The Honourable Mr. SHRIDHAR BALKRISHNA UPASANI:—May it please your Excellency,—I most heartly join in thanking the Honourable Mr. PATEL for having brought this measure before this Council. I also join in thanking your Excellency's Government for granting permission to bring this measure before the Council. I cannot, however, congratulate Government on the tardy and halting support which it would appear to have given to this measure. It was strongly opposed by Government when it first came before this Council in the form of a resolution moved by the Honourable Mr. PATEL in December last and it was a great disappointment to non-official members to find that it was not then accepted by Government. It is also disappointing to hear that the bill should not have been accepted by Government as it was originally submitted by the Honourable Mr. PATEL, though it was drawn up by him in an excessively modest spirit to make it acceptable to Government in every way. In the first place the Honourable Mr. PATEL expressly provided in clause 3 that the issue of a notification making primary education compulsory should be subject to the previous sanction of the Local Government.

Then in clause 4 he provided that the notification under clause 3 should not issue unless the municipality made such provision as the Educational Department of the Local Government consider necessary and sufficient for the primary education of all children in the Municipal District.

Then further he added a clause, No. 14, binding the municipality to impose an education cess to provide funds necessary for this additional liability.

Then again he added a further clause, No. 17, giving Government absolute power to withdraw the notification in case the municipality made default in any of the requirements imposed on it by the bill. In fact he imposed every possible liability on the municipality for the carrying out of this measure, while he left absolute power to Government to accord or not its sanction to its introduction and to withdraw it at any time as it pleased. Not a word was introduced in the bill to bind Government's hands in any way or to impose on it any liability whatever. The bill brought forward in this form should have met with warm support from Government without any further insistence of any amendment in it. It appears, however, that the Government were pleased to insist on clause 16 being added, which provides that all primary schools maintained by a municipality in any municipal district in which a notification making primary education compulsory is issued shall be open to inspection by the Education Department of the local Government and the municipality shall maintain such buildings, staff and appliances for all such schools as the department may from time to time require. This was already sufficiently provided for in clause 4 and there was no need to insist on this clause 16 being added. Government, however, did not stop even there but insisted on still another clause, viz., 18, being added, and it was seriously objectionable. My lord, it is often complained that legislation by Government is introduced more or less to strengthen the hands of Government and to bind the public and other bodies concerned with one-sided obligations. I am sorry that a bill brought forward by a private member should also be open to the same objection. I should have felt more glad if Government instead of insisting on insertion of clause 18 had been able to persuade itself to ask the Honourable

Mr. PATEL to embody in this bill a statutory assurance binding it to give the needful additional help to municipalities for the successful working of this measure. That would have been in the fitness of things especially as Government knows full well that even the existing liability which municipalities have to bear in connection with education is found to be far too heavy for them and that the help which Government is giving them is not adequate enough. The help at present given to municipalities is not in proportion to that given to the local boards, and even for what the municipalities are required to do now more assistance at the hands of Government is necessary. It is not, I think, denied that in respect of elementary education the primary responsibility is on Government and that responsibility must be cheerfully accepted. Illiteracy is still rampant in this country and as my honourable friend, Mr. DESAI, said, it is very disappointing and unsatisfactory to find that even in large towns the percentage of illiterate voters should be found to be from 50 to 75 per cent. The state of things ought to be removed and I think we have a claim on Government to insist on its giving us all the help that is needed in carrying out this measure. I can say with confidence that unless such help is forthcoming it will not be possible for even the more advanced municipalities to bring this measure into force within their area. My lord, the people of the Presidency pay as much as about Rs. 20 crores a year to Government by way of revenue and it is due to them that Government should provide for them sufficient funds from the public revenue to give them at least primary education. Therefore, instead of embodying a provision like clause 18 which expressly exempts Government from any liability in respect of that help, we should certainly insist on Government embodying in the bill a clause conveying Government's statutory assurance that in cases where a municipality may come forward to tax itself to give effect to this measure, Government help will be far more liberally given than at present. I have no doubt that Government will give it, but this clause 18 as it stands raises unnecessary alarm and this alarm, I think, should be removed.

Our friend, the Honourable MR. PATEL, told us that though this clause may stand in the bill there will be nothing to prevent Government from giving needful help. We shall be glad to receive that assurance from Government and if that assurance is given, and if as a matter of fact the required help will be forthcoming, then where is the need to have an express provision on the statute exempting Government from liability to give that help. How can we ask our people and the municipalities to impose additional taxation upon themselves for this measure when there is no assurance in this act itself to indicate that the needful help will be forthcoming from Government, and if clause 18 is to stand as it is, we cannot approach the public unless this assurance is embodied in the statute itself.

The Honourable Mr. PATEL pleaded that this clause 18 was not originally put in by him but that it was inserted to secure the assent of Government to introduce this bill. For my part, I agree with my Honourable friend, Mr. KAMAT, in thinking that there was no need for it. The bill as it stood did not impose any specific liability upon Government, and, therefore, there was no need for clause 18. Even in the bill which the late Mr. GOKHALE presented to the Imperial Government no such saving clause was deemed necessary. If I am right in that, well, I do not know why we should not insist upon this clause being removed from this bill. If it be not possible to embody in this act a provision conveying an express assurance that the necessary help to cover three-fourths or two-thirds of the required additional expenditure will be given by Government, the next best thing that we should do is at least to delete this clause 18 and leave it open to Government to render such help as they can and as the circumstances of each case may require. I have no doubt that Government will discharge its own part of the responsibility, but the public will always want the assurance that Government will do so. With these few remarks I support the bill. As regards the other matters of detail I think we might very well leave them to be considered minutely in the select committee. My honourable friends should remember that in every country in the west and in Japan also compulsion had to be used to fight this demon of illiteracy and if we wish to make any advance and come to a level with the more advanced nations we must introduce this measure in our country. All those fears which were expressed by our honourable friend from Sind would be found to be groundless and I am sure if we only heartily co-operate, the people and Government together, it will be a glorious achievement for which the coming generations will thank your Excellency's Government and the Council itself for having carried this measure through.

The Honourable Mr. F. G. PRATT :—Your Excellency,—I do not wish unnecessarily to prolong the discussion upon this bill, but there are a few remarks which I would like to put before the Council about some of the principles of the bill.

The first fact which, I think, would not be irrelevant to notice is the fact that under the Local Boards Act legislative provision has been made as to the proportion of the income on the one anna cess which should be spent for educational purposes. That proportion, by statute, is laid down as one-third. In the case of municipalities there is no such statutory provision as to the amount that should be spent upon education. It is left entirely to their option; it is enacted only that they must make reasonable provision for primary education. The percentage so spent out of the taxation revenues of municipalities varies very greatly. On the average, I think it falls very far short of the $33\frac{1}{3}$ per cent., which is laid down by statute in the Local Boards Act. In some municipalities in my division it is as much as 40 per cent., but these are exceptional municipalities. There are other municipalities in which the amount spent on education has been as little as 6, 7 or 8 per cent., and those municipalities are not, by any means, the smallest or the least advanced. These considerations are not irrelevant in connection with the matter which we are now discussing.

Turning now to the honourable member's bill, it has practically got only two main principles. The first principle is that compulsion should be applied to parents to send their children to school and the second is that it should be optional for the municipalities to apply that compulsion. The honourable member has satisfied himself and has stated in his statement of objects and reasons that this principle commands the enthusiastic support of all classes of people in the country. He must also have satisfied himself—it is clear he has satisfied himself—that the residents of the areas to which he proposes to apply this legislation will be willing to tax themselves in order to carry out the objects of the legislation. It is clear to anybody who thinks out the question—I am sure the honourable member has devoted a very great deal of thought and trouble to it—that even on the most favourable assumption, that is to say, on the assumption that the municipalities are assisted by appreciable subventions from Government,—even on that assumption, the adoption of the option given to municipalities by this legislation would involve many such municipalities in an appreciable increase of expenditure. They will not be able to make primary education compulsory without spending a good deal more money, which they will only be able to get by increasing any existing taxation or by introducing new taxes. The honourable member is satisfied that the municipalities are willing and eager and anxious to adopt this measure and to tax themselves. He has this faith and he has had the courage to put his faith to the test of practical experience. Time alone will show whether his faith would be justified and his courage rewarded. I hope very sincerely that it will. I do not in the least wish to damp the honourable member's enthusiasm, but I cannot help recalling to mind the instance of another piece of optional compulsory legislation which is analogous to this in some ways. I refer to the Town Planning Bill, which a few years ago was passed by a very strong, numerous and representative select committee and on which a similar chorus of congratulations was accorded by the honourable members of this Council.

The Honourable Mr. PATEL.—No.

The Honourable Mr. UPASANI.—We opposed it.

The Honourable Mr. PRATT.—My remarks can easily be verified by reference to the proceedings of this Council. Well, sir, since this act has been brought into force, in my division only one municipality has introduced a town planning scheme, although the introduction of a town planning scheme involves financial obligations of a very much smaller and a very much less serious nature than would be involved by the adoption of legislation of this kind.

I do not want to discourage the honourable member, but I hope that the results in the case of this legislation will be different. Time alone will show how it will work out, and I can only say that I hope that his courage will be rewarded and that this measure will be a success, and when I say so I do not merely mean that it should pass smoothly through its second reading and third reading, but that it will form a real, living, working part of the legislative machinery of this country.

The Honourable SARDAR SHRINIWAS COOPOOSWAMI MUDLIAR:—Your Excellency,—With your permission, I would like to say a few words in support of this useful bill introduced by my honourable friend Mr. PATEL. The whole of this Presidency is indebted to the mover for having introduced a bill, which is for the benefit of this Presidency, and when this bill is passed into law we shall be able to promote the education of the backward class, which is an essential factor for the uplifting of our country.

Before I proceed further it is my duty, my lord, to thank you and your Government for having given this bill very kind consideration and for having obtained the necessary sanction of the Government of India. This good act of yours will always be remembered by the people of this Presidency.

At this stage we have to see to the principles of this bill and from the speeches of the honourable members it is proved that these principles are acepted. The previous speakers have made suggestions as to the changes in the bill and I do not wish to take the time of the Council by going over these items again. I am sure the select committee will take into consideration all the suggestions made. My honourable friend Mr. PIR BAKSH need not be so very nervous about supporting this bill, for all his objections will be carefully considered by the select committee. I would only add that the select committee will seriously consider clause 18 which is of very great importance. With these few words I support this bill.

The Honourable Mr. J. G. COVERNTON:—Your Excellency,—In rising to speak on this bill I have no intention of criticising it in detail. This is not, I take it, the most suitable opportunity on which to do so. There are, however, a few general remarks which I should like to make, and if I may say so, a few queries which I should like to put from the point of view of a person who possibly hereafter may have something to do with the working of the bill.

In the first place we heard a good deal about the good effects, the great results, which are supposed to be likely to accrue from a bill of this kind. I do not wish to deny that in certain countries and in certain circumstances a great deal has been done which probably could not have been done in other ways than by and through compulsory education. But I do not know that we can take it altogether for granted that compulsory education is the only means by which we can push and promote primary education in a country of this kind. If I may be pardoned for referring to my own previous experience, I would point out another country in which primary education has extended on a far greater scale than obtains anywhere in India or, if I may say so, than is likely to obtain, at any rate in our generation in India, and that that has been effected by a system totally dissimilar from anything like statutory or legal compulsion. I only throw that out as a suggestion, because I think that it has been taken too much for granted throughout this discussion that we are in such circumstances as render it impossible for us to dispense with the principle of compulsion. I do not wish to discuss that point further, but I leave it to honourable members to think about.

A corollary from the question of the application of compulsion seems to me to be this: it has been assumed, not by all honourable members but by a certain number of honourable members, that compulsion is going to be universal. Some honourable members have come to the conclusion that once this bill is passed we shall see a rush on the part of municipalities to introduce compulsory education. Personally I do not anticipate anything of the kind, and speaking for myself I am very glad that I have not to anticipate such a conclusion to this bill, because with our present machinery and with the present appliances and staff and so forth it would be utterly impossible either for us or the municipalities or anybody else concerned to cope with such a condition of things.

The way I should look at it is this, that a bill of this kind is experimental or tentative.

It has been assumed again that the whole principle of compulsion has been adopted by the Government of India and that this is the first fruit of such adoption. Of course I am not entitled in any way whatever to speak for the Government of India, but so far as I know the expression of the Government of India's view is limited to the statement that there is no objection to the introduction of this particular bill. That you will see is a purely negative statement. And as I say, this measure, if adopted, will be a tentative and experimental measure and as has been pointed out by, I think, the Honourable Mr. PRATT, and by other honourable members, this compulsion is purely optional. It will be at the pleasure of any municipality that complies with the conditions of the bill to introduce compulsion. But even if it is in a position to comply with the provisions of the bill, there is no compulsion on the municipality to compel the children in its jurisdiction to go to school. We cannot therefore regard it in any sense as a bill for the introduction of universal or general compulsory education.

There are a few points of some importance which I should like to indicate to the Council, because, as I said at the beginning of my speech, they particularly concern people like myself who will have to do with the actual working of the bill. This bill is not a new bill in the sense that it is something entirely novel which is just placed before us. It is based on the late Mr. Gokhale's bill of 1911 or thereabout and in certain respects coincides very closely with that bill. In other respects and in certain important respects it departs a good deal from that bill.

In the statement of objects and reasons of this bill we are told that various things are intended by this bill and at the end of the statement it is said that the number of boys in elementary schools is little more than half of the total number of boys of school-going age. The idea there seems to be that we are going to introduce elementary education. If you turn to the bill there is not a word about elementary education, so far as I can see. The term used is primary education. Primary education is defined in sub-clause (4) of clause 2 at page 1 of the bill. It says, "'primary education' means such instruction in reading, writing and arithmetic and other subjects (if any) as may be prescribed from time to time for primary schools by the educational department of the local Government."

Again in clause 9 we are told that the child may be excused from compulsion for a reasonable excuse defined in sub-clauses (a) and (b) of that clause. I want to know what the honourable mover intends by primary education. It is all very well to say "such instruction in reading, writing and arithmetic and other subjects, etc." But that covers a very large field and it certainly does not cover what I personally would consider as purely elementary education.

Most of you are aware that our primary system consists of seven standards and works upto what is called the vernacular school final examination. If you compare that system with the system of primary education or vernacular education in other provinces, you will find what we call primary here is called to a large extent secondary in other provinces. For instance, if you take our seven standards of vernacular education, the first four would be denominated primary and the rest might be denominated secondary. I do not think an ordinary person reading this bill and being aware of the standards of the Presidency here would understand what apparently is the intention, which as judged from the wording of the statement of objects and reasons is that the education to be given should be elementary. I admit I may be wrong in my interpretation. If the education is to be fully elementary and not primary, then I think we should consider that point in select committee which is appointed to discuss the bill.

A point not unconnected with that is the age question. Now this bill is, as I have said, modelled on the late Mr. Gokhale's bill, and this age of 6 to 10 is taken directly out of Mr. Gokhale's bill. Well, I do not, at present at any rate, intend to criticise the age-limit, but I have heard it criticised and the only point I wish to put forward is that that does not coincide with any beginning or ending as things are at present in our primary system. Children go to vernacular schools in the Bombay Presidency at a very early age. I find that quite a number go, in fact, I should say, are sent, not to say are dragged, to school at the (shall I say) premature age of 4, and quite a number go to school at 5. I do not intend to imply that the honourable mover should put compulsion on the hapless infant of 4 and compel it to go to school, or to what they would consider something little better perhaps than a prison under such circumstances. But at the same time it is very awkward if we are to have a mixture of ages to begin wtih. Also what about the final limit of 10? I suppose that was taken because six from ten leaves four; and therefore you have 4 years of instruction and in some vague way that was supposed to coincide with a certain number of standards, which again in some vague way were supposed to convey what was called either primary or elementary education. Well what I want to know is exactly what sort of education is going to be given? Is it elementary or fully primary, and if so, how you are going to class the ages? I only put this point in a general way, because it is one which will have to be worked out in the select committee.

The Honourable Mr. LAWRENCE pointed out what I think is a very serious conflict (I hardly like to use the word) and possibly a dead-lock resulting in the application of section 4 in combination with that of section 14. I need not enlarge on the point but it does seem to make it extraordinarily difficult for a municipality to get any Government to sanction any action it wishes to take under the act.

Coming to another section, in Mr. Gokhale's bill, a specific clause was introduced requiring that a municipality should satisfy itself and Government should also be satisfied, that a certain percentage of attendance had been reached in the area concerned before compulsion was going to be applied. In the actual bill which Mr. Gokhale brought forward no particular proportion or percentage was laid down. But in the speech which the late Mr. Gokhale made afterwards when the bill was rejected, he stated incidentally that he had had discussion with other people and on consideration with his own supporters he had come to the conclusion that it was necessary to lay down a percentage of 33 per cent. As I understand the position, no municipality was to be in a position to move for compulsory education, unless it had got at least 33 per cent. of the school-going children in its schools. It then would have a fair prospect of making up the difference and could start ahead with compulsion. That seems to me to be a precaution which was valuable and although it has been dropped in this bill brought forward by the Honourable Mr. PATEL, I am not quite sure that some precaution of that sort, in order to give a practical point from which to start, might not with advantage be inserted. Because it is not only a question of costs, of building and staff, but also, I may remark incidentally, of children, and although a municipality may have made all the other provisions that are requisite, if it has not got the children and if it seems to me unlikely that it will get them without extraordinary pressure, it is a great question whether the application of compulsion would be desirable in a municipality in those conditions.

A point which of course will affect the question of compulsion very largely when we come to practice is the position of the parents. I think the whole discussion has, if I may venture to say so, rather left the unfortunate parent out of account. There is a clause in the bill (rather a hard clause) which threatens the employers of child labour with all sorts of pains and penalties if they employ children who are to be at school. One point that I should like to find out is whether employers of labour are to include parents. We know that in every country many such poorer classes of parents have to employ their children in certain forms of occupation and to a large extent the prosperity and in fact the absolute subsistence of the family may depend on the labours of the children. I do not say it is a good thing, I do not uphold such a state of things for a moment, but at the same time it is a fact which we have got to face, and I do not think that it is possible to gloss it over and to assume that no difficulties will be met with from the opposition which may be expected from parents.

In the same way I am inclined to agree with the representations made by Mahomedan members, so strongly supported by the Honourable Mr. LAWRENCE, in regard to the position of the Mahomedan community. Their circumstances are very special and the application of compulsion to Mahomedan families involves possibly operations which would be extremely repugnant to the people concerned. It will be one of the most important and possibly one of the most difficult questions which the select committee will have to face, namely, to render any compulsion which may be adopted acceptable to the poorer Mahomedan community

The clause in regard to free education strikes me as being inferior to the proposal made by the Honourable Mr. GOKHALE. Mr. GOKHALE'S proposal was at any rate practical and I am afraid I cannot say the same about the present clause. What will happen under this clause is, to use well known phraseology, that each man will take his pen and sit down quickly and write down ham gharib admi hai (I am a poor man), and the school-master will not be inclined to push the matter further. In fact he will not have the power to push it further.

As regard the last clause about which a great deal has been said, I imagine that, as my honourable friends, Mr. PARANJPYE and Mr. PAREKH, have indicated there is nothing in the bill or in the clause to derogate from Government's power of giving grants to municipalities under such conditions as have already proved suitable or may prove so in the future. Where the conditions are suitable and where Government is able to support an extension of education, we can assume that in future as in the past Government, to the best of its ability, will be willing to grant whatever actual funds can be given and are required.

I should like to say before I sit down that though I have perhaps criticised this bill, or at any rate, pointed out certain defects in this bill, I do not wish either for myself or for my department, if and when the bill comes into operation, to make difficulties in the way of its working. I am sure all of us recognize the excellent intentions of the honourable mover in regard to this bill and we are at one with him in our wish to promote primary education amongst the younger children of the Presidency and I myself and my staff and the whole department will do our best to make the bill a great success. (Hear, hear.)

PRIMARY EDUCATION BILL.

[Mr. Munmohundas Ramji; Mr. Lalubhai Samaldas Mehta; Sir Mahadev Bhaskar Chaubal.] [26TH JULY 1917.]

The Honourable Mr. MUNMOHUNDASS RAMJI :—Your Excellency,—I also rise to support the bill and in doing so I have to make one or two points clear, arising out of the bill. Some of my honourable colleagues said that this bill was fraught with some danger; I say that there is no danger at all, because a municipality will have to apply for sanction to Government for being allowed to operate under this bill which application will have to be duly notified. People will have every opportunity then to protest against the proposed action of the municipality, because they will have to find the money for the introduction of this measure from their own area, and will have ample time to consider what their municipality is going to do. Then, Government before granting their sanction will have ample opportunity of gauging the feelings of the people of that area. So far as that apprehension goes, I think, it is groundless. Of course, I quite agree with my honourable friend, Mr. PRATT, that this bill if not supported by Government is going to prove to be a dead letter. It is the Government only who will be able to put the operation of this bill into motion by coming forward and giving sufficient grants to enable the municipalities to introduce compulsory education in their area. If Government see their way to grant funds and help the municipalities, then only the municipalities will be able to cope with this measure and I think as a first measure to introduce compulsion in this country this bill is a good one as it can be introduced by parts or bits into municipalities and then into the local boards and so on. Thereby gradually the whole principle of compulsory education can be introduced. Moreover it will also help Government in granting funds from time to time according to the ways and means at their command. Therefore, I say that the whole success of this bill is in the hands of Government. If this bill becomes law, then it will be only Government who can put it into operation; otherwise it would be a dead letter in the hands of the municipalities.

The Honourable Mr. LALUBHAI SAMALDAS MEHTA :—Your Excellency,—I rise to protest against the remarks made by my honourable friend, Mr. LAWRENCE, to the effect that this bill has been brought forward in a light-hearted manner with a view to getting this bill first placed on the statute book and leaving Government to face all the difficulties. I believe, my lord, that this is not the spirit in which the work of this Council should be carried on. It should be carried on in the spirit in which my honourable friend, the Director of Public Instruction, has just spoken of. I believe with the Honourable the Director of Public Instruction that we should all do our best to help the cause of free and compulsory primary education. I hope that everyone will accord his support to the bill and that we shall not hear any remark of this sort in this Council in future.

The Honourable Sir MAHADEV BHASKAR CHAUBAL :—Your Excellency,—I will not take up the time of the Council by going into any detailed discussion of the bill, because, all the points which have been made by the various speakers have, I have no doubt, been taken a note of by the honourable mover of the bill, and it would be appropriate to leave it to him to reply to them. But there is one point on which I think it is my duty to address the Council as a member of the Government which has permitted this bill to be brought before the Council to be introduced. Several speakers have addressed the Council on the scope and limitations on the usefulness of the bill owing to the existence of clause 18 in the bill. Several honourable members went so far as to throw broad hints to the select committee to recommend the scoring out of that clause. If I had any doubts before about the expediency or necessity of that clause, the speeches to which I have listened have cleared those doubts and convinced me that the introduction of that clause was necessary if for no other purpose at least in order to make people clearly understand the position that Government have taken up as regards this bill. The clause as it stands does not prevent a municipality from asking for financial assistance towards making education compulsory, nor does it prevent Government where they consider it necessary or desirable, from offering such assistance. I have heard it said in this hall that the existence of this clause makes the intoduction of the bill a useless measure, and that no advance in the direction of universal education was possible unless a municipality or a local body was enabled or entitled to claim in some way help from the public revenues of the province. The insertion of the clause was necessary to make it clear to every one that such a claim will not be listened to: and I am inclined to think that with that clause in the bill and the reasons for its insertion it will hardly be within the scope of the select committee to recommend its deletion. Had it not been for the insertion of that clause, this Council may never have seen the bill. If the honourable mover had not accepted the suggestion that he should make it clear by a clause that his bill did not intend to throw any liability on the revenues of the province, the imminence of its effecting such revenues was so great, that the Governor would probably have held that the bill was a measure affecting the public revenues, and that it could not be introduced or that a motion for leave to introduce it could not have been entertained without his previous sanction. It was upon this express understanding that this clause was inserted in the bill, and the necessary stage of leave to introduce was dispensed with in the case of this bill.

The Honourable Mr. PATEL:—Will my honourable friend quote his authority for the statement he makes?

The Honourable Sir MAHADEV BHASKAR CHAUBAL:—My authority for the statement is that the law does not permit it.

The Honourable Mr. PATEL:—You say that on the express understanding that the clause was to be inserted in the bill, the bill was permitted to be introduced. Will you kindly give your authority for saying so?

The Honourable Sir MAHADEV BHASKAR CHAUBAL:—Well, it was perhaps strong to put it as an express understanding. To put it accurately the honourable mover of the bill was given to understand that if he made it clear in his bill that the bill threw no sort of liability on provincial revenues, then Government would accept the principle of the bill and permit it to be moved. The honourable member accepted this and we need not pause to consider how far it falls short of an express understanding. I may be permitted to explain the position still more clearly by referring to the correspondence. When his bill was submitted to the Government of India, the Government of India stated:—"The Government of India agree with the Governor in Council that there is no objection to the principle underlying the bill, but they desire that the following provisions should be inserted in it before it is introduced. As pointed out in paragraph 2 of your letter, it will be necessary to add an express provision that nothing in the bill will affect the public revenues of the Bombay Presidency or impose any charge on these revenues, and it should be stated that the schools in respect of which the bill will apply should be subject to inspection by the education department, and that the staff, buildings and appliances should be such as that department may from time to time consider necessary and sufficient." I believe—I am speaking open to correction—that a copy of this letter was sent to the honourable mover and he was asked whether he would allow the officers of Government to redraft his bill; otherwise it would take longer.

The Honourable Mr. VITHALBHAI JHAVERBHAI PATEL:—May I explain that the drafting is mine?

The Honourable Sir MAHADEV BHASKAR CHAUBAL:—In order to avoid delay, a redraft was made and that redraft embodying the suggestions which the Government of India wanted to insist upon was sent to the honourable mover and he was asked whether he accepted the redraft of these provisions. Well, I do not think there is any doubt after that that the honourable mover consented to the introduction of the bill on the condition that he accepted that redraft with the insertion of the clauses which the Government of India insisted upon being put in the bill. If the Council looks at section 80 of the Government of India Act, to which my honourable friend, Mr. KAMAT, drew attention, and to the rules for the conduct of legislative business, as a matter of fact, he will find that this bill has now been published and the publication itself under rule 28 of our business rules is introduction, and therefore directly the bill was published in the Government Gazette, it was introduced. Section 80 says: "It shall not be lawful for any member of any local legislative Council to introduce, without the previous sanction of the Governor, Lieutenant-Governor or Chief Commissioner, any measure affecting the public revenues of the province or imposing any charge on those revenues." It was because the honourable mover accepted the redraft with the insertion of the clauses which the Government of India wanted, that this step of "the previous sanction of the Governor" was not insisted upon. The Governor was not called upon to exercise his right as to whether to grant his sanction or not, because the honourable mover accepted the redraft, making it clear that the object of his bill was not to throw any liability on provincial revenues or public revenues. I might make it absolutely clear to the honourable mover that if he had not accepted the redraft which according to the letter of the Government of India, a copy of which was sent to him, was necessary, I think I am perfectly correct in stating that the bill would not have been introduced, as it was introduced, by the publication of it in the Government Gazette.

The Honourable Mr. PATEL:—Do you make that statement on behalf of Government? May I know whether the honourable member speaks for His Excellency or the Government?

The Honourable Sir MAHADEV BHASKAR CHAUBAL:—Well, I do not think it makes much difference on whose behalf I am speaking. I do not purport to speak on behalf of His Excellency, but I do purport to speak on behalf of the Government, that under the rules and under the provisions of the Government of India Act, by which we are bound the Governor would not have permitted this bill to be published unless the honourable mover had accepted the redraft with the clause inserted which runs as clause 18 in this bill. Therefore let it be absolutely clear to all honourable members of this Council that it will not be within the province of the select committee to suggest, after having in a way got the introduction of the bill by an assurance that the bill does not propose to impose a charge on the revenues of the province, after having secured that object, which would not have been secured unless the honourable mover had allowed that clause to be inserted in the bill, it will not be open to the select committee to say, "Yes, we have got it introduced, and the introduction being secured we can ignore the provisions of section 80, clause 2."

The Honourable Mr. PATEL:—May I know under what rules do you limit the functions of the select committee to a particular course?

The Honourable Sir MAHADEV BHASKAR CHAUBAL:—Well, it is perfectly open to the select committee to make any proposal they like, but when the report comes before this body it will be for this Council to consider whether its recommendations are within its powers, or are ultra vires. I would submit with all deference that this Council will undoubtedly pronounce an introduction of any measure in direct conflict with the provisions of the act of Parliament to be ultra vires, and if it did not and allowed the measure to be passed it would probably only attract the veto of His Excellency the Governor or of the Viceroy. So far on the point of how this clause 18 came to be inserted.

Now as regards the scope and effect of that clause, I have not the slightest hesitation in repeating what I have observed at the begnining that there is nothing in section 18 which debars the Government from going to the assistance of a municipality. What it does say in effect is that it does not permit a municipality to claim as a matter of right anything from Government. Supposing this bill was allowed without that clause, every municipality might feel itself justified in coming to Government and saying "Government must give us a subvention from the public revenues without which we cannot carry out the object of this bill." Well, I do not consider that to be the main object of the honourable mover of this bill. The congratulations which have been showered upon him, to which I might be permitted to add my quota, are due and deserved in my personal opinion, from the point of view from which I look at it, viz., that the Honourable Mr. PATEL wishes every municipality to realise and appreciate what it has not realised and appreciated hitherto that it is the duty of the municipalities to try and help themselves in a way in which they have not done so hitherto, for, I would ask honourable members to consider, what is it that has prevented municipalities from extending primary education in any way they liked hitherto? Look at the duties which are cast upon the municipalities by the present act. If you look at section 54, you will see that clause (p) says that it shall be the duty, one of the imperative duties, of every municipality to make reasonable provision for establishing and maintaining primary schools. Another thing is, if you look at section 56, clause (c), this is one of the discretionary powers given to the municipalities, it says "furthering educational objects other than those set forth in sub-clause (p) of section 54." Well, here are at present powers which municipalities possess. Why have they not been able to carry out those powers in the way in which they would like to do? Because, as everybody here has admitted, of want of means. So far as making proper provision for buildings for primary schools is concerned, at every place that you go to, you see that the municipality asks Government to grant funds for the purpose when it is really the duty of the municipality under the act to make that provision. For everything connected with primary education there are so many wants and their revenues are so limited that they do not find any other way out of the difficulty except to ask Government to come to their aid. Now the real principle of the bill in my opinion is this, that the bill professes not in terms to throw any liability upon the revenues of the province, but rather that every municipality should realise that principally and mainly the duty of spreading education and cutting down illiteracy in municipal areas should be thrown, so far as possible and so far as the individual circumstances of each municipality will permit, on the municipality itself. That I take to be the real object of the honourable mover's bill and he tries to attain that object by empowering municipalities to levy a special education cess.

Now there is one point about this cess which I would like to mention for the consideration of the honourable mover of the bill. Up to this time I think every member was under the impression—at least I was under that impression—that the bill provides for municipalities getting the means for making primary education compulsory within their areas by the imposing of a fresh and new cess, but unfortunately the wording is very vague so far as the bill itself goes. I do not think that the real object is gained if in the select committee he clause is allowed to stand in the way that the honourable mover has allowed it to stand. In one sense he makes the position of a municipality perhaps worse than it is at present. As I understand it, under clauses (1) and (2) of section 14 of his bill he wants the municipality to have an education cess, but that education cess is to be one of the taxes mentioned in section 59. Am I right there?

The Honourable Mr. PATEL :—Yes.

The Honourable Sir MAHADEV BHASKAR CHAUBAL :—Then the position to which we are reduced is this. Section 59 of the Act mentions certain taxes which a municipality can impose in a certain way, and you have got there about ten or eleven sources of income mentioned, to be raised by the imposition of certain taxes. Well, the municipality says, as every municipality to my knowledge does, that for a number of reforms and improvements in the way of sanitation and other things they have got no sources of revenue left, that they have tapped all the possible sources of income, so far as the municipality goes. I take it that, so far as they possibly could, they have tapped all these eleven sources of revenue. Therefore to my mind this bill does not give to the municipality anything substantial if they in the end are only going to be empowered, for the purpose of the spread of education, to levy only any of the taxes mentioned in section 59 of the act. I do not think it becomes an additional source of revenue at all. You say a municipality is empowered to levy an education cess and in the wording of the section you limit the municipality only to one of the sources mentioned in section 59. Therefore that will never do, because as a matter of fact we know that most of the municipalities have used up all these sources. The municipalities cannot make anything more from these taxes which are mentioned here and therefore they must have the power to impose upon the people in the area an additional cess. Whatever standard they choose to adopt is quite a different thing, but it must be an additional cess entirely devoted to the purpose of education, the amount of which is not to be diverted for any other purpose, however useful or whatever its public utility may be. Therefore I think one of the points which will have to be settled by the select committee is as to whether the cess called the "education cess" is going to be in the real sense of the word an education cess, in the sense that the people are prepared to tax themselves more in order that education should be compulsory and free within their area. I use the word "free" without the sanction for it in the bill, but I suppose the honourable mover has admitted yesterday that practically it is also a motion for free education in addition to its being compulsory. Well, therefore, honourable members and particularly representatives of municipalities ought to bear in mind—I perfectly sympathise with the observations that fell from some honourable members—that it will be impossible for municipalities to work out this bill if you leave it to them to raise funds for educational purposes under the powers given by this bill, namely, trying to raise a fund for educational purposes from the sources which are mentioned in section 59 of the act. But if the motion or object of the bill is that people are more and more alive to the necessity of going in for compulsory education, that the municipalities and inhabitants of municipal areas are becoming more alive to and enthusiastic about compulsory education and in that sense are prepared to do their best in a greater degree than hitherto, then only the working of this bill will be possible.

I am not prepared to retract in any way from the principles which I mentioned when I opposed the honourable mover's resolution last December on primary education being made free and compulsory in municipal areas. I think those objections still hold good, not only on the ground of the policy hitherto enjoined by the Government of India, but also on the ground of the propriety of the application of provincial revenues to education within municipal areas. As a matter of fact it is this call for extended education and reducing illiteracy in rural areas that is far more important than education in municipal areas from the point of view of Government. I then pointed out that when Government considered the question in 1912, it found that in municipal areas under the voluntary system of education within ten years the school-going percentage had been raised from 16 to 34. One of the objections which were mentioned by this Government to the Government of India was this, that the Honourable Mr. GOKHALE'S bill proposed to make education compulsory wherever there was a 33 per cent. of school-going population and that that would mean that education was to be made compulsory and free in municipal areas only. In these areas, as a matter of fact, without compulsion, under the voluntary system, within the last ten years before 1912, we had been able to raise the school-going percentage from 16 to 34 and it was to Government a question of vital importance not to divert revenue—principally the local fund cess, which is a cess largely falling upon rural areas—from rural to municipal areas. It was very questionable how far Government would be justified in diverting a large slice out of this revenue, which comes mainly from rural areas, for the purpose of education within municipal areas. That was the point which I think I had mentioned at the time of opposing the resolution last year, and I am not prepared to resile in the slightest degree from the ground which I took up then. If any members suppose that Government should freely assist the municipal areas, not minding the calls upon their finances from rural areas, I think they can be said to be labouring under a delusion. It is education in rural areas which requires to be attended to far more strenuously and closely than education in municipal areas. Therefore it was that we were particular in stating that, under the circumstances as they are at present, Government would not be prepared to take upon itself the whole burden if education were made free and compulsory within municipal areas. This only emphasises the point I have previously made, viz., that municipalities should realise the difficulty in the way of Government in diverting to any large extent revenue mainly derived from rural areas for the education of children in municipal areas, and appreciating this, to realise that the burden of educating their children should appropriately and mainly fall upon the inhabitants of municipal areas. Last December the Rander municipality instance was cited in this Council—that it wanted to make education free and compulsory and Government did not permit it. In so far as this permission was not given Government have modified their policy, and under this new policy if any municipality comes forward and thinks that it has got the means of making primary education within its area free and compulsory, Government will not only not come in its way but I go further on behalf of Government and state for the satisfaction of those in whom clause 18 has raised serious apprehensions that Government will cordially welcome its efforts, and if Government sees that a municipality has striven and tried its best to add to its resources, to put on an education cess and to set it apart for educational purposes and that notwithstanding its best efforts it has not been able to get up the requisite amount to effectively start a scheme for free and compulsory education within its area, Government will only be too pleased to find itself in a position to assist such a municipality financially from the public revenues. Nobody in this Council doubts the earnest desire and endeavour of Government to promote elementary education, and on its behalf I affirm that if Government are satisfied that honest efforts have been made by a municipality to increase its resources by overhauling its taxation and putting on an education cess and that the people in the municipal area are really keen and striving hard in the matter, Government will do their best to support financially such municipality. That is really the point which I wish to make clear about clause 18.

And having done that I do not think I need detain the Council over minor points which I have no doubt will be fully considered and thrashed by the select committee: among some of these would be—(a) the question whether the provision in clause 14 is ample and sufficient to secure the purpose for which it is meant.

(b) whether the period of age for compulsory education should be as proposed between 6 and 10 or higher. In Baroda, e.g., I am told they started with 6 to 10, but it has been considered necessary to increase the age limit to 11 or 12.

(c) the sufficiency or otherwise of the reasonable excuse provided for by clause 9, sub-clause (a), e.g., may be an excuse for occasional absence—but it is to my mind doubtful how far that is or should be any reasonable excuse for permanent exemption. Sub-clause (b) would also appear to be objectionable on the ground of vagueness. Would it be enough for a parent of a child to say that he or she is teaching the child at home?

(d) the question whether it is worth while troubling a magistrate with these petty cases of non-attendance or whether it would not be desirable to empower the president or vice-president or one or more members of the school committee to take cognisance of these cases.

(e) the question whether the proceeds of the fines should not be credited to the municipalities.

These are all matters of detail which I have no doubt will be considered in the select committee.

PRIMARY EDUCATION BILL.

The Honourable Mr. VITHALBHAI JHAVERBHAI PATEL:—Your Excellency,—I am very much thankful to your Excellency's Government and the members of this Council for the reception that they have been pleased to extend to my bill. I have no reason whatever to be dissatisfied, because I never thought when I gave notice of this bill that it would escape all criticism. I know instances where bills drafted by experts and introduced in this Council were subjected to most severe criticisms, and it would be simply absurd on my part to expect that the defects in the drafting of the proposed measure would escape the attention of the members of this Council. What we are concerned with, however, at this stage, your Excellency, is the principle of the bill. At the first reading of the bill, if the honourable members agree to the main principle, then the bill goes to the select committee and the various criticisms as to details and draft that are offered by the members of the Council are considered in that committee. I am very glad, extremely glad indeed, that almost unanimously and with one voice the principle of compulsion underlying this bill has been accepted by this Council. I am conscious of the fact that there was a discordant voice here and there, but after all one has got to remember this fact, that those who raised that voice had a very very difficult position to meet. They knew very well that your Excellency's Government and the Government of India had accepted the principle of the introduction of compulsory education in the system of our elementary education in spite of their strong opinions to the contrary. That being so, they could not oppose openly the principle to which the Government, whom they are serving, had given its assent. However, if I were in their position I would certainly be true to my conviction and say openly, instead of showing all sorts of misgivings, e.g., that no municipality would take advantage of the bill, that there would be financial embarrassment, and the rest of it, "I oppose the principle of the bill." What is the use of beating about the bush and saying "The thing is impracticable, though we accept the principle"?

In all fairness, I am bound to say that I cannot accept the compliments and congratulations for managing and handling this all important question of compulsory education so well and so soon. Very soon after I moved my resolution at the last December meeting I drafted this bill and went to His Excellency personally. I had an interview with him and showed the draft bill to him. He then encouraged me and it was because of that encouragement and his sympathy that the bill sees the light of the day. (Hear, hear.) I with the permission of the honourable members, therefore, transfer all those congratulations to the person who deserves them most. (Hear, hear.)

Your Excellency, I should like to make one or two points perfectly clear in regard to the speech made by my honourable friend, Sir MAHADEV CHAUBAL. He says on behalf of Government that it is not open to the select committee to modify or delete clause 18 of the bill. In this connection—your Excellency will please excuse me for repetition—I should like to bring to the notice of this Council once again that the Honourable Mr. GOKHALE'S bill, which did not contain the saving clause and which under section 66 of the Government of India Act would require a saving clause if the interpretation now proposed to be put by your Excellency's Government on that Act were correct, was allowed to be introduced, passed through the stage of the first reading and was then referred to the select committee without any such saving clause. No objection was taken by the Government of India on the ground that a saving clause of the kind was necessary. Not a suggestion of the kind was made on behalf of Government during the debate that took place on Mr. GOKHALE'S motion for leave to introduce that bill or for its first reading. I may tell for your Excellency's information and for the information of this Council that this clause 18 is not of my initiative. My honourable friend, Mr. BELVI, wanted to know who first took objection to the absence of the saving clause. I may tell him for his information and for the information of this Council that it was the legal department of this Government that wrote to me that a saving clause of the kind was necessary. Subsequently the bill was reported to the Government of India who, in communicating its approval to the principle underlying the bill through its legislative department, observed that they agreed with the view of the legal department of the Government of Bombay on the question of the necessity of a saving clause. Be that as it may, the question for the Council to decide is "whether under section 80 (2) this bill would be bad without clause 18 in it". The section provides that it shall not be lawful for a member of the Legislative Council to introduce into any Legislative Council any bill which affects the revenues of the Presidency or imposes any charge on those revenues. If my bill, minus clause 18, does not in any way purport to affect the revenues of the Presidency, I submit the clause is superfluous. Is there anything anywhere in any of the clauses of the bill which by any stretch of imagination could be construed to mean that the bill purports to affect the provincial revenues or to impose any charge on them? Absolutely nothing. I admit that I allowed the insertion of that clause in order that there would be no difficulty in the way of this bill being introduced and discussed in this Council. I quite agree that I was not sure that your Excellency's Government would have dispensed with the leave stage if I had not consented to the insertion of that clause. At the same time I am bound to say in fairness to myself that your Excellency never put to me the question " Mr. Patel, unless you insert this clause I cannot dispense with the leave stage." I was also never told that your Excellency dispensed with the leave stage because I allowed the insertion of that clause. These matters, however, are immaterial. As I have already observed, the sole question is whether the clause is legally necessary. This is a question of law. The Honourable Sir MAHADEV CHAUBAL may say anything, I may say anything, but the law is there, section 80, sub-clause (2), of the Government of India Act. It is a question of its interpretation and I do not see how this Government can limit the functions of the select committee. It is for the select committee to say whether under the law as it stands the clause is legally necessary or not. If the select committee by a majority comes to the conclusion that it is not legally necessary, then, with due deference to the Hon. Sir MAHADEV CHAUBAL'S views, it is quite open to the select committee to delete the clause or modify it in such a manner as the select committee might deem fit.

My honourable friend, Sir MAHADEV CHAUBAL, tells us that the mofussil municipalities do not spend as much towards primary education as they ought to. Is that really so? Let me here say for the information of this Council that Government have by several press notes accepted the principle that they would contribute one-half towards the expenditure of primary education. Now, I ask, have they done so? In 1912 when Government found that municipal grants were dwindling down to one-third and one-fourth, they revised them and said that they would in future pay half the expenditure incurred by the municipalities in 1911. Accordingly in 1912 grants were given up to 50 per cent. of the expenditure of 1911. After that there has been no revision whatever and the state of things has come to this pass that although municipalities have gone on increasing their expenditure on primary education so much that in some cases Government contribution has gone down as low as nearly one-third instead of one-half, Government have not moved in the direction of revising their contribution. No doubt, as the Honourable Sir MAHADEV CHAUBAL says, there is a section in the Municipal Act under which a municipality is bound to provide for primary education. That is all true. But as in all countries, in this country also, it should be the duty of the State to contribute mostly towards the cost of the diffusion of primary education. I submit, in this country, municipalities have done more than they should or could in this respect, but Government have not done their part. I do not wish to go into the question at any length at this stage because I have a resolution on the subject which this Council, if not to-day, will, to-morrow, discuss, but the statement of the Honourable Sir MAHADEV CHAUBAL that the municipalities have not been doing their part in the matter of expenditure on primary education is one which I take strong exception to. I again repeat that the municipalities have been doing more than they should or could.

The Honourable Sir MAHADEV CHAUBAL takes somewhat strong objection to the wording of the clause regarding education cess. He points out that such cess should have nothing to do with and should be quite apart and different from any of the items of taxes which municipalities are empowered to impose under section 59 of the District Municipal Act. May I for the information of my honourable friend tell him that the original draft bill which I sent to Government did not contain the words "any of the taxes mentioned in section 59 of the Act"? I then held the same view as my honourable friend now holds. But as my honourable friend told the Council, the legal department have got a lot to do with our private bills, and the credit or discredit of the alteration is due to that department. I shall read the clause as it stood in the bill drafted by me :—

"After the issue of notification the municipality may levy an education cess the proceeds of which shall be devoted to the maintenance and establishment of elementary schools."

Now the clause as altered reads thus : "The Municipality may select as an educational cess any tax which may be imposed under section 59 of the principal Act."

That is the change which the legal department of the Bombay Government has made in my original draft. However, when I received that altered draft, I read section 59 and finding that the last clause of the section in fact meets every requirement of the case, I did not take any objection to the alteration. That clause says that the municipality is empowered to impose any other tax to the nature and object of which the approval of the Governor in Council shall have been obtained prior to the selection contemplated in sub-clause (i) of clause (a) of section 60. Under the circumstances I thought that the clause as altered by the legal department of your Excellency's Government would do in view of the very wide terms of the last clause of section 59. However, this is a matter which, as my honourable friend Sir MAHADEV CHAUBAL said, will be considered very carefully in the select committee.

Let us come now back for a moment to clause 18 of the bill. The Honourable Sir MAHADEV CHAUBAL says that the said clause merely means that municipalities shall not be entitled to claim from Government contribution towards the cost of primary education as a matter of right. If the clause is intended to secure that object, I respectfully submit that it is superfluous. Is there any law or executive order in force at the present moment which entitles any municipality to claim any contribution from Government as a matter of right? The contribution which Government now makes towards the cost of primary education is by way of grace only. The position will always remain the same as long as such contribution is not fixed by law. I am strongly of opinion that there should be a legal guarantee binding Government to bear a certain definite proportion of the total expenditure by the local bodies on primary education. Government, no doubt, does now and will in future make such contribution as they think proper. The insertion of this clause, however, has created serious apprehensions in the minds of the several honourable members as to the future intentions of Government in this matter. I trust, therefore, that Government will make a clear declaration of their future intentions, or better still, the select committee will remove these apprehensions by deleting the clause altogether.

I do not wish at this stage to go into the question of the working of the system of compulsory education in Baroda; but when my honourable friend, Sir MAHADEV CHAUBAL, has made certain disparaging statements in regard to it, I am bound to reply. Let me tell this Council that as a result of the introduction of compulsion in Baroda, as many as 93 per cent.—

PRIMARY EDUCATION BILL.

[26TH JULY 1917.] [Sir Mahadev Chaubal; The President; Mr. Vithalbhai Jhaverbhai Patel; Mr. Covernton.]

The Honourable Mr. PARANJPYE :—I rise to a point of order, your Excellency, whether it is permissible to refer to native states in this Council?

His Excellency the PRESIDENT :—Order, order. I think my honourable friend Mr. PARANJPYE is perfectly correct. I should have called my honourable colleague to order when he referred to a native state.

The Honourable Mr. PATEL :—Let us now examine the financial effect of this bill when it becomes law. There has been, I am sorry to say, a good deal of loose talk on the subject during the debate. I would ask the Council to examine the question in the light of facts and figures which I propose to place before the honourable members. These facts and figures will make it perfectly clear that the apprehensions of my honourable friends are exaggerated, if not unfounded. There are in this Presidency 156 municipal areas. The population in all these municipal towns is roughly speaking 24 lakhs, say 12½ lakhs male population and 11½ lakhs female. Taking primary-school-going population at the conventional figure of 15 per. cent. of total population—and this proportion has been proved to be substantially correct in the latest quinquennial Educational Report of the Government of India—

The Honourable Mr. COVERNTON :—No. It has been discontinued since the directors' conference.

The Honourable Mr. PATEL :—Then may I know the correct figure?

The Honourable Mr. COVERNTON :—No correct figure has been arrived at.

The Honourable Mr. PATEL (continuing) :—Then we might take 15 as the correct figure for the present. We have thus in all municipal towns of our Presidency 1,88,000 boys and 1,72,000 girls of primary-school-going age. We had on 31st March 1916, 1,27,000 boys and 42,000 girls in schools of all types in towns, I mean Government, municipal, aided and unaided but all recognized. Deducting these figures from the first set of figures, we have 61,000 boys and 85,000 girls to be brought to school under compulsion, at any rate under threat of compulsion, for I believe a large majority of these children will require only mild persuasion and no compulsion to be brought to school. Taking the cost of schooling a child at Rs. 10 per annum—the present cost is only Rs. 9-6-0—the additional total cost works out for the boys to Rs. 6,10,000 and for girls to Rs. 8,50,000. Going on the assumption that half the cost of primary education is to be borne by the local body and half by Government, and further that the half share of Government will not be only a theoretical half, dwindling to an actual one-third share, but actual half, the additional cost to Government will be Rs. 3,05,000 for boys and Rs. 4,25,000 for girls. We have only to consider the cost of boys to start with. The cost to the general tax-payer of this Presidency will not exceed Rs. 4,76,000, including the present under-payment to municipalities of a lakh and a quarter and half the loss from fee-receipts, when all the 156 municipalities will have adopted effectively compulsory law. Is this too much for a province the annual budget of which is over 8 crores?

No doubt, there will be some further expenditure on the score of more training colleges. But we have recently got from the Government of India a sum of 2½ lakhs for this and other purposes and I am sure a large part of this sum will be spent for providing additional vernacular training colleges. On the cessation of war, we do hope to get further educational grants from the same source, so that I do not think the Educational Member in charge need have any anxiety on that account. Buildings will come in course of time, we can go on with hired buildings at present, and with advent of better times—better seasons—buildings may be provided for in the course of the next 15 or 20 years. We need not unnecessarily encumber our estimates with cost of buildings, and needlessly frighten ourselves.

PRIMARY EDUCATION BILL.

[Mr. F. G. Covernton; Mr. Vithalbhai Jhaverbhai Patel; the President.] [26TH JULY 1917.]

The Honourable Mr. COVERNTON:—May I ask if the Honourable Mr. PATEL has included in his figures the cost for inspection?

The Honourable Mr. PATEL:—I have taken my figures from the late Mr. SHARP'S report and I understand the cost of inspection which after all must be very small is perhaps included in it.

This is all, your Excellency, that I wanted to say about the financial aspect of the question. With these few words I hope the Council will pass the first reading of the bill.

His Excellency the PRESIDENT:—I do not propose to detain the Council for more than one moment. I think that the honourable member who has introduced this bill may be very well satisfied with the course of the discussion and with the general reception that has been accorded to it. At least he can satisfy himself with the reflection that we have had a plethora of oratory. He has met with some searching criticism, but he may claim some satisfaction on this head too, for I noticed that most of the critics concluded, at all events, with a moderate blessing on his proposals.

I should like to thank my honourable friend very sincerely for his generous appreciation of such efforts as I and my Government have been able to make to push forward the introduction of the measure. He, and I think also others, are rather inclined to suggest that the passing of this bill is going to hand His Excellency the Governor's name down to posterity. Grateful as I am to him for his generous remarks, I cannot possibly assume these borrowed feathers, for I think the credit—and I hope this will be generally agreed to by the members of this Council—for pushing forward this measure is entirely due to the energy and the assiduity of my honourable friend, Mr. PATEL.

I have very little to say with regard to the bill itself, but in passing I must take exception to a certain remark which fell from my honourable friend, Mr. BELVI, and which I thought was extremely unfair to the Bombay Government. I felt thoroughly in agreement with nearly every word that Mr. BELVI spoke during his speech, but he did make this one observation that, with regard to the resolution moved by my honourable friend Mr. PATEL a few months ago, he thought that the attitude of Government was extremely illiberal. I am inclined to think that that was not a fair statement of the facts. He well knew the main reason why the Government of Bombay could not accept that particular resolution, which was that it was against the confirmed policy of the Government of India. But he further went on to say—and this is what I strongly object to—that, notwithstanding that extremely illiberal attitude on the part of Government, my honourable friend Mr. PATEL wore down the Bombay Government. Now let me assure him that, if our attitude had been illiberal and obstructive, not even the keen assiduity of my honourable friend, Mr. PATEL, would have worn down the obstruction of the Government of Bombay.

When this bill is referred to the select committee, I feel sure that those members who will be on that committee will go most carefully into all the various points that have been raised with regard, for instance, to the Mahomedan question and many others which I have in my mind but which I do not think it is necessary to refer to. But I wish to make some reference to the much vexed question of clause 18. There are certain honourable members who seem filled with a fire of determination that, if they are fortunate enough to be on the select committee, they will use their best endeavour to have clause 18 eliminated from the bill. But most Governments, and the Bombay Government certainly, are always anxious as far as possible to guard themselves against possible unforeseen circumstances that may arise, and are bound to take the necessary measures to this end: that is in the main the reason for clause 18. With regard to the general question of finance, to which clause 18 refers, Government feel that we cannot allow ourselves to be tied in any way so that we may have to give preferential treatment to the municipalities over any of the rest of the country. We are not, I quite admit, under the honourable member's bill as it stands at the moment. But we have a certain amount of money each year that is allocated to be spent on education. That amount of money it is the duty of the educational member and the Government as a whole to distribute as fairly as it possibly can be distributed. We want to make quite sure that there will be no possibility of a demand being made on us which may seem to give preferential treatment to the municipalities as against the rest of the country. On the other hand, if any municipalities show enterprise and keenness for compulsory education and wish to tax themselves, and are ready to tax themselves, there is not the least objection to such municipalities coming to Government and asking them to help towards furthering compulsory education. Government will be certain to give the most sympathetic consideration to each application as it comes before them. (Hear, hear.) I have one other remark to make on the general question raised by the bill, and it will be my last word to you to-day on this subject. Government is fully alive, as every Government must be alive, to the extreme importance of primary education to the children of our country. I can assure you, speaking as the head of this Presidency, that nothing has been a severer blow to me than to feel that for nearly four years of my life here money has been curtailed, and many excellent measures have been postponed owing to the war. But I am perfectly certain that after the war is over the question of primary education will have to be seriously and comprehensively met, not only by this Government but by the whole of India. I feel it absolutely necessary that in the near future we should as far as possible educate our young children so as to raise up in our midst an educated and intelligent public opinion, without which the general administration is very severely handicapped.

Bill read a first time. The motion for the first reading of the bill was then put to the vote and carried.

His Excellency the PRESIDENT:—I think perhaps it will be convenient if we now adjourn till a quarter past three.

The Council then adjourned for lunch till a quarter past three.

After Lunch.

The Council reassembled after lunch at 3-15 p. m.

The Honourable Mr. VITHALBHAI JHAVERBHAI PATEL:—Your Excellency,—I now propose that the bill shall be referred to a select committee consisting of the Honourable Sir MAHADEV BHASKAR CHAUBAL, the Honourable Mr. KEATINGE, the Honourable Mr. PRATT, the Honourable Mr. COVERNTON, the Honourable Mr. BELVI, the Honourable Mr. UPASANI, the Honourable Mr. PAREKH, the Honourable Mr. HARCHANDRAI, the Honourable Mr. KAMAT, the Honourable Mr. BHURGRI, the Honourable Mr. PARANJPYE, the Honourable Rao Bahadur SATHE, the Honourable Mr. PATHAN, the Honourable Mr. CHUNILAL V. MEHTA, and myself.

My only excuse for proposing a big committee is that the bill is of such great importance that the committee which has to consider it should be really a representative one. We have a precedent for the adoption of this course. We had 17 members appointed on the select committee to consider the Town Planning Bill. That bill was a very important measure as this bill is, and I ask the Council to consider whether it is not desirable that we should have all the four representatives of the mofussil municipalities, at least two representatives of the Mahomedan community and the two educationists, we have amongst us, I mean the Honourable Mr. PARANJPYE and the Honourable Mr. COVERNTON, on the committee to consider this bill. I have also proposed the names of the Honourable Mr. PRATT, Commissioner, N. D., and the Honourable Mr. KEATINGE, both of whom, I understand, will render useful assistance to the committee.

PRIMARY EDUCATION BILL.

[Mr. Vithalbhai Jhaverbhai Patel; the President; Sir Mahadev Bhaskar Chaubal.] [26TH JULY 1917.]

The next question which the Council has to consider is the question of the appointment of the chairman of the committee.

As the rules stand, there is no provision empowering this Council or the President of this Council to appoint a chairman. All that the rules provide is that the Council shall appoint a select committee. In practice, however, the Council does appoint a chairman, but where it does not, the member in charge of the bill, when the committee meets, takes the chair as a matter of course.

I may here refer to the rules of the Madras Council. In Madras the rule is that the member in charge of the bill shall be invariably the chairman of the select committee, no matter whether he is official or non-official. The Bengal rule provides that the member in charge of the bill shall ordinarily be the chairman of the select committee. For the Imperial Legislative Council the rule is that the law member, and in his absence the member in charge of the bill, shall be the chairman of the select committee.

I do not know whether this Council would be in order in selecting a chairman of this committee in the absence of any rule empowering it to do so. If your Excellency holds that the Council could elect a chairman, I propose that my honourable friend, Sir MAHADEV CHAUBAL, should be elected. My reason is this: Sir MAHADEV CHAUBAL is the Vice-President of our Council and personally I think if the Vice-President of the Council is on the committee he should take the chair. This is the only reason why I propose the name of the Honourable Sir MAHADEV as chairman. In asking the Council to adopt this rather unusual course, I must make it perfectly clear to Government that they shall not cite this as a precedent on future occasions. It should be distinctly understood that a member introducing a bill has a right to be elected chairman of the committee appointed to consider that bill unless he chooses to waive that right as I propose to do in this case.

His Excellency the PRESIDENT:—I hardly think this motion is in order. I should like to put the position before the Council. Honourable members are aware that the whole question with regard to the "member in charge" is going to come up for discussion in a very few moments, but until the question is settled we have absolutely nothing to guide us in the matter. I do not think, on a point of order, I can allow the establishment of a precedent that the chairman of the select committee should be voted on by the Council at this moment, pending the decision that may be arrived at in consultation with regard to these rules. What I would suggest to the Council is that when the select committee meets they should then elect their own chairman, and in the meantime we shall be able to come to a decision as to our procedure in the future.

The Honourable Mr. VITHALBHAI JHAVERBHAI PATEL:—Your Excellency,—I am perfectly willing to abide by the ruling. But the fact is that this is not a precedent. It is not a question of creating a new precedent. This Legislative Council has been exercising the right of electing the chairman of a select committee. My friend, Sir IBRAHIM RAHIMTULLA, was elected by the Council as chairman of the select committee on the Registration of Charities Bill.

The Honourable Sir MAHADEV BHASKAR CHAUBAL:—Was he elected by the Council?

The Honourable Mr. PATEL:—Yes.

The Honourable Sir MAHADEV CHAUBAL:—My impression is that a select committee was proposed and as he was the person who moved the bill, it was naturally assumed that he would act as the chairman. But subsequently, I think, Sir RICHARD LAMB took charge of the chairmanship of the select committee on that bill. I do not think, if the original appointment was by the Council, if Sir IBRAHIM was appointed by the Council, then unless the Council displaced him and put in Sir RICHARD LAMB, how could Sir RICHARD LAMB take Sir IBRAHIM'S place?

PRIMARY EDUCATION BILL: MEDICAL BILL: RULES FOR THE CONDUCT OF BUSINESS.

[26TH JULY 1917.] [Sir Mahadev Bhaskar Chaubal; Mr. Vithalbhai Jhaverbhai Patel; the President; Mr. Raghunath Purshottam Paranjpye.]

The Honourable Mr. PATEL:—I have read the proceedings of 1911 and I am absolutely certain that Sir IBRAHIM was proposed as chairman of the select committee on the Registration of Charities Bill and he was appointed chairman, and I do not know how he was displaced.

His Excellency the PRESIDENT:—I think the honourable member will agree that there is nothing in the rules that lays it down. Under these circumstances I shall be glad if the Council will accept my view, that it would be better on this occasion that when the select committee meets that they should select their own chairman, pending the further discussion of these rules.

Bill referred to a Select Committee.

There will be of course some difficulty with regard to the first meeting of the select committee. So I would suggest that Government should call together the first meeting.

The Honourable Mr. PARANJPYE:—A time limit has to be fixed.

The Honourable Mr. PATEL:—I suggest the 15th October.

His Excellency the PRESIDENT:—It appears the general opinion is in favour of the 15th November.

It was decided that the report of the select committee should be submitted by the 15th November.

His Excellency the PRESIDENT:—A bill further to amend the Bombay Medical Act, 1912. Motion for leave to introduce the bill. The Honourable Mr. PATEL.

The Honourable Mr. VITHALBHAI JHAVERBHAI PATEL:—Your Excellency,—I should like to inquire whether your Excellency's Government is going to oppose the motion for leave to introduce the bill.

Sub-rule (3) of rule 28 of the Rules for the conduct of Council business says: "In speaking to the motion the member introducing the bill may state concisely the scope of the bill and the reasons in support of it, but unless the motion is opposed, such explanation may be deferred to the first reading." I should therefore like to know whether your Excellency's Government is going to oppose the motion.

His Excellency the PRESIDENT:—I may tell the honourable member that Government is not going to oppose the motion for leave to introduce this bill.

The Honourable Mr. PATEL:—Then I formally propose the motion.

The motion was then put to the vote and carried.

His Excellency the PRESIDENT:—Rules for the conduct of business at meetings of the Legislative Council of the Governor of Bombay. The Honourable Sir MAHADEV CHAUBAL.

The Honourable Sir MAHADEV BHASKAR CHAUBAL:—Your Excellency,—As regards this item of business it has probably been noticed that there are certain amendments which stand in my name and others which stand in the name of my honourable friend, Mr. PATEL. In several places these amendments conflict with each other and I took the sense of my honourable friend, Mr. PATEL, and he is quite agreeable to the motion that I am making, that these amendments or certain of these amendments excepting the last one to Rule 42, about which I shall make separate mention, be referred to a small committee who should sit and bring definite proposals as regards the amendments before the Council and then they should be discussed fully here. Instead of each conflicting amendment being taken it would perhaps be more convenient if a small committee sat and discussed these different amendments and placed a definite set of amendments for consideration before the Council. The Council could then discuss them and come to any conclusions they consider best about them, instead of discussing these conflicting motions. There will be only one set to discuss and I think that that will probably be the better course to adopt and will result in some saving of time. My proposal will apply to all the amendments of which notice has been given and which are on the agenda papers except, as I have said, the amendment to Rule 42, and as regards that, I have to request your Excellency to consider the objection which I take to the notice of that amendment. I submit that the said notice of amendment to that rule, in the way it is suggested, is ultra vires. The amendment proposed reads thus:—

"The following sub-rule shall be added:—(7) To maintain a register of all questions and resolutions disallowed and to deposit a copy of it in the reading room for the use of the honourable members of the Legislative Council."

Now honourable members will please note that we have separate sets of rules relating to each class of business before the Council. First we have a set of rules that relate to the conduct of legislative business. Then we have another and separate set of rules, for the discussion of the annual financial statement. We have then a third set relating to resolutions on matters of general public interest; and lastly, we have a fourth set of rules governing interpellations. This amendment, of which the Honourable Mr. PATEL has given notice, obviously relates to resolutions and questions, so that the proper place for this amendment would be in the set of rules relating to those two classes, viz., resolutions and questions. It is, I submit, entirely out of place as an amendment of the Rules relating to the conduct of legislative business. Now it will be seen that the first set of rules about the conduct of legislative business is framed under section 83, clause (1). Section 83, clause (1), says:—

"The Local Government of any Province for which a local Legislative Council is hereafter constituted under this Act shall, before the first meeting of that Council, and with the sanction of the Governor-General in Council, make rules for the conduct of legislative business in that Council (including rules for prescribing the mode of promulgation and authentication of laws passed by that Council)."

Then clause (2) provides that alterations in these may be undertaken or may be suggested by the local legislature, that is to say, this Council has a perfect right to move for any alterations of the rules appearing in Part I and relating to the conduct of legislative business. But as regards the other three, the financial statement, resolutions and questions, the rules as to these are framed under section 80, clause (3), which runs in this way:—

"Notwithstanding anything in the foregoing provisions of this section, the local Government may, with the sanction of the Governor-General in Council, make rules authorising, at any meeting of the local Legislative Council, the discussion of the annual financial statement of the local Government (that is, the second set of rules) and of any matter of general public interest (that is, the third set of rules relating to resolutions) and the asking of questions (the fourth set of rules)."

Then you will see after 2 lines:—

"Rules made under this sub-section for any Council may provide for the appointment of a member of the Council to preside at any such discussion in the place of the Governor, Lieutenant-Governor or Chief Commissioner, as the case may be, and of the Vice-President, and shall be laid before both houses of Parliament as soon as may be after they are made, and shall not be subject to repeal or alteration by the Governor General in Legislative Council or the local legislature".

So that these rules as regards resolutions and questions are rules which are framed under section 80, clause (3). They have been laid before both houses of Parliament and the local legislature has got no power whatever to alter those. The Governor-General's Legislative Council has no power and the local legislature has no power. Therefore, my learned friend's amendment as regards resolutions and questions cannot be undertaken by the local legislature. If there is any change which is sought to be introduced in the resolution or question rules, that alteration it is not in the power of the local legislature to undertake. I do not know if this difficulty had occurred to my honourable friend. It probably had, otherwise he would never have moved an amendment which obviously relates to resolutions and questions by an alteration of the rules in the 1st set of rules. There is no doubt that it is open to this Council or any honourable member to suggest any alterations they consider proper to rule 42 in the 1st set, but I think the present amendment is out of order because it relates to resolutions and questions which ought not to have any place in part I, i.e., in the rules for the conduct of legislative business, and, as alterations in the rules relating to resolutions and questions cannot be undertaken by this legislature. I submit that this amendment as proposed is irregular and should not be allowed.

The Honourable Mr. HARCHANDRAI VISHINDAS:—With your Excellency's permission I may point out to the Honourable Sir MAHADEV CHAUBAL that his interpretation is subject to criticism. For instance, he says that the amendment that is sought to be proposed by the Honourable Mr. PATEL does not come under rule 42 of the rules for the conduct of legislative business but that it comes under section 80, clause (3), of the Government of India Act, and therefore, it is necessary for it to go through the two houses of Parliament and the reason for that is that this amendment relates to resolutions and questions. I submit that that argument is not sound. If that interpretation were correct then there are many matters relating to resolutions and questions which would also not be permissible under rule 42 but as a matter of fact they are. Rule 42 says:— "To take charge of the records of the council". Now these records of the council do include resolutions as well as questions. The other duties of the Secretary to the Legislative Council are:—

(2) "To keep the Journals of the Council and of the select committee."

Now these Journals do include resolutions and questions.

(3) "To keep a minute book, in which he shall enter all the proceedings of the Council, and of the select committee, in the order in which they occur and the names of the members present";

These "proceedings" include resolutions and questions. No. 4 of course relates to printing, and No. 6 says.

"To write all letters ordered by the Council or by any committee".

These "letters" may also relate to resolutions and questions. Then the amendment or addition that is sought to be inserted by my honourable friend Mr. PATEL reads:—

"(7) To maintain a register of all questions and resolutions disallowed and to deposit a copy of it in the reading room for the use of the honourable members of the Legislative Council".

His Excellency the PRESIDENT:—Will the honourable member read question rule 16 and resolution rule 8, the second part. I am only asking the honourable member to do so as this amendment is in direct contradiction of rules 16 and 8 of the resolution and question rules respectively.

RULES FOR THE CONDUCT OF BUSINESS.

[Mr. Harchandrai Vishindas; Mr. Raghunath Purushottam Paranjpye; Mr. Balkrishna Sitaram Kamat; Mr. Dattatraya Venkatesh Belvi; the President; Mr. Siddahnath Dhonddev Garud; Sir Mahadev Bhaskar Chaubal.] [26TH JULY 1917.]

The Honourable Mr. HARCHANDRAI :—That is quite different to what the Honourable Sir MAHADEV CHAUBAL says, your Excellency. He is referring to some other thing; that, of course, is a kind of answer.

The Honourable Mr. PARANJPYE :—Would not "Records" also include correspondence of the Council.

His Excellency the PRESIDENT :—But I would draw the honourable member's attention to the rules which refer specifically to questions and resolutions.

The Honourable Mr. KAMAT :—Might I ask just another point. The Honourable Sir MAHADEV CHAUBAL is going to appoint a committee to consider the rules.

His Excellency the PRESIDENT :—Order, order. I must ask the honourable member to let me have his opinion on this particular matter and not on the committee.

The Honourable Mr. KAMAT :—My question is whether it refers only to these 4 or 5 amendments or are they going to refer to them all the 42 rules?

The Honourable Mr. DATTATRAYA VENKATESH BELVI :—My lord, one word as to the interpretation that is to be put on rule 16 of the question rules at page 228. I respectfully submit that the interpretation which your Excellency puts upon it is not sound, because the rule says all questions that are allowed shall be entered in the proceedings of the Council, and not disallowed questions. What my honourable friend, Mr. PATEL, asks is not to enter the questions and resolutions disallowed in the proceedings of the Council, but he says that a separate register shall be kept for the information of honourable members, so that a question or a resolution that is disallowed on a previous occasion may not be repeated.

His Excellency the PRESIDENT :—The amendment is specifically with regard to resolutions and questions and my honourable friend will admit that under the Government of India Act, 1915, it is perfectly clear that this amendment ought to be brought forward under the rules for questions and resolutions. Under the Government of India Act section 80 (3) no question or resolution rule can be altered except by both the houses of Parliament. That is the position. I only want to hear what honourable members have got to say before I give my final decision in the matter.

The Honourable Mr. SIDDAHNATH DHONDDEV GARUD :—Your Excellency, the Honourable Mr. PATEL does not seek to include disallowed questions in the proceedings of the Legislative Council, but only desires to enable the secretary to the Legislative Council to maintain a separate register of disallowed questions and resolutions for the information of honourable members.

His Excellency the PRESIDENT :—But with regard to questions and resolutions we are governed by the provisions of the Government of India Act.

The Honourable Mr. GARUD :—What I want to point out is that this is not an amendment to rule 16 of the question rules. Rule 16 provides "that no question which has been disallowed by the President shall be so entered." This amendment I may point out does not seek to enter disallowed questions and resolutions into the proceedings of the Council, but suggests the maintenance of a separate register for them.

The Honourable Sir MAHADEV CHAUBAL :—But it seeks an amendment in the question rules. The amendment whether it is accepted or not, or whether it is within our power or not, is quite a different thing, but the subject of the amendment relates to Parts III and IV, governing resolution rules and question rules. That is the first thing to start with. Therefore, if this amendment has got to come in, it is pertinent and relevant to point out, if the amendment sought a change with regard to resolutions and questions, that it would be out of order that amendments which obviously relate to resolutions and questions should be introduced in the first part which relates only to rules for the conduct of business and does not relate to questions and resolutions.

The Honourable Mr. UPASANI:—Your Excellency, there is no doubt the difficulty pointed out by the Honourable Sir. MAHADEV CHAUBAL, but if power is given to the local Government to frame rules subject to the sanction of the Governor-General and then subject to the final approval of the houses of Parliament, then we may well assume that these rules are capable of being altered by the local Government subject to the required sanction. If any contingency arises, Government themselves will raise no objection to alter them and to submit them for the requisite sanction.

His Excellency the PRESIDENT:—Will the honourable member kindly read clause (3) of section 80, the last two lines?

The Honourable Mr. UPASANI:—If the motion had been for an alteration or repeal, it would be another thing. The resolution now moved is in the form of a recommendation to Government and if Government approve the recommendation it may be accepted.

His Excellency the PRESIDENT:—Order, order. It is not a recommendation at all, it is an amendment to rule 42. I think on the whole on hearing honourable members I have had enough of legal opinion to make up my mind on this matter.

The Honourable Mr. VITHALBHAI JHAVERBHAI PATEL:—Your Excellency, I do not want to go over the same ground again. All that I want to be satisfied with is whether after a motion has been admitted by your Excellency under the rules of the Legislative Council and entered by the secretary on the agenda, any member of Government has a right to rise to a point of order and question your Excellency's ruling and ask that the business be expunged from the agenda?

His Excellency the PRESIDENT:—Order, order. There are two points I think that I have finally to decide upon. The one is as to whether this amendment having got on the agenda paper, any honourable member can move that it is out of order, and the second point is whether under all the circumstances of the case, this amendment should stand. Well, with regard to the first point I am quite clear that my honourable colleague is in order in moving this amendment out of order, for this reason, that sub-rule 5 of rule 5 of the rules for the conduct of Council business says:—"Motions which may be made consistently with the Indian Councils Acts, 1861 to 1909, and the rules applicable to the Council." Well, if we hold that this particular rule must come under clause 80 (3) of the Government of India Act, 1915, the amendment is out of order on this occasion just as much as on any other. Then with regard to the other point I think it is perfectly clear that the Honourable Mr. PATEL'S amendment must come or should come, if it is to be properly moved, under the question and resolution rules. The amendment refers specifically to questions and resolutions and under section 80 (3) of the Government of India Act, 1915, no alterations can be made in the matter of questions and resolutions without the consent of Parliament. We can do nothing in the local legislature without the authority of Parliament and for that reason I must rule that the amendment is out of order.

The Honourable Sir MAHADEV BHASKER CHAUBAL:—Your Excellency.—With regard to the other amendments to rules of which notice has been given I propose that the questions involved in the different amendments be referred to a small committee consisting of

The Honourable Mr. PATEL,

The Honourable the ADVOCATE-GENERAL,

RULES FOR THE CONDUCT OF BUSINESS. ENQUIRY INTO PUBLIC EXPENDITURE.

The Honourable Rao Bahadur GANESH KRISHNA SATHE,
The Honourable Mr. Pathan

and that they should after discussion settle the exact amendments and alterations of the rules and adopt the shape in which they should be brought before the Council, as one set of rules instead of different amendments, or conflicting amendments, so that the Council will be in a position to discuss and decide upon each of the amendments and settle exactly which alterations to adopt and which to reject. It is necessary that the terms of reference to the select committee should be settled, and I propose that that committee should consider the several amendments in the rules of business of which notice has been given other than the disallowed amendment and report to Council what modifications should be made in the rules in view of the points raised in the said amendments.

The motion to appoint the proposed committee to consider the amendments to the rules for the conduct of legislative business was then put to the vote and carried.

DISCUSSION OF MATTERS OF GENERAL PUBLIC INTEREST.

His Excellency the PRESIDENT:—Discussion of matters of general public interest. Resolution No. 1. The Honourable Mr. PATEL.

The Honourable Mr. PARANJPYE:—I want to request your Excellency to take resolution No. 24 first. If that resolution is taken first and is accepted, we might possibly be able to drop or postpone some of the numerous resolutions to some other meeting.

His Excellency the PRESIDENT:—In answer to the honourable member's suggestion, I may inform the Council that the Governor in Council has had an opportunity of discussing this particular point with His Excellency the Governor and he very much regrets that he finds that he is exceedingly unwilling to bind himself. He does not wish to give way entirely and allow Council meetings to be held at least six times a year. His Excellency thinks that he ought to be given a free hand with regard to the number of times that the Council should meet and he hopes that the Council will leave that discretion with him in the future as in the past.

The Honourable Mr. PARANJPYE:—My point is if that resolution is discussed first it would enable us to say whether other resolutions cannot be postponed to another sessions.

His Excellency the PRESIDENT:—I am afraid I can give very little hope about No. 24.

The Honourable Mr. GOKULDAS KAHANDAS PAREKH:—Your Excellency.—I rise to support the first resolution that stands on the agenda and has been moved by the Honourable Mr. PATEL and now I beg leave to offer a few remarks on that resolution.

I have stated to the Council the reasons why I consider this resolution ought to pass. The facts which I want to put before the Council in connection with this resolution are that the rate of increase of expenditure has gone up in a series of years under different heads. I shall also try to show that so far as the main heads of the revenue are concerned, elasticity has considerably diminished. Then I shall try to show that so far as the public are concerned there are several urgent wants which cannot be met unless there is a considerable revenue avilable and this would not take place unless much economy is practiced in the matter of expenditure.

ENQUIRY INTO PUBLIC EXPENDITURE.

For the purpose of proving the proposition I am going to place before the Council certain figures for a series of years and the period that I select would commence from 1904.

His Excellency the PRESIDENT.—I hope the honourable member will no doubt remember that he had spoken for 7 or 8 minutes on the last occasion and so he has not got much time. I only wish to warn the honourable member.

The Honourable Mr. PAREKH (continuing):—I shall try to finish what I have to say within the few minutes at my disposal.

In the first instance I shall try to show how the expenditure has increased during the last 11 years. I take these 11 years because the years 1915-16 and 1916-17 are abnormal years in consequence of the war. I take the year 1904-05 because this was the last year of the provincial contract and it would be necessary for the Council, I submit, to have the figures of this year in order to ascertain how the changes of revenue and expenditure have taken place. The figures to which I refer will show the increase of 43 lakhs in expenditure under the head of police the expenditure in 1904-05 was of 64 lakhs and in 1914-15 it rose to 107 lakhs.

In reference to the head of land revenue your Excellency will find that in 1904-05 the expenditure was 67 lakhs and in 1914-15 it was 90 lakhs. It gives increase of 23 lakhs.

Then under the head of superannuation the Council will find that in 1904-05 the expenditure was Rs. 23,00,000 and in 1914-15 it rose to Rs. 38 lakhs, an increase of 15 lakhs. In 1904-05 under the head of courts of law the expenditure was 48 lakhs, in 1914-15 it rose to 57 lakhs, which gives an increase of Rs. 9 lakhs. Under the head of excise the expenditure was Rs. 5 lakhs in 1904-05 and it rose to 12 lakhs in 1914-15, which gives an increase of 7 lakhs. Under the head of forest the expenditure in 1904-05 was 19 lakhs and in 1914-15 it was 26 lakhs; this gives an increase of 7 lakhs. Under agriculture the increase was of Rs. 1½ lakh and under the heads of stationery, general administration, and jails the increase has been 4 lakhs under each. Under the head of public works, excluding the public works which are remunerative the increase has been 115 lakhs. The Council will now see how this expenditure is met. There has been an increase of revenue due to two causes. One of the reasons of this increase is due to the circumstance that the Government of India, which before 1904-05 gave small shares in some of the most important items of revenue to the provincial Government, subsequently changed their policy and some of the heads of revenue were completely provincialized and under some other heads the Government of India gave to the provincial Government much larger shares than they used to do before. The other cause was the normal increase of revenue due to general causes. The large increases that were due to these causes enabled the province to spend adequate sums of money under the heads education, sanitation, and medical relief. The province was not able to provide for them from any normal general increase of revenue, but because there were windfalls brought on by the provincialization of some of the heads of revenue which were till then divisible, and, the increase of provincial shares in some other divisible heads of revenue.

The Honourable Mr. CARMICHAEL:—Might I ask the honourable member if he knows what the Government of India gave to this Government in 1905-06?

The Honourable Mr. PAREKH:—So far as the subventions were concerned in 1904-05 they came to 70 lakhs of rupees and in 1914-15 to 9 lakhs of rupees.

The Honourable Mr. CARMICHAEL.—Under land revenue what were the definite and fixed allotments given by the Government of India? They amount to Rs. 1,79,00,000.

The Honourable Mr. PAREKH.—These are the figures that I have here, but irrespective of what had been given by the Government of India in supplementing the share in the revenue, what I submit to the Council is that, unless there are very great urgent needs and unless there is some sort of economy or some rules laid down and an enquiry held for the purpose of ascertaining why there has been so large an increase in expenditure and especially in administrative expenditure, I think that a time might possibly arrive when some of the most important departments which serve the public may either have their progress stopped or retarded and it is for that reason that I submit it is necessary that there should be an enquiry.

I have next to place before the Council some of the urgent needs of the Presidency and I submit that unless some economy is practiced in some of the spending departments, the cause of education, of sanitation and medical relief will suffer considerably and for the advance of reform in these departments, it is absolutely necessary that an enquiry of the kind which has been pressed for ought to be made. The urgent needs to which I would refer are needs firstly in connection with higher education; the support of new colleges, the providing for larger accommodation of students in colleges, the providing for the staff and equipment for the Institute of Science, for which a building is already ready, the provision in reference to the commercial college, etc. These would be for higher education. Then in reference to middle class education your Excellency will note that there is the general complaint about want of accommodation in schools and provision shall have to be made in order that those people who wish that their children should have middle class education placed within their reach may not be disappointed and may not be deprived of all facility for English education. Then the other thing for which, I submit—

His Excellency the PRESIDENT.—Order, order. I am afraid the honourable member has had 5 minutes over his time.

The Honourable Mr. PAREKH.—These being the circumstances and our provincial needs being of a considerably urgent character, I submit there is a necessity for the enquiry which is the subject of this resolution.

The Honourable Mr. SHRIDHAR BALKRISHNA UPASANI.—Your Excellency.—Within the short time that is at our disposal to discuss this question, it will not be possible for me to go through all the figures which the Honourable Mr. PATEL has placed before us, nor would it be necessary for us to go through the figures. I would only make a few general remarks.

The Honourable Mr. PATEL'S resolution, as it stands, only asks that this Council may be pleased to direct an enquiry by a committee or otherwise on the question of the public expenditure of this Presidency with a view to secure economy wherever possible. I think this is a very small demand. The time that is allowed to us for the budget discussion hardly allows of the searching enquiry which is needed for the complete examination of the increase in our income as also in the expenditure. So far as the rise in income is concerned, the powers of Government are unlimited. Government have power to increase revenue in several ways and we have no control by the Council over the exercise of that power by Government. As regards expenditure, we do exercise some power, but it is feeble and very limited. Therefore, I think it is necessary for us to know our position as to how we actually stand both as regards income and expenditure, whether the income is over-assessed and whether the expenditure is over-incurred.

Whenever any demands for new improvements or reforms are made, Government always pleads want of funds for provision for them. But we have seen, looking at the budget, that there are several itmes in which, prima facie, it might be possible to make retrenchments. We have several times drawn the attention of Government to the excessive expenditure on the police. Then there is an enormous increase in the expenditure in almost every department. In the excise department we have to consider whether a duplicate machinery is necessary for the work of that department or, whether with the addition that has been made to the police force it may not be possible to reduce part of the excise force. In the same way there are numerous items relating to other departments which also admit of retrenchment. There is at the outset the question as to the necessity to retain the scale on which the higher services are constituted. The Public Services Commission made a searching enquiry in connection with this but we understand that they have made recommendations, which if adopted, might cost us further expenditure on these higher services which may come to over Rs. 40,00,000 a year. While this has been proposed for the higher services, the lower services have not been taken into consideration in the proposals submitted by the commission. We will have to consider how far it is necessary to improve both the strength and the remuneration of these services below Rs. 200. These services were not, I believe, included in the enquiry of the Public Services Commission. Then there are also other items like exchange compensation special and acting allowances, etc. It must be considered whether the higher services should with the large increase in their pay still continue to receive any exchange compensation or special allowances and whether it is necessary to allow acting allowances for the same kind of work during the absence of leave of permanent incumbents. Then there are also the items of travelling allowances for which objections are now and then taken. It will not be possible for us to go through all the items in the budget discussion and to point out in detail where there should be reduction. It can only be done by a committee. The details are so many. There are grants made to papers like the Jagadvritta which also have been the subject of protest. There are other large and small items. Therefore, I think the demand made by the Honourable Mr. PATEL for a committee of enquiry is a just demand. It is very legitimate and it will, I think, strengthen the hands of both the Government and the Council to know our actual position and to find money for the necessary reforms which have to be kept back both by the Government and by the Council.

With these few words I support the resolution of my honourable friend, Mr. PATEL.

The Honourable Mr. PANDURANG ANANT DESAI.—Your Excellency, the resolution asks the Government to direct an inquiry by a committee or otherwise on the question of the public expenditure of this Presidency with a view to secure economy whenever possible.

These days are days of stringency and every attempt should be made to reduce public expenditure as far as possible. We make certain suggestions at the time of the budget but there being no sufficient time to discuss the matter it is left where it is.

Now it might be said that this matter might be left to the finance committee for discussion. But your Excellency knows that the time at the disposal of the finance committee is also limited. Therefore it is desirable that full inquiry should be made as regards both the expenditure and revenue and steps should be taken to reduce the expenditure as far as possible.

Now references were made to the expenditure on the police department. Several honourable members have referred in their budget speeches to the police department saying that that department costs much more than is absolutely necessary. We have alluded to the fact that in certain stations sub-inspectors are appointed where there is very little work to do. I submit if a full inquiry is made by a committee consisting of official and non-official members, all these matters would be discussed and then it would be very easy to see whether any reduction in the expenditure is possible.

I therefore support the resolution which has been moved by my honourable friend Mr. PATEL.

The Honourable Mr. LALLUBHAI SAMALDAS METHA.—Your Excellency, reference has been made to the finance committee by my honourable friend Mr. DESAI, who preceded me in connection with this question. I do not see why this question should not be gone into by the finance committee and I do not see the necessity of appointing another committee to go into this question. The finance committee is appointed not by the Council as a whole but its members are elected by non-official members of this Council. So that these members with the honourable the finance member and the Chief Secretary can very well be trusted to sit together and go into this question of public expenditure.

The question of expenditure is a ticklish one. All the honourable members of this Council, whenever they meet ask for an increase of expenditure for their different departments. Some want more money for the medical department, others for sanitation, agriculture, etc. At the same time we generally say that expenditure should be reduced in particular departments. All these are facts which can very well be taken up in the finance committee. Therefore I do not think it is necessary to have another committee. I therefore oppose this resolution.

The Honourable KHAN BAHADUR PIR BUKSH valad MIAN MAHMUD:—Your Excellency.—I quite agree with the Honourable Mr. LALLUBHAI that there is no necessity for appointing an extra committee to pursue this work. The finance committee has sufficient time to consider this question fully and I do not think that my honourable friend, Mr. PATEL, has made out a very strong case for an extra committee. I know that the circumstances of Sind are quite different from those of the Presidency proper. I think it will be sufficient if the matter is referred to the finance committee who have yet 7 months' time at their disposal to go into this question and within which they can meet and fully discuss the whole question.

The Honourable Mr. G. CARMICHAEL:—Your Excellency.—The honourable mover's argument seemed to me very illusive. He made general statements at the beginning of his speech with regard to small items of expenditure. He referred to two items on which he thought the expenditure might be greater than it is. He also referred to other items on which he thought the expenditure should be less, and than he went on to say that very possibly each particular item could be defended in detail, but that there was possibly extravagance somewhere. He expressed his personal apprehension that there was extravagance, but there was no certainty in his own mind. I think it is unfair and unusual for a member to come to this Council on points on which he himself had not made sure.

Another point I may mention is with regard to the figure that he gave to this Council. He gave us at the first meeting, a number of slips showing certain figures giving income and expenditure under certain heads. Now at the time he gave us these figures he had been supplied by the financial department with figures of a later date—more recent figures. He compared the actual expenditure with estimates, which by the nature of things have to be framed with considerable caution, and at the time he was making this comparison of actuals with estimates, he had at hand the actual figures of the year for which he was giving the estimates.

I should like to refer first to some of his general statements. One of the most important points is his reference to a very large rise in the revenue which has occurred during recent years; but he does not allow for the fact that when the provincial settlements were made, first in 1905-06 and then in 1911, Government undertook with the increase of revenue certain responsibilities. In 1911 when the provincial revenues were given the whole of the forest and excise revenue, this Government had naturally to take over the whole of the expenditure in both these departments.

The Honourable Mr. PATEL makes a somewhat rhetorical reference to the position of local boards. He said that our local bodies are in a financially hopeless condition. He indicated that this has been proved by the report of the local boards committee, of which the Honourable Mr. PATEL was a member. But what the local board committee actually pointed out was that the revenue of the local boards had increased in much the same proportion as provincial revenue in the period for which the figures were examined. It must be borne in mind that though the provincial revenues did increase, a very large proportion of the increase has been spent on works which are really local works. Under the public works head a large length of roads, which formerly were maintained at the cost of the local boards, was taken over and their maintenance has been provided for at the cost of provincial revenues. New roads have been made, and for municipalities a large number of new schemes of sanitation, water-works, drainage and opening out insanitary areas—not town-planning—have been undertaken out of the increased revenue which has accrued. In local board areas, also, a considerable sum of money has been spent on new bridges and roads. I think I may safely say that it has not been proved that the local bodies have been starved financially. Possibly the Honourable Mr. PATEL thinks that they should have had the spending of a larger part of the increased revenue. That, I think, is a separate question. It is a matter of policy in connection with the local self-government question. I understand that the Honourable Mr. PATEL thinks that unless the local board has a non-official president and the majority of the members are elected members, the local board is practically an official body. If he holds this view—perhaps I may be doing him a wrong, but that is the impression I have received from a good many speeches of his which I have heard—then I do not see that he has any great complaint if in spending their increased revenue Government have used their own agency instead of what he would call another official agency, namely, the local boards.

The Honourable Mr. PATEL refers to village servants as being underpaid. I do not think he can be aware of the fact that in the last ten years a very considerable re-organization has been effected in the village servants establishment and also with regard to village officers. With regard to the latter the improvement has not been so comprehensive, but numerous individual cases have been dealt with by Government and it must be remembered that the remuneration of this class ordinarily increases with the land revenue.

The Honourable Mr. PATEL said that nothing has been done for the last 50 years to improve the position of the mamlatdars. That statement I do not think has been made with the honourable member's usual fairness. The grading of the mamlatdars' service was improved, as I said the day before yesterday, in 1905 and though the maximum or minimum rates of pay have not been altered, any more than they have been in the I. C. S., a very considerable improvement has been effected in the remuneration.

Finally, the Honourable Mr. PATEL attempted to bolster up his case by a reference to two points which really do not concern provincial finance. One is the question of the fees of the official assignee and the other, the fees paid for the liquidation of certain banks in Bombay. I do not think Government can be held responsible for the amount of work which had to be done in connection with these banks. It is true they had to authorize the payment in connection with one case because the work was entrusted to a Government Officer, but the work had to be done and had to be paid for; and I believe it was very cheaply done.

Coming to the houourable member's figure slips, I should like to deal more particularly with the one under the head of the public works department. In order to understand the figures a considerable amount of explanation is necessary, but I hope I shall not detain the Council very long over it. He compares the actuals of 1908-09 and those of 1913-14 with the budget figures of 1914-15 and of 1916-17 and he deals practically entirely with the allotment under 45, civil works, that is, works carried out by our own provincial civil works—the roads and buildings branch. He made a brief reference also to expenditure under irrigation in both cases. In both cases his suggestion is that the cost of establishment is excessive. The work of the department must be examined as a whole. I am quite ready to take the roads and buildings branch alone, but I think it will give a better view of the work of the whole department if I include the irrigation department. Firstly, I will give the actual figures of expenditure in three years: In 1908-09 the total spent by the department was 155 lakhs, in 1914-15 it was 230 lakhs, and in 1915-16 196 lakhs. That includes irrigation, military works, local fund works and contribution works, i.e., local fund works which were carried out by Government officers and contribution works which were carried out by the Government engineering establishment. The percentage of establishment expenditure on the cost, deducting the cost of the establishment itself, i. e., the percentage on what is actually paid for work alone, and also, deducting the amount on which establishment charges are not admissible, such as machinery imported from England, was in 1909 20·3 per cent., in 1914-15 it was 17·8 per cent. and in 1915-16 it was 23·6 per cent. Now I do not think that this variation of from 20 per cent. in 1908-09 to 23·6 in 1915-16 is at all serious when you remember that the work to be carried out is scattered over the whole Presidency and includes a considerable length of roads in every district, which have to be looked after, whether the engineer has Rs. 5 per mile to spend on it or Rs. 500. I may point out that in 1904-05 and 1905-06 the total percentage calculated in the same way was 26 per cent.

Now I will take the roads and buildings branches alone, but in that connection I must take into consideration the work done for local boards, contribution works and military works because the establishments carrying out these works are one and the same. The percentage was 16 in 1908-09, it was 15 in 1914-15, and in 1915-16 22 per cent. Now one reason why variations occur is this. The work done for local boards and for contribution is fixed at a reduced percentage.

For local boards the establishment charge is fixed at 10 per cent. and I find that on an average the contribution works' charge has been 5 per cent. over a series of years. Thus though it may actually cost us, say, 20 per cent. to carry out the work, we charge the local boards only 10 per cent. and the other bodies or persons for whom contribution works are carried out, 5 per cent. But the establishments have to be paid and the balance that we remit to the local boards and persons on whose behalf we carry out contribution works, the 10 and 15 per cent., is all added against Government work proper. In 1908-09 the total amount of local fund and contribution works was rather over 19 lakhs: local fund works 17 lakhs and contribution works 2 lakhs. In 1915-16 we had 34 lakhs: 17 lakhs local fund works and 17 lakhs contribution works. So that in that year when the actual establishment percentage worked out to 22 per cent. you have to take a percentage of 12 per cent. on 17 lakhs local fund work and 17 per cent. on 17 lakhs contribution work and debit the total as establishment charges against works which are purely Government works, in addition to the amount calculated at 20 per cent. Thus you can realise that the establishment charges on these works, that is to say, under 45, civil works, alone may mount up very quickly, and particularly so if you have in any particular year, like the year 1915-16, to cut down your programme under 45, civil works.

Another important point which should be remembered is this, that since 1908-09 we have had more money to spend and we have been spending part on certain new establishments under the public works head. We have extended the work of the sanitary engineer. I do not know whether the Honourable Mr. PATEL will complain of this because it goes to benefit the municipalities. Again, we have appointed a mechanical engineer with his establishment. His work is practically entirely for the benefit of local bodies and, so far as I know, his advise and help are free. Unless any very large work is carried out by him no charge is made. Also the boring engineer is a new officer with his establishment and he is doing a great deal of work for municipalities and for the water-supply of the Presidency generally. There has also been a very considerable extension of the activities of the electrical engineer and the establishment of the electrical engineer has had to be increased. The whole cost of these extensions under the sanitary engineer and the electrical engineer and the new departure in connection with the mechanical engineer and boring engineer all come under the head of establishments debitable to 45, Civil Works—Public Works Department.

The Honourable Mr. PATEL makes the astonishing statement with regard to land revenue that in the year 1903-04 (I think he gave that year) our land revenue was higher than in the years 1914-15. I think he must have made some mistake. On examination of the figures I think he will see that the actual land revenue was smaller but that we were receiving from the Government of India very considerable sums of money accounted for under the head of land revenue. This was not land revenue, it did not represent our half share of the land revenue. At that time we were actually living on the bounty of the Government of India. The Honourable Mr. HARCHANDRAI referred yesterday to the Honourable Mr. PATEL'S assuming the mantle of the late Mr. Gokhale, and if he does so, I would really ask the Honourable Mr. PATEL to take the same trouble as the late Mr. Gokhale did and the Honourable Sir DINSHAH WATCHA does to verify his figures and ascertain their true meaning.

The Honourable Mr. PATEL in one of his remarks in his speech in connection with this motion said that the ways of spending money were inscrutable. I can assure him that they are not so very difficult to understand and the financial department of this Government will always be ready to help him to understand particular points.

