRIME MINISTER said that it was no easy matter for His Majesty’s Government to decide what advice to give Lord Mountbatten in this matter. In his view, however, there were decisive arguments in favour of pressing him to accept the invitation of the Congress leaders to become Governor-General of India. It was clear that both parties had in fact complete confidence in Lord Mountbatten; Mr. Jinnah’s nomination of himself was no more than an indication of his own egotism. If Lord Mountbatten left India on 15th August, the alternative candidate would presumably be a Hindu; in that event there was serious risk that grave differences would arise between himself and Mr. Jinnah. Moreover, Congress might say that, in advising Lord Mountbatten to leave India, we were yielding to Mr. Jinnah at their expense; in view of the attitude which they had adopted on this question, we should take their interests fully into account.

THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF TRADE said that Mr. Jinnah’s action had created a most unfortunate and difficult situation. While it was admittedly important that the Muslim League should have said that they would welcome Lord Mountbatten’s appointment as Governor-General of India, there was a serious risk, as time passed, that this position and reputation would suffer by the continuance of his service in India as Governor-General of Union of India alone. He had achieved a great reputation and remarkable results by an impartiality which had gained him the confidence of all parties. If he became the Governor-General of one Dominion, he would have to take vigorous action, on advice, in the interests of that Dominion, in such delicate matters as the division of assets.
THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR COMMONWEALTH RELATIONS said that the paramount consideration must be to secure the successful transfer of power in India on the lines decided upon. There was no one whose qualifications for achieving success in this matter were comparable with those of Lord Mountbatten; for this reason, he felt that His Majesty's Government should try to induce Lord Mountbatten to accept the Congress invitation to become Governor-General of India.

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR INDIA also thought that Lord Mountbatten should be pressed to accept the Congress invitation. No other persons could have an equal influence on Congress policy. This factor would be important for three reasons. First, it was still uncertain whether India would ultimately decide to remain in the Commonwealth. Secondly, complex and important negotiations would be necessary between His Majesty's Government and the new Dominion of India regarding future defence arrangements. Thirdly, the partition of assets between the two Dominions would in any event work out unfavourably for Pakistan; Lord Mountbatten would be in a better position than anyone else to exercise a moderating influence on Congress policy in this matter.

There was general agreement among the Ministers that the balance of arguments lay in favour of an attempt to persuade Lord Mountbatten to remain in India for a period as Governor-General of India. While it was recognised that there was some risk that this course might perhaps react unfavourably on Lord Mountbatten's personal position, it was generally thought that, in the interests of the new Dominions of India, he ought to complete the work he had started with such distinction: if his services were lost at this stage, the whole policy embodied in the Indian Independence Bill might be endangered.

The Committee were informed that the Princes were also hopeful that Lord Mountbatten would stay in India; if he went, there was the further probability that many of the British officers of the Indian Army would no longer wish to continue to serve under the new Dominion Governments.

The discussion then turned on the Viceroy's request that an early announcement should be made of the recommendations made by the two Indian Parties for the post of Governor-General in the new Indian Dominions.

LORD ISMAY said that the Viceroy's hope had been that the Prime Minister would be able to explain the history of the matter fully in the House of Commons on the Second Reading of the Indian Independence Bill. Lord Mountbatten had thought that such a statement might be made in connection with Clause 5, which clearly contemplated the possibility there might be only one Governor-General for both Dominions. He was extremely anxious that the full story should be told in order that there should be no suggestion that his sympathies as Viceroy had been with the Congress Party and that he was now openly committed to their side. If the advice of His Majesty's Government could be telegraphed to the Viceroy on 8th July, he would be able to convey his decision on the following day in time for the House of Commons debate. If this procedure was not possible, Lord Mountbatten would wish to tell Pandit Nehru the position in confidence.

In discussion on this proposal, it was pointed out that it would be necessary to avoid making any statement in terms which assumed that Parliament would enact the Bill under discussion; doubt was also felt about the propriety of mentioning at that stage, before the Bill had been enacted, the names of the persons recommended by the Indian parties for the two Governor-Generalships. In particular, the Secretary for State for Commonwealth Relations felt that the mention of names in the House of Commons might not be acceptable to the House of Lords. Against this, it was pointed out that an announcement that there would be two Governor-General which did not mention the names of the persons concerned might result in grave embarrassment; there would undoubtedly be much speculation in India which might result in strong pressure on the Congress leaders to recommend an Indian as Governor-General. Moreover, there was a serious risk of leakage in India during the period while the legislation was under consideration in Parliament.

THE PRIME MINISTER suggested that a statement should be made on the Second Reading of the Indian Independence Bill roughly on the following lines:

‘The House will observe that the Bill leaves it open whether there shall be one or two Governors-General for the two Indian Dominions. It had been intimated to us that it would be most convenient to all concerned to have one Governor-General at least in the initial stages, and for some time we proceeded on this assumption. It has recently become clear, however, that the Muslim League wished a separate Governor-General to be appointed for Pakistan. It is obviously very desirable for this matter to be settled at the earliest opportunity in order that the position may be understood in India, and the new Governors-General prepare themselves to take over at the appropriate time. Both Congress and the Muslim League, who have been recognised as the successor authorities have made recommendations, which have been conveyed by His Majesty’s Government to His Majesty. While formal announcement must wait the enactment of the Bill, His Majesty has intimated that he will be prepared to accept these recommendations as soon as the Bill is passed. The recommendations are (here the names would be given). I wish to add that the recommendation of Lord Mountbatten is also welcomed by the Muslim League. I am quite sure that the House will agree with me that this recommendation shows that Lord Mountbatten has carried out his duties in India with complete impartiality and has won the confidence of all the people of India.

Ministers were in agreement that a statement on the lines suggested by the Prime Minister might be made in the House of Commons on the Second Reading of the Indian Independence Bill.

LORD ISMAY said that he had asked the Viceroy to confirm whether the Muslim League wished him to be Chairman of the Defence Council. It was agreed that, if this was confirmed, it would be a very valuable addition to the statement. In that case it might be advisable to omit the reference to the Muslim League’s welcome to the Congress recommendation on behalf of Lord Mountbatten, in view of the possibility that this might be unwelcome to Congress.

THE PRIME MINISTER said that before any communication was made to the Viceroy it would be necessary to consult the Opposition leaders on the following day; he would then put the matter to the King at his forthcoming Audience with His Majesty.

The Committee

(1) Expressed the hope that Lord Mountbatten would be prepared to accept the Congress invitation for nomination as Governor-General of India.

(2) Agreed that a statement on the lines proposed by the Prime Minister might be made on the Second Reading of the Indian Independence Bill.

(3) Invited the Prime Minister to consult with the Opposition leaders on 8th July.
10. Mountbatten Accepts Governor-Generalship of India

Extract from the minutes of the Viceroy’s fifty-fifth staff meeting, 9 July 1947
T.O.P., Vol. XII, pp. 35–6

Item 1

GOVERNORS-GENERAL

The meeting considered two telegrams which had been received that morning from the Prime Minister. The following was an extract from the first:

‘I would ask you most earnestly to accept the Governor-Generalship of India during this period of transition.’

The second contained the draft of a statement on the nominations of Governors-General for India and Pakistan, which the Prime Minister intended to make the following day in the House of Commons.

A draft reply to the Prime Minister, which had been prepared at a meeting of members of the staff earlier that day, was handed round.

HIS EXCELLENCY stated that he had finally decided to accept the Governor-Generalship of the Dominion of India alone during the period of transition. He wished it now to be put on record, though for the last time, that he was still most uneasy and unhappy about this decision.
He considered, however, that, in view of the overpowering advice which he had received from London, he was choosing the lesser of two evils. He felt that it had been essential to send Lord Ismay home, because His Majesty’s Government had, in a way, been misled.

HIS EXCELLENCY stated that he had that morning shown Pandit Nehru and Sardar Patel the draft statement which the Prime Minister intended to make. They could not have been more charming, and had made no criticism—in fact they had thought it admirable. He had told them that he considered that he was under an obligation to them to stay on and had only asked them to facilitate making clear the fact of his impartiality. They had replied that no-one would imagine that he was being partial. They had further agreed to reference, in the Prime Minister’s speech, to the Muslim League’s approval of his appointment.

HIS EXCELLENCY stated that the Congress leaders had said that they wanted him to stay on as long as he would, but he had insisted on retention of the formula ‘at all events for the transition period’ because this meant that it would be possible to select, nearer the time, the date on which it would be possible to depart with honour. They had accepted this formula.

HIS EXCELLENCY THE VICEROY

(i) approved, subject to amendments which he indicated, the draft reply to the Prime Minister; and directed Pers. Sec. to dispatch it;

(ii) directed Con. Sec. to draft, for his approval, a telegram to Lord Ismay asking him to obtain the Prime Minister’s overall authority for him (Lord Ismay) and Sir Eric Mieville to stay on, and continue to be paid by H.M.G., after the transfer of power....
11. Do Not Expect Rewards for Your Service to India

Extract from M.K. Gandhi’s speech at a prayer meeting in New Delhi, 12 July 1947

CWMG, Vol. LXXXVIII, pp. 321-4

BROTHERS AND SISTERS,

Today I have received a letter from a friend which says: ‘What is happening in the country today is very bad. People who went to jail during the satyagraha movement think they have done something very big which should entitle them to be Prime Minister or Minister or Parliamentary Secretary or Governor of some province. They think they should have a motorcar. I have also been to prison twice and once I was with you in Yeravda. But I have remained a beggar and no one has ever bothered about me!*

If someone has been to jail, has he done a favour to India? If this sort of mentality persists, I fear the Congress will perish. Those who are in the Congress should not even dream of such things. Arguing thus a Congressman may say that, since he has been to jail, his son should be married to the best girl in India or that his daughter should be married to the best young man in India. Jawaharlal has not become the Vice-President or the Prime Minister because he has been to jail. If he does not get his salary, he will not starve. Rajendra Babu might have become the Chief Justice of Patna High Court but he voluntarily gave up practice and chose to live the life of a fakir. Rajaji also has not become a minister by virtue of his jail-going. It is not my contention that they are all angels. They are men like us and all men make mistakes. And how many of us can be absorbed in Government offices? It is an unworthy thought and should be given up. We must never think that we should get some reward for having gone to jail. The reward of doing one’s duty lies in the duty done.

I have been asked: ‘Whereas in Pakistan Mr. Jinnah has been made Governor-General, here in India it is the Viceroy who has been made Governor-General. Why should this be so? The battle for India’s freedom was fought by the Congress. The Muslim League has had no part in it. Whenever the Congress resorted to civil disobedience or satyagraha the League refused to co-operate. Even so the Congress cannot get an Indian as Governor-General. This is not just. This will mean that we shall be safe only if we kowtow to the British or we shall die.’ I shall say that under the scheme that will come into effect on August 15, it does not matter whether the Governor-General is an Englishman, a Frenchman or a Dutchman, whether he is a brown skinned Indian or a White or a Negro. If I had my way a Harijan girl would be the Governor-General. So if Lord Mountbatten becomes the Governor-General he will still be a servant of India. You will say this is the kind of talk to pacify children. Mountbatten, who is a scion of a Royal family, will not be anybody’s servant. But I am not deceiving you. I do not expect any reward from Lord Mountbatten. So long I have been fighting against him. Maybe you will say that the Congress leaders have been deceived by him. Do you mean to say that Jawaharlal, Sardar and Rajaji are so softbrained as to be taken in? True, as I have been saying what I had wanted has not come to pass. But Mountbatten will be Governor-General because we want him. If we did not want him he would not hold that office. But Mr. Jinnah may have chosen to be Governor-General in order to show off. We should not be jealous and we should not be angry. He wants to show to the world what Islam is. Let us see whether he makes of himself a master or a servant. If even a single Sindhi flees, then the responsibility for it will rest on the Governor-General of Pakistan. He will have to be just to all, like Abubaker or Omar, or Ali. I do not say they were all non-violent. But I have in mind their bravery and their chivalry. I understand from the newspapers that originally the idea had been for India and Pakistan to have one Governor-General in common. But Mr. Jinnah later went back on his word. Who was then to prevent him from becoming the Governor-General of Pakistan? In my view he did not do the right thing. When he had once agreed he should have accepted Lord Mountbatten as Governor-General and later if something had gone wrong he could have removed him. Now Islam is to be tested through Mr. Jinnah. He is assuming the Governor-Generalship of Pakistan with the whole world as witness. The world will now wait to see what special virtues Pakistan displays under him. The Congress has always been fighting against the British. Jawaharlal is a simple-hearted man. But the Sardar is a fighter. He used to quarrel with me because I trusted the British. When he himself has been caught up in their wiles, what can you or I hope to do? When he agrees that the Viceroy should be the first Governor-General of India, why should we object? We shall see whether he will serve India as Governor-General or betray her. It will be a new experience. There is wisdom in this and we have nothing to lose. After all we accepted Dominion Status on the advice of the Viceroy. He is an Admiral and a great warrior. Let us have him and if he does not come up to our expectations we can always fight with him.

...I do not consider him a bad man. If Jawaharlal or Sardar Patel had become Governor-General in his place it would have been a dangerous thing. Besides, the Governor-General wields no effective power. He will have to act on the advice of Jawaharlal and his cabinet. He will only be a figurehead.

But we have got into the way of thinking that Lord Mountbatten has great status and the English are capable only of devilry. Lord Mountbatten therefore will have to prove his honesty and love of justice and I am sure that he has come to India to do only justice. Many Muslims come to see me these days. They too are nervous about Pakistan. One can understand Christians, Parsis and other non-Muslims feeling uneasy, but why Muslims? They say they are treated as Quislings, that they will receive even worse treatment than the Hindus in Pakistan and after full power has been transferred to Pakistan their association with the Congress will be considered a crime according to the tenets of Shariyat. I do not agree that this is the meaning of Islam. What crime was committed by the Congress having Muslims within its fold? Do Muslims by associating with the Congress become criminals? Do they not say Kalma or perform the namaaz? Has Islam changed so much since the time of the Ali Brothers? How can nationalist Muslims be called Quislings? I do hope that Mr. Jinnah, while he protects the non-Muslim minorities in Pakistan, will also at the same time accord protection to these Muslims.

12. A Common Governor-General Was a Generous Gesture to Pakistan

Telegram from Louis Mountbatten to Earl of Listowel, 13 July 1947

T.O.P., Vol. XII, p. 142

SECRET

NEW DELHI

No. 1938-S. Your telegram No. 8975 of July 11th.

Position is that parties have agreed to nominate one Judge each for Arbitral Tribunal, in consultation with Chairman. Chief Justice of India has been invited to be Chairman. He has not yet had time to reply. Terms of reference have not yet been considered and general position is explained in my reply to your telegram 8974.

2. I agree to the draft reply proposed in paragraph 3 of your telegram.
3. In reply to any supplementary questions I feel it would not be unfair to point out that as most of the assets are in the Dominion of India their agreement to a common Governor-General was a generous gesture to Pakistan who have voluntarily deprived themselves of the advantage this system would have conferred on the Dominion with the least assets in situ.

4. Congress are feeling very sore at being led up the garden path by Jinnah over a matter in which they were sincerely trying to help him.

13. Mountbatten to Be Governor-General because He Can Work with Speed

Extract from M.K. Gandhi’s speech at a prayer meeting in New Delhi, 22 July 1947
CWMG, Vol. LXXXVIII, pp. 398-400

BROTHERS AND SISTERS,

I have received a letter today. It says: ‘You have given Lord Mountbatten too much of a build-up. You seem to imply that Lord Mountbatten can do no wrong. But if you will remember at the Second Round Table Conference you had said that when freedom was achieved the Viceroy’s house would be turned into a home for Harijan children or a hospital. Your present attitude is not in conformity with this.’

I do not give anyone any kind of build-up. I want nothing from Lord Mountbatten. And he wants nothing from me. I do not want even titles and he has nothing else to give. It is said that I am always rebuking my own people and never can find anything good to say of them. So far as Lord Mountbatten is concerned he must for the moment continue to live in the Viceroy’s house. If I could drag him out of it I would keep him with me. But he has to meet the Princes there and rectify the mistakes of the past. He has to undo the harm those mistakes have done. And he has been made Governor-General precisely because he can work with speed. Giving him this office does not imply any flattery of him. And do you think Jawaharlal and Sardar Patel are the kind of people to flatter anyone? But if the Viceroy has deceit in his heart only he will be the loser. My sixty years’ experience tells me that he who seeks to deceive others deceives only himself. But I do not really know whether Lord Mountbatten will remain permanently in the Viceroy’s house or whether it will be made into a hospital. Only Jawaharlal and Sardar will know about it.

Another correspondent wants to know if the proposal to retain British officers in the army and the partition of the army has my approval. The correspondent should rather ask me if I approve of the retention of the army itself. Keeping an army, whatever its nature or size, can have no support from me. But times have changed. I had fondly assumed that we were all or almost all non-violent. But my eyes have now been opened. What I had taken to be non-violence, I now see, was only passive resistance. Passive resistance is resorted to by a person who does not have arms. We were simply obliged to be non-violent while we had violence in our hearts. And now with the British withdrawing from India we are spending that violence in fighting against each other. I am certain that I never had any violence in my heart. But what am I to do about others? They argue that the fact they were non-violent in the fight against the British does not necessarily mean that they should be non-violent now. The fault is mine. My teaching during the last thirty-two years was imperfect. If I am asked I will still say that I am not for maintaining an army. Is India going to be a military State? From Bengal, the Punjab and Bihar there are demands for the army to be sent. If at one place it is Hindus who want the army to protect them, at another it is Muslims. I therefore have no knowledge about how the army is going to be divided and I do not care to waste my time over things which do not interest me....

Chapter 31. Partition of Punjab

1. ‘The Chenab—Natural Demarcation Line’

Extract from an editorial in The Tribune, 3 June 1947

League Fascism insists that religion should be taken as synonymous with nationality and India should be split up into two or more sovereign States. However fantastic and absurd this Jinnahian proposition may be, when the British Government is willing and indeed bent upon enforcing it, it cannot be pooh-poohed. It has got to be taken seriously and not only it, but also its obvious corollary that the Punjab must be partitioned has got to be given due regard. History, geography, politics, economics, all emphasize that in dividing the Punjab special attention will have to be paid to the rights and interests of the martial Sikh nation, which has no homeland in the whole world except in the Land of Five Rivers. On the maintenance of its solidarity is contingent its continued existence as a living nation. In our yesterday’s leader we indicated the regions in which the Panth’s roots had gone deep. Any partition plan that cuts through them will deprive the Khalsa considerably of the sap of life and will, therefore, be wholly unacceptable to the Sikhs. To every impartial observer the Chenab will appeal as the most natural demarcation line, which will not only keep the Panth practically intact, but also largely prevent the infliction of injustice on the non-Muslims and democratic-minded Muslims. If the non-Muslim majority area runs only up to the Lahore District, there will be 26 lacs of Sikhs in the Eastern Punjab (70 per cent) and 11½ lacs in the Western Punjab, (30 per cent). This will be tantamount to the disruption and ruin of the Panth and such a prospect it cannot contemplate with equanimity. Nor can it put up with the division along the Ravi. For according to it, there will be 28¼ lacs of Sikhs in the Eastern Punjab (75 per cent) and 9¼ lacs of them in the Western Punjab (25 per cent). This also amounts to the maiming and mangling of the Panth, which the Khalsa can on no account tolerate. The Panth will live and thrive only if the demarcation line coincides with the Chenab. In that case the Sikhs in the Eastern Punjab will number 35.1 lacs (93.5 per cent) and those in the Western Punjab will number 2.4 lacs (6.5 per cent). A population of 2.4 lacs can be easily removed from one tract of land to another and even if it stays where it is, the situation remains practically unaltered. As regards the Multan District east of the Chenab the Sikhs need not cast longing glances at it except at the Khanewal Tehsil, where they have some vital interests and if they get this Tehsil, they may not bother about the rest of the land in it....
2. ‘H.M.G.’s Plan Unsatisfactory and Disappointing—M. Tara Singh’

Extract from a report in The Tribune, 5 June 1947

New Delhi, June 4.—Master Tara Singh, Akali Sikh leader, in a statement tonight said that although H.M.G.’s plan conceded the principle of partition of the Punjab, it is unsatisfactory and disappointing in several respects for the Sikhs.

‘There is no positive division at all for giving the Sikhs their homeland and their deserved status or political power. Nor have they been armed with means to safeguard their rights in constitution-making. In fact, notional division breaks up the solidarity of the Sikhs by dividing their population and their heritage into two halves. Even H.E. the Viceroy while expressing his concern for the welfare of the Sikhs admits this ruinous effect. We cannot accept anything like notional division. It is not a matter of mere political power for us: our very existence is at stake’....

3. ‘Think It Over’

Extract from an editorial in Dawn, 7 June 1947

It is quite evident from the utterances of Sikh leaders like Master Tara Singh that they are utterly bewildered and disconsolate at the turn which events have taken for them. When a Sikh questioner asked Lord Mountbatten at his Press Conference why the Sikhs had been split into two by the partition of the Punjab, it was the Viceroy’s turn to be bewildered. Very understandably he asked whether it was not true that the Sikhs themselves had begged for partition and got the Congress to pass a resolution to the effect that predominantly Muslim areas should be partitioned from the predominantly non-Muslim areas of the Punjab. His Excellency did not say in so many words but what he clearly wanted to convey was that in spite of his great love for the Sikh community he had been unable to help them against themselves. The position today is, to put it quite bluntly, that the Sikhs have made the bed and must now perforce lie on it. If they find it a bed of thorns, the thorns are of all their own implanting....

As we see it, there are three courses open to the Sikhs now. First; they can accept the Plan as it is and be content with the proposed partition of the Punjab. If they do so, they will inevitably find that the Boundary Commission has still further reduced the area of the Eastern Punjab, because if one or two contiguous Tehsils or similar areas are taken away from Western Punjab and added to Eastern Punjab, the Eastern Punjab will have to yield to Western Punjab a far greater proportion of its own territory on the same principle. The Sikhs will remain a minority of a little over 20 per cent in their so-called new ‘homeland.’ They will decidedly not have the predominant position in administration and other spheres, which they vainly seek. And in the Western Punjab, where half their population will still remain, they will be entitled to no special considerations or concessions. Second; they can continue to ‘fight’ and carry on what Gyani Kartar Singh has described as guerrilla warfare. If they decide to do so, the only result will be more bloodshed on both sides. Whatever support the Sikhs may receive from either Hindustan or from some of the Sikh Princes, they will never be able to ‘conquer the Punjab,’ as some of them seem still vainly to hope.... Third; they can restore the unity of the Punjab and their own unity, by revising their policy, facing realities and seeking for themselves all possible concessions within the limits of justice and reason. This is only possible if they turn from the Congress to the Muslim League which alone can deliver to them the goods.
We urge Sikh leaders to turn all this over in their minds and take their final decision without their judgment being clouded by the bitterness which the past few months conflict and bloodshed have naturally created. They may not admit it publicly but they know in their own hearts that the bloodshed which has taken place in the Punjab and in which their community has undoubtedly suffered grievous losses in life and property, was provoked not by the Muslims but by themselves. There is nothing but sadness in Muslim hearts at these tragic happenings but let these be matters of the past. These memories can be forgotten and these wounds healed; friendship can emerge out of this welter of enmity; Muslim and Sikh may together add to the glory of Pakistan. But only if the Sikhs will release themselves from the leading strings of others and begin to think and act for themselves....The Sikhs can secure by friendly and unqualified overtures to the Muslim League a far better position for themselves in a united Punjab than they will have in any part of a divided Punjab if they pursue their present policy. The door of Western Pakistan is wide open for the Sikhs to enter, only if they can muster enough commonsense and goodwill to pass through it into contentment, security and partnership with the Muslim nation.

1 This Press Conference was held in New Delhi after the announcement of H.M.G.’s 3 June Plan.

4. ‘Partition of Punjab and the Sikhs’

Extract from a letter to the editor in Dawn, 7 June 1947

Sir,—The Akali leadership is following in the footsteps of Hindu capitalists and they conveniently seem to have forgotten the machinations of the Congress Party during the last general elections. Due to unwise handling of Sikhs’ affairs the hitherto unimpaired solidarity of the Panth is at stake. Our leaders are deliberately keeping mum about the nefarious activities of Hindu dominated Praja Mandals with respect to Patiala, Faridkot, Nabha, Kapurthala and Jind States.

The Hindu capitalists and their so-called Nationalist Press have whole-heartedly supported the partition of the Punjab to meet their own selfish ends. By keeping the Sikhs on their side they have been able to get major portions of Ambala and Jullundur Divisions even by agreeing to carve out predominant Muslim areas from both these divisions. As Ambala division has generally been a liability to the Punjab Exchequer there is a move to annex the partitioned areas of Eastern Punjab with Meerut Division, and certain other districts of U.P. In this way they will bring the Sikh population in the newly constituted unit of Hindustan to 5 or 6 per cent....

I am voicing the feelings of thousands nay lakhs of Sikhs and in the name of our great Gurus and Panth I request our great and respected Master Tara Singh and the Hon’ble S. Baldev Singh to reconsider their position for the good of the Sikhs at large or to convene an All-Parties Sikh Conference. It will be in the fitness of things if we could arrive at an honourable settlement with the great Muslim nation who are so friendly to us in their independent countries. It is high time that we should be friendly to all and hostile to none which is the characteristic of a Khalsa.—Yours, etc.

Simla

S. Trilok Singh
Bahawalpur,

Dear Master Sujan Singh,

I am very troubled by the prospect which is looming ahead of us in the Punjab but I believe it is now possible for the Sikh Leaders to take steps which will avert wide-spread and perhaps chronic disorder and turmoil; and I believe also that the interests in the Sikh Community lie in their taking these steps. This explains why I am writing to you again after so many months.

Broadly speaking, I would like to suggest that the time has now at last come for the Sikh Community definitely to throw in their lot with their brethren in the Punjab and take their place in the new Dominion or State of Pakistan. The present proposals for the partition of the Punjab imply that the Eastern portion will go to Hindustan and the Western portion to Pakistan. A partition of the Punjab leading to these groupings of its two halves will, I am certain, be fatal not only to the peace and good order of the Punjab itself but also to the Sikh Community. A boundary line could hardly be further west than the Beas. Assuming that it is along the Beas with Amritsar District also included in the Eastern Punjab nearly half the Sikh Community will be left on the wrong side of the line. It is quite certain that if the Sikhs insist on Eastern Punjab joining Hindustan the Muslims will treat the Sikh Minority in the Western Punjab little better than sweepers. Owing to the close inter-mingling of the populations this will tend to set up strife in the two halves of the Punjab which will probably spread and spread till gradually the whole of Northern India is involved in turmoil and there may well be 50 to 100 years of anarchy such as we have been seeing in China during our life time.

Personally, I believe that the very attempt to draw a boundary line between Hindustan and Pakistan somewhere right in the middle of Lahore or Jullundur Divisions will itself produce such strife that the conditions prevailing for the last two months in the Punjab will be aggravated and indefinitely prolonged.

What would come out of all this strife cannot be predicted; but no rational and humane leader should precipitate such conditions gambling on the possibility that out of the blind clash of disorganized forces his community may be the gainer. Communities do not rise or flourish as a result of gambling leadership such as this.

I would like, therefore, to recommend most earnestly to you and to other Sikh friends that you should now come to terms with the Muslims on the understanding that the Sikh Community as a whole will throw in their lot with Pakistan. In return for this the Muslims will, I believe, be prepared to make to the Sikh Community considerable concessions so that they will be able to feel that their place in the Pakistan State is quite secure. Now is your time to reach a ‘Samjhota’ with the Muslims for they know the disadvantages of a ‘truncated’ Pakistan. There is no reason why you should not secure from them:

(1) A separate Sikh unit of Eastern Pakistan with rights in respect of the Pakistan Central Government equal to any other Unit e.g. Sind or Western Punjab.
(2) Special privileges for the Sikh Minority in the Western Punjab.
(3) Special privileges for the Sikhs in the Pakistan as a whole.

If the Sikhs take this course they will become far and away the most important minority in the Pakistan and it will be to the Muslims own interest to make them happy, secure and contended.
Furthermore, it is probable that for some years Pakistan will remain a Dominion of the British Commonwealth. This would give the Sikhs a certain amount of added security.

It is also probable that in the course of time the initial cold relations between Hindustan and Pakistan will become closer and warmer. Geography, past history and economic factors will tend to draw the two parts of India together, and when this happens the Sikhs’ position will be still further safeguarded.

I know what I have written runs counter to the policy which the Sikhs have been following for the last few months, but it is absurd to blind yourselves to the fact that the real interests of the Sikh community lie with North-West India rather than with Hindustan. The latest proposals of HMG have put you in a strong bargaining position which should enable you to take your rightful place in the future set up of India with the maximum security. Don’t let the opportunity slip. This is the moment to come to terms with the League.

I feel so strongly on this subject that I would very much like to have an opportunity of discussing it with you, Master Tara Singh and others.

I tried to contact Giani Kartar Singh recently, but could not do so. I would gladly run up to Lahore if you could arrange a meeting either there or in Amritsar. June 12th, 13th or the 23rd would be the most convenient dates for me, but I would somehow or other arrange to come on any day that would suit you and others.

Please excuse this long letter, but these are important matters. I do beg you to consider them.

With kind regards, I hope all goes well at Sirhali in spite of all the trouble in Amritsar.

Yours sincerely,

Master Sujan Singh Sirhali
Distt. Amritsar

6. Hindus Fear Slavery in Pakistan

Letter from Nand Lal Ahuja to M.K. Gandhi, 10 June 1947
AICC Papers, File No. G-34/1947, NMML

Mandi Jagat Rai,
Mianwali,

My most beloved Mahatmaji,

Since the matter of boundary has been settled by the British without any regard for our cherished goal of united India for which you have given your life long devotion, it is now time to think of saving us from the perpetual slavery in the Pakistan. Unless our beloved Hindustan helps us we are here always doomed. It very essential we may be migrated into Hindustan zone as quickly as possible. Property, home, hearth has no value before liberty and freedom. We helpless Hindus look to you to save us from horrible distruction. [sic]

Jai Hind.

Your most obedient servant,
(Nand Lal Ahuja)

If Lord Mountbatten is sympathetic towards ‘Innocent Victims’, he must arrange for cheap transport.
7. ‘Indian Christians and Division of Punjab’
Extract from an editorial in The Tribune, 10 June 1947

It appears that the machinery for the division of India is being set up in a quick and elaborate manner and it is now no use our talking of the necessity and glory of unity. Division seems to be a settled fact and we must face it as brave realists....The Hindus, including the Scheduled Castes, and the Sikhs may be the two most important communities whose rights and interests have to be taken into consideration....But the Indian Christians are not such an inconspicuous and inconsiderable community that they be ignored. They number thirty-two and a half lacs in the whole country....They are an enlightened and cultured lot and they have plenty of talent and ability.... Politically they are highly progressive and extremely liberal. They do not believe in separate electorates; they believe in undiluted democracy. ‘Religion should be kept divorced from politics’—that has been their motto....

Intellectually, temperamentally, traditionally the Indian Christians have remained in close alliance with the Congress. And they will feel far at home in Hindustan than in Pakistan.

Theocratic Pakistan will be the homeland of the Muslims. Democratic Hindustan will be the homeland of all communities....The large majority of the Indian Christians in the Punjab would like the province to be so divided that they might find themselves in Hindustan....only 21,291 Indian Christians will be interested in Western Pakistan outside the Punjab. In comparison with their total population of thirty-two and a half lacs how small this number looks! Their interests in the Sindhi, Baluchi and Pathan (if the Frontier votes for the League) parts of Pakistan will be practically nothing....they would like the Land of Five Rivers to be so partitioned that as many of them in it might be connected with the main Christian body in Hindustan as possible. The large majority of Indian Christians—more than twenty lacs—live in Madras. In Bombay their population is about four lacs. Both these provinces will form integral parts of Hindustan. The overwhelming majority of Punjabi Christians would love to be in intimate contact with the long stream of Christian life flowing in Hindustan. How can the fulfilment of this legitimate desire of theirs be secured? In this province Indian Christians are found generally concentrated in districts situated east of the Chenab, where they number 486,000. If the Chenab is decided to be the boundary line between Hindustan and Pakistan only 58,000, that is, only 1.8 per cent of the whole Christian population will be left in the Western Punjab. The heaviest stakes of the Punjabi Christians lie in the districts of Sialkot, Gujranwala, Sheikhpura, Lyallpur, Gurdaspur and Lahore and if these districts are included in the Hindustan part of the Punjab, the satisfaction of the Christian community will be ensured....

8. ‘H.M.G.’s Plan Rejected by Punjab Mahasabha’
Extract from a report in The Tribune, 12 June 1947

Lahore, June 11.—H.M.G.’s Plan of June 3 has been rejected by the Executive Committee of the Punjab Provincial Hindu Mahasabha.

A meeting of the Executive Committee of the provincial Mahasabha was held on Monday last, Bhai Parmanand presiding, and adopted a lengthy resolution denouncing the H.M.G.’s latest statement.

The Committee reiterated Mahasabha’s firm faith in the integrity of India and once more declared unequivocally that no constitution based on vivisection of India would be acceptable to the Hindus.
The Committee further declared: ‘The present plan is no solution of the communal problem but will, on the other hand, perpetuate communal strife both in the Hindu majority and Hindu minority areas.’

The Committee deplored ‘the weak-kneed’ policy of the Congress in accepting the League’s demand in ‘toto’ and in the Sabha’s opinion the present plan was a clear triumph of the League’s creed of violence over the Congress’s creed of non-violence.

‘The Executive Committee was afraid that after the Pakistan had been established in Western Punjab, the 5,000 or so people arrested on charges of alleged murder, arson, abduction and loot might be granted general amnesty. The Committee, therefore, called upon the Government to make arrangements that these cases might be tried by impartial tribunals so that no miscarriage of justice takes place.

Jhelum: Boundary Line

The Committee on behalf of the provincial Hindu Mahasabha strongly disapproved of the inclusion of only the Ambala and Jullundur divisions and the district of Amritsar in the proposed Eastern Punjab zone and placed on record its demand that the boundary of Eastern Punjab should be along the river Jhelum for the following reasons:

(i) The Punjab, the land of five rivers, is a holy land for the Hindus because the Vedas were first revealed here and no portion of this province lying within these five rivers should be tacked to the proposed Pakistan.

(ii) The Punjab was held originally by the British Government as a sacred trust on behalf of Maharaja Dalip Singh and if at all it was to be detached from Hindustan it should not be placed under the domination of Mohammedans but restored to the Sikhs.

(iii) The Hindus and Sikhs hold enormous stakes both in religious sanctity, property, commerce and industry in the districts of Lahore division and the districts of Montgomery and Lyallpur.

(iv) That the total territorial areas included in the Pakistan State should under no circumstances exceed 22 per cent of the area of British India since this is the ratio of Muslim population in India....

The Executive Committee also resolved that the Hindu majority districts in Sind be partitioned off and constituted in a separate province.

9. ‘Unity of Panth Stressed: Critical Hour—Sikh Leaders’ Speeches at Delhi’

Extract from a report in The Tribune, 14 June 1947

New Delhi, June 12.—The absolute necessity of Panthic unity at this critical hour in the history of the Panth was emphasised by His Highness the Raja of Faridkot in his opening address at a conference of leading Sikhs of all shades of opinion held at Faridkot House.

His Highness considered the British Government’s latest plan ‘unholy inasmuch as it divides the Sikhs into two equal halves’ and warned them of the dangers that were ahead. He exhorted them to unite as true followers of Guru Gobind Singh and face the situation with a strong mind and stout heart. He assured them of the support of the Maharaja of Patiala as well as himself and other Sikh princes in all matters wherein the betterment of the Panth lay.
Sardar Baldev Singh, Defence Member, Interim Government, also stressed the need for unity of the Panth and welcomed the participation of Sikh Rulers in all matters pertaining to the Panth. He, however, felt that the Sikh Princes should have come forward earlier to lead the Panth when Muslim Princes had been openly supporting the Muslim League for a long time and had not shirked their responsibilities.

Sardar Amar Singh, Acting President, Shromani Akali Dal, Sardar Harnam Singh, and Sardar Ujjal Singh, also addressed the conference and stressed the need for unity of the Panth.—United Press

10. No Enthusiasm for Partition

Extract from a letter from Evan Jenkins to Louis Mountbatten, 15 June 1947

Secret Government House, Lahore

No. 683

Dear Lord Mountbatten,

The main event of the fortnight was the announcement of 3rd June. It is now possible to give fairly accurate appreciation of the reactions to it.

2. There is a complete absence of enthusiasm for the partition plan—nobody seems pleased, and nobody seems to want to get on with the job. The plan has had no discernible effect on communal relations, which remain as they were. Nor is there any sign of special anxiety for, or hostility to, Dominion Status.

On the other hand, the political parties here acquiesce in the plan, but (as is usual in matters of this kind in India) for widely differing reasons. Muslim Leaguers think it a master-stroke by Jinnah, who has secured the recognition of Pakistan and will in the end get them all they want. Congressmen think it a master-stroke by Patel, who, having pushed the Muslims into a corner (or into two corners) will be able to destroy them before very long. Patel’s private conversation is reported to be menacing—Barq who was a Minister in the Coalition Government told me he had heard him say that Hindustan could quickly make an end of its Muslim inhabitants if Pakistan did not behave. This may be quite untrue, but the story represents the attitude the Hindus hope and the Muslims fear Patel will take up. The Sikhs pin their faith on the Boundary Commission; they are now said to be fairly well organised in the districts they think critical, and it is quite likely that they will refuse to go very far with partition until they know where the boundary will run. Their latest announcement demands exchanges of property and transfers of population.

Intelligent people not deeply committed to the political parties are far from happy. They do not believe that partition will settle anything, and the disturbance it will cause will make them at best uncomfortable and at worst insecure. Land values are said to be falling in the colony districts, and there are many stories about the ‘flight of capital’ from Lahore.

Generally, the atmosphere of fatalism continues. It was ordained from the first that the communities should massacre and loot one another; nothing can alter this; unity means ruin of one kind, and partition ruin of another; if there is to be ruin anyway partition seems the simpler and perhaps the less bloody form of it....

3. ...Indian members of the all-India Services are worried. The Muslims are, I understand, already parceling out the more lucrative Pakistan appointments among themselves. The non-Muslims do not think they will be safe in the Western Punjab, and hope to be accommodated in Hindustan.

The Provincial Services (composed almost entirely of Punjabis with a sprinkling of Anglo-Indians) are in much the same case. It is assumed that there will be a communal split—Muslims to the West, others to the East—and I have no doubt that the scramble for appointments will soon begin.

The great mass of the Subordinate Services—including anything from an Inspector of Police recruited provincially to a Constable or office messenger recruited on a district basis—can in my opinion be dealt with only by gradual adjustments, but they will not escape the general ferment.

So far as the services are concerned, we are going through a very difficult time, with some men yearning to leave India, others trying to please new masters, and others again upset and apprehensive. The old administrative machine is rapidly falling to pieces.

4. I have kept your Excellency informed of what I have done to get the Partition Proceedings started....

Elsewhere, largely I think because of the presence of troops in all districts likely to give trouble, the fortnight has been fairly quiet, Gujranwala had some communal stabbings; and bomb explosions, suspicious fires, and minor incidents are so common that one hardly notices them in the District reports.

Our liaison with Northern Command is excellent. Messervy established a Tactical Headquarters at Government House, Lahore for about a week from 4th June – a very useful experiment which can be repeated if necessary....

Yours sincerely,
E. M. Jenkins

11. Punjab Congress MLAs Reject Balkanized India
Telegram from Mulraj Mehta to J.B. Kripalani, 15 June 1947
AICC Papers, File No. G-34/1947, NMML

Multan
To Acharya Kriplani, ND
Punjab Congress MLAs carry voters mandate only for united Punjab in united India (stop) morally and constitutionally they can use their voters en bloc against division or resign en bloc to seek fresh mandate otherwise gross betrayal of (stop) Congress ideals of truth and democracy demand resignation of President Congress office holders and MLAs in at least seventeen Western Punjab Districts and fresh elections on current issues of vital importance to honour life, property and political and social rights of people on this side. Still better if the AICC under your leadership acts in accordance with high ideals and integrity of national Congress and rejects balkanised India (stop) remember members of Interim Govt. and AICC were raised to their positions on slogans of United India and complete independence therefore their voting otherwise will mean cheating people for personal or party vested interests and inviting youths to revolt against the Congress that they built with their blood and bones.

12. Representation on Boundary Commission for the Scheduled Castes

Letter from Abbott to G.E.B. Abell enclosing a paper by Chaudhri Sunder Singh, MLA, 18 June 1947

Government House, Lahore,

My dear Abell,

I am enclosing herewith a copy of a paper left with His Excellency by Chaudhri Sunder Singh, MLA., a representative of the Scheduled Castes, at the end of an interview yesterday. Chaudhri Sunder Singh was particularly insistent that this should be forwarded to you.

Yours sincerely,

S. E. Abbott.

Enclosure

Paper by Sunder Singh

Undated

(1) ‘Scheduled Caste people should be given representation on the Boundary Commission. It is difficult to appreciate the point that 37½ lacs of the Punjab Sikhs can be given representation on the Boundary Commission while 16 lacs of the Scheduled Caste people should go unrepresented.

(2) Crown and waste land, especially of the colonies of the Punjab should be given to Scheduled Caste people for their own colonisation as they mainly depend on agriculture. These Colonists should then be allowed to join any Assembly—Eastern Punjab or that of the Western Punjab. If the line demarcation is fixed along the River Chenab, we the Scheduled Caste people may give up the above prayer.’

13. Report from Punjab

Extract from the fortnightly report on Punjab for the first half of June 1947, 21 June 1947

Home Poll (I), File No. 18/6/47, NAI

1. POLITICAL.—The reception of the announcement of 3rd June was unexpectedly quiet. The posting of troops to districts likely to give trouble, and the broadcasts of His Excellency the Viceroy and the Party leaders did much to reassure the public. Moreover, the Press had largely anticipated the terms of the announcement, and so reduced the surprise and shock it might otherwise have occasioned.

Since the 3rd of June, public, political and communal thought has been devoted almost entirely to a study of the award, which is what the Plan is commonly accepted to be. Despite the absence of determined manifestations of rejection, it cannot be accepted that the solution which has been adopted has met with ready acceptance, except by that section of the public which is anxious for peace on almost any terms. Among political and communal organisations, there is disapproval and there is also dismay which varies in degree with the communities and organisations concerned, and with the places of residence of the members and adherents of both. This is not the medium for the presentation of an analysis in detail of all the feelings and views which are involved, but generally it can be said that dissatisfaction is less pronounced in the case of Hindus than of Muslims, and that of the three communities the Sikhs are the most upset and worried. Hindus in the Punjab still favour a united India under a strong centre. Their opposition to the award, however, is not great because Congress has accepted it, and in doing so has conceded what is felt to be a minimum to the Muslims. Hindus hope that the Boundary Commission will give them Lahore and feel that their interest in territory north of the river Ravi now is not so great as it was. They also find solace in the thought that Hindu India will have a large number of Muslims which should ensure Pakistan’s good treatment of Hindus in Muslim territory. At any rate they think that Dominion Status will be a guarantee of good behaviour, and that if it does not materialise Muslims will be driven back to unity by economic and other difficulties. These thoughts are not without malice, but they seem to ensure loyalty to the Congress from the majority and a lack of support to the Hindu Maha Sabha should it attempt to embark on a line of overt action to emphasise the strong condemnation of His Majesty’s Government’s Plan which it has proclaimed. Muslims on the whole are allured by the knowledge that a homeland of their own is in the process of being granted to them, and many of those to whom the advantage does not at present apply, are not devoid of hope that when territory is finally adjusted they will not be excluded. Sikhs are between the devil and the deep sea. The partition the Plan envisages divides their strength and leaves them in a minority in both areas. Their predicament is increased by their fear of offending Congress. They have, therefore, been driven back on reiterating their demands and perfecting the organisation of their forces. Their endeavour in both directions is positive in character. The Sikhs are pinning their hopes upon the Boundary Commission and the Congress, but their latest circular issued by the Shiromani Akali Dal shows that confidence in the strength of the Panth has neither been undermined nor surrendered. The circular states that Pakistan means total death to the Sikh Panth and that the Sikhs are determined on a free sovereign State with the Chenab and the Jamna as its borders; and it calls on all Sikhs to fight for this ideal under the flag of the Dal. In earlier reports the loyalty of most Sikhs to the Panth has been mentioned as something which has to be accepted. The allegiance of Sikh States to the Panth, or at any rate a working understanding between the two, is something which has become more obvious during the last fortnight.

Congressmen have not yet abandoned hope of a United Punjab. The two halves of the Punjab Legislative Assembly have been summoned to meet on the 23rd of June and, when the meetings take place it is intended to move resolutions that the Punjab shall remain undivided and allied to the rest of India. Should this fail, resolutions will be moved in the Eastern and Western sections of the Assembly declaring adherence to the Constituent Assembly which already exists. In this matter it is understood that orders from the Centre are being followed, and that Congress interest in the N.W.F.P. is involved in the line of action which is being adopted. Congress feel that the establishment of a free Muslim State in the Western Punjab will influence the referendum in the Frontier in a way which is against Congress interests, and are anxious that this should be avoided. It is said that the Sikhs are not entirely enamoured of this proposal but that Congress are depending on them and on the dissatisfaction of those Muslims who are in danger of being left out of Pakistan to furnish some of the support required. They are also counting on the influences of certain prominent Muslims who have always expressed the strongest opposition to the partition of their Province. It is doubtful if any success will attend these endeavours except in the case of the Eastern Punjab whose adherence to the existing Constituent Assembly has for long been almost a foregone conclusion.
It is not improbable that the holding of the session of the Legislative Assembly will increase tension in Lahore and possibly in other places nearby. At the same time it can be accepted that the Boundary Commission when it starts work will create a situation of a more explosive kind. All the three communities are looking to the Commission to give to each what none of the others is prepared to part with. In these circumstances grave dissatisfaction is unavoidable. It is nevertheless desirable that the Commission should complete its work without delay, for the sooner doubts are removed the better.

On the assumption that there will be partition, machinery for the examination of the problems involved is being set up in consultation with the Party leaders....

14. ‘The Division of the Punjab’
Extracts from a pamphlet, undated

The Division of the Punjab
Second Revised Edition

‘Moreover the position of the Punjab is complicated by the existence of the compact, well organized and distinct Sikh community, whose ancestors at one time controlled the Punjab’......
‘the fact is that today the Sikhs have declared their strong resolve not to be incorporated in Pakistan. The events of the last few months are, if anything, likely to strengthen their resolve’.

(Extracted from the leader of ‘The Times of India, Bombay, dated 2nd May, 1947)

The Division of the Punjab
The Punjab, ‘Land of Five Rivers,’ is the country enclosed and watered by the Jhelum, Chenab, Ravi, Beas and Sutlej, but the province as now constituted includes also the table-land between the Sutlej, and the Jumna rivers to the south, the Sindh Sagar Doab between the rivers Indus and Jhelum, and the Dera Ghazi Khan district and Isakhel tehsil of Mianwali situated beyond the river Indus. The Province with its states has a total area of 138,105 square miles (about 1/10th larger than the British Isles) and is distributed as below:—

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th></th>
<th>Survey Area.</th>
<th>Revenue Record Area.</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>(a) British Punjab</td>
<td>99,089 sq. miles.</td>
<td>91,571 sq. miles.</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>(b) States</td>
<td>39,016 sq. miles.</td>
<td>39,052 sq. miles.</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

Survey areas include even the uninhabited and unowned areas such as the river beds, lakes and the perpetual snow areas in the mountains. For purposes of the calculations of the division of the Punjab, the revenue record areas of the Punjab Government as printed on page 52 of the Census of India, Vol. VI Punjab 1941 should be taken. The total areas of the British Punjab is [sic] 191,571 sq. miles. The revenue record areas include all areas culturable, Ghair mumkin and Shamlats etc. owned by somebody but exclude all areas which are not owned by anybody and are not inhabitable.