Then the Honourable Mr. PATEL complained that the expenditure on forests is from 55 to 60 per cent. of the income. The Honourable Mr. PATEL, I believe, comes from the Kaira District. I think he was connected with a land owning family there, but of late he must have been living too much in towns and his agricultural instincts are becoming dulled, otherwise he would not have made this extraordinary statement that from landed property you can expect to get as large a proportion of revenue as you can from ordinary taxation. I think he might consult the Honourable Mr. Bhurgri. He will probably tell him that he has to put in a great deal of labour and of money into the land before he gets a substantial return.

I referred to the police expenditure yesterday. The increase has been the result of the recommendations of the Police Commission which held a very extended inquiry into the work of the police in India. On the basis of their report a scheme for the improvement of the police in this Presidency was considered and after a great deal of discussion has been finally sanctioned. As I have said, the matter is again under examination, but that any committee will be of any use in the matter I very much doubt.

With regard to stationery and printing I wish to bring to the notice of this Council that in 1913-14 the cost was Rs. 14,97,000, in 1914-15 Rs. 15,34,000, but in 1915-16 the cost has been brought down to Rs. 12,43,000. The Honourable Mr. PATEL had the whole of these figures before him when he told us that there had been a slight decrease. I submit, sir, that a decrease of Rs. 3 lakhs in one year, in a year when the cost of paper was going up by leaps and bounds, was a very considerable reduction indeed and it was effected entirely by the officers of Government undertaking a detailed review of the expenditure of the department.

Coming to general administration, the Honourable Mr. PATEL and the Honourable Mr. GOKULDAS PAREKH referred to the increase which had occurred. The Honourable Mr. PATEL indicated that there has been some extravagance, as I said before, but he did not indicate in which particular sub-head or main-head had occurred the extravagance of which he complains. There are four main causes for the increase: one is the fact that a fourth Member of Council was appointed. I do not know whether the honourable member considers that extravagant. The Legislative Council was enlarged and that necessitated a considerable increase in the travelling allowances of honourable members. Then there are two particular items. The local audit establishment which accounts for a considerable sum had to be increased. That is work undertaken by Government on behalf of local bodies and municipalities and a number of other bodies like the nursing associations. Lastly, there is a sum of about three-fourth lakhs of rupees of which expenditure Government relieves the local boards. This is properly local board expenditure, incurred on clerical establishment maintained for local board work. Perhaps the honourable member will tell us in his reply in which of these four items he thinks extravagance has occurred.

Your Excellency, I think the position is this, that Government are continually subjecting the expenditure to scrutiny, both at close range for economic adjustment of details and also at a wider range to see that the various allotments are properly and proportionately made. The enquiry which the Honourable Mr. PATEL suggests would, as pointed out by the Honourable Mr. UPASANI, mean going over the ground which has been covered by the Police Commission, the Decentralization Commission, the Public Services Commission, the Excise Committee and the Public Works Department Committee. It seems to me, sir, that it is entirely unnecessary, in view of the scrutiny which is being carried on every day throughout the year, to undertake a special enquiry into this very vast subject.

The Honourable Mr. VITHALBHAI JHAVERBHAI PATEL:—Your Excellency,—I am very much pleased that so far as my non-official colleagues are concerned, there is no difference of opinion on this resolution. The only two members of the Council who spoke about this resolution rather haltingly were the Honourable Mr. LALUBHAI and the Honourable KHAN BAHADUR PIR BAKSH. Both of them, however, admit the necessity for an enquiry; but they say that such an enquiry must be made not by a special committee appointed for the purpose, but by the finance committee. They do not dispute the fact that some enquiry is necessary. The Honourable Mr. CARMICHAEL on behalf of Government tells us that the funds at the disposal of Government are equitably distributed among the various services and that everything is all right and no one has any reason to grumble. Only the other day, your Excellency will remember, we heard member after member criticising the budget, and complaining about the inequitable distribution of the funds at the disposal of Government among the various services under them. With regard to the police expenditure the Honourable Mr. KAMAT raised a vehement protest and Government had no reply to give except that they were making an enquiry.

The Honourable Mr. CURTIS:—I do not want to interrupt the honourable member, but with regard to the police expenditure there is a resolution further down the agenda, and I can say that Government have got a complete answer to that resolution.

The Honourable PATEL:—I submit that it also forms a part of my general resolution, and if this resolution is accepted it will not be necessary to move the other. However, the question for this Council to decide really is whether the time has come when the whole budget should be thoroughly examined and whether there should not be a redistribution and reallocation of the funds at the disposal of Government among the various services. That is the whole question before this Council. I quite agree with my honourable friend Mr. LALUBHAI that the finance committee has several months at its disposal; but as I have said more than once to this Council, your Excellency, we are not allowed to go into questions of expenditure on existing establishments. That being so, the finance committee could do nothing. They merely allot a few lakhs of rupees which are at the disposal of Government for the coming year. They cannot go into past things. Under these circumstances, I submit that there is a very good case for inquiry and I trust that those who have followed and studied the figures of income and expenditure as presented by me at the December meeting will have no hesitation in supporting this resolution.

ENQUIRY INTO PUBLIC EXPENDITURE.

[26TH JULY 1917.] [The President.]

His Excellency the PRESIDENT.—I think that honourable members must have observed that this resolution is really a vote of censure on the administration of Government in general. That is what it comes to, and my honourable friend Mr. PATEL must recognise that. It is quite obvious therefore that Government cannot accept it. I would ask the honourable member one question. He is very anxious that a committee should be formed to inquire into the necessity for a general reorganization of our expenditure, but when he has done that, what does he propose should follow? Does he propose to say that this committee should have plenary powers to order Government to reorganize its departmental expenditure in accordance with its suggestions? Or, what is the position? The position at the present moment is this. Under existing conditions the Executive Government has to do the best it can, and I think does the best it can; for after all we had a budget meeting the other day and I can remember very well honourable members getting up and saying what an extremely satisfactory state of things existed. Why then the need for this committee? I should like to know exactly what my honourable friend Mr. PATEL'S position is. If he really could tell us or if any of the honourable members who spoke could have told us of any definite matter on which Government has been either disgracefully extravagant or ridiculously niggardly, then there would have been something to go upon, but my honourable friend generalizes in a most unsatisfactory manner. I am bound to say there is only one course for Government to take and that is, absolutely to refuse to accept this resolution. There is one further remark which I should like to make. Surely under the present system it is within the power of honourable members to send in resolutions dealing with such matters. During the budget meeting in March honourable members can move resolutions stating their views and putting forward their ideas with regard to particular forms of expenditure. That is a means of criticising the Government, but the vote of censure, I am afraid, is becoming a rather common habit among honourable members. I may inform honourable members that several other resolutions have recently been proposed, suggesting committees for enquiry into various other departments of Government, which I think are mere votes of censure. I do really ask the Council, unless they think that Government have done so extraordinarily badly and that generally our finances are in such a deplorably bad condition, to support executive authority and not to pass this resolution.

The resolution was then put to the vote and lost, with 12 members voting for and 33 against.

His Excellency the PRESIDENT:—Resolution No. 2. The Honourable Mr. PATEL.

The Honourable Mr. VITHALBHAI JHAVERBHAI PATEL:—May it please your Excellency, the resolution which I have the honour to move reads thus:—

"This Council recommends that His Excellency the Governor in Council may be pleased to take steps to have at least one training college for primary school teachers and mistresses established in the city of Bombay at an early date."

TRAINING COLLEGE IN BOMBAY CITY.

[26TH JULY 1917.] [Mr. Vithalbhai Jhaverbhai Patel; the President.]

My lord, this resolution appeared on the agenda of the March meeting of this Council. Very soon after I gave notice of it I read the speech of the Finance Member of the Government of India announcing a recurring grant of £2,00,000 from 1917-18 onwards earmarked for improving the pay and training of teachers in primary and secondary schools in all the provinces of this country. I was also informed on enquiry that out of this grant our Presidency was to get Rs. 2½ lakhs, and that your Excellency's Government had called for the reports of the Director of Public Instruction on the question of the establishment of more vernacular training colleges. Under the circumstances I did not think it right to move this resolution at the last meeting and accordingly asked your Excellency's permission to allow me to postpone its discussion to this meeting. In moving for postponement I observed that if I were not satisfied with the action that Government would take in the meanwhile, I would move my resolution at this meeting. With a view to find out what action Government had taken during this long interval of four months I gave notice of a question asking Government whether any vernacular training colleges would be started, and if so, where and when. This question was disallowed by your Excellency. I do not know at what stage the question has reached; but I believe that the discussion of this resolution in this Council will help Government to solve it in a satisfactory manner.

My lord, on this question of the necessity for more training colleges there can be no two opinions. We have in this Presidency only four Government training colleges for men and three for women. The last college was opened as early as 1889 at Dhulia. Nothing seems to have been done by Government since that year in the direction of opening new colleges. The number of primary schools in the Presidency has increased and is increasing. The demand for a further supply of trained teachers is consequently becoming more acute. The total number of trained teachers in the whole Presidency engaged in all schools under all managements is about 25,000. There is no official estimate of the annual wastage caused by death, resignation or retirement. We might safely put it, as per estimate of the late Mr. G. V. Joshi, a distinguished statistician, at about 8 per cent. annually. According to this calculation 2,000 teachers are required to meet the annual wastage. To this figure of 2,000 should be added the number required to staff the undermanned schools and additional schools which surely will be opened immediately after the cessation of the war. I have not attempted, nor is it necessary for the purpose of this resolution, to estimate this number. The fact remains that the existing state of affairs is far from satisfactory. At the present moment about 2,100 persons—men and women—are under instruction in all the training institutions, Government as well as private, in the Presidency. Taking a two years' course on an average as sufficient for equipping a teacher, not more than 1,050 teachers can be sent out well equipped in the method of teaching. This number is half the total number of teachers required to meet the annual wastage.

His Excellency the PRESIDENT:—I think the honourable member's resolution has reference entirely to the city of Bombay. He had better confine himself to the matter of teachers in the Bombay city.

The Honourable Mr. PATEL:—I would first establish the necessity for the opening of more colleges and then their location.

His Excellency the PRESIDENT:—I must ask the honourable member to look at his resolution. It says: "This Council recommends that His Excellency the Governor in Council may be pleased to take steps to have at least one special training college for primary school teachers and mistresses established in the city of Bombay at an early date." I cannot hold the honourable member in order if he spreads himself over the Presidency.

The Honourable Mr. PATEL:—I will confine myself to Bombay. I have said enough to establish the necessity for opening more colleges.

TRAINING COLLEGE IN BOMBAY CITY.

I now come to the question of their location. I do not know what the views of the Government or the Bombay corporation are on this question. I feel convinced that Bombay is badly in need of a training college. There are at present only 340 trained teachers out of a total of 800, attached to the municipal schools. Besides there are 140 aided schools and perhaps an equally large number of unaided schools. There is no question that all these schools are manned by a very large percentage of untrained teachers. The Bombay Corporation is seriously considering the question of extension of primary education in that city as early as possible. Now let us see what is the provision for the supply of trained teachers for Bombay schools. The Bombay Corporation sends year after year, say, 20 or 30 persons to receive training in the Government colleges at Poona and Ahmedabad. This is utterly inadequate to meet the existing requirement of the Corporation schools. The Corporation has, therefore, recently opened three training classes. Apart from the question of efficiency of men trained in those classes, the fact remains that the opening of such classes will not solve this problem. Another reason why a college in Bombay is a necessity is that the Urdu schools in that city are manned by mostly untrained teachers, and no efforts on the part of the Corporation to get their Urdu teachers trained in other colleges will suffice to meet this want. According to my information out of the four colleges, Ahmedabad is the only college having a branch of equipping Urdu teachers attached to it. Unless, therefore, you have a training college at Bombay with an Urdu branch attached to it, education of Mahomedan children is bound to suffer. Then again, how are we going to solve the problem of supplying trained teachers to the large number of aided and unaided schools in the city? The proprietors of these schools under existing conditions find it difficult to man their schools with trained teachers. Those who pass out from training colleges are under agreement to serve Government or municipalities who pay their stipends. If there is a college in Bombay, I am sure these proprietors will send teachers of their schools for receiving training.

There is one other circumstance to which I should like to draw the attention of the Council in connection with the question of location of training college in Bombay. In 1906 Government had appointed a committee consisting of eminent educationists and public men of this Presidency, including Dr. F. G. Selby, the late Sir Pherozeshah Mehta and Sir Narayan Chandawarkar, to consider the question of extension of primary education in the city. The committee submitted its report to Government in 1908 wherein they expressed their deliberate opinion that there was a great need of additional trained teachers and recommended to Government to bear the expenditure necessary for the maintenance of a training college. Thereupon Government projected a scheme for the establishment of a college in Bombay and asked the Corporation to contribute a portion of the cost. The Corporation whilst admitting the necessity of the college contested its liability to contribution. The scheme, therefore, had to be dropped. I refer to this history to show to this Council that both Government and the Corporation regarded till 1909 that the establishment of a training college in Bombay is a necessity. I shall be glad to be told that the necessity has now ceased to exist. This Council would certainly like to hear members of the Bombay Corporation who are members of this Council on this point. I believe myself that an urgent necessity exists. But if Bombay corporators in this Council think otherwise, this resolution will give them an opportunity to express their views for the information of the Bombay rate-payers. With these words I commend this resolution to the acceptance of this Council.

The Honourable Mr. CHUNILAL VIJBHUKHANDAS MEHTA:—Your Excellency,—I have heard very carefully the speech of the Honourable Mr. PATEL and I confess that I fail to find any arguments which show that the location of a training college in Bombay is the most suitable arrangement for the purpose of increasing the percentage of trained teachers in the city of Bombay.

TRAINING COLLEGE IN BOMBAY CITY.

All his arguments tend to show that there is a need for increasing their percentage, but that has been admitted not only by me but by the Corporation for several years past. I would like to point out in this connection that the percentage of trained teachers in the Bombay schools has been steadily rising and I shall give the percentages for the last five years—

In 1912-13	the percentage was	35.
„ 1914-15	„	40.

You will see, sir, that there is therefore a steady rise in the increase of trained teachers in spite of a substantial rise in the total number of teachers It may not be sufficient—we ourselves do not think it is sufficient. But still that percentage is better than the percentage obtaining in the mofussil municipalities where, I understand, it is under 40 per cent.—it is about 38 to 39 per cent.

But I do not take my stand upon any comparison between the Bombay municipality and the mofussil municipalities. In a question that I put at the last sitting of this Council I asked whether the Government proposed to take any action with regard to increasing the accommodation in the existing colleges or with regard to the establishment of more training colleges. The reply from Government was that the matter was under enquiry. That being the case, I respectfully submit that the proper form which the resolution of my honourable friend, Mr. PATEL, should have taken ought to have been not merely for confining the college to Bombay alone, but for asking for more colleges throughout the Presidency. If your Excellency will permit me, I would like to move an amendment as follows :—

I will mention, sir, why I consider this amendment should meet with the approval of this Council. There is no doubt that more accommodation is required to increase the output of primary teachers. In reply to a question that the Honourable Mr. PATEL put at the previous sitting of this Council he was given figures which show clearly that the accommodation is very inadequate in the existing colleges and that at Poona and Ahmedabad a very small percentage only of the students that apply for admission are admitted into the colleges, no doubt for want of accommodation. The question therefore is that it will be more advisable to start these colleges in the mofussil where there already exists every facility and there is keen demand for admission to these colleges. So far as the city of Bombay is concerned, although there is a great need of trained teachers, I do not think it is necessary to establish a training college there for the following reasons.

Admissions to these colleges are governed by the stipends that the municipality of Bombay pays for its own teachers and the stipends that Government pays for its teachers in the mofussil schools. Now, even with regard to the city of Bombay the stipends amount to Rs. 10 a month; in the mofussil it is even smaller. I would ask the Honourable Mr. PATEL whether he thinks on a salary of Rs. 10 a month for two or three years he will find a sufficient number of students to attend that college, which will justify the large expenditure that is bound to be incurred if it is established in Bombay. In the year 1909 when the proposal was first made to the Bombay municipality, the estimate that was framed by Government provided for an expenditure of Rs. 30,000 per annum towards which they asked the municipality to contribute Rs. 11,900. That scheme made very poor provision for the training of Urdu teachers. The Honourable Mr. PATEL has appealed to the Muhammadan members of this Council to see that they get a sufficient number of trained teachers. If that branch is also to be added to any college that may be established in Bombay or in the mofussil, it would mean an increased expenditure which will come to possibly over Rs. 5,000 a year. In other respects also the scheme will have to be revised and the cost, I venture to think, will be no less than about Rs. 40,000 a year. Is there sufficient justification to incur this cost in Bombay, when we know that the number of students that the college might find in Bombay is bound to be limited, on account of the scanty stipends that they get and also because of the fact that only a very few number of persons pass the vernacular school final examination, which is a test you must pass before you are admitted into any of the training colleges? Now, your Excellency, I attach great importance to the figures that I am going to quote presently. It is only when you have passed this examination that you can be admitted into the college, and the figures of passes for the last five years as I have got them are as follows :—

You will see, sir, that the number of students that pass in this manner is, at the highest, 40 and, at the lowest, 12. It has further to be remembered that about three-fourths of this number refuse altogether to join Government or municipal service, so that provision will have to be made for a number which may possibly be 15 or 20 at the outside.

I may remind the Honourable Mr. PATEL that when the negotiations with the municipality were brought to an abrupt conclusion in 1909, this was the governing idea that was in the mind of Government when they suggested that, instead of starting a training college in Bombay, the municipality should make arrangements to supply stipends to about 75 students whom they should be at liberty to send to the existing colleges. I venture to point out to the Council that it is not altogether a question of cost that guides me in putting this proposition before the Council. I know that it has been suggested that it is because the Bombay municipality may have to bear the cost, that we propose to oppose the resolution of the Honourable Mr. PATEL. I can assure him that it is nothing of the kind and he will see presently that it cannot be the governing factor at all. As I have said, according to the scheme that Government proposed in 1909 the cost to be borne by the municipality was, at the outside, Rs. 11,900. As against that undertaking we were to send 75 students to the existing colleges with a stipend of Rs. 10 each. We have undertaken and are undertaking a charge of Rs. 9,000 per annum, so that the difference is only about Rs. 2,900; but that is not the reason which makes me suggest the modification in the resolution of the Honourable Mr. PATEL. He referred to the liability that the Corporation might have to incur. I may point out that counsel's opinion was taken on this matter in addition to the definite opinion of the Honourable Sir Pherozeshah Mehta that the Bombay municipality was not liable to pay any contribution towards the cost of the primary training colleges. The opinion was given by Mr. Inverarity and Mr. Lowndes and it distinctly stated that it was only if the Bombay municipality considered that the establishment of the training college in Bombay was necessary that they would have to bear the cost of such a college. It is obvious therefore that it is entirely for the municipality to say whether they will have a college in Bombay or not and whether they will bear the cost. That is also clear from the wording of the section in the Bombay Municipal Act, which says that the Bombay municipality is only liable to maintain, equip, aid and suitably accommodate schools for primary education. That is the whole liability and it is not, as is loosely supposed, that they are liable for the entire cost of primary education in the city of Bombay. However, that is a matter which can be considered when the question really comes to be dealt with between Government and the Corporation. For the present I only say that it would be advisable to leave the Government to decide at what centres they will put these new training colleges, and I leave them also to decide whether they think that Bombay city is the proper centre for these colleges. Then let negotiations be opened between Government and the Bombay Corporation; but unless it is clearly proved, which I consider will be very hard in this case, that Bombay is the proper centre for the establishment of a new training college, I think that it should be left to the discretion of Government to make enquiries and find out where the college should be located.

TRAINING COLLEGE IN BOMBAY CITY.

[26TH JULY 1917.] [Mr. Chunilal Vijbhukhandas Mehta; the President.]

I hope the Council will pass my amendment.

His Excellency the PRESIDENT:—Order, order. Further discussion of Resolution No. 2, moved by the Honourable Mr. PATEL with an amendment by the Honourable Mr. CHUNILAL MEHTA. The Honourable Mr. PARANJPYE.

The Honourable Mr. RAGHUNATH PURSHOTTAM PARANJPYE:—Your Excellency, I would not have taken part in the discussion of this resolution if it were merely a family affair between the city of Bombay and Government, but the resolution goes further than the mere reference to the city of Bombay and has reference to increasing generally the number of training colleges in the Presidency. Now, I feel very strongly that a greater number of trained teachers for primary schools is absolutely essential if our primary education is to expand and be of real benefit to the pupils, for any teacher, anybody who can read and write, is obviously not fitted to teach our children properly. Pedagogy nowadays is a great science and our teachers have got to learn at least the rudiments of this science. Now, this resolution of the Honourable Mr. PATEL asked only for a single training college, and our friend the Honourable Mr. CHUNILAL'S amendment asks for apparently more training colleges; I can only say that this would be like being given two eyes when the devotee only prayed for one; and hence I shall be very well satisfied if the amendment of my honourable friend, Mr. CHUNILAL, is accepted. It would be an improvement on the old resolution, and I think it will do a great good to the people of this country. I know there may be some objections to starting a training college in the city of Bombay, and it is evidently a point which deserves to be considered whether at the same cost a training college in some other part of the Presidency might not be more economical. This question of the location of the training colleges may very well be gone into further before coming to a decision, but in any case, I think, more training colleges are required and I suggest that Government had better consider this question first by itself before declaring or committing itself in this Council to act in a particular or definite matter. I have, therefore, great pleasure in supporting the amendment brought forward by my honourable friend, Mr. CHUNHLAL, and suggest to my honourable friend, Mr. PATEL, that he will do well to accept this amendment.

The Honourable Mr. EBRAHIM HAROON JAFFER:—My Lord, I wish to move an amendment to the resolution moved by my friend, the Honourable Mr. PATEL. The amendment will be thus:—

"Adequate provision being made for turning out trained Urdu teachers by starting special Urdu classes in Bombay and a separate Urdu training college for the mofussil."

His Excellency the PRESIDENT:—Order, order. The honourable member cannot move an amendment to the resolution. He can move an amendment to the amendment.

The Honourable Mr. PATEL:—Can there be not more than one amendment to the original proposition?

His Excellency the PRESIDENT:—I think under rule 19 (1) the amendment must be to the amendment and not to the resolution.

The Honourable Mr. PATEL:—I submit, your Excellency, that my honourable friend, Mr. JAFFER, can move an amendment to the original proposition under the rules.

His Excellency the PRESIDENT:—Yes, I think my honourable friend, Mr. PATEL, is right; under the terms of the present rules although it is not the custom in other parliaments. Does the honourable member wish his amendment to come at the end of the resolution or what?

The Honourable Mr. JAFFER:—Yes, my Lord.

His Excellency the PRESIDENT:—Then the resolution as amended by my honourable friend, Mr. JAFFER, will be as follows:—

"This Council recommends that His Excellency the Governor in Council may be pleased to take steps to have at least one special training college for primary school teachers and mistresses established in the city of Bombay at an early date, adequate provision being made for turning out trained Urdu teachers by starting special Urdu classes in Bombay and a separate Urdu training college for the mofussil."

The Honourable Mr. JAFFER:—I believe it is not necessary for me to speak at length to commend this amendment to the acceptance of the Council. The importance of having trained teachers in our schools, primary as well as secondary, is admitted on all hands. The Muhammadan community is backward in education, and if progress is to be made by it, the Urdu schools must be provided with trained teachers. From the statistics which have been supplied to me by Government it is clear that the condition of Urdu schools is very unsatisfactory with regard to qualified teachers and much worse with respect to trained teachers, the percentage of unqualified teachers in Urdu schools being as large as 36·3 as against 15 in other primary schools. I hear again a large number of candidates seeking admission to training colleges at Poona and Dharwar are rejected for lack of accommodation. Out of the 68 male candidates, who sought admission at these two places in 1915-6, only 30 could get admission and in 1916-7 these figures were 39 and 15 only. The case of the Urdu training class at Ahmedabad is well known and I need not refer to it again. Government have not seen their way to add a second year's class to the college at Ahmedábad though the experiment has proved a great success and Muhammadan candidates cannot be admitted to other training colleges for lack of accommodation. Under these circumstances, I hope it will be clear to the Council how urgent is the need for making greater provision for the training of Urdu teachers. I have every hope therefore that my amendment will be accepted by the Council.

TRAINING COLLEGE IN BOMBAY CITY.

[Mr. Ebrahim Haroon Jaffer; Sheikh Ghulam Hussein Hidayatallah; Mr. F. G. Pratt; Mr. J. G. Covernton.] [27TH JULY 1917.]

The Honourable Sheikh GHULAM HUSSEIN HIDAYATALLAH:—Your Excellency, I rise to support this amendment moved by my honourable friend, Mr. JAFFER. At present for training Urdu teachers there is one school at Ahmedabad with its training class and two other colleges. Now, most of the people would not like to go to this training class because the training there is only for one year. Owing to the training there being given only for one year they do not turn out efficient teachers and besides that they have no prospects. Therefore, many young men do not like to go to this training class at Ahmedabad and my honourable friend, Mr. JAFFER, has stated that the two other colleges have not sufficient accommodation for more Mussalman young men to go there for training themselves as teachers in Urdu. Therefore, it is necessary to have a Muhammadan training college as suggested by my honourable friend, especially in view of the fact that primary education is going to be made compulsory. With these remarks I commend the amendment of my honourable friend, Mr. JAFFER, to the Council.

The Honourable Mr. F. G. PRATT:—Your Excellency, there are only two remarks that I wish to make in connection with this resolution. The first is that I agree that the provision of a training college in Bombay would be desirable from the point of view of the mofussil, because every Bombay man that is getting training in the mofussil vernacular training colleges is to that extent taking up the accommodation that would be available for an increased number of mofussil students. The second remark that I have to make is that I was a little surprised that speaking on behalf of the Bombay Corporation the Honourable Mr. CHUNILAL MEHTA should apparently be satisfied with the existing Bombay standard of efficiency in the matter of trained teachers. It is only a very little advance on the standard which has been reached in the mofussil. He told us that in the mofussil the percentage of trained teachers was 38 while in Bombay city it was 44. I should like to submit to the honourable member's consideration that in view of the enormous resources, intelligence, and wealth of the Bombay city I think the proportion should be not 44 but more like 88 per cent.

The Honourable Mr. J. G. COVERNTON:—Your Excellency, it may perhaps save time and trouble if I explain to the Council, as far as possible, exactly what the present position is.

In the first place, a reference has been made by the honourable mover of the original resolution, I think, to a grant which has been made by the Government of India, a grant of Rs. 2,50,000 That particular grant was not made specially for training colleges or for the extension or improvement of training colleges, but rather for the improvement of the pay of teachers in primary and other schools. We have been ascertaining from the inspectors what the demands of the various divisions are under that grant and we have now our proposals practically ready and they will be submitted to Government very shortly.

As regards the particular question of a training college in Bombay, there seems to be some difference of opinion as to whether a college should be in Bombay or for Bombay. There are obvious difficulties about planting a large college in Bombay. The question of expense, the question of a suitable site, the question of buildings—all afford difficulties which at present we are in no financial position whatever to cope with. I understand that the Bombay municipality would not object to have a training college in Bombay, provided they were not called upon to pay for the establishment of such a college. On the other hand, it is stated that the incidence of finance in this respect falls upon the Bombay Corportion, because the training of vernacular teachers is an inherent part of the maintenance of primary education by that body. However that may be, and without going into the legal point which I am not competent to discuss, I should like to say that the Government of India have now raised the whole question of the training of teachers. We had a letter from them some time ago and the whole question has been reviewed from the point of view of this Presidency since the receipt of that letter. We find that we are most undoubtedly very much in arrear in the outturn of trained teachers in this province. It is a little difficult to calculate exactly what the numbers required are, because a good deal depends upon the data from which you start; but even on one of the most economical estimates which I have seen, we should require to turn out something like 900 or 1,000 more teachers a year in order to meet the actual demands of the situation. It is quite obvious that for that purpose our present colleges are insufficient. If you take the present numbers in the training colleges, you will find that they cannot possibly meet that demand. If you extend and add to the present colleges you will be able to meet that demand partially, but in the letter I have submitted to Government I have suggested that the demand could not adequately be met in that way. We should have, I think, to establish additional colleges. That question will be carefully examined by Government and we shall have to decide where the additional colleges are to be placed. If it is found that Bombay, after all, would be a suitable position for a college,—I am not saying that it would not in certain respects,—then, provided that funds are available, we shall be very glad to do what we can to meet the proposition which the Honourable Mr. PATEL has put forward. But I think honourable members must understand that at present we are not in any position to do so. We have not got the staff, we have not got the buildings, and we have not got the subventions necessary to create these new colleges. On the other hand, Government and the department are fully conscious of the needs of the situation and are prepared to do all they can, as soon as money is available, to meet those needs.

TRAINING COLLEGE IN BOMBAY CITY.

[27TH JULY 1917.] [Mr. F. G. Covernton; Mr. Shridhar Balkrishna Upasani.]

The Honourable Mr. SHRIDHAR BALKRISHNA UPASANI:—Your Excellency, the necessity for additional training colleges and the insufficiency of the existing provision for the same are admitted by the Honourable the Director of Public Instruction. It is also admitted that all those who present themselves for admission do not get admission. It will be seen from the last report of the Director of Public Instruction that in Poona only 119 students could be admitted out of 426 who presented themselves. At Dhulia only 85 out of 137 were admitted. At Ahmedabad 110 out of 145 were admitted and at Dharwar 140 out of 500 were admitted.

So it appears that there is no want of competent candidates who are eligible to be admitted but that there is want of accommodation in the existing institutions. The first step, therefore, that will have to be taken will be to extend the present accommodation. And if this could not be done by starting new training colleges, it should, I think, be done by making some provision to strengthen the staff and accommodation in the existing institutions, specially with regard to the third year of training teachers. Their number, I think, is quite out of proportion to the needs of the schools that at present exist. Under the standing rules the 5th, 6th and 7th standards have to be taught by those who have passed the third year examination. But there is no sufficient number of these, and therefore the teaching of those standards suffers seriously. We had for this reason proposed the addition of a third year class for the Dhulia training school, and if that proposal had been seriously considered, I think, the need, so far as the higher standards are concerned, would have been met in part.

TRAINING COLLEGE IN BOMBAY CITY.

[Mr. Shridhar Balkrishna Upasani; Sardar Dulaba Raisingji; Mr. Chunilal Vijbhukhandas Mehta.] [27TH JULY 1917.]

As regards the training college in Bombay or for Bombay, I think the location may be left to Government. But there is no doubt that there ought to be a training college not only for Bombay but for students who come from Ratnagiri, Thana and Kolaba. Bombay itself or some place near Bombay will be convenient to those who come from Ratnagiri and Kolaba and also Thana.

As regards our Mahomedan friends, I think they are placed in a very inconvenient position in having to work with Marathi boys. In fact, they cannot compete with them and the training of the Marathi boys also suffers. As a matter of fact the Mahomedan boys are not so far advanced as the Hindu boys are and many of them have to be admitted with grace-marks as is expressly stated in the last year's report of the Director of Public Instruction. They had to be admitted as students belonging to the non-Brahmin classes who are to be encouraged under the rules. It is hard on Brahmin boys that they should be kept back even though they may stand higher up in rank and that the Mahomedan and other candidates should be given preference over them though less qualified. This, really, is not a satisfactory arrangement and in the circumstances as they stand, I think, that a separate college for Mahomedans would be a better arrangement. They will thereby be all brought together and there will be a a far greater improvement in their efficiency than is possible by putting them together with more advanced Hindu students as is being done at present.

I think, therefore, that the whole question may be seriously considered in the interests of the vernacular education on the whole.

The Honourable Sardar DULABAWA RAISINGJI, Thakor of Kerwada:—Your Excellency, I rise to support the resolution. I also congratulate my honourable friend, Mr. EBRAHIM JAFFER, for having taken this opportunity of moving an amendment, in doing which he has done a great service to the Mahomedan community, and I am sure my honourable friend, Mr. PATEL, will have no objection to accepting this amendment.

This, your Excellency, is a matter of great urgency in view of the fact that we have empowered the municipalities to make primary education compulsory and free. Your Excellency's Government have accepted the Honourable Mr. PATEL'S bill and therefore the need for Mahomedan teachers is still greater. There has always been a very great need for Mahomedan trained teachers and if the amendment proposed by my honourable friend, Mr. EBRAHIM, is accepted, I venture to submit that it will be a move in the right direction.

The Honourable Mr. CHUNILAL VIJBHUKHANDAS MEHTA:—Your Excellency, I am speaking now on the amendment moved by my honourable friend, Mr. EBRAHIM HAROON JAFFER.

The amendment that I moved left room for all considerations to be met, and no doubt when the department considers in what localities new training colleges should be started, they could give adequate attention to the question of attaching either special Urdu classes or starting special Urdu training colleges at suitable centeres.

So far as Bombay is concerned we have started there three special classes—one for Gujarati male teachers, one for Urdu male teachers and one for Urdu female teachers. Out of the three classes we have started for training teachers so that they may be able to appear at the existing training colleges, we have started two classes for Urdu teachers, and I have no objection whatever, if more Urdu men are available who have passed the vernacular final examination, that they should be admitted and that proper accommodation should be provided for them either in the mofussil or in Bombay, if a college comes to be started in Bombay after due inquiry has been made by the department. I, therefore, think, sir, that nothing will be gained by merely having one training college in Bombay city. I am not perfectly clear about the amendment which my honourable friend, Mr. JAFFER, has moved. I understand him to ask for a special training college in Bombay and in addition a special Urdu training college. In my amendment I have asked for more training colleges at suitable centres, and one of them, if necessary, might be a Urdu training college.

TRAINING COLLEGE IN BOMBAY CITY.

[27TH JULY 1917.] [Mr. Chunilal Vijbhukhandas Mehta; Sir Mahadev Bhaskar Chaubal.]

With regard to the remarks of my honourable friend, Mr. PRATT, I do not think he was quite fair. I yesterday distinctly stated that I do not wish to gain any credit by comparison with the mofussil municipalities. I am afraid I did not make quite clear to the Honourable Mr. PRATT the real nature of the rise in the percentage of trained teachers, inasmuch as in 1911 there were 566 teachers out of whom only 204 were trained, in 1916 there were 924 teachers out of whom 409 were trained; so that the percentage reflects not only a rise in stationary figures but a rise in spite of the substantial increase from 566 to 924 Our ambition is not, as the Honourable Mr. PRATT says, to limit trained teachers to 88 per cent., but we are striving at 100 per cent., and we hope we will be able to get that number.

The Honourable Sir MAHADEV BHASKAR CHAUBAL:—Your Excellency, I think it will perhaps clear the situation if I rise at this stage and state that Government have no hesitation in accepting the amendment moved by the Honourable Mr. CHUNILAL MEHTA which runs to the effect that—

"This Council recommends that His Excellency the Governor in Council may be pleased to take steps to increase the accommodation in the existing colleges wherever possible and to have more training colleges for primary school teachers and mistresses established at suitable centres."

In accepting this resolution, however, the Council will permit me to make a statement. There are two propositions which are not disputed by anybody in this Council or by any member of Government. One is that we sadly want more trained teachers for primary schools, as also for secondary schools, though the resolution is not directly concerned with the latter. The second is that, under the present financial circumstances, and such circumstances as one can anticipate in the immediate future, it is impossible to expect to start with any idea of supplying the whole need within a year or two. For that, as explained by the Honourable the Director of Public Instruction, on the rough calculation he has made, you would have to supply trained teachers at the rate of 900 or 1,000 teachers a year. Well, that is impossible. But I can explain to the Council what we are engaged in doing at present. I think I mentioned on the last occasion, when this question was raised, what that was. Seeing, as the Government of India do, that complete satisfaction on this point is not possible under the present financial circumstances, what they have asked us to do is this. They say:—"In view of the fact that for several years to come there can be no expectation of a grant of money from the imperial Government for this class of expenditure, it is recognized that any standard which may now be adopted must necessarily fall far short of the standard which can be prescribed if suitable funds were available; but at the same time it appears to the Government of India that it would be useful for the several local governments to have before them some standard in dealing with this question and, as at present advised, they are of opinion that the lowest result which should be aimed at by local governments is that the number of teachers, male and female, to be trained in each year for Indian schools should not be less than the number of new teachers whom it is necessary to provide during the year in order to take the place of teachers who have died, or resigned or retired, or in order to meet the demands caused by the extension of education." Any funds that may be required for this purpose the Government of India feel that they will be in a position to give, with such assistance as the provincial revenues will be able to make. And this is what we are engaged on at present. We are trying to find out what would be the total output required, taking into calculation the deaths, resignations or retirements and the additional provision that will have to be made on account of the increase in the number of primary schools. Having ascertained this, under the instructions of the Government of India it would be the duty of this Government, if not to do more (which it would be very willing and glad to do) at least to supply that number of trained teachers and mistresses each year. Now, coming to the relevancy of this to the resolution which has been moved, the first thing to consider, is to what extent we can avail ourselves of the existing institutions in supplying this minimum want, if necessary and where possible by enlarging the scope of these institutions. Then if it is found that we cannot get the minimum number from the existing institutions, we have then to consider what number of additional colleges would be necessary, and the suitable centres at which to start them: to see what funds we have for the purpose and to ask the Government of India to give us the promised assistance as to the balance. As this is what we are engaged in, I stated at the outset that I have no hesitation in accepting the resolution which only recommends to Government action in the direction in which Government is actually working at present.

TRAINING COLLEGE IN BOMBAY CITY.

[Sir Mahadev Bhaskar Chaubal.] [27TH JULY 1917.]

The question as regards the original proposition of establishing a training college in Bombay is slightly complicated on account of the peculiar position of the Bombay primary schools, which is a question mainly between the municipality and Government. As explained by the Honourable Mr. CHUNILAL MEHTA yesterday, the last arrangement to which the Bombay municipality consented was that we were to turn out for them in the existing institutions outside Bombay a certain number of trained teachers every year. That we are doing, and if the Bombay municipality wants more and gives more stipends, if we find that we have accommodation for larger numbers in these institutions, then we will consider how many more we can take from Bombay and what additional stipends the Bombay municipality is prepared to give. I ask the mover of the original proposition to take this into consideration: so far as primary education goes, I do not see any particular advantage in locating a training college for primary schools in Bombay, because the education in the primary schools in the first three or four standards is practically the same whether you are dealing with a primary school in Bombay or in the mofussil. It is not as if a person, who is trained as a teacher in the Ahmedabad or Poona or Dhulia training colleges, is not able to teach in a primary school in Bombay or elsewhere. But, on the other hand, the fact remains, as explained by the Honourable Mr. MEHTA yesterday, that in order to keep the men in Bombay and to train them in Bombay a very large amount of expenditure will have to be incurred unnecessarily. Larger stipends will have to be paid and there is the great difficulty about buildings, to which reference has already been made. Therefore, while, on the one hand there is no particular advantage to be gained by having a college in Bombay, on the other hand there is the certainty of increased cost. Again, supposing a training college were started in Bombay, is it to supply the wants of mofussil schools as well as Bombay primary schools? And, if both, the question of how to distribute and adjust the expenditure between the municipality and Government would introduce a further complication. Instead of doing that if we can find that with less expenditure the same object can be attained by starting a training college elsewhere, Government will take steps to do that. I myself feel that the utmost output we can get from the existing institutions will hardly be enough to satisfy the minimum which the Government of India prescribe and there are already suggestions which Government will have to consider very shortly as to the location of a fresh training college or colleges outside the city of Bombay.

There is only one more point that I need mention, namely, that I do not wish to complicate the present resolution, as moved by the Honourable Mr MEHTA, by any consideration as regards separate and exclusive Urdu training colleges. Upon that question I am not, unfortunately, able to make any pronouncement at the present moment. I think the pronouncement may be expected soon, when

Government publish their decision upon the recommendations which have been made by the Mahomedan education committee and the conclusions that Government have come to on those recommendations. I think they will probably be very shortly published, but until that is done I do not think I am in a position to make any pronouncement about separate Urdu training colleges, to which the honourable mover of the second amendment has made a reference.

With these remarks, I think all further discussion may perhaps be cut short if I state that Government are at present actually engaged on carrying out what this resolution recommends Government to do.

The Honourable Mr. PATEL:—Am I to understand that Government have already decided not to start any training college in Bombay?

The Honourable Sir MAHADEV CHAUBAL:—I cannot say that they have decided not to do so, but I think I am fairly correct in stating that the conclusion to which they have arrived at present is, that the starting of a college in Bombay for the purpose that you want is rather inconvenient and that, if that is to be done, the want would be better satisfied by starting a training college elsewhere.

The Honourable Dewan Bahadur KASHINATH RAMCHANDRA GODBOLE:—Your Excellency,—There is only one remark that I want to make and that is that in the course of the discussion it has been stated that the municipality of Bombay is making use of our training colleges and school at Ahmedabad, Poona and Dhulia for the training of their teachers. I wish that the finance department should see that the Bombay Municipality pay proportionately towards the cost of the maintenance of these three institutions in consideration of the use that they make of them.

The Honourable Mr. VITHALBHAI JHAVERBHAI PATEL:—Your Excellency,—I may say at once in rising to reply that I am quite prepared to accept the amendment of my honourable friend Mr. CHUNILAL MEHTA, but in doing so I should like to make one or two observations. My honourable friend, Mr. COVERNTON, told us that the grant by the Government of India was not at all intended for the purpose of improving the training of teachers.

The Honourable Mr. COVERNTON:—I said that it was not intended for establishing training colleges as such.

The Honourable Mr. PATEL:—But I understand that that grant is intended for the purpose of improving the training of teachers. If that is so, how are we going to improve the training of teachers without opening new colleges?

The Honourable Sir MAHADEV CHAUBAL:—That grant is for the purpose of adequately paying and training teachers, so that what the Director of Public Instruction stated was that the grant was not wholly for the purpose for which you want it to be allocated.

The Honourable Mr. PATEL:—I am glad to know that Government have not committed themselves to any view as to the question of location of the new college. My honourable friend Mr. MEHTA'S amendment also does not commit Government to open a college in any particular place—it may be in Bombay or in the mofussil—, but I was certainly surprised to hear, your Excellency, from Sir MAHADEV CHAUBAL that there was no particular advantage in having a training college in Bombay. Until 1910 this Government was of opinion that a college in Bombay was a necessity. They had appointed a committee on which such distinguished men as Dr. Selby, Sir Pherozeshah Mehta and Sir Narayan Chandavarkar were members and that committee had recommended unanimously that a college in Bombay should be opened. Government had then accepted their view and projected a scheme. That was the position in 1910. I do not know on what authority Sir MAHADEV CHAUBAL says that there is no particular advantage in having a training college in Bombay. Anyhow, as the resolution as amended by my honourable friend, Mr. MEHTA, leaves the question of location open I accept the amendment.

The amendment moved by the Honourable Mr. EBRAHIM HAROON JAFFER was then put to the vote and lost, with fourteen members voting for and twenty-eight against it.

The resolution as amended by the Honourable Mr. CHUNILAL MEHTA was then put to the vote and carried.

The Honourable Mr. VITHALBHAI JHAVERBHAI PATEL:—Your Excellency,—Will you please permit me to move resolution No. 18? I want priority to be given to this resolution.

The Honourable Mr. PARANJPYE:—Is there any particular reason for that?

His Excellency the PRESIDENT:—I am inclined to think that after the various discussions in the Council resolution No. 18 is one of the most important matters among the resolutions and as I have authority under rule 9 to give priority to any resolution and think that this is the most important one before us, and, in any circumstances, as honourable members have various engagements within the next two days, I think it would be better to have resolution No. 18 before us and have it discussed.

The Honourable Mr. PATEL:—As your Excellency remarked just now, this resolution is the most important one on the agenda before the Council. Matters connected with this resolution have been discussed at the budget meeting every year and I have now first thought it proper to bring them in the form of a resolution before the Council.

Your Excellency, I now have the honour to move the following resolution:—

"This Council recommends that an enquiry be made by the appointment of a Committee or otherwise into the working of the Police Department since its reorganization and report on the propriety and necessity of the existing establishment and of redistribution of areas."

My lord, a commission to make inquiries into the state of the Police and to submit recommendations was appointed in the year 1902 by Lord Curzon's Government. That commission recorded evidence from every British province throughout India and submitted its recommendations. The reforms contained in those recommendations were recommended to local Governments by the Government of India in 1905. Since then each local Government has been at work in introducing the reforms recommended for its province.

The Bombay Government began to give effect to these reforms in or about the year 1908. Since then we are having, year after year, proposals from the officers in charge of districts, the Inspector General of Police and the Police Commissioner of Bombay. We find that Government are too ready to meet these proposals. This extraordinary treatment is no doubt good. But the question is whether Government shall go on expending money on the lines now pursued without further investigation, simply for one reason that the reorganization scheme has not had a fair trial: or whether if, after eight or nine years' experience, it is not found that the whole thing has progressed satisfactorily, Government would not begin to reinvestigate and set right the several joints so that the subsequent organized body may be complete in itself and as satisfactory as possible. If Government is of opinion that the ideal has been well settled upon and it must be carried through without a halt—if that is the view—, there are circumstances in this case which I propose to put forward to enable Government to come to a conclusion that such opinion is not entitled to any respect. It is proved that the working of the scheme for the past eight or nine years has failed to give satisfaction; it will be for your Excellency's Government to say whether an investigation should not be made before we decide to go on increasing our expenditure and increasing establishment. One thing, my lord, is certain that in spite of the reorganization scheme it has not been felt in the interior part of the Presidency or by people generally that we have had very good results in the working of the police administration. Here I am supported not only by non-official but also by official opinion. During the budget debate of 1915 the Honourable the CHIEF OF KURUNDWAD quoted facts and figures to show that the expenditure on police had during the last 10 years doubled itself. The Honourable Mr. KAMAT, referring to the work of the police in the Town of Bombay, pointed out that from the annual report of the police for the year 1913 the percentage of true cases of all classes which remained undetected rose from 5·96 to 8·32 over previous years, that out of 24 cases of murder 9 remained undetected and the percentage of recovery of stolen property fell from 39·52 to 33·72. He further pointed out that the efficiency of the district police was not at all encouraging and cited the opinions of the district superintendents of police of Nasik and Poona. The Honourable Mr. PAREKH emphatically stated that judging by results the efficiency of the police had decreased rather than increased and urged Government to stop at that stage and institute investigation The Honourable Rao Bahadur SATHE pointed out that there were some police stations in the districts of Ahmednagar, East Khandesh and Bijapur where registration of cognizable crimes had not exceeded 12 during the whole year and urged Government to inquire whether the increased number of police stations was really required and, if necessary, to readjust existing stations. The Honourable Mr. UPASANI laid stress on this point and submitted that in days gone by we had only one chief constable for a taluka and one or two inspectors for the district. Now we have a number of sub-inspectors in each taluka and inspectors in every district. He pointed out how inadequate was the provision for village police and urged upon Government the desirability of postponing the further prosecution of the police reorganization scheme. The Honourable Mr. BELVI has been repeatedly protesting against the top-heavy character of the police department and once more raised his voice in support of the honourable members who had urged an inquiry.

So far with regard to non-official opinion. I find even the official opinion that is recorded in the course of administrative reports points out that the results of the reorganization scheme are far from satisfactory.

The Honourable Mr. LAWRENCE in his last divisional police report says:—"It must be recognized that the cost of the police force has increased enormously under the police reorganization scheme, and it is time to scrutinize that scheme once more and to ascertain whether some of the urgent reforms cannot be financed by removing superfluity in other directions."

The Honourable Mr. PRATT in his report says:—"No district magistrate who has served in any of the criminal districts of Sind, can fail to be struck by the contrast with some of the Gujarat talukas where a touring officer will, from beginning to end of his tour, find nothing in any village he visits of crime or criminals. There seems to be some reason for believing that it may be possible to get a considerable increase of efficiency without any extra cost, by readjusting in the light of our subsequent experience the distribution settled at the time of the last reorganization."

ENQUIRY INTO THE WORKING OF THE POLICE DEPARTMENT.

[27TH JULY 1917.] [Mr. Vithalbhai Jhaverbhai Patel; Rao Bahadur Ganesh Krishna Sathe.]

Here, my lord, I am tempted to quote one line from the report of the district superintendent of police, Surat, Mr. Greenaway. He says: "There is little crime, little real work, many police stations and outposts being in my humble opinion mere loafs (or baithna ki jagas), while in my opinion both the city and Rander are over-policed as well"

I do not want to dilate upon figures in support of my resolution. It is enough for me to point out that the total number of cognizable offences has not, in spite of this huge expenditure and wholesale reorganization, decreased. The number of such cases in 1904, 1905, 1906, 1907 and 1908 was 32,921, 34,084, 33,022, 29,617 and 33,648, respectively. In the years 1911 and 1915 it was 35,721 and 34,447, respectively.

Under these circumstances I submit that undue importance should not be attached to the report of the police commission framed so long back as 1905 and based, as it was, upon generalizations regarding the whole of India. The recommendations contained therein have been, in actual working, found to be defective and the time has come when Government should institute an inquiry through a committee into the working of the police department since its reorganization. With these words I commend this resolution to the acceptance of this Council.

The Honourable Rao Bahadur GANESH KRISHNA SATHE:—Your Excellency,—In the budget discussion of 1915, as my honourable friend, Mr. PATEL, has quoted from the remarks I then made, my point was to impress upon your Excellency's Government that the expenditure which is being made on the police department is far in excess of the requirements. To-day I wish to show, by citing a few figures, how much we have advanced and how many more officers we have engaged in the several districts during the last six years. The district from which I come—Sholapur—had only nine sub-inspectors before the reorganization scheme was introduced. That number of nine was increased to twenty-two in the year 1911 and it was thirty-three in 1916. I take Sholapur first, because it is one of the smallest districts of the Presidency in this division. Taking Satara I find that there were thirty-one in 1911 and forty in 1916; in Poona thirty-two in 1911 and forty-six in 1916; in Nasik thirty-six in 1911 and forty-four in 1916; in West Khandesh twenty-six in 1911 and thirty-two in 1916, and in Ahmednagar twenty-nine in 1911 and forty-two in 1916. So after having given these figures let us enquire into the question whether these officers were really necessary and were useful, either in detecting more crimes or for giving greater protection of property and life to the people of their respective districts. I will not trouble this Council by giving quotations from several of the divisional commissioners' reports, but it is a fact which may be taken as not requiring any proof that the police have not shown any greater efficiency in the discharge of their duties because their number is increased. If we look to the duties of these officers, they are mainly two—protection of life and property and detection of crime—and the divisional commissioners' reports on the police administration do not disclose that there is any greater efficiency shewn in that direction by the police. Sir, we are increasing the cost of this department, when such increase is unnecessary and, in the interest of other departments which are being starved, it is really necessary that your Excellency's Government should undertake an enquiry into this question.

I do not wish to detain this Council by any further remarks except by stating that I strongly support the resolution moved by my honourable friend, Mr. PATEL.

ENQUIRY INTO THE WORKING OF THE POLICE DEPARTMENT.

[Mr. Balkrishna Sitaram Kamat.] [27TH JULY 1917.]

The Honourable Mr. BALKRISHNA SITARAM KAMAT :—Your Excellency,—In supporting the resolution of my honourable friend, Mr. PATEL, I wish in the first place to observe that, as I remarked the other day, non-official members are at a disadvantage in criticising the police department because they can speak only from the statistics and blue books supplied to them, and not from a first-hand knowledge or information of the department and its working. However, it is not their fault. Secondly, I wish to observe and respectfully urge that if non-official members press upon the attention of Government that there is necessity to undertake a particular enquiry regarding a particular department it should not be taken as implying that they mean that Government are not alive to their responsibilities. It does not mean anything of that sort at all. It only means that from the point of view of non-officials what Government may perhaps think to be the irreducible minimum of expenditure in a particular department may not be the irreducible minimum, but it may be further capable of reduction. Thirdly, I should like to observe that when we are asking for an enquiry of such a nature into the whole working of the police department, figures should be taken for the last eight or ten years and no statistics of a particular budget year, for instance this year, should only be taken into consideration.

With these preliminary remarks, I should like to add a few observations to what has fallen from my honourable friends, Messrs. PATEL and SATHE. They have quoted official and non-official opinion and they have quoted figures that I gave on former occasions. I should like to trouble this Council with a few more figures and I trust that both your Excellency and this Council will bear with me if I trouble them with statistics. I shall take the city of Bombay first and I shall take the year before the war, 1913, and compare it with 1915, the latest figures which are available. Now the total strength of the Bombay city police in 1913 was roughly 2,832; during 1915 the total strength of the Bombay city police was 2,998 or 3,000—an increase of nearly 200. I take two things as a standard, namely, recoveries of stolen property and the detection of crime. Now although there has been an increase in the strength of the police force during the last two years, although we are in the midst of the war, I find there is no appreciable increase in the detection of crime or recovery of stolen property. I have compared a few figures both before the war and during the war, and I find that so far as the percentage of recovery of stolen property is concerned, it is something like this; in 1910 it was 52 per cent., in 1911 48·7 per cent., in 1912 39 per cent., in 1913 33 per cent., in 1914 37 per cent. and in 1915 36 per cent. That is to say, commencing from 52 per cent. in 1910 we come down in the year 1915 to 36 per cent.—a descending scale, although we are, so far as the expenditure is concerned, in the ascending scale.

In 1913 we had something like 128 policemen to the square mile in the city of Bombay; in 1915 we were having 139 per square mile, and yet the detection of crime works out like this: in 1913 it was 8·32, in 1915 it was only 7 per cent.; so that the detection of crime is not increasing, it is rather going less and less, although there has been an increase both in numbers as well as in expenditure.

I now wish to trouble the Council regarding the executive police of the districts. The same has been the case to my mind in the mofussil, perhaps. I made out the point the other day that although we are in the midst of the war, the police department is the only department which knows no retrenchment—I should like to reiterate that point once again. In 1913 we had a strength of police as follows:—one inspector-general, five deputy inspectors-general, something like forty-two superintendents, twenty-seven assistant superintendents and so on. The total strength of the mofussil police was 24,000 in 1913 and in 1915 that strength has been increased to something like 28,000, and yet we are told that there has been a reduction in the expenditure on the police. Now I do admit that certain items which were probably intended under the reorganization scheme, namely, Rs. 50,000 in 1916 and some other item under that scheme, have not been expended. But the fact remains that the total expenditure has been going on increasing from year to year, although we are told that a good deal of retrenchment is the rule in very many departments.

There is one more fact which I wish to bring to the notice of this Council. It is a comparatively minor one. The reorganization scheme, as we have been told by the Honourable Rao Bahadur SATHE and the Honourable Mr. PATEL, was brought into force or recommended by the Police Commission for the whole of India. I therefore think it is pertinent to point out the total expenditure on the head of police in other Presidencies. I find that although the Madras Presidency is much larger than our Presidency, still the police expenditure in Madras is 116 lakhs of rupees as compared with 112 lakhs for the Presidency of Bombay. Now everybody knows the Presidency of Bombay is much smaller in point of population than Madras. I will also quote figures in regard to the police department of this Presidency as well as Bengal Presidency. Now in the first place I may tell the Council that the total expenditure in Bengal for the police department is much less than our own. It is something like 86 lakhs, whereas we are having here 1 crore and 12 lakhs, and comparing the strength of the police in Bengal with that in Bombay, I will quote a few figures which are rather significant to me. I find that the total number of superintendents, inspectors and sub inspectors there is much less than it is in this Presidency. Now I know the city of Bombay requires perhaps a larger number of policemen, owing to Bombay being the gate of India; but still making allowance for that fact it will be interesting to see how many superintendents we have in this Presidency and how many they have there. We have in Bombay 42 superintendents; in Bengal there are 45, although Bengal is twice as large as the Bombay Presidency. Here we have got something like 916 sub-inspectors of police; Bengal has got 1,610, not double the number. We have in Bombay 4,101 head constables, in Bengal Presidency only 2,300. In the Bombay Presidency the ordinary constables are 20,998; in Bengal 17,000. I believe the figures are significant in themselves. My point is that Bengal, which is a larger Presidency than ours, has a less number of police comparatively than Bombay.

I think these facts alone are sufficient to convey to the mind of any one that there is need for an enquiry as suggested by the Honourable Mr. PATEL. I do not wish to trouble this Council with further figures. I believe, however, that an enquiry of this nature is essential and I strongly support the motion of my honourable friend Mr. PATEL.

The Honourable Lieut.-Col. JAMES JACKSON:—Your Excellency,—I would like to speak on this matter entirely from knowledge based on the working of my own department.

Now, one of the first questions alluded to has been the over-policing of Bombay city. I am quite sure some of my honourable friends from Bombay would tell me and would tell the Council that Bombay is gravely under-policed. The other thing with regard to the police of Bombay, which I think my honourable friend, Mr. KAMAT, hardly recognises and which makes a very great difference, is that when you have got a criminal population whose friends live in the place, who are born in the place, and who are residents of the place, the recovering of stolen property is a comparatively easy thing. But when you have a criminal population, 90 per cent. of whom are from Gujarat, the Konkan, the Deccan, the Punjab, Calcutta, Lahore, and trans-frontier provinces, it is an extremely difficult thing to trace out the threads of a criminal's connection with other men and find out the stolen property. There is another thing about stolen property: an instance occurred the other day which shows the difficulty that the police sometimes have to experience. A prisoner who was captured by the police was taken to a jail and the head warder of the jail took him out on an extramural party; the prisoner showed him the stolen property and the head warder took it into his custody and removed it to his quarters. That shows one of the difficulties that the police have to face.

Figures, I think, are always very fallacious. We have heard them in large quantities from the Honourable Mr. SATHE, the Honourable Mr. PATEL and the Honourable Mr. KAMAT. But if the police are detecting less crime, why is it that the prison population is steadily going up? I cannot reconcile the two things.

But the point that I really got up to speak on is this. There is an enormous amount in the police budget that is improperly borne, as I consider, by that department. Now, if you take my own department, all the guards for a greater proportion of the jails are police. That is not a genuine police charge. I suppose that accounts for something like 50 or 60 head constables and something like 300 or 400 men scattered all over the Presidency and Sind. In the second place, people very often say "What an awful lot of police!" But they are not all of them on duty. You must have a reserve for the police. Take one question alone. One thing that the police do not do in any other country and they do here is this. If I want to transfer 1,000 prisoners from one district to another owing to administrative exigencies, whom do I call upon to assist me? I call upon the police and they have to furnish the necessary guard. There must be a reserve. I am constantly sending transports to Calcutta and prisoners from one jail to another owing to the economy or, as my honourable friend, Mr. MUNMOHANDAS, would say, the parsimony, that has led to the building of insufficient jails. All these charges for the fixed guards, the escorts bringing these prisoners backwards and forwards, etc., are charged to the police department. It should be charged to my department.

Then there is another thing. From a sincere desire to benefit the general population, for some years past—I should think it began about 1905 or 1907—a completely different procedure has been adopted about the release of certain prisoners. Heretofore a trans-frontier Pathan, a confirmed habitual from Madras, or a blackguard from Calcutta went out from, say, the Yeravda Jail to the Poona bazar to give further trouble and to harass the people. I have seen at a way side station in the Ahmednagar District several Pathans getting out of a carriage. I asked them where they were going and they told me that they were going to Calcutta. As a matter of fact they were paying a visit to a neighbouring village to recover their usury. All these men now are sent to the jail nearest their home and they no longer remain to persecute and bother the people of Bombay. What does that mean? A considerable increase in the police guards, and it is charged to police. But this is not really a police charge, but a charge that ought to go to Law and Justice, or to my own department. We also get a certain number of prisoners from regiments, mostly Pathans. They used to be discharged from the jail where they were incarcerated, and they joined the local population to give trouble. All these men are now sent out to their homes and a police guard has to go with them. I think I am underestimating when I say that there is considerably over a lakh of rupees that should be transferred from the police budget to my budget, and if you look into it you will find that there are many other departments in connection with which the Bombay police are doing duty which the police in no other civilised country do.

The Honourable Mr. HARCHANDRAI VISHINDAS:—Your Excellency,—I have no hesitation in according my hearty support to the resolution of the Honourable Mr. PATEL, but it is not necessarily for the reasons that have been suggested by the various speakers, but for reasons of my own.

I cannot pretend to have expert knowledge with regard to the police and the police affairs in various parts of the Presidency proper, but I do know something about the wants and requirements of the police in Sind and probably I have got a different tale to tell as regards the police in Sind from the tale that has been told about the other parts of the Presidency. All the same, my facts make as much for a thorough investigation and overhauling of the police department as the circumstances pointed out by the other speakers. Now, so far from our complaining of Sind being over-policed, as seems to be the trend of the complaints that have gone round this hall to-day, for a long time we have been bitterly complaining of the under-policing of Sind, and when some years ago I had an occasion to accompany a deputation of panchayats from various villages to the then Commissioner in Sind in regard to the havoc that dacoits were committing in Sind in those days, the then Commissioner very piteously pointed out to me that unfortunately for them the recommendations of the Police Commission for the reorganisation of the police had not been carried out and that he had been doing his level best to induce the Government to carry out those recommendations. Thank God, since then that defect has been almost adequately remedied. We have now a considerable strength added to the police and I do not think I shall be justified in talking in the same strain as about seven years ago, that we have not got the strength of police for Sind that is necessary for the requirements of the case. But there is one crying evil about the inadequacy of the police requirements which I think will appeal to every common-sense man, I mean, the ridiculously low pay of the subordinate police establishment. Now, when in this very Council the other day I appealed to His Excellency for improving the pay of the menial establishment of Government in Sind, you could very easily imagine the great necessity for the increase of pay of those men who are in receipt of the lower grades of pay. My pattawalas appeal to me to have their pay increased on account of the rise in the price of food-stuffs and we are obliged to increase their pay to Rs. 15 from Rs. 11 to Rs. 13. Would it not cause you a shock of surprise to hear that the constabulary of Sind do not get more than Rs. 10 to Rs. 13? There is a general cry that the police are unintelligent, illiterate, and therefore corrupt and unskilled in detection. Is it reasonable to expect all these qualities from a man who gets only Rs. 10 to Rs. 13? It is a crying and most shameful evil that has been existing for a very long time, and it has been commented upon in the press and elsewhere as far as my knowledge goes. Therefore, I am very glad to hear that representatives of other parts of this Presidency are quite prepared to discard a good deal of the money that is being spent upon their police. I am quite prepared to absorb a good deal of that. But all the same, as I have said, it makes for a thorough investigation and overhauling of the police organisation.

I do not mean to commit this Council to a thorough acceptance of the facts and figures that I have given. That is simply a kind of tentative remark in the manner as some honourable members have made remarks. But, that the police commission should have made their report in 1905, that such a long time should have elapsed and that some of the recommendations that have been carried out, as has been pointed out by several honourable members, have not been quite satisfactory—in most cases they have been rather in the way of extravagance than otherwise and in the case I have just now quoted they are not in the shape of adequate provision—these facts prove that a very strong case has been made out and the time has come for the overhauling of the whole question.

The Honourable Mr. F. G. PRATT:—Your Excellency,—Yesterday we had before us a resolution from my honourable friend Mr. PATEL in which he wished to pass under review the expenditure of every branch in the administration. That resolution practically would have amounted to a vote of censure on the administration at large. That resolution was lost yesterday, but my honourable friend Mr. PATEL, out of the 26 various heads under which the expenditure of this Presidency is carried on, has now singled out this one head of police, in order to introduce a resolution which practically amounts to a vote of censure on the administration of the police department.

Now, sir, I confess to a feeling of considerable surprise, after listening to the speech of the honourable member, to find how remarkably little—in fact, I may say, there is none at all—ground there is in justification of this vote of censure, which he brings forward against this department. He tells us that throughout the Presidency it is well-known—it is an open secret—officials and non-officials, he says, are agreed about this. Official and non-official opinion, he says, is unanimous in the statement that the results of the reorganization scheme are not at all satisfactory. He asks for an enquiry into the working of the police department. He brings into question the efficiency of the district police. Well, sir, I think that when statements of this kind are made, one would expect something more than statistics to be put forward in support of them. One would expect chapter and verse in the way of actual observation and experience of the real bad working of the police. One would expect to find that the crime in particular districts or particular talukas is out of hand, that the police are incompetent to perform the duties with which they are entrusted, that a public scandal of this sort exists in either the whole Presidency or any considerable portion thereof. Nothing of the kind has been stated. The one criticism or complaint which I find in the speech of the Honourable Mr. PATEL, is that there is not enough crime to keep the police fully employed.

Well, sir, this brings me to criticise the remarks which we have heard in this discussion from another point of view. Honourable members attacking this department have spoken sometimes as if the functions of the police were confined to the detection of crime and the recovery of stolen property, and we are given statistics of the drop in the percentage of the recoveries of stolen property as 48 to 46, as if that was a really serious indictment against the police department. We are told nothing about the very important duties which are connected with the prevention of crime. I would suggest to the consideration of the honourable gentleman that the absence of crime, that the small amount of crime registered and enquired into, is a matter of congratulation and may be taken to show that the police are getting a real grip upon the criminal classes and that their activities are resulting in the prevention of crime.

Dealing with the statistical criticisms, I would like to say, what most practical administrators are thoroughly well aware of, that there is nothing so fallacious as to criticise any results in a department purely from a statistical point of view, especially when, as is here admittedly the case, the criticisms are unsupported by any practical knowledge of the facts and are based upon arm chair study of blue books in libraries, without any practical knowledge or observation outside. Dealing with the statistical argument from this standpoint, I would like to put before the Council some figures which I have boiled down into as convenient a form as possible in order to give a bird's-eye view of the actual facts. We are told by the Honourable Mr. Patel that the expenditure doubled during the last ten years. That is one of the statements which we have listened to. What are the facts? I give in round figures the actual expenditure of the year 1906-07 and the actual expenditure for 1915-16. In 1906-07 the actual figures were 73 lakhs. In 1915-16 the actual figures were 105 lakhs. This is very far from a doubling of the expenditure. It is an increase from 73 to 105. A few details would be interesting as to the distribution of that increase. We have an increase of 32 lakhs. What is the distribution of that increase? Seven lakhs go to Bombay. That is purely a book entry. It represents the police charges which used to be incurred by the municipality of Bombay but which in the year 1909 were taken over by Government in the course of a contract, of the details of which members of this Council are aware. That accounts for 7 lakhs. In the course of these ten years there has been considerable extension of railways. Necessarily that means an extension of police duties. You must have more police to watch and guard the railway lines whom we are bound to pay. I think I am right in saying that three-tenths of this expenditure is borne by the railway company.

Coming to the most important item, that of the district executive police, the actual figures in 1906-07 were 47 lakhs and in 1915-16 70 lakhs. Again this is very far from a doubling of the expenditure. Well, sir, that increase is due to the bringing into force of the police reorganisation scheme. What was the principal item in that reorganisation? The heaviest item was the increase in the payment of the constabulary. I need add little—I do not think that I need add anything—to what the Honourable Mr. HARCHANDRAI said as to the urgent and imperative necessity of giving the constabulary a living wage. Even at the present moment, when honourable members are complaining that there is an increase of expenditure, there is one thing which is an open secret, which is universally admitted on every side, and that is, that the unfortunate police constable is not getting a living wage. They are paid from Rs. 10 to Rs. 12. A sepoy in an Indian regiment gets Rs. 11 and in addition free quarters, free rations, free fuel and uniform. Compare that with the pay of the unfortunate police sepoy. It is bad enough that school masters should be paid a starvation wage. The school masters are in charge of children. The police sepoy is in charge of the lives and liberties of his fellow-subjects. That he should be paid a miserable, inadequate wage and kept in a state of chronic discontent is a state of things which would justify an increase of expenditure much more than has been shown in the figures which I have just read out.

I would like now to go back a little to the reference which my honourable friend Mr. PATEL made to the reports which I personally made about the police establishments and the reconsideration of some of the details and the changes which were introduced in the police reorganisation. In the first place, I would like to dissociate myself most emphatically from the statement which is attributed to me that the results of the scheme are not at all satisfactory. What the Honourable Mr. PATEL asks for is apparently a reconsideration, casting into the melting pot again, all the principles laid down in the Police Commission report which came out 8 or 9 years ago and which forms the basis of the present organisation of the police. Against those main principles I think I am correct in saying that there is no official opinion which says that those principles are wrong and require amendment. What we have been asking for, what I understand the Honourable Mr. LAWRENCE is asking for, is a reconsideration, here and there, of the detailed working out of some of those main principles which he and I most fully accept. Practically it amounts to this. The Honourable Mr. PATEL is hammering at a door which is already open. We have been giving our best consideration and our best endeavours to the reduction of expenditure, so far as possible, wherever economies can be made, and a good deal has already been done in this connection. In pursuance of that I will give the Council an illustration. One of the main principles laid down by the Police Commission is that the employment of mounted police should only continue where very strong reasons can be made out in support of it. In past years in this Presidency we had mounted police; for various reasons it was found to be necessary. But things change as time goes on and that matter has recently been carefully taken into consideration and considerable savings have already been made, and further considerable savings are about to be made, by the reduction of mounted police which are considered to be unnecessary under present conditions in various districts—I do not say in every district and every part of the Presidency, but practically in all the districts of the Presidency proper at the present moment. Other reductions have been made including, I may say, a reduction which would meet the criticisms of the Honourable Rao Bahadur SATHE, a reduction in the number of sub-inspectors. All these matters have been fully and recently and carefully considered and action, as I say, has been taken and is about to be taken.

There is another point which I would like to refer to. It is to invite a comparison between the progress in the police expenditure and the progress of the expenditure of the Presidency as a whole. I submit for the consideration of the Council that if the police expenditure were to stand still at what it was ten years ago, that would be a dangerous condition of things. There would be stagnation, discontent and inefficiency in that department. The expenditure of the Presidency has increased in these last ten years from 477 lakhs to 788 lakhs. That very closely corresponds with the ratio of increase in the cost of the district police, which has increased from 47 lakhs to 70 lakhs.

I submit, therefore, for the consideration of this Council that this resolution asks for a general enquiry into the working of the police department, which there is nothing in the condition of that department that would justify. It asks for economies which are already under consideration, which have already been passed into effect, and therefore I would suggest that this resolution should be treated in the same way as the resolution of yesterday about the general increase in the expenditure of the Presidency.

The Honourable Mr. CHUNILAL VIJBHUKANDAS MEHTA:—Your Excellency,—I do not see from the resolution of the Honourable Mr. PATEL that he means to cast any reflection on the administration of the police or that he wishes to suggest that there should be a reduction or decrease only even if the committee should come to the conclusion that an increase in certain cases is necessary. No doubt he has used the words "to report upon the propriety and necessity of existing establishments and of redistribution of areas". The resolution might have been better worded, but I understand from him that it is his intention that the committee should make full enquiry and should be at full liberty to suggest increases for improvements wherever they are necessary. Then—I speak now on behalf of Bombay city—certain figures have been quoted as regards the increase in the police expenditure for Bombay city. Ever since the police charges were taken over by Government, the municipality and the public of Bombay have felt that sufficient attention and sufficient expenditure have not been bestowed upon the police department and that the city would be very much better for an increase in the number of policemen and also for an improvement in their status as well as their efficiency. Only a few weeks ago, honourable members must have noticed the many complaints that appeared in the vernacular and English papers about what I must call a sort of "terrorism" that prevailed in the suburban parts of the city; and it would be an exceedingly good thing if more police could be found for the Salsette area, so that people may feel safe in moving to the suburbs, by which means the congestion in the city might be reduced. There is no doubt that the public have often times expressed a fear that the police are not as efficient as they might be and that crimes do not get detected in the same proportion in the city as they used to be in the past. The reason may be that during the period of the war a great many irresponsible and dangerous people have entered the city and, as has been pointed out by the Honourable Lieut.-Col. JACKSON, the police have had their hands full in dealing with trans-frontier men. That no doubt explains in part the falling off in efficiency the public have noticed in Bombay city. I do not think therefore that the proposition of my honourable friend Mr. PATEL need be taken as suggesting that there should be a decrease only in the number of men.

The Honourable Mr. MUNMOHUNDASS RAMJI:—Your Excellency,—Speaking for Bombay, I support the view of my honourable friend Mr. CHUNILAL MEHTA. As things are in Bombay, we do want a considerable increase in the number of police for the adequate control of the city. It is observed by many people in Bombay that the actual number of policemen doing duty at certain places is not sufficient for the detection and prevention of crime.

Now, what is the state of affairs in Bombay? Of course the figures are sometimes misleading. Although there is an increase shown in Bombay by the reports, one has to take into consideration the extended area of Bombay during recent years. There is another thing also, viz., the vehicular traffic in Bombay. A number of motor-cars have to ply in Bombay as it is a business city. The vehicular traffic has, therefore, to be regulated and a large number of police is devoting its attention to that purpose.

Then again, as pointed out by my honourable friend Mr. MEHTA, a large number of people come to Bombay from different parts of India a greater number of whom come with the idea of sometimes committing thefts. We see that thefts are committed in Bombay to such an extent that supposing the tenants of a floor at a particular time are out, a theft is sure to be committed there.

The general experience is that Bombay, as a whole, is not sufficiently policed to cope with the extra work.

Then, there is another thing, while I am on this subject; I may point out that the policemen in Bombay are not adequately paid and are not adequately housed. If that is to be done, I think there ought to be an increase rather than decrease in the amount of expenditure. Of course, I cannot say anything about the organization of the district police, but as far as Bombay is concerned, and as regards the figures quoted for Bombay, I think Bombay requires a thorough reorganisation as regards the police.

The Honourable Mr. PHIROZE C. SETHNA:—Your Excellency,—As a representative from Bombay I should also like to add my voice in support of what has fallen from the Honourable Mr CHUNILAL MEHTA. I believe the Honourable Mr. KAMAT observed that the increase in the number of Bombay police was 125 or 150 in the space of the last six years. I ask the Honourable Mr. KAMAT if he considers that increase sufficient for a city of the importance of Bombay. I would only call attention to the Alexandra docks. The addition of the Alexandra docks alone necessitates an increase in the number of police larger than that quoted by the Honourable Mr. KAMAT.

The Honourable Mr. CHUNILAL MEHTA says that he has no objection to the resolution, because the committee, if appointed, will consider the question from all points of view and if its members come to the conclusion that an increase is necessary, they will ask for the same. I question if that is the idea underlying the resolution and if at all the suggestion put forward by my honourable friend Mr. HARCHANDRAI will be given effect to. The one point that suggests itself to me is this. Member after member has spoken against the increase in the police charges. Is there one member amongst those speakers who will volunteer to suggest to Government a reduction in the policing of the town or district from which he hails?

The Honourable Mr. LALUBHAI SAMALDAS MEHTA:—Your Excellency,—I support all that has fallen from the Honourable Mr. CHUNILAL MEHTA and the Honourable Mr. SETHNA. I want more police not for Bombay but for Salsette. In the answer to the question asked by the Honourable Mr. MUNMOHUNDASS RAMJI, whether Government will be pleased to state the number of policemen stationed in Santa Cruz, Ville Parle, Andheri, Goregaon, Malad, Kandivli and Borivli in the Salsette district, Government in their reply have said that it is not in the public interest to publish the exact numbers of the police at particular places, but a statement of the numbers posted in the localities referred to will be supplied privately to the honourable member by the Secretary to the Council on application. I take it, sir, that the number of police is so small that the member in charge of the department is afraid to make it public. I do not know whether public interests are served by keeping the information back, but even if this is so, I would much like to have more policemen in Salsette. The Honourable Mr. SATHE was good enough to say that there are in his district more sub-inspectors than are wanted. Well, I am prepared to take the additional staff that is there over for Salsette.

The Honourable Mr. H. S. LAWRENCE:—Your Excellency,—I find myself in agreement both with the desire of the Honourable Mr. PATEL for economy in the expenditure of the police department, and with the desire of the Honourable Mr. HARCHANDRAI that the pay of the Police in Sind should be improved; and

ENQUIRY INTO THE WORKING OF THE POLICE DEPARTMENT.

[Mr. H. S. Lawrence; Mr. Pandurang Anant Desai.] [27TH JULY 1917.]

I may tell the Council that for some considerable time now we have been making an enquiry and are half way through that enquiry, whether it is possible to combine these two objects. We are seeking to raise the pay of the lower ranks of the police and to meet the cost by reducing the number of the police. We cannot yet say whether we shall succeed in our object or not.

There have been for some time very great difficulties in securing the recruitment of men of the proper class in Sind. In former days objection was taken to any increase in the pay of those policemen whose recruitment might interfere with the recruitment for the Army. But we all know that within this year the terms of service in the Army have been very greatly improved; free rations and other privileges have been granted; and it is now possible to remove the embargo on an increase in the pay of the police force. In fact, last March the Honourable the Finance Member referred to the need for revising the terms of service of the police department throughout India; and some time later the newspapers reported His Excellency the Viceroy, when speaking in the Punjab, as supporting this suggestion.

I hope shortly to come to Your Excellency's Government with proposals for the improvement of the terms of service of the police in Sind. We shall do our best to effect this without any additional cost, but if additional cost is necessary we shall look to the sympathetic consideration of the Government.

The Honourable Mr. PANDURANG ANANT DESAI:—Your Excellency,—One of the official members said that this resolution is practically a vote of censure on Government as far as the police department is concerned. I submit that what is meant by this resolution is, not that a special committee should be appointed or must be appointed, but that an enquiry should be made. It may be made by Government through its own officers. My honourable friend Lt.-Col. JACKSON said that there is a decrease in the detection of crime, because there are difficulties in the way of the police. Nobody denies that there are difficulties. There are difficulties and therefore it is that policemen are appointed. If it were easy for the ordinary man to prevent crime, there would have been no necessity for police at all; but some of the non-official members have also joined the official members in saying that our talk in this Council is the talk of irresponsiblity. The Honourable Mr. PRATT says it is no use quoting statistics and drawing conclusions from those statistics. He asks, is there any honourable member who has got personal knowledge and who can say from personal experience and observation that the expenditure on this department is excessive. Here I stand before him and say that there is one place in my own district, Bijápur, Algur in Sindgi Táluka where there has been a sub-inspector newly appointed after this reorganization scheme came into force. In that place not more than 10 crimes take place every year. This fact was brought to the notice of Government in the year 1914 by the Honourable Ráo Bahádur SATHE. I ask Government what has been done in that respect up till now? Three years have elapsed, still there are only 10 crimes in the area, there is a sub-inspector, there is a head-constable and there are several constables. The total number of crimes is only 10. Now these 10 crimes require Rs. 1,500 per year and, as the Honourable Mr. PARANJPYE would say, each crime costs Rs. 150. Is that appointment necessary? My other honourable friends might be able to quote instances from their own knowledge, but I have quoted one instance and I should like to learn from the honourable member in charge of the department what he has to say to this? We say that to our knowledge there are certain posts which are unnecessary and we are asked if we can quote chapter and verse? We quote chapter and verse from your own blue-books. Now if we quote from them, it is said it is no use quoting from blue-books, as they are erroneous. I ask what can we honourable members do, if we have access only to blue-books and such other public records of Government; other records of Government are sealed to us? We quote only from those books and unless Government say that those figures are not correct, we are justified in quoting from them. Therefore, my submission, to your Excellency, is that from our own knowledge and observations we can say that there are certain places where police expenditure is excessive. Of course, we cannot say, not being in possession of all records of Government, with positiveness that the expenditure at a particular place is excessive; but as far as our own knowledge and observation goes, we say that in certain places there is police expenditure which has been carried to extremes. Under these circumstances I submit that the resolution is a modest one, because it does not say that a committee must be appointed but what it says is this:—"That an enquiry may be made by the appointment of a committee or otherwise into the working of the police department since its re-organization and report on the propriety and necessity of the existing establishment and of redistribution of areas".

From the remarks which were made by several honourable members there is a demand for more police in some palces. Therefore, I say that an enquiry is necessary, because in some places there is a demand for more police and in some places there is a demand that a reduction should be made. Under the circumstances I submit that the resolution should be passed and I strongly support the resolution.

The Honourable Mr. HARCHANDRAI VISHINDAS.—Under rule 16 at page 198 of the Council manual, I would request your Excellency to ask the honourable mover whether the purpose of his resolution is simply a decrease in expenditure or is it comprehensive enough to include increase also, because a doubt has been suggested by the Honourable Mr. SETHNA. I want to know whether it is merely a curtailment of expenditure or whether it implies an increase also?

His Excellency the PRESIDENT.—I do not think this is a matter for reference to the rules at all. If my honourable friend wants to ask a question, it is perfectly competent to him to do so.

The Honourable Mr. PATEL.—I do not mean necessarily increases. I mean increase where necessary or decrease where necessary. My resolution says "redistribution of areas".

Tho Honourable Mr. DATTATRAYA VENKATESH BELVI.—Your Excellency,—I rise to support the resolution of my honourable friend, Mr. PATEL, in a few words. But before I address myself to a consideration of the resolution before this house, I must say that I do take very seripus exception to the principle which was enunciated by my honourable friend, Mr. PRATT, that whenever an enquiry is demanded into the working of a department it is to be supposed that non-official members intend to impeach the good faith of that particular department, if not of the whole administation. That is a very dangerous doctrine to proceed upon. The position of non-official members of this Council is undoubtedly very delicate. Non-official members or, at any rate, those of them that sit upon the finance committee, have no right whatever to pry into the antecedent history of the details of a department, when examining the finances of the Presidency. They can only ask for an explanation of any addition which may be proposed in a particular year to a particular department. They cannot go behind the figures of the previous years. That is how we are stopped there. When we come into this open Council and ask that an enquiry should be made into the rising expenditure of a particular department, we are told that our sinister motive is to impeach the good faith of Government, at any rate, to impeach the honesty and the good faith of the particular department. That is a very dangerous doctrine indeed. It is indeed very wrong to attribute motives of the kind to non-official members. We ask for an enquiry into the working of the police department with the best of motives. It seems to us that the increase in the expenditure of the police of this Presidency is going up from year to year. To my knowledge I know that I have been protesting against the increase in the police expenditure from the year 1911. This is my seventh year in this Council and finding that my protests went for nothing for 6 years, I took no part whatever in the discussions of the budget to which we gave a decent burial the other day. What is the use of talking in this Council when we are met in such a spirit? When we make any remarks against any expenditure, we are told that we question the good faith of a department and the good faith of the Government itself. There is nothing that can be further from the truth.

The Honourable Mr. PRATT.—I said nothing of the sort.

The Honourable Mr. BELVI.—My honourable friend, Mr. PRATT, did say that this resolution amounted to a vote of censure on the police department. Nobody ever thought that the police department was to be censured. We did not mean to say that there are policemen who are wasting our money for nothing. All that we submit is that it is just possible to examine the working of the department, either through a committee or with the assistance of Government officers themselves, to see whether retrenchment is or is not possible. More than once I have contended in this Council that the police department was undoubtedly top heavy. In my view there are many more sub-inspectors, many more inspectors of police, than are absolutely necessary. I have pointed out to the Council more than once that in every táluka where there was in the past one sub-inspector, there are now 3, 4 or 5. Is it not open to us to see if such a large number of sub-inspectors is necessary for each táluka? Is there anything inherently wrong in such a demand for an enquiry? It is open to gentlemen of the position of the Honourable Mr. LAWRENCE and the Honourable Mr. PRATT to satisfy us non-official members from their experience that it is necessary in the interests of good government to maintain so many sub-inspectors, but until a regular enquiry is made and until non-official members are satisfied that it is necessary to maintain the police force at a such a heavy cost, it should be open to us to ask your Excellency's Government to hold an enquiry, and as my honourable friend, Mr. PATEL, has already told us, the object of this resolution is simply to see whether the present heavy expenditure is justified He is prepared to concede that in a particular locality like Bombay it may be necessary to increase the police force. At the same time it should be open to us to point out places where the numerical strength may be reduced without any detriment to the administration of the police department or to the adminisrration of justice. My friend, the Honourable Mr. HARCHANDRAI, has said that the rank and file of the police department, the constabulary, are paid a miserable pittance. That is a fact undoubtedly. Is it not open to us to say: "Reduce the number of sub-inspectors, abolish the posts of inspectors altogether, who in my opinion do absolutely nothing." They simply occupy comfortable berths without doing anything good either to the people or to the Government. That is the view of a layman. I may be wrong. What we have to say is: "Consider the view which we place before you and then come to your own conclusion." My view is that it is possible to reduce the number of sub-inspectors, to reduce, if not altogether abolish, many posts of police inspectors, and if we effect a saving by doing this, it is possible to add to the small salary of the rank and file of the police I know that poor police constables have to do a lot of hard work. They are not well paid. They are not given even a living wage. But we may effect in one branch some saving and pay these policemen something more to induce them to do their duty more zealously. At any rate it must be understood that it is not the intention of any non-official member here to pass a vote of censure either on the Government as a whole or on the police department. Ours is a bonâ fide request, for making an enquiry into the working of the department. If non-official members have got any status whatever here, it should be left open to them to place their views freely and frankly without any motives being attributed to them.

I do not wish to go into any figures, because this has been done sufficiently for the purposes of this Council by my honourable friends, Messrs. SATHE and KAMAT. After all, these figures have to be examined for what they are worth. They are supplied to us by Government itself, and it has been rightly pointed out to this Council by the Honourable Mr. DESAI that we have not got any other source of information than blue-books. We do our best with these blue-books.

ENQUIRY INTO THE WORKING OF THE POLICE DEPARTMENT.

[27TH JULY 1917.]

[Mr. Dattatraya Venkatesh Belvi; Rao Bahádur Tekchand Udhavdas; Mr. Shridhar Balkrishna Upasani; Mr. Patel; Mr. Upasani.]

With these few observations, I support the resolution of my honourable friend, Mr. PATEL.

The Honourable Ráo Bahádur TEKCHAND UDHAVDAS:—Your Excellency,—I rise to oppose the resolution moved by the Honourable Mr. PATEL. I do not see anything to justify at this stage the passing of the resolution requiring a commission or committee of enquiry to be held in this matter. Throughout the debate, your Excellency, nothing has been shown definitely or precisely as to what the defects are which the Honourable Mr. PATEL wants to have remedied by an enquiry, as to what really has been done that should be gone into or calls for a report or enquiry, and I quite agree with the suggestion made by the Honourable Mr. PRATT that the resolution sounds, as it were, that the police department were not working satisfactorily, and, if an enquiry were to be made, it would certainly amount to a vote of censure.

Another reason why I oppose the resolution is that I understand the divisional commissioners have been asked to make enquiries, that enquiries are being made and are half way through, and it would be most inopportune to pass a resolution asking for a committee now. For these reasons I strongly oppose the resolution and I think it will serve no purpose, more especially in view of the fact that an enquiry is being held departmentally by the divisional commissioners.

The Honourable Mr. SHRIDAR BALKRISHNA UPASANI:—Your Excellency,—It is indeed very unfortunate that any criticism coming from non-official members should not be taken in the spirit in which it is meant and that it should be considered as a vote of censure. Yesterday though on my own part I expressly stated that—

His Excellency the PRESIDENT:—I should like to make the position quite clear, because I was responsible for the original remark with regard to the vote of censure. My position is—and it is the Government's position too—that whenever an honourable member brings in a sort of omnibus resolution, asking for a committee to enquire into the whole of the administration of a particular department or, as the first resolution did, asking us to enquire into the general administration of the Government, I do consider it most distinctly a motion for a vote of censure on the Government. What I would urge on honourable members to consider is this, that if they want to move a resolution with regard to a particular department, let them move it in regard to any particular matter affecting that department. Now my honourable friend, Mr. BELVI, expressed the view very strongly that there are too many sub-inspectors in the districts. Why does he not move a resolution to that effect, that a large reduction could be made in the number of those sub-inspectors? Then we can get something concrete. As it is, what always happens is, we have a general discussion with no definite accusation and we do not get any further.

The Honourable Mr. PATEL:—Your Excellency's Government had got ample powers to rule a resolution out of order if it was considered a vote of censure. If your Excellency considered it was a vote of censure, you were perfectly entitled to rule my resolution out of order.

His Excellency the PRESIDENT:—I am sorry my honourable friend is inclined to take me to task for allowing the resolution to appear on the agenda and I would further say this, that I hope that as a result of my remarks such resolutions as these will not be sent up in future.

The Honourable Mr. UPASANI:—We are very thankful to your Excellency for having cleared the position to a certain extent, but let me assure your Excellency on our part that, so far as we are concerned, we do not mean any vote of censure and it may be taken that whenever such an enquiry is asked for, it is asked for in the best interests of the department and also of the public generally. As regards details, it will be difficult for us to bring in resolutions for every detail. However, it is a matter on which I need not dilate in supporting this resolution.

As regards this particular resolution, I think the remarks that have been made both by those who have spoken for and against it themselves prove the necessity for an enquiry. It is admitted that our expenditure has risen from 73 lakhs to 105 lakhs within a short period and nevertheless there are still places where the police force requires to be increased and there are places where the police force is considered to be excessive. That itself is one special reason for the enquiry.

Another thing is that while the expenditure has so far increased, nobody has noticed the miserable pittance that the police force in the inferior service is getting. As a matter of fact, we have to see whether the present increase in the number and pay of the superintendents and assistant superintendents is needed, or whether the same is needed in the lower grades of the police force. That is the first thing which requires to be enquired into. There are so many matters of detail to which enquiry should be directed.

Then my honourable friend, Mr. KAMAT, has pointed out that the area and population of our Presidency is less than that of Madras and of Bengal and yet we find that we are spending a good deal more than those provinces on our police department. I would like to know whether it is considered that the Bombay Presidency contains a larger element of criminal population than either Bengal or Madras. If that is not the case, is it quite fair that there should be larger expenditure on the police here; and is it satisfactory that in spite of that large expenditure we should not have proper distribution of the police force even in places close to the seat of our Government; if that is the position, should it be allowed to continue as it is, and is it not time for us to ask for an enquiry into this matter? I submit that this enquiry would show that the present condition of the rank and file is not satisfactory; that the higher posts are unduly increased and their pay is unduly too high. We only ask Government to satisfy the public that that is not the case.

With these words I support the resolution.

The Honourable Mr. BALKRISHNA SITARAM KAMAT:—Your Excellency,—May I give a personal explanation with regard to the figures that I have quoted? For the city of Bombay I never said that the number of police was too large or too small. What I pointed out was that although the number has been increased, there has been no corresponding increase in the detection of crime.

The Honourable Mr. G. S. CURTIS:—Your Excellency,—It gives me great personal satisfaction to have a chance of replying to the resolution which the honourable mover has brought before this Council, partly because, I think, the criticism levelled against the large expenditure which appears in the budget is at first sight a good deal justified and because personally, until I gained the knowledge that I have gained since my recent association with the department, I ranged myself entirely on the side of the economist.

But, sir, I think that if the whole question of police expenditure is carefully examined, it will be seen that the apparent increases in the expenditure are not really serious as might be imagined.

Now, sir, I will first deal with the matter on broad lines: the totals of expenditure under police, its relation to the total expenditure of the Presidency and the rise under it relatively to the rise under other heads.

In 1907-08 the total of the expenditure in the Provincial budget was 477 lakhs, that on police was 73 lakhs. I am not as good at decimals as my honourable friend, Mr. DESAI, who reeled them off at tremendous speed. But, sir, as far as I can make out, the percentage of expenditure was 15·3. In the current year, 1917-18, the total expenditure of the Presidency is 788 lakhs and the expenditure on the police is 112. Now according to my arithmetic the percentage is 14·2. But, sir, with reference to that total of 112 lakhs, I would ask this Council to bear in mind two things. First of all since 1907-08, the gross total of police expenditure in this Presidency has been largely swollen by a big transfer of something like 5 or 6 lakhs, representing charges previously borne by the municipality, under the arrangement come to in regard to the police charges bill in 1909. Therefore, we can legitimately reduce the total from 112 to 106. There is further an extra charge of one lakh provided in the current year's budget, due to the fact that two years ago the finance department largely cut down the provision for clothing and it has been found to be absolutely necessary to make a special grant this year, the last year of the quinquennium. So we reduce that total further to 105. There is also, sir, as the Council will have noticed, always a very large excess in the original estimate owing to the impossibility of budgeting very closely, having regard to the variation in recruiting, and it is more than possible that the revised estimate may come down, allowing for the 6 lakhs allotted to the Bombay Municipality to 101 lakhs. But, sir, I put it at 103 and if allowance is made for these reductions in the police expenditure of the current year, the percentage will be 13·2 as against 15·3 ten years ago.

Now, sir, whatever may be said against the re-organization scheme (and I myself have been a very severe critic), it must be admitted that the very large increase is more apparent than real; at any rate having regard to the general increase in the wealth and in the income of this Presidency, it is not nearly so high as it looks at first sight.

The Honourable Mr. KAMAT referred to the expenditure on sanitation and he contrasted the expenditure on sanitation with that on the police. I rather doubt whether the comparison is a fair one. It is a matter of custom in this particular country that the police charges fall wholly on the provincial revenues, and sanitation mainly on local rates. In my country both fall on the rates. It is a matter of convention. But if we look at the sanitation grant in 1908, we find that it was Rs. 3,45,000. In the current year it was Rs. 10,85,000, an increase of something like 314 per cent. Added to this sum of Rs. 10,85,000 there is also a considerable sum, the details of which I have not ready to hand, representing the cost of the sanitary engineer's establishment and others, well-boring, etc., which are shown under the head No. 45, public works. It is not too much to say, therefore, that as regards sanitation the expenditure has increased by 400 per cent. during the last 10 years. The other head of expenditure which might have been held to be starved is perhaps education. The grant for education in 1907-08 was Rs. 31,52,000; in the current year it is Rs. 85,89,000, an increase of 273 per cent. The grant for agriculture was Rs. 4,57,000. In the current year it is Rs. 15,71,000, an increase of over 300 per cent.

So that, sir, as regards these four branches of expenditure, the increase in the police cannot be said to be in any way excessive. As I say once more, the proportion between the police expenditure and the total expenditure of this Presidency with the major part of the re-organization scheme carried through, is not any greater than it was in the unreformed police department ten years ago. That, sir, is an important fact which I think we must bear in mind very carefully indeed.

Now, sir, I will go a little further into details. The expenditure on police may be put down roughly at something like about 106 lakhs, and we may assume in the year 1907-08 the estimate was 74 lakhs, that is, it has gone up to about 50 per cent. Well it would be convenient if we cut up this expenditure into its constituent parts. Roughly speaking the district executive police force, which represents the police as most of us know it, is responsible for only two-thirds. The remaining one-third consists of various special bodies of great importance and with regard to which there has been a considerable increase. This one-third can be considered first of all. This one-third consists of the Bombay city police, the railway police, what is called special police, consisting of the police in the three political agencies, the village police, also an important body, and the criminal investigation department. Out of this one-third, by far the most important is the Bombay city police. The Bombay city police figures give the impression at first sight that there has been a formidable rise. The estimate for 1907-08 was Rs. 4,14,000 and in the current year it is Rs. 13,29,000. But the most important fact to remember there is, that until July 1908, the Bombay municipality bore a very considerable share of the total expenditure on the Bombay city police. I think the reduction in the actual sum borne by the Bombay municipality in the accounts for 1906-07 is Rs. 4,76,000, in round figures Rs. 5,00,000. In the budget estimates for 1907-08, there is an amount of Rs. 6,47,000 as due from the Bombay municipality. That contribution was not eventually made. But there is no doubt that the increase which has occurred since the original estimates of 1907-08 were framed may be put down, as regards these 5 or 6 lakhs at least to the fact that the whole burden has been transferred from the Bombay municipality to Government. Therefore, the total net increase in the expenditure on the Bombay city police is something like approximately 4 lakhs.

But, sir, what I would desire to impress upon this Council is that having regard to the very large increase in the inhabited area in Bombay Island, the spread of industry, the expansion in the dock area, this particular increase that has taken place in the Bombay city is extremely moderate.

There is also one further point to which my honourable friend, Ráo Bahádur SATHE, has already referred, the automatic increase in the charges. I would invite particular attention to two instances of automatic increase in the budget of the current year. I would refer to the increase of Rs. 25,000 on account of rates and taxes levied by the Bombay Municipality. That is one instance and there is a second increase on account of the police at the Alexandra Dock. If you turn a year or two back, you will find a very large increase similarly for other docks' police. With the extension of a huge city like Bombay, with constant demand for the creation of new divisions and for the strengthening of the police force in the northern parts of the island, which is very necessary and which has been carried out as far as possible, it will be clear to this Council that the police charges must increase.

Then after the city police there is the railway police. I have details here of the various extensions of railways during the last 10 years, but I find it is somewhat difficult to distinguish which are in Native States and which in our own territory. These increases involve an automatic increase in the liabilities of Government. At the same time Government have certain liabilities wi h reference to chaukidars on these railways. The establishment of large institutions such as the big shunting yards at Bandra and Kalyan, and big works at Matunga, all these mean an increase in the liabilities of Government for extra police.

Finally, sir, I come to the three agencies. There the increase has been about a lakh of rupees. But that again is almost automatic, caused by the absolute necessity of providing a living wage for the police employed there.

Now, sir, I turn to the district police. The actual reorganization was not ours. It was the scheme of the Government of India, finally recommended and carried out after representative evidence had been heard all over India. The preliminary orders of the Government of India were given in 1905. Then there was an enormous amount of correspondence and final sanction was received from the Right Honourable Lord Crewe, the then Secretary of State for India, on the 27th November 1913, less than four years ago. Therefore, sir, the actual receipt of sanction to this scheme is a matter of very recent history. That scheme laid down certain principles. It laid down that the whole country should be divided into circles. A circle was to be in charge of an inspector who was to have from 5 to 8 stations under him; the stations were to cover a certain area, 150 square miles was the area suggested, and the stations were to be in charge of sub-inspectors who were to be recruited from the more educated classes of society as far as possible; the old custom of investigating offences with untrained and illiterate constables was to be discontinued, and a trained and an intelligent agency was to be used; efforts were to be made to put the organization of the department and the investigation of crime and supervision of bad characters in charge of a well paid, well educated and thoroughly dependable agency right through, who moreover should be in sufficient numbers to allow of officers taking leave when they require it.

Well, sir, the result of that scheme has undoubtedly been to give us a very much larger number of superior officers than existed under former arrangements.

At the same time steps have been taken to increase the pay of the lower ranks of the force from Rs. 8, 9 and 10 to Rs. 10, 11 and 12 and to make their lot easier in other ways. Now what the Honourable Mr. Kamat wishes to say is that the extra expenditure which has been voted to the district police, which amounts to something like Rs. 28 lakhs, is wholly unjustifiable. I venture to hope that the Council will not support this statement. It is quite clear that, first of all, as regards the lower ranks of the force the Honourable Dewan Bahadur GODBOLE'S statements, which he made yesterday, must be held to apply. The Honourable Dewan Bahadur Godbole stated that where a cooly demanded 3 annas before, he now demands 6 or even 8 annas. Well, sir, as far as as the lower ranks are concerned, they are, in many cases, drawn directly from the labouring classes and it is perfectly clear, if you are to get your men, you will have to pay more. But, sir, it also applies to the literate part of the force. Employers of labour are fully aware that where 10 years ago or 15 or 20 years ago, one could obtain tolerably good clerks on Rs. 15 with great ease and graduates for Rs. 30, we now have to revise our scale of salaries and place them on a higher standard altogether. Therefore, it is absolutely necessary, I say, to have this higher scale of salaries both for the higher ranks of the police as well as for head constables and constables.

But, sir, I understand from the terms of the resolution that the Honourable Mr. PATEL has asked us "to make an enquiry by the appointment of a committee or otherwise into the working of the police department since its re-organization and report on the propriety and necessity of the existing establishment and of redistribution of areas". It occurs to me, on looking through the correspondence of the past few months, that in my answer to the honourable gentleman's question I did rather less than justice to the Commissioners, and the Inspector-General of Police, in the steps they have taken during the last 18 months to ensure economy and as far as possible to improve the state of the police in the Presidency under the re-organization scheme The Honourable Mr. PATEL asked whether there has been an enquiry into the working of the re-organization scheme? As I disliked to pretend to have carried out enquiries which may seem far more ambitious or far-reaching than is actually the case, the answer to that question was given in the negative. But sir, it seems to me that on further study of the correspondence regarding the working of the re-organization scheme it might be held that we have been making some general enquiry and therefore, I think, it would be better if I tell the Council what exactly has been done during the last 18 months to secure economy in this department. Some 18 months ago when during the early days of this terrible war the question of the preparation of the police budget came before the finance department in which I was then employed under my honourable colleague's orders, we laid down that it was undesirable to sanction expenditure on new items outside our re-organization scheme which could not be provided for by the head of the department by an economy on existing charges. I may mention that the then Inspector-General was pressing for extra allowances, for hutting allowances and local allowances, in the case of the police employed in large centres like Ahmedabad and Sholapur and so forth. Well, sir, the Inspector-General, on receipt of these orders, took action to secure economy as far as possible and following on certain suggestions made in the re-organization scheme of the police department he effected very considerable economies, mainly in the mounted police and the criminal investigation department and I think in one or two odd ways. The economy secured in that way exceeded something like Rs. 1,15,000. The sum so saved by this economy has been devoted to providing policemen in Ahmedabad and elsewhere with hutting and local allowances on a very much larger scale than was possible before. Following the successful prosecution of one of the recommendations of the re-organization commission, further enquiries have since been made into the details of the arrangements which have been made in consequence of the adoption of the recommendations laid down by the commission. When I say that there has been an enquiry into the details, I must guard myself against saying that the actual frame-work of the police re-organization has been materially altered. It is possible that this may be done as the result of still further enquiries which are now in progress, but with the co-operation of the Commissioners and at the instance of the Inspector General of Police, to whom the acknowledgments of Government are due for his continual striving after economy, a great deal has been done in cutting down superfluous guards, in reducing the number of policemen employed in out of the way places and to ensure as far as possible that all policemen shall be employed on thoroughly useful work. Those enquiries are not yet complete. The question of various details, such as for instance the reduction of the mounted police, the removal of superfluous police wherever it is possible, will continue to receive the attention of the department and Government at the present moment have under consideration a number of recommendations from the Inspector General for the reduction of superfluous officers and superfluous stations, which will receive due consideration. If consistently with the principles laid down by the reorganization commission they should prove practicable, the economies thereby secured will be devoted, as far as possible, to raising the pay of the lower ranks of the police and strengthening the establishments in places where crime is prevalent and where the demand for a larger police force is insistent. Various speakers in the course of their remarks have referred to specific instances. The Honourable Mr. DESAI refers to a case where there are 10 crimes a year and he calculates that each of the crimes costs Rs. 150. Well, sir, I think, it was the Honourable Mr. PRATT who remarked that the detection of offenders after a crime is committed is only one of the functions of the police. After all, the prevention of offences is even more important and it is possible, at the station at this particular village, after it has been put under a vigilant sub-inspector, that crime has been reduced and possibly the criminality of the locality is not as great as it might have been. In any case, if any specific instances of that sort are brought to the notice of the local deputy inspector-general of police, the superintendent of police or the district magistrate, they will at all times receive attention. No one pretends that the scheme as introduced can be absolutely perfect, but, sir, details of this sort must always be liable to correction and can always be corrected by a stroke of the pen if necessary. If the public will bring matters to our notice no doubt action will be taken. On the other hand, it was the Honourable Mr. KAMAT who quoted the district magistrate of Poona, Mr. Hatch, as saying that there were three police stations in Sirur. It is possible that three police stations may be too many in Sirur, but if this was the case, it was open to the district magistrate to bring the matter to the notice of the Inspector-General of Police and I have not the slightest doubt the Commissioner would have supported him. It would be easy to reduce one station and possible to utilize the funds so set free for other improvements. On the other hand we have had gentlemen from the vicinity of Bombay, the Honourable Messrs. LALUBHAI and MUNMOHUNDAS RAMJI, complaining of the inadequacy of the police in Salsette. The Honourable Mr. LALUBHAI could not understand why we were so reticent about stating the number of police allotted to each station in Salsette. Well, the position of a police officer is rather like that of a commander of an army in the field, contending against an enemy which in this particular case is represented by the criminals. He moves his forces from place to place where he thinks an attack is likely and as far as possible he conceals from the enemy the exact places where the bulk of his forces is situated. I think the Honourable Mr. LALUBHAI will gather from that why we do not wish the criminals of Salsette to know exactly where the bulk of the force is at any time situated. But there is no possible objection to the Honourable Mr. MUNMOHUNDAS passing on to the Honourable Mr. LALUBHAI the details which, I think we have communicated to him. I think when he has seen them, he will agree with me that the establishment of police in Salsette cannot be said to be in any way inadequate. Now, if as might possibly happen, local officers reported that some stations such as the one at Sirur are not wanted, it would be possible to set free funds which would allow of the forces in Western Salsette being strengthened. The matter will be borne in mind and the Inspector General will be instructed to see what can be done.

There is one more suggestion of which my honourable colleague in charge of the finance department reminds me and which I think I must mention before closing; it has reference to the financial side of the case. The total excess in the district force comes to nearly something like Rs. 28 lákhs. I should mention that we have received from the Government of India a grant of Rs. 20 lákhs for police reorganisation and we are also receiving from the Government of India Rs. 1 lákh for Sind railway ploice and Rs. 48,000 for cantonment police, so that the actual extra cost to provincial revenue must be reduced to that extent. I think, sir, I have shown that so far the growth of police expenditure has not been in any way disproportionate. I have established the fact that the percentage of police expenditure to the total expenditure of the Presidency, at the present moment, allowing for the paper charge transferred from the Bombay municipality on the police charges bill, is considerably less than it was 10 years ago. I have also shown that the total increase, when spread over its constituent heads, is not in any way excessive and that the principal excess in the district police has been necessitated by the natural rise in the general rate of wages given both to skilled and unskilled labour. I have further shown that, as a result of the united efforts of the Inspector General and the Commissioners in the past year, we have already effected considerable economies and that without in any way going behind the main principles laid down by the Reorganisation Commission. The Inspector General is now laying before Government proposals for further economy. I may add on behalf of Government that if honourable members as a result of their personal experience find cases in which they consider that economy is possible, that Government or the Inspector General will be always pleased to receive suggestions and as far as possible consider whether they can put them into practice. But sir, the resolution asks for an enquiry "by the appointment of a committee or otherwise." I must acknowledge to considerable speculation as to what the meaning of the expression "or otherwise" is. The only possible method I know of is by ordinary enquiry by Government in the ordinary way of correspondence or by sending a peripatetic committee round the Presidency. Well, sir, as regards the appointment of a committee, as I say, we have had of late years, I think, somewhat of a surfeit of committees and I think we can take it that both official and non-official members have in their heart of hearts come to the conclusion that they would like a rest from committees for some considerable time. Therefore, sir, I think that if we discard the notion of a committee, then we are left to the alternative of "or otherwise" and if "or otherwise" merely means a reference by Government to local officers, if it merely means that local officers will as far as possible devote themselves to securing economy and that they are at the present moment engaged in securing then, sir, I hope this Council will consider that this resolution is unnecessary. There is however another alternative. I may put it in the form that Government are prepared to give an undertaking that they will lay on the table as soon as completed a memorandum showing exactly what has been done with regard to the question of existing establishments and their redistribution and I suggest to honourable members that it is possible that a resolution in this form might meet, perhaps, the whole case :—

"That this Council recommends that Government should lay on the table as soon as it is completed a memorandum of the inquiry which is being undertaken with regard to the question of existing police establishments and redistribution of areas."

With these words I would ask the Council to reject the resolution in its present form.

The Honourable Mr. VITHALBHAI JHAVERBHAI PATEL :—Your Excellency, I am very much obliged to your Excellency's Government for the exhaustive and lucid explanation of the position of Government on this important question. Your Excellency, year after year, we have been, at the budget debate, complaining bitterly about the ever-growing expenditure on police and Government should have come out with the necessary explanation long ago. I remember in 1912 when several honourable members in their budget speeches criticised the police expenditure, my honourable friend, Sir RICHARD LAMB, made a clear statement to the Council that it was absolutely impossible to go into the working of the police department, everything was all right and no inquiry or anything of the kind was necessary. That naturally put us out and year after year we repeated our complaint, until today when we have been able to induce Government to come out with their say in the matter. As regards one matter I would like to say a word. It is a matter of great regret to me personally that my resolution of yesterday and that of today were regarded as resolutions in the nature of a vote of censure on Government or the department concerned respectively. Let me assure your Excellency and Government that nothing is further from my mind than bringing any such proposal before the Council. I am fully convinced that the expenditure of this Presidency is top-heavy and unless a thorough inquiry is made into the whole question, we shall come to a serious deadlock in some matter some day. It is, therefore, that I have been pressing for an inquiry by these resolutions. Let me at once tell this Council that in the Madras Council resolutions of exactly the same nature were discussed and not even a suggestion was thrown out by any member of Government there that non-official members had any motive other than that of the best interests of good administration. With these words I accept the resolution as amended by the Honourable Mr. CURTIS.

His Excellency the PRESIDENT :—I am very much obliged to the Honourable Mr. PATEL for accepting the amended resolution. I do not think it is necessary, after the extremely lucid remarks of my honourable colleague who has given a full explanation of our position with regard to the police department, that I need detain the Council for more than one moment. I think probably the feeling among most honourable members after listening to the debate is one of sincere sympathy for the unfortunate member who is in charge of the police department. All who have listened to this debate will agree with me when I say that to certain members—shall I say the Honourable Mr. KAMAT—the words "police department" are rather like a red rag to a bull. On the other hand, there are other honourable members who assure us that it is absolutely necessary to spend a good deal more money in various ways on the police department. Well, as my honourable colleague suggested just now, you cannot have it both ways and he has got to try and satisfy the Honourable Mr. KAMAT and others who think that increased expenditure is not necessary. I think my honourable colleague has put the position very clearly and I would merely put the resolution to the vote and conclude by saying that I do assure honourable members that my honourable colleague in charge of the department is going very carefully—without, as he says, undoing the frame-work of the re-organization scheme—into the details, with a view to see whether any improvements can be made and any reductions or economy can be achieved in various ways; that we have the completest confidence in the Inspector General, whose keen interest in the subordinate ranks comes very clearly to my mind and who is doing the very best he possibly can, and that, I can assure honourable members, under not too easy circumstances.

The resolution as amended by the Honourable Mr. CURTIS was then put to the vote and carried.

His Excellency the PRESIDENT:—The Council will now adjourn for lunch till 10 minutes past 3 o'clock.

The Council then adjourned for lunch till 3-10 p. m.

After lunch.

His Excellency the PRESIDENT:—Order, order. Resolution No. 3. The Honourable Mr. PARANJPYE.

The Honourable Mr. PARANJPYE:—Your Excellency,—I beg to withdraw this resolution in view of the fact that Government and the University are thinking of abolishing the school final examination. I wished to introduce it up till now, but I do not wish to move it just now, and therefore I beg to withdraw it.

The resolution was by leave withdrawn.

His Excellency the PRESIDENT:—Resolution No. 4. The Honourable Dewán Bahádur GODBOLE.

The Honourable Dewán Bahádur KASHINATH RAMCHANDRA GODBOLE:—Your Excellency,—The resolution that I have to place before the Council reads thus:—

"This Council recommends that His Excellency the Governor in Council may be pleased to call upon the Revenue, Public Works, Forest and Irrigation Officers of Government to submit reports as regards existing and probable water power sites in the Bombay Presidency, giving their localities, extent, duration, capabilities, etc., and to publish these reports when received after reviews of them by the expert officers of Government, the reports being based on observations and upon records in Government files."

I think, sir, that the resolution that I have placed before the Council deals with a very important subject. The importance of the subject has been well brought out in the evidence that has been recorded before the Industries Commission of Sir Thomas Holland. In the sittings of the Commission at Bangalore in February last, they examined Professor Hay of the Indian Institute of Science.

Professor Hay's evidence contains the following statements:—

"The earliest possible utilisation of the available water power of the country was a matter of primary importance to future generations. Every new hydro-electric plant which came into existence had the effect of preventing an avoidable increase in the rate at which the fuel resources were being used up. It was no exaggeration to say that the water power of the country was one of its most valuable assets, and for that reason it seemed desirable that the state should devote to it that degree of attention which was warranted by a matter of the highest national importance. He would therefore suggest that a very complete survey be made of the available water power of India, and that in addition to determining the maximum amounts available, rough estimates should be prepared of the probable cost of development, and information of that kind should be given the widest publicity and should be placed freely at the disposal of intending manufacturers, who should be encouraged in every possible way to utilise hydro-electric power in preference to power derived from heat engines. He believed this matter to be of sufficient importance to warrant the establishment of a special hydro-electric power department."

WATER POWER SITES IN BOMBAY PRESIDENCY.

[Dewán Bahádur Kashinath Ramchandra Godbole.] [27TH JULY 1917.]

This extract will enable the Council to see how important the subject is.

I moved my first resolution on this subject in the March session of this Council in 1916. The resolution, on that occasion, was accepted by Government, and in response to it, they issued a press note. The press note contains information upon the three water power sites that are available in connection with the storage reservoirs that have been constructed by the Government of India in this Presidency,—I mean the storage reservoirs in connection with the Pravara, the Godavari and the Nira canals. In my opinion, sir, the collection and publishing of further information is necessary. I therefore sent a further resolution on the subject at the last March session of this Council, and in that resolution I asked that Government should appoint a special officer for the investigations of water power in this Presidency and should place the results of these investigations before the public. The Honourable Mr. CARMICHAEL, however, thought that I was making too large a demand on Government establishments. In the first place, he had no spare officers in the Public Works Department, and in the second place, he thought that it was not necessary that any detailed enquiries should be made in this matter of water power. I have, therefore, amended my resolution, made it more modest, and placed it before the Council in the shape in which it appears today. In this amended resolution, I simply ask that certain officers of Government should, from their personal knowledge and from the records that they have on their files, compile a memorandum of the water power that is already available or that can be made available in their districts. This request will not necessitate the appointment of any special officer, and will not require any extra expenditure for preparing the information that I ask for.

It will interest the Council to know that in this Presidency we have specially favourable features for the development of water power. In the first place, we have the Sahiyadri range, or the Western Ghats, with a rainfall varying from 100 to 400 inches in the year which seldom fails. In the second place, we have got a number of rivers that flow from this central Sahiyadri range and go eastwards and westwards to join the sea. In the third place, at the heads of these streams there are suitable sites for the construction of reservoirs which, on account of the rainfall in the Ghats, will easily fill. Fourthly, most of these rivers have, in in their courses, rocky rapids and rocky falls which are very favourable for the production of water power without the construction of any extra works; and lastly, after the use of the water for the production of water power, it can be run lower down and utilised in the irrigation of large tracts of country with great advantage and benefit to the rayat. These are the special features of this Presidency, and I think they ought to be made use of to the utmost possible extent.

This Council is probably aware of the two notable instances in which water power is being utilised in this Presidency at present. The first instance is that of the Tata Hydro-Electric works with which, I believe, every member of this Council is acquainted. The same enterprising firm that has constructed those works is going in for another scheme on similar lines, and that is the Andhra Valley scheme. The third instance of water power that I may draw the attention of the Council to is the Gokak falls in the Belgaum District, which have been utilised by an enterprising firm of Europeans in Bombay for running a spinning and weaving mill, with great profit to themselves and with great advantage to the community. In addition to these instances there are numerous places where water power is or can be made available in this Presidency. For instance, near Chandanpuri, the village of my honourable friend, Mr. GARUD, there is a waterfall of the Girna river which is being used for the production of power for running a grinding mill.

What I want, sir, is that water power, wherever it exists in this Presidency, should be harnessed for industrial purposes. From personal knowledge and from enquiries that I have been making, I find that there are several sites where water power could be generated. I will mention to this Council some of these places. In the Kanara district we have got four rivers running from Ghats to the sea. These are the Kalinadi, the Gangavali, the Tadri and the Shirawati. On each of these rivers there are rocky falls which vary in extent from 200 to 890 feet. Your Excellency has seen one of these falls, and that is the Gersappa fall on the Shirawati river with a drop of over 800 feet. On the Gangavali river we have got the Magod falls with a drop of 800 feet. In the case of the Tadri river we have the Lushington falls with drops which total up to nearly 300 feet. Coming to the Belgaum district, sir, we have got the Gokak falls to which I have already referred. Then at Manoli near Saundatti we have got the rapids and falls of the Malaprabha river which probably could be utilised for the production of water power. On the Markandi river near Pachhapur station and near Gokak, at the village of Benchinmardi, there is a drop in the river bed of 50 feet. There are two falls on the Wadarhatti branch of the Gokak canal. In the Ahmednagar district there is on the Adula river near Samsherpur a fall which I am told is about 150 feet in depth. Similarly there are the Randha falls of 200 feet depth on the Pravara river. In the Nasik district we have the Gangapur fall on the Godavari river with a drop of 32 feet. In the Khandesh district we have rocky rapids on the Tapti river, above and below the railway bridge near Bhusawal. In the Surat district there is the Deer-leap or the Haran fall on the Tapti river, where it emerges from Khandesh and goes into Gujarat. Then all tank outlets have varying water power available at them and so also have many of the larger bhandaras and weirs that have been constructed for irrigation purposes. In the case of some of these sites there are great possibilities of development and expansion. For instance, in the case of the Samsherpur fall a reservoir could be constructed across the river above the fall and the water of the reservoir could be utilised in the generation of perennial water power at the fall. The perennial power could be utilised for the weaving industry near Sangamner and Samsherpur and afterwards the water could be utilised for irrigation purposes lower down by the canals that have already been constructed. Probably, the Benchinmardi fall could be utilised in the same way. I have collected all this information from enquiries. Some of it is based on personal observation also. In addition to the instances given there must be a lot of other sites in the Presidency, and I want these sites to be catalogued and brought on a regular list. I am aware that in many of the instances given by me the water power at present available is for 4 months, 6 months, 8 months or 9 months only; but even for this short duration power we can find employment, because the Council is aware that there are many industrial enterprises in this Presidency which require power for short periods only. In this connection I might mention the many cotton presses, cotton ginning factories and oil presses in this Presidency. These generally work for 4 or 6 months in the year, and there is no reason why the limited power available should not be utilised by them with profit.

What I want Government to do is, that they should call upon their officers in the departments that I have indicated, namely, the Revenue, the Public Works, the Irrigation and the Forest Departments, to submit reports as regards the existing and the possible water power sites in their districts, stating approximately what the extent of the power is in each case, and how far the same could be developed. I want these reports to be prepared not by incurring any large special expenditure. They should be based principally on personal observations and on the records that the officers may have on their files.

Secondly, I want these reports to be scrutinised by the expert officers of Government so as to separate the chaff from what will be really useful information.

Thirdly, I want Government to publish these scrutinised reports. We will in this way secure a record of what water power sites we have in this Presidency, and what are likely to come into existence after expenditure on development. I do not want any large expenditure incurred in the detailed investigation of the sites. When a record like this is available, we will leave the industrialist that wants to make use of our sites to make all further enquiries for himself. He will frame his own estimates; he will find out what industries the power can be utilised for; he will find out what further development will be needed, and so on. All those details will be worked out by the industrialist for himself. The Government of this Presidency will simply prepare a directory containing the information that I have referred to. I think, sir, that as the landlord and administrator of this Presidency, it is a part of the duties of this Government to have a record of the possibilities of their estate. In the case of a private landlord he would not be called a wise landlord if he does not know what the capabilities of his own estate are. I therefore think that it is the duty of the state to compile a record of the water power in this Presidency in the manner I have indicated and to publish it for the information of industrialists and of the general public. With these remarks, sir, I place the resolution I have moved before the Council, for its acceptance.

The Honourable Mr. G. CARMICHAEL:—Your Excellency,—Perhaps it will save further discussion if I indicate the views which Government hold with regard to this particular resolution. The Honourable Dewán Bahádur GODBOLE has referred to his previous resolution on this subject and he criticises the press note which was published as a result of that resolution. He says that the press note refers entirely to the water power under the large irrigation works which have been constructed in the Presidency, but I think he is hardly fair in saying that that is all the information given. Reference was made to the fact that in the Bombay Presidency there are very few perennial streams, and those which do exist, namely, the Kalinadi and Tadri in the Kanara district and Vaitarna in the Thana district, were specially mentioned and some information with regard to them was given. When he again brought this particular question before this Council, his proposal was that Government should appoint a special officer in order to make local enquiries—to investigate schemes as a matter of fact. I do not remember whether the resolution was discussed, but I think I informed the Honourable Dewán Bahádur personally the view that was held by Government. That was that we could not at this time depute an officer to undertake the investigation of schemes until it was known for what purpose exactly the water power was required. He now comes before the Council with a more modest proposal and I am very glad that he has been able to give us definite instances in which he thinks that the information given in the original press note was incomplete. With regard to some of the instances which he gives, or rather with regard to all the instances which he gives, in which water power is now actually being used, I think in every case the water power has been obtained by the construction of a reservoir. I think in the case of the Honourable Mr. GARUD'S factory too the water power comes from a reservoir.

The Honourable Dewán Bahádur GODBOLE:—No; from the river.

The Honourable Mr. CARMICHAEL:—The river itself is kept supplied with water by a reservoir.

The Honourable Dewán Bahádur GODBOLE:—It is supplied with water throughout the year by the Chankapur tank.

WATER POWER SITES IN BOMBAY PRESIDENCY: MODI SCRIPT IN OFFICIAL CORRESPONDENCE.

[27TH JULY 1917.] [Mr. George Carmichael; Dewán Bahádur Kashinath Ramchandra Godbole; the President; Mr. Raghunath Purshottam Paranjpye.]

The Honourable Mr. CARMICHAEL:—Well, I do not know the details with regard to this particular installation but I say, assuming, that the Girna is now supplied with water from the Chankapur tank, that that is one of the reasons why the Honourable Mr. GARUD is able to run his installation throughout the year. My recollection of the Girna is that the amount of power available in the hot weather months is not large.

In the other instance which he gives where use was being made of a river—at the Gokak falls—that again is kept supplied with water by the reservoir up above and, as far as I remember, the company obtained very good terms from Government as regards the supply of water. The special features of this Presidency are that we have a very heavy rainfall on the Western Ghauts but few perennial streams, and in order to obtain any considerable and continuous supply of water power very large dams have to be constructed. The Honourable Dewán Bahádur refers to the Tapti river. I do not know whether anyone has ever contemplated the harnessing of that river. That certainly would give a big volume of water throughout the year, but I fancy the work would be a very costly one to undertake. But possibly attention should be given, first of all, to the completion of the storage schemes on the Ghauts rather than to harnessing a big river like the Tapti, which is subject to high floods.

With these remarks, sir, I venture to say that Government are prepared to accept the resolution which has been moved by the Honourable Dewán Bahádur GODBOLE to the extent, i.e., on the basis of the cases which he has mentioned—that these cases should be examined and similar cases, if they are found, should be examined by the local officers in the course of their ordinary duties, and information should be collected and put on record. I feel myself that it would be a much greater help if the Honourable Dewán Bahádur would himself undertake to develop one or more of the particular schemes which he mentions. An ounce of practice is worth a good deal of preaching.

The Honourable Dewán Bahádur GODBOLE:—I am now 69 years of age.

The resolution, on the understanding indicated by the Honourable Mr. CARMICHAEL, was then put to the vote and carried.

His Excellency the PRESIDENT:—I wish to inform honourable members of the Council that a few minutes ago I received a request from several members, an extremely unusual one, to the effect that owing to other urgent—I hope they do not consider them equally important—engagements which they have got during the next few days, they were very anxious that I should be pleased to adjourn this session of the Council and adjourn all the business of the Council until the next session whenever that should be. Well, I wish to inform honourable members that Government is perfectly willing to sit on here and conclude the business of the Council and it is entirely in deference to the wishes of honourable members that I am prepared, if the Council agree, to accede to their wishes; and my proposal is that we should adjourn the session of this Council at 4-30 p. m. in order to give non-official members time to elect the members of the finance committee.

His Excellency the PRESIDENT:—Resolution No. 6. The Honourable Mr. PARANJPYE.

The Honourable Mr. RAGHUNATH PURSHOTTAM PARANJPYE:—Your Excellency,—As several honourable members want to speak on this resolution, they will want more time and so I wish to adjourn it to the next Council meeting.

His Excellency the PRESIDENT:—I think it would be better if my honourable friend would move his resolution now.

MODI SCRIPT IN OFFICIAL CORRESPONDENCE.

[Mr. R. P. Paranjpye.] [27TH JULY 1917.]

The Honourable Mr. PARANJPYE:—My lord, the resolution which I have the honour to move runs as follows:—

His Excellency the PRESIDENT:—Does my honourable friend propose to read out his printed speech? Can he not agree to take it as read?

The Honourable Mr. PARANJPYE:—Your Excellency—I propose to read it out to the Council as I have many alterations and additions to make in my printed speech.

My lord, the resolution that I wish to propose for the Council's acceptance reads as follows:—This Council recommends to Government that the Modi script be restored in the official correspondence and records of Government.

The history of this question is, my lord, but one more illustration of the fact that Government is not, and does not care to be, in touch with public opinion on any question under consideration. This question concerns the people of Mahasashtra only, i. e., the people of the Central Division, of the districts of Ratnágiri and Kolába in S. D. and Thána in N. D. The people of the other districts of S. D., of the native states in the Southern Marátha Country and of a part of the City of Bombay are also concerned to a certain extent. Now it would not be too much to say that on no question has the opinion of the people been so nearly unanimous as on this question during recent years; and leaving aside the question of the merits of the case, I would put it to the Government and this Council whether it would be wise, whether it would be statesmanlike, whether it would be in the interests of good government in the larger sense of the term, to tell about ten millions people—or at least the educated part among them—in this presidency that their convenience and sentiments, prejudices if you will, have not the slightest weight in comparison with the whims, fads, or even the convenience of a few civilian officials. The usual arguments of prestige and the inadvisability of retracting a step once gained are brought forward in this connection. But I am sure that these arguments should not apply if we are convinced, on a consideration of the merits of the case—which would also include the feelings of the people—that the course once taken was wrong. In discussing this question I shall have to refer to matters which may seem very elementary to some, but in this case I have to convince our friends from other parts and I hope I shall be excused for giving these details.

Maráthi language is similar to the modern European languages in having one script for printing and another for writing and is unlike most other Indian languages such as Gujaráti, Kanarese, Bengáli and Hindi. The script for printing is called Bálbodh and that for writing is called Modi. There is, however, this about the Bálbodh that it is not quite so difficult to write as the ordinary Roman script in European languages and is occasionally used for writing by uneducated people, including children and ladies, for writing sacred books and poems, and in fact for writing anything where speed or convenience is not in question and very great clearness is aimed at. In the middle ages before the introduction of printing many monks used to copy the Bible in ordinary Roman script and copies of these can be seen in any famous library in Europe, but then the monks had generally nothing else to do. Bálbodh is also generally used by Maráthi authors when sending copy to the press. The one disadvantage in Modi is the want of distinction between short and long vowels i and u. Several proposals have been made by scholars to get over this, but Government through its educational department did not give heed to the matter. Also in Modi words are not generally separated. Bálbodh, or under its other name Devanagari, is a thoroughly scientific script but it has the fatal defect of inconvenience for ordinary writing. It takes very much longer to write and in the eyes of connoisseurs is not pretty to look at. It is alleged also that Modi is often written illegibly.

I shall take these arguments one by one. As regards long and short vowels they have not much real significance in Maráthi and scholars are divided into two camps as to whether the vowels in particular words should be written short according to their strict Sanskrit etymology or long as they are generally pronounced. In fact I wonder how far the Bálbodh written in offices will satisfy the test of correctness. For one who knows the language they don't cause any confusion. I shall ask my English friends how many of them write so distinctly as to distinguish between n, u, m, i. Any person who was just learning English and whose eyes are not accustomed to read written English will find it difficult to read an ordinary English letter. Some time ago the newspapers announced that "Lord Brassey starved at the Government House for four days," a needless reflection on Your Excellency's hospitality by the bad handwriting of somebody who wished to write "stayed" but was read "starved." I shall give the instance of the various Arabic and derived Scripts. The vowel sounds and often even the various dots distinguishing different letters are never actually written but a person knowing the language has no difficulty in supplying them as he reads. I could relate an interesting instance in the etymology of the word "Sine" in Trigonometry which came through the medium of the Arabic from the Sanskrit word jyā (the string of a bow).

As regards the non-separation of words it does not form a very great difficulty, for when a word begins a new phrase it is generally written distinctly and and in fact in our old Bálbodh manuscript pothi's or manuscript sacred poems words were never separately written. In olden days even in Europe words were generally not separated and members will remember Mr. Pickwick's interesting excursions to find the hidden archæological meaning in the plain words written continuously "BILLS TUMPSHISMARK". In this case again reform can be introduced by insisting on separated words when writing petitions, etc.

The alleged illegibility of Modi is due to a great extent to the want of familiarity with the language. In the parts of the presidency concerned, all accounts, correspondence, even histories in olden days, and legal documents used to be written in Modi and are still written in Modi. My lord, if a man is careless, he can make any script illegible. In the civil service examination a large number of candidates have their marks reduced by as much as 150 or 200 for illegible handwriting. From the correspondence which has been published in answer to various questions in this Council you will see that Balbodh—script to be understood by children—has already become illegible in many offices. A member of a band while travelling in a train and asked to show his ticket said he had lost it. "Look into all your pockets. You can't have lost it" said the guard. "Why man," replied he, "you don't know me, I have lost my big drum." In the same way a man who takes pride in illegible handwriting as showing his importance can make anything illegible. In fact you will find in records published that signature of many officers is "illegible". Personally I think that bad or at least illegible handwriting ought to be visited with far greater penalties; it shows bad breeding as it means want of regard for the covenience of others. In work where speed is necessary a phonetic script which admits of continuous writing, i.e., writing which does not necessitate taking the hand off the paper and without too many involutions, is absolutely necessary. These are the principles underlying any system of shorthand. Modi has some similar advantages; there are in it a large number of recognised abbreviations. Thus, for instance, "the fatal objection to Bálbodh", says the Collector of Ratnágiri, "is that it is not written in a cursive hand, and never was meant to be such". It is absurd to say that because the Ramayan, Shakuntala, or the Bhagwat-gita were written in the Devnagari or Bálbodh character, depositions in court should be written similarly or the various registers in the registration office. As well may you say that because the epitaph on a tombstone is written in Roman capitals, everything should be written exactly like that. If Bálbodh is made compulsory for fast writing what will happen is that it will degenerate into bad Modi—only it will give us different kinds of Modi for each individual district or each táluka. The present is a standardised script for Maráthi current from Bombay in the west to Nágpur on the east, Khándesh, and even Indore and Gwalior on the north to Sholápur in the south. Whatever tradition may say about its introduction by Hemadpant—

MODI SCRIPT IN OFFICIAL CORRESPONDENCE.

[Mr. R. P. Paranjpye.] [27TH JULY 1917.]

a point that has been made much of by Mr. Kincaid, who says that Modi is a non-aryan script. It can be easily seen to be evolved from Bálbodh.. Is Government and this Council to stop or even undo this gradual process of evolution which has gone on for five hundred years? I shall bring to the notice of members of this Council the fact that written French books look quite different from written English although the script is the same. I can say this from experience as I have had occasion to read lithographed—therefore carefully written—books in French. The case of German will be a stronger illustration. Both German print and German handwriting have evolved on different lines from the Roman. If the standardised Modi of the present is abolished, the written Bálbodh of Nágpur, Khándesh, Ratnágiri and Sholápur will show differences as great as those between English and German writing.

The history of this question of Modi is a patent example to all how not to do things. An officer of Government who takes pride in his knowledge of the vernaculars first of all got this fad into his head. From his superior position he made this experiment in his office. It did not succeed well, but as the saheb was keen on it, it was allowed. He got it introduced in two or three other districts. But when his friends went away from these districts their successors reported against it; and in one or two cases the experiment was given up. Thus, for instance, Mr. Ghosal, the Collector of Ratnágiri, in those days says "I have consulted all my sub-divisional officers and Messrs. Divatia, Garret and Parnaik all condemn in strong language the Bálbodh script and urge that we should at once re-introduce the Modi script. The Mámlatdárs are also unanimous on this point. The universal opinion is (a) that Bálbodh undoubtedly takes a much longer time to write than Modi; (b) it is responsible for much of the arrears; (c) the Bárnishi work can hardly be managed unless the staff is increased; (d) the Bálbodh writing is daily getting more undecipherable than Modi.

Then, again, the Collector of Násik says "all the officers throughout the district are anxious for the re-introduction of Modi. The Divisional Forest Officer alone has a good word for Bálbodh, and again all my three Sub-divisional Officers are in favour of Modi and so is the District Superintendent of Police." But in the meanwhile this officer had gone to another place where he could manipulate the strings more effectively. The experiment was considered to be successful withour taking the opinion of the people best able to judge. The opinions of those officers against it were put down as one-sided; and lo! the whole Government became committed to it. It is distinctly stated that no District and Subordinate Judges were ever consulted in making this change. It is not too much to say that this officer, Mr. C. A. Kincaid, is the fons et origo mali in regard to this question. In the whole correspondence laid before the Council it is only he that argues this question: all others who support him merely say "ditto." On the other hand Messrs. Divatia, Ghosal, Dikshit, Brander of the superior officers ably defend it. You cannot put their advocacy down to a mere sentimental liking for it; for of these four officers only one is a Dakshini whose mother tongue is Maráthi; the mother tongues of the others are as varied as Gujaráti, Bengali and English.

We are told that the action of the Government has been made comparatively inocuous by requiring only the official records to be written in Bálbodh; petitions to government officers may still be written in Modi; private account-books may be still kept in that language. Now while this is a very diplomatic move to disarm opposition, we do not think that it does very much to alleviate our fears. If good Modi writing is not supposed to be a necessary qualification for clerks under Government, Modi will be neglected everywhere. Again, supposing that this substitution is continued, what will happen? Officers will lose all familiarity with Modi; a Modi petition is sent to the officer he will not be able to read it at all; his subordinate clerks will be able to burke that petition if it contains a complaint against themselves. All account books, as I said before, are kept in Modi; my honourable friend, Rao Bahadur Naik, will be able to tell you that even in the Karnatic in several Canarese families accounts are still kept in Modi. These account books often come before courts in judicial cases; is it desirable that by the action of Government the judges should lose all ability to examine the account for themselves? I would like to ask honourable members to look at the opinion of the late Mr. Tyabji. "The papers which it is most frequently necessary to refer to in cases to be decided by judges are deeds which are generally in Modi and would probably continue to be in Modi even if Bálbodh is adopted as the Court script".

As has been said the main objection against Bálbodh is want of speed and want of individuality in the writing. The want of speed in Bálbodh has been admitted by everybody—even Mr. Kincaid. But we are told that the reader will be saved some time; that high civilian officers of Government will do their work faster. Now I put it to members whether members of a "heaven-born service" like our Indian Civil Service men are so incapable as to get a fair facility for reading Modi manuscripts. I think Mr. Kincaid rather overdoes it when he says that an officer will require 2 or 3 years before he can learn Modi. In every office now-a-days the writing work has so much increased that clerical establishments are now already overworked. I would now refer to Mr. Brander's opinion:—"Introducing Bálbodh would mean that merely to make the reading of vernaculars a little easier for them, the labour of hundreds of kárkuns, talátis, and others will be greatly increased and official correspondence fall into arrears". Even in schools the schoolmasters have to write so many registers that a great deal of their time is taken up in this work. I have had occasion to look over some of these registers; and I find that while they have not become more legible, they have only afforded an excuse for taking more time in writing them up. The same is the experience of most people who have to read Bálbodh depositions taken down in court in judicial cases. Mr. Ghosal says: "The great advantage claimed by Mr. Kincaid is that it is easy to write. I would respectfully urge that it is not so. Those who are accustomed to write Modi when they write Bálbodh only rarely do so in a neat style. But those who have to do so habitually always write a worse Bálbodhi than a Modi hand". Mr. Dikshit says: "It cannot be denied that hurriedly written Bálbodh is more illegible than Modi written with the same speed". The delay in deciding judicial cases has become well nigh intolerable. If we require all depositions to be taken down in Bálbodh, more time will be taken in deciding them. At present current English and Modi are written with approximately equal speed by persons who can write them with ease. If Bálbodh is required the judge will be held back, while his shirastedár takes down the vernacular deposition.

The other serious disqualification of Bálbodh is the want of individuality in writing. In these days when typewriters are coming into vogue in great numbers it is found a very difficult task to detect forgeries, and special experts are required to detect the particular typewriter on which any particular paper has been typed. Bálbodh can be very easily imitated while Modi cannot. In the story of the Count of Monte Cristo, the learned Abbe Faria showed young Dantes that a writing with the left hand shows no individuality and cannot be traced. Compare Mr. Brander's opinion: "It is important to keep Bálbodh out of Judicial work as it lands itself peculiarly to forgery and interpolation." Government action is trying to make us writers with the left hand. Any tampering with account books, petitions, and other papers will become much more easy if Bálbodh is universal.

Mr. Kincaid in his original memorandum, like a clever advocate, tries to complicate matters by the specious argument of a national script. He tells us that it may be possible to introduce Bálbodh as the script for all Indian languages. Now I would like to ask the honourable members if they seriously regard this as a question of practical politics. Mr. Kincaid tried this with Canarese in the Bijápur District and the experiment was abandoned in a very short time and he would not venture to repeat that experiment in Dhárwár, Bijápur and Belgaum again. I do not know but can easily conceive what my Gujaráti and Pársi friends would say to a proposal to do away with their script and take to Bálbodh. They learn Bálbodh from a sentimental point of view. Sanskrit quotations are written in Bálbodh and Bálbodh is occasionly used for the purpose of underlining as italics are used in English.

MODI SCRIPT IN OFFICIAL CORRESPONDENCE.

[Mr. R. P. Paranjpye.] [27TH JULY 1917.]

Baroda is trying this experiment to a certain extent but it has not, as I understand, been very successful. I leave it to my Sindhi friends to consider whether they would change their script for Bálbodh. The history of the Nāgari and Urdu controversy in the U.P. makes quite clear what the attitude of my Moslem friends will be in the event of Mr. Kincaid starting a crusade for doing away with Urdu and substituting the Bálboth or Devnāgri for it. Why stop there! Mr.. Kincaid agrees that the Bálbodh or Devnāgri script is a more scientific script than the imperfect and redundant English alphabet. I would ask him to pursuade Government to make this reform in the writing and printing of English. If Mr. Kincaid were the inventer of letters as a fabled god among the Greeks, then he might have lighted upon Bálbodh; but we have to take facts as they are. Again when people talk of a common script in India—a movement with which I have some sympathy—they only think of printed books. It is by means of the printed book that one province comes into contact with another and the fact that all languages in India are derived from a common source in Northern India, I mean, would make the printed page in another language possibly easier for an educated person knowing another cognate language to read. Again in these days English is coming to be more and more the lingu franca of India and we regard it as one of the greatest gifts of the British to us Indians and the most important cement in the building up of an Indian nationality. But when Mr. Kincaid's ideal is not likely to succeed I don't see any sense in making our language the first and last sacrifice on the alter of this common script. Let me assure the Council on behalf of all my Dakshini friends that in the event of such an ideal coming within the range of practical politics we shall not be found in the way of the attainment of that ideal; on the other hand, we shall do our best to persuade our countrymen to sacrifice their sentiment for a common cause. It is because we are persuaded that our sacrifice is sure to be useless for the great cause and only harmful to ourselves that we are opposing this action of Government.

I do not intend to keep the Council much longer. I shall only refer to one personal point. I find that a leading paper of Bombay in its discussion of this question a few days ago appeared to know all about what I write and do. I can only say that that paper knows more about me than I do myself. Let me however say that whenever I have to write in Maráthi to one who knows Modi, I never do write in Bálbodh. I have gone further and have written articles in Modi for a newspaper which its compositors can very easily type in Bálbodh. I find from personal experience that writing an article or a letter in Bálbodh is at least twice as difficult as writing it in Modi. I admit frankly that I answer an English letter in English and myself write in English to friends that are quite conversant with it as my education has been through English and I find it easier to do so when I have to write seriously on any subject which I learnt through English. But when the choice is between Bálbodh and Modi I unhesitatingly choose the latter.

I will not go over the other arguments used in defending this most impolitic action. I shall pass over all the padding about what happened in the Roman Empire which Mr. Kincaid has used in his advocacy. For I hope we have gone a little further in political knowledge than the Romans did. I do not think that these arguments will deceive anybody. I shall place before this Council the one fact that all the members of this Council from the Maráthi-speaking parts of the presidency and the Kanarese members who are also familiar with Maráthi are unanimously in favour of the resolution I propose; and I trust it would not be too much to expect that the members will support me in this resolution. You may call it sentiment on our part, but the world is not led by mere material considerations alone; sentiment has to be respected and conciliated. I think I shall not appeal to you in vain. With these words I beg to propose my resolution.

His Excellency the President.—The Council will now adjourn.

The Council then adjourned sine die.

By order of His Excellency the Right Honourable the Governor,

1. (a) Has the attention of Government been drawn to a Circular No 10-A.M.C., dated the 26th of April 1916, issued by the Collector of Nasik, withdrawing the right of the Dumaldars of the district to pass orders in connection with the collection and distribution of "Chillar" and directing it to be credited into the Government Treasury? (Dumaldars and "Chillar" in Nasik District.)	1. (a) and (b) The Circular did not lay down any new principle, but directed compliance with the orders contained in Government Resolution No. 4168, dated 3rd June 1897, whereby it was directed that kadim allowances in alienated villages should not be handed over by the village officers to the Inamdars but should be remitted to the treasury
(b) Will Government be pleased to state—

QUESTIONS AND ANSWERS.

Questions.	Answers.
(1) Whether this right was exercised by the Dumaldars without question till it was withdrawn by this Circular?	and disbursed therefrom to the proper recipients. As Chillar is a kadim allowance more ancient than the grant of the village revenues, the practice of paying it over to the Dumaldar was incorrect.
(2) Whether it is proposed to restore this right to the Dumaldars?
(3) The reasons for withdrawing this grant?
(4) The nature of the grant covered by this Circular?
2. (a) Has the attention of Government been drawn to a Circular No. 13-A.M.S.N., dated the 7th of May 1915, issued by the Collector of Nasik, withdrawing the right of the Dumaldars of the district to issue orders in connection with the collection of "Miscellaneous Receipts" (Kirkol Utpanna) and directing that in future these orders were to be issued to village officers by Mamlatdars?	2. (a) The Circular in question referred only to Sharakati inam villages, and not to all Dumala villages. It was afterwards modified by allowing Dumaldars in such Sharakati villages to issue orders in cases of miscellaneous revenue of which it is established that Government get no share.
Dumaldars and miscellaneous receipts in Nasik District.
(b) Is it true that the right of passing these orders was exercised by the Dumaldars without question till it was withdrawn by this Circular?	(b) Before the issue of the Circular it was ascertained by the Collector of Nasik that the Dumaldars of all Sharakati villages in the Nasik and Niphad talukas had never exercised the power in question. If others have done so, it was not as a right but as an assumption of right never conceded by Government.
(c) Is it proposed to withdraw this Circular?	(c) No further action is intended.
(d) Will Government be pleased to state the reasons for the Circular?	(d) The Circular was issued in order to (i) safeguard the interest both of Government and the Inamdars, and (ii) secure uniformity of practice in the levy of certain items of revenue, as the Dumaldars are not usually conversant with the standing orders and the procedure to be followed. The Inamdars are in no way the losers, since their share is correctly calculated in the village accounts and is paid to them.

1. Will Government be pleased to state—

(a) How much land has passed out of the hands of agriculturists by voluntary transfers or by transfers through the operation of the Civil Courts during the last ten years in Sind?

Agricultural indebtedness in Sind.

1. (a) The Honourable Member is referred to the Land Revenue Administration Reports, Part II, of the Bombay Presidency, including Sind, which give information regarding the area of land held by agriculturists and non-agriculturists every year. In Sind, the inclusion of the fluctuating figures of occupancies given out on yearly tenure obscures the real transfers between the two classes of holders, and steps have been taken to secure in future a more accurate presentment of the figures. A study of these figures will give some indication of the extent of the transfers of land between agriculturists and non-agriculturists. They do not show what proportion of the total transfer is due to the operation of the civil court. In a recent report to Government it was stated that the actual sales in execution of decrees of civil courts in recent years have represented an average of 1,000 acres out of the total occupied area of eight million acres.

(b) If they have any information about the indebtedness of the agricultural classes in Sind?

(b) The question of the indebtedness of the agricultural population of the Bombay Presidency, including Sind, has long engaged, and is at present engaging, the attention of Government.

QUESTIONS AND ANSWERS.

[Mr. Shaikh Gulam Hussain Hidayatallah; Mr. Ebrahim Haroon Jaffer.] [10TH OCTOBER 1917.]

Questions.

Answers.

(c) If so, what are the causes of this indebtedness?

(c) The general causes of indebtedness may be stated to be the lack of capital for the proper cultivation of the land, and the consequent necessity of recourse to the money-lender and to the increase of the indebtedness thus incurred by improvident expenditure on customary or social objects: and to the high rates of interest which the money-lenders are, from the absence of competition and the necessities of the borrowers, able to charge. The accumulation of such indebtedness from generation to generation often renders it beyond the power of the cultivator to redeem. The main remedies are increase of thrift, improved methods of agriculture, spread of education and the increased use of co-operation.

(1) A notice was issued by the Matheran Municipality for the imposition of a tax of the nature referred to. As no approval of Government to the selection of the tax was applied for by the Municipality as required by section 59 (xi) of the Bombay District Municipal Act, 1901, that body has been asked to cancel the notice and to apply to Government for the necessary sanction.

(4) What is the object of imposing the said professional tax?

(4) The object of imposing the tax is to meet the necessary expenditure on the hill by making the incidence of taxation fall on the richer class.

2. Will Government be pleased to say—

(2) Is it a fact that during the last Matheran Season the authorities of the Dispensary in several cases declined to dispense such prescriptions?

Questions.

Answers.

(3) If so, what was the reason for the Dispensary authorities acting in this manner?

(3) Because in some instances the medicine prescribed was not in stock and in others there were just enough drugs to suffice for the requirements of the bonâ fide dispensary and hospital patients.

3. Will Government be pleased to say—

(1) Whether till very recently the Byramji Jeejeebhai Dispensary used to be kept open for the public for the whole day?

Byramji Jeejeebhai Dispensary.

3. (1) Yes.

(2) Whether it is now kept open only during two hours or so in the morning, and is kept closed for the rest of the day for the public?

(3) Will Government be pleased to say what was the reason for such alteration?

(2) and (3) No. According to the rules in force it is kept open from 7 a. m. to 10 a. m. and from 5 p. m. to 7 p. m. generally, but for urgent cases it is open night and day. In order to cope with the increased work an extra compounder has been recently entertained, but the number of compounders is not sufficient to allow of prescriptions other than urgent being made up at any hour during the day. For ordinary prescriptions therefore definite hours are fixed.

THE HONOURABLE MR. SHRIDHAR BALKRISHNA UPASANI.

1. (a) Will Government be pleased to state from which of the villages in East Khandesh contributions have been received for school* buildings and which of them have not yet been provided with the buildings for which they were levied ?

Contributions for school buildings in East Khandesh.

1. (a) The accompanying statement* gives the information required by the Honourable Member.

Vide* Appendix M.

(b) What contributions were paid by the villagers of Bahal in taluka Chalisgaon and how long ago and is it true that the school-building for which they were paid is not yet provided ?

[This question was asked at the meeting held on the 13th March 1917 when an ad interim reply was given.]

(b) Sums of Rs. 300 and Rs. 1,200 were contributed in 1906 and 1914, respectively, by the people of Bahal. The former amount was paid to the Local Board, but it is not known whether it was intended for original work or for extending the small local board building in the village. The latter sum was given to the School Fund Association, taluka Chalisgaon, for the extension of the school building. The amount of Rs. 300 was subsequently transferred to the account of the School Fund Association along with all such sums previously collected. As the attendance at the Bahal school increased later the idea of extending the school-house was abandoned. Provision has however been made in the supplementary local fund educational budget for 1917-18 for a new school-house to be constructed by the Public Works Department at a cost of Rs. 16,604 exclusive of help from the School Fund Association.

2. Is there any foundation for the complaints made by a correspondent in the Khandesh Vaibhava newspaper of the 25th June 1917 with regard to the thefts committed at the Jalgaon Railway Station by the railway's own hamals ?

Thefts at Jalgaon railway station.

(b) Will Government be pleased to state the reasons for abolishing the Vice-Principal's place and engaging junior men as lecturers in his place ?

(b) It was found that the need for appointing a Senior Head Master as Vice-Principal had disappeared and that the work which the late incumbent of that post had performed could be done by some of the younger men, who had been trained at the College and had had experience in the schools with better results than if an older man who had never been at a training institution were appointed as Vice-Principal. It is also expected that with the additional number on the staff it will be possible to give more practising work to the teachers under training.

Questions.

(c) What subjects are taught by the Principal and by the lecturers, respectively, and how many hours' teaching work have they to do in a week?

(d) What degrees do the lecturers hold and how many years' teaching experience they had before they were taken as lecturers for the College?

7. (a) Is it true that fresh teachers entered in the Educational Department are engaged only as probationers and that for want of accommodation in the Teachers' College they have to remain as probationers for 4/5 years and in case they subsequently fail to pass the S. T. Examination they are liable to be thrown out after they are overage?

(b) How many probationary teachers are there in the Department at present?

(c) Is the supply of trained teachers from this College sufficient to meet the requirements of the several Government and aided high and middle schools in the Presidency?

9. Will Government be pleased to state if the resolution moved in the Imperial Council in 1916 by the Honourable Khan Bahadur Asad Khan suggesting that steps be taken to investigate the possibility of placing the ancient and indigenous systems of medicine on a scientific basis and increasing their usefulness was referred to this Government for opinion, and if so, will the Government be pleased to lay its opinion on the Table?

* Vide Appendix E.

(d) All the three lecturers hold the B. A. degree. One of them had nine years' teaching experience and the other two eight years' experience.

7. (a) Yes. Temporary assistants are made probationers after one year's service, if they are recommended by the Educational Inspector concerned. Probationers failing to obtain the Secondary Teachers' Certificate Diploma are relieved but are given previous notice of at least three months to enable them to seek employment elsewhere and in order that they may not lose their pensionable service in the Educational Department.

(c) The answer is in the negative.

8. The answer to the first part of the question is in the affirmative. As regards the second part, the approximate cost is Rs. 1,700, Rs. 3,400 and Rs. 6,800, respectively.

9. Yes. As the matter is still under consideration, Government do not propose to place their reply on the Council Table.

11. (a) The question is too vague for a definite answer to be given.

(b) How many hours a week have the students to attend the school and what will be the cost if provision for similar instruction is made at Poona, Ahmedabad and at Karachi in Sind?

(b) The students have to attend six hours a week. The cost of providing for similar instruction elsewhere is not known.

12. (a) With reference to the answer given to Question No. 3 (c) and the supplementary question asked by me at the last Council Meeting, will Government be pleased to state whether the whole of the cost of the Dhulia City Survey amounting to Rs. 17,633 was charged on the owners of private houses alone or was apportioned between them, the Municipality and Government in proportion to the areas belonging to them respectively which were surveyed?

Dhulia City Survey.

12. (a) The whole cost on account of the survey was recovered from the private house-holders concerned.

(b) If charged on the house-owners alone, will Government be pleased to state why it was so done when the charge was increased for surveying a total area of 2,144 acres 18 gunthas, of which only 150 acres and 32 gunthas were covered by private houses and their premises, as stated in answer to my said question 3 (b) asked at the last meeting?

(b) The cost was recovered in accordance with the usual practice under Rule 83 of the Land Revenue Code. It would not be possible to apportion the cost according to the proportions of the various areas included within the limits of the survey, since open sites, agricultural land, rivers, nallas, etc., are not measured in detail. Their boundaries only are shown, the labour of demarcating which is trifling. The main cost and labour is involved in the demarcation of land covered by private houses. Municipalities are charged survey fees on the properties from which they derive revenue.

Thereafter unless these Assistants become Head Masters they do not get any increase of substantive pay, but in special cases allowances of Rs. 3 per mensem per head are given. Commutation of Kulkarni watans.

22. (a) and (b). The Honourable Member is referred to the statements placed on the table in reply mentary question asked by me at the last meeting, will Government be pleased to state how many of the talatis who have been appointed by Government in place of the watandar kulkarnis whose watans were commuted have passed both the kulkarni's qualifying test as also the School Final or Vernacular Final Examination?

(b) How many of the talatis have passed only one of these tests and how many none of them?

(c) How many watandar kulkarnis in the several districts in the Central and Southern Divisions who have not consented to the commutation of their watans will be affected by Government Order No. 10676, Revenue Department, dated the 8th November 1916, which now requires them to pass the double tests referred to in the said order?

Answers.

to question No. 15 (ii) put by him at the meeting of 8th December 1914, which shows the number and qualifications of talatis up to then appointed in lieu of watandar kulkarnis, and the examinations passed by them. Government do not consider that any useful purpose would be served by collecting information beyond that contained in those statements.

(c) The orders are of general application but as they come into operation in regard to any particular representative watandar only when his turn of service comes round it is not possible to exhibit their application by figures. The order in question has been modified by Government Order No. 10717 dated 5th September 1917 which allows discretion to the officers making the appointments to appoint as officiators representative watandar kulkarnis who have not passed the Vernacular Final or School Final Examination but have rendered recent service which has been satisfactory and up to the standard of the work done by stipendiary village accountants. A copy* of this order is placed on the Table.

* Vide Appendix Q.

Agricultural Farms.

23. (a) Will Government be pleased to state how many of the Government Agricultural farms in the Presidency are working at a profit and how many at a loss?

23. (a) The farms are intended for experiment and demonstrations and their usefulness cannot be gauged by a bare profit and loss account.

(b) Have any agricultural classes been attached to these farms and, if so, to which of them and what is the total attendance in these classes?

(b) A school is attached to the Mirpurkhas farm. The attendance in 1915-16 was nine.

(c) Is any provision made for instruction in fruit cultivation in the Agricultural College or any of the Agricultural farms and have any of the agricultural graduates engaged in the Department specialised in this branch of agriculture?

(c) The information required is given in the Annual Report of the Department of Agriculture for 1915-16, e. g., Appendix I, paragraph 36 of Appendix E and paragraph 30 of Appendix F of the Appendices attached to the Report.

(d) Will Government be pleased to state how the sum placed at the disposal of the Agricultural Department out of the wheat profits' grant is proposed to be utilised?

(d) The question of the distribution of the whole grant is still under consideration.

QUESTIONS AND ANSWERS.

[10TH OCTOBER 1917.]

Questions.

24. (a) Has Government's attention been drawn to the large increase in the cattle pound receipts in the districts of East and West Khandesh as also in Nasik as shown in the Local Board's Administration Report for 1915-16?

Increase in Cattle Pound Receipts.

(b) Is this due to higher rates being charged for cattle pound and, if so, at whose instance and in what talukas were the rates increased and to what extent? Were the Municipalities or the Local Boards in the districts consulted in the matter before raising the normal rates?

25. (a) Will Government be pleased to state if any complaints were made to the Collector or the Commissioner of undue pressure being used for levy of war loan in the Parner Taluka of the Ahmednagar District and, if so, what was the result of the inquiries, if any, made with reference to the same?

Alleged forced levy of war loan.

(b) Is it a fact that one Khushalchand Khubchand Marwadi of Padali Darga in the said taluka was detained at the chavdi and his house kept locked on the 28th June 1917 while there was a marriage at his house on the 29th June 1917?

(c) Was the house of one Saga Appaji Pawar of Babhulwadi in the same taluka kept locked for more than ten days?

26. Is it a fact that in several cases of lands taken up for Local Fund roads in East Khandesh compensation has not been paid for years? If so, will Government be pleased to state in how many cases it remains to be paid, how many years ago were the lands taken up for the roads and what is the total amount to be paid? Have any steps been taken to expedite the payment?

Compensation for lands taken for Local Fund roads.

[Mr. Shridhar Balkrishna Upasani.]

Answers.

24. (a) There was an increase in the cattle pounds receipts in the districts of East Khandesh and Nasik and a decrease in those of West Khandesh, in the year 1915-16 as compared with those of 1914-15. The aggregate figures for the three districts were less in 1915-16 than in 1913-14.

(b) Enhanced fees under sections 12 and 26 of the Cattle Trespass Act were applied by Government notifications in certain village areas in East Khandesh, and in and near the Municipal limits of the town of Nasik. No enhanced fees were ordered in West Khandesh. The notifications were issued on the recommendations of the District Magistrates supported by the Commissioner.

25. (a) Government were aware that the Commissioner and the Collector had received one complaint of the nature referred to from the Parner taluka but did not consider it necessary to take any action as these officers had the matter in hand for disposal.

(b) and (c) Government do not propose to call for the information asked for, as no representation has been received from the persons named that they are dissatisfied with the action taken by the local officers.

26. Between the years 1912 and 1917 notifications were issued in thirty cases for acquiring land for Local Fund roads in East Khandesh. Government will request the Commissioner to enquire whether payment has been unduly delayed in any case, and if so, to expedite payment. Government do not think that any useful purpose would be served by incurring the labour that would be involved in supplying the statement asked for.

Questions.

27. Is it a fact that quarry and stone fee which used to be charged at one anna a cart is now raised to six annas a cart in East Khandesh District?

Quarry and stone fee.

28. (a) What was the amount of the original estimate of the Lonavla Municipal Water Works and what did the actual cost ultimately amount to?

Lonavla Water Works.

(b) How much of the total cost was shared by the Municipality and Government?

(c) Did the G. I. P. Railway contribute any portion of the cost?

29. (a) Is it a fact that widows of deceased co-sharers in hereditary Kulkarni Watans have been allowed to pass commutation agreements under section 15 of the Watan Act and to also surrender their right to the one-third allowance on receiving cash payment?

Commutation of Kulkarni Watans.

(b) Have the other co-sharers, who had a right to officiate in respect of their share, been deprived of their watan under such commutation, both in respect of their own share and as reversion owners of the deceased sharer to even the one-third allowance, though the widow had only a life-interest in her husband's share?

(c) Has this happened in the case of one Govind Daji Kulkarni of Rajapur under a commutation agreement executed by Radhabai, widow of Govind Ramkrishna Kulkarni of that village, in taluka Dindori in the Nasik District?

(d) Has one Dhondu Narayan Kulkarni of Malpur in taluka Sakri been similarly deprived of the watan by his uncle passing a commutation agreement and surrendering his right on receiving a cash payment though he represented a younger branch and was not entitled to be the registered holder under section 36 of the Watan Act?

Answers.

27. The information will be called for.

28. (a) The original estimate was for Rs. 3,67,801. The completion certificate has not been received but the actual cost will be about Rs. 4,73,100.

(b) and (c) The cost is being shared equally by Government and the Municipality.

29. (a) and (b) Such widows have been permitted to commute the right of service, but Government are not purchasing from them by lump payment the cash allowances they receive in commutation.

(c) Radhabai's case has been dealt with as indicated above.

(d) So far as Government are aware the facts are not as stated.

APPENDIX G.

GREAT INDIAN PENINSULA RAILWAY COMPANY.
(Incorporated in England.)

AGENT'S OFFICE.

No. 207-C.—7.

VICTORIA TERMINUS:
Bombay, 15th September 1917.

THE JOINT SECRETARY TO THE GOVERNMENT OF BOMBAY, PUBLIC WORKS DEPARTMENT,
Bombay.

Dear Sir,

Re Thefts at Jalgaon Railway Station.

In continuation of my letter No. 207-C.—3, dated 19th July 1917, I beg to state that the Superintendent of Government Railway Police advises me that eight cases of theft are reported to have occurred at Jalgaon during the year. The particulars of these cases are as under:—

(1) A passenger's trunk disappeared and the hamals who handled it were suspected.
(2) Two porters were convicted for stealing 0-6-0 worth of dhál.
(3) Investigation was refused in the absence of evidence to work on.
(4) Two porters were convicted for theft of wheat.
(5) Theft of sáris: undetected.
(6) Theft of tea: an outsider convicted.
(7) Theft of gram: watchman convicted.
(8) Theft of cash from a passenger, by an outsider: case under trial.

2. The merchants of Jalgaon recently complained that the Railway hamals were detected while misappropriating sugar from a consignment. The matter was carefully enquired into and it was ascertained that the consignment in question was received along with a consignment of twist in a road van, and the hamals finding it difficult to open the road van on the platform side, opened it on the off side. On opening the door one of the bags of sugar was found to be slightly torn, which was probably due to its having come in contact with the bolt of the wagon door. The bags were delivered the next day under clear receipt which fact goes to prove that no sugar was misappropriated by the hamals.

3. I do not consider that the merchants of Jalgaon have any just cause for complaint against the staff at that station.

4. In regard to the closing in of the goods shed the matter has not been lost sight of and when the station is remodelled, this work will be taken in hand.

Yours faithfully,

(Signed) FRANK J. CLARK, for Agent.

APPENDIX J.

Local Self-Government: Power of Vice-Presidents of Taluka Local Boards to perform the duties of the President during the interval between the latter officer vacating his post and his successor assuming charge of his duties.

No. 2833.

REVENUE DEPARTMENT.

Bombay Castle, 7th May 1887.

Read again paragraph 3 of Government Resolution No. 2228, dated 13th April 1887—Stating that orders will be issued hereafter on the suggestion made by the Collector of Poona in paragraph 3 of his letter No. 510, dated 29th March 1887, to the effect that the President, District Local Board, may be vested with power to authorise Vice-Presidents of Taluka Local Boards to perform the duties of President, Taluka Local Board, during the interval between the latter vacating his post and his successor assuming charge of his duties.

Government memorandum to the Remembrancer of Legal Affairs, No. 2265, dated 15th April 1887—Forwarding to him extract paragraph 3 of a letter No. 510, dated 29th March 1887, from the Collector of Poona; and requesting his opinion on the proposal made therein by the Collector.

Letter from the Remembrancer of Legal Affairs, No. 449, dated 19th April 1887:—

"In reply to Government memorandum No. 2265, dated 15th instant, I have the honour to report that I am not aware what are the difficulties which Mr. East's proposal is intended to meet, but that a modification of the Act would, in my opinion, be necessary to give effect to that proposal.

"2. It seems possible, however, that the desired end might be obtained by a deputation of powers and duties under section 29 (b) of the Local Boards Act."

Government memorandum to the Remembrancer of Legal Affairs, No A.—7, dated 29th April 1887.

Memorandum from the Remembrancer of Legal Affairs, dated 29th April 1887:—

"I still think that the Collector's proposal could not be carried out without an amendment of the Act.

"2 Nor do I think that it would be in accordance with the intention of the Legislature that a President about to resign and knowing that his office would probably remain vacant for some time should depute the powers and duties of the President during such vacancy only to the Vice-President.

"3. But section 29 (b) of the Local Boards Act contemplates the deputation of powers and duties by every President of a Local Board to the Vice-President as an ordinary feature of the administration; and if, in addition to the powers and duties deputed to the Vice-President absolutely, the President were to depute to him certain other powers and duties to be exercised and performed by him only when the President himself is absent from the head-quarters of the board or from the district, such deputation would hold good during any temporary vacancy in the office of the President.

"4. The Act, of course, does not contemplate that there will ever be a prolonged vacancy in the President's office."

RESOLUTION.—Copies of the Legal Remembrancer's reports should be sent to the Commissioner in Sind, the Divisional Commissioners and all Collectors for information and guidance.

APPENDIX P.

Report of the Commissioner, N. D., on the working of the Ahmedabad Municipality for the year 1915-16.

"Submitted to Government. It will be noticed that the President has forwarded the report without comment.

2. There are hardly any points in the record of this year's administration upon which it is possible to dwell with satisfaction.

3. The financial condition of the Municipality is unsound, the normal expenditure being in excess of the income. The income of the year under report fell off, because the proceeds of the terminal tax were disappointing for several months after its introduction.

4. The Engineering Department was in a state of considerable confusion, not to say chaos, for want of an efficient organization under a competent head. These causes combined to produce stagnation and a general suspension of works programmes. In my opinion the time cannot long be deferred when the Municipality will have to thoroughly overhaul its whole system of finance and taxation.

5. As regards the working of the new system under which the Municipal Commissioner has become the executive officer of the Municipality the report is completely silent, and the reason of this is, I think, that the Municipality as a body has made little or no effort to co-operate with the Municipal Commissioner in making the system work successfully. On the contrary, the tendency has been to regard the new system and its representative with jealous mistrust and prejudice. There is still far too strong a tendency to subordinate public interest to private factions and to judge all questions on the narrowest of personal grounds. Unless these tendencies are counteracted and checked by the growth of worthier and saner views of public duty, the administration is not likely to improve or progress.

6. It is discreditable to the Municipality that practically no progress should have been made during their seventeen months' tenure of office since April 1915 with the work of revising and remodelling their rules. Other important matters are treated with similar neglect. A sub-committee is appointed to attend to them and the matter drifts indefinitely.

7. The two Municipal Commissioners, Mr. Monteath and subsequently Mr. Shillidy, have worked with zeal and energy under difficult conditions."

Report of the Commissioner, N. D., on the working of the Ahmedabad Municipality for the year 1916-17.

"The Commissioner regrets to have to record his opinion that the administration of the Ahmedabad Municipality during the year under report (1916-17) was if anything more unsatisfactory than in the previous year.

"2. The financial condition and prospects of the Municipality are bad and there is no improvement in the broad facts of the situation as stated by Government in their review of last year's report. The necessity of raising the additional revenue required has been repeatedly impressed on the Municipality and its leading Councillors. The result so far has been very small but there is some reason for hoping that in the ensuing year there may be some acceleration of the rate of progress in financial and other reforms and organization.

"3. There was a great increase in the number of meetings of the Municipality (last year 42 and this year 70), but this has not remedied the defect which I pointed out last year of excessive delays in the treatment of all matters which are of real importance. Until the Ahmedabad Municipality has learnt the lesson of decentralization and delegation to its committees and officers it will continue to spend all of its time over routine matters. The importance and dignity of its committees may be gauged from the fact that they are only allowed to hold office for three months at a time.

"4. The President remarks that 'Mr. Shillidy has applied himself with great energy to the work of overhauling the Municipal administration and he has placed before the Board schemes for the reorganization of almost all departments of the Municipality'. References will be found throughout Mr. Shillidy's report to these proposals for reform, but one looks in vain for any indication of prompt and business-like consideration of or decisions on those proposals.

"5. The proposals for the reform of the Cess Collection Department were passed by the Managing Committee on the 31st October 1916 and were then handed over by the Municipality at a meeting held on 4th December 1916 to a Sub-Committee which is still sitting on them and when I last enquired into the matter in April of this year the Sub-Committee had already held or adjourned for want of a quorum no less than fourteen meetings.

"6. It is therefore not a matter for surprise if as the President remarks there has been no improvement in the general sanitary condition of the City or in the efficiency of the Municipal Executive.

"A Municipality which refuses to support its superior Executive staff and which keeps its inferior staff on starvation wages must not expect a high degree of efficiency. Till quite recently the Municipal sweepers have been paid at the rate of five rupees a month. Servants so paid will inevitably shirk most of their work and will do the rest dishonestly and inefficiently.

"7. The Municipality in spite of very numerous reminders failed to complete the revision of their rules during the year under report."

Prescription of the Vernacular (or English) School Final Examination as an additional qualifying educational test for officiators in kulkarni—.

GOVERNMENT OF BOMBAY.

REVENUE DEPARTMENT.

Order No. 10777.

Bombay Castle, 5th September 1917.

Petitions from Narayan Deshpande and others, representative watandar kulkarnis and their deputies in the Dhárwár District—Praying that, in the circumstances stated, Government Order No. 10676 dated 8th November 1916, prescribing the English School Final or Vernacular Final Examination as a qualifying test for officiators in the kulkarni watans, may be cancelled, or that the watandar kulkarnis and their deputies who have been already officiating, at least, may be exempted from passing the said test.

ORDER.—Government Order No. 10676 dated 8th November 1916 is intended to apply to fresh appointments of officiators in kulkarni watans made (i) in the case of representative watandar kulkarnis serving in person after 1st January 1918 and (ii) in the case of deputies after 1st January 1917, and would not apply to persons already appointed. There is, however, the case of representative watandars not now working as kulkarnis but whose turn will come again. On a strict reading of the Order it might be held that they could not officiate, as they had not acquired the necessary qualification. This is likely to cause hardship in the case of representative watandars who had rendered efficient service in former rotation periods and are now not in a position to pass the required test. The officers making the appointments are accordingly allowed discretion to appoint kulkarnis who are not so qualified but have rendered recent service which has been satisfactory and up to the standard of the work done by stipendiary village accountants. The discretion should, however, be exercised only in the case of representative watandars serving in person and not in the case of deputies.

2. The petitioners should be referred to the Collector of Dhárwár for a reply to their petitions.

THE PRABHURAM AYURVEDIC COLLEGE,
Bhuleshwar, Bombay,
17th July 1917.

To

THE SECRETARY TO THE COUNCIL OF
HIS EXCELLENCY THE GOVERNOR OF BOMBAY FOR MAKING LAWS AND REGULATIONS.

Sir,

Re A bill to further amend the Bombay Medical Act, 1912.

On behalf of the Managing Committee of the Prabhuram Ayurvedic College I have the honour to submit this representation and shall thank you to lay the same before His Excellency and the Honourable Members of Council for consideration in connection with Bill to further amend the Bombay Medical Act, 1912, which the Honourable Mr. V. J. Patel is about to introduce.

Our Committee is concerned only with clause 3 of the Bill which introduces an explanation and illustrations of the phrase "infamous conduct in any professional respect" occurring in sections 7 and 9 of the said Act. Our Committee feel it necessary to submit this representation as they are of opinion that the view taken by the Executive Committee of the Medical Council appointed under the said Act of the meaning and operation of that phrase is prejudicial to the welfare of our Institution and unless disallowed will give a severe blow not only to our Institution but to the Ayurvedic and Unani systems of medicine generally and eventually wipe off the same altogether.

The Institution now known as Prabhuram Ayurvedic College, of which Dr. Popat Prabhuram Vaidya, L.M. & S., is the Principal, was first established in the year 1896 by the late Vaidyaraj Prabhuram Jivanram of Porebunder who possessed a thorough knowledge of the Ayurvedic system and his ability and experience were admitted by eminent Doctors like Col. Carter, Col. Grey, Col. Arnott whom he frequently called in consultation and it was at the suggestion of eminent Doctor friends and certain leading Citizens of Bombay that he started the School with a view to spread the knowledge of that system of medicine for the benefit of the Vaidyas and the public who trusted to their treatment. How far the Institution has achieved success could be judged from the following opinions expressed by leading and eminent Citizens of Bombay at the annual gatherings and distribution of diplomas.

The Honourable Chief Justice Sir Lawrence Jenkins said :—"I think there "can be no doubt that this Institution is capable of doing great and good work "and I say this with more confidence when I see on my right and left such distin-"guished medical experts as Sir Francis Lovell, Dr. Quick, Dr Turner and "Sir Bhalchandra Krishna."

Sir Narayen G. Chandavarkar said :—"The Institution carries on its opera-"tions in a scientific manner. I consider that the Institution deserves the support, "the sympathy and the patronage of every right-minded man."

Honourable Dr. Sir R. G. Bhandarkar, M.A., LL.D., M.R.A.S., K.C.I.E., said :—"The Doctors turned out of the Institution will meet a want that is widely "felt."

The Honourable Mr. Justice Badruddin Tyebji said :—"The Institution does "furnish its students with sufficient knowledge of Eastern System of Medicine to "make it safe for our people to entrust their health to the care of its students."

The late lamented Col. K. R. Kirtikar, I. M. S., said :—"It is my privilege to "know almost all the teachers who are on the staff of this Institution. They are "all able men, young men and men who are sure of success in teaching the special "subjects which they have selected for imparting instructions in."

Dr. M. G. Deshmukh, M.D., B.A., B.Sc., said :—"The Institution is every "year making good progress and any one who cared to see for himself the way in "which the instruction was being imparted in the school would be satisfied that "everything there was arranged in the properly systematic manner."

Dr. Sir Bhalchandra Krishna, Kt., said :—"The instruction is given by means "of lectures, charts, models, specimen of drugs and clinical practice in a Dispen- "sary and a Hospital."

The late Dewan Bahadur Ambalal Sakarlal Desai said :—"I sat through "Dr. Popat's lecture and must say it was very clear, able and instructive. I was "fortunately present when it was opened and it has given me great pleasure to "observe the remarkable progress made by it during the short time."

Dr. G. B. Prabhakar, L.R.C.P., L.M. & S., said :—It has grown into a "full fledged medical School."

The Committee has very often thanked Dr. Popat for the interest he has been taking in the welfare of the Institution without any remuneration and its present success and position are mainly due to his earnest and disinterested work. The Institution would be deprived of his help and advice if the narrow and unwarranted interpretation of the phrase "infamous conduct in any professional respect" which the Executive Committee of the Medical Council press on the Government is accepted, as such a view would enable the Council to remove the name of Dr. Popat from the Medical Register on account of his association with the Institution.

We submit that the view taken by the Executive Committee and by the Medical Union in their protest is erroneous, illiberal, unsustainable, unworthy of a learned body belonging to a noble and liberal profession and opposed to the view of eminent Judges in England and expressed in the following words :—"If it is shown that a medical man in pursuit of his profession has done something with regard to it which would be reasonably regarded as disgraceful or dishonourable by his professional brethren of good repute and competency then it is open to the General Medical Council to say that he has been guilty of infamous conduct in professional respect."

Our Committee respectfully submit that it would be gross perversion and abuse of language to say that Dr. Popat's action in imparting his knowledge of Ayurvedic Medicine to the students of this Institution and his association with it as an act of filial duty as an honorary worker and helper can reasonably be regarded as disgraceful or dishonourable conduct in pursuit of his profession. Indeed such action ought to be regarded as honourable and creditable and it has moreover no reference to or connection with the pursuit of his own profession as a registered Medical practitioner. Eminent members of the profession such as Lieut.-Col. Kirtikar, Sir Balchandra Krishna, Dr. Deshmukh, Dr. G. B. Prabhakar, warmly approve and support such action and Dr. Turner, our Health Officer, has expressed his opinion as follows :—

"I have read the report of your Society with interest and note the rapid "extension and improvement in the teaching of the Ayurvedic College.

"There is no doubt that you reach a class of people who would otherwise be "without any medical help and this class is large even in Bombay, where there "are so many qualified medical men. I know from personal observation that "many of the poorer classes die without calling in any medical aid. If your "Society could reach them you would be doing a very useful work."

His Excellency Lord Hardinge, Viceroy and Governor-General of India, laid the foundation stone of a similar Institution at Delhi on 29th March 1916 and in the course of his speech said :—"90 per cent. of the population of the country took "advantage of the Ayurvedic and Unani systems of medicines" and further "I cannot but recognize that there is good in them and it is far better for the "masses of people where Western Science cannot for a long time reach that these "ancient systems of medicine should be modernised as much as possible to meet "present-day requirements and that they should have their benefit rather than "have no treatment at all."

Sir Pardey Lukis, Director General of the Indian Medical Service, in his speech in the Imperial Council in March 1916 said :—"I resent strongly that "spirit of trade-unionism which leads many modern Doctors to stigmatise all Vaids "and Hakims as quacks and charlatans" and further he observed that "he "cannot recognize any fixed line of demarcation between the Eastern and Western " systems of medicine." Further, Order No. 36569, dated 23rd May 1916, under the signature of Mr. P. W. Monie, Secretary to Government of Bombay, says :—" It is not denied that there are at present capable practitioners of the ancient methods" : and yet the Bombay Medical Union in their representation, dated 7th July 1917, in sweeping terms says " that the majority of men practising under the designation of Vaids and Hakims are illiterate and uneducated and therefore even the educated of these Vaids and Hakims should not be associated with or educated by the Medical practitioners."

Our Committee has ascertained that Dr. Nariman has not studied the Ayurvedic system at all and he has no knowledge of Sanscrit and yet in his speech in the Bombay Legislative Council he undertook to say that " Ayurvedic " is no system at all. We crave permission to quote the opinions of learned members of the profession and other eminent men to show how unfounded Sir Nariman's doctrine is :

On Medicine and Surgery.

Professor Wilson :—" The ancient Hindus attained as thorough a proficiency in Medicine and Surgery as any people whose acquisitions are recorded."

Medicine.

Dr. Hunter :—" Their practice of Physic embraced the classifications, causes, symptoms and treatment of diseases, diagnosis and prognosis."

Curative and Preventive Medicine.

Lord Ampthil, while declaring open the Indian Institute of Preventive Medicine at Madras, said that " they can lay claim to have been acquainted with the main principles of curative and preventive medicine ".

Surgery.

Mr. Weber says :—" In Surgery too the Indians seem to have attained a special proficiency and in this department European Surgeons might perhaps even at the present day still learn something from them as indeed they have already borrowed from them the operation of Rhinoplasty."

Mr. Elphinstone :—" Their surgery is as remarkable as their medicine."

Dr. Hunter :—" The surgery of the ancient Indian physicians was bold and skilful. They conducted amputations, arresting the bleeding by pressure, practised lithotomy; performed operations in the abdomen and uterus; cured hernia, fistula, piles; set broken bones and dislocations, and were dexterous in the extraction of foreign substances from the body. A special branch of surgery was devoted to Rhinoplasty or operation for improving deformed ears and noses and forming new ones, a useful operation which European surgeons have now borrowed The ancient Indian surgeons also mention a cure of neuralgia analogous to the modern cutting of the fifth nerve above the eye-brow. They devoted great care to the making of surgical instruments and to the training of students by means of operations."

Mr. Elphinstone :—" They cut for the stone, couched for the cataract."

Midwifery.

Dr. Hunter :—" They were expert in Midwifery, not shrinking from the most critical operations."

Mr. Elphinstone :—" They extracted the fœtus from the womb."

Hygiene:

Dr. Hunter :—" Much attention was devoted to Hygiene, regimen of the body and diet."

Dr. Furnell, Dy. Surgeon General and Sanitary Commissioner, Madras, in his lecture delivered on the 1st April 1882 most vigorously supported the claims of Hindu Medicine as the most advanced sciences ever cultured in the world. Speaking of the importance of drinking unpolluted water, he said that " As the ancient Hindus were superior to all others in other respects, so also were they superior to the others in recognising the importance and value of water as well as in insisting upon preserving the water from fifth of any kind whatever". He added that in his address to the Convocation in 1879 he had said that the Hindu physicians were unrivalled in all branches of Medicine. He then described the instructions contained in the Hindu Medical works with regard to the use of water which he said were most remarkable.

Colonel King gives clear proof that the ancient caste injunctions of the Hindus were based on a belief in the existence of transmissible agents of disease.

BACTERIOLOGY.

Colonel King :—" Both Hindus and Mahomedans used inoculation by small-pox virus as a protection against small-pox, and certain it is that long before Jenner's great discovery, or to be more correct re-discovery of vaccination, this art of inoculation was used for a while in Europe, where it has been imported from Constantinople, and knowledge of Medicine which flourished in the Near East at the commencement of the Christian Era emanated, as I have already shown you, from India."

Dr. J. A. Turner, M.D., Executive Health Officer, Bombay, in his book styled " Sanitation of India " says :—" Inoculation (for small-pox) was a most ancient custom of India practised by a particular tribe of Brahmins delegated from the different Colleges of Brindaban, Benares, etc."

H. E. the Governor of Madras :—" It is also very probable, so Colonel King assures me, that the ancient Hindus used animal vaccination secured by transmission of the small-pox virus through the cow."

His Excellency Lord Ampthil further said that " modern plague policy of evacuation and disinfection is not a wit different from that enjoined in ancient Hindu Shastras."

Mr. Elphinstone :—" They have long practised inoculation."

DISEASES OF WOMEN AND CHILDREN.

Mr. Elphinstone :—" They were experts in the diseases of women and children."

ANATOMY.

Sir William Hunter :—" Indian Medicine dealt with the whole area of science. It describes the structure of the body, its organs, ligaments, muscles, vessels, and tissues."

CHEMISTRY.

Mr. Elphinstone :—" As regards their knowledge of the science of Chemistry, their chemical skill is in fact more striking and more unexpected."

Dr. Ray says :—" We have only to refer our readers to the chapter on the preparation of caustic alkali in the Susruta with the direction that the strong lye is to be preserved in an iron vessel, as a proof of the high degree of perfection in scientific pharmacy achieved by the Hindus at an early age. It is absolutely free from any trace of quackery or charlatanism."

" From the evidence we have adduced all along there can now be scarcely any question as regards the priority of the Hindus in making mercurial remedies a speciality; and they are entitled to claim originality in respect of the internal administration of metals generally.

" In Europe however the medical virtues of mercury do not appear to have been at all ascertained even in the days of Pliny the elder; that writer termed quicksilver the bane and poison of all things and what would with more propriety be called death silver."

BOTANY.

Professor Wilson :—" The extent and fertility of their native country furnish them with many valued drugs and medicaments."

METERIA MEDICA.

Sir W. Hunter :—" Materia Medica of the Hindus embraces a vast collection of drugs belonging to the mineral vegetable and animal kingdoms, many of which have now been adopted by European physicians."

Professor Wilson :—" Their Materia Medica is most voluminous."

PHARMACY.

Sir W. Hunter:—"Their Pharmacy contained ingenious processes of preparation with elaborate directions for the administration and classification of medicines."

The action of the Executive Committee of the Medical Council in reference to Dr. Popat as disclosed by the annexed correspondence is sufficient to show the imperative necessity of the explanation in the interest of Schools and Institutions like the Ayurvedic College teaching the ancient systems of Medicine and turning out practitioners to whom thousands of the population of India resort for relief and who would otherwise go without any medical help or relief at all. Such a result must be regarded as a public calamity and it would be highly inexpedient and impolitic to coerce however indirectly 90 per cent. of the population of the country to resort to practitioners of Western Medicine in whom rightly or wrongly they do not feel confidence or go without any medical relief at all. Such an action moreover would seem only to accentuate and intensify the public prejudice and dislike of the European system of medicine.

We trust Government will be pleased to appreciate the necessity of such an amendment as the Honourable Mr. Patel intends to propose and of exemplifying and illustrating the true meaning and intent of the phrase "Infamous conduct in any professional respect" even if it be not possible to give a clear and comprehensive definition of the phrase.

I beg to acknowledge receipt of your letter No. 670, dated 9th December 1915, and in reply I beg to state as follows :—

I note that pending an explanation from me the Executive Committee have not resolved to institute an inquiry under the rules to which I refer and that they have merely intimated their opinion to me that my position in connection with the Prabhuram Ayurvedic College is incompatible with my status as a registered medical practitioner and left it to me to take such action or offer such explanation as I might desire.

I thank the Committee for the consideration they have shown to me and conveying me their opinion simply, but I again beg to submit that in doing so they ought in all fairness state to me the information that may have reached the office or complaint if any received setting out the circumstances under and the grounds upon which and how far and in what way and manner my position with and what kind of connection or what act or commission or omission of mine in connection with the Prabhuram Ayurvedic College is incompatible under section 9 of the Act, for, so far as the provision of the said section is concerned, it simply empowers the Committee to direct the removal of a medical practitioner's name from the Register on two grounds, viz.:—

(1) His conviction of a cognizable offence as defined in the Criminal Procedure Code, or

(2) He, after due enquiry, having been held guilty by them of infamous conduct in any professional respect.

Your letter under reply is quite explicit that the 1st ground is not the one on which Committee asks for my explanation. The 2nd ground is not in any way defined or made explicit in the section under notice and it therefore requires that he should be found guilty upon due enquiry being made and the rules made thereunder lays down a procedure for it.

You as well as the Committee will thus see that I ought to know, before I can offer my explanation, the nature of the information that may have reached the office, or any complaint made against me charging me of any and what infamous conduct in any professional respect, with full particulars of any act, commission or omission of mine and the circumstances under and the grounds upon which the Committee have formed their opinion so kindly conveyed to me, that I may be able fully to explain the same and remove any misapprehension they may have regarding my such connection and association with Prabhuram Ayurvedic College; and I need hardly say that in deference to the consideration shown to me I am most anxious to offer my explanation that may be required of me by the Committee as soon as I am made aware of the points as to which of my action, commission or omission in connection with my association with the Institution they require my explanation or to what the Committee take an exception in reference thereto.

Trusting you will please at the earliest opportunity possible convey me the information asked for by me in the above paragraph, so that I may offer my explanation as early as possible and remove any misapprehension the Committee may have on the subject of my association or connection with the said Prabhuram Ayurvedic College.

I beg to remain, etc.,

Dear Dr. Popat Prabhuram,

I should be greatly obliged if you would kindly furnish at a very early date, for the use of this office, one copy of the pamphlet which you have published containing notes on the Ayurvedic system of medicine as taught in the Prabhuram Ayurvedic College. I believe that you have presented copies of the pamphlet to the Surgeon General and certain other members of the Medical Council.

Dear Mr. Joseph Bocarro,

Yours of the 23rd instant. As desired therein I have great pleasure in sending you under separate cover a copy of the pamphlet containing "Notes on the Ayurvedic system of Medicine as taught in the Prabhuram Ayurvedic College." The contents of the pamphlet were furnished by me to the Surgeon General at his request and were subsequently published by the Committee of the College. Yes, I have presented copies to certain medical gentlemen, some of whom are members of the Medical Council.

Sir,

Your association with a system of treatment foreign to that which the Bombay Medical Act has been framed to protect became known to the members of the Executive Committee through advertisements appearing in the daily paper and has since been admitted by you in your letters and in a prospectus which you have sent to some of the members.

2. Such association would appear to constitute a primâ facie case of unprofessional conduct inasmuch as it implies that you being a registered practitioner, by your presence, countenance, advice, assistance and co-operation, knowingly enable unqualified or unregistered persons to attend, treat and perform operations upon patients in respect of matters requiring professional discretion or skill as if such persons were fully qualified. For this reason the Executive Committee first sent you a warning note as to the incompatibility of your status and subsequently informed you that their opinion was based on the powers prescribed by section 9.

3. As from your reply dated the 8th January 1916 to the letter, you evidently mistook the position, the matter was taken up under Rules 75 and 78 and I was directed to call for an explanation as required by the latter rule which I did in my last letter.

Sir,

I beg to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of 18th November.

Now that I know for the first time the reasons for your previous correspondence with me, I am preparing a detailed reply which will be sent to you as early as possible. It will take some time because instead of replying to my specific questions put by me in my last letter, your Committee has taken up quite a different position based on mere conjectures and inferences on surmises only, as will be pointed out in my next letter.

Sir,

I beg to acknowledge receipt of your letter No. 740, dated 18th November 1916, and your reminder No. 205, dated 12th April 1917, in answer to my letter dated 8th January 1916 and in reply to observe as follows, viz., you have not stated the circumstances under and the grounds upon which and how far and in what way and manner my position with and what kind of connection or what act or commission or omission of mine in connection with the Prabhuram Ayurvedic College is incompatible under section 9 of the Medical Council Act, with my position as a registered Medical practitioner, nor have you conveyed to me the nature of the information that might have reached the office, or any complaint made against me charging me with any and what infamous conduct in any professional respect, and the full particulars of any act of commission or omission of mine, and the circumstances under and the grounds upon which the Committee has formed their opinion so kindly conveyed to me, so as to enable me fully to explain the same and remove any misapprehension they might have regarding my connection or association with the Prabhuram Ayurvedic College, which I requested the Committee through you to furnish by my letter of the 8th day of January 1916, notwithstanding that I furnished to you as required by the Committee (vide your letter of 23rd February 1916) one copy of the pamphlet compiled by me, containing notes on the Ayurvedic system of medicine as taught in the Prabhuram Ayurvedic College with my letter of the 28th idem. This gives full details as to :—

(1) How the Institution came into existence;
(2) The course of study in detail;
(3) The text books and the books of reference recommended;
(4) The facilities for teaching;
(5) The prescribed examinations, and
(6) The names of the successful students since the year 1901, to which I shall refer in detail later on.

Nor have the Committee indeed asked you to mention any specific instance on which they have formed their opinion, that my association with the Prabhuram Ayurvedic College is prima facie a case of unprofessional conduct, an expression to which I take exception and protest against its use in correspondence in general sweeping terms, without stating what acts, commission or omission in respect thereof is considered unprofessional conduct.

2. I note that the Committee in asking you to write to me for explanations consider that—

(a) My association is with a system of treatment foreign to that which the Bombay Medical Act has been passed to protect, and
(b) That such association would appear to constitute a prima facie case of unprofessional conduct inasmuch as it implies that I being a registered practitioner by my (1) presence, (2) countenance, (3) advice, (4) assistance, and (5) co-operation, knowingly enable unqualified or unregistered persons to (a) attend, (b) treat and (c) perform operations on patients in respect of matters requiring professional discretion or skill, as if such person was duly qualified.

(c) That as in the opinion of the Committee my letter of the 8th January shows that I mistook the position the matter was taken up under Rules 75 and 78 and I was called upon to give explanation as required by the latter.

A. As regards point (a) suggested in your letter under reply, I submit that a perusal of the Statement of Objects and Reasons published in the Bombay Government Gazette, Part VII, page 389, of 21st August 1911, will clearly show that the Act was not intended, and does not as a matter of fact pretend to protect any particular system of treatment as is erroneously supposed by the Committee, nor indeed does it compel any one to get himself registered. This misapprehension on the part of the Committee as to the aims of the Act at once explain that the position taken up by the Committee regarding my association with the Prabhuram Ayurvedic College is altogether unsustainable.

As to point (b), the more I go into it the more I am convinced that the Committee have formed its opinion on mere surmises and inferences of their own, unsupported by any facts and it is stated so vaguely in general terms, that it can only be refuted by a general denial of the charge.

The Statement of Objects and Reasons published with the introduction of the Bill for the Medical Act, while stating in the clearest terms that the Bill is to protect the public, afford means for ascertaining whether any particular medical practitioner possesses certain scheduled qualifications, says that the Bill follows in general outline the English Act (21 and 22 Vic. X, chap. 91) without however prohibiting in any way the recovery of charges by unregistered persons, and winds up by saying that " while therefore it places no direct restriction upon the practice of Indian Vaids and Hakims, it will improve the status of the qualified medical men ".

Having regard to the official utterances of His Excellency the Viceroy and other officers quoted below, I venture to say that I am right in thinking that the Committee has fallen into an error of judgment in arriving at the conclusion that the Act was framed to protect any particular system of treatment and that therefore I have (in the opinion of the Committee) acted wrongly in associating with the Prabhuram Ayurvedic College, which teaches the Ayurvedic system of treatment. The official utterances I have alluded to above may be summarised thus :—His Excellency the Viceroy and Governor General of India, Lord Hardinge, before leaving India, laid the foundation stone of an institution called the Ayurvedic Tibbi College at Delhi on 29th March 1916, when he observed and very rightly that " 90 per cent. of the population of the country took advantage of the Ayurvedic and Unani systems of medicine " and further that " I cannot but recognise that there is good in them (the Ayurvedic and Unani Systems) and it is far better for the masses of people where Western science cannot for a long time reach, that these ancient systems of medicine should be modernised as much as possible to meet present-day requirements, and that they should have their benefit rather than have no treatment at all.