The Punjab is divided into 29 districts constituting five divisions. The districts are generally too large to be suitable for efficient civil administration on a democratic basis. Their administration in the past was possible because the only cause to be served was that of Imperialism but it is now no longer possible, as due to the development of irrigation projects and the colonization of barren lands, the areas under irrigation and the population have enormously increased and now when India is going to be free much attention has to be paid to the uplift of the masses both educationally and economically as well as to industrialization. The engineering development in P.W.D. with ten Chief Engineers and an eleventh in the making (Hydro-electric, two; Buildings and Roads, three; and Irrigation, six) has made the administration unwieldy with no co-ordinating efficiency. The districts, therefore, need to be changed according to the irrigation boundaries of the canals. The canal[s] are the primary wealth of the Punjab as an agricultural province and it is high time that the district boundaries should be changed according to canal boundaries for the convenience and efficiency of administration. In the New Punjab there should be nearly 40 districts with an area of 2,500 square miles each. Such a vast province, with an annual income of about Rs. 24 crores is far too big to be democratically administered as one province. Apart from communal considerations, the division of the Punjab into two parts is otherwise very necessary.

2. Community-wise Statistics of the Punjab

...vi. Communitywise statistics of the Punjab would be utterly incomplete without recognizing and ensuring the special position of Sikhs in the Punjab. The Cabinet Mission recognized them as the third major community in India. They have thus their inherent right to safeguard their national and religious interest in the Punjab. The Punjab was a Sikh State before the advent of British rule and the British kept Maharaja Dalip Singh (a minor in their tutelage) with certain treaty rights. Now when the sovereignty returns to the various other states after June 1948, why should the Punjab be treated differently. Any division of the Punjab which does not place Nankana Sahib (birthplace of Guru Nanak—the Mecca of Sikh religion) in the East Punjab and also does not ensure other Sikh religious places in the West Punjab as per Schedule I of the Punjab Sikh Gurdwara Act of 1925 as separate pockets governed by the Sikhs, shall ever remain a dead-letter. Similarly the special control by the East Punjab of Hindu places of sacred pilgrimage such as Amar Nath, Katash Raj and Gorakh Tilla, shall be ensured.

3. Mode of Division of the Punjab

The Punjab belongs to Punjabees, and extraneous forces and all-India considerations cannot coerce and overawe non-Muslims into forgoing their claims in the province. All-India organizations such as the Congress and the Muslim League have no right to dictate a surrender of rights by non-Muslims (Hindus and Sikhs) in the Punjab. Non-Muslims of Punjab are not a minority community in the sense as they are in the N.W.F.P. or as the Muslims are in other provinces in Group ‘A’ with no distinct predominant areas sufficient to form a province. Here they are nearly 70% in the Eastern Punjab which is a considerable area with a probable annual income of more than Rs. 10 crores, which is sufficient to form a separate province.
The Punjab is not a Muslim province at all, but the Punjab Muslim League has started posing, as if it belonged to Muslims exclusively. The land revenue share of Muslims in the province is 44 per cent and their contribution to other taxes, including income-tax, is hardly 20 per cent. On the whole the economic share of Muslims is hardly 30 per cent. The Qaid-e-Azam, as reported in the ‘Civil and Military Gazette’ (Lahore) dated 18th April, 1947 has said that the Ambala division could be detached and Sikhs could then have a separate Khalistan if possible in the remaining Punjab. Sheikh Karamat Ali, member of the Punjab Muslim League, has, as reported in the ‘Civil and Military Gazette’ dated 20th April, 1947, asked the Sikhs to approach the Punjab Muslim League if they want to safeguard their special interests in the three districts of Ludhiana, Ferozepur and Jullundur. Scraps are being thrown to the non-Muslims as if non-Muslims were beggars in the Punjab. By underhand and open oppression and by unjust laws passed by the Unionist Government, Muslims in the Punjab since 1920 have been able to increase their interests in the province from barely 25 per cent to 30 per cent. Master Tara Singh, to whom Sheikh Karamat Ali addressed his appeal to approach the Muslim League, is not merely interested in the 14 per cent of population comprising members of his community but is the accredited leader of all non-Muslims (carrying the solid vote of all non-Muslim M.L.As in his pocket) and is thus interested in the 70% economic share of the Punjab belonging to all non-Muslims. It is, therefore, for the Punjab Muslim League to approach the leader of non-Muslims with the request:

‘The Muslim majority of the West Punjab want to exercise their right of self-determination by cutting themselves off the parent India, thus forcing the division of Punjab. The corresponding non-Muslim majority in East Punjab could exercise a similar right of self-determination by remaining with parent India, but, as the economic share of the Muslims in the Punjab is hardly 30 per cent—very small as compared to their numbers—the leader of non-Muslims should allow them a relatively greater share of the Punjab.’

The division of the Punjab could thus be on the following bases: (1) Economic. (2) Socialist. (3) Landed property. (4) Population....

7. Division of the Punjab according to Population No. (A)
The correct population share of Muslims is difficult to determine as the Census figures were inflated and faked by the Muslims as already established. The correct method to find this out would be voters share with adult franchise and with joint electorate as check on correct voters’ lists. Muslims knowing that Census figures are inflated, always avoid this short of correct enumeration. The present voters’ strength of Muslims for the present Legislative Assembly is 44 per cent. Which is the correct democratic population share of the Muslims. A population incorrectly recorded is meaningless unless it is reflected in the voters’ list. However, let us suppose that the leader of the non-Muslims agrees as special concession to allow 25% extra share in addition to 44 per cent out of generosity. Thus the share of Muslims be raised to 55 per cent which was the reported Census percentage of Muslims in 1921....

8. Division of the Punjab on Population Basis No. (B)
(i) The population share of Muslims is 55 per cent (1921 Census) and therefore 55 per cent of land, canals and hydroelectric should go to West Punjab.

However the Hindu and the Sikh leaders might be forced into the position by the British Government to allow full quota of 57.0 per cent of 1941 Census in even the land to Muslims.
The district percentages are meaning less because they have been materially changed by the Muslims themselves by turning out non-Muslims from the Frontier Province and from West Punjab in March and April 1947. The basis should be the total population share of Muslims in Punjab and not by districts. The division (B) is, therefore, worked out to allow approximately 57 per cent land, 63 per cent canal and 50 per cent hydro-electric power in the West Punjab. This should be extreme limit up to which the Hindu and Sikh leaders could go especially when the economic share of the Muslims in the Punjab is below 30 per cent and the landed property is 44 per cent. The excess over 55 per cent now given to Muslims should be surrendered if 57 per cent population of Muslims is not eventually proved....

9. Conclusions
The division of the Punjab is very necessary even if the Muslim League drops the demand for Pakistan because:—

(a) Even in the B Group, a separate East Punjab is essential as a safeguard against its conversion into Pakistan at a future date.
(b) The ordinary citizen is concerned with Law and Order, Education and Health. He is little affected in his daily life by ‘Group’ or central subjects. We have seen enough in recent months to prove that non-Muslims cannot continue to be subject to Muslim notions of Law and Order. Law and Order must, therefore, be taken over for as much area as possible.
(c) The non-Muslim taxpayer is being bled and fleeced in the Punjab for the economic development of the West Punjab.
(d) Sikh States are encircled in Group ‘B’, and even in the present Punjab they cannot be of any help to the rest of the Punjab unless their encirclement is removed by dividing the Punjab.
(e) The real man-power of India is between Gujranwala and Delhi. In Indian history the people living in this area always fought invaders somewhere near Panipat and if they won, India won, and if they lost, the whole of India was lost. This man-power must be saved at all cost from being effeminated and weakened with 75 per cent Muslim teachers in the present Punjab. The non-Muslims in this area are being reduced to cowardice by inferiority complex even though they are in a majority. Why should they be disheartened by being called a minority?
(f) It is a wrong argument that the non-Muslim minority west of Gujranwala will be further weakened by this division of the Punjab. Non-Muslims of the West Punjab could be accommodated in the East Punjab on reciprocal basis. This can best be done by the Governments of the separated Punjab.
(g) The division of the Punjab is also necessary, apart from communal considerations, as it is far too big for democratic rule by the people for the people. District boundaries need to be changed according to the irrigation boundaries of the canals, which form the real wealth of the Punjab. The province should be divided into 40 districts of 2,500 sq. miles each for efficient democratic administration. The present unco-ordinated and unwieldy administration of all P.W.D. Chief Engineers badly needs reorganization and distribution among at least two provinces.
If Pakistan is dropped and if also grouping is dropped but still the civil liberties (Law and Order, health and education) must be divided up to L.C.C. boundary line in Rachna Doab and up to Montgomery in Bari Doab with two assemblies and a combined House for the remaining subjects Finance, Irrigation, P.W.D. and Development (Defence Central subject). Non-Muslim Taxpayer would no doubt continue to be fleeced for the development of West Punjab but would be saved the pin pricks of Muslim way of law and order in his normal life.

The Hariana Prant Ambala Division may remain in the East Punjab, but, if that is not desired by that population, areas irrigated by the Western Jumna Canal could be joined to Delhi Province, as very large areas of the Hissar and Karnal districts have yet to benefit from the Bhakhra Dam canals from the Sutlej River. The East Punjab should definitely include all areas to be eventually irrigated by the Bhakra Project. This is a domestic affair of the East Punjab non-Muslims and could be amicably settled at a later date.

By demanding the division of the Punjab, the Sikhs and Hindus of the province will only be asking what is their undisputed right. The Times of India in its leader of 2nd May, 1947 says ‘….. the call to partition of the Punjab and Bengal is the logical sequel to the Muslim League demand for the division of India.’ The Cabinet Mission has also recognized this principle when it declared that every argument in favour of Pakistan could be used with equal force for the partition of the Punjab and Bengal. Is it not reasonable to expect that when 24 per cent of the Muslims of India can claim a division of India, then surely 44 per cent of the Hindus and Sikhs of this province can claim the same?\(^1\)

15. Punjab Assembly Votes amid Burnt-out Ruins

Extract from a report from Reuter Indian Service, 23 June 1947

LAHORE

With large sections of Lahore and scores of villages throughout the Province fire-blacked ruins, the 168 members of the Punjab Legislative Assembly laughed and joked as they shook hands in the lobbies of the Assembly building on their way to record their votes to decide whether the Punjab should be partitioned.

Meeting in joint session in the Assembly Chamber, 91 members voted to join a new, separate Constituent Assembly if the Province remained united.

Twenty minutes later, 72 members from East Punjab, meeting in separate session, rejected by 50 votes to 22, a motion by the Moslem League leader Khan of Mamdot that the Province should remain united.

Under the British plan, this decided the partition issue, although West Punjab members rejected a partition motion by 69 votes to 27.\(^1\)

Later East Punjab members decided to join the existing Constituent Assembly....

Approaches to the Assembly building were blocked by barred wire barriers and the vicinity was under heavy police guard.

The public was not admitted, but foreign and local pressmen filled the press gallery.

The 91 members who voted in favour of joining the new Constituent Assembly consisted of 88 Moslems, two Indian Christians and one Anglo-Indian.

Hindus, Sikhs and representatives of the Scheduled castes, numbering in all 77, voted for the present Constituent Assembly.

The 88 Moslems included eight Moslem unionists (who have in the past been opposed to the partition of the Punjab) led by Sir Khizr Hayat Khan Tiwana, former Premier of the Punjab.

For the first time in the history of the Punjab Legislative Assembly, the speaker, Dewan Bahadur S. P. Singha (Indian Christian) went to the lobby and recorded his vote for the new Constituent Assembly....

16. ‘Punjab to Be Partitioned’—Elected Representatives’ Decision

*Extract from a report in The Tribune, 24 June 1947*

Lahore, June 23.—Punjab’s elected representatives have decided today that the province must be partitioned. This decision was arrived at by the Eastern Section of the Punjab Assembly which sat separately after a joint session of the Punjab Assembly had been held.
The two Sections of the Punjab Assembly, the Eastern Section and the Western Section met separately, at 9 A.M. and both decided in favour of holding a joint session of the Assembly.

Then a joint session of both Sections was in session where ninety-one members voted for joining the new Constituent Assembly whereas 77 voted in favour of joining the existing Constituent Assembly.

The members divided themselves again into the Eastern Section of the Punjab and the Western Section under the notional division contained in the British Plan of June 3.

The Eastern Punjab decided in favour of partition by 50 votes against 22. The Western Punjab decided in favour of keeping a united Punjab by 69 votes against 27.

Dewan Bahadur S. P. Singha presided over the joint session and the separate session of the West Punjab, whereas Sardar Kapur Singh was in the chair in the Eastern Section meeting.…

Dewan Bahadur S. P. Singha, referring to H.M.G.’s statement of June 3, put it to the members that they had to decide as to which Constituent Assembly, the existing one or the new one, they would like to join. Before this, however, he asked the members that they had to decide upon the procedure which they would like to adopt. The party leaders, said the chairman, had agreed upon a procedure by which it was decided that there shall be no speeches nor shall there be any motion from any members and he would, therefore, ask if the House was willing to approve the agreement arrived at by the leaders. The House gave its approval.

Existing or New

The chairman then put it to the House that they should vote on the question whether they would like to join the existing Constituent Assembly or would like to join the new Constituent Assembly.

The motion having been put, the members rose to go to the lobbies to record their votes. The Whips became busy on both sides to ‘whip in’ every member to vote.

The chairman announced the result of voting and said that 91 members had voted in favour of joining the new Constituent Assembly and 77 had voted for joining the existing Constituent Assembly.

Voting Analysis

Of the 91 members who voted for the new Constituent Assembly, 88 were Muslims, including Sir Khizar Hayat Tiwana and his group. Two Indian Christians, including the chairman, and one Anglo-Indian voted with them. The man behind the Khizar throne—that was Nawab Sir Allahbaksh Tiwana who remained a pucca Unionist all through, was absent. Of the Hindu and Sikh as also the Scheduled Caste members, 2 were absent. Jathedar Man Singh of the Panthic Party and Ch. Harbhaj Ram who was a Unionist. The hand of death had removed Munshi Hari Lal, the veteran Congressman and two Muslim League members, Mian Allahyar Khan Daulatana, Chief Whip of the League Party and Sh. Mohd. Amin, Bar-at-Law. The only European member, Mr. P. M. Guest, was not present, because under the new Plan he was not entitled to vote at these meetings.

Good Bye to the Chamber

The House was then adjourned and the members bade good bye to the Assembly Chamber, once for all—perhaps they may meet once again here to elect members for the existing and new Constituent Assembly....
Partition Voted For

The members then again re-assembled in their sectional meetings. In the Eastern Section, the chairman, Sardar Kapur Singh, put it to the House, again under the British plan, whether they would like to have a United Punjab or whether they would like to divide the province. On votes being recorded, the Chairman announced that fifty M.L.A.s had voted in favour of the partition, whereas 22 had voted against partition. The 22 were the Muslim M.L.A.s, including the Leader of the Muslim League Assembly Party, and the 50 were represented by members of the minority communities.

According to the instructions contained in the letter to the Chairman, Sardar Kapur Singh, immediately after the result of voting was known, sent a written letter to the Chairman of the Western Section, intimating to him that the Eastern Section had decided by a majority that the Punjab must be partitioned. This letter was duly delivered to the Chairman of the Western Section. The Eastern Section then voted on the question whether they would like the constitution of the Eastern Punjab to be drawn up by the existing Constituent Assembly or the new Constituent Assembly. On this question also the voting was 50 for the constitution being drawn up by the existing Constituent Assembly and 22 for the constitution being got ready by the new Constituent Assembly. This meeting was then adjourned.

Against Partition

Down stairs in the tea room the Western Section voted in favour of keeping a united Punjab, 69 voted against partition (having pressed for dividing India all these years) whereas 27 voted in favour of partition. Here also all the representatives of the minorities, excepting the three representatives of the Indian Christians and Anglo-Indians, voted for partition. That section also voted by majority for getting their constitution drafted by the new Constituent Assembly, the voting result was the same as the first, being 27 for drawing the constitution by the existing Constituent Assembly and 69 for getting it done by the new Constituent Assembly which will now be constituted.

It must be made clear that when the League Assembly Party voted in favour of having a united Punjab their object was to have a united Punjab which would join the new Constituent Assembly as was clear from the voting result at the joint session and thus have the whole Punjab as a part of the Pakistan.

The minorities voted for partition of the Punjab because they did not want to join the new Constituent Assembly and wanted their constitution to be drawn by the existing Constituent Assembly. It is known that an offer was made by the Congress and the Panthic Parties that they would be willing to have a united Punjab if it would join the Indian Dominion and have its constitution drawn up by the existing Constituent Assembly. The League Party vote was not so much for maintaining the solidarity of the Punjab as for bringing the whole province in Pakistan.

Thus was decided the fate of the future Punjab after all these formalities which had been laid down had been gone through in about an hour’s time. The province was decided upon to be divided because the Muslim League insisted upon the division of India for the solidarity of which country and the province men had worked for centuries and for whose unity and independence innumerable sacrifices had been made by Indian men and women among whom some of the Punjabis occupied a position of unique distinction. The Punjab which was divided to-day was the land from where the slogan, ‘Inqilab Zindabad’ was first raised and for bringing about which ‘inqilab’ young men and women made themselves immortal by the sufferings and the sacrifices which they made in this province and in India for whose glory and independence they loved to suffer.

Sardar Bahadur Abnasha Singh, Secretary, K.B. Hakim Ahmed Shuja, Deputy Secretary and the Assembly Staff had a busy time in making all arrangements for the meetings at a short notice.

17. ‘Unionist Party Liquidated’

Extract from a report in The Tribune, 24 June 1947

LAHORE, June, 23.—With the decision by the Punjab M.L.A.s to divide the Punjab the end was announced of the Unionist Party as well to-day.

The last of the Unionists, Sir Khizar Hayat Khan Tiwana, sided with his erstwhile political opponents and so did his Muslim colleagues who had contributed to Unionism.

The Unionist Party had swayed the politics of the province for over 25 years when the Unionists lost to the Muslim League in 1946. Sir Khizar Hayat, however, decided to cling fast to the creed of his leader the late Sir Sikandar Hayat Khan, and his friend and colleague, Sir Chhotu Ram, and the handful of Hindu and Muslim Unionists pledged their loyalty to him and decided to stand by him.

The party had a crash on the night of March 2, 1947, on the morrow of which opened a new chapter in the history of the Punjab. The resignation from the Premiership of the Unionist Chief was followed by happenings in the province which in fact have resulted in the division of the Punjab for the minorities said they had no other course left open but to part company as friends with the majority of the province.

Today, however, the party was declared to be dead for ever. The Unionist leader, even though he voted for a United Punjab but voted with those who, while asking for the division of India were anxious to have a United Punjab for different reasons. Therefore what was left of the Unionist party were three lieutenants of the late Sir Chottu Ram who were determined to follow the footsteps of their ‘political guru.’ In view, however, of the developments to-day, Rao Bahadur Ch. Suraj Mal, Rao Sahib Mohar Singh and Ch. Prem Singh Unionist M.L.A.s declared their decision to join the Congress Party. This gave a decent burial to the good old Unionist Party....

18. ‘Leaders’ Reactions’

Extract from a report in The Tribune, 24 June 1947

LAHORE, June 23.—...Sardar Swaran Singh, leader of the Panthic Assembly Party in the course of his talk with the ‘Tribune’ representative immediately after the voting on the division of the Punjab... said: ‘We had always stood for the Punjab going into the existing Constituent Assembly and even today we took that stand in both parts that a joint session of the parts might be held. We had hoped that the joint session would vote for joining the existing Constituent Assembly and thus pave the way for a united India. But the Muslim League members had decided to divide India and by their majority in a joint House wanted to drag the whole of the Punjab into Pakistan. There was no option for the Eastern part but to ask for partition. We are not at all happy as India is being divided but if division of India is inevitable the only right course was to ask for partition of the Punjab. Hindus, Sikhs and Scheduled Caste members in the Eastern part as also in the Western part have solidly voted in one group.

‘Let me point out that the existing notional division is only for the purposes of deciding partition question and cannot be used for any other purpose. The Boundary Commission will demarcate the line of division and it is hoped that justice will be done to the Sikhs by maintaining their solidarity and I would strongly urge upon the two parts of India to appreciate the view point of the Sikhs and help them in carving out a respectable future for this small but brave community.’

Mr. Sachar’s Statement

Lala Bhim Sen Sachar issued the following statement to the Press:—

‘So the expected has come to pass. The province has now been divided into two parts. As a Punjabee, I might be distressed at it: but under the choice that was before us now—Indian union or Pakistan—nothing else could be expected. Anyhow this is no time to assess blame. One has now to reckon with a “fait accompli.”

‘This is the most crucial of the periods we are passing through. Our attitude and outlook this time will determine the fate of millions and even of two States that might be set up. For at this time we need one thing above all, and that is mutual accommodation and understanding. In this way many thorny problems could be settled with the least amount of scratching, many misunderstandings could be adjusted amicably which might otherwise prove explosive. But all this requires a breadth of vision and a largeness of heart, which unfortunately have been generally lacking in the past. But other people, situated in similar circumstances have been able to show the necessary adaptability. I can see no reason why we cannot rise above our past, with all its compelling force notwithstanding.

‘This faith, I am sure, will help us to overcome our problems, leaving no trace of bitterness behind. And it is only in this way that we could hope to see a United India again, drawn together by natural ties of geography and the indestructible unity of the fundamental interests of the masses of India, which transcend all artificial barriers of religion and creed.’...

‘No Punjabi Can Be Happy’—Khizar Hyat

Interviewed when coming out of the Assembly Malik Khizar Hayat Khan Tiwana, the former and the last Premier of an undivided Punjab, said:—

‘The land of the Five Rivers, as we have known it, is today no more a political entity. No Punjabi can be happy over it. Associations centuries old, common martial traditions in adversity and victory, comradeship in arms on various parts of the globe are to be torn asunder. This is not to the benefit of any community nor area. The economic structure of the Punjab is so interdependent that it will be gravely dislocated. Such a course of action could have only been adopted under extraordinary circumstances of estrangement and tension. The past history of the Punjab and its success and glory in every sphere of life were built on the sure foundation of mutual good relations. Differences were solved by give and take and sound compromises. The Punjab was in the vanguard of India’s economic and constitutional progress, but to-day circumstances have so shaped things that in the final and last leap to freedom it has become the main casualty. I count on the renowned commonsense of the Punjabis of all sections that it should not be impossible to still save the Punjab before further and unretraceable steps are taken.’...
19. Deplorable Situation of Hindus in West Punjab

My most respected Leader,

After thinking over the matter for days and days, I now take courage and write you a few lines. The Hindus of these areas have been sacrificed at the altar of freedom. The lot of the non-Muslims particularly the Hindus seems very bad. Their life, property and honour is at stake. The woeful tales of Amritsar and Lahore must have reached your ears. ...No non muslim could dare enter those areas particularly during the curfew hours.

The propaganda is set afloat here that no muslim should buy the property of the Hindus and thus the value has depreciated in value to a great extent. The treatment is growing worse everyday and we people are hated and ignored. I can’t write you more as you must be aware...

In case some body of influence is known to you, you will be good enough to send me a letter of introduction.... We don't want lands free either. Leases of lands very kindly be granted to us and ... permission to practice as lawyer be also given.

Hoping you would be gracious enough to encourage me by replying to this humble letter of mine.

20. Proposal for a Sikh-Muslim Pact

Letter from Penderel Moon to H.L. Ismay, 27 June 1947
Mountbatten Papers, File No. 140, NMML

PRIVATE AND PERSONAL

Dear Lord Ismay,

I write with reference to our conversation a few weeks ago regarding the Sikhs.

Feroz Khan Noon made, I understand, a direct approach to them, indicating that the Muslims would grant them special concessions if they would throw in their lot with Pakistan, but he met with a rebuff.

This was to be expected. The Sikhs are still smarting from the injuries inflicted on them by the Muslims in the Rawalpindi division. Temporarily they've been thrown off their balance. But an influential section of them (including Master Tara Singh and Gyani Kartar Singh) know, in their heart of hearts, that they must come to a settlement with the Muslims if the Punjab is to be spared disaster. Hence, though one must not look for any immediate results, there is yet hope that with patience and perseverance the Sikhs will be brought to the view that Eastern Punjab—which must in any case be formed—should join Pakistan. If this is achieved, then the civil war, not to mention administrative complications, which must inevitably follow an attempt to draw a frontier between two National States somewhere in the middle of the Lahore Division, will be averted.

Meanwhile what steps are to be taken?
Certain Sikhs, in touch with both Baldev and Tara Singh, are going to formulate, informally and entirely privily, the Sikh conditions for joining Pakistan. If these offer, as I believe they will, a possible basis for negotiation, certain Muslim League leaders will be informally approached. The Sikhs are anxious that it should not leak out that any such negotiations are afoot or contemplated.

It will considerably facilitate matters if it can be so arranged that the new Eastern Punjab has the strongest possible Sikh complexion and does not, therefore, include Gurgaon, Hissar, Rohtak and Karnal. The Sikhs have already put this demand to Congress who hesitate to accept it. I would suggest that this Sikh demand should be encouraged and conceded. You can doubtless be of assistance in this regard. If the Sikhs are taken out of Hindu clutches—as they want to be—and put in a more or less independent position on their own, they are much more likely to gravitate in the end towards their natural alignment with the rest of the Punjab and Pakistan.

The next step would be to indicate that it is optional for this Sikh Eastern Punjab to join either Hindustan or Pakistan and that there is no presumption that it must join one rather than the other. The Sikhs will probably make this clear themselves, but if they ask for some pronouncement to this effect from HMG, it will probably be advisable to accede to their request.

Please forgive this unasked for effusion. My excuse is that without a Sikh-Muslim pact there will be chaos in northern India.

Yours sincerely,

PENDEREL MOON

21. Demand for a Separate Punjabi-Speaking Province

Record of interview between Louis Mountbatten and Kartar Singh and Baldev Singh, 30 June 1947
Mountbatten Papers, File No. 194, NMML

H.E. spoke about four points which the Giani had made in his letter, dated the 13th June. He pointed out that after the 15th August he would have no special powers at all, and even if he was Governor-General would be purely constitutional. He thought there was some consolation for the minorities in Maulana Azad’s appeal. He promised that in regard to weightage and safeguards he would bear the Sikh point of view in mind and use his influence with the major parties.

2. Sardar Baldev Singh said that neither of the major parties would give any safeguards or weightage.

3. Giani Kartar Singh said that the time for action was now, while the Governor-General still had his powers.

4. H.E. said that he had already talked to both sides about the minorities and both had given assurances. He thought that the presence of so many representatives of the world Press in India would provide the minorities with an important safeguard if they used it properly.

5. After some discussion Giani Kartar Singh said that the main points which the Sikhs wished to press were two. First that they should have weightage in the Legislature of the East Punjab, or, alternatively, the Hindi-speaking parts of the East Punjab should be separated off and there should be a Province comprising the Punjabi-speaking areas. The Home Member had said that he preferred the second alternative, to the first.
6. Next Giani Kartar Singh said that the Sikhs wanted more representation in the existing Constituent Assembly, because they were at a great disadvantage in committee as a result of having only two representatives.

7. Giani Kartar Singh then put forward some further points. He said that the Sikhs were very anxious:
   (a) That the boundary should be drawn more favourably to them.
   (b) That transfer of population should be arranged, and
   (c) That H.E.’s broadcast should be given to the Boundary Commission as part of the Plan of the 3rd June.

H.E. explained that he had not agreed to putting his broadcast to the Boundary Commission in this way because the result would have been that the Muslim League would have put in a large number of documents to the opposite effect. He had authorised Sardar Baldev Singh to put in a copy of the broadcast. He thought that the Sikhs would have greater bargaining power than they imagined owing to their military importance in the new Union of India.

8. H.E. undertook to write to the leaders and say that as a result of discussion with the Sikh leaders he wished to put their point of view. They asked for assurances about weightage in the Legislature of the East Punjab and for extra representation in the existing Constituent Assembly. They hoped the question of the transfer of population would be taken up, and H.E. thought that this might be examined.

22. Disputed Territory Should Remain under Joint Administration till Final Settlement Letter from Baldev Singh to Jawaharlal Nehru, 2 July 1947

SECRET

My dear Pandit N.,

Yesterday, I glanced through the India Independence Bill which is to go before the Parliament shortly. You will have studied the clause dealing with the Indian State [sic]. I wish however to draw your attention to the provisions relating to the Western Punjab. Some of the districts included that side, according to the annexure attached to the bill, as you know are disputed territory and it is our case that control over them should remain joint till final settlement is made.

The other day when we discussed the question of Armed Forces Reconstitution in the Partition Council Meeting, I pointed out the difficulties inherent in allowing one Government’s control over these very disputed districts. The Viceroy appreciated my point and instructed the C-in-C to prepare a scheme for joint administration of Armed Forces stationed in this area.

The districts concerned are—Lahore, Gurdaspur, and Sheikhupura in the Division of Lahore. I would like you to please see that suitable amendments are made in the Bill or the Annexure or both to ensure that these districts do not automatically go over to Pakistan when the Bill becomes law. The Boundary Commission will take some time investigating the rival claims. We believe that it will be prejudicial to us if the administration of these districts is allowed to pass into the hands of Pakistan Government until such time as the Boundary Commission has announced its findings. I hope you will take necessary steps to exclude these areas from Pakistan territory at this stage.

Yours sincerely,
Baldev Singh

23. Christian and Anglo-Indian Minorities Should Not Be Classified under ‘General’ Category
Letter from C.E. Gibbon to M.A. Jinnah, 4 July 1947
Jinnah Papers, Vol. III, pp. 84–5

13 JAIL ROAD, LAHORE

Dear Mr. Jinnah,

I have not written for sometime as I have been busy organising the Association. I am happy to say that we are growing in strength daily in spite of pro-Congress efforts to cause a split in the community in Pakistan.

On June 23 the two Christian members of the Punjab Legislative Assembly and I voted with the League against partition and for the Pakistan Constituent Assembly.

Today we met to elect members to the three General seats from West Punjab, in the Pakistan Constituent Assembly, and were swamped out by Congress. Our candidate, Dewan Bahadur S.P. Singha, was cried down by the Hindu Group as being pro-League, and in spite of our best efforts to get him elected, were [sic] defeated.

This, however, has not left us downhearted. We have established the fact it is no longer possible for the Christian and Anglo-Indian minorities to be classified under ‘General’, and we sincerely hope you will remember us when your Constituent Assembly begins its work.

Dewan Bahadur Singha is, I understand, writing to you separately.

With my best wishes,

Yours loyally,
C. E. GIBBON, M.L.A.,
Founder President,
Anglo-Indian Association of Pakistan.

24. Sikhs Anxious over Partition of Punjab
Letter from Louis Mountbatten to M.A. Jinnah, 4 July 1947
Mountbatten Papers, File No. 140, NMML

Dear Mr. Jinnah,

As a result of discussions I have had from time to time with the Sikh Leaders I should like to put to you their point of view.

2. They are naturally worried about the position in the Punjab where, unless major alterations are made by the Boundary Commission, the Sikh community will be divided into two almost equal parts.

3. They have asked for certain special considerations in the Union of India and in the Eastern Punjab but they also urge that the transfer of population should be seriously considered in the Punjab and I hope that at the proper time this will be considered by you, whether as the result of the Boundary Commission or otherwise. They also hope they will have weightage in the Central Houses of Pakistan and a seat in the Pakistan Government.

4. I sympathise with the Sikhs, as I am sure you do, and I hope everything possible will be done to allay their fears.

Yours sincerely

25. Sikh Leaders Ask for Weightage and Special Representation
Letter from Louis Mountbatten to Jawaharlal Nehru, 4 July 1947
Kirpal Singh (Ed.), Partition of Punjab, pp. 139–40

Dear Mr. Nehru,

As a result of discussions I have had from time to time with the Sikh leaders I should like to put to you their point of view.

2. They are naturally worried about the position in the PUNJAB where unless major alterations are made by the Boundary Commission, the Sikh community will be so divided that almost half will remain in the Muslim province of WESTERN PUNJAB.

3. They hope that the Boundary commission will make such major alterations, but that is not a point which immediately concerns the political parties. Apart from this, they ask for assurance that they will receive weightage in the Legislature of EASTERN PUNJAB. They hope also that they will have weightage in the Central Houses of the Union of India and a seat in the Union Government.

4. They have suggested that they should have special representation in the existing Constituent Assembly. Clearly I cannot help them on this point or, indeed on any of the others except by approaching you, but you may wish to consider the matter.

5. Finally, they have suggested that the transfer of population should be seriously considered in the PUNJAB.

6. I expect all these points have been put to you but I should like to tell you how much I sympathise with the Sikhs and how much I hope you will be able to help them.

26. ‘Resolve to Stick to Your Soil’—Mr. Sethi’s Appeal’
The Tribune, 5 July 1947

Lahore, July, 3.—Lala Dev Raj Sethi, M.L.A., has issued the following statement:

‘During our three days’ stay in Delhi an effort was made to discuss with members of the Congress High Command the problems of the minorities in the Western Punjab relating to transfer of population, citizenship rights, flow of capital, future of business, and industry, partition of services and other allied subjects. It is distressing to learn that there is a general move on behalf of upper strata among different sections of minorities to shift to the East. Out of half a crore Hindus, Sikhs and others an overwhelming majority has to remain in the West willy nilly. When the masses learn with dismay that the front rank businessmen, industrialists, land-lords and even Congressmen and proprietors of daily papers are out in search of homes and offices in East Punjab, or in other parts of India, their nervousness deepens. There is complete unanimity that this exodus is harmful and should cease forthwith. This may mean some sense of insecurity for the better placed, but they are the natural leaders of the people. They should continue to play their role of guide, philosopher and friend of the masses and to share their weal and woe.

It is a great relief to learn that Master Tara Singh the veteran Sikh leader has categorically contradicted the statement in which he was alleged to have exhorted the Sikhs to quit the West. Let us resolve to stick to our soil in which we are rooted. Let us further pool our resources and devise effective measures for ensuring an honourable and an all-round progressive life in the land of our birth. Responsive co-operation should be our watch-word. The architects of India have assured the minorities that we shall never be treated as aliens in their land. The Congress President Acharya Kripalani in his concluding remarks in the A.I.C.C. meeting held at Delhi on June 15 clearly enunciated the Congress position about it. Let the minorities rest assured, we can always rely on their legitimate support.’—U.P.I.

27. Ministry Question Remains Unresolved in Punjab
Telegram from Evan Jenkins to G.E.B. Abell, 6 July 1947

IMMEDIATE

No. 163-G. Your telephone conversation of 5th July with Abbott about possibility of establishing Ministry in Punjab. I understand Bengal model would be followed with one team of Ministers (presumably Muslim League) in charge of whole Province and second team (presumably Hindu and Sikh) holding watching brief for Eastern Punjab.

2. Conditions here are not the same as in Bengal because whereas in Bengal stable Ministry existed before new arrangement was made, here we are still in section 93. Appointment of shadow team in Bengal can be made to appear concession to non-Muslims, but appointment of regular League Ministry plus shadow team in Punjab would be regarded as surrender to League. When after 3rd June Statement I suggested Coalition no party was keen and Sachar and Swaran Singh said there could be no cooperation on law and order on which League and other parties held irreconcilable views. I would welcome transfer of responsibility for law and order to Ministers, but I do not see how transfer could be effective with Muslim Ministers advising in one sense and Hindu or Sikh applying veto.

3. Apart from general difficulty mentioned above following points are relevant:
(a) With 40 days to go to transfer of power, partition work is practically untouched. Partition Committee is still bogged down in trivialities.
(b) First act of new Ministry on termination of section 93 is normally to meet Assembly and pass budget. Formation of Ministry would divert attention from Partition, and routine processes of preparing budget, meeting Assembly and getting settled in would occupy more than the time available.
(c) Situation here is generally explosive. Hatred and suspicion are universal and undisguised. It seems to me that this is inevitable under plan which in Punjab converts our principal cities into Frontier Towns and drives boundary through area homogeneous in everything except religion. Explosion may be touched off at any time and I except trouble when Boundary Commission reports. Attempt to form Ministry giving League jurisdiction throughout Punjab would be a very powerful irritant.
4. I think you should visit Lahore and discuss in some detail before Viceroy takes final decision.

28. ‘Firm Faith in Integrity of India—No Vivisection—Punjab Hindu Sabha Passes Resolutions’

The Tribune, 6 July 1947

Lahore, July 4.—To observe a ‘protest day’ against the latest award of the British Government partitioning the country into two independent dominions, an emergent [sic] meeting of the Punjab Provincial Hindu Sabha was held yesterday in the Hindu Sabha Bhawan, outside Shahalmi Gate under the presidency of Bhai Parma Nand. A resolution adopted reiterated Sabha’s firm faith in the integrity of India, declaring that no constitution based on the vivisection of the country would be acceptable to the Hindus.

It was resolved that in the opinion of the Hindu Sabha all attempts to introduce and encourage Hindustani should be dropped and Hindi should be made the medium of instruction in all educational institutions. Steps should also be taken to make it the ‘lingua franca’ of the country.

It was further resolved that now that the Muslims had been conceded Pakistan, national flag of the country should be a purely Hindu flag of saffron colour.

By another resolution the Sabha strongly disapproved of the efforts being made by certain politicians to make the country drop its ancient name ‘Hindustan’ on the ground that it did not contain only Hindus but Mussalmans as well.—United Press.

29. Separate Electorates a Fundamental Problem

Letter from Jawaharlal Nehru to Louis Mountbatten, 7 July 1947

NEW DELHI

Dear Lord Mountbatten,

Thank you for your letter of the 4th July regarding your discussions with the Sikh leaders.

2. We appreciate thoroughly the anxiety of the Sikhs. They have been hard hit by this division. They might be helped somewhat by the decisions of the Boundary Commission. As for assurances in regard to weightage etc., I fear this raises complicated issues. All our troubles, or nearly all, have been due to separate electorates and the system of weightage, originally introduced for the Muslims. It became clear that this did little good to the minority concerned and only created separatist tendencies. The addition of a seat or two makes no essential difference. But it means the acceptance of a fundamentally wrong principle. Once admitted, this principle leads to far-reaching consequences and illwill. It is possible, of course, that without weightage and separate electorates some kind of reservation might be given with freedom to contest the general seats also. We should like to help any minorities getting additional seats from general constituencies.

3. The question of transfer of population does not arise immediately. If the people concerned desire it, it must be seriously considered.

Yours sincerely,

Jawaharlal Nehru
30. Separate Sikh State for Safeguarding Sikh Rights
Letter from Secretary, Sikh Sangat, Gujrat, to J.B. Kripalani, 7 July 1947
AICC Papers, File No. G-34/1947, NMML

Sikh Sangat,
Kawankh, Gujrat

My dear Mr. Kriplani [sic],
Through the proclamation of 3rd June, the Sikh community has been ignored entirely. To safeguard the rights of the Sikhs it is requested that a separate Sikh State as indicated in the telegraphic telegram¹ must be formed.

The Sikhs have been and are sincere and well disciplined soldiers of Congress and as such have got the better rights to claim better dues. The Sikhs still believe that the Congress High Command will re-consider this question of Sikhs.

Yours sincerely,

31. Sikhs Wear Black Armbands in Protest against Partition
Extract from a report from Reuter Indian Service, 8 July 1947
_T.O.P._, Vol. XII, pp. 17–18

NEW DELHI—India’s 5,700,000 Sikhs, most of whom live in the Punjab, wore black armbands as they prayed in their Gurdwaras (temples) today in protest against the threat to split their community under the British Plan for India.

In growing alarm at the possibility of their people being split by partition of the Punjab, Sikh leaders West of the provisional partition line are urgently endeavouring to impress about 1,500,000 Sikhs in rural areas with what they consider a danger to the existence of the community.

The protest day of prayer passed quietly in the Punjab, according to reports so far received. Gurdwara congregations approved a resolution declaring that ‘any partition that did not secure the integrity and solidarity of the Sikhs would be unacceptable and create a difficult situation’.

Leaders of the Shiromani Akali Dal, leading Sikh religious and political organisation which sponsored the protest day, said that though they did not wish to disturb the Punjab’s precarious situation they felt something must be done to arouse the Sikhs to effective protest before the Boundary Commission declares its findings.

Black-bearded, blue-turbaned, carrying three-foot curved swords like walking canes, the Organisation’s Acting President, Amar Singh Dosanjh, and General Secretary Amar Singh Ambalvi, said there could be no peace in the Punjab if the Sikhs were dissatisfied by the partition.

They declared a boundary on the River Chenab was their minimum demand adding that when the Sikhs asked for partition of the Punjab they had in mind the separation of preponderently Moslem areas from the rest of the Punjab.

Hindu and Sikh shops in Old and New Delhi remained closed today as a mark of protest....
32. Complete Hartal by Sikhs in Protest against Partition

Letter from Sikhs of Kohala Village, Distt. Ferozepore, to J.B. Kripalani, 8 July 1947

AICC Papers, File No. G-34/1947, NMML

To

Acharya Kriplany [sic], President, Indian National Congress,
New Delhi.

'The sikh [sic] of (Kohala Village) District Ferozepore observed complete hartal on 8th July as protest against the June 3rd plan and subsequent developments thereafter.

The sikhs [sic] of this place, therefore declare in unequivocal terms that partition of the Punjab should be effected in a manner whereby their integretity [sic] and socidarity [sic] is maintained and they get an adequate share in the canals and canal colonies and their sacred shrines are included in the Eastern Punjab.

Any partition which does not secure this for the Sikhs will be unacceptable to them and will create bitterness and a difficult situation.'

33. Movement for a Separate Punjabi-Speaking Province Opposed

Letter from Lahiri Singh to J.B. Kripalani, 9 July 1947

AICC Papers, File No. G-34/1947, NMML

Lahore

My dear Acharyajee,

As you are no doubt aware, now-a-days in the Punjab the Sikh movement (sponsored by Master Tara Singh) for the creation of a Punjabee-speaking Province comprising the whole of Jullundur Division, Amritsar, and parts of Ambala Division is gaining ground. This will result in isolating the Hariana Prant, viz. districts of Rohtak, Karnal, Gurgaon and some parts of Hissar. To propose further division of the truncated Punjab is definitely actuated by the sole desire of establishing Sikh hegemony in the Central Punjab. This move on the part of Sikh leaders cannot be justified in any way. Apart from these two divisions being predominantly non-Muslim, there is so much common between them that any talk or move of further fragmentation is preposterous. To take one instance alone, the proposed Bhakra Dam and Nangal Project will be to the common benefit of these two divisions, and if one is separated from the other, there will be practical difficulties in bringing these Projects to fruition. There will be a host of other complexities which may be to the detriment, if not the utter ruination, of Hindus and Sikhs of the Eastern Punjab. I am making haste to pen these few lines at this inopportune moment, when the Boundary Commission has already commenced their deliberations so that there may not be any commitment on the part of Congress from which it may be difficult to dis-entangle later on.

I shall be grateful if you will kindly permit a few of us in the Hariana Prant to wait upon you in the near future to explain our case verbally.

Yours sincerely,

34. Avoid Postponing the Relief of British Troops
Letter from Evan Jenkins to Louis Mountbatten, 9 July 1947
IOR, R/3/1/176, Acc. No. 3477, NAI

Secret
No. 693.

Dear Lord Mountbatten,

I discussed with the Army Commander on 7th July, and have again discussed with the Lahore Area Commander this evening, the question of the relief of British troops. I understand that they are likely to be moved during the first half of August, and that decisions may be taken by G.H.Q. about 17th July.

2. It is not easy to say how things will go, but my opinion is that the most dangerous period will be 15th July to about 15th October. There is great soreness in the Punjab about partition, especially among the Sikhs, and if they intend to make trouble, they may do so (a) when the Boundary Commission reports, if it reports before 15th August, or (b) immediately after the 15th August, if the Boundary Commission has not reported by then. The Sikh member of my Partition Committee actually proposed this morning that we should stay effective proceedings until orders had been passed on the report of the Boundary Commission; he also indicated that the Sikhs would not wish the Government of the Eastern Punjab to leave Lahore until the fate of Lahore had been decided. These matters will probably be referred to the Central Partition Council with a view to arbitration, but Swaran Singh's attitude illustrates the Sikh view.

3. On the whole, I think it will be wise to avoid postponing the relief of British troops for too long. It would be awkward if trouble on a large scale started while the relief was in progress. My own advice would therefore be to make the change before the end of July, if it can be made so soon. I have thought it right to give this opinion to Your Excellency as the Commander-in-Chief will no doubt discuss the matter with you.

Yours sincerely

E. M. JENKINS

35. Armed Forces to Put Down Sikh Resistance
Extract from the minutes of the meeting of Partition Council, 10 July 1947
T.O.P., Vol. XII, pp. 65-6

Mr. Jinnah pointed out that although he was doing every thing in his power to retain a hold over the Muslim sections of the population concerned to honour the undertaking given that the findings of the Boundary Commissions, whatever they were, would be accepted, he had noticed that the Sikh leaders were still reported to be inciting their followers to offer active resistance to decisions which they might regard as unfavourable. It was reported that active preparations for resistance were being made and that oaths to resist were being taken. The impression on the Muslim mind was that the Sikhs were carrying on this agitation in order to influence the decisions of the Boundary Commission. In consequence any suggestion that a Sikh deputation was being received to raise the question of boundaries would have a most undesirable effect.

His Excellency reiterated that he had made it abundantly clear to His Highness the Maharaja of Patiala, S. Baldev Singh, Master Tara Singh and all other Sikh leaders, with whom he had interviews, the consequences of any attempt to offer active resistance. No responsible government would tolerate for a moment such action, which would be met by the regular armed forces of India. In view of the superiority in aeroplanes, tanks, artillery etc. that the armed forces enjoy, such action would inevitably result in very severe losses being inflicted on those who would only be armed with rifles and out-of-date weapons. He reaffirmed his hope, therefore, that the Sikh leaders would be able to restrain their followers. His Excellency said he had been assured by Sir Cyril Radcliffe that he will be able to submit his reports by the 14th August. In conclusion His Excellency said that he would communicate with H.H. the Maharaja of Patiala, and make it clear that if he received the deputation no questions regarding boundaries could be brought up; and if the deputation were received this fact would be made very clear in a press note.

36. Report from Punjab

Extract from the report on the situation in the Punjab for the second half of June 1947, 10 July 1947

Home Poll (I), File No. 18/6/47, NAI

Confidential

1. Political—As was confidently expected, the meeting of the Punjab Legislative Assembly on June the 23rd to decide the future of the Punjab resulted in a decision for partition. The slender hope of the Congress that Sir Khizar Hayat Khan Tiwana and his Muslim supporters would vote for the unity of the Punjab and participation in the Hindustan Constituent Assembly was unfulfilled, and the attention of the political parties is now being given to the working and personnel of the Expert Committees and preparation for laying their respective claims before the Boundary Commission. The voting of Muslim Unionist M.L.A.s with the League in favour of partition has resulted in the death of the Unionist Party and most of the Hindu Jat members of the Party of the Eastern Punjab have now aligned themselves with Congress and more are expected to follow the example before them.

In keeping with its previous endeavours to form a coalition ministry, the Punjab Muslim League has recently made an attempt to persuade the Congress to agree to the formation of Zonal Ministries. The Congress, however, which is at the moment determined to do all it can to retain the sympathy of the Sikhs and non-Congress Hindus, has found itself unable to agree to the proposal. The Punjab Muslim League was not perhaps very serious in advocating the establishment of Zonal Ministries, and the Leaders now seem more concerned with partition and with the restoration of confidence in the Western Punjab.

The tardy realisation of the Sikh leaders that by their own insistence on partition they have gravely damaged the solidarity of the Panth has resulted in an intensification in the demand for a Sikh Sovereign State to exclude the Ambala Division but including a large area of the canal colonies. The rejection of H.M.G.’s Plan of June the 3rd by the Working Committee of the S.A. Dal followed out-spoken criticism on the grounds of the Akali leaders’ political incompetence by practically all members of Sikh society and political organisations. It is clear, however, that the rejection does not mean that the Sikhs intend to abstain from putting their case to the Boundary Commission. It is equally clear that a serious situation may arise if the Commission does not concede to the Sikhs what they conceive to be their rights. However, when this might happen is still obscure. Meanwhile the Sikh volte face has necessitated a change in Congress policy. Congress which hitherto had been averse to suggesting a link-up with the Ambala Division with Meerut Division and other contiguous areas, because it feared to alienate Sikh favour, is now considering the amalgamation of the Ambala, Rohilkhand, Meerut and Saharanpur divisions, after which it is expected approval will be forthcoming to the Sikh demand for a sovereign state within the Indian Union, which would act as a useful buffer between Pakistan and Hindustan. The Muslim League has tried to counter this move with a suggestion to the Sikhs that they should have the Ambala and Jullundur Divisions as their homeland, incorporated in the Pakistan territory. The future attitude of the Sikhs to these two proposals is yet unknown but it seems unlikely that they will relinquish their claims to the colony areas, which recently have been subjected to most intense Akali propaganda. The decision of the Working Committee to hold a 'protest day' on July the 8th throughout the Punjab which aims to include a complete non-violent hartal by all classes, is thought by the Sikhs to be a preliminary exercise to demonstrate and estimate their strength and the results achieved by weeks of preparation. The failure of Master Tara Singh, Giani Kartar Singh and Udham Singh Nagoke to include their names in the joint peace appeal, which was issued in the names of the Khan of Mamdot, Lala Bhim Sain Sachar and Sardar Sowarn Singh, is accepted by many as an indication of the Sikh temper and suggestive that the Panth does not intend in any way to cool the feelings of belligerency which have been inspired in the Sikh community by repeated suggestions that the Panth is in danger until a final solution satisfactory to the Sikhs, is arrived at concerning the disputed territories.