Order No. 36569 of 23rd May 1916 under the signature of Mr. P. W. Monie, Secretary to the Government of Bombay, says " It is not denied that there are at present capable practitioners of the ancient methods " and the fact has been corroborated by Sir Pardey Lukis, the Director-General of the Indian Medical Service, who in his official speech in the Imperial Council in March 1916 says that " I resent strongly that spirit of trade unionism, which leads many modern doctors to stigmatise all Vaids and Hakims as quacks and charlatans ". He further says in the said speech that " I do not recognise any fixed line of demarcation between the Eastern and the Western system of medicine ".

Not only do the above official utterances clearly show that the Government is not partial to any system, but there are still more weighty and matured opinions of officials and professional men practising Western medicine, that the Ayurvedic system is complete in itself, as will appear from the following quotations which are very important for the Committee to consider in judging my connection with Prabhuram Ayurvedic College, before characterising it as unprofessional conduct on my part, and to which as stated above I take exception. I resent the insinuation and deny it in toto.

On Medicine and Surgery.

Prof. Wilson :—"The ancient Hindus attained as thorough a proficiency in Medicine and Surgery as any people whose acquisitions are recorded."

Medicine.

Dr. Hunter :—"Their practice of Physic embraced the classifications, causes symptoms and treatment of diseases, diagnosis and prognosis."

Curative and Preventive Medicine.

Lord Ampthil, while declaring open the Indian Institute of Preventive Medicine at Madras, said that "they can lay claim to have been acquainted with the main principles of curative and preventive medicine".

Surgery.

Mr. Weber says :—"In Surgery too the Indians seem to have attained a special proficiency and in this department European Surgeons might perhaps even at the present day still learn something from them as indeed they have already borrowed from them the operation of Rhinoplasty."

Mr. Elphinstone :—"Their surgery is as remarkable as their medicine."

Dr. Hunter :—"The surgery of the ancient Indian physicians was bold and skilful. They conducted amputations, arresting the bleeding by pressure; practised lithotomy; performed operations in the abdomen and uterus; cured hernia, fistula, piles; set broken bones and dislocations, and were dexterous in the extraction of foreign substances from the body. A special branch of surgery was devoted to Rhinoplasty or operation for improving deformed ears and noses and forming new ones, a useful operation which European surgeons have now borrowed. The ancient Indian Surgeons also mention a cure of neuralgia anologous to the modern cutting of the fifth nerve above the eye-brow. They devoted great care to the making of surgical instruments and to the training of students by means of operations."

Mr. Elphinstone :—"They cut for the stone, couched for the cataract."

Midwifery.

Dr. Hunter :—"They were expert in Midwifery, not shrinking from the most critical operations."

Mr. Elphinstone :—"They extracted the fœtus from the womb."

Hygiene.

Dr. Hunter :—"Much attention was devoted to Hygiene, regimen of the body and diet."

Dr. Furnell, Dy. Surgeon General and Sanitary Commissioner, Madras, in his lecture delivered on the 1st April 1882 most vigorously supported the claims of Hindu medicine as the most advanced sciences ever cultured in the world. Speaking of the importance of drinking unpolluted water, he said that "As the ancient Hindus were superior to all others in other respects, so also were they superior to the others in recognising the importance and value of water as well as in insisting upon preserving the water from filth of any kind whatever". He added that in his address to the Convocation in 1879 he had said that the Hindu Physicians were unrivalled in all branches of medicine. He then described the instructions contained in the Hindu Medical works with regard to the use of water which he said were most remarkable.

Colonel King gives clear proof that the ancient caste injunctions of the Hindus were based on a belief in the existence of transmissible agents of disease.

Bacteriology.

Colonel King.—"Both Hindus and Mahomedans used inoculation by small-pox virus as a protection against small-pox, and certain it is that long before Jenner's great discovery, or to be more correct re-discovery of vaccination, this art of inoculation was used for a while in Europe, where it has been imported from Constantinople, and knowledge of medicine which flourished in the Near East at the commencement of the Christian Era emanated, as I have already shown you, from India."

Dr. J. A. Turner, M.D., Executive Health Officer, Bombay, in his book styled "Sanitation of India" says:—"Inoculation (for small-pox) was a most ancient custom of India practised by a particular tribe of Brahmins delegated from the different Colleges of Brindaban, Benares, etc."

H. E. the Governor of Madras—"It is also very probable, so Col. King assures me, that the ancient Hindus used animal vaccination secured by transmission of the small-pox virus through the cow."

His Excellency Lord Ampthil further said that "modern plague policy of evacuation and disinfection is not a wit different from that enjoined in ancient Hindus Shastras".

Mr. Elphinstone.—"They have long practised inoculation."

DISEASES OF WOMEN AND CHILDREN.

Mr. Elphinstone.—"They were experts in the diseases of women and children."

ANATOMY.

Sir William Hunter.—"Indian medicine dealt with the whole area of science. It describes the structure of the body, its organs, ligaments, muscles, vessels, and tissues."

CHEMISTRY.

Mr. Elphinstone.—"As regards their knowledge of the science of Chemistry, their chemical skill is in fact more striking and more unexpected."

Dr. Ray says:—"We have only to refer our readers to the chapter on the preparation of caustic alkali in the Susruta with the direction that the strong lye is to be preserved in an iron vessel, as a proof of the high degree of perfection in scientific pharmacy achieved by the Hindus at an early age. It is absolutely free from any trace of quackery or charlatanism.

"From the evidence we have adduced all along there can now be scarcely any question as regards the priority of the Hindus in making mercurial remedies a speciality; and they are entitled to claim originality in respect of the internal administration of metals generally.

"In Europe however the medical virtues of mercury do not appear to have been at all ascertained even in the days of Pliny the elder; that writer termed quicksilver the bane and poison of all things and what would with more propriety be called death silver."

BOTANY.

Prof. Wilson.—"The extent and fertility of their native country furnish them with many valued drugs and medicaments."

MATERIA MEDICA.

Sir W. Hunter.—"Materia Medica of the Hindus embraces a vast collection of drugs belonging to the mineral, vegetable and animal kingdoms, many of which have now been adopted by European physicians."

Prof. Wilson.—"Their Materia Medica is most voluminous."

PHARMACY.

Sir W. Hunter.—"Their Pharmacy contained ingenious processes of preparation with elaborate directions for the administration and classification of medicines."

B. Now as to the second point mentioned in your letter under reply and noted by me as above, allow me to say that I emphatically deny the charge that my association as stated in point B noted by me as above would appear to constitute a prima facie case of unprofessional conduct. I also deny that it implies that I by my presence, countenance, advice, assistance and co-operation knowingly enable unqualified or unregistered persons to attend, treat and perform operations upon patients in respect of matters requiring professional discretion or skill. I challenge you to cite a single instance of the kind. There is no room even to suppose anything of the kind as my notes, which I sent you at the request of the Committee long before the date of your letter under reply, amply prove that nothing of the kind supposed by the Committee could occur. The students are taught the Ayurvedic system scientifically which is perfect in itself, and the principal and other teachers do nothing more than what every professor does in any recognised college, viz., they teach and impart instruction to students how to treat a case, and do not allow them to attend, treat or perform operations by themselves, until they pass their examinations and satisfy the tests fixed by the rules and regulations of the College. All the teachers in the college are well qualified in the Anyurvedic system, and no unqualified man is employed in the college as is clearly stated in my notes sent to you.

I cannot help expressing my surprise at the general way and on mere surmise and imagination on which the Committee has gone to the length of saying that it is a prima facie case of unprofessional conduct. Seeing that there can be no objection to Ayurvedic practitioners who have studied the science completely to practise, your Committee have no business to describe all who do not practise Western system as unqualified, and if I am permitted, I will quote one instance which in itself is quite sufficient to say that the Government of Bombay by legislation amended the Medical Act in order to recognise one of the graduates of the Prabhuram Ayurvedic College to hold an appointment which according to the Act could be held by a registered practitioner only.

With due respect and deference to the opinion of the Committee I must protest against the insinuation made by the Committee against the whole system, and say that I am guilty of unprofessional conduct because I have associated myself with an institution teaching Ayurved. This institution, according to the opinion of many local eminent and professional men, is doing good to the public in supplying well educated and trained practitioners of the Ayurvedic system for upwards of 20 years openly and with the knowledge of the whole profession.

The College has been successful and has passed out 52 graduates during these years and has conferred its Ayurvedic Diplomas on these graduates at the hands of eminent citizens of Bombay whose utterances and opinions expressed at public meetings are quoted below:—

Hon. Chief Justice Sir Lawrence Jenkins says:—"I think there can be no doubt that this Institution is capable of doing great and good work, and I say this with more confidence when I see on my right and left such distinguished Medical experts as Sir Francis Lovell, Dr. Quick, Dr. Turner and Sir Bhalchandra Krishna."

(Presidential address.)

Hon. Sir Justice N. G. Chandavarkar says:—"The Institution carries on its operations in a scientific manner I consider that the Institution deserves the support, the sympathy and the patronage of every right-minded man."

(Presidential address.)

Hon. Dr. Sir R. G. Bhandarkar, M.A., LL.D , M.R.A.S., K.C.I.E., says:—"The doctors turned out by this Institution will meet a want that is widely felt."

(Presidential address.)

The Hon. Mr. Justice Badruddin Tyebji says:—"The Institution does furnish its students with sufficient knowledge of Eastern system of medicine to make it safe for our people to entrust their health to the care of its students."

(Presidential address.)

H. H Sir Bhavsingji Maharaja Saheb of Bhavnagar says:—"The Institution is one which had a vacancy long since in the minds of persons knowing the importance of the Hindu Ayurved."

(Visit, 1905.)

The Hon. Mr. Goculdas Kahandas Parekh says:—"The Ayurved Vidyalaya (The Prabhuram Ayurvedic College) is one of the various indications of the intellectual advance that the country has been making in recent years."

(Speech, Con. Gathering, 1901.)

Lieut.-Colonel K. R. Kirtikar, I.-M. S., says:—"It is my privilege to know almost all the teachers who are on the staff of this Institution. They are all able men, young men, and men who are sure of success in teaching the special subjects which they have selected for imparting instructions in."

(Speech, Con. Gathering, 1902.)

Dr. M. G. Deshmukh, M.D., B.A., B.Sc., J.P., says:—"The Institution is every year making good progress and any one who cared to see for himself the way in which instruction was being imparted in the school would be satisfied that everything there was arranged in the properly systematic manner."

(Speech, Con. Gathering, 1904.)

Dr. Sir Bhalchandra Krishna, Kt., L.M., J.P., says:—"The instruction is given by means of lectures, charts, models, specimens of drugs and clinical practice in a dispensary and an hospital."

(Speech, Con. Gathering.)

Dr. Shivnath Ramnath, Chief Medical Officer, Bhavnagar State, says:—"The Institution is towards the best direction at a time when petty Vaidyas are cropping up by cramming stray translations."

(Visit.)

Divan Bahadur Ambalal S. Desai says:—"I sat through Dr. Popat's lecture and must say it was very clear, able, and instructive. I was fortunately present on the day the Institution was opened, and it has given me great pleasure to observe the remarkable progress made by it during the short time."

(Visit.)

Dr. G. B. Prabhakar, L.R.C.P., L.M. & S., J.P., says:—"It has grown into a full fledged medical school."

No. 25057 of 1915-16.

Bombay, 3rd November 1915.

Municipality of Bombay,
Public Works Department.

From

John A. Turner, M.D., D.P.H.,
Executive Health Officer.

Dear Dr. Popat,

I have read the report of your Society with interest and note the rapid extension and improvement in the teaching of the Ayurvedic College.

There is no doubt that you reach a class of people who would otherwise be without any medical help, and this class is large even in Bombay where there are so many qualified medical men. I know from personal observation that many of the poorer classes die without calling in any medical aid. If your Society could reach them, you would be doing a very useful work.

Yours faithfully,
J. A. Turner.

I have been in my humble way assisting a cause to put an end to quackery by training and producing efficient men to practise the Ayurvedic system and in doing so I must again repeat that, with due deference to the opinion of your Committee, I am not in any way guilty of unprofessional conduct.

The pamphlet I sent to you gives a full and detailed curriculum and the titles of the books which are taught to them. These books, as is stated by eminent professional men and other officials, contain a complete system of medicine, and to which for a certain extent in their opinion the Western system owes a great deal; and yet your Committee, without giving any reason, or stating any facts, simply held that my connection with this Institution, of the nature stated above, is prima facie a case of unprofessional conduct.

C. I do not understand the 3rd point suggested in your letter and stated above by me. If your Committee is acting under rules 75 and 78 of the Medical Act, then I say the explanations should have been asked for in the name of the President, and not the Committee, and a copy of an abstract reported to be made by the Registrar under rule 75 and to be submitted under rule 78 should have been in all fairness forwarded to me, which would have saved time and given me an opportunity to explain, and the matter would not have been ventilated to the prejudice of the Institution and myself in so vague a manner.

I need hardly say that from the very commencement I have been trying my best to give the Committee any explanation they want and convince them that my association with the Prabhuram Ayurvedic College is what it should be, and with a laudable object to train and turn out qualified men under the Ayurvedic system, which I consider to be most useful to the masses of people, say 90 per cent. according to official statements, without in the least degree under-rating the Western system I have learnt and practise, and for which I entertain the same opinion as the members of the Committee and the profession. If your Committee however decide to investigate the matter under the said rules, I shall be but too glad to stand the investigation and defend myself, if and when a formal charge with the necessary particulars are furnished to me. To such open enquiry and investigation I am entitled as a matter of right and claim, if after the above explanation, your Committee still think it right and proper to persist in an opinion formed ex parte by them.

In conclusion I give my honest opinion that after having studied the Western system, to assist the ancient Ayurvedic system so ably spoken of by men higher in rank than myself, is no sin, and not in the least degree either prima facie or at all unprofessional on my part. My presence, countenance, advice, assistance and co-operation are not with unqualified men, and I have not helped such persons to attend, treat or perform operations upon patients. All I have done and am doing is to teach the students and show them how to attend and treat patients, as all other professors and teachers do in Medical Colleges. Hence to say or to infer that I do so to enable unqualified persons to attend, treat, etc., is not true and I challenge the Committee to prove the same.

Trusting that these explanations will be found satisfactory to the Committee,

I have, etc.,

THE SECRETARY TO THE GOVERNMENT OF BOMBAY,
Legal Department.

Simla, the 4th September 1917.

Sir,

I am directed to return herewith, with the assent of His Excellency the Viceroy and Governor General signified thereon, the authentic copy of the Law noted on the margin, which was received with your letter No. 674, dated the 18th August 1917.

The Bombay Municipal and Local Boards (Amendment) Law, 1917.

I have the honour to be,
Sir,
Your most obedient Servant,

(Signed) A. P. MUDDIMAN,
Secretary to the Government of India.

REPORT OF THE SELECT COMMITTEE APPOINTED TO CONSIDER AMENDMENTS TO THE RULES FOR THE CONDUCT OF BUSINESS AT MEETINGS OF THE LEGISLATIVE COUNCIL OF THE GOVERNOR OF BOMBAY.

We, the undersigned members of the select committee appointed to consider certain amendments in the Rules for the Conduct of Business at meetings of the Legislative Council of the Governor of Bombay, of which notice had been given and which are shown in Part I of the schedule appended to this report, and to report to the Council what modifications should be made in the rules in view of the said amendments, have the honour to report as follows:—

The amendments referred to us raise questions of principle falling under two main heads, to which we will in the first instance allude.

(1) The rule which the Honourable Mr. Patel proposes to introduce as rule 21A, makes the "member in charge" of the bill the chairman of the select committee ex officio, but does not define the expression "member in charge". This expression is ambiguous. We think, however, that if it came to be construed, the meaning attributable to it would be that given in the definitions in rule 1 of the Rules relating to Financial Resolutions, to the discussion of matters of General Public Interest and to the asking of questions; that is (in effect) the member of the Executive Council in charge of the department concerned. It is however necessary to avoid any ambiguity on the point. It was with this end in view that the Honourable Sir M. B. Chaubal proposed to insert an express definition of "member in charge" in rule 1. The questions of principle then, which are raised by these two proposals, are (a) whether the member of the Executive Council in charge of the department concerned should invariably be a member of the select committee, and (b) whether if so he should be chairman thereof. Government, being charged with the welfare and good governance of the Presidency, must necessarily be interested in all legislation. Further the member of the Executive Council in charge of the department concerned has either a greater knowledge or at any rate a greater means of knowledge on the matters under discussion than any other member, including the introducer of the bill. Lastly, from the point of view of the introducer of the bill, it is to be presumed that he desires to make use of the knowledge at the disposal of Government and to know the views of Government on all matters under discussion. We are therefore of opinion that question (a) should be answered in the affirmative.

We are further of opinion that if once it be conceded that the member of the Executive Council in charge of the department concerned should be a member of the select committee, it is but in the fitness of things that he should be chairman, unless he is prepared to waive his right to be so. The sub-rules (2) and (3), which we recommend should be added to rule 21, have been framed to give effect to these views. These sub-rules represent the substance of the Honourable Mr. Patel's proposed rule 21A, combined with the Honourable Sir M. B. Chaubal's proposed definition.

(2) The second main question which we have considered is whether the procedure at present provided for in rule 28, according to which a member desiring to introduce a bill first asks leave of the Council for its introduction, should be done away with, as proposed in the Honourable Mr. Patel's group of amendments dealing with rule 28. The stage of legislation in question is recognized in section 80 of the Government of India Act, 1915, and in the rules of all legislative councils in India, and we are of opinion that no case has been made out for its abolition. It is true that in the case of bills framed by Government, this stage is usually omitted and introduction is ordinarily effected by publication in the Gazette as provided by Proviso (5) to Rule 28. Government bills however stand on a somewhat different footing from additional members' bills. A Government bill is generally the outcome of prolonged consideration, and the resources at the disposal of Government enable it to undertake enquiries and to obtain information more readily than an additional member can do. Hence a Government measure is first published in a more mature state than would ordinarily be the case with an additional member's bill. Moreover the local Government is not the only Government concerned in local legislation. A proper interval is required to enable the local Government to inform the Government of India and the Secretary of State of a bill of which notice is given and to receive replies. Lastly in the case of an additional member's bill the drafting frequently requires considerable alteration. We should further point out that Proviso (5) to Rule 28 permits the Governor in his discretion to order the introduction by publication in the Government Gazette of bills in suitable instances, whether they be private bills or Government bills. This was done in the case of the bill for compulsory education which was read for the first time at the sessions of the Council in July last. For these reasons we advise the retention of the present procedure.

2. We considered the question whether leave to introduce a bill must be dispensed with in the case of bills that require the sanction of the Governor, and we think it is more in accord with the spirit of sections 79 and 80 of the Government of India Act, 1915, that the sanction should have been given previous to the motion for leave to introduce. This recommendation, we may mention, is in accord with the decision on the question in the Madras Legislative Council and in accordance with the rules in force in the Imperial Legislative Council.

3. The other amendments do not appear to require discussion. We have altered the wording of the Honourable Mr. Patel's proposed rule 31A and advise that it should be inserted after rule 37. The amendments of the rules which we recommend for adoption are collected in part II of the schedule.

MINUTE OF DISSENT BY THE HONOURABLE MR. V. J. PATEL, BAR.-AT-LAW.

This select committee as appointed by the Council consists of three official and two non-official members. I regret that the point of view of the official members is so diametrically opposed to that of the non-officials on the main questions referred to the committee that I find myself unable to sign the majority report. I, therefore, record my views in this separate minute.

Chairman of Select Committee on Bills.

The rules made under section 37 of the Indian Councils Act, 1861, make no provision for the appointment of chairman of select committee. Rule 21 of the said rules merely empowers the Legislative Council to appoint a select committee but makes no mention of the appointment of its chairman. In practice, however, the Council appoints the chairman or, where it does not, the member in charge of the Bill takes the chair as a matter of course. This practice, in my humble opinion, is, to say the least, irregular. I, therefore, gave notice to the Secretary of the Legislative Council of my intention to move the Council at its last meeting to add the following new rule after rule 21 of the rules for the conduct of Council business:—

"21(a). The member in charge of the Bill shall be invariably a member and also the chairman of any select committee to which the Bill is referred."

The Government thereupon in their letter No. 1825-L., dated 17th July 1917, inquired whether I would be prepared to substitute the words "the member of the Executive Council in charge of the Bill" in the place of the words "the member in charge of the Bill". I did not see my way to accept that suggestion.

Subsequently this motion along with several other motions was referred by the Legislative Council at its last meeting to this committee. During our deliberations the official members on the commitee took the same view as was intimated to me by the Government in their letter above referred to. It was contended by them that a member of the Executive Council knew more about the subject-matter of a Bill referred to a committee and that knowledge would be of immense use to the committee if he were the chairman. I cannot for a moment endorse the view that a member of the Executive Council, however well trained he may be in his official routine, knows more about the subject-matter of every Bill which an additional member, after careful study and anxious thought, may bring before the Council. It is matter of common knowledge that Government members, partly on account of their supposed exalted position which keeps them aloof from touch with popular feelings and grievances, and partly on account of heavy burden of their official duties, have not got the advantage of obtaining first-hand knowledge which the non-official members possess. Assuming, however, that a member of the Executive Council possesses greater knowledge than an ordinary member there is no reason whatever to suppose that he would not condescend to give the benefit of that knowledge to the committee as a member rather than as a chairman of that committee.

There is again a very serious objection to the proposal of the majority of the committee. Suppose, for instance, that an additional member's Bill is very vehemently opposed and severely criticised by the member of the Executive Council at its first reading. The Council, however, passes the first reading and refers it to select committee. Is it fair under those circumstances that the member who holds and has expressed very strong views against a measure should be the chairman of the committee appointed to consider it ?

It was further contended that the position of a member of the Executive Council ought to entitle him to become the chairman of the committee of which he is a member. I wish this argument had not been advanced. One wonders how long it is proposed to maintain the official element in our constitution on a tottering pinnacle of ' prestige '. The public interests demand that the members of the Government and representatives of the people on the Legislative Council should co-operate and work in harmony on a footing of absolute equality. After all the former are paid public servants and the latter honorary. How is harmonious working possible if one assumes an air of superiority over the other ? When a non-official member is reminded of the ' position ', ' prestige ', etc., of a member of Government, is not he justified in retorting that under some Government disciplinary rules, a member of Government is deprived of his liberty of speech or vote, for, whatever his personal convictions on a particular question may be, he must voice the views of Government and vote with them ; while a non-official member can speak out his mind freely and is at liberty to vote according to the dictates of his conscience ?

Having thus briefly answered the only arguments urged against my proposal that a member in charge of a Bill whether he be a member of the Executive Council or an ordinary member of the Legislative Council, should invariably be the chairman of the select committee, I now proceed to cite below the appropriate rules of some of the other Legislative Councils dealing with this question in the hope that the honourable members of the Legislative Council, who are really the ultimate judges of the propriety or otherwise of my proposal, will take them into their consideration at the proper time.

Rules 25 and 26 of the Burma Legislative Council rules.

" 25. The Government Advocate General, if he is the member of the Council, shall be a member of every select committee.

26. The other members of every select committee shall be named by the Council when the Bill is referred to a select committee or at any subsequent meeting.

The member in charge of the Bill shall be the chairman of the committee and in the case of equality of votes shall have a second or casting vote."

Rule 43 of the Madras Legislative Council rules.

" 43. The member in charge of a Bill shall invariably be a member and also the chairman of the select committee. . . . . "

Rule 10 of the Punjab Legislative Council rules.

" 10. .....

The member in charge of the Bill shall be the chairman of the committee and in the case of equality of votes shall have a second or casting vote."

Rule 35 of the Bengal Legislative Council rules.

"35. (1) The member in charge of a Bill shall ordinarily be the chairman of any select committee to which the Bill is referred.

(2) In the case of an equality of votes at any meeting of the select committee the chairman shall have a second or casting vote."

Rules 34 and 35 of the Assam Legislative Council rules.

"34. The Legal Remembrancer, if he is the member of the Council, shall be a member of every select committee.

35. .....

The member in charge of the Bill shall be the chairman of the committee and in case of equality of votes shall have a second or casting vote."

Motion for leave to introduce a Bill.

During our deliberations it was suggested that my motion to dispense with the leave stage was ultra vires of section 80 (1) of the Government of India Act, 1915, which contemplates a motion for leave for the introduction of any Bill. According to this view every Bill, whether of Government or of an additional member, must pass through the leave stage. I have carefully considered this aspect of the question and I am inclined to take the same view. Section 38 of the Indian Councils Act, 1861, laid down as follows :—

"It shall not be lawful for any member or additional member to make or for the Council to entertain any motion unless such motion shall be for leave to introduce some measure as aforesaid into the Council or have some reference to some measure actually introduced thereinto."

This section is repealed by the section 80 of the Government of India Act which provides :—

"At a meeting of local Legislative Council no motion shall be entertained other than a motion for leave to introduce a measure into the Council for the purpose of enactment or having reference to a measure introduced or proposed to be introduced into the Council for that purpose."

These statutory provisions make it perfectly clear that the first stage of a Bill to be introduced into any Legislative Council in India is motion for leave to introduce it. When such a motion is made it is for the legislature to say whether leave should be given or refused. If the legislature is satisfied that a practical necessity exists for the proposed legislation or that a state of things has arisen that necessitates such legislation, it may grant the necessary permission. The Government of India Act does not empower the legislature to dispense with the leave stage or to delegate its function to grant or refuse leave. Sub-rule 5 of rule 28 of our rules, however, gives the Governor power to order publication in the Bombay Government Gazette of any Bill though no motion for leave to introduce it has been made; and rule 29 (1) provides that such publication shall be deemed to be the introduction of the Bill. The result is that these rules give the Governor a power and a function which ought to rest and which do rightly rest in all constitutional countries with the legislature. The legislature is not responsible for these rules. They were made by the Executive Government when the Bombay Legislative Council was first established. It is difficult to understand, however, how the Government, who themselves did not possess these powers, transferred them to the Governor, when as a matter of fact even the legislature, as I have just observed, could not legally part with them. In this connection I should like to quote below a very emphatic expression of opinion recorded in 1862 by the then Secretary of State for India in his despatch No. 25 of 31st July in reference to a similar rule of the rules for the Imperial Legislative Council.

"A rule, the practical effect of which is that instead of moving for leave to introduce a Bill into the Council a member may send it to the Secretary to the Government in the Home Department to be dealt with as if leave has been given to introduce it, appears to me open to serious objection. The power vested in this Council at its meeting for making Laws and Regulations, of exercising a control over the introduction of the Bills is not to be considered a matter of form. There are certain subjects in regard to which the Council has no power to legislate; there are others in regard to which no member or additional member can introduce a Bill without the previous sanction of the Governor General, and others again in regard to which it may for obvious reasons be highly inexpedient to attempt legislation. In all such cases the power of imposing a check upon the introduction of Bills can be most effectively exercised at meetings of the Council. It must be further borne in mind that on such questions the additional as well as ordinary members have the privilege of voting. But the practice under your rules would go to deprive them of that privilege. The Government might, indeed, refuse to take any steps upon a Bill sent to the Secretary, but it is not fitting or expedient that the members of the Executive Council alone should exercise a power which belongs to every member of the Council when assembled for making Laws and Regulations. For these reasons I am of opinion that the initiative step for the introduction of every Bill should be taken at some such meeting of the Council."

For these reasons I maintain that sub-rule 5 of rule 28 and sub-rule (1) of rule 29 which, in effect, delegate to the Governor the function of legislature and thus empower him to dispense with the leave stage, are ultra vires and must be repealed.

Assuming for argument's sake that the legislature can legally dispense with the leave stage or delegate its function to do so to the Governor, I respectfully submit that all Bills whether of Government or of additional members should be treated alike in this respect by the delegate. Past experience has, however, shown that the Governor to whom are transferred the powers of legislature has invariably exercised those powers in favour of Government Bills and not in favour of Bills of additional members except in one solitary instance where the Government of India and the Bombay Government had accepted the principle of the particular Bill. That being so, the legislature should repeal the rules which empower the Governor to dispense with the leave stage at his discretion and resume the said powers and regulate the exercise thereof by a formal rule to the effect that in future any member of the Legislative Council may introduce a Bill at a meeting of the Council provided he has given to the Secretary two months' previous notice of his intention and sent with it a copy of the Bill and a full statement of objects and reasons.

Procedure where previous sanction of the Governor or the Governor General is required before the introduction of Bill.

Section 79, sub-sections (2) and (3), of the Government of India Act, 1915, enumerates cases in which it is not permissible for any local legislature to make or take into consideration or repeal or alter any law without the previous sanction of the Governor General. Section 80, sub-section (2), of the said Act makes it unlawful for a member of any local Legislative Council to introduce without the previous sanction of the Governor any measure affecting the public revenues of the province or imposing any charge on those revenues. The Honourable Sir Mahadev Chaubal proposes that an application for the necessary sanction shall be made through the Secretary by the member at the time when he gives notice of motion for leave to introduce a Bill. He further proposes that a member shall not be permitted to make motion for leave to introduce his Bill until such sanction has been received. With regard to the first proposal I contend that it is not necessary to make any rule fixing the time at which application for sanction must be made. It is, in my opinion, quite sufficient if the necessary sanction is obtained at or before proper time. So far as I know, no Legislative Council in India has made such a rule.

I now proceed to examine the second proposal of the Honourable Sir Mahadev Chaubal. Sub-section (1) of section 80 of the Government of India Act confers an absolute right on every member of any local Legislative Council to make a motion for leave to introduce a Bill. This sub-section read with sub-section (2) of the said section makes it perfectly clear that there is a distinction between a motion for leave to introduce a measure and the actual introduction of it after leave has been granted. There is no limitation on a member's right to make a motion for leave to introduce a measure. Sub-section (2), however, imposes limitation on his right to introduce the said measure after leave has been granted. That sub-section says: "It shall not be lawful for any member of any local Legislative Council to introduce, without the previous sanction of the Governor, Lieutenant-Governor, or Chief Commissioner, any measure affecting the public revenues of the province or imposing any charge on those revenues." Once a motion for leave to introduce any measure contemplated in this section is granted, the member shall not be permitted to introduce it unless he obtains the necessary sanction. The proposal of the Honourable Sir Mahadev, if accepted, would seriously interfere with a member's right to make a motion for leave and is therefore ultra vires of sub-section (1) of section 80 of the Government of India Act. No Legislative Assembly in India can pass laws or make rules which override any Parliamentary Enactment.

I should like in this connection to refer to the rules of some of the other local Legislative Councils on this question. Bengal and Behar Rules leave a member's right to make a motion for leave untouched. They clearly provide that after leave is obtained by the member he shall not be permitted to introduce the measure unless and until the necessary sanction has been accorded thereto. I quote below for the information of the Council the appropriate rule of the Bengal Legislative Council Rules:—

"29. (1) Any member desiring to move for leave to introduce a Bill in accordance with the provisions of section 37 or 38 of the Indian Councils Act, 1861, shall give the Secretary at least two months' notice of his intention and shall together with the notice send a copy of the Bill and a full statement of objects and reasons.

(2) If after expiration of the said period such motion be carried in Council the Secretary shall cause the Bill together with the statement of objects and reasons to be printed (if not already in print) and send a copy to each member and the Bill shall thereupon be deemed to have been introduced in the Council.

Provided that the President shall not permit the introduction of any Bill which requires the previous sanction of (a) the Governor under section 38 of the Indian Councils Act, 1861, or (b) the Governor General under—

(i) Section 43 of the said Act, or

(ii) Section 5 of the Indian Councils Act, 1892, as the case may be, unless and until such sanction has been duly accorded thereto."

Rule 31 of the Behar Council Rules makes similar provision.

In Madras, however, a proposal similar to the one which we are considering was discussed and passed at the last meeting of its Legislative Council in the teeth of very strong opposition by the non-official members, 21 voting for and 17 against it.

Apart from this question of ultra vires there is another very serious objection to the proposal of the Honourable Sir Mahadev Chaubal. If a motion for leave to introduce a measure is allowed to be discussed the Governor, who has to decide whether he should grant or refuse his sanction, will be in a far better position to exercise that discretion one way or the other on the materials brought to light during the course of such discussion. On the other hand, if the proposal of the Honourable Sir Mahadev Chaubal is accepted, the Governor will be deprived of the opportunity of having before him the views of the official and non-official members of the Council which can only be elicited if motion for leave is allowed to be discussed and he will have to grant or refuse sanction almost in the dark on the information supplied to him by the Secretariat. It seems to me, therefore, that the balance of advantage is in favour of allowing the motion for leave to be discussed before the Governor makes up his mind to grant or refuse sanction.

For these reasons, I am of opinion that the rules of our Council should provide that introduction of any Bill which requires the previous sanction of the Governor or the Governor General shall not be permitted unless and until such sanction has been duly obtained.

MINUTE OF DISSENT BY THE HONOURABLE MR. A. F. I. PATHAN.

I also decline to sign the report and record my view in this separate minute under rule 24 of the Rules for the conduct of Council business. I have had the advantage of seeing the very able and instructive minute of the Honourable Mr. V. J. Patel and I endorse fully his views on the first two questions dealt with by him.

The first question is whether an additional member of the Legislative Council, if he happens to introduce any bill, should not preside over the deliberations of the Select Committee to which the bill is referred. The official members contend that the member of the Executive Council, possessing, as he does, greater knowledge of the subject-matter than the introducer of the bill, would be very useful, if he were the Chairman of the Committee. Assuming for argument's sake that he does possess greater knowledge, I agree with the Honourable Mr. Patel that there is no reason to suppose that he would not give the benefit of that knowledge, if he were merely a member. I am quite confident that the member of the Executive Council, as a member of the Select Committee, would enlighten the Committee with the knowledge at the disposal of Government and also the views of Government on all matters under discussion. The Honourable Mr. Patel has quoted in his minute the rules of other Provincial Legislative Councils bearing on the question and I do not wish to repeat them. Under the circumstances I am of opinion that the introducer of the bill whether he be an additional member or a member of the Executive Council should, invariably, be the chairman of the Select Committee.

The second main question is whether leave stage should be dispensed with in the case of bills of additional members. If section 80 (i) of the Government of India Act is construed to mean that leave stage is legally required I am humbly of opinion that the section is applicable to Government bills also. That being so, the Legislative Council alone has the power to grant or refuse motion for leave to introduce any bill. If, however, it is thought that there is nothing illegal in dispensing with the leave stage, I strongly hold that bills of additional members should be placed on an equality with Government bills in this respect. I regret that the majority of the Committee thinks that in the case of an additional member's bill the drafting frequently requires considerable alterations. Any one who has compared the original bill on compulsory education as drafted by the Honourable Mr. Patel with the bill, as altered by the Legal Department, cannot fail to observe that the bill, as originally drafted, should have evoked much less comments than the altered bill as it appeared before the Council. I may further observe that just as a Government bill is the outcome of a prolonged consideration, that of an additional member is matured by the member after long thought, careful consideration, and mutual consultation. Besides, the Government gets two months' notice of an Ordinary Member's bill and that ought to suffice.

With regard to the 3rd question whether sanction, where necessary, should be obtained before motion for leave or before introduction. I may say that the decision of the question rests on the construction of section 80 (2) of the Government of India Act. The Honourable Mr. Patel and the Honourable the Advocate General have both differed from each other on the construction to be placed on this sub-section. The question is one, therefore, which requires to be thoroughly threshed out in the Council. Madras Council has supported the contention of the Honourable the Advocate General, while the rules of the Bengal and Behar Councils are in accordance with the views of the Honourbale Mr. Patel.

The humble Memorial of the Citizens of Bombay assembled at a public meeting on the 29th day of September 1917.

RESPECTFULLY SHEWETH :

1. That your Memorialists are desirous of submitting for the favourable consideration of Your Excellency in Council this Memorial with reference to the Bill to further amend the Bombay Medical Act, 1912.

They strongly feel that the view taken by the Executive Committee of the Medical Council appointed under the Act, of the meaning and operation of the phrase "infamous conduct in any professional respect" occurring in sections 7 and 9 of the said Act and sought to be pressed on Government for acceptance is not only erroneous and unsustainable but calculated to deal a serious blow to the ancient and renowned systems of Ayurvedic and Unani medicine so widely prevalent in this country and ministering to the wants and sufferings of at least 90 per cent. of its population.

2. As a concrete instance of the grave hardship and injustice involved in the acceptance of the view of the Medical Council your Memorialists crave leave to refer to the well-known and very popular Institution in Bombay known as the Prabhuram Ayurvedic College on whose behalf a representation has already been submitted to Government by the Managing Committee of the Institution and which your Memorialists fully endorse and support and with which they are in entire sympathy.

3. The Institution now known as Prabhuram Ayurvedic College of which Dr. Popat Prabhuram Vaidya, L. M. & S., is the Principal, was first established in the year 1896 by the late Vaidyaraj Prabhuram Jivanram of Porebunder who possessed a thorough knowledge of the Ayurvedic system, and his ability and experience were admitted by eminent Doctors like Col. Carter, Col. Grey, Col. Arnott, whom he frequently called in consultation, and it was at the suggestion of eminent Doctor friends and certain leading citizens of Bombay that he started the school with a view to spread the knowledge of that system of medicine for the benefit of the Vaidyas and the public who trusted to their treatment. Leading and eminent citizens of Bombay have expressed warm appreciation of the work and success of this College as set out in the aforesaid petition of its Managing Committee and Dr. Popat has repeatedly been thanked for the interest he has been taking in the welfare of the Institution without any remuneration, and its present success and position are mainly due to his earnest and disinterested work. The Institution would be deprived of his help and advice if the narrow and unwarranted interpretation of the phrase "infamous conduct in any professional respect" which the Executive Committee of the Medical Council press on the Government is accepted, as such a view would enable the Council to remove the name of Dr. Popat from the Medical Register on account of his association with the Institution.

4. Your Memorialists submit that the view taken by the Executive Committee and by the Medical Union in their protest is erroneous, illiberal, unsustainable, unworthy of a learned body belonging to a noble and liberal profession and opposed to the view of eminent Judges in England and expressed in the following words: "If it is shown that a medical man in pursuit of his profession has done something with regard to it which would be reasonably regarded as disgraceful or dishonourable by his professional brethern of good repute and competency, then it is open to the General Medical Council to say that he has been guilty of infamcus conduct in professional respect."

5. Your Memorialists respectfully submit that it would be gross perversion and abuse of language to say that Dr. Popat's action in imparting his knowledge of Ayurvedic Medicine to the students of this Institution and his association with it as an act of filial duty as an honorary worker and helper can reasonably be regarded as disgraceful or dishonourable conduct in pursuit of his profession. Indeed such action ought to be regarded as honourable and creditable, and it has moreover no reference to or connection with the pursuit of his own profession as a registered medical practitioner. Eminent members of the profession such as Lieut.-Col. Kirtikar, Sir Bhalchandra Krishna, Dr. Deshmukh, Dr. G. B. Prabhakar warmly approve and support such action and Dr. Turner, our Health Officer, has expressed his opinion as follows:—

"I have read the report of your Society with interest and note the rapid "extension and improvement in the teaching of the Ayurvedic College.

"There is no doubt that you reach a class of people who would otherwise "be without any medical help and this class is large even in Bombay where there "are so many qualified medical men. I know from personal observation that "many of the poorer classes die without calling in any medical aid. If your "Society could reach them you would be doing a very useful work."

His Excellency Lord Hardinge, Viceory and Governor-General of India, laid the foundation stone of a similar Institution at Delhi on 29th March 1916, and in the course of his speech said: "90 per cent. of the population of the country took advantage of the Ayurvedic and Unani systems of Medicines," and further "I cannot but recognize that there is good in them and it is far better for the masses of people where Western Science cannot for a long time reach that these ancient systems of Medicine should be modernised as much as possible to meet present day requirements and that they should have their benefit rather than have no treatment at all."

Sir Purdy Lukis, Director-General of the Indian Medical Service, in his speech in the Imperial Council in March 1916 said: "I resent strongly that spirit of trade-unionism which leads many modern Doctors to stigmatise all Vaids and Hakims as quacks and charlatans" and further he observed that "he cannot recognise any fixed line of demarcation between the Eastern and Western systems of medicine." Further Order No. 36569, dated 23rd May 1916, under the signature of Mr. P. W. Monie, Secretary to Government of Bombay, says: "It is not denied that there are at present capable practitioners of the ancient methods;" and yet the Bombay Medical Union in their representation, dated 7th July 1917, in sweeping terms says, "that the majority of men practising under the designation "of Vaids and Hakims are illiterate and uneducated and therefore even the "educated of these Vaids and Hakims should not be associated with or educated "by the medical practitioners."

6. Your Memorialists crave permission to refer to the opinions of learned members of the profession and other eminent men as to the high value of the Ayurvedic system of medicine in all departments of Science set out at length in the above representation of Ayurvedic College.

7. The action of the Executive Committee of the Medical Council in reference to Dr. Popat is sufficient to show the imperative necessity of a clear business-like and sympathetic explanation of the much disputed expression "infamous conduct in a professional respect" in the respect of Schools and Institutions like the Ayurvedic College teaching the ancient system of medicine and turning out practitioners to whom thousands of the population of India resort for relief and who would otherwise go without any medical help or relief at all. Such a result must be regarded as a public calamity, and it would be highly inexpedient and impolitic to coerce however indirectly 90 per cent. of the population of the country to resort to practitioners of Western Medicine in whom rightly or wrongly they do not feel confidence or go without any medical relief at all, such an action moreover would seem only to accentuate and intensify the public prejudice and dislike of the European system of Medicine.

Your Memorialists therefore pray that Your Excellency in Council will be pleased to reject the view and action of the Medical Council and provide a just, liberal and judicious interpretation of the clause "infamous conduct in a professional respect" in sections 7 and 9 of the Bombay Medical Act, 1912, in consonance with the feelings, needs and interest of the large bulk of the Indian population and with the high value of the Indian systems of Medicine.

And your Memorialists as in duty bound will ever pray.

His Excellency the PRESIDENT:—Bill further to amend the Bombay Medical Registration Act, 1912 (Bill No. III of 1917), first reading. The Honourable Mr. PATEL.

The Honourable Mr. VITHALBHAI JHAVERBHAI PATEL:—Your Excellency,—I rise to move the first reading of a bill to amend the Bombay Medical Registration Act, 1912. The first object of the bill is to secure an elective majority in the constitution of the Medical Council. The Punjab Medical Act provides for such majority on the Medical Council of that province. After the last meeting of the Council at which leave to introduce this bill was given to me, the Government of the United Provinces have published in their Gazette, dated the 4th August 1917, the United Provinces Medical Act, No. III of 1917. That act also gives an elective majority to the Medical Council of those Provinces. The Honourable Mr. O'DONNEL, while presenting the report of the select committee on the bill which became law as published in the Gazette just referred to, said as follows:—

"Honourable members will have doubtless read the report and the bill as amended by the select committee and I need, therefore, only refer to a few of the changes that have been made. The more important of these relate to the composition of the Medical Council. The bill as originally introduced provided for a council to consist of eight nominated and five elected members. The first select committee reduced the nominated element to 6 and increased the elected element to the same figure. The committee with whose report we are now concerned has carried this process still further. Whilst leaving the nominated element unchanged it has increased the number of elected members from 6 to 8.

The Medical Council of these provinces will thus have a substantial elected majority and in this respect will be unique in India. In Madras, Bombay and Bengal there is a nominated majority on the Medical Council, and in the Punjab there is an elected majority, but a majority of only one. I hope it will be recognized that the select committee has gone as far as would be prudent and reasonable having regard to the existing circumstances of the medical profession in those Provinces."

The Bombay Medical Council consists of 13 members, 7 nominated and 6 elected. In order to secure an elective majority, it is proposed to reduce the number of nominated members from 7 to 5 and to increase the number of elected members from 6 to 8. It is further proposed in the bill that these two additional seats should be filled by persons elected from among the members of the faculty of medicine by the senate of the Bombay University. I know there is some difference of opinion on this point; that, however, is a matter, which can be satisfactorily settled in the select committee. What the Council is really concerned with at this stage is the principle of elective majority. If the honourable members agree—and I hope they will—that there should be a substantial elective majority in the constitution of the Medical Council, I trust they will vote in favour of the first reading and the method by which such a majority could be effectively secured may safely be left to be determined by the select committee.

The second object of the bill is to provide that persons trained in a Government medical college or school holding a Government diploma or certificate that they are qualified to practise Medicine, Surgery, or Midwifery or that they are qualified for the duties of a military assistant surgeon, hospital assistant, or a sub-assistant surgeon, shall be eligible to be members of the Medical Council. This provision is introduced in order to give effect to the recommendation of this Council on a resolution moved by my friend the Honourable Mr. PAREKH at the March sessions of the Council.

I now come to the last and most important part of this bill. It is in reference to the interpretation of the words "infamous conduct in any professional respect" occurring in sections 7 and 9 of the Medical Act. I am glad to tell this Council that the United Provinces Medical Act above referred to has, while empowering the Medical Council under section 26 (1) to prohibit the entry in, or order the removal from, the register the name of any medical practitioner found guilty of "infamous conduct in any professional respect" provides in sub-clause (2) of the same section as follows :—

"Nothing in sub-section (1) shall be deemed to justify the exclusion or removal from the register of the name of any medical practitioner on the ground of his adoption of the theory of Medicine and Surgery not in accordance with the accepted views for the time being or of his association with a vaidya, hakim or homeopath or an unregistered practitioner..... ....".

The Honourable Mr. O'DONNEL, on behalf of Government while presenting the report of the select committee on the bill, said as follows on this question :— "Lastly, it has now not only been definitely provided that nothing in the bill shall affect in any way a homeopath and ayurvedic or unani practitioner but it has also been definitely laid down that association with such a practitioner shall not be regarded as constituting unprofessional conduct."

Now let us examine the history of this question in our Presidency.

Honourable members will remember that when the measure, which became law in 1912, was discussed in this Council it was distinctly understood that it was not calculated to lower the prestige of the ayurvedic or the unani system of medicine, that it was in no way intended to impair the dignity of those practising these systems, but that it was primarily and solely meant for the purpose of bringing within the disciplinary jurisdiction only those practitioners who possessed certain scheduled qualifications. There were certain members of this Council and a large section of the public outside it, who feared that indirectly, at any rate, the passing of the measure would strike a heavy blow at the growth and advancement of the ayurvedic and unani systems, and will ultimately have the effect of wiping out the systems altogether. But judging from the tenor of the bill, as it was put through the Council, all were under the impression that those fears were perhaps unfounded, and would easily prove to be unjustified by the working of the act in actual practice. Under the cricumstances, the bill was passed into law. My Lord, under sections 7 and 9 of the act, disciplinary jurisdiction is conferred upon the Medical Council to deal with cases of "infamous conduct in any professional respect". The act has made no attempt to define by any special clauses what would amount to professional misconduct and what would not. That being so, the Medical Council of Bombay has recently proposed to interpret the phrase to mean any association by a registered practitioner with any institution teaching the ayurvedic or unani system of medicine. I may allude at this stage to what has become public property, Dr. Popat's case. But before I do so I may remind the Council that the President, in summing up the proceedings of the Council when the bill was read for the first time in answer to the apprehensions of the members, said that "the bill will not affect the vaids and hakims". Again at the second reading of the bill as amended by the select committee the Hon'ble Mr. LAMB, who introduced the bill on behalf of the Government, denied that the bill excluded from the advantages of registration doctors who practise ayurvedic medicine. He said "if any school of ayurvedic medicine can at any future time show that its training is efficient and that the men holding its diplomas have the knowledge and skill for the efficient practice of medicine it will be open to Government to include it in the Schedule". Your Excellency, there is existing for the last twenty years an ayurvedic institution in Bombay which is now known as the Prabhuram Ayurvedic College doing its work scientifically and turning out qualified men to practise the system. About this institution some of the leading and distinguished men of this Presidency, Indian as well as European, have from time to time testified to the efficiency of this Institution and the good work that it has been doing, at various gatherings for giving certificates and degrees to qualified students.

Dr. Popat is the Principal of this Institution. In the month of May 1915 an advertisement in a Gujarati newspaper appeared under the signautre of Dr. Popat giving information to the public that "the college will begin its sessions from the middle of June next and entrance examination will begin on the 10th idem. The rules and regulations with curriculum of the new course will be sent on applying to the Principal".

On the 18th June a letter was sent to Dr. Popat by the Registrar of the Bombay Medical Council, saying that the executive committee of the Council had directed him to draw Dr. Popat's attention to the advertisement appearing over his signature and informing him that the association of his name with the ayurvedic college was incompatible with his status as a registered medical practitioner. Dr. Popat naturally asked how it was incompatible. He in answer was referred to the provisions of section 9 which empowered the Council to erase the name of a registered member from the register. Without replying to the specific questions put by Dr. Popat as to who was the complainant, what was the complaint, and as to what act or omission or commission of his in connection with the institution was considered amounting to infamous conduct, the Registrar simply said that his mere connection with the institution constituted primâ facie infamous conduct.

My Lord, Sir Pardey Lukis, the Director General of the Indian Medical Service, in his speech in the Imperial Council in March 1916 says: "I resent strongly that spirit of trade unionism which leads many modern doctors to stigmatise all vaids and hakims as quacks and charlatans and further that I do not recognise any fixed line of demarcation between the eastern and the western systems of medicines." Your Excellency, I may be pardoned for quotations but I cannot help reading to this Council a sentence or two from the speech delivered by Lord Hardinge, the late Governor General and Viceroy of India, when laying the foundation stone of the Ayurvedic Tibbi College at Delhi on the 29th March 1916. He says "that 90 per cent. of the population of the country took advantage of ayurvedic and unani systems of medicine and further that I cannot but recognise that there is good in them and it is far better for the masses of people, where western science cannot for a long time reach, that these ancient systems of medicine should be modernised as much as possible, to meet present-day requirements and that they should have their benefit rather than have no treatment at all".

It is impossible to understand, my Lord, how the ayurvedic system can be modernised as Lord Hardinge said it should be, if western practitioners are not allowed to associate with institutions wherein eastern systems are taught. This step of the Council has roused a fear in the minds of the public that the construction attempted to be put on the provisions of the act, by the executive committee of the Medical Council, will no doubt completely wipe out the ayurvedic and unani systems of medicine. I confess I cannot understand the action of the executive committee because no stretch of words can enable them to put such a violent construction upon the phrase "infamous conduct in any professional respect". By the construction proposed to be put on it by the Bombay Medical Council it has been made to mean that no doctor who has studied the western system of medicine and got himself registered under the act can impart to others the knowledge of any other system which he happens to know, and which not only he but eminent doctors like Sir Pardey Lukis and others consider to be useful. Your Excellency, I do not for a moment attribute any motive of oppression or animosity to the gentlemen under whose orders the notice was issued, because at the second reading of the bill the Honourable the Surgeon General had assured us, that there was no danger that the clause would be made use of for the purpose of oppression or animosity but I must say that the action of the Medical Council in issuing such a notice and not coming to any conclusion for the last two years, keeping all the time a drawn sword over Dr. Popat, is open to grave suspicion.

When the act was passed many members wanted to define the phrase "infamous conduct" but then it was said that it was impossible to give an adequate and exhaustive definition of the phrase. The mover of the bill, while admitting that the substitution of the phrase "infamous" in place of the phrase "grave misconduct or professional misconduct" carried more obloquy, said if he himself had to draft it he would have preferred those original words in place of "infamous conduct". The select committee, however, recommended the phrase on the ground that it would help the Council to construe that phrase better with the help of English cases.

Your Excellency, I am glad to say that there is one case reported in I. Q. B., 1894, where a definition is given of that phrase by more than one of the English Judges. It is explained in very few lines, and I crave indulgence to read them more especially as the Bombay Medical Union has sent in a protest supporting the construction put upon the phrase, by the executive committee of the Medical Council. Now let us see what these learned and independent Judges say what that phrase means :—

"I adopt the definition which my brother Lopes has drawn up, at any rate, of one kind of conduct amounting to infamous conduct in a professional respect, namely, if it is shown that a medical man in the pursuit of his profession has done something with regard to it, which would be reasonably regarded as disgraceful or dishonourable by his professional brethren of good repute and competency, then it is open for the General Medical Council to say that he has been guilty of infamous conduct in a professional respect, but on the other hand, an act which is not done in a professional respect does not come within this section. There may be some acts which, although they may not be infamous in any other persons yet if they are done by a medical man in relation to his profession, that is, with regard either to his patients or to his professional brethren, may be fairly considered infamous conduct in a professional respect."

Again, the British Medical Act considers one who by his presence, countenance, advice, assistance or co-operation knowingly enables unqualified or unregistered persons to attend, treat and perform operations upon patients in respect of matters requiring professional discretion or skill, as if such persons were duly qualified, to be guilty of infamous conduct. The Bombay Medical Council has taken the same ground but I request your Excellency and the honourable members of the Council to refer to what the Honourable Surgeon General said on this matter in his speach at the time of the second reading of the bill. He says "it was never pretended for one moment that the passage of the bill was to protect the qualified medical practitioners from the vaids and hakims". What was said was that it was to protect the qualified medical practitioner from the unqualified men practising according to western methods—the untrained compounders—such as may be found in every bazar and so on. These are the men who are going about pretending that they are medical men. Dr. Popat surely, from what information has reached us, does not by his presence, countenance, assistance, co-operation or advice enable these unqualified and unregistered persons, the untrained compounders practising western methods, to act as if they are fully qualified. He is simply giving scientific instruction in the ayurvedic system to students who attend a particular course of instruction in the Ayurvedic College for a specific period. These students pass several test examinations and then get a qualifying certificate. One cannot understand how this kind of work can be even for a moment taken as infamous conduct when 90 per cent. of the population depend for their relief on the indigenous systems and cannot get scientific medical help unless such institutions are worked. I think your Excellency and the whole Council will agree with me when I say that taking into consideration the present situation as described by His Excellency Lord Hardinge, Dr. Popat is doing a laudable work such as Government should have begun long ago.

Under the circumstances and in the light of Lord Esher's ruling it becomes the plain duty of this Council to explain clearly to the public and to the Medical Council, which administers this act, that it would not be unprofessional conduct on the part of a medical practitioner to countenance in any way or encourage or to associate with any institutions where the unani or the ayurvedic systems are taught or practised or with any persons practising either of those systems.

I, therefore, propose by this bill that the following explanation should be added at the end of section 7 of the act :—

Explanation.—The commission of all or any of the following acts shall not be deemed "infamous conduct in any professional respect" within the meaning of this section or section 9 of this act :

(a) Studying or practising the ayurvedic, unani or other indigenous systems of medicine.

(b) Managing, assisting, encouraging, supporting, co-operating or in anywise associating with any hospitals, asylums, infirmaries, dispensaries or lying-in hospitals, wherein the ayurvedic, unani, or other indigenous methods of treatment are carried on.

(c) Managing, assisting, encouraging, supporting, co-operating or in anywise associating with schools, colleges or other institutions, wherein the ayurvedic, unani or other indigenous systems of medicine are taught, or (d) Consulting, advising, assisting, encouraging, co-operating or in anywise associating with medical practitioners adopting the ayurvedic, unani or other indigenous systems of medicine.

MEDICAL BILL.

[10TH OCTOBER 1917.] [Mr. Vithalbhai Jhaverbhai Patel; Dr. C. Fernandes.]

With these observations I move the first reading of the Bill.

But before I close, your Excellency, I want to make one further observation. I have deliberately refrained from drawing comparisons between the relative merits of the western and indigenous systems of medicine and I trust that your Excellency, as President of this Council, will not allow any discussion on the relative merits of the different systems of medicine.

His Excellency the PRESIDENT :—I am very much obliged to the honourable member for his advice.

The Honourable Dr. C. FERNANDES :—Your Excellency,—I rise to speak on the bill as a medical man of some years' standing in the city of Bombay and as one who is well acquainted with the conditions affecting the profession and who has a fair knowledge of the views and feelings of my fellow practitioners. Dealing first with the proposed reduction of the nominated members from six to four I may say at once that while I think it highly desirable to have an elected majority on the Council, there seems to me no justification for adding two members to the number at present representing the faculty of medicine of the University. There are already ten members of the faculty on the Council out of a total membership of thirteen. The proposed amendment would add two more by election, which, I think, is superfluous. I would suggest that one of the seats should be given to the College of Physicians and Surgeans for which only the members on the Council of the college should be eligible We might then be spared the repetition of such a calamity to the Council as the exclusion from it of the principal of the only medical college in the Presidency, who is principally responsible for the training of the cream of the profession of the Presidency. The other seats should be given to the graduates of the University, thus bringing up the number of seats to which the latter are entitled up to five. I may also suggest that two more seats might be added to the present thirteen to bring the number on a par with that of Bengal and Madras, each of which has a total of fifteen. If this suggestion should be adopted, one of the two additional seats might be given to the faculty of medicine of the University and the other to the College of Physicians and Surgeons. The position would then be as follows:—Out of a total of fourteen members excluding the president who should always be nominated, four members would be nominated and ten elected, the latter being distributed as follows:—5 to the local graduates, 2 to those eligible under section 2, sub-section (2), clause (a), of the act, 2 to the College of Physicians and Surgeons and 1 to the Medical Faculty of the University. I feel no doubt that the profession generally would approve of this arrangement. I now come to sub-section (3) of section 2 of the bill.

I would say in regard to this that the view put forward in the representations of the Bombay branch of the British Medical Association and the Bombay Medical Union are entitled to the fullest consideration. It is far from my intention in any way to reflect upon a deservedly respected class of men, but it is natural that the higher qualified men should regard this proposal to make military assistant surgeons and sub-assistant surgeons eligible for membership of the Council with strong misgiving, justified by the obvious undesirability and indeed the anomaly of a proposal which would qualify men of inferior status to themselves to sit in judgment on them when cases of inquiry into alleged professional misconduct come up for consideration. I may be pardoned if I emphasise the high importance of preserving the status and educational and professional standard of the Council. Now whatever else may be the merits of this class of men, and their claims to consideration, they are after all admittedly below the status that is required of medical men by the various professional governing bodies throughout the world, and I think it must be admitted that there is sound reason in the contention that only those members of the profession who have qualified in the fullest degree can be fitted to deal with all the delicate and complicated matters that come before the Council for consideration. There is another point which I should mention. We are looking for reciprocity in the matter of registration with the governing bodies of the profession in other countries. That will not be conceded to us while we admit to our register men of an inferior status who would not be admitted to the register of the United Kingdom or accepted as members of the British Medical Association. Thus we are already suffering from a heavy disability by the existence of a common register for fully and lesser qualified men and instead of emphasising this by admitting the latter to the Council I would submit that the proper course would have been to have had schedules as was proposed in the draft act of the British Medical Association. Even now it would not be too late to do this.

I think we have gone far enough in admitting this class to the electoral roll. It is true it is proposed only to remove the bar to the eligibility for membership of the Council and that it does not necessarily mean admission into the Council, but they are in an enormous majority on the register, and can there be any doubt that they would immediately take advantage of the concession thus opened to them? Moreover, I agree with the representation of the Medical Union that exclusion from the Council should serve as a desirable inducement to them to qualify themselves for the higher grade of the profession.

Coming to the last and most important clause of the bill I must say that this clause would deprive the Council of its legitimate control over registered practitioners. A registered practitioner might associate himself with the veriest quack, and do so under the most disgraceful circumstances, and the Council would be powerless to deal with his conduct, to the extent of placing it within the definition which would exclude such an offender against professional propriety from the pale of recognition. It seems to me there is a great deal of misapprehension regarding the meaning of the phrase "infamous conduct". The word "infamous" no doubt has a very unpleasant interpretation in common parlance, but it is used in a special sense and has a limited meaning in this connection. Its application is confined solely to the matter of professional conduct, it does not imply any moral reflection but merely a failure to conform to the rules of professional conduct recognised by the legally constituted professional governing body. In conclusion, I would say that more encouragement is needed for the use of indigenous drugs in our medical practice and we might well follow the example of Madras and institute a chair of pharmacology at the Grant Medical College or elsewhere, with a laboratory attached where the medical virtues of these drugs could be scientifically tested and demonstrated. The results of such investigation could be made available for medical men generally, but in a more special manner to those who choose to undergo a post-graduate course in this branch of medicine, as I am sure many of them would be only too glad to do. It must be recognised that the indigenous drugs used in the ayurvedic system of medicine are of high value, many of them perhaps unequalled in their efficacious properties and require to be scientifically investigated, although the system itself is antiquated and obsolete.

The Honourable Mr. PHIROZE C. SETHNA:—Your Excellency,—The Bombay Medical Act was passed only five years ago in 1912. Since then there have been two amendments which are Bombay Acts Nos. III and IV both of 1916 and now after a little more than a year the Honourable Mr. PATEL has brought forward a bill proposing further amendments. In the first place he asks for a redistribution of seats on the Medical Council; secondly, his object is to enable medical undergraduates who are allowed to register under this act and who at the moment are only permitted to vote for two seats on the Medical Council to be also able to offer themselves as candidates for these two seats. Lastly, the bill aims at compelling, as it were, the medical fraternity registered under this act to recognise practically on a footing of equality those who profess to practise the ayurvedic, the unani or other indigenous systems of medicine.

MEDICAL BILL.

[10TH OCTOBER 1917.] [Mr. Phiroze C. Sethna.]

Members of this Council have been favoured with copies of representations from different medical bodies and others on the changes proposed by the Honourable Mr. PATEL. These representations are all agreed that in future, instead of Government nominating six members besides the president in a council of thirteen, they should nominate only four, exclusive of the president. Whilst there is complete agreement in regard to the reduction in the number of Government nominees, all these medical bodies differ from one another in the recommendations they make as to the assignment of the two seats that would be so released. The honourable mover suggests a change in the act whereby these two seats could be filled by the members of the medical faculty of the senate of the Bombay University As the Honourable Dr. FERNANDES has just pointed out, the medical faculty of the Bombay University consists of twenty members, and it so happens that as many as ten out of these twenty are already on the Medical Council of thirteen. This large proportion is likely to continue for years to come and it is therefore not at all advisable to allot any seat or seats to the medical faculty of the senate. The Bombay branch of the British Medical Association propose that one of the seats should be allotted to the medical faculty of the University and the other to the Fellows of the College of Physicians and Surgeons, Bombay. The Bombay Medical Union, on the other hand, recommend that these two seats should both go to the medical graduates of the Bombay University. Sub-section (2) (c) of section 2 of the act lays down that four members of the Council be elected by doctors, bachelors and licentiates of medicine, and masters, bachelors and licentiates of surgery of the University of Bombay who are registered under the act. The Bombay Medical Union are not only for increasing this number from four to six, but add the proviso that all the six must be no other than members of their own body, namely, graduates of the Bombay University. There is yet another recommendation, and that from the Gujarat branch of the All-India Sub-Assistant Surgeons' Association, and naturally to the effect that these two seats be reserved for sub-assistant surgeons with an independent electorate from their own class. These various suggestions will require to be fully considered in select committee. Personally I am of opinion that because the Bombay medical graduates are primarily concerned with the Bombay Medical Act, they should be given a larger representation and they be allowed to elect five members instead of four as at present. In regard to the other seat, I propose a separate electorate altogether consisting of medical men holding diplomas and degrees of Universities other than the Bombay University, who might thus be enabled to return one of their own number. I make this suggestion because as time goes on it seems to me that all the elected seats will be filled up by the Bombay medical graduates, and medical men, whether I. M. S. or from Universities other than that of Bombay, will have to depend exclusively on Government nominations.

The Honourable Mr. PATEL'S second point is to enable the medical non-graduates, generally known as sub-assistant surgeons and military assistant surgeons, to offer themselves for two seats on the Medical Council. The medical practitioners who come under this class are men who are trained at the Grant Medical College in Bombay for the work of military assistant surgeonships or those who are trained at the medical schools in Poona, Ahmedabad and Hyderabad (Sind) in this Presidency for sub-assistant surgeonships. It is a matter of common knowledge that the standard of ducation required of pupils who aspire to these positions is comparatively very low. Even for the most junior clerkships in Government service the school final examination, which is a severer test than the matriculation, is considered essential, whereas the fifth and the sixth years classes in schools are all that students are required to go through if they propose to qualify for this lower branch of the medical profession. The Bombay Medical Act of 1912 and similar acts in the other Presidencies are framed on the lines of the medical acts in the United Kingdom. Medical under-graduates with the qualifications of our sub-assistant and military assistant surgeons would not be registered as medical students and much less as medical practitioners under the acts in the United Kingdom. They have been treated more leniently under the local act and are allowed to be registered, as also to vote for two representatives. To suggest now that they should sit as equals with fully qualified medical graduates on the Medical Council is perhaps stretching the point a little too far On account of their limited school education, as also on account of the difference in rank and status in their own profession, they are not so qualified and the attempt to put them on the Medical Council might result in driving out of the Council men with the highest medical diplomas serving on it at present but who would hesitate to continue on a body with colleagues intellectually and professionally very much their inferiors. The honourable mover is a member of the bar. He knows that for any dereliction of duty on the part of a member of his profession, on the motion of the Advocate General, such member can be brought up for trial before the judges of the High Court. Will my honourable friend approve of a proposal that at such a trial a munsiff from one of the lowest courts in the mofussil be appointed as a colleague of the High Court judges? And this is exactly what his proposal amounts to. It is one of the functions of the Medical Council, to try cases where perhaps a fully qualified medical graduate is brought up on the charge of 'infamous conduct'. If two of his judges according to the proposed amendment are medical undergraduates, their position would correspond to that of the munsiffs associated with High Court judges enquiring into charges against a barrister-at-law. It is said that in Bengal and Madras the medical undergraduates do not suffer from the disqualification which the honourable mover is trying to remove in the case of the Bombay Presidency and that they have been given the same status.

The Honourable Mr. PATEL:—I have never stated it.

The Honourable Mr. SETHNA:—The Honourable Mr. PATEL, I believe, has not. But I will qualify my statement by observing that it is so stated in the press and in the various representations that have been received. If the other Presidencies have made this mistake, it does not follow that we should do likewise, for I feel certain that if the other Presidencies are given a chance they would be only too willing to take away this concession which perhaps they granted in a hurry and regret having done so.

According to the last Bombay Medical Register there were 1,944 men registered under this act up to the end of 1916. This number is made up of 805 Bombay graduates, 18 from other Indian universities, 97 from European universities and 1,024 medical undergraduates. Out of these 1,024 some may have passed the matriculation or the P. E. examinations. Such men can qualify for the membership diploma of the newly founded College of Physicians and Surgeons in Bombay This diploma is recognised to be a fair test and in many ways conforms with the M. B., B. S. examination of the Bombay University. It would be unfair not to allow those who have received these diplomas to be elected to the council, and if the Honourable Mr. PATEL'S motion were restricted to such men alone, I am sure the same would have found favour, for it would then delete the whole class with just the registrable diplomas and holding subordinate status, but extend the privilege to those few who care to rise to a higher status and possess the ability to do so. It may be urged that such men who have obtained this diploma, are at the present moment very few; but the college itself was opened as recently as 1911. Between 1912 and 1916 as many as 57 obtained the Licentiate diploma and 22 more in March of this year, which brings up the total so far to 79, and there is sure to be a steady increase as time goes on. In the same manner there will be a gradual increase in the number of men who obtain the Membership diploma. If these men are recognised for admission to seats on the Medical Council, we cannot find fault with them.

MEDICAL BILL.

[10TH OCTOBER 1917.] [Mr. Phiroze C. Sethna; Mr. Munmohundas Ramji; the President.]

We now come to the third and perhaps the most important part of the Honourable Mr. PATEL'S bill. In the United Kingdom every medical man intending to practise must perforce register himself, for otherwise his certificates would not be accepted. Out here only medical men in Government service must compulsorily register themselves. The rest may do so or not. Although the number of medical graduates is much larger, only 920 have so far registered under the Bombay Medical Act. The General Medical Council of the United Kingdom issues what is called a warning notice to every practitioner requiring him not to assist any unqualified person, which is in other words an endeavour to do away with quackery as best as possible. The explanation, as proposed by the Honourable Mr. PATEL to be added at the end of section 7 to interpret what is meant by "infamous conduct", would clearly permit any one registered under the Bombay Medical Act to associate with those who practise the ayurvedic, the unani or other indigenous system of medicine. The reprint of a very able paper read about fifteen months back before the Poona Medical Society by the late Dr. Garde of this city has been placed in our hands. Whoever is "Magna est veritas et prevalebit", to whom we are obliged for this reprint; he has struck the right note by observing that "any consideration of the relative value of the eastern and western systems should be conducted not on racial lines, but on a basis of scientific reason and common sense", and the late Dr. Garde must certainly have had this very idea in mind, for he says that with all its shortcomings the ayurvedic had many things to teach. The clinical experience and observations of ancient physicians, which have stood the test of several centuries, are of immense use, and it must not be forgotten that the hymns in which their medical works were written were sung long before Homer sang the glories of the Trojan war or the first pyramid saw light in the land of the Nile. But with equal fairness Dr. Garde adds that the old phycisians had been handicapped by the absence of the solid foundation of physical science, anatomy, physiology and pathology, on which they take their stand to-day, and that lines of research have been opened to us now which the ancients never knew. There is no evidence of the ayurvedic or unani systems having made any advance of importance, and as is the common complaint against most things Indian, those who practise the ayurvedic or the unani systems of medicine are content to go on and work on the identical lines adopted by those who went before them ages ago. Indians are proverbially conservative. Our agriculturists use to-day the same kind of implements as were in vogue in the country centuries back. Our skilled artisans just copy the old designs and employ the same methods of workmanship as did their forefathers, with the result that their works of art when shipped to foreign marts never sell so largely or command the same attention or fetch the same high prices as do works of art from other Asiatic countries which are more progressive. When medicine and surgery are advancing every day in the west, can the unani or ayurvedic systems in our midst show any progress whatsoever? It would be no exaggeration to say—

The Honourable Mr. MUNMOHUNDAS RAMJI:—May I rise to a point of order, your Excellency? The speaker is here discussing the systems of medicine, western and eastern, which it is not for us to consider.

His Excellency the PRESIDENT:—I think the question of eastern and western medicine has got a great deal to do with the subject.

The Honourable Mr. PHIROZE C. SETHNA:—It would be no exaggeration to say that perhaps the drugs used and methods employed to-day are no different from what was the case in the days of Akbar the Great or no different even from the days of Charak and Sushruta, the originators of ayurvedic medicine. Great importance is attached to the opening of a unani College in the beginning of last year at Delhi and reference has been made in the press and by the public, as also by the Honourable Mr. PATEL to-day, to the speech made on the occasion by the then Viceroy Lord Hardinge. His opinion on the unani system and the opinions of various others on the ayurvedic system are frequently quoted. They all serve to show that there is much good in these systems which none of us will deny, but the same authorities, if asked to compare, would be the first to admit that the western system has gone much further, and with great profit to humanity at large. The benefits of western medicine and surgery cannot be expected to reach the masses in this country for years to come. The masses are accustomed to the indigenous systems and for their good it may be necessary to encourage the establishment of schools for the improvement and advancement of indigenous systems. Government may certainly do so, but that surely ought to be no reason for Government, as is evidently the object of this part of the bill, to compel those qualified under the western systems to recognize the others practically on a footing of equality.

The Honourable Mr. PATEL:—That is not the object of my bill.

The Honourable Mr. SETHNA:—The Honourable Mr. PATEL has referred to the Prabhuram Ayurvedic College. A leaflet extending to the size of 30 sheets of foolscap has been issued by the Prabhuram Ayurvedic College and sent to the Members of this Council over the signature of the chairman of the managing committee of this college. The chairman of the medical college, strange as it may appear, is not a member of the medical profession, but a solicitor of the High Court, and I understand that some other members of the managing committee are likewise laymen. This institution which revels under the high sounding title of a college is located on one of the floors of a four-storeyed building above Dr. Popat Prabhuram's dispensary in the crowded locality of Bhuleshwar in Bombay, paying, I understand, about Rs. 80 as rent per mensem. The representation makes out that the views of the Medical Council are prejudicial to the welfare of this institution in particular, but to the ayurvedic and unani systems of medicine generally, and will eventually wipe out the same altogether. Now, this so-called college, on its own admission, during its existence of 21 years has turned out as many as 52 graduates, or an average of 2·5 per annum. Further, this is the only institution of its kind throughout the Bombay Presidency. If the need for this system of medicine is as great as it is made out to be, surely there ought to have been more ayurvedic schools in Bombay as well as in other parts of the Presidency. Again in this representation great stress has been laid on the fact that the late Vaidraj Prabhuram used to call in consultation various eminent members of the Indian Medical Service. This only proves that whenever the ayurvedic treatment did not effect cures, the vaidraj preferred to avail himself of the help of western medicine. The late Mr. Prabhuram Jeevanram had the reputation of being a very able vaid, and his contemporary the late Mr. Baker Ali a very capable hakim—

The Honourable Mr. PATEL:—The time is up, your Excellency.

His Excellency the PRESIDENT:—Will the honourable member kindly point out to me any time limit in the rules?

The Honourable Mr. SETHNA:—But to every single such vaid or such hakim worthy the name how many hundreds upon hundreds of others are there calling themselves vaidrajs or hakims who cannot claim even a nodding acquaintance with the healing art? In fact there is no qualifying test, nothing to separate the wheat from the chaff, and the explanation relating to the words "infamous conduct" as proposed by the Honourable Mr. PATEL, if passed, would mean that every qualified practitioner registered under the act would have to recognize every one without any discrimination. If to-morrow my friend the Honourable Mr. PATEL and myself take it into our heads to put signboards over our houses calling ourselves hakims or vaidrajs, there is nothing to prevent us from doing so.

His Excellency the PRESIDENT:—I think the honourable member must recognize that we do not want to go closely into the merits of the two systems.

MEDICAL BILL.

[10TH OCTOBER 1917.] [Mr. Phiroze C. Sethna; Mr. Vithalbhai Jhaverbhai Patel; the President; Rao Bahadur Venkatesh Shriniwas Naik.]

The Honourable Mr. SETHNA:—I only want to say that the Honourable Mr. PATEL would not construe it as "infamous conduct" on the part of registered practitioners if they "assisted, encouraged or co-operated" with us should we decide to call ourselves hakims or vaidrajs. In the agenda before the Council for this session there is a resolution standing in the name of my friend the Honourable Mr. PATEL for amending section 50 of the Bombay Municipal Act. I think that following the same reasoning, which he has put forward in connection with this part of his bill, he might perhaps with greater justice have brought forward another resolution for amending another section of the Bombay Municipal Act, viz., section 344A. Vaids and hakims have to do with the health of the public. The supervision of houses built in the city was carried on at one time by any one calling himself a "mistry". It appeared to the Municipal Corporation that the time had arrived for public safety to legislate that the supervision of the construction of houses be entrusted only to licensed surveyors or to those persons who may be approved of by the Municipal Commissioner. Now, the Municipal Commissioner may approve of a mistry if he is satisfied that he is thoroughly conversant with his duties, but according to the Honourable Mr. PATEL this restriction ought to be removed from this section.

The Honourable Mr. PATEL:—Why don't you move another amendment in the Corporation?

His Excellency the PRESIDENT:—The honourable member is quite capable of looking after that himself.

The Honourable Mr. SETHNA:—I do not move such an amendment because I do not hold the same views as the mover of this Bill; buf I say, sir, that it would be consistent on the part of my honourable friend Mr. PATEL tq bring forward such an amendment whereby the Municipal Commissioner would be bound to recognize anybody calling himself a "mistry" in the same manner as the Medical Council is expected to recognize anybody calling himself a hakim or vaid.

The Honourable Mr. PATEL:—That is entirely outside the scope of the bill, your Excellency.

His Excellency the PRESIDENT:—The honourable member will have every opportunity of answering that when he replies.

The Honourable Mr. PATEL:—If my honourable friend makes a wrong statement, your Excellency, am I not entitled to correct it?

The Honourable Mr. SETHNA:—I shall now conclude and observe that this will be the result of the Honourable Mr. PATEL'S amendment, and no matter whether this Council accepts his two other recommendations in the bill in the form in which he has proposed them or in any modified form, I for one trust that this Council will certainly not accept the "explanation" he desires to be added to section 7 to interpret the meaning of the words "infamous conduct", for otherwise we would be vitiating the very object for which the Bombay Medical Act of 1912 was brought into existence a few years ago.

The Honourable RAO BAHADUR VENKATESH SHRINIWAS NAIK:—May it please your Excellency,—I have very great pleasure in supporting the first reading of the bill, now before the Council. The most important principle, involved in this proposed amendment, about which I should like to make a few observations, is that which defines more clearly to the public and to the Medical Council, which administers the Act, what would not constitute infamous conduct in the medical profession. The chief reason that has induced my friend the Honourable Mr. PATEL to introduce this amendment of the Bombay Medical Act, defining more clearly the vague and wide term infamous conduct, occurring in sections 7 and 9 of the act, seems to have arisen from the correspondence, circulated to the members of this Council,-between the Bombay Medical Council and Dr. Popat Prabhuram, regarding the latter's association with the Prabhuram Ayurvedic College of Bombay. By carefully going through the correspondence it is found that the Medical Council is led to think that Dr. Popat Prabhuram's association, as a registered medical practitioner, with the Ayurvedic College, is objectionable. Leaving off this individual case for itself, the chief point to be considered by this Council is whether the association of a registered medical practitioner with any institution teaching or administering the indigenous medicines under the ayurvedic or unani systems, or with any vaidya or hakim practising these systems of medicines, is so sinister as to lead the Bombay Medical Council to think that it is an infamous conduct on his part. It must be admitted that ayurvedic and unani systems of medicines have existed from time immemorial, have done and are doing a great deal to relieve human suffering, and were once in almost a complete state of perfection, and this fact cannot at all be suppressed. But unfortunately on account of want of encouragement and proper facilities and institutions to develop their study and research, these oriental systems of medicines are obliged to rely upon text-books which are in some cases centuries old. In view of the fact that the population of this country is a vast one, whereas the number of qualified medical practitioners brought up under the western system of medicines is a very small one, and considering that the disproportion between the demand and supply is so woefully glaring, and is palpably so large, is it not crucial to the country that the Medical Council, instead of encouraging schools in which ayurvedic and unani systems of medicines are taught, should take action that would go to paralyse these institutions, and would ultimately lead to their utter extinction? It is not necessary or me, my Lord, to refer to the assurances, given to the public at the time of the enactment of the Bombay Medical Act, that its object was never intended to operate in any way to the prejudice of these systems of medical treatment, although apprehensions were then entertained in several quarters It is true that the Medical Council even now does not interfere directly with the working of ayurvedic or unani systems of medicines, but if they were to restrict, in the way they have now been doing, the association of registered medical practitioners, on whose co-operation and working these systems of medicines are required to regain their former reputation, with the unani and ayurvedic schools of medicines, these institutions are sure to disappear and the community will have to depend greatly upon the self-styled vaids and hakims. On account of the want of such institutions there is a very great difficulty of making a distinction between the accredited, recognised or authorised ayurvedic or unani practitioners and anybody. Under these systems any one can style himself as vaid or hakim. When the medical institutions established in this Presidency, taken together, are quite insufficient and inadequate to meet the wants and requirements of the people, when they do not cover even a small area of this province, and when a great number of people residing in rural areas, whether rich or poor, educated or uneducated, high or low, have still faith in these indigenous systems of medical treatment, and still have recourse to such medicines for several ailments and diseases, is it not fair for the Medical Council as far as possible to encourage such institutions, wherever they are working, by allowing their registered practitioners to help them and try to develop the science? In many Indian families, ladies and elders, through superstition, have recourse only to indigenous systems of medicines, and I know that in many families both kinds of doctors are sent for and consulted, and both classes of practitioners are getting on very well. If the words "infamous conduct" occurring in sections 7 and 9 of the act are not made clear, as now proposed in clause 3 of the amending bill, the registered practitioners would not visit a house or family, and give advice or medicine to those people who have called in a vaid or hakim, even though they may like to take medicine under western system, and the family will have to rely upon the vaid or hakim for ever, which situation I believe your Excellency's Government do not hope to countenance.

MEDICAL BILL.

[10TH OCTOBER 1917.] [Rao Bahadur Venkatesh Shrinivas Naik; Mr. C. N. Seddon.]

Very recently in the United Provinces of Agra and Oudh they have passed their Medical Act (Act No. 3 of 1917) which has also been approved by His Excellency the Viceroy, and in sub-section 2 of section 28 of that act they have provided that the association of a medical practitioner with a vaid or hakim or a homeopath or any unrecognised practitioner, or the adoption of a theory of medicine and surgery not in accordance with the accepted views for the time being, shall not justify the Medical Council's exclusion or removal from the register of the name of such practitioner. When a sister province has enacted that there is no harm for a registered medical practitioner to associate with an institution or person teaching or practising any indigenous systems of medicines, I do not understand why your Excellency's Government, which has the reputation of being the most liberal and progressive one in the whole of India, should not pass this small bill. With these remarks, your Excellency, I support the bill in its first reading.

The Honourable Mr. C. N. SEDDON:—Your Excellency,—I should like, with your Excellency's permission, to say a few words in opposition to this bill, confining myself only to the third part. The bill proposes to force the Bombay Medical Council into a decision which seems perfectly impossible. It will tend gravely to impair its powers for good, and perhaps will break it up altogether. I am afraid that many honourable members look upon this controversy from the point of view of sentiment, and consider that they are bound to champion a system which they regard as their own national property. I submit that there is no need for sentiment in the matter at all It is a practical question which concerns the health, and therefore the happiness, of millions of our fellowmen, and there is no reason for sentiment. I find in the bill that reference is made to the ayurvedic, yunáni and other indigenous systems. I do not know what other indigenous systems are in the mind of the honourable mover of the bill. So far I have heard none spoken of or suggested.

The Honourable Mr. BELVI:—Homeopathic, for instance.

The Honourable Mr. SEDDON:—That is not indigenous.

Possibly the words are merely a rhetorical flourish. It is claimed that the yunáni and ayurvedic systems are national, and therefore they are to be supported. Let us look for one moment at the yunáni system. Your Excellency, the word "yunáni", which is spelt wrongly now-a-days—it is misspelt in the draft bill—is a Greek word. It is not indigenous. The system was first propounded by Hippocrates, and Galen developed it further, and later on in the days of the great Caliph of Baghdad, Haroun-al-Raschid, it was taken over by the Arabs, and there are many hundreds of Arab works on the subject of yunáni medicine as it is understood in the present day. It was summarized and brought to perfection by Abu Ali-ibu Sina, the great Persian, better known in Europe as Avicenna. It was brought into India by Moslem conquerors. There is no reason why it should be called indigenous, or why Indians should take to-day any particularly national interest in it.

With regard to the ayurvedic system our information is much less complete. But I think investigation tends more and more to show that most of the ayurvedic knowledge was also brought in from Greece. The Honourable Mr. SETHNA has spoken of the ayurvedic as existing for a couple of thousand years. I think that idea should be given up. It was probably for the most part brought in between 300 and 400 A. D. by Brahmin savants who visited Alexandria and other parts. For further information on this subject I should like to refer to an article in the current journal of the Royal Asiatic Society. It will show what connection there was between the Brahmins of India and Alexandria and other parts of the west about that time. But, your Excellency, the fact is that no system of medicine can be called national. There is no eastern or western system of medicine.

There is no science other than true and false. The true system of medicine does not belong to any time or any country, but it is the property of the whole world.

With your Excellency's permission, I should like to say a few words about the yunáni system, not with the intention of stirring up controversy, but in order that honourable members may understand something of the foundation upon which it is based. The main idea is that there are four elements in the body, and when the four elements are mixed in proper and due proportion they are in equilibrium and a man is healthy. But when by some cause one of these elements (or more than one of these) is in excess, a distemper or disease is set up, and it is the physician's task to discover what element it is that is in excess, and to introduce into the body by some drug or some food which contains a large amount of the opposite element sufficient to counterbalance that element which is in excess and which is causing the disease. The elements, of course, are heat, cold, dampness and dryness, so that if a man has fever—

His Excellency the PRESIDENT:—I really do not think that the details of the unáni system need be referred to.

The Honourable Mr. SEDDON:—I have no intention of going into details, but I thought I might as well explain the idea that is at the bottom of it. I have nothing to say against the yunáni system as it originally existed and as it exists now, but I simply wish to point out that it is a system which in fact will have to be given up, and anything that supports what eventually must be given up supports what must interfere with the due development of modern science and the due development of medicine in this country, and must be given up.

Now. your Excellency, it may very well be said that even though these systems are not in themselves based on such scientific foundations as modern medicine, still they are of much practical good. I submit, your Excellency, the proper way would be to investigate the drugs and the food and the method of treatment, and I see no reason why our scientific associations should not assist such institutions, and why Government should not assist them; but I submit that that is a very different thing from according support to a system which is not indigenous or national, the recognition of which is bound to have an unfortunate and harmful effect upon the welfare of the people of this country, and I am sure that none of the honourable members here have the least desire for any such untoward result.

The Honourable Mr. SIDDHANATH DHONDDEV GARUD:—Your Excellency,—I beg to accord my hearty support to the first reading of the bill moved by the Honourable Mr. PATEL. The bill does not propose to extend recognition to any indigenous system of medicine, but merely seeks to remove the bar which the Medical Council desires to impose upon the association of registered medical practitioners with the followers of an indigenous medical system.

The Honourable Mr. SEDDON, in referring to the words "other indigenous systems" in the third clause of the bill, inquired what system other than the two systems already mentioned was intended to be included in the bill, and as he could think of no other indigenous system, he proceeded to describe the words as "a mere flourish of words". But these words probably refer, or should refer, to the Hata yoga system—the first complete drugless system of healing given to the world by the Hindoos long before Hippocrates and his cult were born. This system is now being so widely studied in America and has been proved, to the satisfaction of some of the most eminent medical men, to be so efficacious in its results that I shall not be surprised if it comes back again to us as a great American discovery. This system has suffered here entirely from lack of sympathy and has so far been only in the hands of people who could not sufficiently investigate or develop it. The main principle upon which this system is based is internal and external cleanliness—which they call Malashuddhi (मलशुद्धि)—with the aid of (1) water, by means o the lavage of the stomach—which they call Dhowti (धौती)—and flushing of the colon—which they call Basti (बस्ती), (2) air, by means of breathing exercises and (3) heat, by means of muscle-tension exercises.

His Excellency the PRESIDENT :—Is the honourable member referring to an indigenous system ?

The Honourable Mr. GARUD :—Yes, my Lord. The Hata yogis were the first to recognise that there was no such thing as a remedial drug in this world and I am sure that the better mind of the medical profession will one day come round to this conclusion. The medical faculty has investigated several drugs and it is now being slowly realised that if there were any such thing as an efficacious drug in this world, past civilizations would have left at least some drugs as an infallible remedy against some diseases. With the huge number of drugs that are at the command of the present medical practitioners there is not a single disease which is absolutely curable. The list of incurable diseases is so large and is being added to every day to such an extent that the utility of what we call the medical system should soon cease in the eyes of laymen. Under the Hata yoga system every disease is curable and the great panacea is water. Eliminate the wastes and there will be no germs to eat them. These questions are being studied widely elsewhere and they will one day call our attention to them. Books have been written upon this water cure system in America and a great deal of the new hygiene and physical culture systems is undoubtedly taken from, and is a part of, the Hata yoga system. This system needs investigation, but the professional interests of the medical faculties have prevented them from recognising the utility of its very simple fundamental principle, of that very valuable therapeutic agent—water, and it has therefore so long remained disused. When this system comes to be widely known, as it undoubtedly will be in a few years' time, it will not be possible to prevent people from taking largely to it. It is therefore time that we do not shut our eyes entirely to this system, that we allow our medical practitioners to learn the truth, that we do not cut off their association with truth itself, and that we enable them to remove a reproach which has been frequently levelled against them that they know everything about the medical science except the art of healing.

The Honourable Sir TEMULJI BHIKAJI NARIMAN :—Your Excellency,—I rise to oppose the amended bill moved by my honourable friend Mr. PATEL, more particularly the new explanation proposed to be added at the end of section 7 of the Bombay Medical Registration Act of 1912.

Before I proceed I tender my grateful thanks to your Excellency for giving me the opportunity of taking part in the debate by nominating me as an additional member of your Excellency's Council. I was one of the first to agitate about the introduction of the Medical Registration Act in our Presidency, and I was the secretary of the Grant College Medical Society when we first memorialised Government in 1881 on the subject.

I am not a lawyer, but I understand that you make amendments to the act only to improve upon it, and not for taking a retrograde course, as is proposed by the honourable mover of the bill. The duly qualified Indian medical profession was opposed to this act (of 1912) because they thought that the hospital assistants and the subordinate medical practitioners were not competent and that the privileges given to the registered pratitioners were almost nil. I myself expressed my opinion at that Council that the bill gave the registered practitioners what we call cholelo bore, that is, a plum deprived of its succulent part, leaving the stone behind. My honourable friend Mr. PATEL specifies the commission of all the acts which in his opinion shall not be deemed infamous conduct in any professional respect, and here he encroaches on the rights of the registered medical practitioners, who are better able to judge what ought or ought not to be deemed infamous conduct than any lay members of the public. It is our code of honour or ethics and those who join us or get themselves registered must abide by the rules and regulations framed by us, and the outsiders have no voice to interfere. We do not force any one to join our ranks, but once they join us they must respect our code of ethics. There are as many registered practitioners as there are unregistered ones, and those connected with and encouraging or supporting any ayurvedic or unani institutions will be no worse off than the unregistered medical graduates and will be at liberty to do what they like. But if they once join our rank they must abide by our code of ethics.

The words "infamous conduct in professional respect" have been in current use in the British Medical Act for more than half a century and the British public have not taken any objection to their introduction, and I understand that similar acts in America and Australia have the same words in their acts. Our Indian leaders have been clamouring for western methods of administration and western institutions, but when it suits their purpose they say that east is east and west is west, and that India has not sufficiently advanced in that respect, and that the customs, the traditions, the feelings and the prejudices of the people must be respected. I believe that there is considerable misapprehension or misrepresentation on the part of those who are agitating to support this amendment. They believe, or make others believe, that those practising western method of medicine and the Government are opposed to the advancement and encouragement of the ayurvedic system of medicine, that there are innumerable valuable indigenous drugs unknown to those practising western methods, and that the ayurvedic school was founded with the object of encouraging and reviving the ancient ayurvedic system.

The Grant Medical College was founded about 70 years ago by Dr. Charles Morehead, its first principal, and his object was "to aid in raising the profession to the loftiest standard of purity and intelligence and to eradicate the demoralising effects of the irrational, superstitious and too often criminal empiricism which prevailed in the different systems of native medicine." Instead of raising the profession to that lofty standard, what do we find some of the alumni of our college doing? Some have started a school of native medicine, while others have associated themselves with it, and they make us and the public believe that here medicine is taught both in European and ayurvedic systems, and that they are going to develop and bring into prominence the ayurvedic system of medicine. Can any sane or sensible man for a moment believe that a system of medicine practised in bygone centuries can ever hold its own against our recent advances and new discoveries? Can any one now without a complete knowledge of anatomy, physiology, pathology, biology and bacteriology ever hope to practise medicine, and could any system of medicine be ever perfect without a thorough knowledge of these subjects? If with the present preliminary standard of entrance to the college we hear complaints of the inefficiency of our students, how can we expect pupils of the ayurvedic school with little or no preliminary culture to comprehend and fully understand different subjects comprising a medical curriculum? It will be simply by trading on the ignorance and credulity of the people at large that these new vaidyas will eke out their existence; but is it creditable to those of us who, instead of using all their influence and resources for the advancement of the medical science by carrying on investigations and research into the properties and uses of our indigenous medicine, fritter away their time and energies and turn out men who for want of real knowledge will lower the profession to deeper depths of ignorance and superstition? And the honourable mover of this bill wishes to force us to co-operate and associate with such class of practitioners!

Your Excellency, I do not deny, and no medical man ever denied, the existence of some Indian drugs which may be more effective in some cases or have miraculous effects in some diseases. But instead of bringing those effective drugs to light and testing them by the light of recent knowledge, you start a school on a native system which really speaking is no system at all. This is simply a retrograde movement and does no credit to our profession. A little smattering of some of the western sciences connected with medicine is taught here by translations and the Indian therapeutics, they say, are taught here. The best course would be to add a chair of Indian therapeutics to our curriculum, and if there is real need of a large number of medical men in the country, let our friends start schools under state control where some supervision can be exercised and a lower standard of teaching adopted. We have seen the prescriptions of those practising both western and ayurvedic medicine, and very often have found 18 drugs out of 20 in their prescription to belong to our British pharmacopœia and 2 or 3, supposed to be Indian drugs, to belong to our Indian pharmacopœia. It goes with the credulity which characterises the present age to be incredulous of proved truth; alike in rejecting what is known and in believing what is preposterous, the rights of private foolishness assert themselves. It is but the same impotence of judgment which shrinks from embracing what is real and lavishes itself upon clouds of fiction. As I have said, your Excellency, I do not deny the existence of some effective Indian drugs, but have the principal and his co-workers in the ayurvedic school given out during the last twenty years a single specific or a single drug of proved efficiency for the benefit of suffering humanity?

I received a pamphlet only last week, written by one Dr. Garde, a great admirer and supporter of the ayurvedic system and one who was entrusted by His Highness the Gaekwar of Baroda to translate the Vagbhat into Marathi. Dr. Garde has clearly shown what the works of Charak and Sushrut, the greatest ayurvedic authors, teach us. He there impartially says that the modern vaidyas do not follow the teaching of the ayurvedic authors and that their knowledge of physiology, anatomy, materia medica, pathology and bacteriology is based on a later system of treatment, devised by the alchemical school of medicine, which was not known in the days of Charak and Sushrut, as the theories and treatment propounded by the old ayurvedic authors were primitive and heroic. I will not give, your Excellency, all the quotations, but only one quotation about which he speaks so much. He says that the flesh of animals that are not usually used as food is recommended in phthisis, for instance, crows, owls, serpents—

His Excellency the PRESIDENT:—Order, order. I really do not think that it is necessary to go through all this.

The Honourable Sir TEMULJI NARIMAN:—Very well, your Excellency. I will not give any further quotations, but simply ask my honourable friends here present, and those who wish to revive the old ayurvedic system, whether by so doing they will promote medical science or the native medicine or simply retard its progress, and I ask Sir Narayan Chandawarkar, the chairman of the memorial meeting, whether this is quackery or not. Sir Narayan in the memorial speaks in a most contemptuous way of the different theories which are exploded in the western medical science in the course of 20 or 25 years. Medical science is a progressive science and no wonder such things happen. Your Excellency, we know that Sir Narayan Chandawarkar's views on politics and social reform have changed so often. So, I submit, his views on medicine do not signify anything. Many names of men in high position who have spoken well of the ayurvedic system are quoted in the memorial of the vaids and hakims. They are all very good and honourable men, but some of these were carried away by sentiment or love of antiquity and others through sympathy have said things of which they had superficial knowledge. It is not medical officials like Sir Pardey Lukis and others who, though very high in rank in the service, have come into intimate contact in their practice with the vaids and hakims, but men like ourselves who for nearly half a century in the profession have seen both the good and the harm done by these native vaids and hakims The good they have done is a thousand times overshadowed by the harm and mischief of their practice and profession. I would appeal to my Hindu friends that if they have the interest of humanity at heart, instead of frittering away their money in the school which has passed only 50 students in 20 years, to close it and make use of this money for starting a pharmacological laboratory or research institute in medicine, where all Indian graduates who have the inclination and will to prosecute research in indigenous medicine may be encouraged by grants or scholarships to devote their whole attention to the development of Indian medicine, and the registered medical graduates would be the first to come forward and help them and co-operate with them in their beneficent work. If such an institution is started, on the lines I suggest, I am willing to come forward with a sum of Rs. 25,000 to found scholarships, etc. But the way proposed by my honourable friend Mr. PATEL is not the right way of dealing with the subject.