37. ‘Sikhs Warn Against Unfair Division: Hartal All Over Punjab’
The Hindustan Times, 10 July 1947

A warning that any partition which did not secure the integrity and solidarity of the Sikhs would be unacceptable to them and create bitterness and a difficult situation was given by a resolution adopted at a huge Sikh meeting on Tuesday in Lahore.

Sardar Amar Singh Dosanj, Acting President of the Shiromani Akali Dal, Sardar Ajit Singh, former Minister of the Frontier Province, and Sardar Amar Singh Ambalvi, General Secretary of the Shiromani Akali Dal, were among those present.

Similar meetings were held in Lyallpur, Jullundur, Amritsar, Ludhiana, Ferozepore, Rawalpindi, Ambala and in the interior of the districts.

The day passed off peacefully in Lahore, no incident was reported from any quarter. Hindu and Sikh shops remained closed in the city. Hindu and Sikh Government employees attended their offices wearing black badges.

AMRITSAR

All markets were closed. Hindu and Sikh drivers also observed hartal. Sikhs wore black badges with the inscription Kani Wand Manzur Nan (partial partition unacceptable). A largely attended devan was held in Guruka Bagh Manji Sahib (Golden Temple), where prominent Hindu and Sikh leaders including Master Tara Singh, Jathedar Udham Singh Nagoke, M.L.A., Sardar Ishar Singh Majhail, M.L.A., and Principal Ganga Singh criticized H.M.G.’s Plan. They anticipated a serious struggle if the solidarity of Sikhs was not assured.
RAWALPINDI
An appeal to the Hindus and Sikhs of the Western Punjab not to migrate but face reality with patience and courage, was made by Mr. Avtar Narain, a Congress member of the Pakistan Constituent Assembly in a statement to the Press.

Sikhs and Hindus in Rawalpindi observed complete hartal on Tuesday in pursuance of the decision of the Shiromani Akali Dal. Meetings were held in various Gurdwaras in the town.

A resolution protesting against the partition of the Punjab based on ‘bogus’ census figures was adopted at a largely attended Sikh dewan held in Kartarpura gurdwara. The resolution further stated that owing to the policy of appeasement of Muslims pursued by the British Government, Sikhs had lost their solidarity and had been thrown into the wilderness. The resolution urged the Boundary Commission to take into consideration ‘all other factors’ while making decisions.

Another resolution demanded of the Government of India to compensate the loss in property in this area as rehabilitation of the victims of communal frenzy was quite impossible in their original homes. In case the Government of India were not competent at the present moment to do the needful, the resolution demanded that they should negotiate with the future Pakistan Government regarding this point when treaties were signed.

Another resolution thanked the Maharaja of Patiala for the sympathy shown to refugees from Rawalpindi district.

SOLAN
The Sikhs and Hindus of Solan, Simla Hills, observed complete hartal on Tuesday as a protest against the June 3 statement of H.M.G. and the ‘unfair’ partition of the Punjab. The Sikhs at a meeting demanded that partition of the Punjab should be effected in a manner whereby their integrity and solidarity were maintained and they got an adequate share in the canal colonies and their sacred shrines came in the eastern zone.

AMBALA
Non-Muslims in Ambala city and cantonment observed complete hartal on Tuesday as a protest against ‘unfair’ partition of the Punjab. Black badges were worn by non-Muslims. At a Khalsa dewan held at the local gurdwara, a resolution was passed protesting against the partition of the Punjab and urging the Boundary Commission to take Sikh interests into consideration in demarcating boundaries.

FEROZEPORE
Complete hartal both in Ferozepore city and cantonment was observed on Tuesday by Hindus and Sikhs as a protest against H.M.G.’s Plan of June 3. Students absented themselves from schools. Men, women, and children, including Government employees, were seen wearing black badges. Big black flags were hoisted on the gurdwara buildings.

Resolutions protesting against the partition of India were passed at largely attended Sikh and Hindu dewans and also by the Ferozepore branch of the All-India Sikh Students’ Federation.

PATIALA
Hartal was observed on Tuesday in Patiala by the Sikhs and Hindus under the auspices of the City Akali Jatha as a protest against the partition of India. Hotels and milk shops were also closed.
SRINAGAR
A large number of Hindu and Sikh shops were closed in Srinagar on Tuesday in observance of ‘Anti-Partition Day’. Hindu and Sikh students absented themselves from local educational institutions.

CAWNPORE
‘Anti-Partition Day’ was observed by the Sikhs in Cawnpore on Tuesday. All Sikh shops and business houses remained closed.

A resolution opposing the vivisection of India in general, and the Punjab in particular, was adopted at a meeting of Sikhs held in a local gurdwara, Sardar Inder Singh M.L.A. (Punjab), presided.

By another resolution the meeting demanded the release of all Sikhs who were arrested in connection with the recent rioting in Cawnpore.

Giani Man Singh, a Punjab Sikh leader, who addressed the gathering, explained the significance of the partition of the Punjab.

38. Singha’s Election to the Constituent Assembly

Extract from a letter from S.P. Singha to M.A. Jinnah, 10 July 1947

20 MASSON ROAD,
LAHORE

My dear Quaid-i-Azam,

I wrote to you on the 21st of June. I hope my letter reached you.

You are aware of the result of the election to the Constituent Assembly. Mine was more a protest than a contest. But even then I was very near winning the election, had it not been for the all-out effort on the part of the Congress to keep me out as a punishment for having accepted your leadership and voting for Pakistan on the 23rd of June. At the last minute they withdrew the Congress candidate in favour of Rai Bahadur Ganga Saran, who had pledged his vote to me, and even the Scheduled Caste Unionist, who had pledged loyalty to the League, voted on the sly with the Congress, having been won over through promises made by Dr. Gopi Chand Bhargawa and the underhand work of Sardar Zulfiqar Ali Khan Qizalbash, a bosom friend of Rai Bahadur Ganga Saran. Khan of Mamdot knows the dismal details of the transaction.

It seems a sin to bother you with small matters during these crucial days when your time and energy are taxed to the utmost. I am writing to you not to trouble you with a paltry thing like the above but to seek your advice on a matter which in my humble opinion is important enough to deserve your consideration.

I have had a letter from Mr. Walter Biscoe from England in which the following occurs:

My latest news of you is that you have carried with you the Indian Christian vote into Pakistan and with them, have moved the Anglo-Indians. Well Perkie I feel you have done the right thing and the God-guided thing by your community... I am still as sure as ever I have been that God’s plan for Pakistan can be discovered more surely in Caux than anywhere else. I am praying that He will open the way for you to join us there... I expect by now you have received your invitation to Caux from the Committee of the House of Commons... The French Government want to send 130 Party Members to it. In Norway a special Cabinet meeting was held to decide who
I have received the invitation to attend the Conference at Caux in Switzerland from Mr. Stan Awbery, M P....

I have no desire to make a short trip to London and the Continent and incur considerable expense unless I can be of some service to Pakistan. If the visit has your approval, I shall accept the invitation. And if you will be kind enough to give me some time when I can come to see you, I would like to take a message from you and obtain your instructions in regard to the line I should take in my speeches and interviews. If you can trust me as a good Pakistani, I think the international gathering at Caux will furnish a good venue to boost the new country.

Yours sincerely,

[DEWAN BAHADUR] S.P. SINGHA

39. Aftermath of the Decision to Partition

Governor’s Appreciation, 11 July 1947
IOR, R/3/1/91, Acc. No. 3416, NAI

(1) The communal feeling is now unbelievably bad. In the Ambala Division, outside Gurgaon, the Muslims seem resigned to their fate, and the same is probably true of the non-Muslims in the Rawalpindi Division and in Dera Ghazi Khan, Muzaffargarh, Multan and Jhang. In the Lyallpur and Montgomery districts and the Lahore and Jullundur Divisions tension is extremely high.

(2) The Sikhs are the most uneasy of the three communities. They believe that they will be expropriated and possibly massacred in the Western Punjab and smothered by the Congress and the Hindus generally in the Eastern Punjab. They threaten a violent rising immediately after the transfer of power unless by then there has been a satisfactory award by the Boundary Commission.

(3) The Higher Services have virtually disintegrated. They were given the final blow by the partition policy, which turned professional civil servants into subordinate politicians. In the I.C.S. not one non-Muslim Indian is prepared to serve in West Punjab, and only one Muslim is prepared to serve in East Punjab. Hatred and suspicion are entirely undisguised.

(4) Partition goes very slowly indeed. Meetings of the Partition Committee resemble a Peace Conference with a new war in sight. In the time available it will be quite impossible to make a clean job of partition, and even if we can check disorder up to 15th August, and the new Governments can maintain themselves thereafter, there will be appalling confusion. In civil administration certain things cannot be done properly in a matter of days or weeks, and ‘standstill’ orders (most of which will be accepted very grudgingly by the Parties) do not really solve the administrative problem.

(5) From mid-July onwards many new officers will be posted to key appointments, and the new Governments will face the critical time in August with Secretariat and District teams even weaker than those which we have had during the past year or two. There will be much wrangling about postings since the non-Muslims are unwilling to commit themselves until the Boundary Commission reports.

(6) The Chairman of the Boundary Commission does not arrive until 14th July. His colleagues have given the Punjab Government an enormous questionnaire, the replies to which cannot at the earliest be ready before about 20th July. Thereafter, if all the information collected is to be studied and transferred to special maps and if the parties are to be heard at any length (they have engaged very eminent counsel) it is difficult to see how the Commission can report by 15th Augst. [sic]

(7) If the Commission does report by 15th August there will in all probability be a row because the Muslims or the Sikhs are not satisfied with the report. If the Commission does not report by 15th August, there will be a row because the Sikhs do not like the ‘notional’ boundary.

(8) The prospect is in short far from encouraging, but we can only go ahead and see what happens.

40. Sikhs Will Sacrifice All

Letter from Kirpal Singh to Secretary, AICC, New Delhi, 11 July 1947
AICC Papers, File No. G-34/1947, NMML

To Secretary
All India Congress Committee
New Delhi

As decided by the Sikh Panth, complete Hartal was observed by the Sikh & Hindu inhabitants of 21 villages in Sarhal Qazian (Thana Baga) Illaqa. A big Dewan was held in the afternoon, stirring speeches were made by the prominent veteran leaders of Doaba exhorting the people to organise themselves for the supreme sacrifice to preserve the unity and integrity of the panth, in case the decision of the boundary commission divides them into two nearly equal parts. The following resolutions were unanimously passed.

1. Resolved that the national [sic] division of the Punjab envisaged in Lord Mountbatten plan does a grave injustice to the Sikhs. The Sikhs have been shown lip-sympathy [sic] while the other two major communities have been given Hindustan & Pakistan. The Sikhs too, strongly demand to live and develop their religious & cultural traditions in a single group placed on the eastern side of river Chanab. The Sikh community will not submit to any decision imposed on them by ignoring their special contribution to the present setup of the Punjab.

2. Resolved that the Sikhs of this illaqa are prepared to make all the sacrifices demanded from them for the prosecution of Panthic plans to preserve the solidarity of the Panth.

3. Resolved that the copies of the above be sent to Lord Mountbatten and the President Boundary Commission, Master Tara Singh, Governor Punjab, Congress President.

Yours faithfully
Kirpal Singh
Stage Sec.
Sarhal Qazian P.O.
Jullundhar Distt.
Most respected Qaid-i-Azam,

We realised how fully occupied you are and what a terrible pressure of work you have to sustain during these critical and decisive days. But we are convinced that the two or three matters on which we seek your advice and direction are so urgent and so directly affect not only the future, but the very establishment of our Pakistan, that we must bring them to your notice even at the risk of distracting your mind from more important problems. We had intended that all of us should go to Delhi and discuss these grave problems but since Khan Iftikhar Hussain Khan of Mamdot, as President, cannot be absent from Lahore even for a day during these disturbed conditions and Mumtaz Daultana has to attend daily meetings of the Partition Committee, we have requested Sardar Shaukat Hyat Khan to represent all of us and to place the view-point of the Punjab Muslims before you.

1. According to the new Bill before Parliament, the ‘appointed day’ has been fixed at August the 15th. We, in the Western Punjab, will be expected to take over and sustain power as from that date. However, it is well known that the Sikhs, with the fullest cooperation of the Hindus, are determined to embark on a large scale civil war from the very day on which Pakistan is established and perhaps even a few days before that. The present Government is very well aware of this and every C.I.D. report that they get (we have seen very many of them with our own eyes) gravely confirms this intelligence. It appears, however, that the present Governor is a privy to these plans and his present hostile attitude to the Muslims enters as a necessary element into them. Under these circumstances, if power is suddenly transferred to us without adequate and elaborate precautions and arrangements having been taken before-hand, we might face a crisis or a disaster, which may well jeopardise the entire future of Pakistan. It is absolutely necessary, therefore, that at least ten days before the ‘appointed day’ an adequate Military force manned by Muslims and equipped with the most modern weapons should be at our disposal, so that we may deploy it at the strategic points well in advance. It is our impression that if such a force was present on our borders and if the fact of its presence was well known, the Sikhs may not even dare to put their plans into action. We believe that our High Command is already taking action along these lines, but we must urge with all the emphasis at our disposal that steps must be taken from now, because even if the final decision about the despatch of Muslim troops to Western Punjab are taken today, it will take well over a fortnight to transport and billet them in their new quarters in our province. It is possible that we are unduly and alarmingly emphasising a point which is already having your fullest consideration, but our duty to the Mussalmans of the Punjab compels us to make it clear that unless the steps indicated above are taken at once, all the heroism, self-sacrifice and undaunted determination of the Muslim people will not avail against the catastrophe planned for them. At the same time we would like to assure you that if these steps are taken, we are convinced that we can man our fortress and win the day.
2. The hostility of the present Governor towards the Muslims of the Punjab is well known. We have hammered at this point so often that we do so again at the risk of irritating you. But it has recently come to our knowledge on the basis of unimpeachable evidence that the present Governor has approached Lord Mountbatten with a very strong representation that at least one colony district of the Punjab (either Montgomery or Lyallpur) should go to the Sikhs under the award of the Boundary Commission. Sardar Shaukat Hyat Khan will give you full details on this point. The facts are well known to you, and therefore we need not emphasise how fantastic such a claim would be if advanced on behalf of the Sikhs. But perhaps it may be necessary to point out that if either Montgomery or Lyallpur, and we believe that the Governor has suggested Montgomery, go out of Pakistan, Western Panjab cannot survive as an economic or a strategic unit even for a single day. Quite apart from this the demoralisation among the Muslims would inevitably provoke a revolt, which none of us in the Punjab at least could control. In view of the machination of the Punjab Governor, therefore, we feel that there should be intensification of our propaganda with reference to the Boundary Commission. We must lay emphatic claims to Amritsar, Ludhiana and Hissar so that we may check the impression that is being given that the Muslims are more or less satisfied under the present set-up. We believe that if the latter impression is given, the Britishers would succumb to their traditional habit of appeasing those who make the largest noise. In this direction, we suggest that the Dawn should take up this matter and that it should be made clear to Sir Cyril Radcliffe that any suggestions, or so-called expert opinion, given by Jenkins amounts to a partial and paid statement of the Sikh case. The recent statement made by Baldev Singh, which practically amounts to his renunciation of his former acceptance of the British decision, must have come to your notice. In view of this, we would suggest that a statement from our top-most leaders clearly indicating that a partial and unjustified Boundary award of the British Government would be unacceptable to the Muslims and would provoke them to the final resistance, would not be out of place.

3. We have been urging in the Punjab Partition Committee that in view of the transfer of power on the 15th of August, officers chosen by the Western Punjab successor government should be posted at least fifteen days in advance in all the critical districts as well as at Headquarters, so that they may get acquainted with the ways of the administration and get a hold on the machinery, which they will have to employ from the 15th onwards. On this point, the Sikhs have adopted a temporising attitude and have suggested that until the decision of the Boundary Commission, no such postings should be made. They have also suggested that both Governments should share Lahore for the establishment of Government offices and the Secretariat till the Boundary Commission has awarded Lahore either to one or the other party. This is an intolerable position, which would leave us unarmed and unprepared on the ‘appointed day’. We hope to refer this matter to the Central Partition Committee within the next day or two and I hope that clear and precise directions will be issued to us soon enough to enable us to finalise our plans.

Once again we hope that you will forgive us for having intruded upon you with our own problems.

All the Muslims of the Punjab stand by you firm as a rock and true unto death.

With deepest respects to Miss Jinnah and yourself.

Yours obediently

42. ‘Leaders’ Peace Appeal at Gujranwala’

The Hindustan Times, 12 July 1947

LAHORE, July 11.—Mr Gopichand Bhargava, Lala Bhimsen Sachar, the Khan of Mamdot and Mian Iftikharuddin arrived in Gujranwala today on a peace mission.

Addressing a crowded meeting at the Town Hall, they called upon the people to help the authorities in restoring law and order.

The Khan of Mamdot asked members of his community to protect the life and property of the minorities. He said: ‘You are the guardians of the minorities. You must do all you can to assure them that their future would be secure in Pakistan.’

Mian Iftikharuddin said that they had to prove to the minorities that all would be well with them in Pakistan. ‘Failure or success of Pakistan would be judged from the treatment meted out to the minorities. We must prove that we are worthy to command their confidence. To fail the minorities is to fail Pakistan.’

Sachar’s Call to Muslims

Lala Bhimsen Sachar, speaking next, impressed on the gathering that fratricidal warfare would lead the people nowhere. Increasing bitterness would leave an unhealthy legacy behind. It would take years before amity and concord could once more prevail. ‘In the name of humanity I appeal to you to shed this madness. Such killings are a blot on the good name of our province.’

Muslims should not make the task of their leaders difficult by indulging in arson and rioting. He said: ‘A heavy responsibility lies on the shoulders of your leaders. You must help them to discharge it with justice to all people who would be living under them.’

Dr. Gopichand Bhargava reminded the people that the responsibility for law and order now lay with them as the British were about to quit. He added: ‘We should so conduct our administration that we can prove that we are worthy of freedom which we are about to attain.’

Earlier, the leaders conferred with local officials and discussed the situation in detail with them. Several deputations of citizens waited on the leaders.

43. ‘Democracy Alone Will Lead to Reunification of Punjab’

Extracts from a report in People’s Age, 13 July 1947

The following resolution has been issued to the Press by the Central Committee of the Communist Party of India:—

...Voluntary Union

The Communist Party which has firmly stood for the unity of the Punjab inside an Indian Union of free and equal national units declares the present British plan to be harmful for the interest of the entire people of the Punjab.

It reiterates its belief that only a voluntary union of national units forming a united India can solve the problems facing our country and carry forward the struggle for complete destruction of British imperialism, abolition of Princely autocracy and full democracy and well-being of the people.

Nevertheless the Communist Party realises the Mountbatten Plan has been made possible because of division in the upper-class leadership of the Congress and the League which divided the common people, the separatist campaign carried on by the League and the failure of the Congress to make a bid for Congress–League unity on the basis of democracy and self-determination.

Today the overwhelming majority of Muslims have solidly lined up behind the demand for a Pakistan State in the establishment of which alone they see guarantee against Hindu domination. The Pakistan State is therefore not to be looked upon as merely the product of machinations of British imperialism and its agents. It will also be a State which would be looked upon by the Muslim masses as the embodiment of their freedom aspirations and the instrument to better their life.

The path towards the voluntary reunification of the people of the Punjab and the people of India, therefore, lies through the establishment of the most cordial and friendly relations between the two States and between the communities inside each State.

The people of the Punjab who occupy a key position in the present set up and whose life and economy are threatened with disruption as the result of the British plan, can play a great role in bringing about this unification: by refusing to fall prey to imperialist machination and the disruptive policies of the vested interests; by building democracy in their respective zones; by according fair and generous treatment to the minorities; by solving problems like transport, communication and irrigation in a spirit of mutual cooperation.

For this, it is essential that the immediate question of boundaries on which disputes have arisen is solved on the basis of commonly accepted just principles.

No Unjust Demands

- The demand to extend the boundary line of the Hindu-Sikh zone upto the Chenab, the demand to include the city of Lahore in this zone, on the plea of predominance of Hindu-Sikh property in this city, the demand for the canal colonies of Lyallpore—all these demands which cannot be justified by any democratic principles, will, if pressed, cause further bitterness and conflict.

- Similarly, the demand to include Amritsar in the Muslim zone on the plea that the exclusion of this city will hamper the economic development of Pakistan and the backing up of that demand by a campaign of arson and loot, cannot lead to any equitable settlement.

The Communist Party appeals to progressive forces all over the Province, to the Congress, the Muslim League and Akali Party, not to make fantastic and unjust demands and to solve the question of boundaries strictly on the basis of population and by mutual agreement....

Eliminate Feudalism

...The Communist Party shall support all progressive forces both inside the League and outside, who by eliminating feudal influences, by initiating progressive measures, strive to make Western Punjab an advanced democratic unit of the Pakistan State.

It is the Western Punjab zone that because of its large population, its economic resources and its political importance will be the most important unit of the Pakistan State. Therefore, it will be the responsibility of the progressive League members in this area to ensure that British influence is eliminated from the whole of Pakistan, police-raj is ended, complete civil liberty established and Pakistan establishes the closest friendly relation with the Indian Union.

For this they will have to work in closest cooperation with the progressives outside the League and help in the growth of united working class and peasant movements.
While Western Punjab has been the main base of imperialism in this Province and the progressive forces will have to fight the hardest battle in that area, it must not be forgotten that reactionary forces are powerfully entrenched in Eastern Punjab, also, especially in the Ambala Division, a stronghold of Hindu Unionists.

In this part of Punjab will also be the States of Patiala, Nabha, etc., whose Princes have developed close ties with the worst reactionaries in the Sikh camp. Raising the bogey of Muslim invasion, putting forward slogans calculated to divert peoples' attention from the task of establishment of democracy, these elements will strive to strengthen their own economic and political hold on the people.

In both parts of the Punjab, therefore, the forces of progress will have to wage a determined battle against powerful enemies. The Punjab has won unenviable notoriety as the worst police-ridden Province in the country. Civil liberties have never existed here; police officials, many of them closely related to the big landlords and jagirdars, have wielded almost unlimited power. That power has to be broken if freedom is to mean anything for the common people.

To End Police-Raj
The Communist Party will wholeheartedly co-operate with the popular ministries in both the zones of the Punjab in the task of ending police-raj and in making the police what they really ought to be—servants and not masters of the people.

In the Eastern zone of the Punjab, the Punjabi speaking areas have been tacked to the Hindi-speaking areas of Ambala Division. The Communist Party, which has always stood for the formation of Provinces on linguistic and cultural basis feels it necessary that the Punjabi-speaking areas of Eastern Punjab are constituted into a single Province, by the abolition of the States and thus breaking down the artificial barriers that divide the States people from their brothers outside....

Appeal to Sikhs
The Communist Party sympathises with the Sikhs. But it reminds them that it is the opportunist policy of their reactionary leaders who stepped up chauvinistic passions and based their whole policies on the theory that the interests of the Sikhs can be best served by playing the Congress against the League that contributed to this development.

Even today these leaders are striving to play their old game, intriguing with Princes and counting on further Congress–League conflict and even on conflict between the Indian Union and the Pakistan State.

The Communist Party is confident that the great Sikh community that has played such a glorious role in putting Punjab on the political map of India will see through this game, will line up with the progressive forces in both zones of Punjab and help in establishing cordial relations between the communities in each zone and between the two zones. That will win them the respect of all and will be the best guarantee for the protection of their cultural and religious rights.

Fighting Riots
The Communist Party will strive for the recognition of both Urdu and Punjabi as the State language in both parts of the Punjab. It will fight for equal rights of all in all spheres of life, for equal opportunities in services, for rights to secure fallow land.
In the midst of the communal conflict that has ravaged large parts of the Punjab during the last three months, the united working-class and peasant movement led by the Communist Party has waged a valiant struggle, maintaining the unity of Hindus, Muslims and Sikhs wherever possible, fighting the poisonous propaganda carried on by communalist reactionaries....

Coalition Ministries

The Communist Party stresses the necessity to solve all problems that arise in a spirit of mutual confidence and cooperation. It feels that in order that this is done, it is essential that Coalition Ministries are formed in both parts of the Punjab, consisting of the most progressive elements in all parties and these Ministries take immediate steps to curb the activities of riot-mongers and establish civil liberties....

'This Meeting of the members of Poona (248 Nana Peth) Arya Samaj held on Sunday the 13th July, 1947 enters its strong protest against the move for inclusion of Lahore in Pakistan area and urges on the Govt. of India and the Boundary Commission to fully sift the matter and to so carry out the partition as to provide a natural Boundary Line between India and Pakistan, retaining in India Lahore with which is associated the oldest history, culture and tradition of Bharat Varsh beginning with the hoary ages of Shree Ramchandra ji hero of Ramayan and which has been immediately before advent of the British, the Capital of the Sikh State and has been the Centre of social, religious and educational activities of the Arya Samaj for seventy years and more.'

Dear Mr. Jinnah,

I am informed that all British troops are being moved out of Lahore by August the 1st. Are they doing the same in places in Hindustan also? I have been hearing a lot ‘wait till August the 15th’. Please see that Pakistan troops move into Lahore in strong number[s] by August 1st.

We had a large meeting at Mamdot’s house yesterday and started work in real earnest. We have sent 2 lawyers to Calcutta to watch and report proceedings to us and to send us certain books. We have selected Khalifa Shujauddin, Karamat and Tasadduque Hussain to help Zafrullah who arrives tonight at 10 p.m.

Radcliffe decided today that 18th is the last day for submitting memoranda by associations and not in individuals [sic]. Zafrullah won’t have much time. On the 21st the 4 Indian members will start hearing Council [sic for counsel] for 10 days and on August 3rd Radcliffe will come back and sit here till the 6th when he will return to Delhi and give his award on the 11th. He says everything is relevant. Let people have their full say so that there is no grievance in anyone’s mind. People here wonder if he has already made up his mind.

Yours sincerely,

46. ‘Sikhs Decide to Stay out of Pakistan C.A.’

The Hindustan Times 18 July 1947

LAHORE, July 17, 1947.—The Sikh members of the Punjab Assembly, who met in Lahore to give final shape to the memorandum to be presented by them to the Boundary Commission, decided to recommend to the ‘Panth’ to call upon the Sikh representatives not to participate in the deliberations of the Pakistan Constituent Assembly in view of the massacre of the Sikhs and the Hindus in Rawalpindi and Multan divisions in March last.

The resolution released this evening declared that ‘no demarcation of the boundary would satisfy the Sikhs unless it was so drawn that historical gurdwaras and the landed interests of the Sikhs in proprietary as well as in colony lands were amassed within Eastern Punjab.’

The meeting also demanded a provision for the transfer of population and property to be made so as to give relief to the small pockets of Sikhs that might be left in the Western Punjab.

The following is the full text of the resolution: ‘The Panthic Assembly Party has given anxious consideration to the question of the Sikhs’ participation in the Pakistan Constituent Assembly and in view of the massacre of the Sikhs and the Hindus in Rawalpindi and Multan divisions in March 1947, recommends to the Panth to call upon the Sikh representatives in the Pakistan Constituent Assembly not to participate in the deliberations of the Assembly.
'The Panthic Assembly Party takes note of the references to the Sikh position made by Mr. Arthur Henderson, Under-Secretary of State for India, Mr. R.A. Butler, leading member of the Opposition, and Sir Stafford Cripps in the debate on the Indian Independence Bill in the House of Commons and trusts that the Punjab Boundary Commission will in the demarcation of the boundary line take into account the factors mentioned in the parliamentary debate.

'The Party declares that no demarcation of the boundary will satisfy the Sikhs unless it is so drawn that historical gurdwaras and the landed interests of the Sikhs in proprietary as well as in colony lands are amassed within the Eastern Punjab. A further provision for the transfer of population and property must be made so as to give relief to the small pockets of Sikh population that may be left in the Western Punjab.—A.P.I.

47. ‘Uncontestable Claims of Sikhs’

Extract from an editorial in The Tribune, 20 July 1947

The debate on India in the House of Commons has shown a clear grasp of the essential elements in the Punjab situation on the part of some leading British statesmen. This province is inhabited not by two but by three nations—the Muslim nation, the Hindu nation and the Sikh nation. The last named nation’s position in the Punjab is peculiar in many ways and therefore it requires special consideration. It is undoubtedly the function of the Boundary Commission to demarcate boundaries between two parts of the Punjab on the basis of the ascertained contiguous majority areas of Muslims and non-Muslims. But as Mr. Henderson has pointed out ‘in certain cases there may be special factors which will justify departure from this principle.’ In fact provision for such a departure has been made in the Commission’s terms of reference by the inclusion in them of the words ‘other factors’. Mr. Arthur Henderson merely underlines the prescribed course, which the Boundary Commission cannot but follow, when he says: ‘These special factors are being allowed to take account of the circumstances of the Sikh community in the Punjab so that the location of their religious shrines can be taken into account’. The location of Sikh religious shrines is not the only ‘other factor’ that clamours for consideration. There are many ‘other factors’ which are almost equally numerous and they cannot be ignored. Mr. Butler rightly lays stress on them when he says that ‘in the (notional) partition of the Punjab we have left the Sikh community almost exactly divided between one side of the Frontier and the other. It is to be hoped that the Boundary Commission will be able to arrange the boundary so that the shrines and properties and other things held so dear by the Sikhs may be amassed as far as possible within one frontier.’ It is surprising that logical and reasonable utterances like these have created an uproar in bustering and sabre-rattling. We shall ignore that part of the noise which makes no sense and take notice of only that part which makes some sense.

It is urged that there should not be the slightest deviation from ‘the basis of the ascertained contiguous majority areas of Muslims and non-Muslims.’ Well, then, what is the meaning and value of the words ‘other factors’ used in the formula framed in connection with the evolution of the partition process? Again the argument is trotted out that if any weight and importance is to be attached to ‘the shrines and properties’ of the Sikhs in the Punjab, weight and importance should also be attached to ‘the shrines and properties’ of Muslims in Hindustan, and the whole of India should be given to Mussalmans. This argument is on the face of it absurd. The question of division of India is a settled and closed question. That cannot be unsettled and reopened. Besides, if the whole of India is to go to the League, where will be the question of dividing it? To-day only the question of the partition of the Punjab and Bengal is before us. And in solving this question the Boundary Commission is both duty-bound and honour-bound to take ‘other factors’ into consideration. The League ... have put forward a thoroughly wrong and inadmissible analogy. The Sikh nation occupies a special position in the Punjab and no analogy can be produced which may be entirely applicable to its case. As we have pointed out in these columns ‘the Indian Muslims like the Hindus have so many provinces which they can call their own and in which they can work and play and pray as they like. Besides, the Pakistanists amongst them, with extra-territorial sentiments surging in their hearts, can look upon any Muslim country as their homeland and the Mecca and Medina outside India as the salvation-guaranteeing places of pilgrimage. But all the religious stirrings and social strivings and political ambitions and economic endeavours of the Panth the boundaries of the Punjab bound. The Sikhs’ entire stake lies in the Land of Five Rivers. If this land is so divided that the Panth’s unity is not impaired and its political and economic life is not sundered and its religious places are not isolated, it will live and prosper and progress; but if it is so divided that the Panth’s head lies in one region and the trunk in another and the legs in yet another, it is bound to wilt and wither and perish. It is obvious that the Sikhs cannot accept any such partition plan as may spell their extermination.’ ...

49. Notional Division of Punjab Will Cause Dissensions among Sikhs

Letter from Tara Singh to Clement Attlee, 25 July 1947

Shiromani Akali Dal
Head Office, Amritsar

No. E/101

Dear Sir,

The Shiromani Akali Dal, the only Sikh political organisation is sending a Sikh Deputation with Principal Ganga Singh as its leader to London to place before you the urgent case of our community. We fear that the notional division of the Punjab will cut our community into two and thus threaten our existence and may lead to very grave consequences. We want to avoid it if possible; with this idea this deputation is coming to your country. I sincerely hope that you will give them some time to explain our case to you and help them in every possible way.

Thanking you in anticipation.
I beg to remain,

50. Sikhs Might Resist Exclusion of Nankana Sahib

THE VICEROY’S HOUSE, NEW DELHI

THE POSSIBILITY OF DISTURBANCES IN THE PUNJAB.

Attached is a note containing a paraphrased version of a report rendered by the Director of Intelligence. Copies of this note (less this cover sheet) will be handed round at the Partition Council Meeting on Tuesday 29th July, if approved at the Viceroy’s Meeting at 10 a.m. on Monday 28th July, 1947.

THE POSSIBILITY OF DISTURBANCES IN THE PUNJAB
NOTE BY THE VICEROY’S STAFF

1. Information has been received from a reliable source to the effect that, if Nankana Sahib (which is about 12 miles north of Lahore) is not included, by the award of the Boundary Commission, in East Punjab, the Sikhs intend to start trouble on a big scale.

2. It is reported that the Sikhs intend to act on or about 7th August; and that during the ten days before this date large meetings will be held to work up agitation. As is already known, the Sikhs have collected large quantities of arms.

3. It is also reported that the Muslims are fully aware of the preparations which the Sikhs are making; and are, in fact, making counter-preparations themselves.

4. Both sides are attempting to subvert troops in the areas concerned. These attempts are said not to have been wholly unsuccessful; promises of assistance from some troops have been received.

51. Assembly Parties Responsible for Choosing Leaders

Statement by M.A. Jinnah, 29 July 1947
Report from Eastern Times as cited in Amajit Singh (Ed.), Jinnah and Punjab, Shamsul Hasan Collection and Other Documents, pp. 332–3

‘There is a great deal of misapprehension that I am directly or indirectly trying to force leaders on the Muslim League Assembly Parties of the Punjab [and] Bengal respectively, and some interested parties are using my name as what my wishes are, regarding who should be the leader [sic].

I, therefore, wish to make it clear that I have expressed no preference or desire to support anyone as the leader of the Muslim League Parties, either in the Punjab or in the Bengal. It is entirely the responsibility of the Assembly Parties and they should freely and fairly choose their leaders, whom they consider best.

I understand that the dates for the Party meetings have already been fixed and I hope that they will elect the right men who will guide them and serve them selflessly and wholeheartedly. Whoever may be elected as Leader as the final result of a contest, if any, the defeated candidate and his supporters must, in the interest of the Musalmans and discipline and in order to work as a team, remain loyal to the leader that may be chosen finally by the Party, as long as he remains the leader of the Party. They must give him the fullest co-operation and support in the discharge of his responsibilities and it is only thus that we will make the building of Pakistan as one of the greatest States in the world, successfully’ [sic].

52. Report from Punjab

Extract from the fortnightly report on Punjab for the first half of July 1947

Confidential

1. Political:—The three main political parties, the Muslim League, the Congress and the Akalis, have been mainly occupied with the selection of members to the Security Council and the Partition Committee, the splitting up of the services, the valuation of assets and connected matters, and the preparation of the data to be produced before the Boundary Commission. The Muslim League, in addition, has devoted some attention to Frontier politics and has sent representatives, political and religious, with volunteer guards and students to the N.W.F.P. to assist in the work in connection with the referendum. The Akalis, not content with constitutional methods, have furthered their preparations for a struggle against the Muslims, which the leaders, to judge by their speeches on the occasion of ‘Protest Day’ in Amritsar on July the 8th, consider inevitable in the future whatever the Boundary Commission’s immediate findings may be.

The ‘Protest Day’, which coincided with the absence of a number of Muslim League leaders and workers from the Province, was viewed with considerable suspicion by the Muslim community who considered its observance as provocative and believed it was designed to estrange relationships to breaking point. The fear that the ‘Day’ would not pass without incidents of a serious nature was fortunately not realised and it may be considered, as previously suggested, as a preliminary move by the Akalis to ascertain the fruits of the very active propaganda which has been spread from village to village during the past few weeks, particularly in the areas most under dispute. The ‘Day’ was widely observed and the Hindu community, which had already staged a ‘Protest Day’ of its own on the 3rd of July on a smaller scale, generally co-operated in making it successful.

The Congress has not been idle, but an attempt it has made to set up a strong Minorities Protection Board in the Western Punjab, largely sponsored by Provincial Congressmen, has temporarily failed. The minority representatives of the seventeen districts who met in Rawalpindi on July the 6th on the occasion of the minorities convention, although agreeing on the necessity for safeguards and rights of minorities in the future Pakistan, failed to decide on the personnel to be co-opted into the Protection Board; in reality their ideologies are so divergent that this was only to be expected. There is no doubt that the Congress had hoped for some tangible results and the failure to evolve a compact opposition, with Congress as the guiding force, has caused some disappointment to this organisation.

The approach of the day when self-government will be vested in the hands of the political leaders of the Eastern and Western Punjab is causing party factionalism to increase again. Malik Feroze Khan Noon seems bent upon making a bid for power before the Khan of Mamdot can be elected to a vacant Western constituency, and is thought to be supported by a number of Muslim M.L.A.s and local leaders of the Western Punjab, and to rely on a pact with the followers of Sir Khizar Hayat Khan Tiwana. It is believed, however, that Sir Khizar Hayat Khan has not yet responded and accepted that, in any event, Mr. Jinnah will be the final arbitrator. The news of this divergence in the League has spread throughout the Province and has been welcomed by both the Congress organisation and the Hindu community. The Congress is believed to view any political move with satisfaction which will split the present Muslim League oligarchy and to be anxious to see a party with socialist leanings in power in the future Pakistan. The Punjab Congress itself, however, is now showing signs of revival of party faction as well and will have its own troubles, particularly in the Eastern Punjab where the Haryana Jat community and the orthodox Hindu community are evincing a decided disinclination to be ruled in the future by anyone but themselves. There are indications, too, of a revival of the old Giani Nagoke group differences amongst the Akalis, which may be largely due to the approaching necessity to select Ministers for the Eastern Punjab. They are not likely, however, to interfere with Tara Singh’s determination to forge a united Sikh front to oppose the Muslim community. The Ahrars, content for the moment to remain inert, hope that in the future they will come into their own, when the Muslim community realises that the Government of Pakistan is not going to be conducted on Islamic principles. Their optimism took birth in the non-inclusion of religious authorities in the panel of nominated members to the Pakistan Constituent Assembly. However, the same factor has not attracted much comment from the Muslim community which imagines the future Pakistan State will be governed on modern Islamic lines or on principles similar to those of the Turkish constitution. The Communists and Socialists are finding some solace in the thought that a change in leadership is bound to come soon, when the Muslim lower classes realise that their present leaders are selfish and egoistic capitalists. It is not known yet what organisations will be set up by the Communists and the Socialists when Pakistan comes into being, but both parties have expressed their determination to continue their work amongst the labouring classes in Pakistan.

Reactions to the proclamation by Allama Mashriqi of the dissolution of the Khaksar organisation have been varied. Many important Khaksars are reported to be considering the continuation of the movement, possibly under another name and with modified objects; others consider alignment with the Muslim League is now essential. It is likely that definite decisions will be taken when the Khaksars who attended the Delhi rally return to the Punjab but it is improbable that the Khaksar organisation has a future.

The appointment of Mr. Jinnah as the future Governor-General of Pakistan is popular with the Muslim community, the intelligentsia holding that the lie has been thrown back at those who contended that Pakistan would be a base for continued British exploitation. It has also been accepted that the nomination will help the League in its endeavours to capture the Frontier Province. The nomination made in the case of India caused some surprise, but Congressmen and many Hindus consider the selection a wise one and one which will enhance Congress in the eyes of the world and prove of advantage in the coming months when urgent decisions of importance will have to be taken....

53. ‘Lunatics Too Demand Partition’

_Tribune_, 30 July 1947

LAHORE, July 28.—While the Partition Committee is engaged in the serious task of dividing Punjab’s assets and officers, it continues to receive numerous representations, some of them rather interesting.

The latest communication in a registered cover is from the inmates of the Mental Hospital that, while partitioning the Punjab they should also be kept in mind!

It is learnt that about 180 of them belong to the majority community and the rest—80 in number—to the other community.

54. Sikhs Urged Not to Participate in 15th August Celebrations

Resolution adopted by Working Committee of Shiromani Akali Dal in its meeting, 1 August 1947

AICC Papers, File No. G-34/1947, NMML

The Shiromani Akali Dal has always stood for United India and strong position of the Sikhs in the Punjab. It has, however, declared more than once that in case of division of India, Sikhs are entitled to Sikh Home in Hindustan by partitioning the Punjab in a manner whereby the solidarity of the Sikhs should not also be impaired. The decisions so far taken completely ignore the wishes of the Sikhs by planning the partition of the Punjab whereby the solidarity of the Sikhs may be seriously impaired and they may be relegated to a subsidiary position. Besides the Sikhs have not as yet been definitely assured that the solidarity of their population would be maintained to an appreciable extent in the Eastern Punjab and their shrines would be included therein, nor they have been given any satisfactory position there, nor any provision has been made for the transfer of their population with properties from Pakistan to this area, therefore the Shiromani Akali Dal is of the considered view that Sikhs have no cause for pleasure on the fifteenth of August, hence it calls upon the Sikhs not to participate in such celebrations except those on official duty called upon to do so.

The Shiromani Akali Dal has, however, no intention of coming in the way of other communities in their celebrations on that date.

55. Assurances to Sikhs about the Safety of Their Shrines

M.K. Gandhi’s speech at Gurdwara Punja Saheb, near Rawalpindi, 5 August 1947

_CWMG_, Vol. LXXXIX, pp. 4–5

Replying to the address Gandhiji [said he] did not consider it possible that Eastern Punjab should be handed over entirely to the Sikhs to govern. He felt that the Sikhs should never entertain such an unworthy ambition. The Sikhs were reputed, and rightly, to be a warlike race. With them of all the persons in the world, merit and merit alone should be the sole test for holding any office. He hoped that throughout the two dominions merit would be the sole test. The speaker invited the Sikhs to lead in this desirable competition.

Coming to the protection of Punja Saheb, Nankana Saheb and the other Gurudwaras that may be found in Pakistan or elsewhere, he said:

One Sikh is equal to one and a quarter lakh men. Why should he beg for anyone’s help? If they have the mettle no one can cast an evil eye on Punja Saheb. But these days the Sikh brethren have taken to luxury and enjoyment. I do not intend to say that Sikhs alone have fallen into that habit. Among others women also have taken to fashionable ways though to a lesser degree. But do not think that I am defending them. Some take liquor in large quantities while others take less but that does not mean that it is a virtue to drink less. Similarly it is not a virtue to be less fashionable. As long as true Sikhs are alive no one can cause you any harm.

Do not look to any other power outside yourselves for the protection of these shrines. I would like every Sikh to be a defender of his faith and, therefore, of all the Gurudwaras and not merely of Punja Saheb which is one of the greatest. At the same time I want you to shed all fear about the future. I would ask you to rely upon the plighted word of the Muslim leaders. They have got their Pakistan. They have no quarrel now with anyone in India—at least they should have none. If your fears materialize and any attempt at desecration of the Gurudwaras is made by the Muslims, it will be contrary to the tradition of Islam as I know it. And those Muslims who take part in such desecration would be partakers in the destruction of Islam. Every faith is on its trial in India. God is the infallible Judge and the world which is His creation will judge the Muslim leaders not according to their pledge and promises but according to the deeds of these leaders and their followers. What I have said of the Muslim leaders is also true of the leaders and followers of other faiths.

56. On Present Disturbances

Note by Major General D.C. Hawthorn, 11 August 1947

_T.O.P._, Vol. XII, pp. 667–8

1. The Civil arrangements for splitting the Punjab are proceeding rapidly and a few days ago a new Hindu Supdt of Police arrived in Amritsar to take over. His first act was to disarm the Muslim members of the Police Force. This has created considerable alarm and despondency. The Police Force in Amritsar has decreased by 30%. The Muslim Police are most anxious for their own safety and for that of their families. The Governor has taken prompt action and this Hindu Supdt of Police has been transferred to the Kangra Valley. The Muslim Police are being evacuated under Civil arrangements to Western Punjab. The harm has however been done and with this reduction in the efficiency of the Police Force more and more calls are being made on the troops of the Punjab Boundary Force.
2. The refugee problem mainly from Eastern Punjab to Western Punjab is becoming increasingly difficult and more and more of the population is on the move; naturally the Civil are demanding escorts from the Punjab Boundary Force to protect these defenceless refugees as they move and the Commander, Punjab Boundary Force is doing what he can.

3. The disturbances are producing an average daily killing of about 100 people with occasional large raids in which 70 to 80 people are killed at one fell swoop. There have been two of these in the last few days, one in which the victims were Muslims and the other in which the victims were Sikhs and Hindus. A Lieut in 3 Mahar who went on a few days leave to his home was liquidated with his entire family. The GOC did not know his name.

4. The bigger raids are usually carried out by well armed and well led Gangs. Information is generally being received too late. This is due to the ‘sources’ of information drying up and the general pull-out of Europeans.

5. There is no doubt that but for the presence of troops an uncontrolled massacre would now be taking place.

6. The Government of Eastern Punjab which is setting up is of course a very creaky machine at present.

7. The troops are unaffected by the communal tension and are carrying out all that is asked of them magnificently.

8. The GOC pressed for the arrival of the Fighter Recce Sqn which was promised him. So far it has not arrived and he is being forced to use his AOP Flight for inter-communication and recce purposes. He stresses the importance of the Air from the morale aspect and says the appearance of aircraft quietens down the neighbourhood at once. Railway authorities are pressing for aircraft to be allowed to fly up and down the railway lines as they consider this will prevent, to a large extent, damage to the track by keeping saboteurs well away from the lines.

9. The derailment of the train two nights ago, he attributes to Sikhs and the Jeep containing the saboteurs which was chased disappeared into the State territory of Faridkot.

I am taking action re FRecce Sqn.

57. East Punjab Ministry Sworn In amid Communal Rioting

Letter from Francis Mudie to M.A. Jinnah, 15 August 1947
Kirpal Singh (Ed.), Partition of Punjab, pp. 488–9

Dear Mr. Jinnah,

I write to inform you that I was sworn in this morning at 11 a.m., and later swore in the four Ministers—Mamdot, Shaukat, Daultana and Karamat Ali. I did not, as I suggested in a previous letter, ask your advice as Mamdot had just come from Karachi, when I saw him yesterday morning for the first time.

2. The situation here is still very disquieting. Yesterday there seemed to be a danger of serious differences arising between the police, practically all of whom are Muslims, and certain Hindu troops, and even of their fighting one another. We therefore decided that there should be joint police and army patrol accompanied, wherever possible, by a Magistrate. This seemed to get over the difficulty, at least for the time being, and we have decided to continue this practice.
3. The League leaders’ efforts yesterday to get their followers to abstain from attacks on the other side were to some extent frustrated by stories, about the truth of which I can give no opinion, that Hindu troops were firing indiscriminately at people in the streets. This was another reason why we decided on mixed police and military patrols.

4. This morning I am told the position has somewhat improved, though during the night there was a very serious incident in which a Gurdwara was destroyed and a number of Sikhs, put at between 13-22, were killed. This is said to have happened in fairly close proximity to a Muslim picket composed partly of police and partly of military. Inquiries are being made.

5. There is little news from outside Lahore. A serious incident is reported from the Gurdaspur, Sialkot border, where Muslims attacked a train and are said to have killed about 100 Hindus and Sikhs.

6. The situation is still very dangerous. The League leaders are trying again today to persuade the Muslims of Lahore to keep the peace, whatever the provocation may be.

7. But the destruction last night of the Gurdwara may lead to retaliation in Amritsar. The Sikh leaders, Tara Singh and Swaran Singh, are reported to be doing their best to pacify the Sikhs. I hope that they will succeed. If the peace can be maintained in Lahore and Amritsar, it will probably be possible to keep the other places in control.