In conclusion I most earnestly appeal to your Excellency and to the honourable members of this Council not to be carried away by sentiment and the clamour of those interested in the agitation, but to calmly and dispassionately judge what harm would be done to the medical profession and the medical science if this amendment is ever carried. I would rather see the whole medical act erased from the statute, as I honestly believe that the amendment proposed will not benefit the advancement of native medicine, but on the contrary will encourage quackery and put the progress of medical science a few centuries back.

The Honourable Mr. F. G. PRATT:—Your Excellency,—the Honourable Mr. PATEL wishes that the door should be closed in this discussion against all consideration of the relative merits of the methods of the western and eastern systems of medicine. Consistently with that wish of his we find that in his proposed explanations there is no suggestion whatever that those who associate with ayurvedic or unani systems or hospitals in this way should be careful to pick and choose and take the best and eliminate the bad and to find out if there is anything good or useful or true or scientific in those systems and to make use of what is good and true to the exclusion of the useless and false and unscientific. Is not that rather as if a college of science were to ask for recognition and affiliation, a college of science displaying in its prospectus a course of lectures on alchemy and the philosopher's stone, and if the question were raised as to the desirability of those lectures, it should be strongly objected that there should be no discussion as to the merits of alchemy or of its claims to inclusion in a course of modern science study? It appears to me that it is impossible to exclude considerations of that kind, and it is because he has excluded considerations of this kind that the explanation which he proposes to add must be regarded as totally unacceptable.

Before I sit down I should like to supply some information which the Honourable Mr. SEDDON asked when he enquired what my honourable friend Mr. PATEL means by "other systems of medicine". In Ahmedabad at the present moment we are having a very severe plague epidemic and a number of registered medical practitioners responsible for the public health there have been carrying on a strenuous inocculation campaign. But during the last few days I have heard to my regret that the figures of inoculation have been dropping because of the recent popularity of a system of indigenous medicine which, advocates, instead of inoculation, the use of a kind of bean, to be tied round the wrist. This bean may be purchased in the bazar for two pice, and I am sorry to say that the growing popularity of this indigenous system is reducing the figures of inoculation.

The Honourable Mr. HARCHANDRAI VISHINDAS:—Your Excellency,—I rise at this stage to speak on this bill, not because as a member of this Council I am entitled to speak, but for one particular reason, and I have to tackle one particular aspect of the question, which has not been hitherto touched. I say I am speaking because I was one of those few, whose number to-day would not be counted on the fingers of one's hand, who were parties to the passing of the original Medical Registration Act in 1912. The Honourable Sir Temulji Nariman was another. Now, what I want to say is that I regret to find that owing to the absence of a very large number of members of this Council who were parties to the introduction of this act, the real question which should be touched has been entirely overlooked, and that question is this. Now, while considering this question, I would certainly concede a mead of praise to the very eloquent and able addresses that we have heard from the Honourable Mr. Sethna and the Honourable Sir Temulji Nariman, which, so far as they go, may be entirely accepted as true in all their aspects. But, as I said at the outset, the reason for my claiming to speak to-day is that the real question at issue, which was considered at very great length at the passing of the original act, has been entirely ignored and overlooked, and it is this. I say that I, as a member of this Council, am responsible, although in a very limited measure, to keep the faith of this Council. Now, at the time when this act was being passed, as the Honourable Sir Temulji Nariman will bear testimony to-day, this question was definitely and distinctly raised as to whether the status or the practice of the ayurvedic and indigenous practitioners of medicine was going to be interfered with, and time after time—I cannot exactly reproduce the names of the members who spoke to that effect—we were being assured that it was not the intention of the act or the framers of the act to interfere with the indigenous systems at all. A passing reference, of course, we have had to that from the Honourable Sir Temulji Nariman, also in the complaint which he says he made at the time that they were only getting the kernel and not the fruit itself. That was exactly so. Whilst the western medical profession complained against the then bill that it did not aim at the abolition of the ayurvedic system, those who were the sponsors of the bill distinctly said that it was not the intention of the bill to interfere with the ayurvedic or other systems of medicine, and the members of the Council who were then present understood that from the Government as well as from those who were responsible for the passing of that measure. There was conveyed a kind of assurance that in the actual working of the act the ayurvedic system would not be interfered with, and my reason for interfering to-day and speaking on this matter as a mere layman, which otherwise I think I would not be competent to do, is that as a member of this Council I with others pledged ourselves to the effect that the ayurvedic system was not going to be interfered with and that pledge is to a certain extent—

His Excellency the PRESIDENT:—I think the honourable member is rather suggesting that Government is opposed to the ayurvedic system. I can tell him on behalf of Government that Government have no objection at all and will encourage the ayurvedic system if suggestions are made in the proper manner in the matter.

The Honourable Mr. HARCHANDRAI VISHINDAS:—What I mean to say is this, that if it is true that the Honourable Mr. PATEL'S present bill is intended to check or to meet an attempt to exclude from the Medical Council certain members on the ground that they associate themselves with practitioners of ayurvedic medicine, I am afraid that that will be to a certain extent indirectly interfering with the ayurvedic system. Of course, my interpretation may be entirely wrong. It may be that your Excellency thinks that my construction is too remote, that it does not bear directly upon the question; but I submit, your Excellency, that when we hear the Honourable Sir TEMULJI NARIMAN and other gentlemen of the medical profession say that the Medical Council should not be interfered with in their practice, that the Medical Council are the most competent authority for the purpose of deciding whether any member of that Council has acted professionally or not, and whether such member has lowered the standard or not, then I say "No". The Medical Council, in view of the fact that we passed this act, are not the sole judges. One cannot deny that the profession in England and western countries and in India have got certain standards of conduct, deviation from which would authorise them to punish in any way the defaulter. But those who support or oppose the bill are apparently confounding the two issues. It is quite open to the members of the profession under the rules which they observe, quite apart from this act, to bring to book anybody who has been guilty of unprofessional conduct from their point of view, but when they invoke the provisions of the Medical Registration Act, I respectfully submit, your Excellency, then our honour comes to the stake and we say that according to the assurances that we had given at the time of the passing of the act, such an act would be an act of breach of faith on the part of this Council.

Therefore I say the point is entirely a new point of view. It does not touch the expert, or the scientific or the medical aspect of the question and I submit that if you look at it from that point of view, you would find that you may admit in their entirety the arguments advanced by the opponents of the bill but still say that so far as this Council is concerned it will put its foot down upon the practice which it is the object of the honourable mover to put down, namely the absolute exclusion in other words the tabooing of the ayurvedic system.

Now what is it that has inspired the Honourable Mr. PATEL to bring forward this bill? It cannot be denied his motive is that a particular medical practitioner who by reason of his associating, in the treatment of a particular case according to the ayurvedic system, with vaids and hakims, was considered to be guilty of professional misconduct and therefore under the operation of this act was called upon to explain or to show cause why he should not be excluded from the register, should not be affected in this way. What I submit is that if that is the case, if the facts are true, then I say that it is going against the principle recognised in this Council at the time of the passing of the act that ayurvedic medicine would not be interfered with, by tabooing in this way a practitioner who associates himself with ayurvedic medical men. I say by that we shall be, to a certain extent, abusing the privileges which we gave to the Medical Council by which they were recognised and were brought into existence. When the Medical Registration Act was passed it was on several hands objected to on the ground that it was an attempt on the part of the framers of the bill to overlegislate and to bring about a state of things for which there was no reason, that in spite of the agitation that had been carried on in this regard by the Honourable Sir TEMULJI NARIMAN about which we have received testimony from him to-day, there was no necessity of creating any new legislation. But better counsels prevailed and they thought that it was high time that some kind of regulation should be adopted towards the medical practitioners of the city of Bombay and that they should be regulated in their conduct. But it was never contemplated that directly or indirectly, nearly or remotely, the effect of this act should be that ayurvedic medicine should be interfered with. I understand, your Excellency, I am open to correction if I am wrong, that the Government in no way desire to interfere with ayurvedic medicine. I do not say that Government desire that at all. But I say that this Medical Council which has been created by us, by this Council, under a particular act, will be transgressing the limits that have been prescribed for them by that act if they bring into operation this particular law for the purpose of serving the object in view. It may be laudable, it may be praiseworthy, it may be salutory, but there are other methods of enforcing it. That is to say, if anybody has offended from their point of view against their professional standard, they have the means of punishing him through the profession.

His Excellency the PRESIDENT.—Will the honourable member tell us what they are?

The Honourable Mr. HARCHANDRAI VISHINDAS.—I understand that in all professions there is a particular rule that if there is any member of the profession who offends against a particular standard then he can be reported as not belonging to the profession or, as is the case with our bar associations. Although the members of the bar association who practise the legal profession are not regulated by any such corresponding act, still in England as well as in this country the bar associations report the name of such an offending member whose conduct is unprofessional to the superiors and those superiors deal with him. I daresay members of the medical profession who are in the enjoyment of diplomas and degrees can very easily be reported, if they are guilty of unprofessional conduct, to the universities who granted them those diplomas or degrees and they can be deprived of the diplomas.

His Excellency the PRESIDENT.—But may I just suggest to the honourable member that the bar associations can take action under their rules? Similarly the Medical Council wish to take action, if necessary, under their rules. Has the honourable member any objection to that?

The Honourable Mr. HARCHANDRAI VISHINDAS.—My point of view is this, that if the present sense and the conscience of this Council and the public is that this kind of concession or privilege should be granted to the Medical Council, then we must boldly face the situation and come forward with an act in which the Medical Council should be recognised to exercise this power.

His Excellency the PRESIDENT.—Has the honourable member any objection to the Medical Council acting under their rules?

The Honourable Mr. HARCHANDRAI VISHINDAS.—If they are acting according to this particular act in a manner which was opposed to the declared assurances given by this Council, then I certainly would have an objection. There are many other lines of conduct which members of the Medical Council can object to, but when there is a particular act which is directly in consonance with the declared wishes of this Council, then for the Medical Council to attack and punish a hypothetical offender is tantamount to a breach of faith on the part of this Council. That is the only question I wanted to touch and I say the object which the Medical Council have probably in view, of bringing to book the conduct of any member who offends against their professional standard, can be achieved by the Honourable Sir TEMULJI NARIMAN boldly coming forward before the Council and asking for the amendment of the act and making it quite clear and saying that although this Council five years ago gave an assurance that ayurvedic medicine would not be interfered with, in so far as it does not carry out the objects of the Medical Council, such and such changes should be made in the act, but so long as the act remains, so long as it is based on that assurance that was given at the time, then any attempt to trench upon the assurance would not be consonant with the dignity and honour of this Council to encourage.

His Excellency the PRESIDENT:—The Council will now adjourn till 3 o'clock.

The Council then adjourned for lunch.

After Lunch.

(The Council re-assembled after lunch at 3 o'clock.)

His Excellency the PRESIDENT:—Order, order. Further consideration of the bill to amend the Bombay Medical Act, 1912, first reading.

The Honourable Dewan Bahadur KASHINATH RAMCHANDRA GODBOLE:—Your Excellency,—I am going to accord my support to the bill that has been brought forward by my friend the Honourable Mr. PATEL.

The first two clauses of the bill, I see, are not opposed by the previous speakers. Only a few changes are recommended and these changes will probably be carried to the satisfaction of the Council when the bill goes before the select committee.

As regards the third clause there has been very determined opposition, but I think, sir, that some provision like the one that has been proposed by the Honourable Mr. PATEL seems to be really necessary as will be apparent from a hypothetical case which I will place before the Council. We know that nearly 80 per cent. or as it was stated here, 90 per cent., of the population of this Presidency resort to hakims and vaids for medical treatment. Now I will put it to my honourable friend, Sir TEMULJI NARIMAN, what will he do in a case like the one that I am going to place before the Council? Suppose a man goes to a vaid or a hakim for treatment. He places himself under the treatment of this vaid or hakim and after a certain time finds that the treatment is hopeless; he then changes his mind and wants to consult Sir TEMULJI NARIMAN. What will Sir TEMULJI do? Will he let this man die or will he go to his assistance? I think as a professional man it is his duty to go to his assistance and he cannot render any assistance unless he consults the vaid or hakim under whose treatment the patient was. Sir TEMULJI will have to find out whether this vaid or hakim has been administering purgatives or what other treatment he has been giving to his patient, and until he ascertains this, he won't be able to treat the case. Sir TEMULJI must thus place himself in communication with this vaid or hakim, and associate himself with him to this extent. Either he must let the patient die (which I think would be very unprofessional) or he must consult the vaid or the hakim to the extent I have indicated. To meet cases of this kind it is necessary, I think, that some proviso to clause 7, of the description indicated by the Honourable Mr. PATEL is necessary, and I therefore think that the bill deserves to be brought before the select committee and that its first reading should be passed.

The Honourable Mr. PANDURANG ANANT DESAI:—Your Excellency,—I rise to accord my support to the first reading of this bill which has been moved by the Honourable Mr. PATEL The bill consists of 3 parts.

The first part wants an increase in the elective principle. At present out of 13 members of the Medical Council, in addition to the chairman, 6 are nominated by Government. The bill wants that out of these, two seats should go to the elected members. At present the number of elected members is 6. We want that number to be increased by 2. It would be then 5 nominated and 8 elected. If this principle of election is taken into consideration, then the next question would be, as the honourable mover proposes, whether these two seats should be given to the members of the Faculty of Medicine. As regards this there is a difference. Some propose that these 2 seats should not be given to the members of the Medical Faculty because already there are about 10 members of that faculty on the Council; and therefore these two seats should be given to other bodies. The Honourable Dr. FERNANDES proposes that 1 out of these 2 should be given to the College of Physicians and the other should be given to the medical graduates. Of course, these details may be left to the select committee when the bill comes before it, and therefore, we need not trouble ourselves with this question at present. It can very well be disposed of by the select committee.

Now, the second part of the bill is with respect to the hospital assistants or sub-assistant surgeons. At present they have got the power of voting but the sub-assistant surgeons want that they should be held eligible for membership of the council itself. Now we have learnt that there are about 1,024 or 1,025 such persons as sub-assistant surgeons and I think that such a large body as that should have their representatives on the Council. The demand is certainly not unreasonable, because out of the 2,000 members, more than half are sub-assistant surgeons and as the Council is at present constituted there is no representation for them. Therefore, I submit that if there is a demand that sub-assistant surgeons should have representation, that demand is not unreasonable.

Then comes the third part of the bill which is the principal part that has been strongly opposed by some of the honourable members and that is the most important part of this bill. As regards this, the first thing which has been suggested by some of the honourable members who have spoken before is that the Medical Council should be at liberty to frame rules and regulations for its own conduct. I admit that the Medical Council should frame rules and regulations for its own conduct, but they must take care to see that those rules and regulations do not affect any body else. The present question is whether the interpretation which the members of the Medical Council want to put upon the association of registered graduates with unregistered men or men who practice the ayurvedic or unani system is correct. They now propose that this association should be looked upon as "infamous conduct". The case before us is that of Dr. Popat Prabhuram who has opened a college in Bombay which has been in existence for over 20 years. A notice has been issued to him to show cause why his name should not be expunged from the medical register. He has asked the Medical Council to give specific reasons as to why they want his name to be expunged. No definite answer has been given to him though two years have elapsed. But the act of issuing a notice clearly shows that the Medical Council warts to say that this association is a disqualification. We must consider whether that is proper and whether that should be done. If this interpretation is allowed, what would be the direct and indirect effect of this interpretation? We have seen that since this act was passed in 1912 those teachers of western science, who were actually teaching this ayurvedic system in this college, have left the college because they thought that if they had association any further with this institution their names would be expunged from this register. Now the only men who are competent to teach western science are—

The Honourable Mr. CURTIS:—I beg the honourable member's pardon—will the honourable member please give the names of members who have left the college?

The Honourable Mr. DESAI:—I do not know—my instructions are to that effect—I have not got the names but my honourable friend Mr. UPASANI has got the names and I am told that since this act was passed they have left the college, and I suppose Dr. Popat Prabhuram is now the only man there who has passed an examination in western medical science. My opinion is that Dr. Popat is not guilty of any infamous act. He is a person who has taken a great interest in the welfare of this college. Now can this association of Dr. Popat be treated as infamous? Your Excellency will see that this phrase "infamous conduct" is just after the words "any medical practitioner who has been convicted of a cognizable offence or who after the due enquiry has been held guilty by them of." Now I ask whether this conduct, namely, association with students or teaching students in the college is infamous or whether that association is in any way against the conduct of a professional man? Is there any dishonesty in it? Is it in any way dishonourable? Therefore, my submission is—

The Honourable Mr. CURTIS.—Do I understand the honourable member to say that the Council has definitely decided that association with the college is infamous conduct?

The Honourable Mr. DESAI.—It is not decided yet, but they have issued a notice to Dr. Popat to show cause why his name should not be expunged from the register. As far as we see Dr. Popat is not guilty of any infamous act. The only thing he has been doing is that he has been giving instruction to the students. Therefore, my submission is, can this be called infamous conduct? Then if this is called infamous conduct what would be the direct and indirect result? The direct result would be that people would not dare to open such colleges or schools and the indirect result would be that people who are dependent upon unani and ayurvedic systems of medicine will suffer. We have been told that 90 per cent. of the population are dependent upon these systems. What would be the fate of these 90 per cent.? If they are to depend upon these systems of medicine, then there ought to be some provision made for the education and instruction of some persons at least in these systems.

Now if we take into consideration the present state of things we see that there are about 700 or 800 hospitals in this Presidency. Taking the number of the hospitals and the population of the province we see that for one hospital there are about 30,000 people. Now is it possible, I ask, that these 700 or 800 hospitals can give medical aid to so many persons? And we know that these hospitals as they stand are at distances of 20 or 30 miles. Is it possible for a villager to go to the hospital whenever he is in need of medical aid? If Government is not in a position to make provision for these 30,000 people, is it not necessary that some provision should be made for the encouragement of ayurvedic or unani systems? People have faith in those systems.

I admit that there are defects in those systems. It is said by some that the physiology, anatomy and pathology of the ayurvedic and unani systems are in their crudest form. I admit that they are in the crudest form, but, I ask, are you, persons who have to look to the interests of the public, not bound to make improvement in those systems? If you say that persons who teach, persons who have connection with the ayurvedic or unani systems are to be condemned as undesirable persons, where is the possibility, I submit, of making any improvement? If these 90 per cent. of the people are to go to these hakims and vaids, is it not obvious that improvement is necessary in their case? Therefore, I say, if improvement is necessary, then if you admit this interpretation, the direct and the indirect effect of that interpretation would be disastrous. People will not dare to go to these schools, they will not dare to open these schools and colleges to teach students, and people will not dare to have consultation with vaids and hakims.

Now of course I am a layman. I have got no knowledge either of the ayurvedic or of the western science. But as a man with common sense I am competent to say as others have done, that I have seen several instances in which patients who have been given up as hopeless have been treated by hakims and vaids and have been cured. Now how can that be accounted for by the persons who are against this bill? Well they might say it was a cure by nature or that it was a cure by accident. But I say if it was a case of a single man, it could have been said so. But I have seen several cases of chronic diarrhœa and of pthisis, which were given up by doctors and which have been successfully treated by these hakims and vaids. Therefore my submission is that if this interpretation is allowed, that would be a death-blow given to these indigenous systems of medicine and therefore I submit that this interpretation should not be allowed.

Now we have seen that in the United Provinces a bill of a similar nature was brought and it has been passed into law. There it has been held that nothing shall be deemed to justify the exclusion or removal from the register of the name of any medical practitioner on the ground of his adoption of a theory of medicine and surgery not in accordance with the accepted view for the time being or of his association with a vaid, hakim or homeopath or an unregistered practitioner so long as that unregistered practitioner is possessed of one of the qualifications specified in the schedule. Now this definition according to our Medical Council in Bombay is clearly wrong. But your Excellency will see that this act has been passed by the United Provinces Legislative Council and it was submitted in the usual course to His Excellency the Viceroy and His Excellency the Viceroy has given his consent to it How could this conduct in Allahabad or in the United Provinces be looked upon as approved, while it is looked upon in Bombay as infamous? According to the views of the Bombay Medical Council a person who has passed the university examination in Allahabad is qualified to be a member of that Council. Now take a hypothetical case. Suppose a medical man comes from Allahabad to Bombay. The Bombay Medical Council is bound to register his name according to its rules. If he is in consultation with a vaid, then how can you interpret in his case that it is a disqualification. He might say that according to the law which is prevalent in his province he has not committed any bad act in associating with a vaid or a hakim and that therefore his name should not be expunged from the register. Therefore an act which is held reasonable in Allahabad cannot be held unreasonable in Bombay. There is no atmospheric condition which renders it undesirable in these places, and therefore, my submission is that if it is held as reasonable in Allahabad it should be also held reasonable in Bombay, and that there is no force in the argument that the rules which have been framed by the Bombay Medical Council ought to be obeyed. The rules should not be inconsistent with the interests of the medical practitioners in the other provinces. In this case if you admit the interpretation which the Bombay Medical Council want to put upon this association with a vaidya or a hakim, I submit that it is going to affect the interests of all the persons other than those who are on the Medical Council.

Now I have admitted that there are many defects in the ayurvedic or the unani systems. But an attempt should be made to improve those systems, and therefore, I say, it is the bounden duty of Government to open schools and to prescribe any tests in those systems. I admit that the motive of Government is excellent. There is nothing objectionable in the motive of Government, because the object of this act is to protect the interests of the public. No doubt if a person poses himself as a doctor who has got no knowledge of medicine and who was simply a compounder for a year or two, the Medical Council may ask that such a person should be stopped from practising his fraud. But as regards men who have regularly studied the science of ayurved or the unani system, it cannot be said in their cases that those persons are undesirable. Both these sciences, namely, the ayurvedic and the unani have been practised for over 2,000 years.

The Honourable Mr. SEDDON said that it is not a question affecting the Hindu nation because he thinks that this ayurvedic system was perhaps transferred from Greece to India and that Hippocrates was the father of western medicine It cannot be so because our ayurved was in existence about two or three centuries before Hippocrates was born in Athens. Therefore my submission is that our science is the science of the soil, and of course we have got this sentiment also, namely, that if this system has been in practice for over two thousand years and has satisfied the wants of all of us it should not be swept away by a stroke of the pen.

Then as regards these sciences the author of the bill has quoted some important speeches and among them that of Sir PARDEY LUKIS, the Director General of Indian Medical Service. Nobody has tried to contradict the view of Sir PARDEY LUKIS and I submit the opinion of such a responsible officer is entitled to much weight.

Then another indirect effect of this interpretation would be that persons who have studied the ayurvedic or unani systems would not get any post under any municipality or local board. The other day there was a case in Poona itself. A man who had studied in this college in Bombay was placed in charge of an ayurvedic hospital in Poona. There was some row about it and Government had to change the law in that case. I submit therefore that if we want to make provision for the 90 per cent. of the population, we must try to improve these systems and try to remove the defects and the drawbacks which are at present found in these systems. We must try our best to modernise the ancient systems and therefore I submit that Government ought to establish colleges and schools where these subjects will be taught with the aid of modern science.

With these words I support the first reading of the bill.

The Honourable Mr. SHERIFF DEVJI CANJI :—Your Excellency,—I shall begin by offering my congratulations to my honourable friend Mr. PATEL on his bringing forward this bill before the Council. Evidently one of the objects of his bill is, to lay down definitely that certain courses of conduct on the part of the registered medical practitioners shall not be declared as infamous conduct in any professional respect. The Medical Council in declaring association with the ancient systems of medicine as infamous conduct has rendered such a measure absolutely necessary. In a matter like this, we, as legislators, have not only to note the public feeling and public opinion on this question, but have to be guided by what conduces to their welfare. The most important consideration is this. Whether in the existing circumstances of this country, is it desirable for the benefit of the public and in the larger interests of humanity that registered medical practitioners should associate with and encourage the ancient systems of medicine?

Now let us look at the facts. As Lord Hardinge has said 90 per cent. of the population in this country takes advantage of the ancient systems of medicine. They are the cheapest agencies of medical relief and the people of this country have very great faith in them. Is it then wise that the Medical Council should look upon these vaidyas and hakims as untouchables? Is it possible for years to come to substitute a cheap agency of doctors qualified according to western science in the place of vaidyas and hakims who carry medical help and medical relief to the vast majority of the people of this country? That is not possible. I therefore venture to think that it is the duty of the Government to improve and encourage the indigenous systems of medicine. But it has been contended that these vaidyas and hakims are quacks. Is that so? Even Mr. Monie, a Secretary to the Government of Bombay, has admitted that there are at present capable practitioners of the ancient methods, while Sir PARDEY LUKIS has strongly resented "that spirit of trade-unionism which leads modern doctors to stigmatise all vaidyas and hakims as quacks and charlatans." As a layman I shall not venture to decide between the claims of the western and the eastern systems of medicine, but I cannot help observing that I know of several cases where the treatment according to the western science has failed, while that according to the indigenous systems of medicine has succeeded.

What the public wants is a cheap agency of effective medical relief—it matters not whether it is western or indigenous. I may, however, admit that all the vaidyas and hakims are not properly trained. Even for the sake of argument let us say that they are not trained at all. What should be our duty in that case? Either to prevent them all from practising their profession which I believe will be disastrous in the interests of the vast majority of the people of this land who have great faith in them, or to create and encourage those facilities which increase their knowledge and impart them regular training. The Prabhuram Ayurvedic College is doing excellent work in this direction as testified by the remarks of several eminent men who have visited that college. Even such a high authority as Dr. Turner has not only approved and praised their work but has held that it is absolutely necessary to carry cheap medical relief "to those poorer classes who die without calling in any medical aid." But such excellent and useful work would not have been possible without the association and devoted labour of such a well known registered medical practitioner as Dr. Popat Prabhuram. While the public of this city hold him in high regard for his self-sacrificing spirit, the Medical Council has been thinking of declaring his conduct in this matter as infamous It is this spirit against which we must strongly protest. It is evident that such association with the ancient systems of medicine on the part of registered medical practitioners not only improves and develops those systems but also increases the number of regularly trained vaidyas and hakims. I therefore hold that such association, for the benefit of the public and in the interests of humanity, should be strongly encouraged and the Government should see their way to start schools and colleges to further the interests of the indigenous systems of medicine.

One word more. It is a truism to say that those who are in search of truth should welcome light from whatever quarter it comes. It is therefore necessary that to achieve the progress of medical science both the western and the ancient systems of medicine should be studied together. He who does this should receive encouragement and not disgrace. We should not give legal sanction to those rules which seek to guard the spirit of narrow professionalism but should always be ready to welcome and encourage those practices which conduce to the welfare of the people. My Lord, if this restriction on the liberty of the medical practitioners associating with the ancient systems of medicine is not removed, I am afraid such useful institutions as the Prabhuram Ayurvedic College will not come into existence in future. And the consequence would be that the public would be condemned for ever to the treatment of vaidyas and hakims, many of whom are not regularly trained, and would be thus deprived of the prospective benefit which they would otherwise receive from the treatment of trained practitioners of ancient methods. My Lord, I therefore strongly feel that if we do not accord our support to this measure, we shall fail in our duty by the public.

The Honourable Mr. BALKRISHNA SITARAM KAMAT :—Your Excellency,—I wish to make a few remarks regarding the subject matter of this bill. I think it is necessary to slightly correct the statement which has fallen from my honourable friend Mr. DESAI when he relied on a certain quotation from the recent act of the United Provinces on the subject. The quotation which he gave leads one to the impression that there that act allows the registered practitioner to associate with an unregistered practitioner unconditionally. I hold in my hand a copy of the gazette in which the act has been published, and so far as association with unregistered practitioners goes, the wording there is :—"Nothing in sub-section (1) shall be deemed to justify the exclusion or removal from the register of the name of any medical practitioner on the ground of his adoption of a theory of medicine or surgery not in accordance with the accepted view for the time being, or of his association with a vaid, hakim, or homœopath or an unregistered practitioner, so long as that unregistered practitioner is possessed of one of the qualifications specified in the schedule." That is to say, if a registered practitioner has been associated with an unregistered practitioner, that unregistered practitioner must have certain qualifications specified in that schedule. However, that qualification does not apply to vaids and hakims, and therefore the proposition of the Honourable Mr. DESAI and of the Honourable Mr. PATEL remains, that in the United Provinces the Government there have admitted the principle that a registered practitioner can associate with a vaid or a hakim; and as the assent of the Government of India has been given to that act, all the discussion that has been going on in this Council at present can be cut short, I think, by a declaration on behalf of Government. After all, the Government of India have given their assent to the main principle of the bill that a registered practitioner can with immunity associate himself with a vaid or hakim.

Now coming to the observations of the various speakers, my honourable friend Mr. SETHNA referred to the practice followed in the United Kingdom and he quoted certain figures as to the number of registered practitioners in Bombay. Now speaking about a certain point referred to by him about the elective principle, may I point out to Mr. SETHNA that according to section 7 of the English act, on which after all the Bombay act is modelled, the total number of members of the General Medical Council in England is 25 and out of those 25 only 5 are nominated by Government, and the remaining 20 are elected by the various bodies. Out of these 20, eleven members are returned by the various universities, and the remaining nine by the various medical colleges. That is to say, even in England under the English act, which has been quoted, the proportion of the nominated members to the elected members is something like 5 to 20 or 1 to 4. Then the Honourable Mr. SETHNA also referred to the medical graduates who have registered themselves in Bombay, from which he drew a certain inference. May I also point out to him that, so far as the English act goes, the system or at any rate the condition of things in the United Kingdom is such that there is homogeneity among the medical practitioners? We are told that prior to 1912 during the previous 24 years the total number of medical men registered was something like 35,000 per annum and during the course of 24 years there was only one expulsion from the register; that is to say, the conditions in England are so widely different from those that prevail here that there can be no analogy between the two. There almost all doctors belong to a certain system of medical science; not so in India, where if there are 9,000 graduates trained in western science, there are perhaps 90,000 who are not trained in any particular science, who are vaids and hakims and who have no system and qualifications as such, and yet they are very useful to the country.

The Honourable Mr. SETHNA also referred to the school or college—call it by whatever name you like—which has been started by Dr. Popat Prabhuram and he made much of the fact that on the managing committee there is a solicitor, and that in the course of 20 years they have turned out only 52 trained men. May I mention to him that after all, it is not a college and nobody contends that it is a college in the same sense as the Grant Medical College is? But, even then, Government have recognised its work and it has been recognized for the purpose of a dispensary in Poona, namely, the ayurvedic dispensary maintained by the Poona City municipality and recognition has been given after a good deal of discussion and consideration by the Government of Bombay to a graduate from the Prabhuram Ayurvedic School. The managing committee have to look, after all, to nothing beyond the management of this institution, which has been doing work of a very useful nature.

The Honourable Mr. SEDDON to my mind went into almost an academical discussion. His contention was that the unani system was not a pure native of the soil. Whatever it is, if the unani system is not a native of the soil, my Mahomedan friends can take up the cudgel on that particular point. My point is this, that at any rate the ayurvedic system is a very ancient system and contains several useful drugs, and if that is so, I submit that the Bombay Medical Council ought to look upon it in a catholic spirit and wherever there is a useful drug it must be picked up, whether it be from the indigenous system of ayurvedic or unani, irrespective of the fact whether the system practised by a vaid or hakim belongs to India or to Greece or to any other country.

Turning to my friend the Honourable Sir TEMULJI NARIMAN, he in the first place maintained that the Bombay Medical Council has every right to lay down its code of ethics. I demur. Of course, to a certain extent a body of a professional character has a certain right, no doubt, of laying down its code of ethics. That proposition, as a general rule, I accept, but if the rules laid down by that body are so framed as to materially affect the interests of the country at large, then I believe that it is our duty, as legislators and as men who have passed the act, in the interests of the public at large to see that the Medical Council frames rules of such a nature as could be tolerated. I put it to Sir TEMULJI NARIMAN that supposing a body of literary men, of scholars, lay down that no scholar of western training ought to associate himself with a shastri, or a pundit or a munshi or a person having some knowledge of oriental learning, how would he, Sir TEMULJI NARIMAN, like that idea? Should not western scholars associate themselves with our shastris or pundits? Should they be shunned as men who are a polluted, contaminated humanity and be excluded as morally depraved?

My Honourable friend Dr. FERNANDES said that in the word "infamous" there is no suggestion of any moral reflection. That proposition is not acceptable to me. After all, as we understand the term "infamous" there is a certain moral dereliction implied in the case of a man who has been removed from the register. If it was not so, why should not Dr. FERNANDES allow a certain modification of the definition of the word "infamous" to be put in the act itself? If there is no moral reflection passed upon a man removed from the register, say so in the act itself that there is no reflection whatsoever.

MEDICAL BILL.

[10TH OCTOBER 1917.] [Mr. Balkrishna Sitaram Kamat; Mr. Shridhar Balkrishna Upasani.]

Then Sir TEMULJI NARIMAN in the course of his remarks said that a good deal has been made of Sir PARDEY LUKIS'S speech and he went on to say that he may not have come in contact with men who practise the ayurvedic and the unani systems. Well, this Council will pardon me if I give another quotation from Sir PARDEY LUKIS'S speech, delivered at Indore in 1915 in which he said :—"I wish to impress upon you most strongly that you should not run away with the idea that everything that is good in the way of medicine is contained within the ring-fence of allopathy or western medicine. The longer I remain and the more I see of the country and the people, the more convinced I am that many of the empirical methods of treatment adopted by the vaids and hakims are of the greatest value; and there is no doubt whatever that their ancestors knew, ages ago, many things which are now-a-days being brought forward as new discoveries." From this quotation it seems that the Honourable Sir PARDEY LUKIS is not a stranger to India and that he has come into contact with the people of this country as much as is necessary. But as the Honourable Sir TEMULJI NARIMAN has said that he, Sir PARDEY LUKIS, may have never come into contact with the people of this country, may I also, by similar analogy, ask him whether he, Sir TEMULJI himself, has studied as closely as perhaps it should be done, the systems of ayurvedic or unani medicine? If he can tell me that he has very closely studied and tried by experiment certain drugs of the two systems, then in the opinion of the Medical Council he is guilty in a way of infamous conduct. If he has not studied the systems, then his testimony will be out of court. In either case his testimony is out of court or, if he has studied the system then it only proves to our lay minds at any rate that there is no harm in studying eastern medicine on the part of western men and associating themselves with the ayurvedic and unani vaids or hakims.

Sir TEMULJI NARIMAN says that there has been no single medicine produced by the ayurvedic school of Dr. Popat. On the contrary, let me ask him whether in the schools started by Government for the hospital assistants—men of lower status—they have given to the world any discovery regarding any medicines from the education which they have received? If then the education which they are receiving at the hands of Government is after all of an inferior character and if such schools for hospital assistants have not produced any new medicine, why should the ayurvedic schools be expected to make discoveries in medicine?

The argument of the Honourable Sir TEMULJI NARIMAN about physiology, pathology, anatomy, biology, etc., has been met by my friend the Honourable Mr. DESAI. The whole issue is this. No exponent of the ayurvedic or unani systems maintains that the systems are as perfect as the western system. I for one never contend that it is an up-to-date or a perfect system. We all admit that it is antiquated, that it is crude and that perhaps it is an unscientific system. But the whole issue as I say is this. Is it such a scandalous system that even the very association with it ought to put a man outside the pale of decent society? I cannot maintain that the greatest western scholar should feel ashamed if he is, out of necessity, compelled to associate himself with the Indian systems. That is the whole point. I believe, as members of this Council and as legislators, we should see that the rules laid down by the Medical Council are not of such an anamolous and preposterous a character as to affect the interests of the public. It is from this point of view that we have to approach this question. If we do so, I believe we can come to one decision only, that it is desirable, in the interests of the country not to stigmatise a man who must, for the sake of the country and owing to the peculiar circumstances of this country, associate himself with the Indian systems of medicine.

For these reasons I have very great pleasure in according my hearty support to the Bill of the Honourable Mr. PATEL.

The Honourable Mr. SHRIDHAR BALKRISHNA UPASANI.—Your Excellency.—The Honourable Mr. PATEL deserves our best thanks for having brought this bill before the Council. The bill is a very modest one and the Honourable Mr. PATEL seeks only a few amendments in the existing act. He first aims at making the Council more representative by increasing the proportion of elected members which at present stands at six elected to seven nominated. His proposal is to reverse this by putting it otherwise, seven elected to six nominated members. For my part, I should think that considering that the number at present standing on the medical register has gone up, as stated by the Honourable Mr. SETHNA, to 1,944, the time has come to increase the number on the Medical Council, to at least 15 which will correspond to the number on the Bengal Medical Council. There the Medical Council consists of a president, seven nominated members and seven elected including the registrar. Now here, I think it would be better to have a constitution on the same lines, but with six nominated members including the president, and the rest elected. While having the constitution thus amended, provision might be made for allowing representation to that large class of registered practitioners, I mean the medical undergraduates, about whom so much has been said. Their number on the register stands at 1,024 against 805 Bombay graduates, 18 graduates of other Indian universities, and 97 gentlemen of European qualifications. Considering their number, they are entitled to have seven members elected from them for their proper share of equal representation, and I think the least that we can do in their interest is to give them at least three seats in a medical council of 15. This is the more necessary, because there is a feeling of prejudice with reference to them and we have every reason to fear that their interests will not be treated with the same consideration as the interests of the gentlemen with higher qualifications. Even in this Council when references were made to them, they were spoken of as if they were a body of inferior men with inferior qualifications, but as regards them I will only beg your Excellency's leave to refer to what was said about them by the Honourable Sir RICHARD LAMB when the bill was first passed in 1912. He spoke as follows :—

"Among the persons qualified to be registered, we have included the sub-assistant surgeons and military assistant surgeons. These men go through a four years' course of instruction in a Government medical college or school, as compared with five years for the degree of L. M. & S., and on passing the final examination receive a certificate from Government declaring them to be qualified to practise medicine, surgery and midwifery. Most of the mofussil dispensaries are in sole charge of men of this grade, and they are found to be fairly competent medical practitioners. Except in the larger towns, the greater part of the medical practice in the mofussil is in their hands and Government have to depend on them for medico-technical legal work. We consider that they are entitled to be treated as fully qualified medical practitioners, and indeed it would be impossible to rule them out without leaving the greater part of the mofussil entirely without 'duly qualified practitioners' for the purpose of certificates and for the officering of dispensaries. Their inclusion in the register is, therefore, essential to the working of the act." The Honourable Surgeon-General H. W. STEVENSON spoke of them in still more eloquent terms and with greater emphasis as regards their qualifications. That being the case, it is not only desirable but necessary that they should be allowed their proper share of representation on the Medical Council which is due to their number and also to their position if they are to be registered members.

Your Excellency very pertinently enquired, while the Honourable Mr. HARCHANDRAI was addressing the Council, as to whether it was not open to the Medical Council to have its own rules. I say that it should be open to the Council to have its own rules. But my point is that they should be consistent with the spirit of the law which does not leave it entirely to the option of the medical practitioners whether they should or should not get themselves registered. In fact these practitioners are allowed certain privileges only if they get themselves registered. Unless they are registered they would not be eligible for service under Government or in municipalities or local boards. They have also other privileges, such as the granting of medical certificates, etc. Therefore, when Government imposes these conditions and these disabilities and allows the Medical Council to have special disciplinary jurisdiction over the sub-assistant surgeons, it is desirable that they should have representation on the Council which is necessary in their interests.

Now we come to the other point which has provoked so much discussion as to the meaning of the word "infamous". It was unfortunate that it was not possible to find out a better word than this word "infamous". Well, it conveys to my mind some moral dereliction or gross failure of duty and its use should be confined to only such dereliction or gross professional failure. Its extended application by the Medical Council has necessitated the amendment which the Honourable Mr. PATEL now proposes to make. The same necessity was felt in other Presidencies and I am glad that in the United Provinces, at any rate, this grievance has been redressed.

A good deal has been said about the relative merits of one science or the other, but I think it is well known that any system which is at present giving relief to 90 per cent. of the population should be recognised, whatever its inherent merits may be. But as regards the inherent merits of the ayurvedic system, I will only refer this Council to the opinion of a distinguished and eminent doctor, the late Dr. Garde. He was a very keen admirer of the western medicine and was also a diligent student of the ayurvedic system and he had practised both the systems for more than 25 years—and in a public address delivered by him in Poona he summed up his conclusions as follows :—

"To sum up we arrive at the following conclusions :—

"I. That the science of medicine was developed in India at a very early date, i. e., long before the Greek father of medicine Hippocrates.

"II. That the progress made in that science even in those early days was far in advance of Greece and Rome.

"III. That notwithstanding the defects in the theoretical part of the science, the practical part is of much use even for practitioners of western culture.

"IV. That we can introduce into our practice many of the drugs and preparations of Hindu medicine with advantage so that we may recoup or replenish our means of cure.

"V. A scientific study of Indian medicine will cause a regeneration of the system and thus will be of vast benefit to the whole world and more so to the people of this country."

That is what he said and he further strongly urged that the subject of ayurvedic medicine should be taken up by our medical men earnestly as a post-graduate study. Now what the Honourable Sir TEMULJI NARIMAN says is that we should allow the Medical Council to treat even mere association with an ayurvedic school or institution as a disqualification, nay as infamous conduct on the part of a registered practitioner. I am simply surprised that he should say so; I can well understand that our European friends may not be in a position to study this science or to appreciate its value, but it is certainly surprising that a veteran doctor like Sir TEMULJI NARIMAN should insist that our own young, medical graduates, even if they wished to bring the ayurvedic system up to the level of the western system, should not be allowed to do so, and if they did it, that it should be considered infamous conduct on their part justifying the removal of their name from the register.

Then I will only beg leave to quote the opinion of some of the more advanced thinkers in the west like professors of the King's College, London. Dr. J. Clark says:—"If the physicians of the present day would try and treat their patients according to the method of Charak, there would be less work for the undertakers and fewer deaths in the world." This is said by a man of European repute. I, therefore, say that our medical practitioners should not only be allowed to associate with practitioners of ayurvedic medicine but it should be compulsory on all our medical graduates to devote some time to the study of the ancient methods of medicine, and it should be a part of the duty of the Medical Council itself to help them in doing so, instead of acting like a bureaucratic body which would not itself do what it should and would also not let others do it. Considering this aspect of the case I hope this bill will meet with strong support from the Council.

The Honourable Mr. LALUBHAI SAMALDAS MEHTA:—Your Excellency,—Your Excellency put a direct question to the Honourable Mr. HARCHANDRAI whether the Medical Council should not be allowed to frame rules in the same way as a law association or a bar association would be allowed freedom to proceed against its own members according to the rules made by them. My friend did not reply to it. What I would say is this, that if the Medical Council had been a private association registered under one of the existing acts of legislature, then they would have full freedom to frame their own rules and demand that every member who joined them should follow those rules or act according to the rules laid down by them. But in the case of the Medical Council the Government have passed a special act and have given certain concessions. As my honourable friend Sir TEMULJI NARIMAN said, the concessions may not be worth very much to them, but the Legislative Council was, when the bill was moved in 1912, specially prepared to give those concessions to protect their interests. As the Medical Council has been created by a statute of the Bombay Government, have not the Bombay Government the right to see that the action taken by the Medical Council is in consonance with the general lines laid down by Government? It is only for these reasons that I would like to see that the bill goes to the select committee. I do not approve of all that the Honourable Mr. PATEL has said about the explanations in the bill but the simple question is this: Has this Council the right or is it justified in laying down general lines in defining the words "infamous conduct" and then leaving the Medical Council to act according to this definition? My Honourable friends Sir TEMULJI NARIMAN and Dr. FERNANDES said that they strongly resented any interference of the Legislative Council in the matter of their rules. Sir TEMULJI went to the other extreme in saying that he would rather like that the existing act should be erased than have this amendment passed. It is merely to give the Medical Council a guidance in the matter that the amendment is proposed. That is how I look at it. Possibly my friend Sir TEMULJI NARIMAN has been frightened by the explanations proposed by my friend Mr. PATEL that these would be restricting their freedom of action. What I would suggest is, that, if the bill goes to the select committee, the definition laid down by Lord Esher and accepted by the Honourable Mr. PATEL as regards the words "infamous conduct" under the British medical act be adopted. This is what Lord Esher says:—"I adopt the definition which my brother Lopes has drawn up, at any rate, of one kind of conduct amounting to infamous conduct in a professional respect, namely, if it is shown that a medical man in the pursuit of his profession has done something with regard to it which would be reasonably regarded as disgraceful or dishonourable by his professional brethren, of good repute and competency, then it is open for the General Medical Council to say that he has been guilty of infamous conduct in a professional respect, but on the other hand, an act which is not done in a professional respect does not come within this section. There may be some acts which although they may not be infamous in any other persons yet if they are done by a medical man in relation to his profession, that is, with regard either to his patients or to his professional brethren, may be fairly considered infamous conduct in professional respect." If such a definition is put in and if the Medical Council is given full freedom to decide, for instance, what "unqualified" means, then I do not think the Medical Council can take any umbrage at this bill being sent to the select committee.

MEDICAL BILL.

[10TH OCTOBER 1917.] [Mr. Lalubhai Samaldas Mehta; Mr. Raghunath Purshottam Paranjpye.]

As to what the Honourable Sir TEMULJI NARIMAN said it appears, your Excellency, there has been some misunderstanding. He thinks that this bill is brought forward with the idea of forcing or allowing all members of the Medical Council to participate or take part in ayurvedic institutions. I do not think that this would be the possible effect of the explanations which the Honourable Mr. PATEL proposes to include in the act. Personally, I do not want all those explanations. After the attitude taken up by the Honourable Sir TEMULJI NARIMAN, when he says, as a matter of fact, they should have nothing to do with ayurvedic medicine, I would suggest to my friend the Honourable Mr. PATEL to start a separate association. If Government is so good as to give to the new association the same concessions as are given to the present Medical Council and if that association comes up to Government with a definite concrete proposal for a concession for starting a large number of schools and the lines of work to be done are definitely laid down, we may perhaps be able to control the vaids and hakims who are lately moving about in the bazar. If that can be done then we can benefit the 90 per cent. of the population who are referred to in this debate. We have been asked how can 52 men turned out in these 20 years be supposed to treat 90 per cent. of the population. I submit they cannot do it. The present ayurvedic school can only have done some good work, but if we are going to approach the public, for whose welfare we hold ourselves responsible, the best way of doing that is to go to Government with a definite constructive proposal to allow them to start an association on the lines suggested and to give that association practically the same concession that has been given to the Medical Council and to give them grants to support schools where the entrance examination would not be very high and instruction should be given in vernacular, This would give the country a much better class of vaids and hakims than are now found in almost all the large cities of India.

Then my honourable friend Mr. KAMAT said that the Medical Council put a stigma on the registered medical practitioners who associated themselves with men practising ayurvedic medicine. I do not think that is what is meant. The Bombay Government is in no way opposed to the system of ayurvedic medicine. The only thing is, if I understand the Honourable Sir TEMULJI NARIMAN right, that the two systems are so opposed to each other, practically so contradictory that they cannot work together. And if that is his opinion and if that is also confirmed by the other medical gentlemen here, what I would suggest to my honourable friend Mr. PATEL is to drop the bill and to work up for a new association which would be a real constructive proposal for the good of the country.

The Honourable Mr. RAGHUNATH PURSHOTTAM PARANJPYE.—Your Excellency,—I wish to accord my hearty support to this bill the first reading of which is moved by my honourable friend Mr. PATEL. As regards the first two parts of this bill there has not been very much heated controversy. I would only say, however, that the status of sub-assistant surgeons as regards the Medical Act requires to be reviewed. At present, as we have been told, more than half the number on the medical register are sub-assistant surgeons. These together with graduates of foreign Universities are allowed to elect two members on the Council and another section of the same act says that these two members must be only of the graduate class and not belong to the sub-assistant surgeon class.

Now the Honourable Mr. PATEL in one of the sections proposes that sub-assistant surgeons also should be capable of standing and competing for these two places. Now while that would be a certain sort of encouragement to the sub-assistant surgeons, I do not think that it would quite meet the legitimate grievences of sub-assistant surgeons. Well, what the sub-assistant surgeons want is a real and live representation upon the Medical Council. Now when graduates of foreign Universities also are allowed to stand as candidates for the same seats, who I say are mostly I. M. S. people, I am afraid sub-assistant surgeons would not stand the chance of getting elected because the officers of the I.M.S., are the official superiors of the sub-assistant surgeons. What I, therefore, propose is that in this elective element I would reserve one or two seats entirely for the representation of sub-assistant surgeons. Of the two seats which the Honourable Mr. PATEL proposes to take away from the nominated portion to be given to the elected portion, I would suggest one seat at least should be given to the sub-assistant surgeon. That would give them a real and live and not too much representation considering their educational status, but it would allow them to have their voices represented on this governing body of the medical profession in this Presidency. That will remove the very reasonable grievance that these sub-assistant surgeons have. There is only one point as regards this which has been brought out by some honourable members and which requires to be answered, and that is this. They say that these sub-assistant surgeons are of comparatively low qualifications and so they are not qualified to stand as candidates for the Medical Council. I can understand the objection if the Medical Council is to be called in consultation at the bedside of a patient when it would be a question of purely professional medical skill only. But this purely professional skill is not a matter of great importance on the Council; here their interests as members of the profession really are involved. It is not technical knowledge that is wanted in any medical council, but a general knowledge of medicine together with a knowledge of all the professional interests to be represented and regulated. That is the kind of representation that we want in a medical council, and I think that at least some representation, separately and independently of being grouped together in a class with foreign university men, should be given. They are a majority on the register and we are getting accustomed to the cry of no taxation without representation, and when these people are required to pay fees and submit to the rules made by the Council, I submit that there should be some representation for them.

Now coming to the other and more important part of the Honourable Mr. PATEL'S bill, I think a great deal of heat has been introduced which is of the nature of a trade union spirit. The Honourable Dr. Sir TEMULJI NARIMAN and other professors of western medicine have been attacking us for introducing sentiment into this question. Now, I appeal to this Council and ask on what side this sentiment is being introduced. It is certainly on the side of the professors of western medicine that sentiment has been mostly used. They say we do not want to have anything to do with the people who practice Ayurvedic system. Anybody who touches them is polluted. So sentiment, or rather prejudice, is on their side. Their spirit is a spirit of trade unionism. We want to resist the spirit of trade unionism at least in this Council to a certain extent. The Honourable Sir TEMULJI NARIMAN and his friends have put a pointed question: If Dr. Popat Prabhuram does not want to be bound by the decisions of the Medical Council why should he get himself registered and be on the medical register? The plain answer to that is that the legislature has passed an act which has given special privileges to this class of registered graduates. If, for instance, the Medical Council was a private body of medical men, they might make any laws and regulations, and this Council would have nothing to say to them.

We by our act have given these registered practitioners special privileges and I think the Council is bound in duty to see that these special privileges are not abused. According to section 19 of the Bombay Medical Act you will find that "Subject to the provisions of this act, the Medical Council may from time to time make rules and regulations generally to carry out the provisions of this act: provided that no rules or regulations made by the Medical Council, whether under this or under any of the foregoing sections of this Act, shall have any force or effect unless the same shall have received the previous approval of the Governor in Council". So that any action taken by the Medical Council is to a certain extent the indirect action of the Government and therefore the Legislative Council have certainly every right to look into the way in which they exercise the powers that have been given to them by the legislature. If, as I said, the Bombay Medical Council were a private body, we should not have discussed this matter in this Legislative Council and there would have been no need of introducing this bill.

The Honourable Mr. PHIROZE SETHNA took the example of the legal profession and asked us if this Council would be justified in interfering with the lawyers' association. But let me point out to him that according to the Legal Practitioners' Act it is the High Court that has got to consider the unprofessional conduct of any member of the legal profession. The Bombay Medical Council is not a High Court. Even the High Court is bound by certain statutes. People have confidence in the High Court and it would not therefore be right to say that the case of the registered medical practitioners registered under the Bombay Medical Registration Act is on all fours with the case of the legal practitioners under the Legal Practitioners' Act in which the jurisdiction is vested in the hands of the High Court. There is, as I said, a certain sort of compulsion upon professors of western medicine to join this association, namely, the Bombay Medical Council, if they want to get the benefit of the act which confers exclusively upon them certain rights. The Government and this Legislative Council have conferred a monopoly on the professors of the western medical science, and therefore it is the bounden duty of this Council to see that that monopoly is not abused.

The Honourable Sir Temulji Nariman has also said a good deal to a certain extent in a ridiculing vein about the size and management of the Prabhuram Ayurvedic College. Now, I think the honourable member ought to have looked at this in a more sympathetic spirit. He ought to have seen first of all that this is a private institution, not at all supported by Government or getting any help from Government. Anybody who knows how difficult it is to manage an institution on a private basis will find the efforts of this Prabhuram Ayurvedic College a matter for congratulation rather than a matter for ridicule. I know it is a comparatively small institution. But as regards one point about its location, I may mention that several years ago it was housed in an independent and a comparatively big building.

The Honourable Sir TEMULJI B. NARIMAN :—I never said a word about its location.

The Honourable Mr. PARANJPYE :—I beg my honourable friend's pardon. I think it was the Honourable Mr. PHIROZE SETHNA who said that.

As I said before, the Prabhuram Ayurvedic College was housed a few years ago in a comparatively big building. However, we have to make allowance for the fact that it is a private institution and nothing like the Grant Medical College or anything like it. The college was housed, as I said, in a private house, but there was some legal difficulty about that house and the question of the proprietorship of that house had to go before the High Court and the suit has only very recently been decided in favour of that college and I hope soon the college will be properly housed in that building. It was taken out of this private house and located on the third floor of the present building as a case of necessity, because it was not possible to do anything else. However, it is not a matter for ridicule. I quite appreciate the idea of the Honourable Sir TEMULJI NARIMAN'S coming forward with an offer of a donation of Rs. 25,000. That at any rate is an honest effort to show that he is willing to put his hands in his pocket. But it was not right on the part of my honourable friend Mr. PHIROZE SETHNA to ridicule the location of the school unless he is prepared to do something in the same manner as the Honourable Sir TEMULJI NARIMAN. After all these matters are to be taken up in a practical spirit.

We know how conservative this country is. To get the influence of western science to act upon Indian medicine is after all a very difficult task. The Prabhuram Ayurvedic College is trying its best to do something in this direction.

It may have done very little, but we ought to help it and we ought to encourage it We would like the professors of western science to take some interest in the systems of medicine, which, whether we like them or not, are the only systems to which the majority of the people of this country will resort. And therefore we have got to see whether we can find means of doing this. The way to do it is by research. But what kind of research? The Honourable Sir TEMULJI NARIMAN tells us that the best way to make research in this direction will be to endow a chair for this purpose in the Grant Medical College. Now, I submit in these days a college like the Prabhuram Ayurvedic College would be a far better method of conducting research. It has got an almost infinite hospital in the form of the whole of Bombay in which one can try eastern science. There if for instance an Ayurvedic physician were associated with a western physician in the treatment of a case, the western physician may simply watch even if he is not allowed to treat it. He may simply watch it and find out the effects of the remedies and treatment prescribed by the ayurvedic physician and in this manner he can best find out the effects of eastern drugs upon the patient and his knowledge will be an experimental knowledge conducted under reasonable and ordinary conditions, not in the conditions of a pathological dispensary or on a small experimental scale. Here then we have got a vast field for research. If western practitioners are allowed to associate themselves with eastern practitioners in this manner, we shall probably find a great deal of light and truth, perhaps even all falsehood if you like, but practically demonstrated as such. I therefore think that we ought not, by any direct or indirect action of ours, to prevent our registered practitioners from associating with eastern practitioners and conducting research under the most natural conditions.

I am not going to deal with the historical disquisition of my honourable friend Mr. SEDDON as to whether unani and ayurvedic systems were really Indian systems or were borrowed from the Greeks. But after all if they had been borrowed from the Greeks they have been in this country for a very very long time. Well, after all in the same manner you might say that the Parsis are foreigners in this country or you might even say that Englishmen are foreigners in England. These systems have been in this country for over 1,000 years, and as it is said, possession is nine points of law. The foundations of the Ayurvedic and Unani systems may be wrong. We have often found in other sciences also that the theories may be wrong but the results may be right. The Ptolemaic system of astronomy for instance was wrong, but the predictions of eclipses, etc., according to it were always found to be right. The same has perhaps happened in the science of medicine. So we cannot look at these matters from entirely a theoretical standpoint, and as I said, astronomers have found that although the foundation of the Ptolemaic system might be wrong, there was a great deal of truth underlying that system, and therefore it would not be right simply to look down on that system and say that there is nothing in it. After all the principles of science, of chemistry, or of medical science even, have begun on wrong theories, but all the results that were obtained by these theories have not been found to be wrong. If you only take the most up-to-date theories and take the results which have been deduced only from these theories and not from wrong old theories, your medical science itself will be found to be only of limited extent. Therefore I say that it is not right to say that simply because the fundamental theories of the science underlying these ancient systems were wrong, therefore the practical operations of it should also be wrong. Therefore, considering all the circumstances of this country, the fact that a large number of people will not have anything to do with the western systems and the fact that we have somehow to approach them, we must do something for them by our legislative acts to help them. It is only by associating physicians of western medicine with these eastern vaids and hakims that we can effect any improvement in the eastern systems, and it is therefore necessary that the autocratic methods of the Bombay Medical Council should be checked. If they had taken a commonsense view of the matter, if they had seen the circumstances of the case and not gone merely by the letter of their law and not simply followed precedents which might be all right in the case of the United Kingdom but which are not all right in the case of this country, then there would not have been any necessity for a bill of this character. It is because the Medical Council have not acted in a commonsense manner that my friend the Honourable Mr. PATEL has had to bring this bill forward, and I hope the bill will pass the first reading.

The Honourable RAO BAHADUR GANESH KRISHNA SATHE:—May it please your Excellency,—The first part of the bill seems to me not to be contentious, because various speakers who have made speeches on this bill do not find fault with the principle underlying that part of the bill. The principle underlying that part of the bill is that there ought to be a majority of elected members over nominated members. How that majority is to be secured is a matter of detail, and as it has been rightly observed by several speakers, it had better be done in the select committee. However, before proceeding to the third point, that is, the third clause of the bill, I wish to make one observation, viz., that the sub-assistant surgeons who get themselves registered under this act should have an independent electorate. It was observed by one of the speakers that it was not right that men of inferior qualifications should be allowed to take part in the discussion of subjects likely to come before the Medical Council where more competent and better equipped gentlemen of the profession take their seats. But if we look to the total number that is to be on the Council and if we give one or two seats to these sub-assistant surgeons, I think the effect will be rather to give a stimulus to the sub-assistant surgeons to improve their status and to enable them to take a broader view of things, and it will in no way affect the dignity and prestige of the Medical Council which consists of 11 or 12 other members elected from out of the graduates who have got themselves registered.

Now, sir, going to the third part, namely, whether it is really desirable to have a definition of the words "infamous conduct" in the act or not, I would tell this Council that I went through the proceedings of 1912 when this bill was passed, and I find that the apprehensions which were then entertained by the Honourable Mr. SETALVAD and the Honourable Sir Pherozeshah Mehta seem to have been realised to-day, and there was an amendment in the name of the Honourable Mr. SETALVAD to the effect that the clause about infamous conduct should be omitted. I will not weary this Council by reading extracts, but I think it is necessary to read one or two extracts from the speech of the Honourable Sir Pherozeshah Mehta. It is on page 77 of the Council proceedings of 1912. He said:—

"Prima facie it seems to me that there are likely to be a great many more cases in India than in England, because opinion is very much divided in this country as to whether qualified medical men can deal with the Indian systems of medicine. In England qualified medical men have nothing to do with the unqualified men. In this country the case is different. Will it be considered infamous conduct on the part of a qualified medical practitioner to have anything to do with the unani and Aryan systems of medicine?"

That was the question or query put by the Honourable Sir Pherozeshah Mehta and we find to-day that objection on the very same ground has been taken by the Medical Council to the association of Dr. Popat with an ayurvedic school. As to the utility of that school and the standard in which it is maintained, I am not in a position to speak. Even assuming that Dr. Popat's case gave occasion to the introduction of this bill, still we should not brush aside the question on that account. There are other aspects of the case which have to be looked at when we are considering the question as to the necessity of having a definition of the words "infamous conduct" in the act itself. There is, as has been stated by several speakers, a large percentage of the population of this country which is beyond the reach of medical practitioners who are trained in the western methods. Now, those have got themselves to be treated by ayurvedic doctors and unani doctors or vaids and hakims. Now, if in such cases the patient thinks of discontinuing the treatment of the ayurvedic vaid and calls in the aid of a registered medical practitioner, will it be open to him to go and see that patient and just have a consultation with the previous ayurvedic vaid, not because that consultation will necessarily help him in his diagnosis, but because it will help him to know from him what medicines were given and whether the treatment which was followed was beneficial or otherwise. If we take account of the present attitude of the Medical Council, it appears to me that even such a connection of the registered medical practitioner with the vaids may be considered by it as amounting to infamous conduct, and if that is going to be the result, I think a large percentage of the people living in this country and in cities other than Bombay will be put to a very great difficulty. In fact, there will be two alternatives before them. Either they have to bring in the services of a registered medical practitioner or they have to prefer to die at the hands of the ayurvedic vaid even if his treatment becomes unsuccessful. To me it appears, sir, that if this question is looked at from this point of view, then there really appears to be a necessity of defining the words "infamous conduct" in the act itself. Now, are we not going to leave the question of association on the part of a registered medical practitioner with an ayurvedic vaid or unani hakim to the good sense of those who get themselves registered and to whom the interest and prestige of their own profession must be very dear? It is really paying a very poor compliment to those who have passed under western methods, who have graduated themselves by taking instruction in the Grant Medical College and other colleges, to apprehend that they would stoop so low as to associate themselves with those whom we call quacks and nothing better than quacks. I think such a position of distrust does not reflect credit on those who have been already practising under the western method and are registered practitioners.

If you look at the English Act, section 28, you will find that the name of a practitioner cannot be struck off merely because he adopted any theory of medicine or surgery. I do admit that conditions in England are materially different from conditions in India; however, one thing appears to me to be certain from this section, and from the quotation from a decision that has been read out to us, that there is nothing infamous on the part of a registered medical practitioner if he wishes to practise or learn any other theory of medicine or surgery. If that is so, are we going to say that any association with—or any such study of—the ayurvedic system ought not to be allowed, and that if any one prosecutes that study, his conduct should be considered as infamous? It is practically putting a bar on one's desire to learn the ayurvedic system. Suppose, for instance,—I am only giving a hypothetical case—if a registered medical practitioner studies at home the ayurvedic system and begins to give such medicines of the efficacy of which he has assured himself, then is the Medical Council going to say "Because you have studied the ayurvedic system and because you are using certain medicines from the ayurvedic system, we will hold your conduct as infamous conduct"? I think that such a result ought not to follow. Now, if we look at the explanation proposed by the Honourable Mr. PATEL, I do think that some changes would be required, but at any rate I think your Excellency's Government will appreciate the hardship that will accrue to the registered medical practitioners by their association in the way I have just described. If this bill therefore goes to the select committee, there the question will be thoroughly threshed out, and that will be a proper place to consider whether the whole of the explanation is necessary or such of the explanation is necessary as would safeguard the interests of the general public without undermining the prestige of the medical profession trained under western methods.

MEDICAL BILL.

[10TH OCTOBER 1917.] [Rao Bahadur Ganesh Krishna Sathe; Surgeon-General R. W. S. Lyons.]

There was one small point made by some honourable members, namely, whether this Council should draw up a definition or whether it should better be left to the Medical Council itself to determine what is infamous conduct. Personally I do not see any objection to have such a definition drafted in the act itself. It will only serve as a principle which will guide the Medical Council in deciding such cases.

Your Excellency, my point is that certain latitude should be allowed to these practitioners to develop the ayurvedic system. And how are you going to facilitate its development if a prohibition is placed in their way, inasmuch as any the least association with the ayurvedic practitioners is likely to be styled as infamous conduct by the Medical Council?

With these words, sir, I think the bill ought to go to the select committee where the explanation will be thoroughly threshed out.

The Honourable Surgeon-General R. W. S. LYONS:—Your Excellency,—This bill which is before the Council is the outcome of the resolution passed by this Council which the Honourable Mr. PAREKH had moved and in which a proposal was made that sub-assistant surgeons should have the privilege of representation in the Medical Council. With that proposal I may say I am quite in agreement. This bill, however, is much more than that proposal.

With regard to the second clause of the bill, I may say that I am in agreement with the principle involved in that clause, because that clause has the support of the majority of medical men and it has been specially asked for by sub-assistant surgeons in their petition to Government. There are two strong reasons for supporting that clause. Sub-assistant surgeons and military assistant surgeons form more than half of the total number of registered medical men and it is only right and fair to my mind that they should be capable of having representatives on the Medical Council elected from among their number. It is illiberal to deny them this right and to continue to do so would be unworthy of the profession of medicine. Although I am in agreement with this principle, I entirely disagree with the way in which it is proposed to be carried out. My reason for this is that in the clause of the act which it is proposed to amend only such persons as are practising in the Bombay Presidency are allowed seats in the Council, whereas by the new clause any registered man, whether he practises in the Presidency or not, is eligible for a seat on the Medical Council.

With regard to clause 1, I cannot support it because I consider it unnecessary and in no way an improvement on the present arrangement. The constitution of the Bombay Medical Council is based as closely as possible on that of the General Medical Council in England.

Now, the Honourable Mr. KAMAT gave a composition of the General Medical Council which, I am afraid, was taken from some old register. At any rate that is not the present composition. The General Medical Council consists of five members nominated by His Majesty, five direct representatives, of whom three are elected by the registered practitioners in England, one by the registered practitioners in Ireland, and one by the registered practitioners in Scotland. In addition to these each of the 23 examining bodies is allowed to send a representative to the Medical Council. Honourable members will see from this composition that there are five nominated members, five elected members, and one member from each of the examining bodies in the United Kingdom.

The Honourable Mr. PATEL:—Are they elected or nominated?

The Honourable Surgeon-General LYONS:—I will come to the question presently. The nominated members are chosen from medical men at the top of the profession with high scientific attainments; the direct representatives are chosen by agreement from amongst the most prominent members of the medical societies in England, Ireland and Scotland. The representatives of the examining bodies are chosen from the medical faculties of the colleges and the universities without any ballot such as we had in India a few days ago in connection with our Medical Council; that is to say, there is no ballot such as the Honourable Mr. PATEL would want. In the case of the General Medical Council all the members were chosen, there is no ballot from the beginning to the end. Although I am registered in England I have not given a single vote in the whole of my life as I have not attended any meeting of these societies. But if I attended I would agree with the majority in saying that so and so is our most distinguished medical man and he should be our representative. Your Excellency will see that the men are chosen. There is no such thing as election, there is no such thing as canvassing, and there is no such thing as ill-feeling in the case of the Medical Council in the United Kingdom.

In Bombay when the Medical Act was passed there was only one examining body, namely, the University of Bombay, and it was given four representatives on the Medical Council, that is to say, four times the number allotted to any examining body in the United Kingdom. It is now proposed that we should give to the Bombay University two more representatives, that is, the number will be increased to six—practically half of the Medical Council—while the number who represent all the other registered practitioners is only two, although they are 50 per cent. more than the Bombay University graduates, and the number nominated by Government from among the medical profession will be reduced to four. In England, it should be remembered, the number of nominated members is equal to that of the elected members. In the Medical Councils of Bengal and Madras also the number of nominated members is equal to that of the elected. Instances have been given of the Medical Council of the United Provinces and the Punjab in which Medical Acts have been passed. But the Medical Councils there have done no work yet. Ours is the first Medical Council which has been established in India and has worked well for five years.

At present the Bombay Medical Council consists of four members elected by graduates of the Bombay University, two elected by medical practitioners who are not graduates of the Bombay University, and six members nominated by Government. But when the actual composition is examined it will be seen that it consists of four graduates of the Bombay University elected by the university graduates, four graduates of the Bombay University nominated by Government, two non-graduates of Bombay elected by the medical practitioners other than the Bombay University medical graduates, and two nominated members of British Universities. It will thus be seen that the Bombay University is represented on the Council by eight of its graduates. To add to this number is to transform the Council into a department of the university. But it might be said "Why should not two or all of the Bombay University graduates nominated by Government be elected?" The Hon'ble Mr. Patel dwells very much on the elective principle and he thinks that it is the remedy for many evils in the future in India. Well, in a political matter it may be so. But when we come to the Medical Council the first thing that comes to my mind is that it is a judicial body of experts to try cases of infamous conduct and many other things. It is a body of experts appointed especially to judge and see that examinations are kept up to the proper standard and that the graduates in medicine shall be duly qualified to undertake their duties. It is absolutely different from a political assembly in that it cannot go one hair's breadth outside the lines of the Medical Act. No man, whether radical or conservative, can be one thing or the other in the Medical Council. He will have to go exactly as the act prescribes. So the elective principle to my mind is of very little value.

Now, as I have stated, it may be said, why should not two or all of the Bombay University graduates nominated by Government be elected. A reference to the names of those nominated will show excellent reasons for not resorting to election. Dr. Rajaballi Patel, a distinguished university graduate, would have small chance in an election owing to the small number of Mahomedan graduates in the university. Dr. Viegas is also a distinguished university graduate who has been on the senate of the University for years and is also an examiner in the University, but although he would be most suitable to sit on the Medical Council, he would stand no chance of election at all as the Goan community cannot claim a large number of graduates. Dr. Row, another distinguished graduate, although from his scientific attainments a most suitable candidate, would be the last person to push his canvassing to the extent required to secure election. Sir Temulji Nariman, also a most distinguished graduate, would not care to stand for election. All these desirable persons, if a canvass is carried out, would not be available. It will be seen, therefore, that nomination is the best and indeed the only means of securing the services of these distinguished medical gentlemen. For these reasons I consider the existing arrangements better than those proposed in the bill, and because also there is no strong support of the change from registered medical men. We have had representations from only two bodies, namely, the Sind Medical Association and the Gujarat Medical Association. I oppose clause 1. I think we should have strong support before we make any change in an act of this nature.

Then I come to clause 3. I consider that it is most undesirable that this should be considered at the present time. With regard to what it proposes to do I would draw attention to certain facts which do not appear to be widely known in the country and certainly not known by those who have spoken before me. The Medical Act of 1912 is an act for the registration of medical practitioners. It is not compulsory. No one is compelled to register or is in any way prevented from practising medicine because he is not registered. In this Presidency out of over 5,000 medical graduates of universities and medical schools only about 2,000 have registered themselves. These 2,000 who have registered have voluntarily submitted themselves to the conditions imposed by the act, and the conditions imposed by the act are enforced by the Medical Council which is established by the act. These conditions are that any person seeking registration must (1) hold the qualification of one of the bodies mentioned in the schedule of the act, and (2) that he is not disqualified by having been convicted of a cognizable offence or been guilty of infamous conduct in a professional respect.

Before going further I would like to deal with the expression infamous conduct. It was introduced in the English Act of 1858. That act has been amended at least three times and during the years that have elapsed there has been ample opportunity offered to alter the expression if it was considered necessary to do so. But it has never been done. The assumption is, I think, that the General Medical Council have found it a useful expression and a proper one.

Now as regards the removal of a name from the register for infamous conduct in a professional respect certain principles are involved with which the public generally are not well acquainted. For example it is not generally known that both the General Medical Council and the Bombay Medical Council accepted the principle involved in section 28 of the Medical Act of 1858 that no one should be in any way penalized because he has adopted or refrained from adopting any particular theory of medicine or surgery. Now the result of that is that any medical man whatsoever can adopt the ayurvedic or unani system or any other system and no one will interfere with him. It will be seen from the Medical Act of 1858 and the Bombay Medical Act of 1912 that it is left to the respective medical councils to decide what constitutes infamous conduct in a professional respect. This has to some extent been settled by the decisions of the Medical Council which are summarized on certain forms of professional misconduct which have come before it and which are given in a warning notice which appears in the medical Register. The instances given of professional misconduct rendering a medical man liable to have his name erased from the register are as follows :—

Firstly, "any registered practitioner who shall be shown to have signed or given under his name or authority any certificate, notification, report or document of a kindred character which is untrue, misleading or improper." I think every one will agree with this.

Secondly, " the employment by any registered practitioner in connection with his professional practice of an assistant who is not duly qualified or registered and the permitting of such unqualified person to attend, treat or perform operations upon patients in respect of matters requiring professional discretion or skill, is in the opinion of the Council in its nature fraudulent and dangerous to the public health." I think the majority will agree with this also.

"Any registered practitioner who by his presence, countenance, advice, assistance or co-operation knowingly enables an unqualified or unregistered person, whether described as an assistant or otherwise, to attend or perform any operation upon a patient in respect of any matter requiring professional discretion or skill, to use or procure the use of any certificate, notification, report or other document of a kindred character or otherwise to encourage any professional practice as if the said person were duly qualified and registered, is liable on proof of the facts to have his name erased from the register." This is the particular clause to which the Honourable Mr. PATEL takes exception. But I think the majority of honourable members will see that it is a clause provided in the interests of the public who know no better and who may go to any one registered or unregistered. It has also an effect which may not be generally recognized but which all medical men know, namely, that if a man were exempted from the influence of this particular clause, he might employ as an assistant an unqualified man to boom his name, as a consultant, in order to bring him practice, to the detriment of the public and of other medical men who are working straightforwardly and honestly. This clause protects the public and also the medical practitioners amongst themselves.

The third of the rules is: " The employment, for his own profit and under cover of his own qualifications, by any registered practitioner who keeps a medical hall, open shop or other place in which scheduled poisons or preparations containing scheduled poisons are sold to the public, of assistants who are left in charge but are not legally qualified to sell scheduled poisons to the public, is in the opinion of the Council a practice professionally discreditable and fraught with danger to the public, and any registered practitioner who is proved to have so offended will be liable to have his name erased from the register." I think every one will agree with this clause.

The fourth rule is: " Any registered practitioner, who either by administering anæsthetics or otherwise assists an unqualified person to attend, treat or perform an operation upon any other person in respect of matters requiring professional discretion or skill, will be liable on proof of the facts to have his name erased from the register." I think honourable members will agree that this is a very judicious clause indeed.

Fifthly, " the practice of advertising by a registered medical practitioner with a view to his own gain, particularly if depreciatory of other practitioners, or of sanctioning such advertising, of employing or sanctioning the employment of agents or canvassers for the purpose of procuring patients and of associating with or accepting employment under any association which practises canvassing or advertising for the purpose of procuring patients are in the opinion of the Council contrary to the public interests and discreditable to the profession of medicine and any registered medical practitioner resorting to any such practices renders himself liable on proof of the facts to have his name erased from the medical register."

These rules are based on decisions in cases which came before the Medical Council in England. They are not impracticable rules at all and the list is not intended to be a complete list. The warning notice says that the Council are in no way precluded from considering and dealing with any other forms of professional misconduct, as for example immorality involving the abuse of professional relationship, which may be brought before them.

MEDICAL BILL.

[10TH OCTOBER 1917.] [Surgeon-General R. W. S. Lyons.]

The general guiding principle in dealing with the different forms of misconduct is that a medical practitioner is considered to be guilty of infamous conduct in a professional respect if it is shown that in the pursuit of his profession he has done something in regard to it which will be reasonably regarded as disgraceful or dishonourable by his professional brothers of good repute and competency. They are sound rules passed in the interests of the public as much in those of the medical profession and binding only on those who have themselves registered. An unregistered medical practitioner can practice his profession without let or hinderance and break any or all these rules every day of his life with impunity. But a registered medical practitioner who wishes to break them must either remove his name from the register or expect to have it removed by the Medical Council.

This is the position in which matters stand at present. I would point out, before going further, that when the Bombay Medical Act was passed in 1912 Government promised that it would in no way affect the ayurvedic or unani vaids or hakims. The present bill, if passed, would cause the act to gravely affect these practitioners. In the first place it would be necessary to define exactly who are to be considered as vaids and hakims. That alone will immediately affect the ayurvedic and unani practitioners. It must be decided also what qualifications are necessary before a man calls himself a vaid or a hakim. Then these men must be brought under some sort of control, as it could not be permitted that a convicted person, for example, or one given to immorality, should be allowed to practice and call in the assistance of a registered man, who is penalized by such practices. Indeed a medical man whose name has been removed from the register for one or other of the reasons that I have mentioned might call himself a vaid or hakim and go in to the bazar and practice with immunity or try even to compel, under the proposed amendment of the Honourable Mr. PATEL, a registered man to consult with him. To allow registered medical men to associate with them in practice unless they are bound by suitable rules and under control will certainly lead to such offences as advertising and canvassing for practice, covering the practice of unqualified men and to other dishonourable procedures which in their nature are fraudulent and dangerous to the public health and are demoralizing to the medical profession.

Has it been considered also whether the vaids and hakims generally will look upon it as fair that some of their number should gain the advertisement of working in partnership with registered medical men? I should think not. And up to the present the general body of these practitioners have not expressed any wish to be so associated. The whole clause represents the wishes of one small ayurvedic school in Bombay, so small that it may be considered negligible.

On the other hand I think this Council should consider the probable effect on registration. Will medical men who hold European qualifications and are registered in England remain on the Bombay Register and will the best sort of medical men continue to register in Bombay? I am sure not. In deciding to pass the first reading of this bill these considerations should be weighed.

There are further considerations which are against this clause being passed at the present time. A large number of medical men are on war service and they have no opportunity of learning what is proposed or of expressing their views. It is unfair to pass a bill, which would gravely affect their position, without their knowledge. In the next place there is no considerable number of registered medical men who desire to have the privilege offered. I doubt if there are 20 out of 2,000 who have registered. Lastly, there is a very strong feeling among registered practitioners against any interference with the act as it stands, and this will be apparent to this Council from the representations submitted by the members of the Bombay Branch of the British Medical Association, the Bombay Medical Union, and also I think by the Surat Medical Union which has sent me a copy of its resolutions which it has forwarded to His Excellency the Governor against this proposal. Every medical body that has had an opportunity of expressing its views of this clause is against it.

For these reasons, and also because 300 or 400 registered medical men are on war service, because it is not desired by any large number of registered medical men or ayurvedic or unani practitioners, and because of the fact that there is very violent opposition on the part of registered medical men to the proposed amendment of the act, I oppose this clause and suggest that it should be dropped. Indeed I would suggest that the whole bill should be dropped and that Government should bring in a bill which would properly provide for the case of sub-assistant surgeons.

The Honourable Col. W. E. JENNINGS:—Your Excellency,—I should like to preface my remarks by stating that my appeal to honourable members to oppose this bill is not the outcome of any fear on my part that any honourable member who has had proper opportunities of studying it in its right perspective would for one moment vote for it, but because it seems to me easily conceivable that, the bill being a purely technical one, there are many members who from the lack of proper professional guidance and advice have not had the opportunities to enable them to give it the consideration which it deserves and who might therefore, from sentimental or other reasons, be led to vote for it without appreciating that the bill is unnecessary, logically imperfect and premature, and without foreseeing that its safe passage into law might endanger the very existence of an act of their own creation.

I may also say that my opposition is not based upon any prejudice against indigenous systems or methods, but upon a pure conviction on my part that the passage of this bill would be retrograde and unworthy of this Council.

The honourable mover of this bill has referred to the last clause as the most important and I therefore propose to confine my remarks to that clause first. I am of opinion that the amendment proposed is unnecessary. When this honourable Council passed the Medical Act they gave an assurance that no interference was intended with indigenous systems. Well, no act of the Medical Council properly construed has given any one any justification to consider that that attitude has in any way been altered. There is no member of the Medical Council, I am certain, who would object to any registered practitioner practising any theory or any system of medicine that he conscientiously believed in, provided that he did not resort to practices which would render any registered practitioner amenable to the discipline of the Medical Council. There is no member of the Medical Council who would not welcome any conscientious or sustained effort to bring out what is good in foreign systems on the lines suggested by the Honourable Surgeon-General Sir Pardey Lukis, with whom we all agree though much has been hinted to the contrary. I therefore consider that legislation is unnecessary to compel acquiescence to this extent. The only result of the amendment would be to authorize unscrupulous persons under the guise of registration to have recourse to methods such as advertising, canvassing, covering unqualified practitioners and other irregularities which have been mentioned this afternoon, and thus to gain pecuniary advantages over other more scrupulous brethren of the profession. The amendment seems to me, therefore, unnecessary on these grounds.

I also consider it to be logically imperfect and by that I mean that it would not attain the object which it professes to seek. The honourable mover of the amendment has said that he wishes to make it clear what "infamous conduct in a professional respect" means. Well, his amendment does not in any way make it clear. It neither defines nor describes the expression nor does it in any way make it clear to any one. All that it does is to eliminate from inclusion in the expression three or four specific acts among many hundreds which might be included. There is nothing that could be said to define what infamous conduct in this sense means. Decisions in particular cases must be left to the discretion of a body of men elected by the profession concerned and they can only be guided in their conclusions by the principles laid down by the Master of the Rolls, which I will now quote: "If it is shown that a medical man, in the pursuit of his profession, has done something with regard to it which would be reasonably regarded as disgraceful and dishonourable by his professional brethren of good repute and competency, then it is open to the Council to say that he has been guilty of infamous conduct in a professional respect." I consider, therefore, that the amendment should not pass on this ground, because it would not attain the object which it is intended to attain.

Now, as to the consequences, I have said that the passage of this amendment into law might endanger the very existence of the Medical Act and I think that I cannot do better to illustrate this than quote a few lines from an article which appears in this month's issue of the leading medical journal of India, the Indian Medical Gazette:—

"A bill further to amend the above act, introduced by a lay member of the Bombay Legislative Council, bids fair, so far as one of its provisions is concerned, to prove the undoing of the Council in that it seeks to largely deprive its members of discretionary power in dealing with offences by enumerating a list of such which should not, in the opinion of the author, be considered as meriting their censure.

"No self-respecting medical practitioner could, in our opinion, seek election upon a body so constituted or accept office if nominated thereto without contravening the ethical considerations by which he is bound as the holder of a diploma or degree. It therefore behoves those responsible for passing or rejecting the amendment to weigh very carefully all the considerations involved lest by hasty legislation the very existence of the Medical Act be jeopardized; a highly regrettable sequence, seeing that it is the first of its kind in India and has, more or less, served as a model in establishing similar institutions in other provinces.

"The hampering of any judicial body with limitations of such discretionary power is obviously to render such body powerless and we would strongly urge upon medical men registered under the Bombay Medical Act and medical societies to lose no time in expressing their views to the Bombay Government on the certain results of the amendment should it become law."

What has been written by the Indian Medical Gazette is not the whole of what might happen. As had been pointed out by the Honourable Surgeon-General Lyons, a Medical Act so constituted would offer very little attraction to graduates to become registered and those who are at present registered would remove themselves from the register, and the result would be that we would have a Medical Act without a Council and with a blank register. It would thus become a dead letter. Similar legislation would follow in other provinces and with the same results. The hands of the clock would thus be put back indefinitely, for generations perhaps, or, as the Honourable Sir TEMULJI NARIMAN said, for centuries. I consider the amendment to be premature because it would be impossible at present to work the act as amended on account of the difficulties pointed out by my honourable friend Surgeon-General Lyons of classifying or limiting the class of people with whom association would be permitted.

I have always had reason to believe, your Excellency, that the honourable mover of the amendment is a patron of reform and progress and I cannot help thinking that he has brought forward these proposals without giving due consideration to their possible results. It was not many years ago that determined efforts were made to start and establish an independent medical profession in India. The establishment of Medical Councils has gone fully half way towards attaining that goal, and we are now face to face with the undoing of all that has been done by hasty and ill-considered legislation. It therefore behoves the honourable mover of this bill to consider very carefully the possible consequences before allowing it to be pressed to what might prove a disastrous issue, and it also behoves the honourable members to pause before they consent to any act or action which might result in the destruction of laws which they have created themselves.

The other clauses of the bill refer to the inclusion in the Council of sub-assistant surgeons and military assistant surgeons and also to an alteration of the constitution of the Council by reducing the number of nominated members and increasing that of the elected members. There is really very little to add to what has fallen from the Honourable Surgeon-General Lyons. I would only point out, in the latter connection, that it is desirable to have a continuity of personnel in any judicial body, and therefore, it is better that nominated members should predominate. There appears to be no reason at all for having any amendment and no reason has been shown by my honourable friend the mover. There is moreover, as the Honourable Surgeon-General pointed out, no scope for differences of political, racial or religious feelings as the Council is bound by the letter of the act. I would also take the opportunity of saying that those who administer common law are all appointed and not elected. I think, therefore, your Excellency, that this bill, if not withdrawn on the grounds that I have stated, should not be passed because it is unnecessary, logically imperfect and premature and because its passage would be fraught with disastrous consequences to the Medical Act.

The Honourable Dr. RAGHAVENDRA ROW.—Your Excellency,—I rise to oppose the bill moved by my friend the Honourable Mr. PATEL, as I feel convinced it is a retrograde measure.

Before proceeding further I beg to express my gratitude to your Excellency for the honour you have done me in nominating me as an additional member of this august assembly. I thank you, sir, not only for the honour but the opportunity afforded by this nomination to be present here in response to what I consider my duty, duty to the profession to which I have the honour to belong, duty to the good name of ayurvedic medicine, and duty to my country, for it is needless to say I yield to none in my enthusiasm or my earnest desire to see my countrymen taking their fair and legitimate share by sheer force of merit in all the activities of the present times, including the activities of the medical profession. Nothing will gladden my heart more than to see the ayurvedic system of medicine taking its proper place, if it deserves it, in the front rank of the medical profession or to see the ayurvedic pharmacopœia taking a similar place in the pharmacopœias of the world.

I am afraid I have to confess my ignorance of the ayurvedic or unani systems of medicine beyond what is known to any lay man. We all know we have a mass and wealth of literature referring to the old systems of medicine and they being the work of old sages and records of observations of learned men of ancient times, I bow to them for their antiquity, for their having stood the test of so many centuries. They have their own interest not only to the student of antiquity but also to the student of comparative histories of medicine.

Now to come to the bill under discussion, I propose to confine myself to only the most contentious part of it, viz., that referring to clause 3. No one disputes about any one studying any system of medicine or any branch of learning but when one comes to the question of practice, it seems to me that the whole subject revolves round the question of propriety of one set of registered medical practitioners having professional relations with another set of practitioners, and those of the ayurvedic and unani systems. This leads me to consider what is common to the practitioners and what is not and I propose to deal with them by dividing the practitioners into 3 divisions and set them before you for comparison.

First we have the registered medical practitioner of the western school. These before registering have to qualify for practice: it is nedless to remind this house of the requirements of preliminary education before one enters into a very exacting course of professional studies before qualifying to practice. In all civilized countries a qualified man gets registered before he becomes a practitioner. In England this is a sine qua non for practice and has its own advantages but here the advantages are few compared with the restrictions a practitioner imposes on himself voluntarily. Not only does he voluntarily submit himself to the code of disciplinary laws framed by a body of his seniors but he thinks it is a good thing and an honour to do so, because he knows these disciplinary laws are made with the object of preserving the interests and dignity and honour of the medical profession.

This leads me to consider the genesis of registration. A practitioner in medicine apart from his professional qualities is brought face to face with what I consider the human factor. The very conditions which bring the practitioner and his patient into close relation are those in which this human factor plays such an important role. Here a patient, in the grip of disease and amidst suffering, is in a state of despair, despondency and hope which borders on credulity, and it is remarkable that however strong may be the personality when in health, to what a pitiable and helpless state the patient is reduced when he is suffering. It is just under these circumstances that a practitioner gets unlimited scope, if he is so inclined, to practice on the weakness of his patient or take advantage of him. But he has always before him the high ideals of his profession and the lives of his great masters and as a result of his education and of his discipline he has deserved well the confidence of the public. To further safeguard the interests of the public and thus further ensure the prestige of the profession the register has come in, and it is a pride to every qualified man to enter the register not only voluntarily but with a feeling of honour in doing so.

Now I come to the consideration of the practitioner of the ayurvedic school. Such practitioners are soon dying out but here and there we still find them and the description given below is that derived from an interview I had with one yesterday, an old ayurvedic practitioner of the old school. They were turned out in the following way. The pupil had to undergo a course of preliminary education of 2 or 3 years in Sanskrit before apprenticing himself to an old vaidya; at his feet he sat for 12 long years or more, drinking a few drops of knowledge and it is only after this period of decipline and instruction that he got the command from the master to go abroad and practice. Such a practitioner would by the very nature of his discipline and contact with the master be worthy of the trust which is imposed on him by his profession.

The third class of practitioner is one who goes by the name of the modern ayurvedic practitioner or vaidya whom one sees everyday. His preliminary education may be anything. It may be 2nd or 3rd or 4th standard of an English school; perhaps a little better education in the vernacular. He goes to an institution going by the name of an ayurvedic school or college, where he goes through a professional training in the translation of some of the old books with a smattering of the scientific knowledge of the western school, imparted by a staff of teachers of questionable qualifications in ayurvedic medicine, and after a course of studies lasting, sometimes two and sometimes three years, in books of the ayurvedic system as well as those of the western school, the pupils are declared qualified to practice, and thus, we get a body of men whom we always meet with as practitioners of ayurvedic medicine. But those of us who know the real state of affairs are convinced that these practitioners set up practice in the western system under the cloak of ayurvedic vaidyas. It is needless to ask if with such a state of training the modern "ayurvedic" practitioner does not savour of fraud or imposture. It is this class of men and their masters whom the honourable mover of the bill would not think it infamous for registered practitioners (of the first category above described) to associate with professionally.

A more practical plan to promote ayurvedic system of medicine will be for the remants of the ayurvedic practitioners of the old school, described under heading 2 of the practitioners, to gather together and band themselves in the form of an academy of the ayurvedic system and draw up their own syllabus of training and studies for the benefit of the pupils. Then it will be time for considering how far the present conditions can be modified for their benefit and in the interests of ayurvedic medicine.

One word more, your Excellency, with regard to the practice of ayurvedic system of the present day. It seems there is a great deal of confusion in the lay mind as to the exact part played by ayurvedic medicine. As the modern colleges of ayurvedic medicine admittedly assume that they have to base their theories on the western lines because they impart a knowledge of modern scientific knowledge as a part of their studies—the whole ayurvedic system is reduced to a very small part of medicine, i.e., a branch dealing with a small part of the medical armamentarium, viz., a study of ayurvedic drugs. These are reputed to be of high value, it is said, but I may inform this house that I have waited in vain these 20 years for even one drug to test and study in the scientific way, in spite of all my efforts to do so from these very men who boast of their advocacy of the ayurvedic system. To me it seems a hopeless task as there seems to be a certain secrecy or mysticism observed in all preparations of the so called potent remedies.

Perhaps by the suggestion I have made above that the ayurvedic vaids should band themselves in the form of an academy we may yet hope to obtain some useful results. Therefore, I would request my honourable friend Mr. PATEL either to withdraw the bill or postpone its consideration till then and this I do in the interests of ayurvedic medicine.

The Honourable Mr. GOKULDAS KAHANDAS PAREKH:—May it please your Excellency,—I heartily support the first reading of this bill. There are three systems of medicine that prevail in this country. The first is the ayurvedic system of medicine It may or may not be in reference to the ayurvedic system that they got a portion of their knowledge through the Greeks, inasmuch as India came in contact with the Greek civilisation so early as about 2,200 years ago and thus it is not at all unlikely that the Greek system of medicine to some extent exercised its influence over the Indian system. But as a matter of fact, the system has existed for a very long time and its professors and the people who have practised under that system have reached great eminence from time to time. There have been people of great learning and ability practising and studying the system and some of them have earned not only provincial but Indian reputation. I would mention only one man, Jandhu Bhat, whose high reputation for great skill, deep learning and vast experience was not confined to this Presidency but spread throughout the whole of India. In this system there may have been faults and imperfections, but it has not remained what it was and it has received considerable development in the course of centuries, from the experience and observations of numerous practitioners. The other system namely the yunani system was introduced and became much developed under Muhammadan rule. It brought the learning and experiences of Western India and it produced great many practitioners of great learning and experience who contributed to enrich it. In reference to the western system, the British Government has been good enough to encourage the spread of the learning of the west in the east and we are really much indebted to Government for establishing the western system in our country. This, I submit, is material for the purpose of considering what action should be taken in connection with the bill under discussion.

The present bill is neither unnecessary nor premature. The necessity for its introduction has arisen in consequence of an action taken by the Medical Council which put a particular interpretation on certain words appearing in the Medical Act. The question before the Medical Council was "What was the meaning of the words 'infamous conduct' in the exercise of the medical profession." The Legislature could not have intended to use these words otherwise than in their natural and ordinary sense and the most important question was whether the Medical Council did not act ultra vires in interpreting these words in a different sense. So far as the action of Dr. Popat was concerned, there was nothing dishonest or dishonourable in it. He was sacrificing his own time and labour for the purpose of what he considered to be the good of the country and the good of the medical profession. Therefore the question arises whether under the ordinary interpretation of the word the Medical Council was justified in treating this as an act of infamy.

Then the other question is was it intended that the Medical Council should utilise this act for aggrandising the western school at the expense of its rivals. I quite admit that if it was a private association which was formed for the purpose of benefiting its members, the Medical Council would have been perfectly justified in taking the action that it did, but when it was created by law, I submit that it was not within its power to do anything for the purpose of the aggrandisement of its branch of the profession, unless the thing that was done was one that was required in the interest of the country. Therefore I consider that in both ways the action taken by the Medical Council was ultra vires and thus rather than take the course of going to law, my honourable friend Mr. PATEL was quite right in trying to obtain the sense of this Council as to the powers of the Medical Council.

Then the question arises as to whether the limitations which the Medical Council proposes or intends to apply to the registered practitioners is in the interests of the country. I say that they are not only inconsistent with public good, but they are exceedingly detrimental to it. One important thing to which I would draw the attention of this Council is that it is not only the two classes of practitioners (people who are trained in the western system and the vaids and hakims) who practise in this country. The great mischief in this country is done by a lot of people who have had not a particle of medical training, but who still pose before the public as doctors.

It is admitted that the number of practitioners who are trained in the European system is too small, too inadequate, to meet the medical needs of the country, particularly when we consider that a large portion of the population is rural population spread over villages which are distant from each other. The question of the greatest importance is that if the Medical Council makes any rules the effect of which is, either immediately or in the long run, to prevent the recruitment of people trained in oriental science of medicine, what would be the result? The result would be that these people who would take the place of the vaids would not be trained vaids, but people who merely pretend or pose as vaids or doctors and have not the slightest training. The question then is whether it is in the interest of the public that this recruitment of vaids and hakims should be stopped for the purpose of replacing them by people who have no training whatever, and I respectfully submit that whatever may be the defects of the oriental system of medicine, that a man who is trained in an ayurvedic school or under the yunani system would be a much better man than one who has not received any training at all.

Then the next question to be considered is, who can revive, if you have to revive, the ayurvedic study or bring the vaids in a proper line with the western science? The vaids themselves, either in consequence of demoralisation that has followed amongst them by the development of the western system in which they find they are recognized very little or because their patronage is considerably diminished, have become very weak and they have lost all power of organization. Therefore, if it is left to the vaids themselves, they would be altogether unable to organize or establish a school for the teaching of their science. That difficulty having arisen, the only party to whom we can look for the purpose of advancing the ayurvedic knowledge in our part of the country and furnishing people with cheap medical facilities are the persons who are trained in the western science and who have the patriotism and the self-denial to make efforts for the purpose of advancing ayurvedic learning in their country, and therefore this is the only way in which the science could be advanced.