8. I have arranged to go to Ambala on Sunday, 17th August, accompanied by Mamdot, Daultana and one or two officials to discuss the law and order problem with Trivedi and his Ministers. We will go by air and return the same evening. In this matter the Governments of East and West Punjab must certainly co-operate very closely.

9. The Governor of the Punjab used to send daily telegraphic reports on the situation to the Viceroy. In the changed constitutional situation it would seem to me to be more appropriate if in future these reports were sent by the Chief Secretary West Punjab to the Home Department of the Pakistan Government. I hope that you will agree. I propose, however, unless you wish it otherwise, to continue to write to you a fortnightly letter giving my views on the official reports. I think that this was useful as a method by which Governors can keep touch with the Governor-General and vice-versa.

10. In conclusion, may I thank Your Excellency for what you said about British rule in India in proposing the King’s health at your banquet in Karachi? It was, if I may say so, very generously done and will be greatly appreciated by all those who like myself have spent their lives in service in this country. It will also be a great encouragement to those British officers now serving in Pakistan.

Yours sincerely,

Sd/- R. F. Mudie.

His Excellency Mr. Muhammad Ali Jinnah,
Governor-General of Pakistan,
Karachi (Sind).
Chapter 32. Partition of Bengal

1. Report from Bengal
   Extract from the fortnightly report on Bengal for the second half of May 1947, 4 June 1947
   Home Poll (I), File No. 18/5/47, NAI

1. Political

1. The period has been one of intense political speculation, centering round the announcement scheduled to be made by His Excellency the Viceroy on June the 2nd. Forecasts, frequently in considerable detail, of the plan of procedure for the transfer of power have been discussed and rediscussed from every possible point of view according to the political proclivities of the various parties concerned. Unfortunately the general result of this feverish speculation has not been to the political or communal benefit of the Province and as Bengal approaches what may be called the dead-line, the feeling is tense, in particular in Calcutta but present also to a lesser degree, owing to the fact that political consciousness is less developed, in other parts of the Province.

2. As was indicated in the last report would be the case; the period has been fully utilised by all parties to marshal arguments in favour of their particular scheme for the future well-being of the Province. It is doubtful, however, whether the numerous meetings and discussions which have been held have modified the general opinion very considerably regarding the future of the Province and, as the date approaches for the announcement of the plan of procedure, the general feeling both in Calcutta as well as in the districts appears to be that the partition of the Province following some form of self-determination is inevitable and that, as a result of such partition, Calcutta, the Burdwan Division and certain parts of the Presidency Division at least will be separated from the rest of the Province. As only to be expected from the original protagonists of the idea of partition, the Mahasabha has been prominent during the period and their activities have inevitably tended to heighten communal feeling and to intensify the distrust that at present exists in the capital of the Province. The leaders of this party have been prominent at a number of meetings held in Calcutta during the period, notably at Ballyganj on the 16th when 4,000 persons were addressed and on the 23rd at a meeting at Chetla when 10,000 persons assembled and resolutions were passed urging the creation of a separate Hindu Province, condemning the alleged unauthorised and uncalled for pact of Mr. Sarat Chandra Bose with the Leaguers and demanding the dissolution of the present Ministry and its replacement by two regional Ministries. As part of its general campaign the party have been stressing the need for the establishment of a parallel Government in Bengal. This last step is considered inevitable whatever the future may hold, for if the decision is against partition it would be necessary for the Hindus to resist the British plan to hand over Bengal to the League and the establishment of a parallel Government would automatically come to the front; if, on the other hand, the British decision is in favour of the partition of Bengal the Hindus would have to be prepared for violence from the Muslim Leaguers. Definite steps to combat Muslim attacks are proposed by the party which organisation has proposed to turn every Hindu mahalla into a fort under the protection of a volunteer corps. The endorsement of the Mahasabha plan by the B.P.C.C. is being sought and the party’s final plan of action would be given shape at the forthcoming All-India Council meeting at Delhi on the 7th and 8th of June. Meanwhile district and subdivisional Mahasabhas have been instructed to speed up their preparation for the emergency and to organise public meeting and conferences to marshal public opinion in favour of the demand for the partition of the Province and the dissolution of the present League Ministry.

3. The official Muslim League party have continued to indicate their entire opposition to the proposal to partition Bengal. Information available indicates, in fact, that the agitation for the partition of the Province is very much resented by all the Muslims of Calcutta and the possibility of bloodshed should such a partition be effected cannot be discounted. Their activities—like those of the Mahasabha—have been characterised by apprehension and a determination to resist possible Hindu aggression: from information available it appears that sections of the Muslims at least are already busy collecting food and preparing plans for defence and offence, whichever is necessary, in the Muslim areas.

On the other hand, a sovereign State on the lines reported to be favoured by Mr. Bose and the Chief Minister is disliked as it is thought that it would amount to a complete surrender to the Hindus. Developments during the period have confirmed the view that this movement is finding little support at present.

4. The necessity for maintaining the unity and integrity of the Indian National Army is the principal reason ascribed for Mr. Sarat Chandra Bose’s opposition to the evergrowing Bengal partition movement. The inability to split the I.N.A. by identifying himself with the communal cry of the partition of Bengal has determined Mr. Bose’s course even though his leadership among the Hindus of Bengal may be at stake. It would appear, however, that the I.N.A. are not united on this issue, for during the period the visit of ‘General’ Mohan Singh of the first I.N.A. to Calcutta took place when he unequivocally supported the proposal to partition the Province.

5. The seamen, too, have been considering their position in the light of recent developments and sections of them, notably the Seamen’s Union, the Indian Sailors and Quartermasters’ Union and the Bengal Saloon Workers’ Union being perturbed by the proposal of the annexation of Calcutta to the Hindu zone, have moved the Secretary of State and the Viceroy to ensure that Calcutta should continue as integral part of both Bengal.

6. Activities in the districts have followed lines similar to those in Calcutta. In West Bengal, as was to be expected, the partition movement has continued to gather momentum. A very large number of meetings continued to be held in support of the idea, notably one in Birbhum presided over by Mrs. Nellie Sen Gupta and attended by some 6,000 persons. In the view of local officers the entire Hindu community of West Bengal has accepted the inevitability of partition. Further meetings in support of the movement for partition are reported also from the Presidency Division but in the Dacca Division, where the Forward Bloc has some strength, some opposition to the general idea was noticeable. In Chittagong, where the scheme for a sovereign Province of Bengal has met with little support from any quarter, most people continue to consider the partition of the Province as a certainty.
7. The attempt of the Hon’ble Mr. J.N. Mandal, Law Minister, Government of India, to rouse an anti-partition feeling is reported to have been uniformly unsuccessful in West Bengal and such meetings as were arranged were on a very small scale. In a meeting attended by him in the 24-Parganas district early in the month an audience of only about 50 could be secured. The campaign was no more successful in Calcutta and led, in fact, to a counterblast on the 27th when the Bengal Provincial Depressed Classes League held a conference at which some 2,500 were present (including a thousand members of the Depressed Classes) presided over by Dr. Rajendra Prasad and having Mr. Jagjivan Ram as the Chief Guest....

2. Irony in Congress Support for Partition of Bengal

Extracts of a letter from Rajendra Prasad to Satish Chandra Mukherji, 5 June 1947

R.P. Papers, File No. 6-I/45-6-7, S. No. 52, NAI

1, Queen Victoria Road, New Delhi

My dear Sir,

... You must be following the political developments that have taken place from day to day. Events are moving very fast and we hope that by August next, we shall get what is called ‘Dominion Status,’ which is said to be more or less equivalent to independence. As the Viceroy said yesterday at the Press Conference, H.M.G. will not appoint any Governor-General thereafter and we could keep or send away Englishmen who are at present in the service of the Government of India. But the country is to be divided and not only the country as a whole but also the two Provinces of Punjab and Bengal. It is an irony of time that the very people who fought against the partition of Bengal and got it reversed should now demand that it should be divided and that that demand should be conceded just as the demand for the reversal of partition had to be conceded; but there was a more or less unanimous demand from Bengal Hindus and so far as I know Sjt. Sarat Chandra Bose was practically isolated. So now we are going to enter on a momentous period of our history, in order to run it according to our own notions and ideas. There are of course, limitations and inhibitions arising out of past history. Let us pray that God will give us wisdom and strength to do the work honestly and diligently.

With kind regards,

Yours sincerely,

3. Muslim National Guards Threaten Congress Leaders
Letter from Vallabhbhai Patel to Louis Mountbatten, 5 June 1947
Mountbatten Papers, File No. 19, NMML

NEW DELHI

My dear Lord Mountbatten,

You will be interested in the enclosed circular purporting to have been sent by the General Officer Commanding, Muslim National Guard, Pakistan Killa, presumably somewhere in Bengal, to Mr. Harendra Nath Mazumder, Deputy Leader of the Congress Party in the Bengal Legislative Assembly. Apparently this is a specimen of the non-violent activities of the League. I understand that this circular has had quite a wide circulation.

2. I should be glad of the return of this letter, as I propose to institute further enquiries.

Yours sincerely,

Dear Sir,

Salamwalequm:

You are out for partitioning Bengal, when wise Leaders like Mr. Sarat Chandra Bose, Mrs. Lila Roy, Hon. J.N. Mondal, Com. Somnath Lahiri, Com. N.N. Roy and others are opposing it. Just to think of it.

Do not do so, for the sake of your life. If you loose [sic] your life you loose [sic] all.

So be prudent come out, stand for United Bengal. You then will have your due share, but if you fail....

4. Inclusion of Bengal in Pakistan Must Be Prevented Letter from Bimal Chandra Sinha to Vallabhbhai Patel, 5 June 1947
SPC, Vol. IV, pp. 52–4

59 Barrackpore Trunk Road
P.O. Cossipore
Calcutta

Respected Sardarji,

You will perhaps remember the interview I had with you along with Sjt. Niharendu Dutt Majumdar a few days ago. Your encouragement and kind sympathy embolden me to encroach upon your valuable time and write this letter to you to bring to your notice certain facts which demand your immediate consideration.
1. It has not been made clear in the Viceroys's declaration what would happen to certain all-Bengal constituencies. For instance, the Railway Trade Union constituency (held by a Communist), the Water Transport Trade Union (held by a Muslim), the 5 Commerce seats (of which 4 seats are held by Congressmen and 1 by a Muslim), the Presidency and Rajshahi Division Landholders seats (both held by Congressmen) which are now being split up, Presidency Division and North Bengal Municipal constituencies (both held by Congressmen), which are also being split up—the fate of these constituencies does not appear to be very clear. Inclusion of some of these seats would strengthen our cause. A suggestion has also been made that in these cases an option may also be given to the member concerned, where his constituency is being split up, to choose which Constituent Assembly he would like to join.

2. The declaration yet leaves open the chance that, if at the time of voting, the Muslim League chooses, as a strategical move to ensure its domination in the administration of Bengal, to vote for remaining with the Hindustan Constituent Assembly, we would, in that eventuality, be included in the Indian Union, no doubt, but it would not be possible for us, in [those] circumstances, to build up a base for nationalism in Bengal, which cannot be secured unless we have the administration in our hands. Though the probability of the Bengal Muslim League revolting against Mr. Jinnah is very remote, still we must guard against every eventuality and make up our minds from beforehand. We feel that, if that happens, it would be more or less the continuation of the present state of affairs and the idea we have of securing in Bengal a base for nationalism will be completely frustrated. In our opinion, there should be a partition, which does not prevent East Bengal province to join the Hindustan Constituent Assembly if it so chooses, but at this critical hour we cannot allow the whole of Bengal to pass under the domination of the Muslim League in any shape or form. In order to secure an administration of nationalist character we feel partition to be essential and we are anxious to know what your reactions in the matter are.

3. In Bengal, we feel it has become necessary to concentrate now on two or three things in particular, namely, (1) To rouse public enthusiasm to white heat, particularly in West Bengal, so that there may be no wavering and no chance of defection in spite of the best efforts of the Muslim League and perhaps also of some of our 'leaders'. The public pressure is already tremendous, but we are determined to take no chances. (2) To prepare for the Boundary Commission, so that we may get those areas, which have at present been left but which should in all fairness, come to us. (3) From the trend of talks with some of our leaders we have reasons to anticipate that an effort may now be made to create a bitter feeling between East Bengal and West Bengal, but we are also determined to see that there is no such mis-representation of the Congress stand, which can only benefit the Muslim League. But for us to carry out this programme, it is necessary to have a strong organisation of one mind and one urge, conscious of the difficult times ahead and fired by the idealism of securing the territory that is now lost to us temporarily. Changes in our party and organisational structure, consequential to the declaration, would perhaps now take place, and as a humble Congressman I can only urge upon you the necessity of the all-India Congress leadership closely supervising and guiding these changes so that the changes may take place smoothly and no group or similar considerations may affect the great and vital issues at stake.

The feeling in Bengal, so far as I have been able to gather, is one of universal satisfaction amongst the nationalists, but the Muslim League is depressed. Though the Nazimuddin group of newspapers has hailed the declaration as one containing Pakistan, yet Ittehad, the mouthpiece of the Suhrawardy group, has written today editorially that Mr. Jinnah has back-stabbed Eastern Pakistan by agreeing to Bengal partition. Moreover, Mr. Muazzemuddin Hossain, our Education Minister, has today issued a Press statement saying that they wanted meat but they have been given stone instead. He has also asked that why is it that in spite of Mr. Jinnah’s assurance that nothing but Pakistan will be accepted, this ‘moth-eaten’ ‘truncated’ Pakistan is being offered to the Muslims in Bengal. The tone is one of despair and not of fight.

We would be anxiously awaiting your guidance in our difficult days that are coming, specially during the period of flux and change that is immediately before us and your instructions on the various points that I am writing to you would be eagerly awaited.

With deepest regards,

I remain
Yours sincerely,

Bimal Chandra Sinha

5. Partition Means Progress for East Pakistan

Note on Eastern Pakistan by Hamidul Huq Chowdhry, MLC, Calcutta, to M.A. Jinnah, 6 June 1947
jinnah Papers, Vol. II, pp. 73–93

The first reaction to the decision for partition of Bengal on the lines announced by H.M.G. is one of mixed feelings. It was never thought that Jalpaiguri and Darjeeling, where Hindus are in a minority of the total population, would be declared a Hindu area even for a temporary purpose; that Khulna, where there is a nominal majority of Caste Hindus-cum-Scheduled Castes over the Muslims, should have similarly been grouped with the Hindu districts without consulting the local opinion is also a serious injustice to the majority of the population. In this district, the Muslims and Scheduled Castes, together forming three-fourths of the population, would have, if given a chance, cast [in] their lot with the Muslim districts of Bengal. The other objectionable feature is that relating to Calcutta. Much of these serious drawbacks, we hope, will be rectified at the time of fixing the boundary by the Boundary Commission. When contiguous areas are reassigned according to population and full consideration is given to the necessity of creation of an economic unit with simpler international boundaries, the whole of Khulna, 1/3rd of the 24-Parganas and part of Calcutta and the whole of Jalpaiguri and Darjeeling are bound to be included in the new Muslim State. The essential feature of the scheme, namely the constitution of an independent Muslim State, even with the temporary drawbacks mentioned above [but] with the neighbouring Muslim part of Assam in it, is one of the greatest achievements and one for which Muslim India cannot be too grateful to [sic] the efforts of their great leader, the Quaid-i-Azam.

It will not require a very close examination for dismissing such criticism as that the new State thus created even without Calcutta will be economically weak. The area of the new State, along with the District of Sylhet and a major part of Cachar and Goalpara (where Muslims are in majority), would be at least 60,000 sq. miles as against 27,000 sq. miles of the new Hindu Bengal, on the basis that whole of the 24-Parganas, Calcutta, Khulna, Jalpaiguri and Darjeeling are included within the Hindu area. The population of the Muslim Bengal would be at least 470 lakhs as against 190 lakh for the Hindu Bengal. The new Muslim State will, therefore, be as big in size as Bihar and bigger than the present Assam, and in population as big as Madras and more than twice as that of [big as] Bombay. In short, it will be of the size and population of France. When boundaries are drawn up finally on an equitable basis the Muslim area is bound to benefit by another 9 to 10 thousand sq. miles.

Regarding the economic position, the following considerations will show that it will be economically as strong as many other independent States. It is true that it has not got any minerals except certain oil-bearing areas in the Muslim part of Cachar. Its real strength lies in the fact that it produces 85 per cent. of the total jute produce of the world. The value of jute export to other countries, both raw and manufactured, in 1942-43 was above 90 crores of rupees. The jute exports form more than 25 per cent. in value of India’s total exports. In short, without jute India will have very little foreign exchange, specially dollars, to pay for the machinery which India needs for her post-war reconstruction. This alone will be sufficient for the new Muslim State to be able to pay for all her requirements from foreign countries and for her development and reconstruction, and she will be in a very much stronger position in this respect than the rest of India.

It has often been stated that the Muslim Bengal is a deficit area in respect of food compared with the Hindu Bengal. The reverse is the case. The annual average of the last quinquennial for the Hindu districts of Bengal is 669 lakh maunds of rice and for the Muslim districts 1,732 lakh maunds (on the basis of the present division of Hindu and Muslim districts by H.M.G.). This work out at the rate of 3.3 maunds per head for the Hindu Bengal as against 4.2 maunds per head for the Muslim Bengal. In fact, Calcutta depended mostly on the rice of Eastern and Northern districts (Muslim area and often these latter districts were starved even to death to feed Calcutta). Similarly, the bulk of the agricultural products come from the Muslim parts of Bengal; as an example, the annual production of tobacco in the Muslim area is 120 lakh tons as against 10 lakh tons in the Hindu Bengal. Ninety-two per cent of the Bengal mustard seeds are produced in the Muslim Bengal. Practically the whole of sugarcane also comes from the same area. All the sugar mills are situated in this area. The same is the story in respect of other cereals and pulses and hides, silk, shellac and betel-nut that are produced in Bengal. 200,000 acres of Bengal tea cultivation are mostly situated in Jalpaiguri and Darjeeling. This will no doubt, we are confident, only temporarily pass into the Hindu Bengal. As against this, the areas under tea in Sylhet and Cachar, together with those in the Tippera State, will be almost equal in extent to the area of tea in Jalpaiguri and Darjeeling.

The Hindu Bengal is very deficient in food and her resources will have to be consumed for providing food to her people and she will have to depend upon supplies from the Muslim Bengal, for whatever surplus is there in this part (Hindu Bengal) will not be enough to feed the present population of Calcutta.

The only commercial commodity of Western Bengal is coal. The average production from Bengal mines works out at 50-lakh tons. Its value cannot be more than 5 to 6 crores of rupees per annum.

It is true that Calcutta is one of the two greatest industrial cities in India. This in itself may be an object of pride for the people of Bengal. But speaking from the point of view of the real people of the province and especially those of the East and North Bengal, the city has or had no economic value except as a negative factor. The hundred jute mills and hundreds of jute presses that are there are owned by Europeans and by Marwaris. This constitutes Calcutta’s biggest industry.
The Muslims of Bengal have not even the advantage of employment in those industries. Similar is the story of most of the cotton mills (23 mills are in West Bengal against 6 in the Eastern Zone). The powerful foreign industrial interests have utilised the governmental machinery for their benefit. The East and North Bengal for generations have not received any consideration from the provincial government, be it in the field of employment, industrialisation, education, health, irrigation or improvement in the system of cultivation. Whatever little has been done for improving the lot of the cultivators has been entirely confined to the cultivators of the Burdwan Division. The vicious circle which has made this possible is so strong that all efforts by representatives from East Bengal to improve the lot of the people of those parts have never met with any success till today.

The best natural port [Chittagong] in Bengal has been neglected in preference to Calcutta, an inland river port lying more than 125 miles from the river mouth and maintained at enormous cost, thus neglecting the development of the best natural port of the Province of Bengal. There is an erroneous view held in certain quarters that unless a considerable sum of money is expended on improvements and River Karnafuli made permanently navigable for the largest class of ocean-going steamers, the port of Chittagong, though it serves a large and prosperous area, has no future before it. In 1917 Sir George Buchanan was deputed by the Railway Board to advise them as regards the engineering works and improvements necessary to make the port suitable for accommodating the largest ships and the amount of the expenditure that these works would involve. His proposals, excluding the cost of dredgers, amounted to 250,000 and there was in his opinion no engineering difficulty in keeping the Karnafuli River permanently open for navigation by the largest ocean-going steamer.

The partition of Bengal in 1906 [sic for 1905] gave a short fillip to these areas and aroused considerable hope in the minds of the people but that too was destined to be only short-lived, as in 1911 the centre of gravity was again shifted to Calcutta by annulling the partition, and since then Western Bengal marched on the road to prosperity and the East slowly languished.

In the field of politics also Calcutta’s domination over Bengal has been complete and will continue for years to come if Bengal remains undivided. The only escape lies in accepting the formula of H.M.G.

The Eastern and Northern Bengal represent the Muslim Bengal. Anything done for the improvement of these areas had always been looked upon with suspicion by the entire Hindu Bengal; even the Hindus coming from these areas always opposed economic measures designed for the improvement of the people of these areas, simply because the bulk of the benefit will go to the Muslims. The opposition to the amendment of the Tenancy Act of 1928 and 1939 and the Debt Settlement Board Act, the Money-lenders Act and the Rural Primary Education Act are illustrations of the working of the Hindu mind. The Secondary Education Bill, meant for the improvement of the schools in the province (which by all opinion—Hindu and Muslim—need immediate improvement), is meeting with the combined opposition of the entire Hindu community on the sole ground that a very great portion of the benefit will be shared by the Muslims. Without multiplying the instances it can safely be said that at a time when the combined Hindu strength in the legislature is below 100 as against the 150 which the League Government commands, [any] legislation essential for the improvement of the lot of the people has been made impossible because of the opposition of the Hindu representatives. This is so even when the entire body of Muslim representatives has united under the Muslim League banner. With the disappearance of the political controversy the Muslims are bound to be split into groups in the legislature and then the vested interest represented by the Hindus of West Bengal will be able to make the Muslim representatives completely ineffective, the more so when the representation between the respective communities would be in the proportion of 45 and 55.

Under the new arrangement the representation of the Muslims is bound to increase to 68 per cent and the influence of the vested interests will be reduced to the minimum by the removal of the powerful interests of Calcutta.

Rapid industrialisation of the Muslim Bengal will not only be possible but [is also] imperative and the people [would be] rapidly taken towards prosperity, once we have a government controlled by us and suitably manned by the ablest amongst us. To continue under the present arrangement [will mean that] our lot will be what it has been during the last 100 years—poverty, illiteracy and disease.

Therefore, it should be patriotic of every Muslim to make possible the regeneration of the largest Muslim bloc of India. For this purpose, the removal of the influence of the Burdwan Division and of Calcutta would be a blessing in disguise thereby increasing the proportion of Muslim representation in the legislatures and making it more effective and the atmosphere in which the Government will be acting [would be] made rural and Islamic in its outlook.

6. Unity Purchased by Corrupt Practices Would Be Worse than a Frank Partition

Letter from M.K. Gandhi to Sarat Bose, 8 June 1947
CWMG, Vol. LXXXVIII, p. 103

I had gone through your draft. I have now discussed the scheme roughly with Pandit Nehru and the Sardar. Both of them are dead against the proposal and they are of opinion that it is merely a trick for dividing Hindus and the Scheduled Caste leaders. With them it is not merely a suspicion but almost a conviction. They feel also that money is being lavishly expended in order to secure the Scheduled Caste votes. If such is the case, you should give up the struggle at least at present. For the unity purchased by corrupt practices would be worse than a frank partition, it being a recognition of the established division of hearts and the unfortunate experiences of the Hindus. I see also that there is no prospect of transfer of power outside the two parts of India. Therefore, whatever arrangement is come to, has to be arrived at by a previous agreement between the Congress and the League. This, as far as I can see, you can’t obtain. Nevertheless, I would not shake your faith, unless it is founded on shifting sand consisting of corrupt practices and trickery alluded to above. If you are absolutely sure that there is no warrant whatever for the suspicion and unless you get the written assurance of the local Muslim League supported by the centre, you should give up the struggle for unity of Bengal and cease to disturb the atmosphere that has been created for the partition of Bengal.

7. Gandhi Against Partition of India

Extract from M.K. Gandhi’s speech at a prayer meeting in New Delhi, 8 June 1947
CWMG, Vol. LXXXVIII, pp. 108-10

BROTHERS AND SISTERS,

...I am accused of spoiling the situation in Bengal. It is my claim that nothing is spoilt at my hands. Whether it is in Bengal, Bihar or Noakhali, nothing has ever been spoilt at my hands.
I can only improve things and I have done so. Now, like the Punjab, Bengal too is going to be divided. In one part of Bengal the Muslims are in a majority and in the other the Hindus. A large number of Hindus desire partition, for, how long can one put up with turbulence? They say once there is partition they can at least live in peace in their homeland. The Muslim League in Bengal has rejected this proposal. But who takes the Bengal Muslim League seriously? Division of Bengal is certain under the new proposal.

Now I am being blamed for not letting Bengal be divided. It is true that I do not want the division. But then I also totally disapprove of the whole country being divided into Hindustan and Pakistan. Even if I was the only Hindu remaining, I would still have the courage to go and live in the midst of the Muslim majority. What is the worst they could do? Kill me; could they do anything worse? But they would not kill me. They would protect one solitary individual. God would protect me. God always protects one who has no one to protect him. That is why the poet says, ‘God is the strength of the weak.’ I do not at all like the division of Bengal. But I will say that the Hindus should let themselves be subdued and give up their desire in order to save their life and property. If they feel that they will be able to live in peace in their part of the province, let no one imagine that I shall come in the way.

Sarat Babu came to me the other day. He does not want Bengal to be partitioned. He says that the whole Province has one culture, and the same food habits. Why then should it be divided in the name of religion? Sarat Babu has his view, I have mine. The people however have the right to act as they desire. My individual opinion cannot thwart the opinion of many.

I always co-operate in good things. If a bad man recites Ramanama, shall I not join him? I shall certainly join him in reciting Ramanama. And if a man considered good indulges in wicked acts, shall I join hands with him? If I do so, I shall not be Gandhi for Gandhi can never worship Satan. Whoever acts out of good intention, out of love, will have my support.

I have come to know that money is being squandered to stall the partition of Bengal. Nothing enduring can be achieved with the help of money. Votes purchased with money have no force. I can never be party to such an act. I can never support an act of goondaism, even if committed by my own kith and kin.

Hence, I would like to tell Sarat Babu that even though he and I would like to stop the partition of Bengal we should forget about it for the time being. It cannot be achieved by impure means. God cannot be realised by impure means and no means for obtaining anything dishonourable can ever be pure.

8. Ensure Voting in Atmosphere Free of Coercion
   Letter from P.B. Mukherji to Rajendra Prasad, 9 June 1947
   R.P. Papers, File No. 6-I/ 45-6-7, S. No. 53, NAI

   Calcutta

   Strictly Confidential

My dear Sir,

Let me hope you have not forgotten me. I was in charge of the X-Ray Deptt. of the Patna Medical College Hospital before and shifted to Calcutta and am now in charge of the same Deptt. in the Chittaranjan Seva Sadan, Calcutta. I trust you are keeping fit.
I am writing to you on a very important matter and would beg of you to discuss the same with Mahatmaji, Pandit Nehru, Sardar Patel and others whom you consider necessary and take proper steps in advance to avoid a catastrophe.

I had been to see a patient in a Muhammadan family this afternoon and overheard the following, coming from an adjacent room, while examining the patient:—

‘Twenty lakhs per members means five crores; we are prepared to offer this amount and see whether we can buy them over or not.’

It at once flashed across my mind that the Muslims in Calcutta are hatching a conspiracy to bribe the non-Muslim members of the Bengal Legislative Assembly those who represent the Hindu majority districts and make them vote against partition of Bengal. Twenty lakhs per member would be too big a temptation to resist unless we adopt measures in advance to foil this nefarious game. The Congress High Command must not sleep over the matter and simply depend on the loyalty of its members in Bengal Assembly to give a good account of oursevles.....at the critical moment. Human nature being what it is, we must heed the warning, so fortuitously received. What adequate steps should be taken to see that these Hindu M.L.A.’s, representing the Hindu-majority districts of Bengal yield to the temptations placed in their path or threats hurled against them, is a matter which you are in a better position to decide; but may I suggest the following for your consideration?:—

1. The meetings of the M.L.As of Bengal and Punjab in two sections (one section for members from Hindu-majority districts and the other sections for members of the other districts) for the purpose of deciding whether these two provinces should be partitioned or not, should be held in Delhi under the presidency of H.E. the Viceroy. If these members could be taken away from Bengal and Punjab to Delhi for the purpose of this meeting, they would be out of reach of the mischief-makers in their own provinces.

2. The Congress High Command should convene a meeting of the M.L.As at Delhi at the same time, as the A.I.C.C meets there and obtain from them in writing that they would honor the Congress decision in respect of partition of these two provinces (in case India is divided) and vote accordingly when they meet in the separate sections of their respective provincial legislatures.

3. In case suggestion no (1) is not feasible or practicable, steps should be taken in advance of the dates fixed for the meetings of the two Provincial legislatures for the purpose of obtaining the decision on partition, to collect all the non-Muslim M.L.As, representing the Hindu-majority districts of Bengal and Punjab in Calcutta and Lahore respectively, at least four or five days before the date of the meetings, and accommodate them inside the Legislative Assembly premises, under armed guards provided by the Central Govtt. so that they may not be accessible to mischief-makers. All arrangements for their meals, sleeping facilities, sanitary requirements etc. should be made by the Provincial Congress Committee of Bengal and Punjab or the Central Government itself. What the public (non-Muslim public) of these two provinces demand is that their representatives in the Assembly should not be interfered with and be allowed to register their votes on the question of partition in an atmosphere free from coercion (physical as well as mental).

In conclusion, I would beg of you to take up the matter very seriously, and take all steps that are humanly possible to guard against any disaster. We should remember that ordinary people do not possess the honesty, integrity or the unbreakable determination of a Gandhi, a Rajendra Prasad or a Jawaharlal; twenty lacs may be a bait which might buy off in our camp.

With regards and respect.

9. Request for Voting against Partition in Bengal Legislature
Letter from Sarat Chandra Bose to M.A. Jinnah, 9 June 1947
Jinnah Papers, Vol. II, pp. 121–2

Calcutta

My dear Jinnah,

I have to thank you most sincerely for your courtesy and cordiality towards me and for the consideration you gave to my suggestions. Bengal is passing through the greatest crisis in her history, but she can yet be saved. She can be saved if you will kindly give the following instructions to Muslim Members of the Bengal Legislative Assembly:

i. At the meeting to be held of all members of the Legislative Assembly (other than Europeans) at which a decision will be taken on the issue as to which Constituent Assembly the province as a whole would join if it were subsequently decided by the two parts to remain united, to vote neither for the Hindustan Constituent Assembly nor for the Pakistan Constituent Assembly, and to make it clear by a statement in the Assembly or in the press or otherwise, that they are solidly in favour of Bengal having a Constituent Assembly of her own.

ii. At the meetings of the Members of the two parts of the Legislative Assembly sitting separately and empowered to vote whether or not the province should be partitioned, to vote solidly against partition.

The request I am making to you is in accordance with the views you expressed to me when we met. But it seems to me that if you merely express your views to your Members and not give them specific instructions as to how to vote, the situation cannot be saved. I hope you will do all in your power to enable Bengal to remain united and to make her a free and independent State.

If Muslim Members of the Bengal Legislative Assembly vote solidly as suggested in paragraph (i) and (ii) above, I think Lord Mountbatten will be compelled to convene another meeting of all Members of the Assembly (other than Europeans) at which a decision can be taken on the issue as to whether the province as a whole desires to have a Constituent Assembly of her own.

I shall be coming to Delhi again on the 13th or the 14th and shall call on you on the 14th or the 15th.

Thanking you and with kind regards,

Yours sincerely,

SARAT CHANDRA BOSE
10. United and Determined Leadership Is the Answer to Bengal Situation

Letter from Vallabhbhai Patel to Bimal Chandra Sinha, 10 June 1947

SPC, Vol. IV, p. 55

Dear Friend,

Thank you for your letter of 5 June 1947.

2. The question of all-Bengal constituencies is under consideration and they will have to be divided between East and West Bengal on a consideration of all relevant factors. We shall know the actual division in a few days.

3. I do not think there is any chance of the Muslim League making any attempts for the united Bengal to come into the Hindustan Constituent Assembly. If such attempts have been made or are made, we should know how to deal with them.

4. I quite realise the needs of Bengal at the present moment. What you need above everything else is united and determined leadership and I only hope that public opinion will force the leaders of Bengal to realise the urgent call of the situation and to take up a united stand against nefarious designs. No outside intervention can take the place of action which is required of Bengalis themselves, and I am sure if there were a general awakening in this sense, the leaders dare not defy the popular voice. Even at this late hour I hope popular opinion will make itself felt.

Your sincerely,

Vallabhbhai Patel

11. Problems regarding Voting on Partition in Bengal Legislature

Letter from K.C. Neogy to Vallabhbhai Patel, 11 June 1947

SPC, Vol. IV, pp. 57–8

Cecil Hotel
Simla, S. W.

My dear Sardarji,

Permit me to draw your attention to the enclosed statement which indicates the probable line of voting on the issue of the partition of Bengal. It will be seen that the margin is about ten or eleven, and if there [is] a defection of six from our side, the scale would be turned in favour of the League.

Disquieting rumours about fabulous sums that are going to be spent by the Leaguers for the purchase of Hindu votes have reached Simla, and I feel perturbed on that account. It is a pity that I have to be away from Calcutta at this time, being detained on account of the sitting of the Indian Railway Enquiry Committee at Simla. I hope, however, to reach Calcutta on the morning of the 22nd; but perhaps our fate will have been decided by then. The attitude of Sarat Bose and Kiran Shankar has been extremely deplorable, and if things go wrong, they will be mainly held responsible.

I feel sure you are closely following the situation. I wonder if it will be possible for you to pay a short visit to Calcutta at this juncture; it would certainly put heart into those who are working indefatigably in the cause of partition. Likewise, a visit paid by Rajen Babu and Sjt Jagjivan Ram would be very helpful for the purpose of counteracting Sarat Babu’s sinister influence and the attempts that are reported to be made by Jogendra [Nath] Mandal at bribing particularly the Scheduled Caste members of the Assembly.

The Governor himself is in favour of Pakistan and is for all practical purposes Suhrawardy's lap dog. The Governor and the Ministry are likely to do all that is possible to influence a decision in favour of Pakistan. Hence, to my mind, is the necessity for the presence of a few members of the Central Government, particularly yourself, in Calcutta at this time.

Trust this find you in the best of health.

With kindest regards,

Yours sincerely,

K.C. Neogy

12. Stoop to Conquer Hindus
Letter from M.K. Gandhi to H.S. Suhrawardy, 12 June 1947
CWMG, Vol. LXXXVIII, p. 137

I have your long, angry letter. Instead of being angry you should be thankful to me that I have dispelled all suspicion, if there was no ground for any... Do you not realise that the unity of Bengal is as dear to me as it is to you? The partition agreed to by the Congress and the Muslim League, however reluctantly it may be, can still be undone by you if you have the Muslim opinion behind you and if you would, as I suggested to you when we met, stoop to conquer the Hindus.

New Delhi

My dear Neogy,

Thank you for your letter of 11 June 1947. I also received your earlier letter in which you wrote to me about your own future having regard to the contemplated substitution of the Central Legislature by the Constituent Assembly.
2. You need not be anxious about yourself. I am bearing the matter in my mind and will do what I can.

3. As regards voting on the question of partition, we are taking necessary precautions. I feel confident that it will be all right.

With kind regards,

Yours sincerely,

15. Report from Bengal

Extract from the fortnightly report on Bengal for the first half of June 1947, 17 June 1947
Home Poll (I), File No. 18/6/47, NAI

...2. The announcement itself, followed quickly as it was by broadcasts by the main leaders accepting, for all practical purposes, the decision had a reassuring effect on public opinion and, since then, speculation and discussion have been rife regarding the implications of the changes decided upon. One minor—immediate—reaction was surprise that a final decision had been reached in such a short space of time, without the usual endless wranglings and debates: certain sections had confidently expected that, as had happened so often in the past, the announcement would only be the commencement of a long course of deliberations and negotiations with a view to evolving a final scheme for the smooth transfer of power. To find a ... scheme for the smooth transfer of power accepted straightforwardly was a ... welcome development.

3. Final opinions have not yet crystallised but preliminary reactions of the inhabitants of Calcutta have already begun to take shape. With certain very definite exceptions the announcement and the settlement that has now been reached has been received, if not with a good grace, at least with a healthy resignation and sense of relief and an appreciation that, as it is not possible to obtain everything, what has been granted is the best possible under the circumstances.

4. The preliminary reaction of the Hindus has unquestionably been one of satisfaction and congratulation. Within the course of a few months they have staged a demonstration in favour of partition and have achieved their end. At the same time they fully realise what the division of the Province will mean and some of them, at least, recognise that in the councils of Hindusthan they, the Hindus of a truncated Bengal, will carry little weight. At the moment they are buoying themselves up with the feeling that they have, at last, got rid of the League Ministry and will be able to develop their culture unhampered. In addition, they refuse to regard partition as a permanent solution of the problem of Bengal and are confident that the Muslims of Eastern Pakistan will be compelled in a short time to apply for inclusion in Hindusthan.

Hindus coming from East Bengal are relieved that the whole of Bengal has not been included in Pakistan but are naturally apprehensive as to their future under the dominant Muslims. The question of the transfer of population from East Bengal to West Bengal is already being ventilated. Both sections are apprehensive of the continuance in power of the present League Ministry in the period before the change-over.

Opportunity has moreover been taken by Hindu leaders to emphasise that the partition has been forced upon the country by the British and the Muslim Leaguers, and the Hindu Mahasabha have been quick to pass a resolution calling for a peaceful hartal on the 3rd July 'to protest against the vivisection of the country'.
With the announcement there has followed considerable activity to ensure that West Bengal casts in its lot with Hindusthan and the proposed visit of the President of the A.I.C.C. to Bengal at this juncture is no doubt connected with this aspect of the problem.

5. The Muslims are undoubtedly enthusiastic that at last they have a country which they can call their own but undoubtedly disappointed that the partition of the Province was found to be inevitable. The upcountry Muslims in Calcutta are particularly dissatisfied with the turn of events and the loss of large portions of Bengal, particularly Calcutta. They feel that they have been sacrificed and have expressed extreme resentment.

The youths and students are also dissatisfied with the provision for partition and are reported to be reluctant to concede Calcutta to the Hindus without a fight. Hindus also apprehend such a development and are reported to be organising defence measures in different parts of Calcutta.

6. All reactions, however, have been disciplined up to date and emphasise the degree of control that the political parties have been able to attain over their followers.

7. Reports from the Divisions tend to confirm the preliminary reactions of Calcutta. In West Bengal where there were in the early part of the period a large number of meetings in support of the proposed partition of the Province, the most important being the one at Suri presided over by Mr. N.C. Chatterjee and attended by nearly 8,000 people, the reaction of the Hindus has been one of relief. The Muslims are finding it more difficult to make up their mind about the attitude they should take up towards the plan; they have a feeling of having been let down but are sustained by the thought that Pakistan is at last a reality. The present reactions indicate that if there is trouble as a result of the decision it will come from Howrah where the announcement is reported to have done little to clear the atmosphere of suspicion and hostility between the two communities, the Hindus fearing that the Muslim minority will not accept without a fight the loss of Calcutta and Howrah.

In North Bengal the parties who are waiting for a lead from their respective High Commands have received the decision quietly.

In the Dacca Division, where the East Bengal Hindus have persuaded themselves that partition is in their own interests and where the local Muslims are not worrying about the loss of Calcutta, the announcement has caused general relief.

In Chittagong, too, the announcement was received calmly and no trouble or excitement has been reported from any quarter. The arrival of additional troops had a steadying effect, particularly as it was generally believed that many more troops had, in fact, arrived than was actually the case.

8. Seeds of future local trouble are likely to be found, apart from Calcutta, in those areas where the minority are in a local majority. Such a situation arises in the Gopalganj area of Faridpur where (thanks to the Scheduled Castes) the Hindus are in a slight majority. The possibility of trouble in this area has already been forecasted. Political parties have already been quick to note such areas and to make it clear that in the due course ‘opportunity must be taken to rectify (naturally in their own favour) glaring instances of injustice’....
16. Jinnah Rejects the Idea of Coalition Ministry in Bengal

THE VICE ROY’S HOUSE, NEW DELHI

H.E.

Pug and I saw Gandhi, Jinnah and Badshah Khan in your room at 4.30 p.m. today....

After the meeting broke up, Pug saw Jinnah privately for a moment and asked him whether he would be prepared to authorise Suhrawardy to form a regional Ministry in Bengal as desired by the Governor. I am afraid that Jinnah’s reply was an absolute negative, and I do not think that the subject is worth pursuing.

17. ‘Parts of Jessore, Faridpur and Bakerganj Should Go to Hindu Bengal’

Hindustan Standard, 19 June 1947

Mr. P.R. Thakur M.A. Bar-at-Law (Bengal) Scheduled Caste Member of the Constituent Assembly of India representing Bengal has issued the following memorandum for inclusion in the new Hindu Province of Bengal non-Muslim majority areas (where the Scheduled castes predominate) of parts of the districts of Jessore, Faridpur and Bakerganj contiguous to the non-Muslim majority district of Khulna.

Under H.M.G.’s final statement an announced by H.E. the Viceroy Lord Mountbatten on 3rd June 1947 it has been decided to demarcate the boundaries of the two parts of Bengal on the basis of ‘contiguous majority areas’ of Muslims and non-Muslims. The Boundary Commission to be subsequently appointed will also be instructed to take into account ‘other factors’ for ascertaining the exact boundary line.

In pursuance of the above principles enunciated in H.M.G.’s statement an attempt has been made in the following paragraphs to carve out a compact contiguous non-Muslim majority area in the three districts of (i) Jessore, (ii) Faridpur, and (iii) Bakerganj.

It may be noted at the very outset that this compact area comprises 2043 sq. miles with a total population of 23,48,339 persons of whom non-Muslims, including tribes etc., would be 12,35,720 and Muslims 11,11,619, of the non-Muslim, Scheduled Castes would number 7,28,421 and Caste Hindus 4,94,046. It would thus appear that the non-Muslim majority in the said area will amount to over 55 p.c. of the total population, which is a sufficient justification for its inclusion in the contiguous non-Muslim district of Khulna.

The details of the different area and their respective population are given below:

DISTRICT OF JESSORE

The police station of Kalia, Abhoynagore, Narail, Salikha and the Southern portion of Lohagarah
P.S. (river Nabaganga being the boundary)
DISTRICT OF FARIDPUR

The Police Stations of Gopalganj, Kaslani, Kotwalipara, Muksudpur (in Gopalganj sub-Division) Rajair, Western part of Madanpur P.S., Western part of Kalkini P.S. (the river Arial Khan being the eastern boundary line.

DISTRICT OF BAKHERGANJ

The police stations of Goumadi, Wajirpur, part of Babuganj P.S. part of Barisal Kotwai P.S. including Barisal town, a portion of Bakerganj Police Station Part of Nalchity P.S. including Nalchity town, portion of Pirojpur P.S. including Pirojpur Town part of Cowkhali P.S., Swarup kathi P.S. Banariparia and Najiirpur P.S. (a number of rivers viz. Arial Khan Barisal, Pandav, Bishkhali Kacha and Baleswar being the natural boundary line on the east of these areas as would be found in any large scale map of Bengal).

The above areas are compact non-Muslim areas contiguous to the North Eastern side of the district of Khulna as would appear from the attached map, the said area being specially marked red. The exact boundary line of the said area would be modified to some extent by the river line passing through it.

Details of areas with particulars of population in the said districts.

In delimiting the boundaries of the new province special provision must be made for the following:

(a) Arrangement should be made at State expense for exchange and migration of the population specially of the Scheduled Castes, where so desired.

(b) Adequate compensation should be made by the State to the migrating population for lands and property left behind.

(c) Advance reservation of areas and lands should be made preferably on the border district for settlement of the Scheduled Castes who would not like to go far into the interior for reasons of climate and other factors.
18. Jinnah’s Attitude towards Proposed Coalition Ministry

Telegram from H.L. Ismay to J.F. Burrows, 21 June 1947

IOR, R/3/1/159, Acc. No. 3472, NAI

New Delhi

SECRET

No. 1533-S. Jinnah has told me that he has had telephone message from Suhrawardy saying that you had threatened him with Section 93 if he refused coalition ministry or regional ministry. He said that this was entirely ultra vires, that we had considered Section 93 in NWFP and decided that it was impossible. There was no reason why Suhrawardy should not carry on with caretaker government. He begged me to inform Viceroy of position at once and ask him to instruct you to take no final decision till matter had been discussed between Viceroy and Jinnah.

Have just telegraphed Kashmir accordingly. Viceroy returns Monday and should be able to let you know his views Monday evening or Tuesday morning at latest.

19. ‘Bengal Partitioned: Fateful Decision by Legislators of Non-Muslim Majority Areas’

Extract from a report in Amrita Bazar Patrika, 21 June 1947

The decision to divide Bengal in order to remain attached to the Indian Union was taken by the Bengal Assembly members representing Hindu majority areas voting for it at their meeting at the Assembly House on Friday.

This fateful decision was taken by 58 members voting for it and 21 against. The Congress members on whom the responsibility for the decision lay acted as they were expected to and all uneasiness that any of them could do otherwise was set at rest by all of them voting solidly for the motion. All Congress members were present with the exception of Mr. J.C. Gupta who is out of the country being on his way home from England. Mr. Annada Prosad Mandal with his temperature running 104 degrees was present and cast his vote in favour of partition.

With four Anglo-Indians, 2 Communists and 1 Indian Christian joining the solid phalanx of Congressmen and Dr. Syama Prosad Mookerjee, the number of supporters for the partition rose to 58, the Moslem League section voting en bloc against partition.

The members of the Bengal Assembly excluding the Europeans met in two sections at 11 in the morning and there being demand for joint meeting from the Congress section at both these meetings they were immediately adjourned. The joint session commenced at 3 p.m. where the League members voted solidly not to join the existing Constituent Assembly while the Congress members and Anglo-Indians voted for it, voting being 126–90. Three Communist members remained neutral.

The two sections then met separately again and the Hindu majority section voted as stated above. While the other section, the meeting of the representatives of the Muslim majority areas, voted against partition and for joining the Pakistan Constituent Assembly.

The Congress members opposed both these motions. Voting being 106–35 and 107–34. The motion whether in the event of Sylhet referendum resulting in favour of amalgamation, Sylhet would be amalgamated was adopted by 105–34 votes, Congress members opposing this.
The morning session of the meeting of the members representing the non-Muslim majority districts commenced punctually at the scheduled time—11 a.m. at the southern lounge on the first floor of the Assembly House. Congress members were first to take their seats and Muslim League members started at 2 p.m.

The meeting was then dissolved.

MUSLIM MAJORITY SECTION

When the two parts of the Bengal Legislative Assembly met at 11 A.M. one in the Chamber itself and another in the southern lounge on the first floor of the Assembly House, Mr. Nurul Amin, president of the Eastern Bengal section, said as follows:—We are taking a very momentous decision to-day, at this meeting, which will go down as an important event in the history of freedom of this sub-continent. I appeal to each member of the House to support me on this solemn occasion in conducting the proceedings.

‘It is necessary for us to adopt certain rules of procedure for this meeting. The rules were drafted yesterday at a meeting of the leading members of both the parts of the House including the presidents of the two parts of the Assembly. The rules have been supplied to you and I believe that they may be adopted.’

There being no objection, Mr. Nurul Amin declared that the rules of procedure as circulated among members had their approval.

He then announced that the first business before them was to ascertain whether there was any member to demand a joint sitting of the two parts of the Assembly at which the decision would be taken on the issue as to which Constituent Assembly the province as a whole would join in the event of the province remaining undivided.

Mr. Kiran Sankar Roy then rose in his seat and demanded that there be a joint meeting. The President thereupon adjourned the sitting in response to Mr. Roy’s demand and said that the joint meeting would be held at the same place and at 3 P.M. He also announced that this part of the meeting would re-assemble in the Chamber fifteen minutes after the termination of the joint meeting.

A message to the effect that a request had been accepted for holding a joint meeting was communicated to the President of the other part of the Assembly members.