My honourable friend Dr. Row has referred to the class of people who are now practising the ayurvedic art. It is quite true that in the olden days under the old system of learning, when there was very little of written literature, when all the literature was conveyed from one man to another by memory, considerable time was lost or required for the purpose of acquiring the necessary knowledge. But it is not at all necessary for the success of ayurvedic learning that this old system of teaching should be continued. We have more modern systems, which prevail in our schools and colleges, which will enable the recipients of instruction to acquire knowledge much earlier than under the old system.

Then it is stated that there are certainly modern theories of medicine which are not at all found in the ayurvedic system, but taught in this school. But where is the harm if we try to bring the ayurvedic learning in contact with modern learning and have medical practitioners who not only know the ayurvedic science but are also acquainted with other supplementary study of things which do not appear in the ayurvedic system? This can only be done by medical people trained in the knowledge of the western science, and if, in these circumstances, any embargo is placed on them, I think the whole efforts of improving the ayurvedic system will fall through and the learning will be practically killed, to the great detriment and to the great loss of the rich treasure of literature which now lies hidden in India. Therefore I submit that in the public interests it is most undesirable that there should be placed any obstacle to the teaching of ayurvedic learning by the practitioners of western medicine.

But, your Excellency, the embargo does not stop there. These people trained in the learning of the western medicine say that, so long as there are theories in the ayurvedic learning which do not accord with their theories, they shall not have anything to do with it. This may be right or wrong, but I submit that to consider the teaching of what is contained in their own books to be something which would bring infamous conduct, a stain of infamy, upon the registered practitioner is nothing else but a piece of trade unionism, and therefore I consider that it would be most improper for the Medical Council to frame any rules or carry out any rules the effect of which would be to stop the recruiting of medical students and the recruiting of medical men trained in oriental learning.

There is one more thing to which I wish to draw the Council's attention. One of the evils which my honourable friend Mr. PATEL wishes to guard against is that if a man is ill and he was attended by a man who has knowledge of the western system he should not be prevented from having consultation with a person who is a hakim or vaid. Now that may be a part of medical etiquette. If it is a mere matter of medical etiquette I have nothing to say. But what I have to say is that if you have not got a sufficient number of doctors who are trained in the learning of the west for the purposes of attending to cases and therefore if one be called into consultation it would very ordinarily be a local man, either a vaid or a hakim or some other unqualified man. Now I ask whether it would be right, whether it would be just, whether it would be human if a qualified doctor who has been called is prevented from 'obtaining' any information about the sickness, the history of the sickness, the treatment given and the effect of the treatment? If he is not supplied with information of that kind how can a medical man be expected to cure a man. This information is absolutely necessary and this information could not be had unless a man has consultation with the previous man whether he is a man trained in the learning of the west or in the ancient system? Whether you may consider it good etiquette or bad etiquette it is something which would interfere with the ordinary treatment of humanity and I therefore submit that the first reading of this bill should be passed.

His Excellency the PRESIDENT: Order, order. Further discussion of a bill further to amend the Bombay Medical Act, 1912 (Bill No. III of 1917)—first reading.

The Honourable Rao Bahadur TEKCHAND UDHAVDAS:—Your Excellency,—I oppose the bill and confine myself only to clause 3. In order to save time I will take my objection on a very simple ground indeed, and that is that clause 3 would needlessly fetter the discretion of the Medical Council. Clause 3 itself and the exceptions and explanations given by the honourable mover of the bill would attract many similar cases which will embarrass the discretion of the Medical Council in determining what is or is not infamous conduct. Why not therefore leave the Medical Council to exercise their discretion and leave it to their sense and judgment to decide what is or is not infamous conduct? If there is any reason to fear that the exercise of their discretion would be questionable, it is open to the Honourable Mr. PATEL to include it in his many resolutions which he often moves and the many questions which he generally asks. I think that will safeguard the interests of the registered medical practitioners instead of embarrassing the position of the Medical Council.

The Honourable Mr. DATTATRAYA VENKATESH BELVI:—Your Excellency,—The bill before the Council seems to cover three different principles in three of its clauses. It is therefore better to discuss each clause of the bill separately. This is a matter of convenience and I have thus to follow this course.

The first principle which is embodied in one of the clauses relates to the necessity of increasing the elective majority on the Medical Council. On that point it seems many of the opponents of the bill as a whole are inclined favourably. My honourable friend Dr. FERNANDEZ was the first to accor hi; support to that part of the bill He was, however, doubtful as to whether the franchise should be given to the Faculty of Medicine of the University of Bombay or to the Bombay Medical Union and the College of Physicians and Surgeons and other similar bodies. It was also the opinion of another honourable friend of mine in this Council. My friend the Honourable Mr. SETHNA pointed out to the Council yesterday that at present there are about ten gentlemen who are members of the Faculty of Medicine of the University of Bombay and who are also members of the Medical Council. He put this forward as an argument that it was not necessary to grant this extended franchise to the Faculty of Medicine but to the other two bodies, the Bombay Medical Union and the College of Physicians and Surgeons. All the same, the principle of the necessity of the expansion of this elective principle is admitted by these gentlemen. The only discordant note that was struck yesterday was the one by the Honourable Surgeon General Lyons. The trend of his argument was that it was not necessary to increase the number of elected members of the Medical Council and I take it that that is perhaps a very fair index to the view which is held by your Excellency's Government. I am not quite sure of it, but it looks to me that the Honourable the Surgeon General probably voiced the views of the official circle in this connection.

Now to come to another point in this connection, it was argued that it was not necessary to extend this franchise to the Bombay University inasmuch as there were at present according to one gentleman 10 members of the Faculty of Medicine on the Bombay Medical Council and according to another gentleman there were 8, and the contention was that when so many men are both members of the Faculty of Medicine and members of the Medical Council, it was not necessary to extend any special privilege to the Faculty of Medicine in the University of Bombay. But I submit that it may be a matter of mere coincidence that there are so many gentlemen who are members of the Faculty of Medicine and who are also members of the Medical Council. There is no guarantee that only gentlemen who are members of the Medical Faculty will always be nominated by your Excellency's Government and that the Medical Faculty may not be in need of representation. But after all this is a matter of privilege and this Council will have to consider if it is not desirable to give a special privilege to the Faculty of Medicine in the University of Bombay. This is a matter which will be considered very carefully by the members of the select committee in case the bill survives the first reading, and it will be for the select committee to allot these additional seats to any constituency they please.

Let us now consider the second principle which is involved in another clause of this bill. My honourable friend Mr. PATEL wishes this Council to enact that sub-assistant surgeons and military assistant surgeons should be allowed to choose their own representatives on the Medical Council. The objection to this part of the bill was virtually stated yesterday in some such way. One of my honourable colleagues contended that these men were of very inferior medical qualifications and that they did not deserve to return their own representatives, representatives who will have to sit on the Medical Council with men of far higher medical attainments. The idea was that it would be infra dig for the members of that Council who hold such degrees as M.D., L.R.C.P., and the like to sit with representatives of an humbler class of medical practitioners. Now it seems to me that this is an argument which cannot possibly be accepted in these days of democracy. We find that there are not less than 1,024 medical practitioners of this particular class who are at present allowed to vote. The only disqualification imposed upon them is that none of them can stand as a candidate for election to a seat on the Medical Council. Some gentlemen think that the sanctity of the Medical Council will be violated by the presence of any one belonging to this class of humbler medical practitioners; but it should be carefully remembered that this is an argument which cannot be tolerated in these days for a moment. Are we to suppose that representatives of millionaires should not sit side by side with representatives of poorer people? What is the trend of public opinion in these days of democratic ideas? This is an argument of very olden times and I really wonder that it should have been trotted out now in all seriousness. As to the medical qualifications of these men, I do not think that I can state their attainments in better language than was employed in this Council in the year 1911, when the first medical registration bill was considered, by the then Surgeon-General. This is what the Honourable Surgeon-General Stevenson then said :—"There has been, I understand, considerable excitement in the medical profession in Bombay with regard to the qualifications which the bill proposes should be considered sufficient to entitle its holder to have his name put on the register; and as it seems to me that a vital principle of this bill is involved in this question, I would ask to be allowed to offer a few remarks on it at this stage: As all the honourable members are well aware, Government have for many years maintained certain medical schools for the purpose of educating lads in the practice of medicine in order to supply its own services, both civil and military. These schools are, first of all, the Grant Medical College, at which is carried out the training of military assistant surgeons, and there are also the three schools at Poona, Ahmedabad and Hyderabad (Sind), where is carried on the training of sub-assistant surgeons, both civil and military. It has not been the practice of Government hitherto to give the students who pass out of these schools any real diploma or certificate of any sort entitling them to place letters after their names. They receive certificates showing that they have sat at an examination, and that they have been found capable and qualified to practise in medicine, surgery and midwifery. In former days they were only qualified to practise as hospital assistants or sub-assistant surgeons, but later they have been qualified to practise medicine and surgery. It is against the inclusion of these men in the register that so much has lately been written and said by members of the profession in Bombay. I will ask the honourable members of the Council to consider the training which these men go through, and the nature of the duties which they have hitherto performed and are at the present time carrying out all over the Presidency. I ask them to consider these before they allow themselves to be influenced by the arguments that have been brought against their inclusion in the register. These lads come to the medical schools from the high schools and elsewhere, and a certain number of them have already passed their Matriculation examination. Before they are allowed to enter the medical schools, they are subjected to an examination in general knowledge, and as the number of vacancies is usually considerably smaller than the number of those applying, it becomes a competitive examination at which, by the way, the matriculated candidates do not always succeed in securing places. This, I think, shows that the preliminary education of these students is not on such a low grade as has been stated in this city. The candidates who are successful in this examination are admitted to the medical schools and there the training lasts for four years. Their progress is constantly checked by examination, both written and oral. After they have succeeded in passing the final tests at the schools, they are admitted into Government service as vacancies occur. In addition to the Government students a certain number of pupils from Indian states and private pupils are also educated at the mofussil schools and qualify themselves for practice in their native towns or villages. After admission to Government service, the military assistant surgeon is sent to a station hospital for duty with European troops, and eventually a certain number of military assistant surgeons find their way back to the civil departments of local Governments. There they are placed in subordinate charge of large civil hospitals in the Presidency, such as St. George's, the J. J., and the Goculdas Tejpal Hospitals in Bombay, the Sassoon Hospital, Poona, the Civil Hospital, Karachi, the General Hospital, Aden, and at Asylums such as Colaba. They are also placed in sole medical charge of all the ships of the Royal Indian Marine; they are also placed—

His Excellency the PRESIDENT :—Order, order. Is the honourable member going to read the whole speech?

The Honourable Mr. BELVI :—No, your Excellency; I will only read a few lines more. "They are also placed in sole medical charge of telegraph stations and quarantine stations on the Persian Gulf; and lastly a certain number of them are placed in sole charge of revenue districts in this Presidency as civil surgeons of the district. In military employment it has been stated that they are never allowed to treat the European soldier or officer. This is entirely untrue. These men are sent on detachments in charge of European troops, in sole charge of both men and officers, and in one case, of which I am personally aware, and I have no doubt there are others, a military assistant surgeon is in sole charge of a station hospital in which both men and officers may be received for treatment. The military sub-assistant surgeon is sent on duty with Indian troops. These men are constantly sent on detachments and camps of exercise in sole charge of Indian troops and their European officers. All members of this Council are aware of the work which is done by sub-assistant surgeons in civil employ. They are in charge of practically all the dispensaries of the country, and I can only say that taking the whole of the work throughout the whole of the country that these men do, it can only be said to be good."

It is unnecessary for me to pursue this quotation any longer. It is evident that in the opinion of the late Surgeon-General with the Government of Bombay these men were wholly fit to exercise this franchise, and it was very candidly and very generously conceded yesterday by the Honourable Surgeon-General Lyons that the claims of these men to have representatives of their own on the Medical Council should be recognised, and I do not think that it is necessary for me to labour this point any longer. So, so far as the second principle is concerned, I think that there will be no difficulty whatever in accepting this bill.

Now I come to the most contentious clause of the bill, which involves the third principle, and that is as to whether it should be considered infamous conduct in a professional respect to associate with vaids and hakims. This particular point has unfortunately given rise to as acrimonious a controversy now as it did evidently in the year 1911, and I have got a very lively recollection of what then took place. It is extremely unfortunate that the western system of medicine should be pitted against the indigenous systems of medicine as found in India, and here I find that considerable efforts were made yesterday to show that the indigenous systems were absolutely worthless, so worthless that it would be disgraceful on the part of a medical practitioner whose name is registered under the Medical Registration Act to associate with a vaid or a hakim who practised the Indian system of medicine.

It seems to me that to assist the non-medical members of this Council in the consideration of this particular clause of the bill two experts have been nominated to this Council; but it is a great pity that Your Excellency's Government was not pleased to nominate medical experts in this Presidency who really knew something either of the ayurvedic system or of the unani system. There were several gentlemen available, men of the position and standing of Dr. Sir Bhalchandra Krishna and Dr. M. G. Deshmukh. But not one of them has been nominated, and we find that two experts have been given seats on this Legislative Council who are both violently opposed to this particular clause of Mr. Patel's bill. As for my old friend the Honourable Sir TEMULJI NARIMAN, his views on the indigenous systems of medicine were well known not only to the medical profession but to the people generally throughout the Presidency since the passing of the Bombay Medical Registration Act in 1912; but I had fondly thought that my honourable friend had been able to study, during the last five years, at least a portion of either the ayurvedic system or the unani system and to see if he could revise his opinion of these two systems. But I was extremely disappointed on listening to his speech with close attention yesterday to find that not only did he cling obstinately to his old views but that there was a deterioration in his usual vigour and that he could not even express as forcibly yesterday what he had said in the year 1912. If this was the only thing which could be expected of him, I do not see why my honourable friend was put to the needless trouble of travelling such a long distance from Bombay. The same phraseology, the same quotation from Dr. Morehead and the same sly hit at Indian political leaders are to be found word for word in his speech in the year 1912. It is sufficient for me to invite reference to his speech which he delivered then. There is not one word which was said yesterday that would not be found there. Sir TEMULJI NARIMAN'S speech may be found at pages 58 to 60 of the Bombay Government Gazette, Part VII, for 1912 and a reference will satisfy every member of this Council that there was absolutely nothing, not even new phraseology, in his speech of yesterday. I do not think that I need ask the Council to brush aside the views of a gentleman who could not even pronounce correctly the names of ancient authors who wrote the well-known ayurvedic text-books. He could not pronounce correctly the names of Charak and Sushruta. This is one of two experts on whose evidence the destinies of Indian systems of medicine are going to be decided by this Council.

I now come to the second expert, the Hon'ble Dr. ROW. He certainly has come to this Council with a very high reputation. There is no doubt that he is one of the best medical practitioners in Bombay of the western science and I thought that he, at any rate, would be able to enlighten us in an authoritative manner as to the relative merits of the two systems on which he ventured to speak. But I must confess to a sense of keen disappointment when I heard him say that he had not been able in the 20 years of his practice to investigate in any useful manner a single drug from the Indian pharmacopœia. It would have been apparent to the members of this Council if he had said that as a student of medicine.

The Honourable Mr. CURTIS:—I think the honourable member is touching on very dangerous ground indeed. I think we agreed yesterday that the relative merits of the two systems were not to be discussed.

His Excellency the PRESIDENT:—I do not wish to prevent the honourable member from saying as much as he can, but I do wish to observe that I have laid down quite at the beginning of the discussion that Government have no possible objection to the ayurvedic system of medicine and it is not a question of relative merits of the system at all. The honourable member should not refer to those at all.

The Honourable Mr. BELVI:—Your Excellency, to me it seems that my Honourable friend Dr. ROW though a very eminent doctor of the western science of medicine was indeed a very gullible witness. I shall only examine the evidentiary value of the valuable admissions which he has made. What did he say about the indigenous systems of medicine, at any rate about the ayurvedic? Did he not admit yesterday that after a close application to the study of ayurved for 10 or 15 years it is possible to turn out an excellent vaid? His only plea was that these old vaids are dying out and their death is depriving the ayurvedic system of its existence. Does not that admission show that if the ayurvedic system is properly developed and studied it is capable of yielding good results?

His Excellency the PRESIDENT:—Order, order. I have tried very hard to keep the relative merits out of this debate and I must call the honourable member to order if he refers to them again.

The Honourable Mr. BELVI:—I simply want to refer here in a few words to the arguments advanced yesterday by the two experts in this Council.

His Excellency the PRESIDENT:—But I understood yesterday from his speech that my honourable friend Dr. ROW was rather supporting the point of view of ayurvedic medicine.

The Honourable Mr. BELVI:—I am much obliged to your Excellency for saying that the honourable Dr. ROW'S views do support the ayurvedic system and that they are in favour of it. It is sufficient for my purpose if it is recognized that the indigenous systems of medicine are not so very crude as they are sometimes supposed to be. But I must tell the Council that ayurveda is looked upon generally by Indians, and especially by Brahmins, as sacred and as one of the vedas. It is called by Brahmins the fifth veda. This is a matter which must be well known to the Honourable Dr. ROW, who is a Brahmin. It is with peculiar feelings of veneration that we look upon the ayurveda and our feelings are much hurt when we find that our fifth veda is attacked in a merciless manner by ignorent men. I do not think I need pursue this point any longer. I am content if members of this Council are convinced that neither of the experts has proved that the indigenous systems are worthless. If that point is appreciated by my honourable colleagues I am satisfied. When the first Medical Bill was passed into law in the year 1912 it was not only not the intention of Government—and I am glad to hear that it is not the intention of Government even now—to discourage in any way the study of ayurvedic medicine. Tho Hon'ble Sir RICHARD LAMB, who introduced the bill, was careful enough to say in his speech that a time may come when gentlemen well-versed in the ayurvedic system may be admitted to the Medical Council.

His Excellency the PRESIDENT:—Is the honourable member referring to Government again?

The Honourable Mr. BELVI:—Yes. I am perfectly satisfied that so far as the attitude of Government is concerned it is sympathetic, and I acknowledge this thankfully. The Honourable Sir RICHARD LAMB, the member in charge of the bill then said:—

"But clause 20 distinctly provides that when the course of study prescribed by any college or other body offering a qualification not entered in the schedule is such as to secure in its students the requisite skill for the efficient practice of their profession, then Government may admit to registration men so trained. If any school of ayurvedic medicine can at any future time show that its training is efficient and that the men who hold its diplomas have the knowledge and skill for the efficient practice of medicine, it will be open to Government to include it in the schedule."

That is the real index to the attitude of Government.

There is another important fact which this Council should bear in mind, and that is the act so recently passed by the Legislative Council of the United Provinces, an act which has been published under the imprimatur of His Excellency the Governor General of India in the month of August of this year. If I mistake not, the act was published on the 4th August 1917, and in that act it is plainly stated that it is not infamous conduct in a professional respect to associate with vaids and hakims or homeopaths. That is a very important provision of which this Council will please take note. Are we to suppose that the United Provinces are much behind us and that we are ahead of all the other provinces? Why should there be a different law so far as this particular point is concerned in the United Provinces from the law obtaining in the Bombay Presidency? And does not the fact that the Government of India have been pleased to sanction this act passed by the Legislative Council of the United Provinces show that in the opinion of the Government of India there is absolutely nothing infamous in the association of registered medical men with vaids and hakims? Are we going to ignore that act altogether? It is possible to say that the phraseology which has been employed by the Honourable Mr PATEL in his bill differs here and there from the phraseology adopted in the act passed by the Legislative Council of the United Provinces. But it is open to the select committee to adopt the phraseology wholesale from the act of the United Provinces and incorporate it into the bill of my honourable friend. But to say that the principle itself should not be accepted here in spite of the fact that the principle has been accepted by the Government of a sister province and has been sanctioned by the Government of India is, I submit, something which is very difficult to follow. Perhaps I may be told by one of my honourable colleagues that we are clamouring for local autonomy and Bombay may have a law of her own, but I should submit that this would be an autonomy granted to us with a vengeance. Are we to suppose that there should be different laws in different presidencies on the same point? Are we to suppose that medical men in the Bombay Presidency are in any way superior to the medical men in the United Provinces? We were told yesterday that if clause 3 of the Honourable Mr. PATEL'S bill were accepted the Bombay Medical Council will have no members to sit on it. To me it seems that this is simply nothing more than a vain threat. For I make no doubt that there will never be a paucity of gentlemen who will choose to sit on the Bombay Medical Council, despite the fact that there are on it representatives of an humbler class of medical practitioners and the fact that registered graduates are allowed to associate themselves with vaids and hakims. I put it to my honourable colleagues to see carefully whether it would be right to depart from the principle which has been accepted not only by the Government of the United Provinces, but by His Excellency the Governor-General of India.

We were told that it was perfectly open to any medical graduate not to have his name registered in the medical register of the Bombay Presidency. That is a perfectly intelligible statement. Do those that advance this argument appreciate the force of what they say? Do they remember the fact that the Bombay Medical Council enjoys its powers under a particular statute? It is maintained out of the public exchequer of this Presidency and it has to exercise its rules and regulations which are sanctioned under a particular law. If statutory powers have been conferred upon the Bombay Medical Council, they must be exercised to the satisfaction of the people of the Presidency and to the satisfaction of this Council. We find by referring to the Bombay Medical Registration Act that peculiar advantages are conferred upon medical men who get their names registered. The most important of these is that none that is not registered can ever be entertained in the public service of this Presidency. He cannot be a Government servant, nor can he be a servant of any public body such as a local board or a municipality. That means that all the available loaves and fishes are thrown open only to a particular class of people and that is the reason why every medical man is anxious to have his name registered. There is another privilege, which is probably within the recollection of my honourable friends. If a certificate is to be produced in a particular case where it is absolutely necessary, it can only be granted by a medical gentleman whose name is registered. When such valuable privileges are allotted to registered graduates, it is but natural that medical graduates should be anxious to have their names registered. It is also a matter of common knowledge that gentlemen who are chosen members of the Medical Council get very handsome fees for their attendance at each sitting of the Medical Council. If I mistake not, the amount of fees is Rs. 50 per sitting. All this money is paid out of the public purse and the public has therefore a perfect right to control the Medical Council. It does not lie in the mouth of any member of the Medical Council to say that it is open to any medical man not to have his name registered.

It was suggested that if a man chooses to have his name registered he must submit himself to the code of rules that may be framed by the Medical Council. I accept this position, but I lay down only one proviso. The code must be in consonance with reason and in consonance with the habits and customs of the people of this Presidency. It is because we find that the Bombay Medical Council is at present acting in a manner detrimental to the interests of certain Indian medical graduates that this bill has been introduced by my honourable friend Mr. PATEL into this Council. The facts of the case of Dr. Popat were very freely referred to yesterday. Do they not show that instead of thanking a gentleman who has devoted something like 30 years of his life to the service of his country by maintaining an institution in which young men are trained both in the principles of western medicine and the principles of the ayurvedic system of medicine, it is sought by the Medical Council to put a stigma upon him and a slur on his reputation by expunging his name from the medical register?

The Honourable Mr. CURTIS:—I beg the honourable member's pardon. Do I understand that the Bombay Medical Council have decided to remove his name from the register?

The Honourable Mr. BELVI:—The case is sub judice. I am only pointing out to this Council that it is necessary to control the action of the Bombay Medical Council. The opposition to this clause shows the direction in which the wind is blowing. Unless this Council safeguards the interests of the Indian medical graduates, it is very likely that their interests will suffer immensely. That is the position which I take up. For aught I know the Medical Council, in their wisdom, may be pleased to acquit Dr. Popat of the charge of infamous conduct and Dr. Popat may be free from his present troubles. But it is not unlikely that other registered graduates may be placed in precisely similar predicament in which Dr. Popat has at present been placed. The very wording of the notice that has been issued to him shows that infamous conduct———

The Honourable Mr. CURTIS:—I beg the honourable member's pardon Will he kindly read the notice?

The Honourable Mr. BELVI:—Yes. I have got all the papers.

The Honourable Mr. CURTIS:—But I do not think the last notice served upon Dr. Popat is among those papers.

The Honourable Mr. BELVI:—The matter is public property and there has been so much public discussion that I do not think that I need read the particular passages from the correspondence. But the correspondence shows that what was considered to be infamous conduct in a professional respect was his association with the college named the Prabhuram Ayurvedic College. He had a notice to this effect. At present the proceedings are going on and the only reason apparently suggested in support of them is the view that registered medical men shall not associate with a medical college or school in which the ayurvedic system is taught side by side with the western system of medicine.

As your Excellency has already been pleased to rule that I should not enter into a comparison of the western and eastern systems of medicine, I shall not do so. I should have otherwise called the attention of this Council to a few passages in this connection from a book known as the Symphony of Shakespeare. Honourable members will be amused to read pages 129 and 130 of that book. They will find there the barber-surgeon's crude notions of physiology and the like in Shakespeare's England. But all that, however, is a matter of past history and we need not trouble ourselves with it in these days.

Honourable members will also please bear it in mind that if there are a few doctors of the western medicine opposed to our systems of medicine, there are a very large number of European doctors who have been trained in the western system but who are in favour of the indigenous systems of medicine in India. Yesterday the name of Sir Pardey Lukis was mentioned in this connection. It was said that he perhaps had not come into close contact with Indian systems of medicine. But a perusal of his speeches in the Imperial Council will show that he even mentioned the names of vaids and hakims with whom he had come into close contact

Then it was contended yesterday that the passing of this bill would be retrograde, illogical and imperfect. I fail to understand how it would be retrograde We are told that many medical men are now out of India and it will be wrong to pass this bill in their absence. If we are to apply the same principle to His Majesty's army, His Majesty's recent pronouncement that Indians should be granted commissions in the army now would be objected to by His Majesty's soldiers who are employed in Flanders and in other theatres of war. I do not see how this question of unfairness comes in.

It is said that the bill should be withdrawn and that another Government bill should be brought in. Why? Simply because no bill brought in by a private member is to be accepted? Is it not open to any member of this Council to suggest any alteration? I submit, your Excellency, that it is necessary to consider the bill on its own merits and to pass it with such amendments as may be acceptable to the members of this Council. This bill is not at all imperfect in my opinion.

There is nothing illogical about this bill and it is in no way a retrograde measure. It cannot be called by any stretch of imagination illogical in view of a similar act which has just been passed by the United Provinces Government. On these grounds I beg to support the first reading of this bill.

The Honourable Mr. SALEBHOY KARIMJI BARODAWALA:—Your Excellency,—I came to this Council with a very open mind on this particular question. But after the speeches made in favour of and against the bill, especially the speech of the Honourable the Surgeon General, I think there is nothing in the attitude of the Bombay Medical Council which demands the necessity of a bill of this nature. I understand the position is this The Bombay Medical Council does not recognise the hakims and vaids because the majority of them are quacks and as such are dangerous to society. It is not alleged that the eastern method of treating patients was useless, but that at the present day, to use the words of the Honourable Dr. FERNANDEZ, the system has become antiquated and obsolete. If we can demonstrate the qualities of our system nobody would condemn it for the mere reason that it is Indian. But until such time as it is proved to be useful, we cannot blame any one if it is not patronised. We are indebted to the Honourable Dr. FERNANDEZ for making a very practical suggestion in this connection—I mean his suggestion for creating a chair of pharmacology in our medical college with a laboratory attached in order to test and demonstrate the qualities of Indian drugs. I think the Indian members of this Council could well devote their enegry in getting Government to accept his suggestion. But there is no point in helping the quack. I agree with my friend Dr. Row that there is a class of men living even in this generation who know the ayurvedic and unani medicines scientifically. But there are no means of discriminating between such people who are admittedly rare and the quacks with which the country abounds, and in such a state of things we ought to be very careful before doing anything which would patronise the latter class of men. Clause 3 of the bill if carried into law will principally benefit this class.

Now we must also take into account the feeling of a class of well qualified men who consider it below their dignity to associate themselves professionally with unscientific men. It is not the case that they force all men trained in the western science to abstain from having any dealings with this class of men. They have left them free to do what they like. Not only that, but qualified doctors, whether they are registered or unregistered, can practise the unani and ayurvedic medicines if they believe in their efficacy, but all that they say is that if qualified men get themselves registered they should not indirectly patronise untrained men. The Honourable Mr. GOKULDAS PAREKH said yesterday that if a man on his death-bed who was under the treatment of an unqualified physician wanted to consult a qualified practitioner, he could not do so under the present act. I have consulted Dr. FERNANDEZ on this point and I am convinced that there is no bar to a registered man for taking over such a case from an unqualified man—nay, there is no objection even to his finding out the history of the case and the treatment followed. Your Excellency, I may not be misunderstood that I am against hakims and vaids generally. I have great regard for really good hakims and vaids, and I have seen cases in which doctors have failed and hakims and vaids have succeeded. But taking all the circumstances into consideration I will vote against the bill.

MEDICAL BILL.

[11TH OCTOBER 1917.] [Mr. Chunilal Vijbhukhandas Mehta; Mr. G. S. Curtis.]

The Honourable Mr. CHUNILAL VIJBHUKHANDAS MEHTA:—Your Excellency,—With regard to the second part of the bill, I will only say that when the Honourable Mr. GOKULDAS PAREKH brought forward his resolution to give the sub-assistant surgeons a seat on the Medical Council and that resolution was accepted by Government, I did not hear, at any rate I do not remember that I heard, any objection either from the Honourable Dr. FERNANDES or from the Honourable Mr. SETHNA, who in particular so strongly and vehemently opposed the second part of the amendment brought forward by the Honourable Mr. PATEL.

With regard to the third and most important part of the bill, I am afraid that if the interpretation that is sought to be put by the Medical Council on the phrase "infamous conduct" is supported, there will be two unfortunate consequences.

The Honourable Mr. CURTIS:—I do not wish to interrupt the honourable member, but what interpretation does he suppose that the Medical Council wish to put on the expression "infamous conduct"?

The Honourable Mr. CHUNILAL MEHTA:—Association with a school or college teaching ayurvedic system of medicine.

The Honourable Mr. CURTIS:—May I tell the honourable member that that is not the charge against Dr. Popat Prabhuram?

The Honourable Mr. CHUNILAL MEHTA:—I would like to know what the charge is, then

The Honourable Mr. CURTIS:—The charge is "You have associated yourself with an institution termed the Prabhuram Ayurvedic College, Bombay, in the capacity of the principal thereof and that as such principal you by your countenance, advice, assistance and co-operation not only enabled unqualified and unregistered persons to attend, treat and perform operations upon patients in respect of matters requiring professional discretion and skill and otherwise to engage in professional practice as if such persons were duly qualified and registered.. ..." and so on. That is the charge that has been made, the evidence has not been sifted yet and no judgment has been passed.

The Honourable Mr. CHUNILAL MEHTA:—In the first notice the charge was what I stated and the Council may make such a charge again. But I did not want to take my stand at all on Dr. Popat's case. If the Medical Council do not wish to interpret "infamous conduct" as association with vaids or hakims then what is the objection to pass the amendment that has been brought forward? I have got nothing whatever to do with this particular instance before us, namely, the case of Dr. Popat, but I may point out for the information of this Council that when Dr. Popat sought registration under the Medical Registration Act everybody knew that he had this connection with the ayurvedic college for the last twenty years. It was a matter of common knowledge and yet his registration was not objected to, and it is only now that this notice has been served upon him.

However, I have nothing whatever to do with the fate of Dr. Popat or what decision the Medical Council may come to. But I say that two unfortunate consequences will arise, not if the interpretation is supported, but, I will say, if the amendment that has been brought forward by Mr. PATEL is not accepted by this Council. The unfortunate consequences would be these. At the present moment there is no scheme on foot which is to encourage or to improve the indigenous systems of medicine. We are entirely grateful to His Excellency for his pronouncement that His Excellency's Government are not against the indigenous systems. But there is no scheme at present on foot which is going to improve these systems of medicine nor to improve the class of vaids or hakims. In the absence of any such scheme, it seems to me that the only avenue which is open now for the improvement of these systems will be closed entirely if the amendment is not accepted by this Council. It has been said that the Medical Council have no objection to a medical practitioner either studying or practising indigenous systems of medicine, but that they have the very greatest objection to a medicial practitioner associating with a vaid or a hakim who practises the indigenous systems of medicine. Now it seems to me that there could not be any proper study without a living or substantial association with those who daily practise the indigenous systems, nor can you expect any improvement in them.

The case of England was placed before this Council in one or two speeches yesterday. I may point out, sir, that the select committee of the United Provinces Government, when they reported on the clause that has been quoted to this Council, stated that they considered that the provision regarding the removal of a name from the register should be qualified by the following words: —"provided that no person's name shall be removed on the ground that he has adopted any theory of medicine or surgery not in accordance with the accepted view for the time being". A similar qualification is to be found in section 28 of the English Medical Act of 1858. The opinion of the select committee was all unanimous, and I may mention that out of the seven members of the select committee three were Europeans and four Indians; nevertheless all unanimously came to the conclusion that the proviso clause should be inserted. In England, as was pointed out by the late Sir Phirozeshah Mehta in 1912, there is a homogeneous body of medical opinion, which makes the working of a medical act of this nature satisfactory and permissible, but the conditions in this country are entirely different and I submit that any reform that we undertake must take cognizance of the existing conditions of the Presidency. Even in England, in spite of this homogeneous opinion in favour of allopathy, it is left entirely to the option of a medical practitioner to adopt any theory of medicine or surgery which is not in accord with the accepted view of the Council, and the practitioners who adopt such theories are in England very few in number; whereas, on the other hand, here in India we have vaids and hakims who administer medicine to, as has been pointed out, 90 per cent. of the population of the country. My appeal to the medical practitioners—and indeed to all those gentlemen who have got themselves registered as a matter of honour—is to try and associate with the vaids and hakims and to raise them to a better system of science, so that the public may be protected. Instead of doing that, they are absolutely cut off from any association, and how, I ask in all seriousness, are the indigenous systems of medicine to be improved if this is the course that is going to be adopted?

The other unfortunate consequence which I mentioned will be that the public will be more and more exposed to the tender mercies of the many quacks and charlatans that undoubtedly exist among the so-called vaids and hakims. Another instance of how the wisdom and foresight of the late Sir Phirozeshah Mehta was justified is to be found in the report of the Council proceedings in 1912. Let it be remembered that at that time it was distinctly pointed out that there was no idea whatever of protecting the medical practitioners as against the vaids and hakims, and I will read to you—it is a short quotation—the very words which the then Surgeon General used. He said:—"It was never pretended for one moment that the passage of the bill was to protect the qualified medical practitioners from the vaids and hakims. What was said was that it was to protect the qualified medical practitioner from the unqualified men practising according to western methods, the untrained compounders, such as may be found in every bazaar, and so on. These are the men who are going about pretending that they are medical men, and, notwithstanding everything Sir Phirozeshah Mehta has said, people employ such men and do not know they are employing unqualified men." So it is perfectly clear from the speech of the then Surgeon General—and I have no doubt that he reflected the views of the Government at that time—that the act was never meant or intended to differentiate or to protect the medical practitioners from the vaids or hakims. It was to protect the qualified medical practitioners from the unqualified men who posed as qualified according to the western method.

Now I could have understood the position that is proposed to be taken up if the number of medical practitioners on the registration roll was larger than it is at present. At present it is only about 2000, or perhaps 3000, practitioners who are taking the benefit of the Registration Act. The other 6000 are entitled to associate with quacks or charlatans or any body they like and yet the registered medical practitioners will associate with these other medical practitioners. If the case was that these 6000 were all agreed that they should have nothing to do with the vaids and hakims then one might have understood the logic of the restrictions; in other words, you have no homogenous opinion even amongst yourselves against the vaids and hakims. It seems to me, sir, that this position savours of an attitude of trade unionism and it is trade unionism in its worst form because it is displayed in connection with a profession whose object is to relieve human suffering and misery and to save life. Instead of training the indigenous practitioners an attempt is made to cut them out altogether and leave them to trade upon the general public who are unable to have recourse to or who have no faith in western medicine. I submit, sir, that so long as the deplorable poverty of the people of this country continues it would be impossible for them to resort to western methods of medicine even though they may be at hand. I do not at the present moment wish to compare the two methods. I have no doubt that the western method is better because it is progressive but I cannot admit that the time-honoured eastern method is no method at all and is a huge hoax. I submit that unless there is some scheme which will improve the status of the vaids or hakims it will be a great misfortune if medical practitioners should sever all association with them.

It is quite possible, and in this country it is very much the case, that out of the many medical practitioners who practise even western methods there are a great many Indians who have an honest desire to study the eastern methods in order to find out what is the good about them and to foster them. If they had this desire, and it is no doubt a most natural one, and if this amendment is not carried, they would be absolutely precluded from having any living association with the vaids or hakims without which progress is impossible. I do not wish to touch upon the case of Dr. Popat but at the same time I say that the Medical Council could not have chosen a worse case for exercising their disciplinary jurisdiction as stated in their first notice because in any case though this college is a humble one, it is an effort to turn out vaids and hakims who are not, at all events, charlatans or quacks. I therefore, think, sir, that the first reading of the bill might be passed although changes might be made in the select committe.

The Honourable SHEIKH GHULAM HUSSEIN HIDAYATALLAH:—Your Excellency,—The present bill proposes to increase the elective element. Personally I would very much like that there should be a majority of elected members in the Medical Council. But looking at the question from the Muhammedan point of view I see that not a single Muhammedan medical practitioner was returned to the Medical Council at the last election and therefore your Excellency's Government was obliged to nominate one.

Now the first amendment proposes a decrease of two nominated members. If we accept the amendment of my honourable friend, what will be the result? The elected members will be decreased by two and I am afraid that the only Muhammedan member might be thrown out. Therefore I would suggest to my honourable friend Mr. PATEL that if he were to make a provision in his bill that one of the two seats that he asks by election be reserved for Muhammedan practitioners I will vote for it.

The Honourable Mr. PATEL:—Yes, I am perfectly willing to do that.

MEDICAL BILL.

[Mr. Sheikh Ghulam Hussein Hidayatallah; Sir Mahadev Bhaskar Chaubal.] [11TH OCTOBER 1917.]

The Honourable SHEIKH GHULAM HUSSEIN HIDAYATALLAH :—Coming to the second amendment, it is to the effect that a qualified class of people known as hospital assistants or sub-assistant surgeons should be members of the Medical Council. The only objection that is raised to this clause is that the educational qualifications of these sub-assistant surgeons are not sufficient to make them eligible for the membership of the Medical Council. But I am surprised at this objection. It is on the evidence of these sub-assistant surgeons that we see every day in the sessions courts and in the High Court that people are sentenced to be hanged by the neck. If their educational qualifications are not sufficient to enable them to become members of the Medical Council, then it ought to be ruled by this Council, sir, that the evidence of these people ought not be relied upon in important cases like murder cases.

Now coming to the third, and a very important amendment, it is to the effect that under the present Medical Act all association of registered practitioners with ayurvedic or unani vaids or hakims is considered as infamous conduct. The Honourable Mr. PATEL, by bringing his third amendment, wants to add certain explanation of the words "infamous conduct." I have heard all the previous speakers. The Honourable Mr. BELVI and the Honourable Mr. CHUNILAL MEHTA both of them have been simply playing on the sentiments of the Council and trying to show that there was something in the Medical Act which prevented the study or practice of indigenous systems of medicine. But so far as I see in the Medical Act there is absolutely no prohibition to the study or practice of indigenous systems of medicine. Under the act vaids and hakims are allowed to practise and give any medicine they like. Therefore, there is nothing which goes to strike a death-blow to the indigenous system of medicine. Again even the qualified practitioners, unless they are registered members, are allowed to associate with a hakim or a vaid and to use any medicines they like. Only the registered practitioners are not allowed to have association or consultation with a vaid or a hakim under the Medical Act. The reason is that there are a large number of vaids and hakims and most of them are quacks. Even these registered practitioners are allowed to use, if I mistake not, ayurvedic medicines. They may use unani or any medicines they like but they are prohibited from associating with any vaid or hakim when they have taken a case in hand. Your Excellency, registered, practitioners are not allowed to associate themselves with vaids and hakims after they have taken up a case. They may take a case through the vaids and hakims and examine the treatment, but after they have taken up a case they should not associate with them, because the majority of them are quacks.

I would suggest one thing, that if these vaids and hakims organise themselves and convince this Government that some of them are competent and qualified people, I am sure your Excellency's Government will not consider association with such qualified and competent hakims as infamous conduct.

With these remarks I oppose the first reading of the bill.

The Honourable Sir MAHADEV BHASKAR CHAUBAL :—Your Excellency,—I will not take up much of the time of the Council, but, after having closely and attentively listened to the speeches that were made yesterday and to-day, I cannot help saying that most of those who addressed themselves to the question before them were not able to keep the consideration of this bill separate from, and independent, of the question which the Medical Council has started with respect to an individual case, that of Dr. Popat Prabhuram. I think this bill, whether it is to be supported or opposed, has got to be supported or opposed on its own merits and not on the merits or demerits of Dr. Popat Prabhuram's case. Honourable members have hardly been able to keep their minds away from this individual case. Now as regards that individual case, I do not think that it is fair in this Council to make any pronouncement and thereby prejudge a case which is before a regular tribunal. As the act requires, a notice has been issued. Dr. Popat Prabhuram will have the right of appearing by counsel before the Medical Council. He can lay his case before them. If they decide adversely, he has got the right of appeal to His Excellency the Governor, and even if he is dissatisfied with the decision of His Excellency the Governor, I do not know that he may not have further the right to go to the High Court. Therefore I submit that that case has got absolutely nothing to do with the consideration of the present bill. Whether the action of the Medical Council was right or wrong in that individual case is not a question which ought in the slightest degree to affect the merits or demerits of the present bill before the Council.

Now coming to the present bill, it has been brought out in the discussion that there is an amount of haziness about what practitioners are definitely indicated when the expression "followers of the ayurvedic, the unani or other indigenous system of medicine" is used. In common parlance all vaidyas are followers of the ayurvedic system, and all hakims of the unani system: and it embraces all sorts and kinds of medical practitioners from the veriest quack to the most highly gifted and learned vaidya or hakim. It is therefore under the present circumstances and at the present time impossible to define a vaidya or a hakim. Yesterday some speakers were puzzled and did not know what the expression "other indigenous systems of medicine" occurring in the Honourable Mr. PATEL'S proposed explanation referred to. I think the uncertainty and haziness about the connotation of the terms vaidya and hakim and along with it the merits or the demerits of the bill will perhaps be brought home to the minds of honourable members if I tell them about a dignified body of indigenous medical practitioners, who are to be found in Poona and who can well claim to come within the scope of the bill. I do not know about other towns, but my friends in Poona ought certainly be able to bear me out. They are called naka dolyache vaidu*. There is a colony of them somewhere beyond Government House, and if you go that side in the morning, you find a specimen of these vaids coming along the foot-path of Ganeshkhind Road with a bamboo on his shoulder on which is suspended his bag of medicines and all his pharmacopœia and they come into the town of Poona and go about begging. Their way of begging is interesting. Perhaps my honourable friends Messrs. KAMAT and PARANJPYE will tell you what it is. They go about stopping at every door and loudly proclaiming their medical preparations often coupling each medical drug he possesses with the name of the disease on which it is a specific remedy: I now happen to remember only one of these medical drugs: it is Rasashendur-matra, but they have quite a string of names of these remedies and diseases which they proclaim in a rich musical voice. Well, that is an indigenous system of medicine and the Honourable Mr. PATEL says that it ought not to be at all undignified or unprofessional on the part of a registerd medical practitioner, whatever his qualifications, to call in perhaps one of these naka dolyache vaidus and be in consultation with him and prescribe medicines with him and discuss with him the virtues and properties of his drugs. This would under the bill be a way of encouraging and supporting an indigenous system of medicine. This, I think, amply illustrates what the mischief of this amending bill might be.

I think one of the points that was made by Dr. Row was not perhaps clearly appreciated by the members of this Council. As I say, I am trying to keep out the case which has been in the minds of the members entirely apart from the consideration of this bill. Suppose a person who is entitled to be a medical practitioner and who has got some degree from a recognised medical college starts an institution to-morrow and proposes to give instruction partly according to the western science and partly according to the ayurvedic system. Now, gentlemen, you all know that in order to qualify a person to be registered or to get any degree which is recognised as a qualification for registration, a person has got to stu y under the guidance of distinguished professors in a recognised medical college for a certain number of years, which is supposed to give him the requisite knowledge of different branches of the medical science which again is tested by examinations. On the other hand, suppose a person starts an institution claiming to give instruction in ayurvedic medicine, and at the same time he professes to teach to his students the principles and practice of western medical science, would there be any guarantee that persons might not emerge from such an institution with a smattering and superficial knowledge of either system, setting themselves up as ayurvedic or unani doctors and under the guise of the name administering medicines and treating patients by the allopathic system with occasional use of indigenous drugs and jurybutties. It cannot be denied that there is this danger, and the bill is likely in that way to open a wide door for frauds of this kind.

There is another question which was touched upon by the Honourable Mr. BELVI. The Honourable Mr. BELVI eloquently said that we who have passed the Medical Registration Act and the public must be satisfied about the justice of what the Medical Council do. I think that an acute lawyer like him should have known that under section 19 of the act which he helped to pass all the rules and regulations passed by the Medical Council have got to receive the previous approval of the Governor in Council. It is the Governor in Council who has got to judge as to whether the rules and regulations that are framed by the Medical Council are proper, reasonable or unreasonable. It is clear, therefore, that according to the law which the Legislative Council of which he was a member passed it trusted Government to see that the rules framed were just and proper; and therefore according to the law he passed it is not he or the public that have to be satisfied but the Governor in Council. I do not think that the opinion of any individual person or member of the public has got anything to do with the case. But what I wish to impress earnestly on the Council is this. The Medical Registration Act was not passed for the purpose of encouraging the system of ayurvedic medicine or any indigenous system of medicine. It is really an act for maintaining a register, the persons enrolled on which are recognised as medical practitioners entitled to grant certain certificates. It is therefore a sort of union or guild which persons with certain definite qualifications may, if they so choose, have the right of becoming members. This union or guild frames certain rules to regulate the conduct of its members in accordance with the accepted etiquette of similar bodies in other countries. Now if after such rules have been framed I choose to go and apply to the Medical Council to put me on the register saying that I am qualified in such and such a way have I any right to complain if the Council take any action against me in accordance with the rules by which I offered to be bound, when I applied for membership? Have I any right to complain that a particular rule was passed unreasonably? That, it seems to me, is the position which the supporters of the present bill must take up when they consider individual cases like that of Dr. Popat. When Dr. Popat joined, he knew or ought to have known that there were certain rules of etiquette to which the conduct of each member ought to conform.

The Honourable Mr. PATEL:—May I know the particular rule under which association with vaids or hakims becomes unprofessional conduct?

The Honourable Sir MAHADEV CHAUBAL:—I am referring to the rules which the Honourable the Surgeon-General read out yesterday as the rules which have been adopted by the Medical Council.

The Honouradle Mr. PATEL:—I should like to know, your Excellency, the particular rule under which association with a vaid or hakim becomes unprofessional conduct. My honourable friend Sir MAHADEV tells us that Dr. Popat joined the institution with full knowledge of the rules. But what are those rules which Dr. Popat had full knowledge of?

The Honourable Sir MAHADEV BHASKAR CHAUBAL:—I think my honourable colleague Mr. CURTIS has read out the notice which was issued by the Medical Council, and I think one of the rules whch were read out yesterday by the Honourable the Surgeon-General does consider the sort of conduct which is mentioned in that notice as unprofessional. My point is that if a person agrees to go and register himself it is his business to inquire what liabilities or responsibilities he undertakes along with the privileges which the membership of that body confers on him. He has no business afterwards to complain of the action of that body if it is alleged that his conduct in a particular case contravenes or goes against the accepted etiquette of this registered body. Now I request my honourable friend Mr. PATEL to bear in mind what I have premised clearly, that whether Dr. Popat's case comes within those rules or not is a thing which has still got to be decided; there is at present only an allegation made against him. If his conduct does not come under any of those rules, I dare say the Medical Council will give their decision accordingly. And I affirm that the question with which we are directly concerned, namely, the propriety of putting this amending clause on the statute-book is a large and general question which does not and ought not to depend on this particular case.

Another point made by the Honourable the Surgeon-General and the Honourable Colonel JENNINGS is that as there is a large number of practitioners who have enrolled themselves on the Medical Register it is the voice of this body which ought to decide about any standard of professional conduct to be adopted.

It ought to be obvious that the opinions of outsiders like lawyers, tradesmen and other laymen as to what is or is not unprofessional are not very material.

There is only one other point that I will mention further. It was suggested that the action of the Medical Council has the object of defeating the assurances which were given in 1912 when this act was passed. I do not see where there is any going back upon the assurances which individual members of Government or Government as a Government gave then. I do not think anybody then said that the Medical Registration Act was passed in order to enable a graduate from the Grant Medical College to study and practice ayurvedic medicine. The only assurance that was given then, so far as I remember, was that those who professed and practised the ayurvedic or any other indigenous system of medicine would be free to do as hither to and that the act will in no way interfere with their liberty. If there was a regular ayurvedic college started, with systematic courses of medical instruction in which the people and the Government could put faith then steps might no doubt be taken to recognise it in any way that might be considered feasible. They might in that case well claim to be entitled to have a separate register for graduates trained in such an institution. But I do not see how any discouragement to the study of ayurvedic medicine can be spelt out of the action of the medical council or how there is any going back on any assurance given when the act was passed. On the contrary the proposed amendment certainly encroaches upon the assurance given to the registered practitioners by a solemn legislative enactment.

The Honourable Mr BELVI mentioned two names, those of Dr. Sir Bhalchandra Krishna and Dr. Deshmukh. He said that they were studying ayurvedic medicine. Now I have great respect for these men. They hold degrees and qualifications which entitle them to put their names on this register, but they have perhaps not done so for the very reason I have mentioned above. The act is not compulsory. It is entirely optional: and there are many others who have not got themselves entered on the register.

The Honourable Mr. C. V. MEHTA mentioned yesterday, that there are a number of persons who, by there qualifications, are entitled to be put on this egister, but who do not get themselves registered: and the services of any of these men could be enlisted in the interests of the science or practice of ayurved c medicine. But why need you impair or prejudicially affect the tone of the whole body of registered practitioners by forcing upon them an etiquette which is abhorrent to the standard of professional conduct that they have adopted? How does the ayurvedic system or the unani system suffer by leaving it to the option of any person to keep outside this register or to come within the register and be bound by rules which may be framed for the conduct and guidance of only such persons as claim to be members of that registered body?

These are the considerations which I venture to put before the Council in the consideration of this bill before honourable members accept it or make up their minds to reject the same.

The Honourable Mr. G. S. CURTIS:—Your Excellency,—There has been so much eloquence expended on this bill that—

The Honourable Mr. PATEL:—May I rise to a point of order, whether two members of the Executive Council can reply on the bill under the rules of debate?

His Excellency the PRESIDENT:—My honourable colleague Sir MAHADEV CHAUBAL was perfectly justified in speaking, and I think even the Honourable Mr. CARMICHAEL may speak if he wishes to do so.

The Honourable Sir MAHADEV CHAUBAL:—There is only one Legislative Council which is recognized by the act and I am quite as much a member of that Legislative Council as the Honourable Mr PATEL or any other member of the Legislative Council who is entitled to address himself to any question which comes before the Council.

The Honourable Mr. PATEL:—I ask His Excellency's ruling.

His Excellency the President:—I gave the honourable member exactly the same answer as my honourable colleague though not with so much force.

The Honourable Mr. CURTIS:—There has been so much eloquence expended on this bill before the Council that I shall endeavour to be as brief as possible, merely stating as far as I can the views held by a lay member of Government who is in charge of the medical portfolio.

The first clause in the bill before us provides for the reduction of the nominated element from 6 to 4. As far as I can make out, the movement in favour of this change has not been promoted by any action on the part of the profession. It is something which the honourable member, a lawyer, who has moved the bill, has evolved from his inner consciousness and the only justification for it, as far as I can see, consists in the fact that in the recent act of the United Provinces Government a similar reduction has been made.

Now, sir, we in Bombay are accustomed to consider ourselves leaders in the particular matter and it is a new doctrine put before this Council that whenever any one of the other provinces makes a change in the constitution of its particular governing body, that we should at once take steps to follow the example of that province, quite regardless of any differences in circumstances or conditions, and at once proceed to put the whole machinery of our legislation in force in order to copy its method. For there is a very considerable difference in the circumstances of the United Provinces and of Bombay. Perhaps members of this Council are not aware what the difference is. What is it? If they will look at the existing constitution of the Bombay Medical Council, it will be found that less than two-thirds of the medical practitioners registered are in the service of Government. What is the case in the United Provinces? If the proceedings of the United Provinces Legislative Council are read it will be found that speakers are unanimous that when the act comes into full operation, for the first few years 9/10 of the practitioners registered will be servants of Government. The result is an entirely different condition of affairs and with a different condition of affairs there are naturally arrangements for a different form of electorate.

Now what is the effect first of all of the Honourable Mr. PATEL'S amendment? He reduces the number nominated by Government from 6 to 4, incidentally, as the Honourable SHEIKH GHULAM HUSSEIN and the Honourable the Surgeon General have pointed out, thereby reducing the opportunities which Government have to nominate any representatives of communities whose numbers are small, namely, the Mussulmans, the Goanese and so forth. Then the honourable mover adds these two to the representatives of the Faculty of Medicine of the University of Bombay. The result is that, excluding the nominated members, the graduates of the University of Bombay have six representatives. Now, sir, the graduates of the University of Bombay are roughly speaking one-third of the number of medical practitioners registered under the act. Is there any particular reason why one-third of the practitioners should have practically one-half of the seats on the Council? I know of none. I know of no principle of proportional representation by which one-third of the registered practitioners should have one-half of the seats. Perhaps the honourable member when he replies will tell me, but I know of none. Therefore, I say that until we have a little more justification for this change other than the fact that the United Provinces have made it, regardless of the fact that the circumstances of the United Provinces and Bombay are entirely different, I ask this Council to defer taking action and would suggest to the honourable mover that he should remand the question for further consideration and possibly bring it up a year hence.

Now I come, sir, to the second proposal: the representation of the class known as sub-assistant surgeons. On behalf of Government some time ago I accepted a resolution moved by the Honourable Mr. G. K. PAREKH that this very useful class of medical practitioners should have a representative on the Medical Council. I have no objection to the principle of that resolution being put into practice. But I object entirely to the way in which the honourable member has put it in his bill. I would point out that he leaves the act, as it will be if his bill is passed, in a most undesirable condition. But perhaps first of all I would invite the honourable gentleman's attention to the terms of the bill. The honourable member proposes to add clause (d) to sub-section (4) of section 2. The result of that will be that a person trained in a Government college or holding a diploma from the College of Physicians will be qualified to be a member of the Medical Council though he may be residing in Indore or Ceylon or Malay States and though he will have no vote.

Further, if the Council will look at sub-section (2) (d) of section 2, you will find that in the case of members elected by the medical practitioners for the time being practising in the Bombay Presidency, residence is not a necessary qualification for membership but it is for voting. Again as the bill stands, the president, the members nominated, the members elected under clauses (a), (b), (c), and I may add, if the honourable member's amendment is carried, (d) as well, need none of them be registered under the act at all. Therefore, I say, if the honourable member's amendment is carried, the result will be that it is quite possible that four-fifths of the members of the Medical Council will not be registered under the Medical Registration Act at all.

Now, sir, these facts are fully known to Government and in accordance with the undertaking which they gave to the Honourable Mr. PAREKH in the middle of March last they have had under consideration a bill, which will be published shortly and which in the ordinary course and in pursuance of the undertaking given will be introduced in the December session. I suggest, therefore, that in view of the difficulties in which the honourable mover's draft has placed us, it would be more seemly on his part if he withdrew his bill and let us proceed with ours.

I now turn, your Excellency, to the matter which has attracted such an immense amount of discussion at our present meeting.

I wish first of all to describe the facts as put before the Council by the honourable mover of this bill. I ask you to say whether the facts as put before the Council are a fair, just and adequate representation of the case and I should then proceed to ask the Council to consider whether the effects of the possible action are as has been stated by the honourable member. I shall then proceed to go further and consider the remedy proposed. Will it be efficient, or will it, as I hold it will, spell the ruin of the medical profession?

Now, sir, the honourable gentleman who has moved this bill is a member of the oldest trade union of the world. A great deal has been said in disparagement of the Medical Council as a new trade union. The honourable mover was formerly practising as a pleader. He then went to England and joined the oldest trade union in the world, the Inns of Court. A case recently occurred in the Bombay Presidency in which another member of that trade union was brought before the High Court for unprofessional conduct. The High Court suspended him from practice for a period of I think two years. The papers went home to the ruling council of that trade union, the Benchers of the Inns of Court, and the Benchers decided that he should be struck off the roll for ever. That, sir, is the trade union to which the mover of this bill belongs.

The Honourable Mr. PATEL:—I do not believe in that union, your Excellency.

The Honourable Mr. CURTIS:—Well, sir, a great deal has been said by other speakers about trade unionism. I say that the Medical Council is no worse for being a trade union. A trade union is an institution which is practically being evolved in every profession under the sun; we see that engineers, accountants and even school masters have their associations. I say that if doctors have their union too there is nothing wrong, I say that it is a tendency entirely of modern times.

Now, sir, what has this trade union done? I will read to you the Honourable Mr. PATEL'S description from his printed speech:—

> "Your Excellency, there is existing for the last twenty years an ayurvedic institution in Bombay which is now known as the Prabhuram Ayurvedic College doing its work scientifically and turning out qualified men to practise the system. About this institution some of the leading and distinguished men of this Presidency, Indian as well as European, have from time to time testified to the efficiency of this institution and the good work that it has been doing at various gatherings for giving certificates and degrees to qualified students.
> "Dr. Popat is the Principal of this institution. In the month of May 1915 an advertisement in a Gujarathi newspaper appeared under the signature of Dr. Popat giving information to the public that 'the College will begin its sessions from the middle of June next and entrance examination will begin on the 10th idem. The rules and regulations with curriculum of the new course will be sent on applying to the Principal'.
> "On the 18th June a letter was sent to Dr. Popat by the Registrar of the Bombay Medical Council, saying that the Executive Committee of the Council had directed him to draw Dr. Popat's attention to the advertisement appearing over his signature and informing him that the association of his name with the ayurvedic college was incompatible with his status as a registered medical practitioner. Dr. Popat naturally asked how it was incompatible. He in answer was referred to the provisions of section 9 which empowered the Council to erase the name of a registered member from the register. Without replying to the specific questions put by Dr. Popat as to who was the complainant, what was the complaint, and as to what act or omission or commission of his in connection with the institution was considered amounting to infamous conduct, the Registrar simply said that his mere connection with the institution constituted prima facie infamous conduct."

Now, sir, I want the Council to turn over the page and read the next reference to the matter :—

"This step of the Council" (what step I do not know) "has roused a fear in the mind of the public that the construction attempted to be put on the provisions of the act by the executive committee of the Medical Council will no doubt completely wipe out the ayurvedic and unani system of medicine."

Then the honourable member goes on to another question, but finally says at the end of the last paragraph of all :—

"Dr. Popat surely, from what information has reached us, does not by his presence, countenance, assistance, co-operation or advice enable these unqualified and unregistered persons, the untrained compounders practising western methods, to act as if they are fully qualified. He is simply giving scientific instruction in the ayurvedic system to students who attend a particular course of instruction in the Ayurvedic College for a specific period."

I say that the honourable member has no definite information. All that he says is based on surmises.

Now, sir, I will read to you as quickly as I can the correspondence which I hold in my hand.

The letter from the Medical Council to Dr. Popat, dated 13th October 1915, is as follows :—

Office of the Bombay Medical Council,
Murzaban Road, Fort :
Bombay, 13th October 1915.

No. 564.

To

Popat Prabhuram Vaidya, Esq., L.M. & S., Bombay.

Sir,

Replying to your letter dated 21st August 1915, I have the honour by direction to state that under the powers vested in the Medical Council by section 9 of the Medical Act, your association with the Ayurvedic College is considered incompatible with your name remaining on the Medical Register.

I have, etc.,

(Sd.) Joseph Bocarro,
Registrar, Bombay Medical Council.

Then follows the reply from Dr. Popat, dated the 23rd November 1915. It runs :—

Vaidya Bhuvan, Bhuleshwar :
Bombay, 23rd November 1915.

From

Popat Prabhuram Vaidya, L.M. & S.;

To

The Registrar,
Bombay Medical Council.

Sir,

I have the honour to acknowledge receipt of your letter No. 564, dated 13th October 1915, in reply to my letter of the 23rd August last, enquiring under which rule and regulation of the Bombay Medical Act the association of my name with the Prabhuram Ayurvedic College is incompatible with my status as registered medical practitioner and referring me to section 9 of the Medical Act, and request you to let me know whether the enquiry made is under rule 78 of the rules made under the Medical Act, 1912, and whether any complaint has been made under rule 78 or under rule 75, and in any case let me have a copy of the abstract of information made or copy of complaint if any received with the necessary declaration accompanying it. As soon as I am favoured with this, I shall be able to send my explanations for the consideration of the Council.

I thank the Council for thus affording me an opportunity to offer my explanation and I hope to satisfy the Council that there will be no necessity to make further investigation or to take evidence in the matter.

I have, etc.,
(Sd.) Popat Prabhuram Vaidya.

Then follows the reply of the Medical Council, dated the 9th December 1915, which runs as follows :—

Office of the Bombay Medical Council,
Murzaban Road, Fort:
Bombay, 9th December 1915.

No. 670.

To Popat Prabhuram Vaidya, Esq., L.M. & S., Bombay.

Sir,

Referring to your letter dated 23rd November 1915, I have the honour to state that pending an explanation from you the Executive Committee have not resolved to institute an enquiry under the rule to which you refer.

2. They have merely intimated their opinion to you that your position in connection with the Prabhuram Ayurvedic College is incompatible with your status as a registered medical practitioner and left it to you to take such action or offer such explanation as you might desire.

3. I am now directed to call upon you formally for any explanation you may have to offer justifying the position referred to.

I have, etc.,
(Sd.) Jehangir Barjorji Sanjana,
Ag. Registrar.

As far as I can see from this, the Council wanted to treat Dr. Popat with every possible consideration.

The Honourable Mr. CHUNILAL MEHTA :—I rise to a point of order. Are we trying Dr. Popat's case at present?

His Excellency the PRESIDENT :—I think my honourable colleague is merely answering certain points that occurred in the honourable mover's speech.

The Honourable Mr. CURTIS:—The Honourable Mr. PATEL has made definite charges against the members of the Medical Council, and I am merely stating facts.

In January 1916 the Medical Council received Dr. Popat's reply.

There was some delay in dealing with it and the notice asking for an explanation was sent on the 18th of November 1916. Dr. Popat's reply, which covered eleven printed pages, finally came on the 28th of April. The Honourable Mr. PATEL'S bill was sent to the Secretary to the Legislative Council two days later, that is, on the 30th April. There is internal evidence to show on looking through Dr. Popat's letter of explanation that Mr. PATEL saw it before he prepared his speech. At any rate the fact remains that before the Medical Council—

The Honourable Mr. PATEL:—Your Excellency,—I should like my honourable friend to repeat what he has just said.

The Honourable Mr. CURTIS:—There is internal evidence to show that before preparing this speech the Honourable Mr. PATEL saw this explanation of Dr. Popat dated the 28th of April. It is only a surmise. However, my point is that the explanation was dated 28th of April 1917 and the honourable member's bill was sent in on the 30th April 1917. Does he think that he was dealing fairly with the members of the Medical Council, who are men of scientific attainments and who have nothing to gain personally from their membership? I do not suppose that even the Honourable Mr. BELVI would press his suggestion that it is because of the fee of Rs. 50 per meeting that they get that they joined the Council. They are anxious to advance the good of their profession and so they are working there. The Honourable Mr. PATEL will tell us when he replies if it was fair to this Council, when Dr. Popat's explanation was asked for in November and only furnished on the 28th April 1917, to whip in this bill on the 30th April 1917 before the Medical Council have had a chance of weighing and appreciating the evidence that is before them and coming to a final conclusion?

Now, sir, those are the facts as affecting the present case. The Medica Council are being arraigned before this Council for action which they have never yet taken. It is perfectly clear from what the Honourable Mr. BELVI and the Honourable Mr. PATEL said, that they have not even seen the charge which has been finally brought against Dr. Popat. I doubt if there is anybody in this Council who has seen this charge. In fact the final meeting of the Medical Council was to be held yesterday. Instead of leaving the Medical Council to do their own business, we have been here sitting for the best part of ten hours trying and deciding a case in which we are ignorant of the exact charge and evidence. So much as regards facts.

Now I am going to turn to what I may call the hypothetical effect. It is very difficult to deal with, because we do not know what action is to be taken and until you know what action has been taken it is very difficult to prophesy what effect it may have; but I will try. I will ask the Council to bear in mind that Government have an entirely open mind as regards the virtues and merits of the ayurvedic system of medicine or any system of medicine other than allopathic. Personally, I am one of the many to whom reference has been made in recent English newspapers, Truth for instance, who have had relatives who have been damaged or wounded in various ways and who after a long course of treatment by regular practitioners have had recourse to a class of people known in England as 'bonesetters'. In my own experience I have had a relative who went to a bonesetter after a long course of treatment by a regular practitioner. He was put under an anæsthetic by a qualified practitioner, who had been struck off the rolls for infamous conduct. He was treated by the bonesetter and he left the room cured in two hours There have been so many similar cases as a result of this unfortunate war. Therefore, so far as what we may call irregular practitioners are concerned, I as a member of Government, may say that I have no bias whatever. What is the indictment made against this Council? The indictment against them is that by their possible action in taking Dr. Popat's name off the register they are pronouncing the doom of ayurvedic medicine. I find it very difficult indeed to place myself in the mental position of people who make this indictment. First of all what is the position? We have been told that ayurvedic medicine has been going on for over 2,000 years.

The Honourable Mr. PATEL:—Are we really going into the relative merits of the ayurvedic and the western systems of medicine, your Excellency?

MEDICAL BILL.

[The President; Mr. G. S. Curtis; Mr. Dattatraya Venkatesh Belvi.] [11TH OCTOBER 1917.]

His Excellency the PRESIDENT:—I think my honourable friend may rest satisfied that my honourable colleague will not go into the relative merits of the ayurvedic and western medicine.

The Honourable Mr. CURTIS:—Well, sir, it is said that it has been going on for something like 2,000 years. I adopt that. I believe the Grant Medical College was formed in 1863. The first action that was taken by the Medical Council was in 1915. Therefore, in addition to 2,000 years of purely ayurvedic guidance, the professors of that medicine have had the advantage of 52 years' guidance absolutely unrestricted, in any way, from professors of western medicine. Until 1915 there was no restriction placed, as far as I know, in any way on any professor of western medicine as regards imparting instruction in ayurvedic medicine or bringing it up to date in any way that he thought it necessary. Until 1915 all medical men were free, as Dr. Popat was, to use their liberty to practise the western or the ayurvedic system of medicine and to teach both or either. Now, sir, what has happened since 1915? Let us leave the case of Dr. Popat for a moment. There are now about 6,000 graduates. Two thousand of these 6,000 are registered. Therefore, excluding the 2,000, there are still 4,000 unregistered medical practitioners available for instruction and guidance and employment in the ayurvedic institutions, if the managers of those institutions are willing to engage them and are willing to pay them adequate salaries. Incidentally it seems to me remarkable that, if there is as much in ayurvedic medicine as its supporters state there is, they should not have been able to get together a large endowment and offer the professors of western medicine wages sufficient to attract them and make them devote themselves to ayurvedic medicine for the rest of their lives. They could then snap their fingers at the medical register. If there is anything in the school of medicine it is still open to the Honourable Mr. Chunilal Mehta, and others who believe in it, to collect their funds and to make it worth while for licentiates in medicine and surgery of the regular colleges to come and teach and train up the younger generation in ayurvedic medicine. But, sir, as far as I can see, nothing has been done in this connection. To say that the Medical Council by insisting on a particular standard of professional ethics are digging the grave of ayurvedic medicine is surely to make an exaggerated statement which has no foundation whatever. After all, the important thing which it seems to me necessary to remember is, that the Medical Council is a purely voluntary trade union. We have cases of gentlemen of the kind of the honourable mover of this resolution, who were pleaders in this country and who went to England and joined the Inns of Court as barristers. That was a purely voluntary action. By joining it they made themselves liable to certain penalties and certain disqualifications. They are bound by the regulations of their trade union to follow certain practices, for instance, they cannot accept any briefs in the Presidency courts except through a solicitor. When a doctor has been 18 years or 20 years in practice we must expect a reasonable care on his part when he joins any association connected with a profession which he practices and by which he lives. Now, sir, this Dr. Popat Prabhuram, when he placed his name on the register, was given a warning notice perfectly clearly saying that he was not to do certain things. If he had any doubt whatever as to whether his continuance in what he was doing was or was not opposed to the regulations of this Council, which he joined so readily and willingly, there was nothing easier for him than to refer the matter to the members of the Council with whom I understand he is on friendly terms, and ascertain from them whether or not his conduct was likely to be acceptable to them or not. What did he do? Instead of that he registered and he has been arguing for over two years

The Honourable Mr. BELVI:—Is it fair to Dr. Popat, who is not a member of the Council, to prejudice his case when the case is sub judice?

The Honourable Mr. CURTIS:—We know that the case is sub judice. That is exactly my point. We have been sitting for two days trying to thresh out what is the right thing to do on facts which are not before us, on action of the Medical Council which has not been taken and we are trying to decide an appeal in a case on which no judgment has been passed.

I now come to the honourable gentleman's remedy. His remedy is, you will see, to define what infamous conduct means, and this he professes to do by saying that "studying or practising the ayurvedic, unani or other indigenous systems" and so on shall not constitute infamous conduct. Now, sir, we have been referred to an act recently passed by the United Provinces legislature and undoubtedly approved by the Governor General in Council. I wish to speak with all possible respect of acts passed by other legislatures in India but I think this Council will agree with me that, we were the first people to introduce legislation in this matter. We passed our act and our example was followed by Madras and Bengal. We have the largest and the most highly educated medical profession. There is no reason why we should lower our standards in order to bring them down to the level of what I may say, with all respect, may be considered to be a comparatively backward province. Incidentally I notice that various statements have been made which it is hard to reconcile with conditions in Bombay. I see His Excellency the late Viceroy, a great and good man, Lord Hardinge, has stated that only 10 per cent. of the population in India depended on western medicine, while 90 per cent. went to vaids. Let us try and figure out what that means. There are 5,000 practitioners in Bombay Presidency; now if they treat 10 per cent., there must be nine times that number for the rest of the population, i.e., 45,000 vaids. Where are they? I know some districts well. Are they in taluka headquarters? I doubt if vaids in taluka towns are very much more numerous than the ordinary practitioners. I am speaking of Khandesh and Ahmedabad the places I know best. In Poona there are 30 or 40 practitioners of western medicine. If His Excellency Lord Hardinge's proportion is to hold good there must be 270 vaids. Where are they? I know of only two. If one drives through Poona one finds that vaids' shops hardly exist. Therefore I think the position has been very much exaggerated and that the rural population is not dependent on these gentlemen to anything like the extent which has been stated. However, sir, let that go.

What is the honourable member's remedy? The Honourable Mr. Patel says "studying or practising the ayurvedic, unani, or other indigenous systems of medicine." Now 'system' is a very fine word, but let us express it in terms of the human factor. India, we know, is a country which is prominent in this respect, namely, everybody wants to know what everybody else's educational qualifications are. If a chief officer is appointed to a municipality, the Honourable Mr. Patel will put a question at once "What are his educational qualifications?" If there is the appointment of an excise inspector, the Honourable Mr. Upasani at once asks "What are his educational qualifications?" But, sir, for the medical man, the man who is to treat us for diseases on which life depends, who is to be admitted to the intimacy of our homes, who is to treat all who are near and dear to us, where is the definition of educational qualifications? There is none, and what is more, I defy the honourable member to prescribe them. The whole of this matter was threshed out in the Madras Council and it was pointed out then to honourable members who opposed the act that the great difficulty was the practical impossibility of defining what a practitioner of ayurvedic medicine or unani medicine or the indigenous systems is. We are now told by the Honourable Mr. Belvi that homeopathy is an indigenous system. I have already understood that homeopathy was discovered by a native of Germany. We had another system given to us by the Honourable Mr. Garud, the Hatha Yoga, which is the Indian system apparently practised in America.

The Honourable Mr. GARUD.—It is practised even in India.

The Honourable Mr. CURTIS.—What I do say is this, that when you are dealing with medicine you are dealing with a very dangerous thing indeed. That is a thing which goes right through your social life and that you must be prepared to be able to define with exactness. Who are the practitioners, what are their qualifications, and how are you to know them from the mere quack and charlatan? I was struck, in looking through the proceedings when the Bill of 1912 was under discussion, with a speech made by the Honourable Mr. MUNMOHUNDASS RAMJI. He said that in the course of his travels he came across a place where he saw a board over a shop. There was a name on it and below it the letters N. D., F. C. He says that it puzzled him for a long time as to what the letters meant and that after some considerable trouble he ascertained that the letters meant 'Native Doctor, First Class.' Will the Honourable Mr. PATEL tell us if that is to be included in the practitioners of ayurvedic or unani systems? I know one medical man in Bombay. I see him constantly in my walks and ride. I won't say where he is to be found. I notice that five days of the week he attends the infantile population. His treatment mainly consists in saying mantras over them and leaving the rest to nature. The other days of the week he concerns himself with foretelling who will win the Saturday races, and I am told by various riding boys, whom I see around him, that he is quite as successful in choosing winners as in the treatment of infants.

The Honourable Mr. UPASANI.—According to our medicine, he is a doctor who can relieve pain and suffering and that is a medicine which cures.

The Honourable Mr. CURTIS.—I am very grateful to the Honourable Mr. UPASANI for his definition, but I would like to know whether the Honourable Mr. PATEL would be prepared to graft that definition on his bill. But, sir, it seems to me that the main trouble with all these definitions—the trouble was felt in the United Provinces act—is the impossibility of defining accurately what is the ayurvedic system and what practitioners of the ayurvedic system are or are not to be respected. And there are no means of getting over the trouble.

Now, sir, having gone so far in criticism destructive, I am going to do something constructive. It seems to me that the reason why the majority of the speakers have found fault with the Bombay Medical Act was not so much that it stereotyped the qualifications of western medical practitioners, but that it has done nothing to uplift the indigenous systems of medicine. I quite agree. But, sir, that was no part of the objects which the framers of the act set out to achieve. The Honourable Mr. C. V. MEHTA, the Honourable Mr. NAIK and the Honourable Mr. LALUBHAI SAMALDAS have pleaded for a more favourable treatment of ayurvedic medicine and asked Government to consider sympathetically such measures as may possibly be evolved, in order to place ayurvedic medicine on a more satisfactory footing than it exists at present. Speaking for myself and I think on behalf of Government, I have no hesitation whatever in saying that any such movement would have the entire sympathy of Government. If the supporters of ayurvedic medicine want a Medical Council of their own, if they want their own register, if they wish to evolve their own scheme of professional etiquette, their own code of professional conduct and their own regulations, I have not the slightest doubt that Government will receive sympathetically any proposals put before them. We have been making enquiries, and so far the material that has come before us for evolving a scheme of education in Ayurvedic medicine is extremely scanty and the response to our enquiries has been disappointing. But if, as I say, the adherents of the unani school or the ayurvedic school or the hatha yoga school or homeopathy wish to have a register of their own, there is no reason as far as I know, why they should not do so and why legislation should not be undertaken in order to secure that a register can be kept up on proper lines. But, sir, it is not necessary, in order to satisfy those aspirations which are perfectly natural, to pull down what has been done already. You have here an Indian body of professors of western medicine, practising the western code of professional ethics and professional etiquette. It is a body of men on whom, I think, we are entitled to look with very great pride and for whom, as is clearly sketched in the report of the Public Services Commission, a great future is open, if they will adhere to the pursuit of the high ideals which have been laid down for them. It is in order to ensure that the pursuit of these ideals shall be continued on uniform lines and that a large standard of professional conduct shall be maintained that the Medical Registration Act was passed. For you will see that section 13 of the act empowers the Medical Council to inspect educational institutions and standardise the level of education. Now, sir, it is the Honourable Mr. PATEL'S object that the electorate which is responsible for the selection of the Medical Council, shall be partly at least under the thumb of men whose ideas are not those of western medical science, but are, if I may call it,—I do not say tainted—but affected, at any rate, by a leaning to other schools of medicine which have not the same high code of professional ethics and which do not make the same demands of their practitioners. Now, I say, sir, that if anyone thinks that he is going to do any good to ayurvedic medicine in that way, he is sadly mistaken. As I say, the Grant Medical College was brought into being, I think, about 50 years ago. I think Sir Bartle Frere opened it in 1863-64. Therefore the present practitioners of western medicine in this Presidency with their Medical Act and their Medical College (both of them the first of their kind in India), are the product of 50 years' labour and 50 years' support on the part of the officers of Government. I ask you to pause before you do anything which will lower them in the eyes of their confreres in western countries. After all, as regards the one case around which so much eloquence has been spent, I have shown that the Council have not the facts before them, that that case has not yet been decided and I would urge that it would be at any rate more courteous to the distinguished gentlemen who form the Medical Council if the Council waited until the matter had been decided before plunging into legislation.

There are two more small points, and I have done.

The Honourable Mr. HARCHANDRAI originally voted for the passing of the act in 1912. He says that he did so on the promise given by Government that vaids and hakims would not be affected, and that that promise has been broken by the action of the Medical Council. Now I want to remind the honourable gentlemen of what happened in this case. Dr. Popat came to the Medical Council voluntarily. No one compelled him to register. He was not a candidate for any Government appointment. He was not compelled to register under the Lunacy Act or under the Vaccination Act, but he came voluntarily and placed himself under the discipline of the Medical Council. He had been 20 or 25 years in practice in Bombay, and before he joined he was given a warning notice showing clearly what registration involved. Now, sir, is it fair to say that any pledge has been broken or that the rights of vaids and hakims have been interfered with? If Dr. Popat had wished to stay in his college, and turned over his $2\frac{1}{2}$ graduates a year as he has done for the last 20 years, none would have interfered with him. But he deliberately entered into a contract with the Medical Council and bound himself to respect conditions laid down by them. Is it fair to say that any pledge given by Government has been broken, because having done so he is called to account? I think it will be admitted that it is not fair. Again it was said by three speakers that one of the effects of the Medical Council's action – we do not know what that action is to be—would be that the poor man who is about to die and who has been attended by a vaid or hakim could not call in a registered medical practitioner or, if he came, he could not take up the case and he could not ascertain from the vaid what treatment has been followed. I understand from medical men that that is not the case. There is nothing in medical etiquette which prevents a doctor going to a patient who has been under a vaid and to ascertain from the vaid what treatment has been given.

Once more, sir, as regards this bill, it treats of three points. As regards the first matter, I would point out that no case whatever has been put forward for legislation. As regards the second point, we have a bill ready which is far superior to the one now under discussion. As regards the third point, I would implore this Council not to accept a proposal which is bound to spell ruin to an institution which has started well, which promises well and which, I have no doubt, if left alone, will continue to do useful work for many years.

For these reasons I oppose the first reading of the Bill.

The Honourable Mr. VITHALBHAI JHAVERBHAI PATEL.—Your Excellency,—If it is going to embarrass the position of the Medical Council, I should like to postpone further consideration of this bill till the Medical Council has decided the matter before I make any further remarks.

His Excellency the PRESIDENT.—I think the suggestion was already made to the honourable member before and he might have thought of it then.

However, under the circumstances, as he has thrown the onus on Government, we will consider the proposal before we meet this afternoon and I will then inform the honourable member what the verdict of Government is in the matter.

The Council will now adjourn till 2-45.

The Council then adjourned for lunch.

After Lunch.

The Council re-assembled at 2-45 p.m.

His Excellency the President.—Order, order. Before we proceed I wish to refer to the matter that the Honourable Mr. PATEL suggested to Government before lunch, and I may say that after consideration we have come to the conclusion that, as this matter has been under discussion for two days, we had better continue the discussion and come to a decision now.

The Honourable Mr. VITHALBAI JHAVERBHAI PATEL.—Your Excellency,—I should like to point out that so far as the drafting of this bill is concerned, I have not heard any honourable member taking any exception to any particular wording. I remember when at the last meeting of the Council the primary education bill was discussed numerous objections were raised as regards drafting. It is therefore a matter of great satisfaction to me that so far as the draft of this bill is concerned, no objections have been seriously urged by any honourable member. I must, at the same time, your Excellency, bring to the notice of the members of this Council that this particular draft has not been touched up at all by the legal department of your Excellency's Government whilst the original draft of the primary education bill was almost wholesale altered before the bill was allowed to be introduced into this Council.

Much has been said regarding the attitude of the Government of India in respect of the principle involved in this bill. Let me make it perfectly plain that so far as the position of the Government of India is concerned not only in the case of the United Provinces but also so far as our Presidency is concerned, the attitude of the Government of India is the same, namely, that they have no objection whatever to the introduction of a measure of this kind. The bill which we are now considering was reported in the ordinary course to the Government of India, and they have, so far as I understand, taken no exception whatever to the introduction of this measure, and I take it, therefore, that so far as that Government is concerned, they have not the slightest objection or desire to object to the proposed measure. If there is any opposition, it is I am sorry to say from your Excellency's Government and not from the Government of India. The honourable members must take into consideration this point before considering the merits or demerits of the bill. I trust the honourable members appreciate that the Government of India have realized the importance of this measure; they have not come in our way, and yet, unfortunately, your Excellency's Government have taken a very hostile and uncompromising attitude towards this bill.

Before I proceed further, I should like to explain one or two misstatements inadvertently made by the honourable members of the Executive Council during their speeches. My honourable friend Sir MAHADEV CHAUBAL in referring to the rules framed by the Medical Council told this Council that the Honourable Surgeon-General yesterday read those rules out. I pointedly asked my honourable friend Sir MAHADEV CHAUBAL which particular rule he was referring to. He said that the rules referred to were the rules read out by the Honourable Surgeon-General yesterday. Let me tell this Council that the rules read out by the Honourable Surgeon-General yesterday were not the rules framed by the Medical Council of Bombay but were the rules framed by the Medical Council of the United Kingdom from time to time and are in force there. That is one misstatement.

The second misstatement is the one made by the Honourable Mr. CURTIS when he said that a notice or rather a warning was given to Dr. Popat Prabhuram when he applied for registration.

The Honourable Mr. CURTIS:—The additional warning is on the first page of the Bombay Medical Register which is given to every member registering and here are the rules, the penal rules, framed by the Council. They are entirely at the honourable member's disposal.

The Honourable Mr. PATEL.—Well, if the Bombay Medical Register of 1917 is to be considered as a notice to all people who intend to apply for registration I have nothing to say, but at the same time let me read to this Council what the so-called warning is:—

"The employment by any registered practitioner in connection with his professional practice of an assistant who is not duly qualified or registered and the permitting of such unqualified person to attend, treat or perform operations upon patients in respect of matters requiring professional discretion or skill is in the opinion of the Council in its nature fraudulent and dangerous to the public health, and any registered practitioner who is proved to have so offended will be liable to have his name erased from the register."

"Any registered practitioner who by his presence, countenance, advice, assistance or co-operation knowingly enables an unqualified or unregistered person, whether described as an assistant or otherwise, to attend or perform any operation upon a patient in respect of any matter requiring professional discretion or skill, to use or procure the use of any certificate, notification, report or other document of a kindred character or otherwise to encourage any professional practice as if the said person were duly qualified and registered is liable on proof of the facts to have his name erased from the register."

Now, these are the rules which my honourable friend Mr. CURTIS construes as a notice or warning to Dr. Popat. Supposing, for argument's sake, that Dr. Popat had notice of the rules they merely conveyed to him that if he by his presence, countenance, advice, assistance or co-operation knowingly enabled an unregistered practitioner to treat or perform an operation upon a patient in a matter which requires technical skill, his name would be removed from the register.

Now let us see what is the charge against Dr. Popat. For this, I invite the attention of the honourable members to the first letter addressed to Dr. Popat by the Medical Council in June 1915. The letter says:—

"I am directed by the Executive Committee of the Bombay Medical Council to draw your attention to an advertisement regarding the Prabhuram Ayurvedic College, Bombay, which appears over your name in the Jame Jamshed newspaper of the 21st May 1915, and to inform you that the association of your name with the institution in question is incompatible with your status as a registered medical practitioner."

Is there any word in this particular letter of the Medical Council which contains even a suggestion that Dr. Popat was by his countenance, co-operation, advice, assistance or by any other means enabling unqualified people to treat patients or perform operations upon patients? This is the first notice after he registered himself.

The Honourable Mr. CURTIS:—I must beg the honourable member's pardon. There is at this moment a definite charge against Dr. Popat which is under decision by the Medical Council. Before that charge was made correspondence went on for the best part of two years. There are rules which lay down the procedure to be followed. They run as follows: "Where a complaint has been lodged, the complaint and all other documents bearing on the case, shall be submitted by the Registrar to the President, who shall if he thinks fit, instruct the Registrar to ask the practitioner by means of a registered letter for any explanation he may have to offer". The first charge was as regards the association with the college. The Medical Council said they did not propose to take any action with regard to that. At a later stage they have varied the charge to the much more serious one of assisting an unqualified person in carrying out an operation which is the charge at present under discussion and on which the Medical Council has not passed any judgment. That charge is not amongst the papers which the honourable gentleman has got and it was to be heard yesterday. The honourable member may as well restrict his discussion to the matters which are not sub judice.

The Honourable Mr. PATEL:—What I want to point out to this Council is that the first charge against Dr. Popat was as regards his association with the Prabhuram Ayurvedic College.

It appears now the Medical Council according to the Honourable Mr. CURTIS has recently laid against Dr. Popat another charge and a very serious one. This Council knows nothing about it. We are told that the first charge is dropped. I ask why it has been dropped and how long was the accusation in respect of that first charge kept hanging over Dr. Popat. The fact is that for two years the Executive Committee of the Medical Council maintained that the association of Dr. Popat with the ayurvedic institution was infamous conduct within the meaning of the Medical Act. Here is the whole correspondence regarding the first charge. I should like to read it to this Council. The following advertisement appeared in the Jame Jamshed on the 21st May 1915:—

"AYURVEDIC VIDYALAYA.

PRABHURAM AYURVEDIC COLLEGE, BOMBAY.

The new course of the College will begin from the middle of June next. The Entrance Examination will begin on Thursday the 10th June in the College hall. The applications for the Entrance will be accepted till Thursday. the 3rd June. The rules and regulations with the curriculum of the new course will be sent by applying to the Principal.

POPAT PRABHURAM, L.M. & S.,

Bombay, 3rd May 1915. Principal."

Dr. Popat then received the following letters from the Registrar of the Bombay Medical Council:—

Sir,

I have the honour to acknowledge receipt of your letter No. 564, dated 13th October 1915, in reply to my letter of the 23rd August last, enquiring under which rule and regulation of the Bombay Medical Act the association of my name with the Prabhuram Ayurvedic College is incompatible with my status as Registered Medical Practitioner and referring me to section 9 of the Medical Act, and request you to let me know whether the enquiry made is under rule 78 of the rules made under the Medical Act, 1912, and whether any complaint has been made under rule 78 or under rule 75 and in any case let me have a copy of the abstract of information made or copy of complaint if any received with the necessary declaration accompanying it. As soon as I am favoured with this, I shall be able to send my explanations for the consideration of the Council.

I thank the Council for thus affording me an opportunity to offer my explanation and I hope to satisfy the Council that there will be no necessity to make further investigation or to take evidence in the matter.

[11TH OCTOBER 1917.] [Mr. Vithalbhai Jhaverbhai Patel.]

"No. 650.

From

Acting Registrar, Bombay Medical Council;

To

Popat Prabhuram Vaidya, Esq., L.M. & S.

Sir,

I have, etc.,

Office of the Bombay Medical Council,

Bombay, 9th December 1915.

"No. 670.

To

Popat Prabhuram Vaidya, Esq., L.M. & S., Bombay.

Sir,

Referring to your letter, dated 23rd November 1915, I have the honour to state that pending an explanation from you the Executive Committee have not resolved to institute an enquiry under the rule to which you refer.

2. They have merely intimated their opinion to you that your position in connection with the Prabhuram Ayurvedic College is incompatible with your status as a Registered Medical Practitioner and left it to you to take such action or offer such explanation as you might desire.

3. I am now directed to call upon you formally for any explanation you may have to offer justifying the position referred to.

I have, etc.,
(Sd.) Jehangir Barjorji Sanjana,
Ag. Registrar."

Then there is a long letter by Dr. POPAT justifying his position and we now hear that there is another charge against Dr. POPAT of which we do not know anything. But so far as the letters from the 3rd May to November 1915 are concerned, the whole correspondence was to the effect that in the opinion of the Executive Committee of the Medical Council the association of Dr. Popat with the ayurvedic institution was in their opinion incompatible with his status as a registered medical practitioner.

Now I ask this Council to say whether the Medical Council, on the facts disclosed, was justified in treating Dr. POPAT in the manner described in the correspondence.

If this Council is of opinion that the action of the Executive Committee of the Medical Council was wrong, I ask this Council to support this measure so as to prevent such harassment to other registered medical practitioners by the Medical Council in future.

At this stage I should like to make it perfectly clear to my honourable friend Mr. CURTIS and to your Excellency that I have absolutely nothing to do with Dr. POPAT personally. I hold no brief for him nor any other member of this Council does. A suggestion which my honourable friend Mr. CURTIS (he called it his surmise) made was that probably Dr. POPAT had shown me his explanation of April 28th and that thereupon I brought this bill. Well that surmise according to the Honourable Mr. CURTIS was drawn from a comparison by him of my speech delivered yesterday, i.e., on the 10th October 1917 with Dr. POPAT'S explanation of April 28th, 1917.

The Honourable Mr. CURTIS: —That is one fact. The first point is that the honourable member's bill was sent on April 30th and Dr. POPAT'S explanation was sent on the 28th of April.

The Honourable Mr. PATEL:—Dr. POPAT'S explanation was sent to the Bombay Medical Council on the 28th of April 1917 and I brought this bill on the 30th April 1917, and comparing the speech delivered by me on the 10th October 1917 (yesterday) with Dr. POPAT'S explanation of 28th April 1917, my honourable friend Mr. CURTIS jumps to the conclusion—jumps to the surmise, I should call it—that probably this bill was brought by me after seeing the explanation of Dr. POPAT. Well I say that that surmise, with due respect, is as violent as the construction proposed to be put by the Medical Council on the phrase "infamous conduct in any professional respect". I shall not say anything more on that point, because my honourable friend told us that it was a mere surmise, on his part.

The Honourable Mr. CURTIS:—The honourable member can disclaim it.

The Honourable Mr. PATEL:—I thank you. I now come to another point. A good deal has been said about the excellent motives of Government as regards the ayurvedic and unani systems of medicine. It is urged that Government have every sympathy with the ayurvedic and unani systems. These are, of course, words and I ask this Council to judge of the attitude of Government towards the ayurvedic and unani systems not from words, but from actions. Have they, during the course of the last 25 years since this Prabhuram Ayurvedic Institution has been in existence, recognised it by the help of any grants? Have they so far opened a single school for the teaching of the indigenous systems of medicine? Have they done anything to encourage the growth and advancement of the ayurvedic and unani systems of medicine? On the contrary, the facts are—I state them as I know—that the Madras Government have already appointed a special officer to suggest ways and means for the growth and advancement of these systems. I gave notice to your Excellency's Government of my intention to move a resolution recommending the desirability of taking steps to improve ayurvedic and unani systems in this Presidency with the result that it was not even admitted. Now how are we to feel that Government really is anxious to improve the ayurvedic and unani systems of medicine? Are we to judge of these words as words coming from God? What are we to do? Unless Government move in the matter and show by their action that they are really inclined to favour the ayurvedic and unani systems of medicine, I for one hesitate to accept their statement.

Your Excellency, the Honourable Mr. CURTIS, interrupting my honourable friend Mr. BELVI during his speech, asked him whether there were really any western practitioners on the staff of the Prabhuram Ayurvedic College and whether any of them had to resign after the passing of the Medical Registration Act. Well, my Lord, I have got with me the names of those medical practitioners and I can give them to the Council, if necessary.

The Honourable Mr. CURTIS:—What is meant by "had to resign"? My information is that they resigned of their own free will.

The Honourable Mr. PATEL:—My honourable friend Mr. CURTIS tells us that according to his information they resigned of their own free will. But, as a matter of fact, these gentlemen—they were 6 in number—were for five or six years on the staff of Dr. Popat's institution and one fine morning they left the institution shortly after the act was passed. Now I leave it to your Excellency's Government and this Council to judge whether these gentlemen resigned all of a sudden in a body because of the passing of the Medical Registration Act or of their own free will. For 20 years this institution was being conducted. People practising western medicine, people trained in western medicine were on the staff all the time, and yet after the passing of this act they chose to resign. I understand my honourable friend Mr. CURTIS does not want to know the names of these gentlemen.

The Honourable Mr. CURTIS:—No; I quite accept my honourable friend's statement.

The Honourable Mr. PATEL:—Now I propose to say a few words on the criticisms regarding the words "other indigenous systems of medicine" in my bill. My honourable friend Sir MAHADEV CHAUBAL thought that perhaps I intended to protect a class of people who go about in the streets of Poona calling certain names—I was not able to follow the Marathi expression used by him, perhaps my honourable friend will repeat it.

The Honourable Sir MAHADEV CHAUBAL:—They are called naka dolyache vaidu. I further said that they purport to possess specific drugs for specific treatment; that they cry out "Rasashendurmatra" which is a matra for a certain ailment; people call them and they diagnose and treat cases.

The Honourable Mr. PATEL:—Well these people are called naka dolyache vaidu, and my honourable friend wanted to know whether by the use of the expression "other indigenous systems of medicine" they would not also get protection. Let me assure your Excellency and this Council that I have not the slightest desire to include in the term "other indigenous systems of medicine" the systems practised by naka dolyache vaidus. When I drafted this bill I did not even know the existence of the class of people described by Sir MAHADEV CHAUBAL. But I do say however that we should take the people as they are. If one of these naka dolyache vaidu were to treat a patient and that patient is on his deathbed and, as my honourable friend DEWAN BAHADUR GODBOLE put it yesterday, supposing he was inclined to consult my honourable friend Sir TEMULJI NARIMAN, would it or would it not be infamous conduct on the part of Sir TEMULJI if he took up the case and held consultation with that man? What I mean to say is that the association by a registered medical practitioner with such a man for the purpose of finding out what treatment he had so far given to the patient would according to the interpretation proposed to be put by the Medical Council be regarded as infamous conduct.

HIS EXCELLENCY THE PRESIDENT:—I think the honourable member is entirely wrong. As the Honourable Sir TEMULJI says, the first thing for the registered medical practitioner to do would be to ask the vaid what he had been doing with the poor patient and then deal with the situation himself.

The Honourable Mr. PATEL:—Your Excellency,—the words of my bill are "consulting, advising, assisting, encouraging, co-operating, or in any wise associating with medical practitioners adopting the ayurvedic, unani or other indigenous systems of medicine." As I have pointed out to this Council, I have not the slightest desire to include in "other indigenous systems of medicine" systems practised by people who go about calling themselves "naka kancha dacter". But I respectfully submit that unless the discretion vested in the Medical Council is limited, as I propose, a registered medical practitioner will not be safe in associating with such people even for the purpose of enquiry.

HIS EXCELLENCY THE PRESIDENT:—Assuming the honourable member's definition of "other indigenous systems of medicine" would be of rather a vague character, can he tell us where he proposes to draw the line?

The Honourable Mr. PATEL.—Your Excellency,—If these words are vague, of course there is the select committee to go into the question, but so far as the bill relates to ayurvedic and unani systems of medicine I submit there can be no objection whatever to its acceptance.

I would ask honourable members to look at the bill as it stands. The first part, i.e., clause 3 (a) relates to studying and practising the ayurvedic, unani and other indigenous systems of medicine. My honourable friend Dr. ROW says that so far as that proviso is concerned there is no harm.

The Honourable Dr. ROW.—Your Excellency,—What I meant to say was studying and practising if they get the sanction of the men properly qualified to give such sanction.

The Honourable Mr. PATEL.—So then a western medical practitioner who is on the register is not entitled, according to Dr. ROW, to practise or even to study other systems of medicine unless he gets the sanction of the men qualified to give such a sanction.

The Honourable Dr. ROW.—There is no objection to any man studying anything. It is only with regard to practising that there is objection.

The Honourable Mr. PATEL.—Very well, any man can study anything, but if he wants to practise the ayurvedic or unani system of medicine, he must obtain the sanction of a person qualified to give it. That is what I understand my honourable friend Dr. ROW to say.

The Honourable Dr. ROW.—What I said was that with regard to practising there will be no objection to any man practising ayurvedic medicine if he gets the proper sanction and training under the proper ayurvedic vaid. That is what I said.

The Honourable Mr. PATEL.—So, with regard to clause 3 (a), my point is that so far as the first part of it is concerned—studying ayurvedic, unani or other indigenous systems of medicine—there is not the slightest objection according to Dr. ROW for this Council to accept it.

With regard to the second part of clause 3 (a), "practising ayurvedic, unani or other systems of medicine" a person going in for it must get proper training and proper sanction according to Dr. ROW.

Coming to clause 3 (b)—"managing, assisting, encouraging, supporting, co-operating, or in anywise associating with hospitals, asylums, infirmaries, dispensaries or lying-in hospitals, wherein the ayurvedic, unani or other indigenous methods of treatment are carried on"—I would ask honourable members for a moment to leave out of consideration the words "other indigenous systems of medicine and methods of treatment" and confine their attention to the words "ayurvedic and unani methods" and say whether a person who is already on the register should or should not be allowed to encourge or support hospitals, etc., where these two methods of treatment are adopted.

We now come to clause 3 (c). The words are "managing, assisting, encouraging, supporting, co-operating, or in anywise associating with schools, colleges or other institutions, wherein the ayurvedic, unani or other indigenous systems of medicine are taught". This is just what Dr. POPAT is doing.

I have already told this Council in my speech in moving the first reading of this bill the object of the Government of India is, as expressed by His Excellency Lord Hardinge, to modernise the ayurvedic and unani systems in order that 90 per cent. of the people who depend for medical relief mainly on these systems may be benefited. Unless and until a person who is on the register is allowed to manage, encourge or otherwise associate with institutions imparting instruction in the ayurvedic or unani systems of medicine, how are these systems to be modernised? That is the question which I ask this Council to seriously consider. If the position of Government is that it is not the intention of Government to prohibit the doing of such a thing then there should surely be no harm, as my honourable friend Mr. C. V. MEHTA says, to accept this bill. I should like to know definitely from Government what their view really is in this respect. If it is not the intention of Government to put any embargo on a registered medical practitioner, then where is the harm in accepting that part of the bill? It may be said that there is no necessity for it. But, as I put it to this Council, that necessity has arisen because of the attempt of the executive committee of the Bombay Medical Council to hold that the association of Dr. Popat with the Prabhuram Ayurvedic College was incompatible with his status as a registered medical practitioner. Such a sort of construction is, I respectfully submit, not only not conducive, but highly detrimental to the growth and advancement of the ayurvedic and unani systems of medicine, and it is in order that the executive committee of the Medical Council may not in future attempt to put such construction that I have brought forward this amendment.

I have already dealt with clause 3 (d). Of course if the select committee to which the bill may be referred consider the words used as vague or wide, they will look into the matter and recommend the necessary alterations. But so far as the principle is concerned, I believe it is admitted that there should be no objection in the way of a person who is on the medical register to, in the first place, his studying and practising ayurvedic or unani medicine, in the second place his managing and encouraging any hospitals or asylums in which these systems are practised, in the third place his managing institutions teaching these systems, and in the fourth place his associating with people who practise the ayurvedic and unani systems.

I should like to say once more to this Council that it is absolutely impossible to modernise these ayurvedic and unani systems unless and until you allow co-operation between the western and the ayurvedic and unani practitioners. All attempts should therefore be directed towards bringing them together, allowing them to co-operate.

It is said that it is a very difficult task to distinguish between a person who is a vaid or hakim and a person who merely poses as one. The same is the case in England. Take the case of an untrained compounder and a medical practitioner who is on the register. What is there to distinguish between the two? There is no feather on one man's cap so that you could say "here is a man who is not on the register". In England there are no ayurvedic and unani systems of medicine at all, and therefore the English Act merely provides that if a person who is on the register enables an untrained person or an untrained compounder to treat or perform operations which require professional skill, he is guilty of professional misconduct. In this country the conditions are absolutely different. We have got the ayurvedic and unani systems. We have got vaids and hakims. No doubt there are a good many quacks, but it may be left entirely to the good sense of a registered medical practitioner to decide whether the person with whom he is asked to associate is a real vaid or hakim or not.

Now, your Excellency, my honourable friend Mr. PHIROZE SETHNA yesterday talked about the Prabhuram ayurvedic institution rather contemptuously. He said it was situated in some Bhuleshwar quarter, probably in a dirty house, and not in any independent house. I could not understand what he meant, but he gave me the impression that he treated the institution with contempt. I am therefore tempted to read to this Council three or four testimonials that this institution has from time to time received. The Honourable Sir Lawrence Jenkins says:—"I think there can be no doubt that this institution is capable of doing great and good work, and I say this with more confidence when I see on my right and left such distinguished medical experts as Sir Francis Lovell, Dr. Quick, Dr. Turner and Sir Bhalchandra Krishna." The Honourable Sir Narayan Chandavarkar says:—"The institution carries on its operations in a scientific manner. I consider that the institution deserves the support, the sympathy and the patronage of every right-minded man."

His Excellency the PRESIDENT:—I do not think the honourable member need tell us all that. I am sure the hospital is most admirably conducted.

The Honourable Mr. PATEL:—I am glad to hear that Government think that this institution is conducted on very good lines. If that is so, will not Government take the earliest opportunity of encouraging it by substantial grants? As His Excellency thinks that the institution is conducted on very good lines, I will not read the other testimonials.

One thing more and I have done. Two public meetings to support this bill were recently held, one at Bombay and the other at Poona. I do not know whether the report of the Poona meeting has reached Government. It was held only yesterday. The Bombay meeting was presided over by my friend Sir Narayan Chandavarkar and according to my information a representation signed by about 3,000 or 4,000 people was submitted to Government some days ago. But unfortunately the petition so signed is not before us. What I want to point out is that there is a very strong public feeling in favour of this bill.

I quite realise that this Council labours under one very serious disability, and it is this: that we have on this Council medical men, five in number, who all practise the western system of medicine only and who therefore are opposed to the pesent measure. Let me point out to this Council that when the medical bill was discussed in 1912 it was pointed out that a person who really had studied both the western and eastern systems of medicine should have been on the Council. It was my honourable friend Mr. Karandikar who had then pointed out that the supporters of that measure were all representative medical men who had studied and were practising the western medicine only and there was none on the Council to represent the other side. Now it is a curious coincidence that most of the honourable members who are supporting this bill are all laymen, while the five medical men on this Council express themselves very strongly against it. Under the circumstances, I think my honourable friend Mr. BELVI was perfectly right when he stated yesterday that Government should have taken the opportunity of nominating at least one expert to represent the other side. We who support this measure are all laymen, and there were already three medical men on this Council representing the western view. They are the Honourable Colonel JENNINGS in the place of the Honourable Lieut.-Colonel JACKSON, the Honourable Surgeon General and the Honourable Dr. FERNANDES. Under these circumstances, I do think that Government should have in all fairness appointed at least one medical man to represent the eastern system of medicine. It is a pity that Government instead of adopting such a course, did the reverse. They have nominated Dr. ROW and Sir TEMULJI who have never studied the eastern systems of medicine. However that may be, we must take things as they are.

With regard to the second clause the only opponents are my honourable friend Dr. FERNANDES and the honourable Mr. SETHNA. It was very rightly pointed out by the Honourable Mr. CHUNILAL MEHTA that when a resolution was discussed in March last neither of these two gentlemen had to say anything against it. Of course people are entitled to change their opinions. But I do think that if these gentlemen really thought that sub-assistant surgeons were undesirable people to sit with honourable gentlemen of the position of Dr. ROW and Sir TEMULJI NARIMAN on the Medical Council, they should have opposed the resolution then on that ground. I most respectfully submit that the course which they now adopt in this Council amounts to a vote of censure on the whole Council.

Now with regard to the first clause of this bill dealing with the question of elective majority, the Honourable the Surgeon-General LYONS and the Honourable Lieut.-Colonel JENNINGS are the only opponents. I know that Government also opposes this part of the bill. But I trust that in these days of democracy and the growth of public opinion the principle of elective majority on the Medical Council will be conceded, particularly when the Medical Council attempts to put on the phrase "infamous conduct" such a violent construction. I think it is high time when all the interests of the profession should be represented on the Medical Council by election and not by nomination. I think we have had enough of nominations in the past and the sooner we abolish the system of nomination, the better for the Government and the country.

With these few words I trust the Council will accept the first reading of the bill.

His Excellency the PRESIDENT:—I do not propose to detain honourable members for more than a very few moments after the various speeches that we have heard on both sides with regard to this particular bill. But I would like first of all to draw the attention of the Council to this fact, that we have been for two days discussing an amending bill on a purely hypothetical question, which is to be decided in a few weeks' time by the Medical Council and which will finally come up for the approval of Government.

I am bound to say that this seems to be rather an unsatisfactory expenditure of our time and—I am bound to say this much further, notwithstanding what my honourable friend Mr. PATEL has said—I am inclined to think that, if there had been no Dr. Popat's case, there would have been no amending bill. I consider myself justified in making that remark because—I do not know whether honourable members noticed the phrase at the time—when my honourable colleague intervened with regard to a certain statement made by my honourable friend Mr. DESAI, the Honourable Mr. DESAI lapsed into rather professional language and informed the Council that "his instructions were so and so". So it is quite evident that he arrived here with his brief very carefully prepared with regard to that particular case.

Now I do not want to enter into any controversial matter, but I want to put before this Council one point only, as fairly as I can, which I trust will bring us to a satisfactory conclusion with regard to this bill. It is a point of which I do not think enough has been made; it is a point which I seriously think is one of extreme importance. I am informed, rightly or wrongly (I believe rightly because I have taken the highest medical advice), that it is impossible to assimilate these two particular methods of medicine, the eastern and the western. They start from a different foundation and they are carried on by different methods. The western method—I am not going into the various 'ologies' because I do not remember them—pursues the most scientific methods of research and is progressing daily in its development. The eastern method—and I think everybody must agree to this—originates from, I understand, various ancient writings in Sanskrit and other languages. It has not developed, it has not advanced in any form or shape, and cannot take its stand side by side with western science for the present. Well, that is the crux of the argument I wish to put before you now. If it be true that you cannot assimilate these two methods, I beg to point out that this particular clause, the third clause, in the amending bill, that my honourable friend has brought forward, will tend to do away with what I call the hall-mark of what is at the present moment the most progressive medical science that we have in this country.

He wishes, as far as I understand him, to give full liberty to any medical man who is a registered medical practitioner at the same time to practise, study and associate himself generally with all the development of ayurvedic medicine. Well, I am bound to say that in the present condition of ayurvedic medical science that seems to me to be a perfectly impossible proposition. I would further emphasise this remark by adding that I have been informed by the Honourable Dr. ROW that he has for long been trying to get some of the drugs for purposes of experiment and research and in order to advance encourage this particular form of medicine. And what is the result? It is impossible, I am told, to extract a prescription from the gentlemen got these drugs, and that is the main difficulty which has now to be Well, if I have persuaded the Council that it is impossible to assimilate at the present time these two forms of medicine, surely the right way to go to work is to try and encourage in every possible way the development and efficiency of the ayurvedic and unani systems of medicine. My honourable colleague has told the Council that we are anxious and ready to help these systems of medicine in every way we can. But if we are to do that, we must get the assistance of honourable members and their friends in order that we may know who are the right people to apply to in order, as I hope, to start an institution and have a register and enable the two systems to work side by side, so that they may be mutually helpful for the further advancement of medical science in future years. Government is perfectly prepared to help ayurvedic and unani and other indigenous systems of medicine; I do not quite know what the last means, but the others are systems the study of which is believed to be useful and profitable, and if honourable members will take it from me that we are anxious to help them in every way, but that we do not believe that it is a sound plan to adopt the proposal made by my honourable friend Mr. PATEL in his amending bill, and practically do away with what I have called the hall-mark of the medical profession as now organised, I sincerely trust that they will refuse to accept the bill which is before the Council.

For, as I said at the outset, this bill, as I think every honourable member knows, is really a bill with regard to an individual and I must impress upon honourable members once more that this particular matter with regard to this individual ought not to be before the Council and ought not to be discussed by the Council. It is for the Medical Council in the first place and then afterwards for the Governor in Council to decide the matter.

That is all I have to say with regard to this measure; I have put before you exactly what I feel in the matter. I believe that Government could, if we get the proper support, start a real system of ayurvedic medicine, and we are perfectly ready to do so. But as matters stand, I am fully convinced that this bill should not be accepted by the Council. I have placed my views, I hope in no controversial way, before the Council, in order that I may tell them exactly what I feel, and with my knowledge of this Council I can leave it with absolute confidence to honourable members to take such action in the division as will make each individual absolutely sure that by his action he is promoting to the greatest possible extent the highest interests of medical research in the future.

The motion was then put to the vote and lost. The Council divided as follows :—

The Honourable Mr. PATEL :—Your Excellency,—I rise to a point of order as to whether the gentlemen who were nominated in connection with my bill have got to vacate their seats or not.

His Excellency the President :—I think the honourable member is correct that those two honourable members must disappear.

MOTIONS OF WHICH NOTICE HAS BEEN RECEIVED.

His Excellency the President :—The Honourable Sir MAHADEV CHAUBAL.

The Honourable Sir MAHADEV BHASKAR CHAUBAL :—Your Excellency,—The motion which stands in my name is to the effect that the amendments to the rules for the conduct of business, recommended by the select committee, be adopted. I think it would be more convenient to me and perhaps to honourable members of the Council if, in making this motion, instead of going into the details of each particular amendment I refer to the three points which have been dealt with in the majority report which the select committee have submitted to the Council. You will find on a reference to it that there are three main questions of principle into which the different amendments referred to the select committee resolve themselves. Now of those three points the first relates to the necessity or otherwise of a definition of the expression "member in charge".

Although according to the draft of the amendments submitted by the majority report of the select committee no definition of the expression is considered necessary, the question arose in this way. The Honourable Mr. PATEL had given notice of an amendment to rule 21 of our rules, by which he proposed that the member in charge should be the chairman of the select committee to which a bill is referred. If this amendment were accepted, it would become necessary to define the expression "member in charge", for the expression nowhere occurs in the existing rules. As the honourable member's amendment for the first time proposed to use that expression, I gave notice of an amendment proposing a definition of the expression in accordance with the definition of the same expression in the other three sets of rules relating to the budget, the resolutions and questions.

The Honourable Mr. BELVI :—I wish to know, your Excellency, whether the expression is "member in charge" or "member in charge of the bill".

The Honourable Sir MAHADEV CHAUBAL.—I was referring only to the expression "member in charge" and not of the matter of which he may be in charge: that may be either a bill or any other matter. But the select committee thought—at least the majority did—that if the expression were used in any fresh rule, it ought to carry the same meaning as was given to it in the three other sets of the rules of the Legislative Council, I mean the rules relating to the financial statement and the budget, the rules relating to resolutions on questions of general public interest and the rules relating to questions. The references to these definitions in the other rules are at pages 204, 219 and 225 of the green book.

It seemed natural to the majority of the select committee that if it was necessary to define that expression for the purpose of the conduct of legislative business, the member in charge of a bill should be the member of the Executive Council to whom may be allotted the business of the department of Government to which the subject of a bill or any other matter may refer. It seemed further appropriate to them that such member should invariably be a member of the select committee to which any bill or other matter might be referred: and for the reasons stated in the report, if he was to be a member of the committee it seemed to them proper and correct that he should serve on such committee as its chairman.

It will be seen that present rules 21 and 27 contemplate matters other than bills being referred to select committees, and the rule as proposed by the majority report would be convenient whatever be the matter referred to a select committee.

Further, the rule as proposed by the majority is in accord with the rules of the Imperial Legislative Council. There the provision is that the law member shall invariably be a member of each select committee and that he shall be the chairman unless he waives his right, in which case, any other person may be appointed, or the member who introduces the bill may be appointed chairman. For these reasons the majority of the select committee thought that for the purposes of any select committee which might be appointed for the purposes contemplated by rule 21 of our rules, the person who ought to be primâ facie the chairman of the select committee should be the member of the Executive Government to whose portfolio the particular subject of the bill or matter referred to the select committee belongs. That is the first question which is dealt with in the select committee's report.

The second question relates to the amendment of the Honourable Mr. PATEL by which he proposed that the step in our present procedure of legislation, which is known as "motion for leave to introduce," should be dropped altogether. As at present rule 28 runs as follows:—

"(1) Subject to the provisions of the Indian Councils Acts, 1861 and 1892, any member may move at a meeting of the Council for leave to introduce a bill."

The Honourable Mr. PATEL'S contention was or is that this step in legislation, of "motion for leave to introduce", was unnecessary and should be omitted and we should begin straight off from the introduction stage. As regards this, the select committee have pointed out that taking the language of section 80 (1) it is not possible to do away with that stage of legislation. Section 80 on page 41 of the green book runs this way:—

"(1) At a meeting of the local legislative council no motion shall be entertained other than a motion for leave to introduce a measure into the Council for the purpose of enactment, or having reference to a measure introduced or proposed to be introduced into the Council for that purpose, or having reference to some rule for the conduct of business in the Council, and no business shall be transacted other than the consideration of those motions or the alteration of those rules."

That is the section of the Government of India Act which recognizes and practically states that so far as this Legislative Council is concerned the only motion that it can entertain is a motion for leave to introduce. It is the first and initial step in any legislation which the local Legislative Council may undertake and it is ultra vires for this Council to consider whether in spite of the act this initial procedure is necessary. This is as you will see the decision that the select committee came to on the actual proposal for the amendment of rule 28 of which Mr. PATEL had given notice. In paragraph 2 of the majority report, however, they have further considered a point on which there was no notice of amendment, but which was allowed to be discussed before the select committee as being germane to the first point dealt with in paragraph 2.

This is the second point dealt with in the second paragraph of the majority report. The Honourable Mr. PATEL'S contention on this point rather touches present clause 5 of rule 28, as regards which there was strictly no notice of any amendment. That contention is that if the "motion for leave to introduce" stage is necessary, it ought to be equally obligatory in the case of Government bills as in the case of bills introduced by private members. The majority report has stated fully the points of difference between Government measures and measures introduced by private members. It states the considerations which ordinarily make it necessary for Government to have longer time for consideration and consultation with the Government of India and the Secretary of State. But let me clearly state to the Council that clause 5 as it stands makes no difference whatsoever between private bills and Government bills. I am free to concede that in the past the Governor has invariably permitted the publication of a Government bill without any motion for leave to introduce having been made. That has been so because of the considerations mentioned above—because the consideration and consultation with the higher authorities which can only be undertaken in the case of private bills after the motion for leave and before the introduction has already been gone through previous to such publication. But the point I wish to emphasise is that the rule as it stands recognises no distinction as such between private bills and Government bills. The rule gives a discretion to the Governor to dispense with the motion for leave to introduce: and he may exercise that discretion as much in the case of private bills as in the case of Government bills. As you are all aware, private members' bills are comparatively a very recent feature: so far as I know there have been hitherto only four legislative measures proposed in this Council by private members: and in 50 per cent. of these the Governor dispensed with the initial stage as in the case of Government measures.

I will only add here that the Honourable Mr. PATEL has in his dissenting minute quoted an extract from a despatch of a former Secretary of State emphasising the necessity of a motion for leave in the case of all bills whatsoever. But he has not stated what followed this despatch. The Government of India strongly protested against the view taken by the Secretary of State explaining to him the reasons for this latitude in the case of Government measures with the result that the Secretary of State admitted the correctness of the position taken by the Government of India and directed that that view should be carried out not by different rules for the two kinds of bills—but by giving to the Governor General or the Governor the discretion to permit introduction by publication without any motion for leave: a decision which you find embodied in the present clause 5 of rule 28 and corresponding rules previous to the present ones.

This rule giving the discretion to the Governor has now been in force ever since 1865. In support of the view taken by the majority of the select committee I may further mention that the rule as recommended by them is the rule which is now adopted in the Imperial Council.

The third and last point to which the report refers is the one arising on section 80, clause 2 of the Government of India Act, 1915—on this point the majority report observes :—

" We considered the question whether leave to introduce a bill must be dispensed with in the case of bills that require the sanction of the Governor; and we think it is more in accord with the spirit of sections 79 and 80 of the Government of India Act, 1915, that the sanction should have been given previous to the motion for leave to introduce. This recommendation, we may mention, is in accord with the decision on the question in the Madras Legislative Council and in accordance with the rules in force in the Imperial Legislative Council." I think these are very good reasons why the construction which the select committee has put upon clause 2 of section 80 of the Government of India Act, 1915, should be adopted. You will probably agree with me that it is in every way convenient that the Governor should be given the opportunity of considering whether he should accord his support and sanction to a measure which is going to affect the revenues of the province, before the time of this Council is taken up, it may be, absolutely fruitlessly, and that the motion for leave to introduce or the first initial step for the conduct of any piece of legislation should come after the necessary sanction has been given. Otherwise, the Council will be in the anomalous position of solemnly giving leave for the introduction of a bill which may not subsequently be sanctioned. It is not a very dignified state of things for this august body to pass a decision granting leave to a member to introduce a measure and when in accordance with such leave granted the member proposes to act up to the decision by introducing the bill the Governor should say to him; " You shall not do anything of the kind". Nor is it a very desirable state of things. If the sanction of the Governor is at any time necessary, I think it is right and proper that the advisability of giving that sanction or otherwise should be considered by the Governor at the time when the first step in legislation has to be taken. If you make a reference to section 79, clause (3), it runs as follows :—

" (2) The local legislature of any province may not, without the previous sanction of the Governor-General, make or take into consideration any law;" (relating to certain subjects mentioned as (a) to (h). I ask honourable members what construction they will put upon this clause. There the words are " making any law " or "-take into consideration any law." Would you construe it as meaning that a local legislature may pass a motion for leave to introduce and may actually introduce any measure relating to the subjects mentioned therein, but that it shall not be made into a law before the sanction of the Governor-General has been given. No, obviously no step in any legislation whatsoever can be considered without the previous sanction of the Governor-General. Similarly where a previous sanction of the Governor is spoken of in section 80 (2) it must mean that no consideration whatever of any measure affecting the revenues of the province can be undertaken before the previous sanction. Lastly as stated in the majority report, this identical point was discussed at length in the Madras Legislative Council only last March, and your select committee's report is in accord with the decision arrived at there. The Honourable Mr. PATEL and the Honourable Mr. PATHAN have dissented for the reasons they have given, which are before you. It is for you to consider what view you will take but for the reasons I have mentioned I move that the majority report of the select committee be adopted by this Council.

The Honourable Mr. VITHALBHAI JHAVERBHAI PATEL :—Your Excellency,—Will it not be better to take the amendments one by one so that they may be considered separately?

His Excellency the PRESIDENT :—I think it would probably be desirable to take all the amendments of the honourable members one by one and the result whatever it may be can be put to the vote as a whole as a substantive propositicn.

The Honourable Mr. VITHALBHAI JHAVERBHAI PATEL :—Your Excellency,—The amendment which I propose to move is stated on the agenda paper. It is :—

(a) After sub-rule (5) of rule 1 of the said rules, the following sub-rule shall be inserted :—

"(6) 'Member' means an ordinary or additional member of the Council."

(b) Rule 21 of the said rules shall be numbered sub-rule (1) of rule 21, and the following sub-rules shall be added thereto :—

"(2) The member in charge of a Bill shall invariably be a member of the select committee to which the Bill is referred. Such member shall also be the chairman of the select committee, unless he waives the right to be chairman, in which case the members present shall appoint their own chairman. In the absence of the chairman at any meeting the members present shall appoint a chairman for that meeting.

(3) The chairman shall have power to report to the Governor the name of any member who is unable to attend the meeting of the select committee or, by death, resignation or otherwise ceases to be a member thereof, and the Governor may thereupon, appoint, out of the members of the Council, another member in his place."

This is the first amendment which I move to the amendments proposed by the select committee. The question at issue is whether, when a non-official member brings in a bill, the member of the Executive Council in charge of the department concerned should be the chairman of the select committee or the member introducing the bill should be the chairman. The contention of the majorty of the members of the select committee is that invariably the Executive member in charge should be not only a member of that committee, but he should also be its chairman. The amendment propsed by the select committee and as put before the Council by the Honourable Sir MAHADEV CHAUBAL takes no note of the introducer of the bill. It does not matter, according to that amendment, whether the member introducing the bill is a member of the select committee or not, but it says that a member of the Executive Council shall invariably be a member of that committee. So it practically comes to this, Your Excellency, that it does not matter if a member introducing a bill is a member of the select committee to which it is referred but a member of the Executive Council shall be a member of that committee. This is the first point.

I respectfully submit to this Council that an additional member who introduces a bill into this Council should invariably be appointed a member of that committee. It may be that it is also necessary that a member of the Government should also be there, but I would but it to the Council to consider whether it is not more necessary that a member introducing the bill should always be there. Now the rule proposed is that a member of the Government should invariably be a member. If you agree with me that a member introducing a bill should invariably be a member of the committee, then you are bound to vote in favour of my amendment.

Then the second question is, who should be the chairman? Here the position is this. The amendment proposed by the majority of the select committee is that the member of Government shall invariably be the chairman of that committee. Now it may be that under certain circumstances it may not be desirable to include a member of Government in a particular committee. It may be that the member for Government has expressed himself strongly against a particular bill which is referred to the select committee and that the Council in the exercise of its judgment may decide that the member for Government should not be a member of that committee. In that case what would be the position? The rule that the select committee asks this Council to adopt is that the member in charge of the department concerned shall be invariably the chairman of the committee. So necessarily the Council is bound to put him as a member. The danger, in some cases, is, as I have pointed out, obvious. Take, for instance, the bill which we discussed a little while ago. If this bill, in spite of the opposition of Government, had been passed by this Council and referred to a select committee and if my honourable friend Mr. CURTIS was made the chairman, how could he have guided the deliberations of the committee. We know how very vehemently he opposed the principle of that bill. It is not fair to the Honourable Mr. CURTIS himself, much less to the introducer of the bill. In all constitutional meetings the chairman is always a person who has sympathy with the objects of that meeting. Now here is a point which I ask the Council to consider, when a member of the Executive Council has opposed the principle of a bill, is it right that he should be the chairman of the select committee? And is it not absolutely necessary that the member introducing a bill should invariably be a member of the select committee?

The Honourable Sir MAHADEV CHAUBAL:—As a matter of fact, the honourable member never raised this question before the select committee in this way. Nobody ever suggested or dreamt of keeping the member introducing a bill out of the select committee. Everybody understood—I did and I think all the members of the select committee did—that he was, of course, to be a member, and if it is suggested by my honourable friend that there was any opposition to that motion, I do not think that it is correct, and, so far as that motion is made, I am quite prepared to admit that along with the Executive Council member in charge the member who introduces a bill should also invariably be a member of the select committee.

The Honourable Mr. PATEL:—The original amendment proposed by me was that a member introducing a bill shall invariably be a member as well as the chairman. The select committee considered the amendment and suggested another amendment instead, namely, that a member of the Government shall invariably be a member and also the chairman of the committee. Now these are the two amendments before us.

The Honourable Sir MAHADEV CHAUBAL:—I beg the Honourable Mr. PATEL'S pardon. No doubt the select committee did recommend that; but they have never said anywhere that the member introducing a bill shall not be a member. And, therefore, if the Honourable Mr. PATEL makes that motion, I am quite prepared to admit that the member introducing a bill shall invariably be a member of the select committee.

The Honourable Mr. PATEL:—All I want to point out to the Council is that the rule as proposed by the select committee makes no such provision. What I propose is that a member who introduces a bill shall invariably be a member of the select committee, and I go further and say that he shall also be the chairman. You will find there the rules in Bengal, Madras, Burma and also in the Punjab support my case. I will ask the Council to refer to my minute of dissent on page 844 of the Bombay Government Gazette, dated the 21st September. Rules 25 and 26 of the Burma Legislative Council rules are as follows :—

"25. The Government Advocate General, if he is the member of the Council, shall be a member of every select committee.

It was pointed out to the select committee, if I remember right, that the word 'member' is nowhere defined in the other Legislative Council rules. As a matter of fact, in the Madras and the Bengal rules I find that the word is defined. According to those rules a member means a member of the Executive Council or additional member. After thus defining the expression 'member' the rules further provide that the member in charge of the bill shall invariably be a member and also the chairman of the select committee. There is no question as to what the expression means. Rule 10 of the Punjab rules says :—

"The member in charge of the bill shall be the chairman of the committee and in the case of equality of votes shall have a second or casting vote."

Rule 35 (1) of the Bengal rules says :—

"35. (1) The member in charge of a bill shall ordinarily be the chairman of any select committee to which the bill is referred."

Rules 34 and 35 of the Assam rules say :—

"34. The Legal Remembrancer, if he is the member of the Council, shall be a member of every select committee."

So it is certain that according to the rules of the other provincial Legislative Councils the member in charge of the bill, whether he is a member of the Executive Council, or the additional member, becomes the chairman of the committee to which the bill is referred.

It was in connection with my primary education bill that I had occasion to refer to the rules of our Council on this subject. I found that there was no provision whatever in our rules. Then I looked up other Legislative Council rules. I there found express provision. I therefore gave notice for the necessary amendment of our rules. After I gave notice Government wrote to me inquiring whether I would be prepared to accept their suggestion, to substitute the words 'executive member' for the word 'member' in my amendment. I respectfully declined to accept the suggestion and the matter was referred to the select committee. They have made the report which we are considering. The minute of dissent of my Honourable friend Mr. PATHAN is very important in this connection. It says as follows :—

"The first question is whether an additional member of the Legislative Council, if he happens to introduce any bill, should not preside over the deliberations of the select committee to which the bill is referred. The official members contend that the member of the Executive Council, possessing, as he does, greater knowledge of the subject-matter than the introducer of the bill, would be very useful, if he were the chairman of the committee. Assuming for argument's sake that he does possess greater knowledge, I agree with the Honourable Mr. PATEL that there is no reason to suppose that he would not give the benefit of that knowledge, if he were merely a member."

I do not believe, Your Excellency, that a member of the Executive Government, if he is newly a member of the select committee, would not give the benefit of his knowledge, if he has any knowledge, to the other members of that committee.

I have already pointed out then when he has opposed a particular measure at its first reading then it is not right that he should be the chairman of the select committee. An invariable rule that he should in all cases be the chairman would be therefore detrimental to public interest. By my amendment I propose that wherever the member introducing the bill waives his right to be the chairman the member of the Executive Government may take the chair, but the rule that invariably in all cases the member of the Executive Government should be the chairman of the select committee will not, I hope, be accepted by this Council. In the first place it is necessary to define the expression 'member' as it is defined in the Bengal and the Madras Legislative Council rules, and therefore the first part of my amendment says that the expression 'member' means the member of the Executive Government or additional member, and then further provides that the member in charge of the bill shall invariably be a member and shall also be the chairman of the select committee.

We are often told that ours is a very forward province and that we lead other provinces. I wish that was true. Here is an instance where we are far behind the sister Presidencies. Let us therefore follow the lead of other provinces in this matter.

With these few words I move my amendment.

The Honourable Mr. ABDUL KADIR alias FAKIR MAHOMED walad IBRAHIM KHAN PATHAN.—Your Excellency,—I support the amendment of my honourable friend Mr. PATEL.

The honourable mover proposes that there should be a definition regarding the expression "member in charge". So far as the wording proposed by my honourable friend Mr. PATEL is concerned it runs thus:—"The member in-charge of a bill shall invariably be a member of the select committee to which the bill is referred. Such member also shall be the chairman of the select committee, unless he waives the right to be chairman, in which case the members present shall appoint their own chairman. In the absence of the chairman at any meeting the members present shall appoint a chairman for that meeting".

With regard to a private bill an additional member moving or introducing a bill and in the case of a Government bill the member of the Executive Council would be the member in charge of that bill and there is to my mind no ambiguity about this expression. If there is, if the Council found that there would be some ambiguity about this expression, I think, the definition as proposed by my honourable friend Mr. PATEL which I read just now would remove the ambiguity altogether.

The Honourable Mr. PATEL has given all the reasons why the introducer of a bill should invariably be a member of the select committee and on behalf of the Government it has been admitted that he should be a member of the select committee. But the question is whether he should also be the chairman. So far as a Government bill is concerned, the member of the Executive Council shall invariably according to this rule be chairman of the select committee. The dispute is with regard to a private bill. I submit, that when an additional member, after mature consideration and after considering the several circumstances which have given rise to the bill, moves the bill, he is naturally and ought to be interested in seeing that it receives due consideration at the hands of the select committee. I submit, therefore that he should in the fitness of things be the chairman of the select committee.

The Honourable Sir MAHADEV CHAUBAL:—Will the honourable member pardon me. He is hardly audible at this distance. I should like to know whether the honourable member is moving the amendment which stands in his name or he is supporting the Honourable Mr. PATEL'S amendment.

COUNCIL BUSINESS RULES.

[11TH OCTOBER 1917.]

[Mr. Abdul Kadir alias Fakir Mahomed walad Ibrahim Khan Pathan; Sir Mahadev Chaubal; Mr. Balkrishna Sitaram Kamat; the President; Mr. Dattatraya Venkatesh Belvi.]

The Honourable MR. PATHAN :—I am supporting the amendment moved by my Honourable friend Mr. PATEL and I am moving my amendment also, because it is with regard to rule 21 and because it bears on the main question. The amendment proposed by the Honourable Mr. PATEL and that proposed by me bear on the same question and so I propose also my amendment.

The Honourable SIR MAHADEV CHAUBAL.—The honourable member is putting the Council into a rather awkward position, because the Honourable Mr. PATEL has moved an amendment to the Select Committee's Report which is put down on the agenda paper and if the Honourable Mr. Pathan thinks that the amendment of which he has given notice is covered by the amendment which the Honourable Mr. PATEL has moved (for I just now heard him saying that his amendment was virtually the same)—I do not see any reason why the Council should have these two amendments put to it separately when they really are the same.

The Honourable MR. PATHAN :—I beg to withdraw my amendment, your Excellency.

The amendment was by leave withdrawn.

The Honourable Mr. BALKRISHNA SITARAM KAMAT:—May I ask your Excellency's ruling with regard to the procedure to be adopted? The Honourable Sir MAHADEV CHAUBAL has spoken about both the topics, whereas I find that the Honourable Mr. PATEL has so far only introduced one amendment under which an additional member introducing a bill will be both a member of the select committee and its chairman. Are we to discuss both together or to take them separately?

His Excellency the PRESIDENT :—My honourable colleague made his speech on the whole report with regard to the amendments that have been proposed by the select committee and my honourable friend Mr. PATEL has moved his motion with regard to the first amendment. So we shall take them one by one.

The Honourable Mr. DATTATRAYA VENKATESH BELVI :—Your Excellency,—If I understand aright, we are discussing the amendment of my honourable friend Mr. PATEL which is on page 2 of the agenda. It is evident from the amendment proposed by my Honourable friend Mr. PATEL that he wishes to have a definition of the expression "member in charge of the bill", and not, as is supposed, of the expression "member in charge". That is what I find in his original motion. The original motion of the Honourable Mr. PATEL is to be found on page 8 of the papers which have been placed on the tables of the honourable members. There the Honourable Mr. PATEL says :—"The member in charge of a bill shall invariably be a member and also the chairman of any select committee to which the bill is referred", and so on. So it is evident from the language of the motion originally made by my Honourable friend Mr. PATEL that he has used the expression "member in charge of the bill". I am really surprised to find that my Honourable friend Sir MAHADEV CHAUBAL has taken only a part of the words, "member in charge", and he has laboured a point which does not arise at all. The amendment suggested in the rule is quite definite. The Honourable Mr. PATEL wishes to have a particular amendment introduced into the rules which regulate the conduct of legislative business of this Council. There are 45 rules and among the 45 there is rule No. 21. Mr. PATEL'S idea is that there should be a supplementary rule and that should be numbered as 21(A). I do not really understand how a shrewd lawyer of the position of Sir MAHADEV CHAUBAL fell into what I consider to be an error. "The member in charge of the bill" is the expression which has been originally used. If you take the whole expression "the member in charge of the bill", there will be no difficulty whatever. My Honourable friend Sir MAHADEV CHAUBAL'S difficulty seems to be that the expression "member in charge" occurs elsewhere in the green book and he fancies that there will be a great difficulty and he wishes to have, in lieu of the expression which Mr. PATEL wishes to have, his elaborate phraseology, namely, "The member of the Executive Council, to whom is allotted the business of the department of Government to which the matter referred to the select committee belongs, shall invariably be a member of the select committee. Such member shall be the chairman of the select committee unless he waives his right to be chairman, in which case the members present shall appoint their own chairman. In the absence of the chairman at any meeting the members present shall appoint a chairman for that meeting." The matter is very plain and I really do not see why such an attempt has been made to give a definition of a thing which Mr. PATEL never wanted. It is quite clear to me and it may be put down in popular English in this way. Whoever introduces a bill must be considered to be the member in charge of the bill and for the purposes of the bill he should invariably be a member of the select committee that may be appointed to consider that bill and he should also be the chairman of the select committee. That is the statement in plain English of what the Honourable Mr. PATEL wants.

Then the Honourable Mr. PATEL'S amendment says that the member who introduces a bill, whether he is an additional member or whether he is a member of the Executive Council of Your Excellency's Government, should invariably be a member of the select committee. Now, in reply to this we are told by the Honourable Sir MAHADEV CHAUBAL that he is prepared to accept an amendment to the effect that so far as the inclusion of the name of the mover of the bill is concerned, he is prepared to accept the amendment that he should be a member of the select committee. But it is curious that this did not occur to my Honourable friend Sir MAHADEV CHAUBAL when he gave notice of his own amendment. On the contrary, he has been very careful to say that the member of the Executive Council to whom is allotted the business of the department of Government to which the matter referred to the select committee belo gs, shall invariably be a member of the select committee, and now he say that he is prepared to accept the amendment. It is very good of him, for if that amendment is not accepted it means that it may rest in the discretion of this Council either to include or to exclude the mover of the bill, because that would depend entirely upon the discretion of the members of this Council. So far as that amendment is concerned, I am glad to learn that the Honourable Sir MAHADEV is good enough to accept it.

Members of this Council will see by referring to the report of the majority of the select committee that two or three reasons have been advanced as to why the member of the Executive Council who is in charge of the department to which a particular bill belongs should invariably be the chairman of the select committee. The first reason is that generally he is better posted in the facts of a case which leads up to the framing of a bill or, at any rate, he is in a better position to have accurate knowledge of the circumstances leading up to the introduction of the bill, and therefore he should be a member of the select committee. I believe these are sound reasons. I do not dispute for a moment the validity of the contention that the member of the Executive Council who is in charge of the department to which a particular piece of legislation may belong should be a member of the select committee. But then we are told in paragraph 2 of the report of the majority of the select committee this wonderful thing :—

> "We are further of opinion that if once it be conceded that the member of the Executive Council in charge of the department concerned should be a member of the select committee, it is but in the fitness of things that he should be chairman, unless he is prepared to waive his right to be so."

I would like to ask why, in the first place, we should assume that the member of Government who happens to be in charge of the particular department to which a bill may refer should be assumed to possess any right to preside over the deliberations of the select committee as a matter of right. So far as I can make out it appears to be so far two reasons. The idea seems to me to be that it is infra dig for a member of Government to be a member of a select committee and to play only second fiddle to the mover of a bill if he happens to be an additional member and the chairman of a select committee. That is derogatory to the dignity of such a superior being as a member of the Executive Council of Your Excellency's Government. The second notion seems to me that if any particular matter comes to the question of voting, the chairman should have the benefit of a casting vote.

The Honourable Sir MAHADEV CHAUBAL:—May I ask the honourable member where he gets that? Is there any provision in our rules for a casting vote anywhere for the chairman of a select committee?

The Honourable Mr. BELVI:—I have been a member of more committees than one and I have very often seen it. I think this is one of the reasons why the Honourable Sir MAHADEV wishes to empower a member of the Executive Council to preside over the deliberations of every select committee. His idea appears to be that a member of the Executive Council should not be an ordinary member of a select committee. He is a superior man and therefore he must be the chairman, and then if he is the chairman and if any particular matter comes to vote, he will have two votes instead of one.

His Excellency the PRESIDENT:—I am sorry that the honourable member has got such a poor opinion of the members of the Executive Council.

The Honourable Mr. BELVI:—Your Excellency will pardon me if I state my views bluntly. I shall not be doing justice to myself if I did not say what I feel. The days when matters of prestige and matters of superiority of members of the Executive Council even in matters of legislation should be taken into consideration have passed away. So far as legislative business is concerned, my submission is that we are all on the same footing and that no question of dignity should ever be raised. It should be all the same who presides over the deliberations of a select committee. I was reading to the Council the second paragraph of the report of the majority of the select committee. It struck me rather as a humorous thing, how such a supposition could have been made. It is taken for granted that if a member of the Executive Council happens to be on a select committee, it goes without saying that he presides over it.

The amendment which stands in the name of the Honourable Sir MAHADEV CHAUBAL says:—

> "Such member shall be the chairman of the select committee unless he waives his right to be chairman, in which case the members present shall appoint their own chairman."

This is a statement to which I humbly demur. The Honourable Mr. PATEL has already pointed out to this Council in his dissenting minute that other Legislative Councils, namely, Madras, the Punjab, Bengal, Burma and Assam have used the expression "member in charge of a bill" and they have laid it down that the member in charge shall preside at meetings of select committees. But we may perhaps be met with the usual assertion that we are a progressive presidency. I suppose the word 'progressive' is to be taken as meaning just the reverse. The word 'progressive' I suppose, is to be taken as meaning 'retrograde', because it is assumed as a sign of our progress that we invest members of the Executive Council with higher powers than are possessed and are enjoyed in the rest of India.

For these reasons I support very heartily the amendment which stands in the name of my Honourable friend Mr. PATEL and I shall vote against the motion of the Honourable Sir MAHADEV CHAUBAL.

The Honourable Mr. RAGHUNATH PURSHOTAM PARANJPYE.—Your Excellency,—I would like to support the amendments of my Honourable friend Mr. PATEL, although I do not think that the matter is of first rate importance, for on the whole bills which are introduced by a private member are few and far between, and we have just seen the fate of one private bill. All the same I believe that it is a matter of principle and I do not think that Government should take the attitude that the Honourable Sir MAHADEV CHAUBAL has taken. While discussing the preceding bill the Sir Honourable MAHADEV CHAUBAL said that he was a member of this Council as much as any other and I myself am inclined to think that so far as the power of legislation is concerned, every member is on a footing of absolute equality. When we are discussing resolutions or the financial statement we might be in a position of certain inferiority to the Executive Council member but so far as legislative powers are concerned all the members are in a position of equality. So far as bills are concerned the member of the Executive Council is on a footing of absolute equality with the member who introduces the bill. I think the difficulty of the Honourable Mr. PATEL is a real one and is quite clear. If the first reading of a bill is carried in spite of the opposition of Government and if the member in charge of the department is chairman of the select committee, it is but human nature that he will not do his best to push the bill through the committee as zealously as possible. Of course, he will not be likely to do anything consciously against the bill, but he is likely to be unconsciously lukewarm in his support during its passage in the select committee, and I therefore, submit that he should not be in a position where he may jeopardise the passage of the bill.

Again there is the question of the casting vote. Well, I have been a member of various committees and I know that it is the recognized practice of every body that the chairman of that body should have a casting vote in case of equality of votes. Many honourable members of this Council will remember that about two or three years ago there was a very singular occasion when there was a tie on an amendment moved by my Honourable friend Dewan Bahadur GODBOLE and at that time all the legal pundits in this place could not decide at the moment whether the President of this Council had the right of a casting vote or not and the session of the Council had to be postponed for that day before this very simple question could be decided, and the next day we saw that the President of this Council gave the casting vote on one side or the other. I think the question of the casting vote is comparatively an important one. If a bill is very hotly contested and opinion is equally divided, as it sometimes is bound to be when Government opposes the bill, the opportunity for giving a casting vote will very often arise. Therefore, it is important to consider as to who is to give the casting vote. I submit that the casting vote must remain in the hands of the member introducing the bill who should consequently be chairman of the select committee and we should leave it to the member in charge of the department to bring forward amendments. After all there is some tactical advantage in having your point of view put forward as a proposition and your opponents being only in a position to move amendments. I think it would be a tactical advantage in such a contingency of opinion equally divided on a question, and I do not know why this tactical advantage should be given to a member who is persistently opposed to the measure. As I said, private bills are very rare, for there had been only one bill in my recollection before, and the one that was before us yesterday. Still this is a question of principle and therefore, I accord my support to my Honourable friend Mr. PATEL.

COUNCIL BUSINESS RULES.

[11TH OCTOBER 1917.] [Mr. Balkrishna Sitaram Kamat.]

The Honourable Mr. BALKRISHNA SITARAM KAMAT.—Your Excellency,—I cannot quite agree with my Honourable friend Mr. PARANJPYE, when he says that this subject is of smaller importance. Although it is perfectly true that private bills come here for discussion very rarely, still it is a matter of principle, and I believe, when the question of principle is involved the Council should stand on its sense of dignity, and the dignity, so far as legislation is concerned, of additional members is just the same as that of the members of the Executive Council. I judge it from this point of view. If in Madras and Bengal private members are allowed to be chairmen of select committees, I do not understand why this Government should not subscribe to the principle that an additional member should be the chairman of a select committee of the Bombay Legislative Council. I therefore think that the question of dignity or prestige ought not to be imported in considering this question.

I am further surprised to find that the majority report thinks it necessary to define under this rule the expression "member in charge." In fact, I wonder, how the Honourable the Advocate General and so eminent a lawyer like the Honourable Sir MAHADEV CHAUBAL think it necessary to define an expression which has not been used at all in the subsequent sections. If members refer to that particular set of rules they will find that in no rule out of these 45 rules the expression occurs at all. The Honourable Sir MAHADEV CHAUBAL told us that the expression "member in charge" occurs in the other set of rules, viz., the financial statement rules and the resolution rules. But there the definition is necessary simply because the expression "member in charge" occurs in various rules. Not only that, I do not think that one should presume or imagine that in this chapter the omission was purely an oversight. If one refers to the rules of the other provinces of Bengal and Madras it will be found that there also the definition of "member in charge" occurs in the chapter of resolution rules or financial rules; but even in their Council rules it does not occur in the rules for the conduct of business. Therefore, I think, in all Councils, Bengal, Madras and Bombay, the expression "member in charge" is avoided so far as its definition goes for the purpose of the rules for the conduct of legislation. It is not a matter of oversight or omission. As my Honourable friend Mr. BELVI pointed out, if now we introduce such an interpretation clause at the beginning of this set of rules, we shall be in an anomalous position. We shall have a definition of the expression "member in charge" without having any necessity for it, as the expression does not occur in the 45 rules, because, curiously enough, the Honourable Sir MAHADEV CHAUBAL instead of using that expression later on in rule 21 or 22 uses an entirely different expression, namely, "the member of the Executive Council, to whom is allotted the business of the department of Government to which the matter referred to the select committee belongs", an expression, which as the Honourable Mr. BELVI has pointed out was of an elaborate kind.

The Honourable the Advocate-General:—Your Excellency,—I rise to a point of order. There is no definition at all before this Council of "member in charge".

The Honourable Mr. KAMAT.—Is it not the proposal to define "member in charge"?

The Honourable the Advocate-General.—In the amendments proposed by the select committee there is no definition of "member in charge" at all.

The Honourable Mr. KAMAT:—I understood from the Honourable Sir MAHADEV CHAUBAL'S remarks and the remarks of the majority report that it was intended to put in a definition of "member in charge".

Now coming to the second question, whether an additional member should be chairman of a select committee or not, I submit that if the other Councils allowed such a privilege, I don't see why the non-official members of this Council should agree to surrender a principle which has been accepted by members of other Councils. And I do not know on what ground the majority report says that it would not be in the fitness of things. I ask, only ten years ago would it have been supposed for a moment that it could be in the fitness of things to pick up from non-official gentlemen in the presidency any gentleman who could adorn the Executive Council of His Excellency the Governor General or His Excellency the Governor of Bombay. No body could have dreamt ten years ago that it was in the fitness of things, and yet at the present moment we know that there are non-official gentlemen who are capable of occupying seats on the Executive Councils in all fitness of things.

It has been argued that generally a member who introduces a private bill has not the same knowledge or, at any rate, has not the means of obtaining the knowledge which a member of the Executive Council has. In the main, of course, the proposition may be true. A member of the Executive Council has greater administrative experience and has greater resources at his hand in the Secretariat to find out the information on a subject. But still it may happen that a private bill introduced by an additional member may be of such a character that with reference to the particular subject under discussion he may know something more about that subject than the member of the Executive Council. I should just illustrate this by an example. Supposing an additional member of this Council introduces a bill having reference to the sub-division of lands and studies for a long time the subject of legislation for preventing sub-division of lands in different coun ries in the world, Italy, Germany, Switzerland and so forth, then his knowledge will be greater than that possessed by the member in charge of the department, with all due deference to the administrative experience that he has. Well, take another illustration. The late Mr. GOKHALE when he introduced his bill about compulsory education had studied the subject very closely. I believe his knowledge of such legislation was greater than that of any other man. In such a case I do not see why it should not be in the fitness of things to have a member who has expert knowledge and who has studied that particular legislation for a long time as a chairman of the select committee.

With thess few words I support the amendment of the Honourable Mr. PATEL.

The Honourable Rao Bahadur GANESH KRISHNA SATHE:—May it please Your Excellency,—I stand before this Council with a certain amount of shakiness, because in the opening paragraph of the Honourable Mr. PATEL'S minute of dissent he has classed me as an official, and if I were to oppose his amendment he would say that there was no force in my opposition, because I am likely to cling to the principle of prestige as I am one of the officials. However, although I am classed as an official on a technical ground, I think he will do the favour of crediting me when I say that I have signed this report, because I believe in the reasonableness of the suggestions adopted.

In the first place, as regards the necessity of the member introducing the bill being on the select committee, I think the Honourable Sir MAHADEV CHAUBAL has made it quite clear that he is ready to accept it. If an amendment is required on that point, I ask Your Excellency's permission to move that amendment under rule 17 on page 198 of Council Manuals.

His Excellency the PRESIDENT:—Does the honourable member propose to move the amendment on the amendment of the Honourable Sir MAHADEV?

The Honourable Rao Bahadur SATHE:—Yes, Your Excellency. After the words "member of the Executive Council to whom is allotted the business of the department to which the matter referred to the select committee belongs" I would propose the addition of the following words:—

> "and if the member introducing the bill be other than the member of the Executive Council then such member also".

The Honourable Sir MAHADEV CHAUBAL:—May I tell the Honourable Rao Bahadur SATHE that there is no question about the admissibility of the amendment that he proposes? I am adopting it. But the difficulty will be how to put it in, because if he will see the amendment of the select committee as it stands, he will find that it does not relate only to a bill, but to all matters that will be referred to a select committee. The only question is of fitting it in with the language.

His Excellency the President:—I am inclined to think with my honourable colleague that that is not a satisfactory way of dealing with it. The honourable member had better put in the amendment to-morrow. We are agreed as to the proposition that the member introducing a bill should be a member of the select committee.

The Honourable Mr. PATEL:—It is not correct. I consider it to be a humiliation to a non-official member who introduces a bill to be on the select committee and not to be the chairman of it.

The Honourable Rao Bahadur SATHE.—I expected that by proposing this amendment I would shorten discussion at least on one of the points and disarm the opposition of the Honourable Mr. PATEL. That does not, however, seem likely.

The other part of the amendment of my Honourable friend Mr. PATEL is that the executive member in charge of the department to which that matter refers ought not to be the chairman of that select committee, and he has quoted precedents of other provinces. In the first place, members of this Council will member that select committees can be appointed not only for the purpose of considering bills which will be introduced from time to time, but also for the consideration of other matters which will be brought before the Council.

The Honourable Mr. BELVI:—I rise to a point of order, Your Excellency. I think we are dealing with the rules relating to the conduct of Council business.

The Honourable Rao Bahadur SATHE:—I beg the honourable member's pardon. If he will kindly refer to rule 21 at page 198 he will find that under that rule select committees may be appointed by the Council for any purpose connected with its business, and the amendment is to this rule. If honourable members would be pleased to refer to the precedents cited of the other provinces, they will mark the distinction which has been observed in some places as regards the chairman of ordinary select committees, namely, select committees which decide matters other than bills and chairman of select committees which decide bills and matters of legislation. As rule 21, under which the select committees are constituted, gives power to select committees to discuss questions other than legislative questions, the present select committee thought it better to add a comprehensive rule and, in order that there should be no two presidents, one for the discussion of any bills and another for the discussion of matters other than bills, it was thought necessary to put in a clause which will cover both these matters.

Then an objection has been taken that if the member of the Executive Council is opposed to the bill, how do we expect him to guide the deliberations of the select committee? Then are we to suppose that he will not act really in a constitutional manner? Even if a member of the Executive Council holds certain views, after all, he is bound by the views of the majority of this Council; and if the majority of this Council holds a particular view, the executive member even if he holds a contrary view, has to abide by the decision of the majority and to control the deliberations of the meetings in quite an impartial manner. I think if we consider that because such a member has avowedly taken an attitude against the opinion of the majority he will stifle healthy discussion of matters coming before the select committee, we are doing the member of the Executive Council a great injustice. I think in the fitness of things there will be nothing wrong if we can get the assistance and co-operation of the member of the Executive Council, who is well posted and who is better equipped in all matters coming for discussion before the Council.

Then another objection which was taken was one of the competency of the chairman to give a casting vote and carry his own point. It is no doubt an advantage, but what would be the effect of the casting vote? Would this Council not see that there has been a substantial minority against the view taken by the majority? And, after all, a report which has been passed only by the casting vote of the chairman will be taken in the spirit in which it was passed, and I do not think it will get the same support as a unanimous report of a select committee or a report of a substantial majority of the select committee will and does receive.

Then there is one more point and that is this. The Honourable Mr. PARANJPYE says that, as the question of principle is involved, he supports the Honourable Mr. PATEL, although he thinks that private bills are generally very rare and that, therefore, it may not matter much for the present. But here when the introducer of a bill places his case before the Council at the time of the first reading and if, by the amendment which I have proposed and which I hope will be accepted, he is going to be a member of the select committee, he will have every opportunity of placing before the select committee the pros and cons of the question. Of course, if, as I take it from my honourable friend Mr. PATEL, that under these circumstances he would decline to serve on the committee, then I must say that he is not fair to the Council.

The Honourable Mr. PATEL says that he would consider it a humiliation for a private member to serve on the select committee with the executive member as chairman. I personally do not consider that there is any humiliation in that but as it is more or less a matter of sentiment I believe I should better leave it there.

On all these grounds I oppose the amendment of my honourable friend Mr. PATEL.

The Honourable Mr. P. R. CADELL:—Your Excellency,—The Honourable Mr. BELVI has introduced the question of prestige. I do not think there is any question of prestige here, but there is a question of status, i. e., of the confidence likely to be placed in a member of the Executive Council as compared with the ordinary additional member. If any ordinary member of the Legislative Council is allowed to preside at the proceedings of the select committee, he cannot be expected to do so with the same certainty of impartiality or of judgment. With all respect to the non-official members of this Legislative Council, most of them will themselves agree that a member who has reached the stage of being a member of the Executive Council will probably have more experience than the average non-official members of the Council. There is the great point of impartiality, which is apparently, the real basis of the opposition to the amendment. The Honourable Mr. PATEL and the Honourable Mr. PARANJPYE have taken up the ground, that if the member of the Executive Council who is the chairman of the select committee is opposed to the bill, he will be partial as regards it, or, will in some way or other, check its progress or hamper it. I believe most of the members of the Council will agree with the Honourable Mr. SATHE.

The Honourable Mr. PARANJPYE:—I did not say at all that he would be partial. What I said was that he will be unconsciously biassed.

The Honourable Mr. CADELL:—Even if the member had such a bias as the honourable member suggests, he might be expected to overcome it. But supposing a bias did exist, it could only perhaps be occasional whereas if the member who introduces the bill were invariably the chairman of the committee, he is bound to be partial on his own subject and it is absolutely impossible for him to be impartial. Personally, I think that if I had introduced a private bill I would be very anxious to see that it is passed through the committee and that no amendments were made in its principles. I should be very sorry indeed to be the chairman of the committee; I should prefer to be a free member and to speak as much as I liked.

Your Excellency, we have got a very excellent precedent which I would submit to members of this Council and that is in the Bombay Municipal Corporation. Members may be aware that for the very numerous resolutions which are brought before the municipal corporation numerous committees are appointed. The number of the committees has now been greatly reduced, I think, largely owing to the efforts of the Honourable Mr. CHUNILAL MEHTA, but at one time there were no less than 60 committees. As a matter of course, the president of the corporation was the chairman of such committees. I do not remember that practice ever having been departed from except in the exceptional instance of the late Sir PHEROZESHAH MEHTA, and that only in the case of certain subjects, and the committees on which he had originally been chairman as president of the corporation; but that was a very exceptional case. In no other case is anyone but the president of the corporation appointed as chairman and no one who brings a motion for the appointment of a committee ever feels himself humiliated, as the Honourable Mr. Patel has suggested, because he is not made the chairman of that committee. For these reasons, I think that the majority of the Council would prefer to get impartiality of judgment by the appointment of a member of the position of a member of the Executive Council, who, in nine cases out of ten, cannot have any personal interest, one way or other in the bill during the course of the proceedings in committee.

The Honourable Mr. GOKULDAS KAHANDAS PAREKH:—May it please Your Excellency,—I support the amendment moved by my Honourable friend Mr. PATEL The question would only arise after the Council has accepted the motion for the first reading. In the case of a Government bill a member of Government presides at the select committee as he is presumed to be the best informed on all questions bearing on it. I understand that in every case the person who should preside at the select committee on a bill should be the one who is best able to pilot it through the select committee. I also think that it is reasonable to assume that in most cases the person who ventures to bring a bill before the Council would be the person who has studied every aspect of the question and who is most competent to pilot it. That being the case, I submit that it would certainly be wrong to take a child out of the hands of its father and put it in the hands of a step-mother. (Laughter.) A question of this kind would only arise when there is opposition between the members of Government and the other members of the Council. When there is agreement a question of this kind is not likely to arise. When there is opposition from Government I submit that it would be very improper that the bill should be taken out of the hands of the person who has introduced it and put it in the hands of a step-mother. That being the case, I submit that the Honourable Mr. PATEL is right in asking that the person who introduces a bill should preside unless he himself is willing that some member of Government should. Then the propriety of this amendment is shown also by the fact that in other provinces there is a provision to this effect, and I understand also that that is the parliamentary practice in reference to private bills. That being the case, I submit that the amendment is a proper one and ought to be accepted.

His Excellency the PRESIDENT:—Before the Council adjourns, I should like to say a few words on the length of time that Government think it possible for this session to last. We have been considering the matter and I daresay that honourable members are well aware that my Government has got a good deal of rather important work coming along in the very near future, having regard to the fact that the Secretary of State is going to be here before very long. Therefore, we shall find it impossible to sit longer than half past two on Saturday. I regret that we cannot give more time, but I will endeavour to get through with as much business as possible, beginning to-morrow at 11 o'clock, if the honourable members wish it, and I hope we shall be able to deal with most of the subjects on the agenda.

There is only one other matter which I shall refer to. That is the question of resolutions. Some honourable members seem to me to be extraordinarily diligent in the way in which they produce resolutions, and I want just to make this observation with regard to them. I think honourable members should always bear in mind that it is not the number of resolutions that they produce but the importance of the resolutions which they bring which is of value to the Council. If Government find that resolutions keep on being adjourned from session to session and their number is really more than we can manage, we shall have to seriously consider the introduction of a method that is adopted in the House of Commons, which at any rate was adopted in the House of Commons when I was there. The method was this, that in every session on a particular day in the week the members of the House of Commons used to put their resolutions in a ballot box; so many of the resolutions were drawn out two or three days afterwards and those resolutions were brought forward for discussion during one day a week of the session. I merely suggest this, I hope it will not have to be adopted, but something of this sort may prove to be necessary. I am bound to say that I think there are certain honourable members who seem to have monopolised the attention of the Council very largely since the session commenced. I do not think that is a very desirable thing; I want to give opportunities to all honourable members to express their views on all the various subjects that arise.

I have nothing more to say, except that we shall have to rise at half past two on Saturday and then we shall have no further session till about Christmas time. The Council will now adjourn till 11 o'clock to-morrow morning.

The Council then adjourned till 11 a. m. on Friday, the 12th October 1917.

His Excellency the PRESIDENT :—Order, order. Further discussion of the Honourable Mr. PATEL'S amendment to the amendments recommended by the select committee to the rules for the conduct of business at meetings of the Legislative Council.

The Honourable Mr. SHRIDHAR BALKRISHNA UPASANI :—May it please your Excellency,—The point to be considered is a very simple one and I think there will be not much difference on this point. As a matter of fact, nine bills out of ten are introduced by Government and in all those cases the member in charge of the executive duties is generally the member who introduces that measure and as such he will be the chairman of the select committees on those bills. That being the case, in those cases there will be no question of his being the chairman, and it will be only in the very few cases in which bills may be brought forward by additional members that there will be occasion to consider as to who should be the chairman of the select committee. The member in charge of the executive department is usually allowed to introduce Government bills because he has special knowledge of the matter to which the bills refer and because he has the means of having available to him all the needful information at the disposal of the department concerned.

In the same way an additional member is allowed to introduce a private bill because he has specially studied the subject to which the Bill refers and has collected all the needful information bearing on the same.

In the case of a bill like the one introduced yesterday by the Honourable Mr. PATEL for amendment of the Medical Act, would it have been desirable to have that bill piloted through the Council by the executive member who opposed it or by any other than the member who introduced it ? It would not serve the object with which a bill is introduced to have all the facts in support of the bill placed before the Council or the select committee by anybody but the gentleman who moves it and it is therefore necessary that he should be the chairman. It is to his interest to place all the facts before the Council and probably he would be better coached than any other member, ordinary or additional, and would be able to place fully and faithfully all the facts before the Council. That being the case, it is in the fitness of things that he should be allowed to be the chairman and that is very correctly the practice in the other provinces.

I do not know why our Presidency should make a distinction between an executive member and an additional member in this respect and not give the same rights and privileges to the latter that are conferred upon the former in those very rare cases where an additional member may happen to bring forward his own bill.

I understand that when a private bill was introduced by the Honourable Sir Ibrahim Rahimtulla in this Council with reference to the administration of Mahomedan religious endowments, it was he who presided at the select committee on that bill. If there is a precedent for us in our own Presidency and when that precedent is supported by the rules of the other Presidencies, which have been quoted by the Honourable Mr. PATEL in his minute of dissent, I do not think there need be any separate definition of member in charge as is now proposed. We do not object to the wording "the member of the Executive Council to whom is allotted the business of the department of Government to which the matter referred to the select committee belongs shall be a member of the select committee", but we object to his being in charge of a bill introduced by an adititional member so as to be entitled ex-officio to be the chairman of a select committee on that bill. As I have already said, in cases where bills are introduced by him he will of necessity be a member of the select committee on that bill and also the chairman; and it is only in the rare case where a bill is brought forward by an additional member that he, the member of the Executive Council, will come in as an ordinary member and not be the chairman, and in that case even if he comes in as only an ordinary member, I have no doubt that all the information available to him will be placed by him before the select committee, whether he may happen to support or oppose the Bill. Yesterday it was urged by the Honourable Mr. CADELL that an additional member, if he be the chairman, will bring in his own bias. I think we need have no fear on that ground on the part of an additional member any more than on the part of the executive member when either may happen to introduce a bill and be the chairman of the select committee on it. In both these cases I do not think there will be any bias. But the question is of the responsibility and the special interest which the member introducing a bill has in the bill and also the information which he has at his command with reference to its subject-matter. In fact the position of an additional member having to place his bill in charge of the ordinary member will be very difficult. All his information will have to be placed by him at the disposal of the ordinary member,—in fact he will have to be in the position of a secretary who furnishes all the information to the ordinary member in the case of Government bills. That is the position to which I do not think we should reduce an ordinary member if he has to introduce a bill, and it would be anomalous to place his bill in charge of the official member who may have to oppose it.

With these few remarks I beg to support the Honourable Mr. PATEL's amendment.

The Honourable Mr. PANDURANG ANANT DESAI:—Your Excellency,—I should like to make a few observations with respect to the amendment which is now under consideration.

Clause 2 which is to be added to rule 21 as it now stands makes no room for the additional member introducing the bill on the select committee. This defect was brought to the notice of the Honourable Sir MAHADEV CHAUBAL yesterday, and I think he had expressed at the same time that he had no intention of excluding the additional member from the select committee. An amendment on that point is under consideration, I think, so that that question is disposed of.

Now the only question is with respect to the chairman of the select committee. With respect to the chairman of the select committee there was a division in the select committee itself and three official members were in favour of reserving that post for the member of the Executive Council and the two non-official members came to the opposite conclusion.

Now the Honourable Mr. PATEL in giving his reasons in his minute of dissent has called attention to the rules of five Legislative Councils of sister provinces, Burma, Madras, the Punjab, Bengal and Assam. In these five Legislative Councils the rules permit that the member who brings the bill before the Council is as a matter of fact to be the chairman of the select committee. No attempt has been made on behalf of Government to explain that the circumstances which obtain in these five sister provinces are different from the circumstances of this Presidency, and until any attempt is made to show that the circumstances there are quite different from the circumstances here, I think we should not depart from that principle which has been admitted not by one, two or three, but by five Legislative Councils. I therefore submit that having regard to the interests of everybody concerned, the chairman of the select committee should be the member who brings a bill before the Council. He may be a member of the Executive Council or he may be an additional member.

My Lord, we are now discussing this question on principle, and your Excellency might see that the only reason given for selecting a member of the Executive Council as a chairman of select committee is that the member of the Executive Council in charge of the Department concerned has either a greater knowledge or at any rate a greater means of knowledge of the matter under discussion than any other member who brings in the bill.

Now these remarks also apply to the members of the Executive Councils of the five Councils to which I have referred, and your Excellency will see that if in those cases, having got the same means of knowledge, having got the same status, the member of the Executive Council is not given any preference over the additional member, there is no reason why we should make an exception in this Council alone.

With these few remarks I think that the amendment proposed by my honourable friend Mr. PATEL should be accepted by the Council.

The Honourable Sir DINSHAW MANOCKJEE PETIT:—Your Excellency,—I rise to accord my support to the amendment proposed by my honourable friend Mr. Patel. Bearing in mind the remark made by your Excellency yesterday just before we dispersed, regarding the time at the disposal of the Council on account of the heavy work that is on the hands of Government entailed by the pending visit of the Secretary of State for India, I will try not to repeat the arguments that have been already put forward in favour of the amendment and be as brief as possible. The arguments put forward in favour of the amendment are so strong and convincing and those that have been adduced against the amendment appear to me to be so weak and feeble that I am surprised that there could be any opposition at all in conceding the very reasonable and modest demand that has been made by the Honourable Mr. PATEL on behalf of the additional members of this Council.

His Excellency the PRESIDENT:—I cannot admit that it is on behalf of additional members.

The Honourable Sir DINSHAW PETIT:—Will you kindly allow me to explain, your Excellency, what I mean?

COUNCIL BUSINESS RULES.

[12TH OCTOBER 1917.] [The President; Sir Dinshaw Manockjee Petit; Mr. Phiroze C. Sethna.]

His Excellency the PRESIDENT:—All that I mean to say is that the Honourable Mr. PATEL has, I hope, moved this amendment for the good of the Council as a whole.

The Honourable Sir DINSHAW PETIT:—I don't mean to say that he is speaking on behalf of the additional members, but the demand he is making is generally for the additional members. If the demand is granted it will be a concession in favour of the additional members.

In reply to the argument put forward by the Honourable Mr. PATEL, that if a bill is introduced by an additional member against the wishes of Government the member of the Executive Council would have a certain amount of bias against the bill and therefore he should not preside, the Honourable Mr. CADELL said that, on the other hand, if the member introducing the bill presides he would have a bias in favour of the bill. With regard to that, I submit, if a bill were introduced by Government and if the member in charge of the bill presides, I do not see why in that case there should be a member presiding who has a bias in favour of the bill whilst it is advanced that in the case of a bill introduced by an additional member the member who is supposed to have a bias in favour of the bill should not preside? The Honourable Mr. CADELL further quoted the instance of the Bombay corporation and said that in the meetings of the sub-committees of the corporation the president presided, and yet no member of the corporation thought it humiliating for him to sit on the committee. Well, sir, the case of the president of the corporation is different from the case of a member of the Executive Council presiding in select committee. If the president of this Council was presiding in the meetings of the select committee it would have been a different matter altogether, but instead of that another member of the Government presides. I must say, sir, that at a time when so much has been heard and is said with regard to the legitimate aspirations of the people of this country towards having a greater hand in the government of the country, it is a matter of disappointment to me that there should be any opposition to the modest demand that has been made by the Honourable Mr. PATEL, and I may be further allowed to say that any expression of sympathy towards the aspirations of the people are of no avail unless they are backed up by Government by a reasonable attitude in matters such as the one before the Council. With these remarks, sir, I beg to support the amendment of the Honourable Mr. PATEL.

The Honourable Mr. PHIROZE C. SETHNA:—The previous speaker observed that he considers the remarks of the Honourable Mr. PATEL and his supporters very convincing and that the recommendations in the majority report of the Select Committee are weak and feeble. I for one cannot agree with him. I think the reasons advanced are sufficiently convincing. Yesterday, my honourable friend Mr BELVI urged that great importance is given to the question of prestige. Perhaps he relies on a remark in the dissenting minute of the Honourable Mr. PATEL which says:—"One wonders how long it is proposed to maintain the official element in our constitution on a tottering pinnacle of 'prestige'". The Honourable Mr. BELVI said that we are now living in an age of democracy and that all must be treated on a footing of equality. We certainly subscribe to this, but I hope that the Honourable Mr. BELVI will admit that even among the most democratic nations in bodies such as ours there may be members possessing superior knowledge and consequently have to be looked up to by the others. I ask the Honourable Mr. BELVI and those who share his views if the members of the Executive Council are not better circumstanced than the majority of the additional members even if we have amongst us some with the untiring energy displayed by the Honourable Mr. PATEL. Now, sir, members of the Executive Council may be officials or non-officials. Officials work their way up after serving in various Government departments and consequently have a better grip of the questions that come up before this Council. If a member of the Executive Council is a non-official he has ample opportunities to specialise in the departments entrusted to him through the machinery of Government, and I am sure the Honourable Mr. PATEL himself will be ready to admit that a member of the Executive Council has means at his disposal of obtaining information first-hand and in such quick time as cannot possibly be expected by additional members no matter however assiduous they might be. This is exactly what the majority in the report refer to, namely, that a member of the Executive Council has either greater knowledge or at any rate greater means of obtaining knowledge on matters under discussion than an additional member introducing a bill. That, sir, seems to me a special reason for allowing the member in charge of the department concerned to be chairman of the select committee to which a bill brought forward by himself or by a private member is referred.

Now, the Honourable Mr. CADELL referred to the procedure adopted in the Bombay Municipality in answer to the Honourable Mr. BELVI. In addition to what fell from the Honourable Mr. CADELL I would like to add that whilst members of this Council may be additional or executive, official or non-official, they are all on a footing of equality and the president is only primus inter pares. Yet the president is almost invariably chosen to preside over all committees. At the present moment there are 32 committees and the president is the chairman of every one of them. But what I want to make out in addition to the Honourable Mr. CADELL'S remarks is that whilst this Council has a right to expect special knowledge from an Executive Member of Council, the president of the corporation is only a voluntary worker in the same manner as his 71 colleagues and consequently it would not be necessary for him to be the chairman of committees and yet the corporation think it prudent to appoint him as such. This, I say, sir, is an additional reason why a member of the Executive Council in charge of the department to which a particular bill may refer to is better suited to be in the chair of the select committee to which the bill is referred. Whenever in difficulty it is best to follow the practice prevalent in the mother of Parliaments. I am not familiar with the rules for the conduct of business in the House of Commons, but I understand they make up a panel and every committee is presided over in turn by members of the House who form this panel. This much is certain that a private member introducing a bill does not preside over the committee to which such private bill is referred. For these considerations, I hope, sir, that the Council will agree with the views expressed by the majority of the select committee who have signed the report.

The Honourable Mr. HARCHANDRAI VISHINDAS:—Your Excellency,—I had no intention of speaking, but the remarks that have fallen from my honourable friend Mr. SETHNA have provoked me to say this much, that, to begin with, so far as my own information is concerned, I think the Honourable Mr. SETHNA is not correct in describing the procedure that exists in the House of Commons. But, of course, I am speaking open to correction by your Excellency, because your Excellency must be aware of the procedure there. But my own information on this subject, gathered in connection with a discussion that arose relating to this very question, was that the procedure that the Honourable Mr. PATEL is seeking to introduce into this Council is precisely the one which exists already in the House of Commons.

His Excellency the PRESIDENT:—The honourable member is wrong.

The Honourable Mr. HARCHANDRAI VISHINDAS:—Well, if I am wrong there, I leave the question alone, but I should still like more light on the point as to who is a chairman of a select committee appointed in the House of Commons. Does he occupy precisely the same position that is occupied by the member in charge of the bill as is sought to be suggested by the Honourable Sir MAHADEV CHAUBAL, or is a different party altogether appointed a chairman? Well, so far as the amendment of the Honourable Mr. PATEL is concerned, I am entirely in its favour for the considerations which have arisen in the course of the debate that has fallen upon this amendment in this Council.

Now various side-issues have been raised which to my mind do not really touch the question and ought not to carry any weight with the honourable members of this Council. There was the question of dignity, of prestige, of sentiment. All these, I think, ought to be brushed aside. All these questions do come in occasionally, but I think they are rather inappropriate or irrelevant to the present consideration. We should look at the question from a practical point of view. It is true that the member of the Executive Council who is in charge of a particular department to which a particular bill relates, on which a select committee has been appointed, is possessed with a degree of knowledge which may not be possessed by other members But at the same time the reply to that kind of argument has already been furnished by the Honourable Mr. PATEL in his dissenting minute on the report of the select committee, and that is that you can very easily remedy that by having the member in charge of the department as a member of the select committe itself, so that all the information that he would be able to furnish as chairman he could also furnish as an ordinary member.

But I approach the question from a practical standpoint and from the standpoint of principle. I think that the reason why a member of Government who introduces a bill is by virtue of such introduction the chairman of the select committee on that particular bill, or ex officio chairman, is precisely the reason why an introducer of a bill, even if he is a private member, ought to be the chairman. I think the principle is precisely the same; that is to say, the gentleman who has taken the trouble of going into the history of the thing and the whole question to such an extent as to mature it in the shape of a legislative enactment is the person who is entitled to preside at the deliberations of the select committee. Now this principle is not without precedent. The rules of a number of Legislative Councils in this country have been quoted by the Honourable Mr. PATEL to show that this principle is observed in those Legislative Councils, the Punjab, Bengal, Madras, Assam, and so on.

I attach very little importance to the argument that has been adduced on the ground of bias. The Honourable Mr. PATEL said that, if the member of the Executive Council in charge of the portfolio is against the bill that is introduced by a private member, he would carry his opposition in the select committee to such an extent that it would be undesirable that he should continue as a member. I do not recognise that as a very sound argument. That was replied to by the Honourable Mr. CADELL yesterday when he said that for the same reason a private member in charge of a bill would be so much in favour of the passage of the bill that it would not be desirable in the interests of impartiality to continue him as a member. But the reply to the Honouruble Mr. CADELL has been furnished by the Honourable Sir DINSHAW PETIT very rightly in saying that, if that principle were to be taken into consideration, then no member of Government who has introduced a particular bill would be competent to sit as chairman of the select committee. So I say these arguments are entirely wide of the mark. That a particular member has a particular bias is no ground for excluding him. On the contrary, I have noticed it frequently that the stronger a particular member is feeling for or against a particular measure, that is always considered a greater reason for appointing him. I have got one very typical instance in mind. LORD DUFFERIN introduced in his Viceregal Council a bill for limiting permanent tenancy that existed before. Mr. KRISTO DAS PAL who represented the zamindars and who was one of the Hindu patriots of the time, was strongly against that measure. But precisely because he was very strongly against that measure and he had advocated the opposite view, LORD DUFFERIN appointed him on the Council and also on the select committee. Here also I have observed times out of number that if a private member feels very strongly on a particular bill and expresses himself at great length in the matter and shows that he has taken a great interest in it, although he may be opposed to the view of the Government or opposed to the view of the particular member of the Executive Council, it is thought fit to appoint him on the select committee, because then it is considered that the question will be thoroughly threshed out and both views, for and against, would be before the select committee in their entirety.

Therefore, I discount the view on the ground of bias that has been urged by so many protagonists in this controversy. But I say that the principle of having the mover of a bill as the chairman of the select committee is a principle which has been once adopted in other Councils, and I think that that is a very sound principle. It is common sense to back it up, and on that principle and irrespective of the considerations of dignity, prestige, position and all that, a member who has introduced the bill, who has taken the trouble and devoted himself to the study that is necessary for bringing a legislative enactment before the Council is the most competent man to be the chairman of the select committee. Therefore, I support the Honourable Mr. PATEL'S amendment.

The Honourable the Advocate-General (Mr. T. J. STRANGMAN):—Your Excellency,— The substantial question which is sought to be raised by the Honourable Mr. PATEL'S amendment is as to whether the chairman of the select committee appointed to consider an additional member's bill should be the introducer of the bill or the member of Government in charge of the department concerned. I say sought to be raised, for I am by no means sure that the question is really raised. The expression "member in charge of a bill" is an ambiguous expression and it is not rendered any clearer by defining the expression "member." And I am by no means sure that if the Honourable Mr. PATEL'S amendment were accepted and came to be construed the meaning which the Honourable Mr. PATEL assigns to that expression would, in reality, be assigned to it. But I will deal with the question on the assumption that the Honourable Mr. PATEL'S amendment carries out his intention.

In the first place, I think all of us are agreed that two particular members should invariably be members of the select committee that we are now considering. One is the introducer of the bill and the other the member of Government in charge of the department concerned. That the introducer of the bill should be a member is, I think, obvious, for it would be in the highest degree unfair that his measure should be cut about in his absence. It is perfectly true, as pointed out by the Honourable Mr. PATEL, that the proposals of the majority of the select committee do not make that clear and the reason is this. All of us, including the Honourable Mr. PATEL himself, took it for granted that the introducer of the bill would be there without providing expressly that he should be there. I admit that we made a mistake, but the Honourable Mr. PATEL is as much responsible for it as any of us. That, however, is a matter of purely academic interest, because Government have agreed to an amendment which will provide that the introducer of a bill shall invariably be a member of the select committee.

Now, sir, I come to consider the position of the member of Government in charge of the department concerned. Let us take it, first of all, from the point of view of the introducer of the bill. I say that so far as he is concerned he will naturally be desirous of having at his disposal the knowledge which Government either have or can obtain in connection with the subjects which will come under discussion. In the second place, he will naturally be desirous of knowing the views of Government on the various points which will arise. So that from his point of view it is most desirable, if not essential, that the executive member of Government should be there.

Let us now take it from the point of view of Government. Now Government,—and this is a point which seems to have been missed by most of those who spoke in favour of the Honourable Mr. PATEL'S proposals,—are directly responsible for the good governance of this Presidency. They are also directly responsible for carrying into effect any measure which may be passed into law, and I say, for that reason, it is essential that Government should keep in touch, and in the most intimate touch, with all legislative projects. For that reason, therefore, it is essential that the executive member of Government in charge of the department concerned should be upon the committee.

We have then got thus far, that both these two individuals should be on the committee, and the only question is which of them should be the chairman. Now the arguments in favour of the report of the majority of the select committee are short and simple. The executive member of Government occupi s an entirely different position to all the rest of us who are merely additional members. He, it is, as I have pointed out, who is directly responsible for the good governance of the Presidency, he it is who is directly responsible for carrying into effect any measure which we as a Legislative Council may pass into law; the rest of us on the other hand have no such responsibilities: and I say, without fear of contradiction, that it is by reason of these circumstances that from the very inception of Legislative Councils in India the executive members of Government have invariably been ex officio members of those Councils. I say further that precisely the same reasons which make it necessary that the members of Government should be ex officio members of this Council also render it necessary that the executive member of Government in charge of the department concerned should be the chairman of the select committee to which the bill under consideration is referred.

The Honourable Mr. PATEL appears to me to have entirely missed the point in his dissenting minute which is recorded on page 843 of the Bombay Government Gazette. What he seeks to show is that there is an attempt on the part of the majority of the select committee which considered there rules to draw an invidious distinction between officials and the non-officials.

The Honourable Mr. PATEL—I have never suggested any such attempt.

The Honourable the Advocate-General:—Let me read the honourable member's very words. He says:—

"It was further contended that the position of a member of the Executive Council ought to entitle him to become the chairman of the committee of which he is a member. I wish this argument had not been advanced.

One wonders how long it is proposed to maintain the official element in our constitution on a tottering pinnacle of 'prestige'".

I say, without fear of contradiction, that the meaning I have assigned is the meaning which any ordinary common sense individual would assign to those words, and I say further that the comment contained in them entirely misses the point. We are not considering here any differentiation between officials and the non-officials. But we are drawing a distinction between the man who is an executive member of Government and the man who is not a member of the executive Government, i.e., between the man who is directly responsible for the good governance of this Presidency and carrying its laws into effect and the man who has no such responsibility. And let me put this to many speakers, and in particular to the Honourable Sir DINSHAW PETIT. Supposing that instead of being nominated by the Government, the executive members of the Council were elected direct by the people, the same distinction which is drawn here would still be drawn. That, I think, is a conclusive answer to all of those who have followed this particular line of argument.

Now, sir, I come to a point made by the Honourable Mr. BELVI. I must express surprise, in the first instance, that the Honourable Mr. BELVI who, I know, is a distinguished lawyer, should have raised such a point. The point was this: that behind the proposals of the majority of the select committee there was a sinister object, that sinister object being to give the Government an undue advantage in the shape of the casting vote. Now, one answer to this has been given by the Honourable Rao Bahadur SATHE, and it is this. Assume the most favourable case in support of the Honourable Mr. BELVI's argument, viz., that in the select committee there was an equal division, say, three on one side and three on the other. The chairman would give a casting vote, and then you would have three on one side and four on the other. The select committee would make a report, the chairman's side forming the nominal majority. The other three would, however, record dissenting minutes, with the result that every member of this Council could see that, in reality, there was an equal division and that there was no majority at all. That is the first answer.

There is, however, another answer, and a more conclusive answer, and it is this, that each member, including the chairman, in the absence of express provision to the contrary, is entitled to one vote and one vote only. That is a matter of law and I must express some surprise that it appears to be unknown to many of the legal gentlemen who have spoken. Now, here there is no express provision to the contrary, with the result that the chairman has no casting vote. Consequently, the very foundation of the Honourable Mr. BELVI'S suspicions disappears.

This leads me to deal with an instance which was quoted by my honourable friend Mr. PARANJPYE yesterday.

The instance to which he referred was this. A tie in your Excellency's Council took place, if my recollection is right, in March 1915, and on that occasion, as the Honourable Mr. PARANJPYE said, the legal pundits were consulted at the conclusion of the day's proceedings and on the following morning your Excellency held that you had a casting vote and proceeded to give it. Now the Honourable Mr. PARANJPYE is perfectly correct in his facts so far as they go. I know it because I was one of the legal pundits. But Mr. PARANJPYE did not state the whole of the facts: he omitted the most important one, and that was the reason which your Excellency gave which is contained in section 34 of the Government of India Acts 24 and 25 Vic., Chap. 62, which then applied. You won't find it in the book before us now because it has been repealed.

The Honourable Mr. HARCHANDRAI:—There is a corresponding section in the present act.

The Honourable the ADVOCATE-GENERAL:—I am coming to that.

The section I was referring to runs as follows:—"And in any case of difference of opinion at meetings of any such Council for making laws and regulations where there shall be an equality of votes, the Governor, or in his absence the senior member then presiding, shall have two votes or the casting vote." There you see there is an express provision to the effect that the Governor shall in case of a tie have two votes and not merely one. You will find a similar provision in section 75 (4) of the present act which you will find at page 38 of the green book: "If any difference of opinion arises on any question brought before a meeting of the Council the person presiding shall have a second or casting vote." And I say it was by reason of the express provision in the act that your Excellency held that you had a casting vote and gave it accordingly.

The Honourable Mr. PARANJPYE:—What will happen if there is an equal division in the select committee?

The Honourable the ADVOCATE-GENERAL:—If there was an equal division in the select committee there could be no majority report. That would be the result. The matter was considered before the select committee and no provision was thought necessary to be introduced into the rules to provide that the chairman should in such an event have a casting vote.

The Honourable Mr. PATEL:—Have not instances occurred in which the chairman has given a casting vote?

The Honourable the ADVOCATE-GENERAL:—I know of none, and if he gave it, he gave it wrongly. I have not looked into the financial rules, but certainly, so far as the rules we are now considering are concerned, there is no provision for an equal division in select committee. And as a matter of law, unless you get a provision that a person shall have more than one vote he has one vote and only one vote. That is the legal position.

Then, sir, I come to deal with another point made by the Honourable Mr. PATEL and it is a point in which he has been supported by a number of speakers. Let me read his own words. You will find them at page 843 of the Bombay Government Gazette:—"There is again a very serious objection to the proposal of the majority of the committee. Suppose, for instance, that an additional member's bill is very vehemently opposed and severely criticised by the member of the Executive Council at its first reading. The Council, however, passes the first reading and refers it to select committee. Is it fair under those circumstances that the member who holds and has expressed very strong views against a measure should be the chairman of the committee appointed to consider it?" Now there are two questions I should like to ask in this connection. First of all what reason is there to assume that the member of Government, even if he be opposed to the measure, will act unfairly. That is the first question. And the second question I ask is this: Let us assume that the member of Government is so biassed that he can only see the matter from his own point of view, in what manner can he as chairman of the select committee act to the detriment of the introducer of the bill? Now, no answer has been given or attempted to be given to the first question, and with regard to the second question, the only answer that has been given is that suggested by the Honourable Mr. BELVI, that the chairman has a casting vote, and that, as I have shown, is without foundation.

Now what is the logical result of giving effect to apprehensions of this kind. The logical result is this, that we shall have to amend our rules for the conduct of business in this Council to provide that when any member moves a resolution or a bill he must go in the first instance to the President and inquire of the President what views he holds on the subject, and if he finds that the President is against him, then there must be further provision that the President shall vacate his seat so long as the motion is being entertained and the mover shall be put in his place. That, I say, will be the logical result of giving effect to this suggestion. The real answer to the suggestion was that given by the Honourable Mr. CADELL yesterday, and shortly stated, it is this: If distrust is to find a place at our deliberations whether here in full Council or in select committee, then it were better to shut up this Legislative Council and put an end to it. Business cannot go on if that is the spirit in which matters are to be conducted. Those remarks, I submit, sufficiently dispose of the paragraph in the Honourable Mr. PATEL'S minute of dissent which I read a few minutes ago.

I now come to the last point, and that appears at page 844 of the Bombay Government Gazette where reference is made to the rules of a number of other Provincial Legislative Councils. The best answer to this is that given by the Honourable Mr. CURTIS yesterday. It is for Bombay to lead and not to follow. That is the first answer. We are not concerned with what others do. Let us do what we think best. But there are other answers. Now you notice when you read these rules that the expression member in charge of a bill or in charge of the bill is not defined and I think I am correct in saying (the Honourable Sir MAHADEV CHAUBAL will correct me if I am wrong) that correspondence took place between the secretary of this Council and the secretaries of the other Councils to ascertain their views on the subject, and apparently from the replies that were received, when the rules were drafted, curiously enough, it was never contemplated that anyone would introduce a bill except a member of Government, and consequently the rules were framed upon that basis; and it might very well be, if the expression came to be construed, it would be construed as meaning the executive member of Government in charge of the department concerned.

But I say, supposing we are going to act on precedent, then why not go to the highest precedent, the Government of India rules? There you will find from the context of the rules that the expression "member in charge" no doubt has the same meaning as the Honourable Mr. PATEL here assigns to it. But you will find that the provision there is that the law member is to be a member of every select committee and that he is to preside at every meeting of the select committee, and it is only in his absence that the member in charge of the bill, that is to say, having regard to context, the introducer of the bill, is to preside. So, I say, if we want a precedent let us go to the highest, and if we go to the highest we find that it is a member of the Government who has to preside. Those remarks I think deal with all the arguments which have been made during the course of this debate, and for the reasons that I have given I propose to vote in favour of the proposals of the select committee and against the amendment of the Honourable Mr. PATEL.

The Honourable Mr. CHUNILAL VIJBHUKHANDAS MEHTA:—Your Excellency,—My reason for taking part in this debate is because the instance of the Bombay corporation and the practice which there obtains has been somewhat freely quoted. I do not think that the analogy of the Bombay corporation is on all fours with the analogy of the Legislative Council. It has been said that in the Bombay corporation the president always presides at meetings of the committees. That is so, but then the president never takes part in the actual discussion of any questions that are brought forward before the corporation. A case has occurred—I do not know whether there have been any more, one case has certainly occurred—where the corporation by a resolution has decided that a particular member shall be chairman of the committee and not the president. I will now show that there is a distinction between the president of the corporation and the chairman of the standing committee. The chairman of that committee takes part in the discussion of the questions that come before it, but nevertheless, the chairman is always the chairman of the sub-committees that may be appointed by the standing committee. But the greatest difference between this Council and the Bombay municipal corporation is this: that in the corporation every member, every one of the 72 members have for some time or another, at any rate, a chance of becoming the president and also chairman of the committees. Here, however, it is altogether denied to an additional member or any member to ever become the chairman of any committees, and the strongest reason which appeals to us in the arguments of the Honourable Mr. PATEL is that he is fighting now for a status of equality between all the members of this Council as a legislative body, except, of course the president.

His Excellency the PRESIDENT:—Please don't exclude the president.

The Honourable Mr. CHUNILAL MEHTA:—Your Excellency, the President is already provided for under our present rules. Equality in the legislative body is the strongest ground on which the Honourable Mr. PATEL has placed his case, and I do not propose to go into the various other arguments because I fully see that much can be said on both sides why the introducer of the bill should or should not be the chairman of the select committee. I would, therefore, sir, with your permission, suggest an amendment to this effect. Taking the rule as drafted by the select committee, I would propose the deletion of all the words after the first sentence. The rule would then run as follows:—

"The member of the Executive Council, to whom is allotted the business of the Department of Government to which the matter referred to the select committee belongs, shall invariably be a member of the select committee."

What would be the effect if this suggestion were accepted? The effect would be that it would entirely be left to the select committee to elect its own chairman, and I have sufficient confidence in the good sense of the members of this Council, and of any member who is appointed to the select committee, that they would elect the best amongst them to be chairman of the select committee.

Take, on the other hand, the effect of what might happen if the Honourable Mr. PATEL'S amendment were carried. It may be that a member of the Executive Council may refuse to serve on the committee. There is no provision to compel such an executive member to serve, and in that case we will lose his valuable knowledge and assistance. Another effect might be this: that a bill might be introduced by an official member, and if the rule is that if such an official member shall always be chairman of the select committee, then again difficulties would arise on account of the status of an official member who has not reached the position of an Executive Council member. I therefore think that such being the conditions, the Bombay Legislative Council at any rate should work in a spirit of tolerance and harmony as they have done in the past, and I think those difficulties will be overcome if we leave the select committee to exercise its discretion and elect its own chairman. With these words I beg to move my amendment.

His Excellency the PRESIDENT:—The honourable member wishes to amend the amended rules of the select committee. I am afraid I cannot admit that until we have disposed of the amendment of the Honourable Mr. PATEL.

The Honourable Mr. SALEBHOY KARIMJI BARODAWALLA:—Your Excellency,—I do not wish to be very long on this, for my honourable friend Mr. STRANGMAN has very rightly and effectively put forward his arguments. I have only a word in reply to my honourable friend Mr. CHUNILAL MEHTA. He said that the president of the corporation never takes any part in the debate of the corporation. He is right so far, because that is the rule which the corporation has adopted. He has mentioned the name of the standing committee, and in the standing committee the chairman by virtue of his office is not debarred from taking part in the deliberations of that body. He is right there also, but I must correct him when he says that the chairman, i.e., president, never takes part in the committees of the corporation. There I think he is wrong.

The Honourable Mr. CHUNILAL MEHTA:—I never said anything of that sort. I said the chairman of the standing committee does take part.

The Honourable Mr. BARODAWALLA:—He is there not only as a chairman of the committee but is an ordinary member of the committee and he goes a step further. He opens the debate and he has the right not only of one vote but he has a casting vote too. And your Excellency, my friend the Honourable Mr. CADELL has very rightly pointed out that these exceptions have been made in the case of certain persons like the late Sir Pherozeshah Mehta who have been the presidents of the corporation for the period of the presidentship and then if another president is appointed and if the work was thought to be of an urgent character, it is by the wishes of the members of the committee that such distinction is given to the ex-president or to any individual member of the committee. And I think it is but right that the Executive Member in charge of the portfolio, i. e., the department concerned ought to be the chairman of the select committees of the Legislative Council. I am not in the secret of Government, but there are certain matters which ought to be treated confidentially in the interest of the public by the members of the Executive Council and I therefore think honourable members will agree with me that confidential matters ought to be treated as such and the chairman of the select committee should be the executive member of the department concerned.

The Honourable Sir MAHADEV BHASKAR CHAUBAL:—Your Excellency,—I think the amendment which has been proposed has been so fully discussed that I need not take up the time of this Council at any length. There are, however, only one or two points that occur to me which I propose to mention with reference to the speeches that have been made in support of the amendment and against it. One thing which I fail to understand is what is meant when it is said that the chairman of a select committee has a casting vote. When a select committee is appointed and a bill is referred to it its function is to submit a report to the Council. That is the only object and the only purpose for which a select committee is appointed. The chairman there is I think merely for keeping order and for the regular conduct of proceedings: but I do not think he has ever to decide a point by a casting vote. I am quite open to enlightenment—but supposing there are six members on the select committee, the chairman is one of them, and there is a division of three and three in the report which is going to be submitted, is the chairman on account of his having a casting vote supposed to sign his name twice to the report to make it a report of the majority. In the case I have supposed there will only be two reports—and there can be no majority report. When they come before the Council, it will only see that the committee was equally divided, and individual members can decide for themselves which of the conflicting views recommends itself to them.

Frankly I am not able to understand the Punjab rule which speaks of a casting vote, and I am not inclined to go to the Punjab for light and leading. I have not known an instance in which the chairman of a select committee to which a bill has been referred has given a casting vote and thereby manipulated a report as a majority report. The Honourable MR. PATEL is very astute, and I can see from his interruption in the Honourable the Advocate-General's speech that he has an instance perhaps to quote on the other side. But he is probably thinking of the finance committee's meetings, at one of which I have heard him complain of some point being carried by the chairman's casting vote. But, he will see, there is a distinct provision, to that effect in the rules relating to the financial statement. I refer him to page 206 of the green book where section 4 says: "The Finance Member shall be the chairman of the committee, and in the case of an equality of votes on any matter shall have a second or casting vote." There however one can understand the meaning of the provision. In the Finance Committee you have got to decide whether a certain figure shall be allotted to a certain item of expenditure or not, and there the casting vote may have its importance. Further, assuming that the chairman has given a casting vote—how is it going to affect the weight of the report which will be submitted to this Council? That is one point.

The other point which I wish to refer to in connection with the amendment proposed is that the scope of the amendment in the shape proposed by the select committee extends to all matters, whether bills or others which can be referred to committees under rule 21.

The Honourable Mr. PATEL:—Was that referred to the select committee?

The Honourable Sir MAHADEV CHAUBAL:—I beg the honourable member's pardon. His amendment was an amendment to rule 21 of the rules for the conduct of legislative business, and that rule 21 to which he proposes to put this as an addition contemplates not only references to the select committee in the matter of bills, but with respect to "other matters". That is the reason why you find the difference in language in the amendment proposed by the select committee. The amendment which they recommend reads as follows:—

"The member of the Executive Council, to whom is allotted the business of the department of Government to which the matter referred to the select committee belongs, shall invariably be a member of the select committee. Such member, etc....."

The word "matter" was taken expressly with reference to the language of rule 21 and that of rule 27. I mentioned yesterday that the report of the select committee may be on a matter other than a bill. These are the only rules relating to the appointment of select committees and the amendment as proposed by the select committee is an exhaustive one: while my honourable friend's amendment is limited to the case only of a bill. I am only pointing to an omission, that Mr. PATEL'S amendment even if it is accepted by the Council will not cover the full scope of rule 21 as it exists at present.

There is only one other point to which perhaps a reference with Your Excellency's permission may not be inappropriate. The Honourable Mr. PATEL with his strong democratic leanings resents the bureaucratic "pinnacle of official prestige, albeit tottering", but I wonder if he realised the humour of his reply to His Excellency yesterday, that he considered it to be derogatory to the dignity of an introducer of the bill to sit in a select committee unless he was the chairman. That shows that even the Honourable Mr. PATEL is not above a certain kind of prestige: but if the introduction of a measure for consideration by this assembly is to give the mover of that measure the prestige of presiding as chairman, it may be pardonable in others to hold that a member of the Executive Government, who is responsible for good government, and has ultimately to bear the responsibility of carrying out any measure has and ought to have some prestige. My friend the Honourable the Advocate-General has clearly explained that no such distinction between official and non-official was contemplated by the majority of the select committee. They did contemplate responsibility for government or administration, and my honourable friend may note that this responsibility must attach to an office whether the officer is nominated as at present or elected as he wishes in the halcyon days of democracy.

Then after all, although there is no rule, have we not unconsciously in practice been following the rule as proposed by the select committee?

It is all very well to say that the Executive Member of Government has nothing to do with a private member's bill: but I should like to ask my honourable friends in this Council, in what capacity did my honourable colleague Mr. CURTIS, reply yesterday at the close of the discussion on the Honourable Mr. PATEL'S Medical Bill. What did you all take him to reply to and in what capacity? Was it not as a member in charge of the portfolio to which the subject of the bill belonged? Surely the Honourable Mr. PATEL could not have thought otherwise, when he called for a ruling from the PRESIDENT as to whether two members of Government were entitled to reply. I think you will all agree that when on the whole bill my honourable colleague Mr. CURTIS to whose portfolio the subject discussed yesterday related, replied, we were all unconsciously assuming that he was doing so as the member in charge. Therefore, we have been, notwithstanding that there is no definition of the expression "member in charge" acting upon the supposition that the member in charge is the member of the Executive Government to whose portfolio the subject belongs.

As regards past practice, the Honourable Mr. UPASANI mentioned the Honourable Sir IBRAHIM RAHIMTOOLA'S bill as an instance in which the introducer of the bill worked as the chairman of the select committee. I do not think it is quite accurate to say that. It was the first private bill to be introduced in this Council, and there was some irregularity about the whole procedure of that bill. The first irregularity was that there was no regular leave to introduce asked for. Sir IBRAHIM conceived and drafted his bill and sent it to the Secretary who in accordance with the practice about Government bills sent it straight for publication in the Gazette. So that strictly the bill was introduced by publication before Sir IBRAHIM made his first speech in Council asking for leave to introduce. But it is not correct to say that he worked as the chairman of the select committee. I was in Council for some months in 1912 after the introduction of the bill. So far as I remember there was no regular meeting of the select committee but Sir IBRAHIM frequently came to consult me in connection with the drafting and other points relating to the bill—because I was at that time the member in charge. I do not know what or how it happened but I believe that in the Secretariat proceedings and in the legislative programmes issued every month, the Honourable Sir RICHARD LAMB was put down as the member in charge of the bill. As I have said when that happened and how it happened I am not in a position to state. But it is not correct to cite that as a precedent in support of any practice that the introducer of the bill is necessarily the chairman of the select committee.

COUNCIL BUSINESS RULES.

[Mr. Dattatraya Venkatesh Belvi; Mr. Lalubhai Samaldas; Sir Mahadev Bhaskar Chaubal; Mr. Vithalbhai Jhaverbhai Patel.] [12TH OCTOBER 1917.]

The Honourable Mr. BELVI:—May I ask the Honourable Sir MAHADEV whether it was not because the Honourable Sir IBRAHIM was transferred to the Imperial Legislative Council that another gentleman had to be appointed in his place?

The Honourable Mr. LALUBHAI SAMALDAS:—It is not true; the Honourable Sir IBRAHIM himself moved as follows:—

> "On the present occasion I have heard from the Legal Remembrancer that the Government of India have not yet come to a decision and suggesting that the bill should again be postponed. I have no alternative but to accept the suggestion and I ask the Council to postpone the consideration of the second reading of the bill. I further beg to submit that it would be better, for reasons which I will presently mention, to refer the bill back to the select committee to which the name of the Honourable Sir RICHARD LAMB as chairman and the Honourable Mr. KARANDIKAR be added and the committee be requested to report by the 13th of June."

The Honourable Sir MAHADEV CHAUBAL:—I am much obliged to the Honourable Mr. LALUBHAI SAMALDAS for enlightening me on the point. That makes it quite clear that if it is any precedent at all, it is one the other way and not as erroneously believed by my Honourable friend Mr. UPASANI.

Further it may be doubted how far the person who introduces the bill can strictly be said to be the member in charge of the bill. No doubt he is the mover and introducer of the bill, but the introducer of the bill may not necessarily be the person who can be said to be the member in charge of the bill, before he has been formally put in charge of it.

As regards the Honourable Sir DINSHAW'S speech, I can only say that he struck quite a novel note when he said that the question before the Council was a question of any privilege or right which was going to be conferred on additional members of the Council. I do not look upon the subject in that light at all: and I say further that it ought not to be discussed in that spirit. There is no question of anybody's right or privilege involved here. What we have got to do here is to consider what would be the best procedure to follow when we are considering the responsible question of putting a measure on our statute book. The sole question is in what way the select committee would be serving the interests of this Council and of legislation in the best way, whether they would be best served by leaving the conduct of the proceedings before the select committee to the member who introduces a bill or whether they will be better served by leaving the conduct in the hands of a member of the Executive Council. That is the sole question. I hope no honourable member will harbour any suspicions that Government have any motive in this proposal of denying to additional members any privilege or right.

With these remarks I submit that the amendments proposed by the Honourable Mr. PATEL should not be accepted by this Council.

The Honourable Mr. VITHALBHAI JHAVERBHAI PATEL:—Your Excellency,—I was asked by my honourable friend Sir MAHADEV CHAUBAL to tell him in what capacity my honourable friend Mr. CURTIS addressed the Council yesterday, in what capacity he was replying. I say the Honourable Mr. CURTIS was addressing this Council in his capacity as a member of the Legislative Council, and not as a member in charge of the bill. I was the member in charge of the bill. That is the position which I take up and I submit most respectfully that, so far as legislative functions are concerned, every member of this Council ought to be treated alike. When the Legislative Councils were first constituted under the Indian Councils Act, 1861, it was the desire of the Secretary of State, clearly expressed in his despatches, that every member of the Legislative Council, whether additional or ordinary, should be on the same footing.

His Excellency the PRESIDENT:—Does the honourable member mean to imply that there is no difference at all, in fact or in any other way, between the members of the Executive Council who are for the time being conducting the Government of Bombay and additional members of the Legislative Council whose privilege is generally to criticise? Is there no responsibility for the Government of Bombay? My honourable friend says that every honourable member of this House, be he an Executive Council member, be he a nominated additional member or an elected additional member, is on exactly the same footing in every respect. I just want to ask him this question. Does he say that honourable members who are for the time being executive officers carrying on the Government of Bombay are in no different position from that of any additional members, who have got no responsibility for the government of Bombay and who are probably generally merely critics?

The Honourable Mr. PATEL:—I protest against the remark that the additional members have no responsibility for the good government of the Presidency and that their only privilege is to criticise. I must make it perfectly clear that, so far as the legislative business is concerned, every member of this Council is on a footing of equality. There is no difference between a member of the Executive Council or any additional member. All members, ordinary or additional, are alike so far as the legislative functions of this assembly are concerned. That was the desire of the Secretary of State in 1862, as expressed in his despatches, and I still maintain that that should be so and that they should be all treated alike.

Now my honourable friend Sir MAHADEV CHAUBAL told us that he did not understand what the meaning of the casting vote was so far as select committee on a bill was concerned. I am simply surprised at the ignorance of the honourable member as to what the meaning of the casting vote is so far as the business of a select committee is concerned. Well, every Legislative Council, Provincial or Imperial, has got rules in which it is laid down distinctly that the chairman of a select committee to which a bill is referred has got a casting vote. The authors of those rules, from the point of view of my honourable friend Sir MAHADEV CHAUBAL, were absolutely ignorant or did not know even the A, B, C of the constitution of Councils and their regulations. What is the meaning of those rules of the other Provincial Councils which give a casting vote to the chairman of a select committee in respect of a bill?

The Honourable Sir MAHADEV CHAUBAL:—I want my honourable friend to give me the meaning.

The Honourable Mr. PATEL:—Yes, I am going to give it. The meaning of the casting vote is this. A select committee is appointed to consider a bill. The committee meets and various amendments are discussed and voted upon. Each is put to the vote and every member is entitled to one vote. Supposing there are six members of the select committee, three voting on one side and three voting on the other. Then what is the chairman to do? The chairman has got to submit his report. He therefore gives his casting vote. A report is then made which, as the Council very well knows, is called the majority report. Otherwise what is the meaning of the majority report? How does the majority report come in? The expression used in our rules is, "the majority report of the select committee." Where is the place for the majority report of the select committee when there are three on one side and three on the other? There should, therefore, be a casting vote with the chairman.

His Excellency the PRESIDENT:—A majority report means a report that has been put in by a certain select committee the majority of whom have voted for that report.

The Honourable Mr. PATEL:—If the committee is equally divided, does my honourable friend Sir MAHADEV CHAUBAL mean to say that there should be no majority report by the select committee? I have got a recollection that on one occasion, at any rate, the chairman of a select committee had given a casting vote. If the practice is against the rules, the rules require to be amended, for in the rules of all other Provincial Legislative Councils there are provisions for a casting vote of the chairman of a select committee. In all meetings, local board or municipal, everywhere in fact, the president has a second or casting vote and I cannot understand why in a select committee on a bill it should not be so, particularly when in all other Legislative Councils they have got rules that the chairman of a select committee shall have a casting vote. This is a defect, as there are many other defects, in our Legislative Council rules. The whole lot of our rules require a thorough revision. But that is a different matter, though ultimately that will have to be done and the sooner the better. If Sir MAHADEV'S view is accepted there would be no report at all. However, the point is, if there is no rule at present, we shall have a rule in course of time following the Legislative Councils of the other provinces, and in that case the chairman, will have the advantage of a casting vote. There is no question about it.

His Excellency the PRESIDENT:—May I just suggest to my honourable friend that the question of a casting vote is not of much importance in a select committee? All that a select committee has to do is to report to the full Council and leave it to the full Council to deal with the matter as they think fit. It really does not make much difference.

The Honourable Mr. PATEL:—The difference is this, that when there is a majority report, it comes as the original proposition before this Council. The same is not the case with the minority report. All other members who choose to represent their own views to this Council will have to do so by way of amendments and the mover of the original proposition has always the advantage, as the Honourable Mr. PRANJPYE put it.

His Excellency the PRESIDENT:—Surely, it is very much fairer that each man should have only one vote, so that the Council may know what the exact position was?

The Honourable Mr. PATEL:—Rule 24 at page 199 of the Council Manual, to which my attention is drawn by my honourable friend Mr. HARCHANDRAI, reads as follows:—"The report of the select committee shall be signed by all the members of the committee or by a majority of them; but any member of a select committee may record his views in a separate minute."

His Excellency the PRESIDENT:—Very well; if a committee is of five and say there is a majority of three to two, the majority report will be of three and the minority report of two, to report to the whole Council.

The Honourable Mr. PATEL:—But if there are six members on the select committee, your Excellency, three on one side and three on the other, who will sign the report?

His Excellency the PRESIDENT:—I would suggest that in that case either every one of them will make a separate report, or there would probably be two reports, one of three and the other of three.

The Honourable Mr. PATEL:—However, as I told this Council, all other Provincial Legislative Councils' rules provide that the chairman of the select committee has a casting vote, and we will have also to make similar provision sooner or later.

Much has been made of the expression "tottering pinnacle of prestige" used by me in my minute of dissent. I stated what I felt. It is no use disguising one's feelings. I felt it was so and I said so. My honourable friend Sir MAHADEV CHAUBAL said that I myself valued my prestige when I mentioned that I would not like to be dragged to a select committee over which a member of Government was presiding when I myself was the introducer of the bill. As I maintain that the introducer of a bill should be the chairman of the select committee, I say I would certainly feel humiliated to go and sit on a committee where a person other than the introducer of the bill was presiding, because it is only human nature to resent.

Now I come to the argument of the Honourable the ADVOCATE-GENERAL. He asks why, in the case of an ordinary member of the Council, we should assume that he would act with bias and unfairly when he is the chairman of the select committee on a bill to which he is opposed. I do not say that the member of the Executive Council would deliberately act unfairly, but as I said, it is only human nature, if you have strong views on a particular point, consciously or unconsciously, I would rather say unconsciously, you would be inclined to push the view which you hold strongly. I do not think any explanation is needed with regard to it. So far as the position of a member of the Executive Council is concerned, I have stated in my dissenting minute and I also state now, he has got to voice the views of Government, whatever they may be, in the Council or in the select committee. Where is the question of bias or prejudice? He cannot say "such and such are my personal views but these are the views of Government, and therefore I put them forward." So the question of bias, prejudice or conscience does not arise. As additional members we have certainly freedom of vote and freedom of speech, but so far as members of the Executive Council are concerned, everyone knows that under some disciplinary rules, they have got to, apart from their personal convictions, voice the views of Government. I cannot therefore accept the position that an additional member has in any way a lesser status or a lesser position than a member of the Executive Council. If at all we stand on a better footing. Apart from this, a person who has strong views on a particular question, would, as I have already observed, consciously or unconsciously, try to push his own views before the committee.

Then my honourable friend Mr. STRANGMAN told us that if we were to have distrust of the members of the Executive Government, we better shut up this Legislative Council altogether. Well, I am surprised. I have been for the last 5 years in this Council, and I must speak out plainly, that we non-official members have always tried to trust Government as far as we can. But if there is no response, are we responsible? Do we distrust Government, or is it the officers of Government that distrust the additional members of this Council? If we seek some information, we are told "You are members of the public and it cannot therefore be supplied to you."

His Excellency the PRESIDENT:—I really think the honourable member is raising controversial matter without any foundation in fact whatever.

The Honourable Mr. PATEL:—It was because my honourable friend the Advocate-General said that we were not trusting Government that I felt bound to make these observations.

His Excellency the PRESIDENT:—Has the honourable member asked a question at any time and has he been told that he is a member of the public?

The Honourable Mr. PATEL:—I several times wrote for some information or the other to the Secretaries and I received replies stating that the information was not to be supplied to persons other than officials.

His Excellency the PRESIDENT:—That does not show that he is regarded merely a member of the public.

The Honourable Mr. PATEL:—There is a letter with me which I will produce if need be, which says "this information is not to be supplied to members of the public". If I am wrong there, I am perfectly willing to withdraw my statement. I have several times asked for information from the Secretaries, and I have with me the replies that I received. It is not necessary to shut up the Legislative Council. Let us go on as we have been going on and act in the best interests of the people as far as we can. Of course, if some of the members of this Council would have their own way, they would certainly shut up the business altogether and at once, but there are higher powers. It is not in the hands of one or two individuals.

Then my honourable friend Mr. CADELL made a very startling statement that a person who is the introducer would always be partial towards his bill and he is therefore not a desirable person to be the chairman of the select committee. I am simply surprised at this argument. Does this argument apply only when an additional member is the introducer of a bill? Is that the view put forward by the Honourable Mr. CADELL? If we carry this view to its logical conclusion, then no member of Government who introduces a bill would ever be a chairman of the select committee, but as a matter of fact, in practice, we always find that Government members, as a matter of course, when they introduce bills, become chairmen of select committees.

Then we are told that we should not look for precedent to the rules of other Provincial Legislative Councils. My honourable friend Mr. CURTIS yesterday told us that we must lead. My honourable friend the ADVOCATE-GENERAL endorses that remark and says: "Well, we have to lead; we should not look to other provinces for our lead". I entirely agree. But, as my honourable friend Mr. BELVI put it, if "lead" means giving the executive more and more power, I differ. If that is the meaning of the word "lead" well, better not boast but follow the "lead" of other provinces. What is proposed to be done in this case? It is proposed that the member of the Executive Council, whether he be the introducer of a bill or not, shall invariably be a member and shall also be the chairman of a select committee. Well, that is directly an encroachment on the rights of the additional members of the Council, and, if we are going to consider that to be a "lead" for other Provincial Legislative Councils to be followed, all I say is that it is the reverse of "lead".

Though the Honourable the ADVOCATE-GENERAL tells us not to look for precedents to other Legislative Councils, when it suits his purpose, he says, why not look up to the Imperial Legislative Council rules? I say, why go there for precedent? You have to lead the whole of India; why look up to the Imperial Legislative Council rules at all? However, let us look at the Imperial Council rules. What do they provide? They provide that the law member shall be the chairman of every select committee. In the constitution of the Imperial Legislative Council there is always a law member. Our constitution does not provide for a law member. That is one thing. The second thing is that even though one member of the Executive Council of the Imperial Government is the introducer of a bill, if he is not the law member, he has to sit aside as a mere member. He does not become the chairman of the select committee although he introduces the bill. We are asked here to provide that invariably the member of the Executive Council shall be the chairman of the select committee. There it is not so. There it is distinctly laid down that the law member shall be the chairman of the select committee to which a bill is referred whether the bill be of an ordinary member or of an additional member.

Then, again, my honourable friend Rao Bahadur SATHE yesterday told us that the committee wanted to make the proposed amendment so wide as to include the cases of select committees other than those in respect of bills. Well, I say by all means, if you find that there is a necessity of a rule to provide for selecting a chairman in cases of committees in respect of matters other than bills, you may make such a rule. But, your Excellency, this Council ought to realise that we cannot have the same rules in respect of matters of legislation and the identical rules with respect to matters relating to questions, resolutions, etc. We additional members here in this Council, your Excellency, so far as legislation is concerned, claim to be on equal footing with members who sit on the other side and I submit that all rules relating to the conduct of legislative business should be quite distinct and different from the rules regarding other matters. It has been the accepted principle. So far as legislation is concerned, we have one set of rules; so far as resolutions are concerned, we have a different set of rules; and so far as questions are concerned, we have again a third set of rules. The reason is that on all these matters our position is not identical.

That is the position. I do not intend to say anything about the rules of the House of Commons as I am sure your Excellency will enlighten us on them. My honourable friend Mr. SETHNA has given some description of the rules and the practice of the House of Commons in this respect. I am not prepared to contradict him. I am surprised, your Excellency, some members ask us to look for precedent to the Bombay corporation. I think we had better take the lead from the House of Commons or the other Legislative Councils. But it is ridiculous to ask us to follow the Bombay corporation, which, I submit, is the most backward body in the matter of local self-government. (Laughter.)—

The Honourable Mr. CHUNILAI VIJBHUKHANDAS MEHTA:—I rise to a point of order. We are not discussing the merits of the various local self-governing bodies and—

The Honourable Mr. PATEL:—With these words, sir, I fully trust that the Council will accept my amendment.

His Excellency the PRESIDENT:—I do not mean to detain the Council for more than a few moments, especially after the most convincing speech of my honourable friend the Advocate General and the concluding remarks of my honourable colleague. But it does seem to me that we have all (and I am afraid His Excellency the President has allowed himself to come into that category) allowed ourselves to wander away from what is really the main point that we are discussing under this amendment. I am inclined to think, and I cannot help feeling that other honourable members also are under the same impression, that really the whole of this discussion has been allowed to turn upon the question whether the executive, under the amendment proposed by the select committee, are so very anxious to uphold their prestige, so very averse from being on a footing of equality, with other honourable members of this Council.

Indeed my honourable friend Sir DINSHAW PETIT waxed into eloquence, which I must own appeared to me of a somewhat political character, and made certain remarks which I think might well be used on other occasions and outside the walls of this Council Hall, with regard to the political aspirations of the people and other topics which hardly arise out of the present discussion.

I want to bring the honourable members to what is really the main point. It is not a matter of prestige, it is not a matter of equality. I hope as long as I am President of this Council we shall have no parties in this Council. We are here to legislate individually, not through a caucus or anything of that sort, for the benefit of the Bombay Presidency; there should be no party feeling of any kind or description. The main question is this. Is it a sound proposition, as suggested by the select committee, that the member in charge should always be a member of the Executive Council, or is it a better proposal, as suggested by my honourable friend Mr. PATEL, that in the case of a private bill the chairman of the committee should always be the member who introduces the bill. Personally I am bound to say that to me there seem to be two strong arguments in favour of the member of the Executive Council being always the chairman of the select committee.

Let me take the case of the Honourable Mr. PATEL himself. Perhaps if he had been fortunate yesterday he might have had a private bill to bring before a select committee. The chairman of any select committee is more or less—rather more than less—sitting in a judicial capacity; he has to regulate the discussion in which all the honourable members of the committee take part. He, at all events is not the person who should prominently advocate any point with regard to the bill. I venture to think if my honourable friend Mr. PATEL had been appointed chairman of the select committee on his bill, he would not have had the same opportunity or anything like it, for putting forward as strongly as he might his position with regard to his bill as if a member of the Executive Council had been in the chair.

There is another point. A member of the Executive Council—I am talking of the executive member of the Council who is in charge of the department to which the bill refers—must have much larger opportunities through the Secretariat of giving information to the various members of the committee with regard to the points that arise in connection with the bill; and it seems to me he would be in a far better position to do so as chairman than if the mover of the bill were in the chair and were to apply from time to time for the information he wanted. It is a question of practical expediency, to be decided on those two points. It is not a question of prestige or equality; it is a question of hard fact, which is the better proposition. The select committee by a majority have recommended that the chairman should be a member of the Executive Council, and notwithstanding what other Councils have done, I venture to think that that would be the wiser plan.

Now my honourable friend Mr. HARCHANDRAI made certain remarks with regard to parliamentary procedure and my honourable friend Mr. PATEL has asked me what is the exact procedure. Well, I am bound to say that I cannot recollect with absolute accuracy what the condition of things was in the House of Commons; but as far as I can remember, when the committee met finally, I think that whenever a Government bill was in the House of Commons it went into committee with the Cabinet Minister concerned in charge of the bill. In the case of a private member's bill, as far as I can remember, at the beginning of every session a panel of members was chosen—some 10 or 15—as chairmen of select committees. Whenever any such bill went into committee, one of these gentlemen was selected to take the chair and control the proceedings of that particular committee. It may be, when more private bills come pouring in before Government, that we shall have to adopt a similar course; at any rate I feel perfectly certain of this, that nothing would give more satisfaction to my honourable colleagues than to be relieved of the duty of piloting these committees. Their own duties are heavy enough. But it has been the decided opinion of the select committee that as a business proposition it is the best method of conducting a select committee, and I am bound to say from my experience in the past and from my experience now that I think it would give a better chance to the honourable member who introduces a bill to press his points with regard to the bill than if he were in the chair, and that it would give a better chance to the honourable members on the committee, if the executive member with all the information at his command were in the chair to control the proceedings of the committee. Under these circumstances, Government has decided to oppose the amendment of the honourable member.

The amendment was then put to the vote and lost, 15 members voting for and 27 against. The Council divided as follows :—

His Excellency the PRESIDENT:—Do I understand that the Honourable Mr. CHUNILAL MEHTA wanted to delete the whole of the last two sentences? Because, if that is so, I think I was wrong. I thought that the honourable member, as I understood him, wanted the amendment to go down to the words "select committee" at the end of the first sentence and delete all the rest. Will he tell us exactly what he proposes?

The Honourable Mr. CHUNILAL VIJBHUKHANDAS MEHTA:—Your Excellency,—My amendment at that time was to that effect, but now I see some difficulty in connection with it, because that would then mean that the select committee would have to elect its own chairman in the case of any bill whether it is a private or a Government bill. Therefore I want to leave it as it is; so that the member in charge of the department shall be the chairman in the case of a bill introduced by Government but that in the case of a private bill it shall be open to the select committee to appoint its own chairman.

The Honourable Ráo Bahádur SATHE:—May it please your Excellency,—In this rule after the word "chairman" in line 6 I propose to add the following words: "Where the matter referred to is a bill introduced by an additional member such member shall also invariably be a member of the select committee". The other amendment that I was going to propose was that instead of the words "members present" in line 5 the words "select committee" be substituted.

The Honourable Mr. BELVI:—It seems to me that your Excellency wishes to take votes on the whole proposition as amended by the Honourable Ráo Bahádur SATHE'S amendment. It will be much better if the amendment now suggested by the Honourable Ráo Bahádur SATHE is separately put to the vote so far as those particular words are concerned.

His Excellency the PRESIDENT:—That is exactly what I am going to do now.

The amendment proposed by the Honourable Ráo Bahádur SATHE was then put to the vote and carried.

The Honourable Mr. CHUNILAL VIJBHUKHANDAS MEHTA:—Your Excellency,—The amendment that I wish to move is this: I will read the whole of paragraph 2 of rule 21 as it stands with the additional words as introduced by the Honourable Ráo Bahádur SATHE, but at the end of that paragraph I propose to add the following words:—

"Provided that in the case of a select committee appointed to consider a bill introduced by an additional member the select committee shall elect their own chairman."

His Excellency the PRESIDENT:—I am afraid I cannot admit that amendment. That goes directly against the principle of the amendment of my honourable colleague and accepts the principle of the Honourable Mr. PATEL.

The Honourable Mr. CHUNILAL MEHTA:—The principle that was sought by Mr. PATEL was that the introducer of the bill should be chairman of the select committee. I want to leave it to the select committee to elect its own chairman. I do not say that a member of the Executive Council shall not be chairman of the select committee.

His Excellency the PRESIDENT:—I think there are two objections to the proposal. The one is that it is a direct negative of what we have just decided on the amendment of the Honourable Mr. PATEL, and the further objection is that notice of all amendments of principle must be given before honourable members propose them. Verbal alterations, of course, can be admitted, but this is a matter of principle and I cannot admit it.

The Honourable Mr. PATEL:—May I know, your Excellency, where there is any time specified for giving notice of amendments in the rules?

His Excellency the PRESIDENT:—It is perfectly true as the honourable member suggests that there is no time specified and there is no rule, but it has invariably been the practice with regard to these matters.

The Honourable Mr. CHUNILAL MEHTA:—May I draw your Excellency's attention to rule No. 17 on page 198 of the green book?

COUNCIL BUSINESS RULES.

[12TH OCTOBER 1917.] [The President; Mr. Chunilal Vijbhukhandas Mehta; Mr. Vithalbhai Jhaverbhai Patel; Mr. Abdul Kadir Pathan; Sir Mahadeo Bhaskar Chaubal.]

His Excellency the PRESIDENT:—What my honourable friend says is perfectly true, but I would suggest to him that it would make the conduct of our business almost impossible if we follow exactly on the lines of this rule. The practice has been—and I think it is a good practice—that on matters of principle it is better that honourable members should give written notice. If it is a verbal alteration, it does not matter so much. After all we may go on in this way for another fortnight, if honourable members were to continue to put forward new ideas which occurred to them in the course of discussion, and I must rule that in regard to questions of principle, whatever be the matter to which they relate, notice must be given and that in writing.

The Honourable Mr. CHUNILAL MEHTA:—Do I understand that your Excellency's ruling applies to the present case only or will it apply to all cases in future?

His Excellency the PRESIDENT:—My argument is that it has always applied. It applies to the present case and it will also apply to the future.

The Honourable Mr. PATEL:—Your Excellency, amendments of principle with regard to resolutions have always been allowed in this Council without notice.

His Excellency the PRESIDENT:—What does the honourable member exactly mean? Can he refer me to any specific case?

The Honourable Mr. PATEL:—Last meeting I moved a resolution for opening a training college in Bombay in this Council and an amendment was moved by my honourable friend Mr. CHUNILAL MEHTA. There, your Excellency, there was no notice.

His Excellency the PRESIDENT:—Quite so, but that refers to an entirely different set of rules. Well, I must tell the honourable member that I think that I am perfectly right in this matter. On resolutions which are merely matters which come up for discussion I see no harm in allowing suggestions or amendments being made during the discussion in Council; but in making suggestions or amendments in connection with bills and matters such as this—changes in the rules for the conduct of business in this Council—I think we must have practical suggestions on paper. We cannot have matters of principle continually brought in as amendments while the debate is going on. That is my ruling.

The Honourable Mr. ABDUL KADIR alias FAKIR MAHOMED walad IBRAHIM KHAN PATHAN:—Your Excellency, I now beg to move my amendment to rule 28—

The Honourable Sir MAHADEV BHASKAR CHAUBAL:—Your Excellency,—I rise to speak to a point of order, as to whether the honourable member is entitled to move the amendment which now stands in his name. I will explain what has happened. There is no motion of amendment to the select committee's proposal regarding rule 28 standing in the name of the Honourable Mr. PATEL. There is, however, one in the name of the Honourable Mr. PATHAN. This, however, is identically the amendment to rule 28 of which notice had been given at the July session of the Council by the Honourable Mr. PATEL, and which was referred to the select committee, considered by the committee and reported on. The Honourable Mr. PATEL has transferred the same now to the Honourable Mr. PATHAN. When the select committee's amendments are now before the Council for consideration, is it in order that the time of the Council should again be taken up by the same amendments which the select committee considered, simply owing to the manœuvre by which they appear under the name of the Honourable Mr. PATHAN?

The Honourable Mr. PATHAN:—I object to the statement made by the Honourable Sir MAHADEV CHAUBAL that the Honourable Mr. PATEL has transferred the amendments on to me.

COUNCIL BUSINESS RULES.

[Sir Mahadev Bhaskar Chaubal; Mr. Vithalbhai Jhaverbhai Patel; Mr. Abdul Kadir Pathan.] [12TH OCTOBER 1917.]

The Honourable Sir MAHADEV CHAUBAL :—I would like to know what is the statement to which my honourable friend takes objection? I said that the amendments are identically the amendments of which notice had been given by the Honourable Mr. PATEL at the last meeting of this Council—

The Honourable Mr. PATEL :—And that "the Honourable Mr. PATEL has transferred them on to the Honourable Mr. PATHAN". That is what the Honourable Mr. PATHAN objects to.

The Honourable Sir MAHADEV CHAUBAL :—I beg the honourable member's pardon I withdraw the word "transferred", but I confess my inability to describe the process by which this feat has been achieved.

The Honourable Mr. PATHAN (continuing) :—The amendment which stands in my name is as follows :—

For rule 28 of the said rules the following shall be substituted :—

"28 (1) Subject to the provisions of the Government of India Act, any member may, at a meeting of the Council, introduce a Bill.

(2) Any member desiring to introduce a Bill as aforesaid shall give the Secretary at least two months' previous notice of his intention and shall, together with the notice, send a copy of the Bill and full statements of objects and reasons and other papers which he considers necessary.

(3) The Secretary shall, within ten days from the receipt of the notice prescribed in the previous sub-rule, or, where the Bill requires the previous sanction of the Governor under section 80, sub-section (2), of the Government of India Act, 1915, or the previous sanction of the Governor General under section 79, sub-section (2) or sub-section (3), of the said Act, within ten days from the receipt of such sanction publish the Bill with the statement of objects and reasons in the Bombay Government Gazette.

(4) Provided that, the Governor may order the publication in the Bombay Government Gazette of any Bill at any time. In such case the statement of objects and reasons shall be published with the Bill."

In this connection, my Lord, I would refer to section 80 of the Government of India Act, which runs as follows :—"At a meeting of a local Legislative Council no motion shall be entertained other than a motion for leave to introduce a measure into the Council for the purpose of enactment, or having reference to a measure introduced or proposed to be introduced into the Council for that purpose, or having reference to some rule for the conduct of business in the Council, and no business shall be transacted other than the consideration of those motions or the alteration of those rules."

Now in the majority report it is stated :—"The second main question which we have considered is whether the procedure at present provided for in rule 28, according to which a member desiring to introduce a bill first asks leave of the Council for its introduction, should be done away with, as proposed in the Honourable Mr. PATEL'S group of amendments dealing with rule 28. The stage of legislation in question is recognized in section 80 of the Government of India Act, 1915, and in the rules of all Legislative Councils in India, and we are of opinion that no case has been made out for its abolition." And further on they say : "Government bills, however, stand on a somewhat different footing from additional members' bills. A Government bill is generally the outcome of prolonged consideration", and so on. In this connection, they make this difference between a Government bill and a private member's bill. They say in the case of a Government bill the leave stage is invariably dispensed with, but it cannot be dispensed with in the case of a private bill. Of course there is a proviso (5) to rule 28, by which the Governor may order the publication in the Bombay Government Gazette of any bill although no motion has been made for leave to introduce it. But I submit that no such differentiation can be made between a Government bill and a private member's bill, and I seriously doubt, having regard to this provision of section 80, if such distinction can be drawn between a Government bill and a private bill. If that is so—

The Honourable Sir MAHADEV CHAUBAL:—May I rise to a point of order? I think the honourable member is speaking to his amendment which proposes to omit the leave-to-introduce stage, as is proposed in clause (1), namely, "Subject to the provisions of the Government of India Act, any member may, at a meeting of the Council, introduce a bill", and I understand the amendment is to omit altogether the leave-to-introduce stage. When the honourable member proceeds to address on the point that the motion for leave-to-introduce stage should be introduced in Government bills, the matter is not one which is covered by the amendment which he proposes and would be an entirely new matter.

The Honourable Mr. PATHAN:—My point is this, my Lord. There are certain bills which require the sanction of the Governor or Governor-General and others which do not require such sanction.

His Excellency the PRESIDENT:—Is the honourable member speaking on his amendment or is he not? Will he explain to me exactly what he is doing?

The Honourable Mr. PATHAN:—My position is this, that if leave stage can be legally dispensed with in the case of Government bills, it should be dispensed with also in connection with private bills.

His Excellency the PRESIDENT:—I cannot see anything about the leave stage in the honourable member's amendment.

The Honourable Mr. PATHAN:—I propose that if the leave stage is dispensed with in the case of Government bills it ought to be dispensed with for private bills and if that is done, my rules I think would be acceptable, because my amendment proceeds on that footing. With these remarks I move my amendment.

The Honourable Mr. VITHALBHAI JHAVERBHAI PATEL:—Your Excellency,—I rise now to move my amendment.

The Honourable Sir MAHADEV CHAUBAL:—May I be permitted to interrupt my honourable friend and ask if this batch of amendments can be moved as amendments to the select committee's report? There was no notice of any amendments to rules 29 and 30 at the July meeting and therefore none were referred to the select committee. As to rule 28, it is now clear why that manœuvre, the description of which as a transfer was objected to, has taken place. The Honourable Mr. PATEL, who strenuously contended that the motion for leave to introduce a bill should be dispensed with, and on which point he has written a dissenting minute at some length, obviously finds it awkward to contend at the same sitting that the motion for leave-to-introduce stage should be insisted upon in every case. I submit that the select committee's recommendations should be voted on: and then the Honourable Mr. PATEL'S present amendments be considered as substantive amendments to the rules. It is entirely new matter.

The Honourable Mr. PATEL:—It is not a different matter at all. If my amendments are not considered side by side with the amendments moved by my honourable friend Sir Mahadev Chaubal on behalf of the majority of the select committee, then it means that my amendments will not be considered at all. There is one question, and one only, and that is, whether the leave stage in respect of bills should be dispensed with or not? My amendment says that there should be a leave stage for every bill and the Governor should not have power to dispense with that stage. That is the purpose of my amendment. The select committee's amendments provide that all bills should ordinarily come in the form of a motion for leave, but that the Governor should have power to dispense with that stage. Now if my amendments are not considered side by side and the select committee's amendments are carried, then my amendments would necessarily drop.

His Excellency the PRESIDENT:—I think there is a good deal of justice in what the Honourable Mr. PATEL says, but I think we had better finish with the Honourable Mr. PATHAN'S amendments first, and then we would take the Honourable Mr. PATEL'S amendments in connection with the select committee's report.

The Honourable Mr. PATEL:—Then, your Excellency, without prejudice to the amendment which I have given notice of, I rise to support the amendments moved by the Honourable Mr. PATHAN. The position is this: According to the Honourable Mr. PATHAN'S amendment, I understand there should be no motion for leave to introduce any bill. The bill should be allowed to be introduced in this Council without any motion for leave in that behalf in the first instance. That is being done if I understand the situation right, in the case of all Government bills at present. Every Government bill, so far as I understand the practice of this Council, comes not in the form of a motion for leave to introduce, but for the first reading all at once. The process under which they come directly to this Council for the first reading, I am not aware of. As a matter of fact, under rule 28 (2) every member of this Council who wants to introduce a bill, whether he is an additional member or whether he is an ordinary member of the Council, is required to give two months' notice to the Secretary of his intention to make a motion for leave to introduce it. Rule 28 (1) says:—

"Any member desiring to move for leave to introduce a bill as aforesaid shall give the Secretary at least two months' previous notice of his intention and shall, together with the notice, send a copy of the bill and a full statement of objects and reasons, and any other necessary papers".

My contention is this, that the word "member" occurring in rule 28 (1) and (2) applies equally to ordinary as well as additional members of this Council. The Government of India Act under which these rules were framed knows no distinction between an ordinary member and an additional member of this Council in this respect. Therefore, I submit, your Excellency, that so long as a member is not defined by any rule, we take it that member means an additional member or an ordinary member. I therefore submit, your Excellency, that a member of Government or an ordinary member of Council, if he wants to introduce a bill, has under sub-rule (2) of rule 28 to give notice of his intention to the Secretary to move for leave in the first instance. I am not aware whether this is being done in practice or not, because I am not in the inner circle, but I know this much that every Government bill comes here for the first reading all at once. Probably an ordinary member does give two months' notice to the Secretary. However, what we who are not in the know as to the way and the manner in which these bills of Government are brought into this Council merely understand is that Government bills come for the first reading all at once. I therefore maintain, your Excellency, as my honourable friend Mr. PATHAN maintains, that if Government bills come into this Council all at once for the first reading, there is absolutely no reason why there should be differential treatment in the case of bills of additional members. It may be stated that when an additional member gives notice of motion to introduce a bill Government must have some time to be ready. There may be some justification in this plea when only 3 or 7 days' time was prescribed for notice, but since my honourable friend Sir MAHADEV CHAUBAL joined this Council in 1915, this Council has altered the rule on his motion and provided that two months' notice should be given by additional members before they bring in a bill. Such being the case, I submit, your Excellency, that there should be no differential treatment accorded to non-official bills. You get two months' notice, you report the bill to the Secretary of State, and you also report it to the Government of India if you like, and there is plenty of time. There are two months within which you could be ready. There is therefore no reason why there should be a motion for leave to introduce a bill in the case of non-official members. The Government of India Act never contemplated, and did not as a matter of fact recognize, any distinction between a bill of Government and that of a non-official member.

The second point raised by the Honourable Mr. Pathan is that in the case of bills which require the previous sanction of the Governor or the Governor-General under section 80 or 79 respectively of the Government of India Act, the secretary shall not publish the bill unless such sanction has been obtained. That being so, a bill shall not appear on the agenda for the first reading unless and until such sanction has been obtained. The Secretary is given power under the rules proposed by the Honourable Mr. PATHAN to publish the bill in the local Government Gazette ten days after the receipt of the necessary sanction, and therefore there is no fear that in cases where the sanction of the Governor-General or the Governor is required any additional member will rush into this house and move for the first reading of such a bill. So what I maintain is that there is ample provision in Mr. Pathan's amendment to prevent such a result in the case of bills which require the sanction of the Governor General or the Governor. The sanction contemplated is required at the time of the introduction. The law says it shall not be lawful for any member of this Council, whether ordinary or additional, to introduce any bill which requires the previous sanction of the Governor or the Governor-General, without such sanction. So before the bill is introduced the rules provide that the secretary shall not publish the bill in the local Government Gazette.

Under these circumstances I heartily support the amendment put forward by my honourable friend Mr. PATHAN, of course without prejudice to the amendment that I am going to submit to this Council.

The Honourable Mr. BALKRISHNA SITARAM KAMAT:—May it please your Excellency,—I am afraid I must oppose the amendment standing in the name of the Honourable Mr. PATHAN. The Honourable Mr. PATHAN has given certain reasons why the leave stage ought to be abolished, his principal reason being that he claims there should be equal advantages both for Government bills as well as for private bills.

So far as the principle of equality is concerned I agree with him. But I do not agree with the conclusion to which he jumps. If there ought to be equality, let there be a leave stage both for private as well as Government bills. But the leave stage must be there, on this ground that after all, I believe, it is the function of the members of this Council to judge whether a particular draft of a bill, whether framed by a private member or by the legal department of the Government, should be approved of and pushed on further after such approval.

I believe even in the House of Commons there is the leave stage, and under rule 164 of the House of Commons, so far as my information goes, every bill introduced is pushed on through its various stages in pursuance of that order of the House of Commons, granted on a motion for leave to introduce.

It might happen that if this amendment is accepted either the Honourable Mr. PATHAN or, say, the Honourable Mr. PATEL may draft a particular bill and send it on to the secretary, and what Mr. Pathan wants is that the bill should be published at once in the Government Gazette, so that no colleague of his knows anything whatsoever of the principle, of the propriety, or the desirability of the measure.

I therefore think that this is a procedure which is not very sound. We, as the colleagues of the Honourable Mr. PATEL or the Honourable Mr. PATHAN, ought to have and ought to know the nature of the draft bill before it appears in the Government Gazette. These are the privileges of honourable members of this Council, viz., to know what that bill is and then grant that motion; that is to say, grant the leave to introduce that bill, with a view that the Honourable Mr. PATEL should at a later stage come here again and introduce it formally in the regular manner. So far as regards the principle whether there should be a leave stage or not.

The second point which has been touched on by the Honourable Mr. PATHAN and supported by the Honourable Mr. PATEL is regarding certain bills requiring the sanction of the Governor in the one case or the Governor-General in the other under section 80 or 79 of the Government of India Act. Here I perfectly well agree that it is necessary that in the case of bills affecting public revenues the Governor should have the right and prerogative to give his sanction or to refuse it. Similarly, if the bill affects the religion or religious rites and usages of any class of British subjects in India, under section 79 (e) of the Government of India Act the sanction of the Governor-General is required. Under these circumstances when a bill is to be taken into consideration it is perfectly legitimate that the Governor-General should have the right to say whether a bill of the nature should be introduced into the Council. The only question, however, is whether the motion for asking leave to introduce a bill should be made before the receipt of Government sanction, or in other words, whether we should wait for the sanction even for the formal purpose of asking for leave to introduce a bill. I know under section 80, sub-clause (2), that is a requisite and an obligatory requisite, but is it a pre-requisite? That clause says that it shall not be lawful for any member of a local Council to introduce without the previous sanction of the Governor any measure affecting public revenues. But that sanction or sub-clause does not clearly and specifically lay down that it shall not be lawful to come here for leave to introduce. A motion for leave to introduce is quite different from the actual introduction. That is the only difference. I do not contend that a member should be at liberty to introduce a bill without the Governor's sanction. But I think it should be open to him to come to this Council with his draft and ask for leave to introduce. It is only a question of construction. I am afraid both sub-clauses (1) and (2) of section 79 are not clear and therefore, as the majority report says, this construction is in consonance with the principle of section 80 and section 79. But after all when it becomes a matter of construction every member, I suppose, is at liberty to draw his own inference.

I contend that under section 80, sub-clause (1), if we read it very carefully, the construction which perhaps is placed on this section by some honourable members is not correct. Section 80, clause (1), says: "At a meeting of a local legislative council no motion shall be entertained other than a motion for leave to introduce a measure into the council for the purpose of enactment, or having reference to a measure introduced or proposed to be introduced into the council for that purpose, or having reference to some rule for the conduct of business in the council, and no business shall be transacted other than the consideration of those motions or the alteration of those rules." If we read that and if we construe it, it only means that a member is at liberty to come here with a motion for leave to introduce. Only sub-clause (2) of section 80 says: "It shall not be lawful for any member of any local legislative council to introduce, without the previous sanction of the Governor, any measure affecting the public revenues of the province or imposing any charge on those revenues." That is the construction which I place upon section 80, sub-clause (1). Similarly section 79, sub-clause (3), is also not very clear. It says: "The local legislature of any province may not, without the previous sanction of the Governor-General, make or take into consideration any law affecting the matters referred to in the sub-clauses." The wording there is "The local legislature may not". It does not specify "The local legislature shall not", and if we proceed further, under sub-clause (5) of section 79 it is laid down "Provided that an act or a provision of an act made by a local legislature, and subsequently assented to by the Governor-General in pursuance of this act, shall not be deemed invalid by reason only of its requiring the previous sanction of the Governor-General under this act." It clearly means that if any act receives the subsequent sanction of the Governor-General, it is not invalid; that is to say, such sanction validates the act although it may have been passed in this Council without obtaining the previous sanction of the Governor-General. Under this construction, therefore, I contend that although the sanction of the Governor-General or the Governor in the first instance is certainly necessary, that sanction could be obtained even after a motion for leave is discussed. Now, I would like to quote an instance from another Legislative Council—

The Honourable Mr. BELVI:—I rise to a point of order, your Excellency. I want to know whether the reasons that have been advanced by the honourable member are not reasons in support of the amendment which stands in the name of my honourable friend Mr. PATEL. The Honourable Mr. KAMAT'S remarks are hardly relevant to the amendment which we are now considering.

His Excellency the PRESIDENT:—I understand the Honourable Mr. KAMAT is referring to the amendment of the Honourable Mr. PATHAN.

The Honourable Mr. KAMAT:—Yes, your Excellency, and I am also taking into consideration the majority report. I am referring to page 1 of the agenda, sub-clause (6), and the amendment of the Honourable Mr. PATHAN. May I explain to my honourable friend Mr. BELVI that the question before the Council is whether, immediately after the sanction from the Governor or the Governor-General is received, a bill should be published in the Bombay Government Gazette and introduced, or whether there should be the first step of leave to introduce, and then sanction, and last of all publication. I suppose we are on that point.

His Excellency the PRESIDENT:—The honourable member is perfectly correct in discussing, as he is now doing, sub-clauses (3) and (4) of the Honourable Mr. PATHAN'S amendment.

The Honourable Mr. KAMAT:—Then I say that the procedure which the Honourable Mr. PATHAN suggests is not the right one. I maintain that there should be first the leave-to-introduce stage, and if a bill requires the sanction of the Governor or the Governor-General, even then we should proceed with the motion for leave-to-introduce any particular bill and we need not wait for the sanction of the Government of India or the Governor-General as suggested in the majority report. The leave-to-introduce stage is necessary and we need not wait for the sanction of the Governor so far as the granting of leave to introduce is concerned. In support of this view I quote the instance of other Legislative Councils. In the Madras Legislative Council, a few years ago, the Post Puberty Marriage bill was introduced by the Honourable Mr. SASTRI. This bill concerned the religious rights of the Hindus and therefere it came under section 79, sub-clause (3), of the Government of India Act, for which sanction is obligatory. But I say that sanction may be obtained at a later stage. That is the only contention which I am making. And as a matter of fact the members of the Madras Legislative Council in the case cited by me discussed whether leave should be granted or not, although the Government of India had not granted sanction at that particular stage. What I maintain is that there is convenience in this way of looking at this question of the sanction of the Governor or the Governor-General, as the case may be. We must consider which is the best or the most convenient way of affording to Government or to the Government of India an opportunity of considering whether sanction should be granted. I believe that if a draft bill is discussed at the leave stage, Government would be in a better position to know the trend of public opinion and they could grant their sanction or not according to the discussion on that particular draft bill in the Legislative Council at the time of the motion for leave. That is an advantage which would be lost if the procedure recommended by the majority report is followed. Referring again to the instance which I have quoted, it so happened that the bill was allowed to be discussed at the first stage, namely, the stage of leave to introduce. In the meantime public feeling was aroused and the Government of India and the Madras Government were in a better position to know the feelings of the Presidency and to judge whether the country was ripe for the adoption of such principles in Hindu religious rights, and they based their opinion on the discussion which went on in the Legislative Council. That is an advantage which I claim would follow if the motion for leave to introduce is discussed irrespective of the sanction to be received from the Government of India. I therefore only suggest, in respect of the Honourable Mr. PATHAN'S proposition, that the leave stage is necessary. We need not wait for such sanction; we can discuss the draft bill at the time of the motion for leave to introduce and wait for the sanction in the light of the discussions which might take place at the leave stage.

That is the only proposition which I wish to put forward and suggest that it be accepted.

The Honourable the Advocate General (Mr. T. J. STRANGMAN):—Your Excellency,—The object of the Honourable Mr. PATHAN'S amendment is to do away with the necessity in all cases of the motion for leave to introduce.

I must begin by saying that I find a little difficulty in appreciating the position of the Honourable Mr. PATEL. He supports the Honourable Mr. PATHAN'S amendment and also his own amendment which is diametrically opposite and the object of which is to insist on the necessity of the motion for leave to introduce in every case.

The Honourable Mr. PATEL:—The position is perfectly clear. The Honourable the Advocate General has not quite understood it. I am for motion for leave to introduce in every bill whether of Government or of a private member. But if this Council comes to the conclusion that there should be no motion for leave to introduce in the case of Government bills, there should be, under the circumstances, no motion for leave to introduce in the case of a private bill also.

The Honourable the Advocate General:—I can understand a person wanting the leave stage in every case or wanting to do away with it altogether. I cannot understand his wanting both. However, we are now discussing whether leave should be done away with. Now, the result of giving effect to this amendment has been pointed out in the report of the select committee. I will take a case where, in fact, no sanction under section 79 or section 80 is required. In such a case the result of adopting this proposal would be that two months after the notice is given to the secretary the bill would be put down for the first reading. Now, it was considered by the select committee that that period was wholly inadequate, and the reason is this. Three different stages have to be gone through. In the first place, Government have to consider whether or not the bill offends against the provisions of section 79 (4) of the Government of India Act, that is to say, whether it attempts to affect an act of Parliament.

In the second place, they have to consider whether or no sanction is required under section 79 (2) or (3) or under section 80, sub-section (2). Then having decided those questions, they have to consider the policy of the bill; and lastly, they have to consider the drafting of the bill. Now in considering whether or no the bill requires sanction under one of these sections and in considering the policy of the bill frequent consultation and communication may be necessary with the Government of India and Sir Mahadev Chaubal assured us in committee that it was absolutely impossible in ordinary circumstances to go through all these operations in the space of two months and for that reason the select committee reported against this proposal.

Now it is perfectly true that in the case of Government bills the leave-to-introduce stage does not take place and advantage is taken of rules 28 and 29 to publish the bill in the Bombay Government Gazette, and the effect of publication is that the leave-to-introduce stage is rendered unnecessary. But entirely different considerations apply in the case of Government bills. These bills, as we were again assured by Sir Mahadev Chaubal in committee, are the result of very mature deliberation and of frequent consultation with the Government of India. It may be that a year or more is spent in preparation before the actual publication of the bill. Consequently, I say, they stand on an entirely different position from bills of which Government know nothing until they are placed before them. Now I would point out that the power conferred upon His Excellency by rule 28 (5), coupled with rule 29, is not confined to Government bills. It applies to all bills and it was, in fact, exercised in the case of my honourable friend Mr. PATEL'S compulsory education bill, and no doubt the reason for the exercise of that power was that, in view of all the circumstances, the matter could be put through within the two months to which I referred. But it does not follow, of course, that that period of two months would be sufficient or anything like sufficient in the case of other bills. And at the same time it does not follow, of course, that His Excellency will not exercise the power in the case of other private bills, provided no difficulties arise in considering the matters to which I referred.

For these reasons I propose to oppose the amendment.

The Honourable Sir MAHADEV BHASKER CHAUBAL:—Your Excellency,—I will say a very few words, and those too not with reference to any rule or its construction, but I will rather appeal to the commonsense and practical judgment of the members of this Council in the consideration of this question. I request the attention of honourable members to the latter portion of my amendment as it stands, i.e., sub-rule (6), second portion. It runs as follows:—"and the motion for leave to introduce such bill shall not be made until such sanction has been received". Now I wish to state to this Council as I said to the select committee that this was put in at the express instance of the Government of India who insisted that the leave-to-introduce stage should precede all bills whatsoever, I mean, wherever any sanction of the Governor or of the Governor-General is necessary, i.e., bills coming under section 80, clause (2), of the Government of India Act. Well, the relevancy and importance of this remark must be considered in the light of section 83 (2). There is no doubt that this Council has got power to make alterations in the rules that have been framed, but this power is subject to the sanction of the Governor, and further, subject to the veto of the Governor-General as you will see from the wording at page 43: "but any alteration so made may be disallowed by the Governor-General in Council, and if so disallowed shall have no effect". What I ask is, is it any good wasting time discussing the propriety of a provision which has been adopted at the express instance of the Government of India, and is it likely that the Governor would sanction or the Governor-General allow an alteration which goes against the express direction of the Government of India. Further, they have adopted identically the same provision in the rules relating to the conduct of legislative business in the Viceroy's Council. If notwithstanding this we adopt an altered rule as proposed by the Honourable Mr. PATEL, will it be a matter for congratulation that this Council should have passed a rule which cannot receive the sanction of the Governor or which, if received, is disallowed by the Governor-General?

Then coming to the question of construction, I think the Honourable Mr. KAMAT, when he referred to the Madras proceedings in connection with a certain bill, ought also to have referred to what has been stated on the point in the select committee's report. In paragraph (2) of the last sentence it is stated :—"This recommendation we may mention is in accord with the decision on the question in the Madras Legislative Council and in accordance with the rules in force in the Imperial Legislative Council". I have not got the proceedings with me of the Madras Legislative Council for March 1917, but if you refer to them you will find that there is a very long and erudite debate extending over several pages of closely printed matter, at the end of which they adopted rules which stand as rules 31 and 32, and clause (2) of rule 31 runs as follows :—

> "(2) where the previous sanction of the Governor-General or the Governor, as the case may be, is required under the Government of India Act, 1915, to the introduction of any bill, no motion for leave to introduce it shall be made unless such sanction has been given."

So that rule 31 is the one that we have got to deal with and you will find that identically the objection which was mentioned by the Honourable Mr. KAMAT about the construction of section 80, clause (2), was considered there and the construction which they have put upon it is the construction which the select committee has adopted in the rules which they have submitted. It is also the rule which stands now as rule 16 in the Imperial Council rules in which the leave-to-introduce stage refers to all bills. For these reasons I submit that the amendment which has been moved by the Honourable Mr. PATHAN should not be accepted by this Council and that the report of the select committee on this point be accepted by the Council.

The Honourable Mr. ABDUL KADIR alias FAKIR MAHOMED walad IBRAHIM KHAN PATHAN :—Your Excellency,—I have only one word to say in regard to this matter. It is stated that two months' time is not sufficient. I think that with the resources at the disposal of Government, the information that they possess and their staff, the time is more than sufficient.

As regards the leave stage, it is dispensed with in the case of Government bills, and if the Council also think that it should be dispensed with in regard to a bill introduced by an additional member, I hope they will come to one conclusion only, that the amendment I propose should be inserted in the Council business rules. It depends upon a matter of principle. If the leave stage ought to be dispensed with in the case of Government bills, it ought also to be dispensed with in the case of an additional member's bill.

With these words, I hope the Council will have no objection to the insertion of the amendment in the rules.

The amendment was put to the vote and lost.

The Honourable Mr. VITHALBHAI JHAVERBHAI PATEL :—May it please your Excellency,—Before I read the amendments that I want to place before the Council I should like to invite once more the attention of the Council to the present procedure as contained in rule 28. Under it, a member gives two months' notice of his intention to introduce a bill to the secretary and sends with it a copy of the bill together with the statement of objects and reasons. Thereafter at a meeting of the Council he makes a motion for leave to introduce that bill. The secretary then publishes the bill in the Bombay Government Gazette; such publication is according to rule 29 (2) equivalent to the introduction of the bill. Sub-rule (5) of rule 28 gives power to the Governor to order the publication of the bill although no motion for leave to introduce it has been formally made. Such publication under the orders of the Governor is also under rule 29 (2) equivalent to introduction. Now, that power contained in sub-rule (5) of rule 28 has been invariably exercised to the knowledge of all members of this Council in favour of all Government bills and exercised only once in favour of a private bill. It may be said that there were not more than three private bills, but if the honourable members will look up the proceedings of the Legislative Council in earlier years, say, 1862, 1863, and onwards, they will find that a number of bills were introduced by private members in those days. There is absolutely no question that the honourable additional members of this Council used to bring a good many bills in this Council. Now in all those bills they were required to make a motion for leave. What I submit now is that every bill whether of Government or of additional member's should come before this Council in the form of a motion for leave. That should be the first step in connection with every bill. There is no question, your Excellency, that the leave stage is an essential stage of the bill. My honourable friend Sir MAHADEV CHAUBAL has told us that the leave stage is an essential stage. Under the Government of India Act, section 80, clause (1), the leave stage or a motion for leave to introduce a bill is a necessary stage. Now the question before the Council is as to whether that motion for leave to introduce a bill should be determined upon by this Council or should be determined upon by one individual, namely, the Governor. Under rule 28 (5) power is given to the Governor to dispense with the leave stage. My submission to this Council is that a motion for leave to introduce a bill being an essential stage, the bill should come before this Council and it is this Council who should determine in each case whether leave should be granted or not. That is the position I take. I most respectfully maintain that the rule empowering the Governor to dispense with the leave stage is ultra vires of the Government of India Act.

His Excellency the PRESIDENT:—I do not think my honourable friend can complain if I say that I think he is a most ungrateful person.

The Honourable Mr PATEL:—I distinctly remember that His Excellency was pleased to dispense with the leave stage in the case of my primary education bill, but I do think that my action in asking His Excellency to dispense with the leave stage, when as a matter of fact he had no legal power to do so, was wrong, and His Excellency's action in granting leave was also wrong. In every legislative assembly, in all constitutional countries, there is the leave stage and it is the Legislative Council that determines the question whether leave to introduce a bill should be granted or not. Now, let us see how and when the Governor got these powers. The position seems to be that when the Legislative Council was constituted under the Indian Councils Act, 1861, a section of that act gave power, in the first instance, to the executive Government to make rules for the conduct of business of Legislative Council. Now, before the Council as constituted under the Act met for the first time the executive Government made the rules for the conduct of its business:

Now, the Act merely empowered the executive Government to make rules for the conduct of the business of the Legislative Council. It did not empower the executive Government to deprive this Council of one of its most important functions, namely, to determine upon a motion for leave to introduce a bill. No doubt the rules were made by the Government under the Government of India Act, but that Act never contemplated that the Government would by those rules deprive the Legislative Council of one of its most important functions in regard to legislation. Under the Act, the Government may make rules merely for the conduct of the ordinary business of the Legislative Council. Your Excellency, at the very first meeting of the Legislative Council under the Indian Councils Act, 1861, this question was discussed and the Honourable Mr. Westropp, the then Advocate General of 1862, pointed out to Government—

The Honourable Sir MAHADEV CHAUBAL:—Will the honourable member permit me to point out that in what he speaks now he is ignoring the answer which Government has given to his question 49 (b)? The question was—

The Honourable Mr. PATEL:—I have not lost sight of that. The question which I had asked your Excellency was this:—

"Is it true that the power to dispense with the leave stage of a bill was vested in the Governor by a rule made by the Governor in Council?"

The answer was "No."

But when I asked the next question, "When was such a rule first made?" the answer was "The rule was adopted by the Legislative Council at the meeting held on the 1st of February 1865 on the motion of the Honourable Sir W. Mansfield." When was it first made? That question Government have not answered. I maintain that the answer as given is incorrect. I find from the Council proceedings of 1862 and 1863 that at the very first meeting it was pointed out to Government that the rules made by them needed immediate revision in material particulars. In this connection I should like to invite the attention of the council to the following reply given by Government to the first part of my question asked yesterday. It is as follows:—

"The first meeting of the Bombay Legislative Council was held on 22nd January 1862; the first rules of business, made by the Governor in Council under section 37 of the Indian Councils Act, 1861, were prepared before that date in accordance with the Act."

From this reply it is clear that some rules were made for the conduct of legislative business by the executive Government before the first meeting of the Legislative Council. At that meeting, however, it was pointed out by the then Advocate General that the rules required revision. He was thereupon asked to prepare a draft. At the next meeting he submitted his draft and made some observations in regard to it. He proposed, among other things, that there should always be a leave stage in the case of Government bills. When he pointed that out, the then President of the Council said: "No; the leave stage in the cases of Government bills should be dispensed with." The original rule empowering the executive Government to dispense with the leave stage thus remained as it stood. Then the Secretary of State wrote to the Government of India to ask the Bombay Government to amend the said rule in accordance with the spirit of the Government of India Act. A select committee was then appointed by the Bombay Council. The committee recommended that a motion for leave was necessary in respect of Government bills. In presenting the report of the select committee the Honourable Sir W. Mansfield pointed out that it was the desire of the Secretary of State for India to treat the additional members of the Legislative Council on a footing of equality with members of Government, and that therefore, they had amended the rule accordingly. The report was accepted by the then Council, but when the rules were sent to the Government of India the Government of India said:—

> "No; we do not agree with you in this. You may have a general rule that there should be a motion for leave to introduce every bill, but we are not in favour of taking away entirely the power of the executive Government to dispense with the leave stage."

The Governor General refused to sanction the revised rule and asked the Council to allow the rule empowering the executive Government to dispense with the leave stage to stand. The Council had, under the circumstances, to accept that position, and thus the rule remains upto this day as it was framed originally before the act of 1861. This, in short, is the history of the question as far as I have been able to gather from my perusal of the Legislative Council proceedings from the year 1862 to 1865, and I should be very glad if the Honourable Sir MAHADEV CHAUBAL or the Advocate General would correct me if and where I am wrong.

Now if the motion for leave to introduce is a necessary preliminary to the introduction of a bill, I cannot understand, your Excellency, how the executive Government can deprive this Council of that function, and I go further and say, how can this Council, even if they were so inclined, delegate that power to the Governor? It is the essential function of this Council to determine whether leave should be granted or not. This is, however, not a case of delegation at all, because the executive have taken the power to themselves by a rule. But even if it were a case of delegation, I respectfully submit that this Council has no power to delegate its function to the executive Government.

The Honourable Sir MAHADEV CHAUBAL:—It is not delegated to the executive Government, but it is delegated to the Governor.

The Honourable Mr. PATEL:—I have not found any section in the Government of India Act under which the Legislative Council can delegate one of its important functions to one individual, even though that individual may be the Governor or the Governor-General. The Honourable the Advocate General tells us that the executive Government is responsible for the good government of the country. Then, why not accept that position and delegate all the powers of the Legislative Council to the Governor and shut up the Legislative Council altogether? I again say that these powers were vested in the Governor not by this Council, that the executive Government, by making rules, took those powers to themselves, that in 1865 when the Legislative Council made an attempt to have to itself those powers the Government of India came in its way, and there we are since. I respectfully submit that it is high time that we should resume those powers to ourselves. It is only right that this assembly should have the power to determine whether a motion for leave to introduce a bill should be allowed or not. We have had enough experience in the past and from that experience we must take a lesson; our delegate has exercised the power vested in him invariably in favour of Government bills and only in one case in favour of a private bill. That being so, I do not know why this Council should not stand on its rights now and say "Well, Mr. Delegate, we resume the powers to ourselves and we will exercise them as we like".

My honourable friend Sir MAHADEV CHAUBAL told us "What is the good of wasting time over these matters? The Government of India is sure to overrule us. They won't sanction such rules even if we make them." Well, I respectfully submit, your Excellency, that if we represent our case in a proper manner, the Governor-General will agree to the position that we take up now. No doubt the Governor-General overruled us in 1865, but it is now 52 years and it is high time that we should go once more to the Governor-General and say "Well, now the times are changed and we propose to have the motion for leave to introduce determined by ourselves and we do not want the Governor to determine it." I am perfectly certain that the Governor-General will respect the opinion of this Council.

Before I proceed to consider the second part of my amendment I should like to draw the attention of this Council to the despatch of the Secretary of State in regard to a similar rule of the Imperial Legislative Council. My honourable friend Sir MAHADEV CHAUBAL told us yesterday that the Secretary of State had reconsidered his decision. I shall be glad if the Honourable Sir MAHADEV would show me the authority for his statement. So far, I find nothing to that effect from the Council proceedings. The despatch I refer to is as follows:—

"A rule, the practical effect of which is that instead of moving for leave to introduce a bill into the Council a member may send it to the Secretary to the Government in the Home Department to be dealt with as if leave has been given to introduce it, appears to me open to serious objection. The power, vested in this Council at its meeting for making laws and regulations, of exercising a control over the introduction of the bills is not to be considered a matter of form. There are certain subjects in regard to which the Council has no power to legislate; there are others in regard to which no member or additional member can introduce a bill without the previous sanction of the Governor-General; and others again in regard to which it may for obvious reasons be highly inexpedient to attempt legislation. In all such cases the power of imposing a check upon the introduction of bills can be most effectively exercised at meetings of the Council. It must be further borne in mind that on such questions the additional as well as ordinary members have the privilege of voting. But the practice under your rules would go to deprive them of that privilege. The Government might, indeed, refuse to take any steps upon a bill sent to the Secretary, but it is not fitting or expedient that the members of the Executive Council alone should exercise a power which belongs to every member of the Council when assembled for making laws and regulations. For these reasons I am of opinion that the initiative step for the introduction of every bill should be taken at some such meeting of the Council."

So, both on the ground of illegality as well as on the ground of impropriety I ask this Council to rule that a motion for leave to introduce a bill is a necessary stage both in respect of additional members' as well as of ordinary members' bills.

The second point raised by my amendment is in regard to the question of bills in respect of which previous sanction of the Governor or the Governor-General is required. In dealing with this question I should like to invite the attention of this Council to sections 79 and 80 of the Government of India Act, page 40 and page 41 of the Council Manual. Sub-clause (3) of section 79 says :—

Then sub-clause 2 of section 80 says :—

"It shall not be lawful for any member of any local legislative council to introduce, without the previous sanction of the Governor, Lieutenant-Governor or Chief Commissioner, any measure affecting the public revenues of the province or imposing any charge on those revenues."

The construction proposed to be put on this sub-clause on behalf of Government is that the sanction of the Governor should be obtained before any motion for leave to introduce a bill is made. I understand that Government maintain that motion for leave to introduce and the introduction of a bill are not two different things. That is probably their view. The Honourable the Advocate General might perhaps further argue that the words of section 79, clause (3), "The local legislature of any province may not take into consideration any laws" are so wide that they would apply also to a motion for leave to introduce a bill. I respectfully submit, with due deference, that you cannot say that the Council has considered a law unless the bill is actually introduced. Because a member of this Council makes a motion for leave to introduce, you cannot say that you are taking into consideration the law. It is only when you grant him leave to introduce a bill and he introduces it, that you are said to take that law into consideration.

For these reasons I maintain that sanction of the Governor or Governor-General need not be applied for or obtained before making a motion for leave to introduce a bill. The Government on the other hand say: "No; before you make any motion for leave you must apply to the Governor or the Governor-General for sanction, and you will not be allowed to make your motion in the Council unless that sanction is obtained."

My honourable friend Mr. KAMAT observed that it would be much better if motion for leave were allowed to be discussed in this Council so that the Governor might have the advantage of hearing both sides. When the bill is fully discussed in this Council he will be in a far better position to say whether it is desirable or necessary under the circumstances of the particular case to grant the sanction.

At present what happens is this, I had bitter experience in this matter only recently. I gave notice of a bill which required the previous sanction of the Governor. I applied for it and the application was rejected. If that bill had been discussed on a motion for leave to introduce it, I feel absolutely confident that His Excellency the Governor would have granted the sanction. But as things stand at present, he has no alternative but to hear the views of the officers of the secretariat in order to decide whether he should grant or refuse sanction. The other side remains unrepresented. That is the position. Therefore, as my honourable friend Mr. KAMAT very rightly put it, it is absolutely necessary that there should be a motion for leave before sanction, so that the bill may be discussed in this Council and His Excellency may have the opportunity of hearing both sides. This contention is supported by the rules of the Behar and the Bengal Legislative Councils. They provide that after the leave is obtained by the member he shall not be permitted to introduce the measure unless and until the necessary sanction has been accorded thereto. In Madras Legislative Council, last May, the question was fully discussed and unfortunately, in spite of very strong non-official opposition, the rule as now proposed to be introduced by Sir MAHADEV CHAUBAL was carried by 21 votes against 17. Anyhow if we go by precedent the Bengal and Behar rules are in my favour and the Madras rule favours the view of the Honourable the Advocate General.

There is one more point which I should like to make clear before I sit down, and it is this. It may be contended that it will merely add one more stage to legislation and cause unnecessary delay in carrying through urgent legislation when necessary. Occasions may arise when it would be desirable and necessary to pass legislation in a shorter period. To meet these objections, one of my amendments proposes that as soon as motion for leave is granted you can at the same sitting also move for the first reading. There will thus be no difficulty and no delay. This is what is being generally done in the Imperial Legislative Council.

One more point and I have done ; and it is this. I have seen the Legislative Council rules of the United Provinces, Assam, Bengal, Burma and Punjab, and I find that there they do not provide that the publication of a bill is its introduction. According to our Council rules publication of the bill becomes introduction. I therefore propose that that should not be so. As soon as notice is given to the secretary his duty should be to send a copy of it with the statement of objects and reasons to each member and then publish it in the Bombay Government Gazette. On the expiration of two months this motion will be discussed in the Council, and if it is accepted the member will move the first reading. With your Excellency's permission, I now read the new rules which I propose :—

1. For rules 28, 29 and 30 of the said rules the following shall be subsituted :—

"28. Any member desiring for leave to introduce a bill in accordance with the provisions of the Government of India Act, 1915, shall give the secretary at least two months' previous notice of his intention and shall, together with the notice, send a copy of the bill with the full statement of objects and reasons.

29. As early as possible after the date of the notice prescribed in the last preceding rule the Secretary shall cause—

(a) the bill together with the statement of objects and reasons to be published in the Bombay Government Gazette,

(b) the printed copies of the bill and of the statement of objects and reasons to be sent to all the members of the Council, and also to the press and the public in such manner as the Governor may direct, and

(c) the bill with the statement of objects and reasons to be translated into such vernacular languages as may be desirable in view of the interests likely to be affected thereby and such translations distributed in such manner as the Governor may direct.

COUNCIL BUSINESS RULES.

[Mr. Vithalbhai Jhaverbhai Patel; the President; Mr. Raghunath Purshottam Paranjpye; Mr. Siddhanath Dhonddev Garud.]

30. (1) The member who has given notice under rule 28 may then move at a meeting of the Council for leave to introduce the bill.

(2) If the motion is carried, the President shall declare that the bill is introduced.

Provided that in the case of a bill which requires the previous sanction of the Governor under sub-section (2) of section 80 of the Government of India Act, 1915, or the previous sanction of the Governor-General under section 79, sub-section (2) or sub-section (3), of the said Act, the President shall not declare the bill introduced unless and until such sanction has been duly accorded thereto."

With these words, I trust the Council will accord their support to my amendments.

His Excellency the PRESIDENT:—Order, order. Before the Council adjourns to-day I want to tell honourable members that if we get to the resolutions to-morrow—I think honourable members understand that we are going to adjourn at 2-30 p. m. to-morrow—I propose to take the resolutions as follows: the first resolution of each honourable member who has got a resolution on the paper will come first. What I mean by that is this: the Honourable Mr. PARANJPYE'S resolution on Modi script will come first, then a resolution of the Honourable Mr. PATEL, and then one of the Honourable Dewán Bahádur GODBOLE, and so on. I want, as far as possible, to give every member a chance of bringing forward a resolution, and if we should get to the end of the list in this manner, I would come back to the second resolution of the Honourable Mr. PATEL.

The Honourable Mr. PATEL:—Does it mean, your Excellency, that only one of my resolutions will be taken?

His Excellency the PRESIDENT:—They will all be taken in order.

The Honourable Mr. PARANJPYE:—May we ask, your Excellency, whether honourable members may choose whichever of the resolutions they like to be taken first?

His Excellency the PRESIDENT:—I have got no objection to that at all. If the Honourable Mr. PATEL says which he is going to take first, there is no objection; only he will have to give a little previous notice to my honourable colleague to enable him to reply.

The Honourable Mr. PATEL:—I will take the jury resolution, No. 8, your Excellency.

His Excellency the PRESIDENT:—I should also like honourable members to bear in mind resolution rule 22. If we do not get to the end of the resolutions by the close of our sitting, the remaining resolutions will be considered to have been withdrawn. So all the resolutions that stand over will have to be re-submitted to the secretary before the next meeting of the Council.

The Honourable Mr. GARUD:—Your Excellency, according to rule 24 any resolutions that are withdrawn cannot be moved for another year to come.

His Excellency the PRESIDENT:—Rule 24 refers to resolutions withdrawn under rule 17. These resolutions are deemed to have been withdrawn under rule 22.

The Council will now adjourn till 11 a. m. to-morrow.

The Council then adjourned till 11 a. m. on Friday, the 13th October 1917.

By order of His Excellency the Right Honourable the Governor,

R. B. MILNE,

His Excellency the PRESIDENT:—Order, order. Further discussion on the amendments moved by the Honourable Mr. PATEL to the amendments of the rules for the conduct of council business recommended by the select committee.

The Honourable Mr. DATTATRAYA VENKATESH BELVI:—Your Excellency,—I confess that I have found it rather difficult to make up my mind on this particular amendment moved by my honourable friend Mr. PATEL. It seems to me, looking into the provisions of section 80 (1) of the Government of India Act of 1915, that a motion for the introduction of a bill into the Council is a sine qua non here generally. At the same time it seems to me that such a stage though legally necessary is on most occasions inconvenient.

Now I find that in this Council there are three different phases of opinion on this particular point. It seems to me that some of my honourable friends such as the Honourable Mr. PATHAN and others are of opinion that it is not necessary at all in any case to make a motion for the introduction of a bill. Another class of gentlemen to be found here may be taken to be fairly represented by my honourable friends Mr. KAMAT and Mr. PATEL who hold that a motion for leave to introduce a bill is absolutely necessary in the case of every bill whether it is introduced by Government or by an additional member. The third class of honourable members of whom I may be taken as a representative holds that the present rules are for all practical purposes good enough, and unless it is shewn that it is absolutely necessary to make any changes in the present rules the present rules may be allowed to stand as they are. At the same time it seems to me that the Government of India Act, 1915, does not leave any room for doubting that a motion for leave to introduce a bill is a necessary step. But I find that since 1861 the Governor of this Presidency has been invested with powers to dispense with this leave stage. That is a change which, in my humble opinion, is salutary. But is there any warrant in law for this assumption of power by the Governor of the Presidency? Unless there is any warrant in law, I submit that it is legally indefensible to confer such a power upon the Governor of the Presidency. It is a power which has been vested in this legislature. The question is whether this legislature is at liberty to part with this particular power in favour of the President of the Council or in favour of the Governor of the Presidency. I have already said that to me it seems that on most occasions it will be mere waste of time to make a motion in this Council for leave before introducing a bill. Such a motion will, on most occasions, give rise to a long discussion and at the end, more often than not, the motion will be carried. I have no doubt that in the case of a bill introduced into this Council by a member of Government such a motion is, in view of the present constitution of the Council, almost sure to be carried, because a majority is almost assured in the case of every motion which may be brought for discussion by a member of Government. The only advantage which may perhaps accrue to the public by such a motion will be that the public will have a further opportunity, and an earlier opportunity, of considering the legislative measure which it is intended to introduce into this Council. That is the only advantage which is likely to accrue to the public. But is it necessary to make a motion and to give the public such an opportunity and to waste a day or two in discussing such a motion? At present we find that under rule 32 of the rules dealing with the conduct of legislative business 18 clear days' notice is necessary to be given to honourable members before a bill can be discussed in this Council for the first reading. It may perhaps be advisable to extend that period of time, but that is another story. If any honourable member feels that it is necessary to extend that period of time, it is open to him to move a resolution on the point. So it seems to me, on grounds of practical politics, it should not be necessary to make a motion for leave to introduce a bill in every case in this Council.

I admit that there is not much force in the contention that leave is dispensed with in the case of Government bills generally but that it is not always dispensed with in the case of private bills. There are very few instances in support of such a contention. We find that there was a bill recently introduced by a private member and in the case of that bill Government was pleased to dispense with the leave stage. So we cannot draw any general conclusion against Government so far as this point is concerned. Shortly stated, my view on this point is that unless I am satisfied by the Honourable the Advocate General, who is the legal authority in this Council, that there is warrant in law for the delegation to the Governor of this Presidency of this particular power, clause (5) of rule 28 will have to be deleted and the amendment will have to be accepted. If we are satisfied by the Advocate General, then I believe it will be wise on our part to maintain the rules as they stand.

As to the other points, namely, whether it is necessary to wait before making a motion for leave to introduce a bill until sanction is granted either by the Governor of the Presidency or by the Governor-General in cases where such sanction is necessary, there also it seems to me that there will again be needless waste of time. It is not necessary, in my opinion, to make a motion for leave before sanction is granted. The only thing that can be said in favour of the proposed amendment is that perhaps we may have an open discussion in the Council which will induce the Governor of the Presidency to grant the requisite sanction. But is that the only way of persuading His Excellency the Governor to grant the requisite sanction? Is there no other way in which we can satisfy His Excellency the Governor that he should be pleased to grant the sanction? Any additional member who wishes to introduce a bill for which sanction is required may see His Excellency in private, or he may submit to him a representation along with the bill stating the grounds on which sanction should at once be granted. It will not be advisable to always insist upon the right of making a motion in this Council for leave to introduce a bill before such sanction is granted. Yesterday the Honourable Mr. KAMAT was able to show that in the Madras Legislative Council a bill was introduced some years ago and there was a full-fledged debate on it in the Council, and after all it was found that His Excellency the Governor-General was not pleased to grant the sanction. So the whole of the time that was taken up in the Council was practically lost except one circumstance, namely, that perhaps the public opinion of the Madras Presidency might have been a little enlightened on the points covered by that measure. Thus it seems to me that it is not necessary to make any change in the existing rules so far as the second point is concerned. On the first point I have already said that I am prepared to allow the rules to stand as they are unless the Honourable the Advocate General is unable to satisfy us that there is warrant in law for the delegation of power to His Excellency the Governor by this legislature.

For these reasons I repeat my opinion that I am not able to form any definite conclusion at this moment, and I shall suspend my judgment and await the opinion of the Honourable the Advocate General on this point.

The Honourable Mr. BALKRISHNA SITARAM KAMAT:—Your Excellency,—I do not wish to detain the Council for more than a few minutes, especially as we have a very short day before us. But speaking to the amendment of the Honourable Mr. PATEL, I wish to make only one or two observations. I am glad, in a way, that although the Honourable Mr. PATEL supported the Honourable Mr. PATHAN'S amendment in which there was no provision for leave to introduce a bill, still in the amendment which stands in his own name he has provided for the stage of leave to introduce. What I said yesterday was that the leave stage is absolutely essential in the case of all legislation, but I find one great defect in the arrangement proposed in the Honourable Mr. PATEL's amendment and it is this. Although I say that the leave stage is absolutely essential, I further say that that stage ought to precede every other step in the course of legislation, whereas what the Honourable Mr. PATEL is trying to do is this. As soon as the draft of a bill is ready he wants it to be sent to the secretary and he further wants that the secretary should immediately publish it in the Bombay Government Gazette, and not only that, but he desires that copies should be supplied to the members immediately and also translations into the vernaculars should be done. And after all these preliminaries are effected, then he likes to come into this Council asking for leave to introduce. I believe this procédure is exactly the reverse of what I have in my mind, for this simple reason, that we the members of the Legislative Council ought to know and ought to have the first opportunity of looking at the draft of the bill and to see the language and the principles and judge for ourselves whether leave should be granted to introduce the particular measure. Before that is done I do not think that the draft bill should be published. That is the great defect which I find in the procedure suggested by the Honourable Mr. PATEL.

Regarding the other point on which he laid stress yesterday, namely, that there should be no difference whatsoever between private bills and Government bills, I agree that theoretically they ought to be on exactly the same footing. Government bills are no doubt drafted by legal experts; however, I for one have not the least objection if they are placed on the same footing as private bills according to the suggestion of the Honourable Mr. PATEL. But that should be effected by a different method, namely, that Government bills also should be compelled to come before the Council, even though purely as a matter of form. For, after all, I consider that although the leave stage is absolutely necessary in the case of private bills, in the other case it is for the sake of a legal form that Government bills should be brought up for leave to introduce, I say purely as a legal formality. If that is done, I do not think anything would be lost. Of course the Honourable Mr. BELVI thinks it purely a waste of time to bring every bill here for leave to introduce. I beg to differ from him, because after all we will have in any case an opportunity of being able to judge as to the propriety of a bill and its desirability as well as its language. I believe that the time spent in the preliminary discussion is more or less gained and not wasted, considering the fact that some discussion is after all bound to occur at a later stage, namely, when the bill is proposed for the first reading, So if there is to be no opposition at the leave stage there is no harm if the discussion is allowed to take place before the first reading. In either case, what I would propose is this: that leave to introduce should be absolutely necessary and that Government bills should be put on the same footing with private bills, and both should not be introduced unless leave is formally granted by members of the Legislative Council for the introduction of any bill.

The Honourable the Advocate-General (Mr T. J. STRANGMAN):—Your Excellency,—The Honourable Mr. PATEL'S proposals are twofold. The first is to render it obligatory in all cases that a motion for leave to introduce should take place and that the power at present vested in your Excellency to cause introduction by publication should be taken away. The second proposal is to permit of a motion for leave to introduce a measure which requires sanction under either section 79 (2) and (3 or section 80 (2) of the Government of India Act before such sanction has been obtained. As to the first point it will be noticed that there is no suggestion—and indeed there could be no suggestion—that the power in your Excellency has in the past been improperly or perversely exercised, either in the case of Government bills or in the case of private bills, or that there has in the past been any improper or perverse failure to exercise such power in the case of any private bill. The matter has been put upon two exceedingly narrow grounds. The first of those grounds is that the rules, i.e., rule 28 (5) and 29 (2), are ultra vires in view of section 80 (1) of the Government of India Act The second ground really amounts to this, that as a matter of sentiment Government bills and private bills should be put upon precisely the same footing in all respects and no different treatment should be accorded to the one or the other.

In dealing with the first question, let us bear in mind certain preliminary facts. Section 80, sub-section (1), is not in fact new law. It merely re-enacts in substance what had previously existed. We have this further, that a rule having the combined effect of rules 28 (5) and 29 (2) was passed at a meeting of the Legislative Council of Bombay on the 1st of February 1865, and I assume that my predecessor in office was present at that meeting and took part in the discussion. Now, that rule remained in force until the new Councils came into existence, some eight years ago. When the new Council came into existence, the executive Government, as they were bound to do, framed rules under section 83 (1) of the Government of India Act, and quite rightly, in this particular, adopted as their model the rule which had been passed by the Legislative Council so far back as 1st February 1865. Now, for 52 years no one has ever made the discovery which is claimed by the Honourable Mr. PATEL. I do not say that that consideration is fatal to the argument, but it is at any rate exceedingly inauspicious, and I think every one will agree that some very convincing and cogent reasons must be forthcoming before we can agree with him that that rule is ultra vires and that what has stood in the rules for 52 years is after all wrong.

Now let us go to section 80, sub-section (1), of the Act; I will read only the relevant portions of the section. "No motion shall be entertained other than a motion for leave to introduce a measure into the Council for the purpose of enactment, or having reference to a measure introduced or proposed to be introduced into the Council for that purpose." Now it will be seen that that section merely states that certain motions, and certain motions only, having legislation, in view, can be entertained by the Council, one of such motions being a motion for leave to introduce a bill. It does not say, nor does any other section in the act say, that a motion for leave to introduce a bill is a necessary step in legislation, and the fallacy which underlies the argument both of the Honourable Mr. PATEL and the Honourable Mr. KAMAT lies in the assumption that because such a motion may be made it must be made. The answer, then, to the contention that these rules are ultra vires is that the act nowhere provides that a motion for leave to introduce a bill is a necessary stage in the passage of a bill into law.

But, sir, I do not think it would be right for me not to deal with the arguments of the Honourable Mr. PATEL a little more in detail, and the best way of dealing with them will be to refer to what he says at page 845 of the Government Gazette. The first statement is this:—"These statutory provisions make it perfectly clear that the first stage of a bill to be introduced into any Legislative Council in India is motion for leave to introduce it." Now, the answer to that is that it may be and not that it must be. Then a little lower down:—"The Government of India act does not empower the legislature to dispense with the leave stage or to delegate its function to grant or refuse leave." The answer to that is that the leave stage is nowhere in the act rendered obligatory. Still further on:—"The result is that these rules give the Governor a power and a function which ought to rest, and which do rightly rest in all constitutional countries, with the legislature. They were made by the executive Government when the Bombay Legislative Council was first established." As I have pointed out, the facts are not fully stated there The rule was made by the executive Government under an obligation imposed by section 83 (1) of the Act some eight years ago when the enlarged Councils came into being, and they took as their model the rule which had been passed by the Legislative Council itself on the 1st February 1865. Then—and this is also the Honourable Mr. BELVI'S point—the Honourable Mr. PATEL says:—"It is difficult to understand, however, how the Government, who themselves did not possess these powers, transferred them to the Governor when as a matter of fact even the legislature, as I have just observed, could not legally part with them." The answer to that argument is that there has never been any transfer by the Government or by the legislature to the Governor at all. There has been no necessity for a transfer. If the act said that there must be a motion for leave to introduce, I quite agree that we could not provide by rules that there need be no motion for leave; but the act does not say that there should be a motion for leave to introduce. Consequently, there has been no transfer of any function of the Legislative Council to His Excellency the Governor.

I have now dealt with all the points that were specifically raised except one, and that is in reference to the letter from the Secretary of State. Now with regard to the letter, I understand the Honourable Mr. PATEL'S suggestion to be that it is an expression of opinion of the Secretary of State that rules such as these are ultra vires. Now, that is quite incorrect. It relates to rules different to those that we are now considering. I can tell the Council this further, that in the course of the correspondence, during which this letter passed, the Secretary of State at the close of that year—this letter was written in July—agreed to the principles of the rules that we now have under discussion. Your Excellency will allow me to briefly refer to the files from which this letter comes. There was a rule in Bombay, and a similar rule in the Legislative Council of the Government of India, as follows:—Rule 12. "It shall not be necessary to ask leave of the Council to introduce bills proposed for the adoption of the Council by Government. But every such bill shall be printed, with the preface hereinafter referred to, and a translation of both the bill and preface, into the vernaculars, and be circulated to the members of the Council, and also published in the Bombay Government Gazette at least one week before it is brought on for discussion." The next rule dealt with the power of any member to move for leave to introduce a bill. The result was that a distinction was drawn in the rules between Government bills and other bills, and there was a provision of which the effect came to this, that it was for the executive Government to decide whether or no there should be a motion for leave to introduce. It was these rules which evoked the advice which appears in the letter from the Secretary of State. That advice was given by a letter dated the 31st July 1862. Subsequently it appears that the local Legislative Council here appointed a committee to frame rules and on the 5th September 1863 the committee which was appointed made a report recommending certain rules, and amongst those rules was a rule (No. 13) which in effect provided that there must be a motion for leave to introduce in every case

COUNCIL BUSINESS RULES.

[13TH OCTOBER 1917.] [Mr. Strangman; Mr. Vithalbhai Jhaverbhai Patel.]

There was no provision whatever for publication taking the place of such a motion. Now this recommendation was made to embody the advice given in the Secretary of State's letter and in ignorance, curiously enough, of the correspondence which had subsequently passed between the Government of India and the Secretary of State in the course of which, as I stated, the Secretary of State agreed to the principle of the rules now under discussion which are said to be ultra vires. The rules recommended by the committee were sent to the Government of India, and on the 26th September 1864 the Government of India stated that there should be a rule providing for introduction by publication. On the 22nd of October 1864 this Government agreed, and they said that the only reason why such a rule had been omitted was on account of the advice of the Secretary of State, and they submitted a rule founded upon a rule which was then, and still is, in the rules of the Government of India. I will not read the rule they submitted. In effect, it was the same as the two rules we are now considering, that is to say, it provided for introduction by publication in the Gazette. The authority to decide whether there should be publication was the Governor and not, as in the rules which evoked the advisory letter quoted by the Honourable Mr. PATEL, the executive Government. The Government of India on the 14th November 1864 agreed to this rule and they sent copies of the correspondence which they had with the Secretary of State to the Bombay Government, i. e., the correspondence which had passed at the end of the year 1862. Then, on the 1st of February 1865, as I mentioned before, the local Legislative Council passed the rule upon which these two rules in question are founded.

I will now go back to the correspondence which passed between the Government of India and the Secretary of State. We find that the Government of India pointed out, in reply to the letter of the Secretary of State which the Honourable Mr. PATEL has quoted, that the motion for leave to introduce was one of mere form and nothing else, and consequently that a rule such as that which was under consideration, that is to say, rule 12 that I read before in the Bombay rules, should be enacted with a modification, the modification being to take away from the Governor General in Council the power to publish and to give such power to the Governor General, thus putting all the members, both ordinary and additional, on precisely the same footing as regards the introduction of bills. The Secretary of State agreed to that, with the result that the Government of India passed their rule, which still exists and from which the Bombay rule was copied.

The Honourable Mr. PATEL:—Is there any letter of the Secretary of State to that effect?

The Honourable the ADOCATE GENERAL:—Yes, there is. This is what the Secretary of State says: "A despatch dated 10th of October 1862 relative o the conduct of business at the meeting of the Legislative Council of the Governor General for making laws and regulations has been considered by me in Council. With reference to the 4th and the following paragraph of your despatch, I sanction your proposal to make the publication of the bill subject to the approval of the Governor General alone instead of the Governor General in Council." Well, that correspondence then shows this, that the Secretary of State agreed to the principle of the rules that we are now considering and that, I think, really finishes the point of ultra vires.

Now I come to what may be termed the sentimental reasons: the suggestion is that Government bills and private bills should invariably be placed upon the same footing and treated in the same manner. In the first place the rules draw no distinction whatever between Government bills and private bills, and it is open to His Excellency to direct publication of any private bill just in the same manner as he may direct publication of a Government bill and so do away with the necessity for a motion for leave to introduce. There have been, I think, four bills, since the enlarged councils were formed, introduced by additional members—one by Sir Ibrahim Rahimtulla, one by the Honourable Mr. BHURGRI and two by the Honourable Mr. PATEL. In two of them, namely, in the case of Sir Ibrahim's bill and in one of the Honourable Mr. PATEL'S bills, publication took place and the necessity for leave to introduce was obviated.

The only question is whether the rules should take away a useful power and provide that all bills should invariably be treated on the same footing. As far as I understand the argument of the Honourable Mr. PATEL, it really comes to this: it may very well be that this power is a useful power, but inasmuch as in the past it has been exercised invariably in favour of Government bills and only in 50 per cent. of additional members' bills, therefore take it away. Now, if I may say so without any disrespect at all, putting it in homely language, does not this amount to an expression of willingness to have one's nose cut off to spite one's face? Well, I ask, is that a reasonable attitude and is there anything whatever in this point of sentiment? I say there is no point of sentiment involved. It is a pure question of business and of business only.

Now what is the object of a motion for leave to introduce? The object of a motion of that kind is to give time, time to the people whose interests are likely to be affected, time for those people to voice any objections that they may have. In the case of a Government bill there is an elaborate inquiry before the bill is published to ascertain the views of the various classes whose interests are likely to be affected. Consequently, speaking generally, there is no necessity for the leave stage in the case of a Government bill. An additional member, on the other hand, has not at his disposal the facilities that Government have for ascertaining the views of the people at large; consequently his bill stands on a different footing. It may of course be that his bill is such that it could be said at once that it is not likely to evoke any hostile feeling or controversy, and such I presume was the case in the instance of the Trust Bill of Sir Ibrahim and the Education Bill of the Honourable Mr. PATEL.

The Honourable Mr. PATEL:—Was motion for leave dispensed with in Sir Ibrahim's Trust Bill?

The Honourable Sir MAHADEV CHAUBAL:—It was published to start with.

The Honourable Mr. PATEL:—It was discussed in this Council at a motion for leave to introduce it, and then permission was granted for the first reading.

The Honourable the ADVOCATE GENERAL:—My recollection is that the first reading took place at once and there was no mention for leave to introduce.

Whether there was a motion or whether there was not in the case of Sir Ibrahim's Trust Bill is, however, really immaterial. On one point I think all must agree, and that is that there is a possibility, indeed a probability, of additional members bringing in bills of a highly controversial character, and I say, in cases of that kind it is essential that there should be a certain amount of delay which can readily be obtained by a motion for leave to introduce.

Well, now I come to the second point and with that I can deal very shortly indeed. The suggested alteration is that a motion for leave to introduce a bill which requires sanction under sections 79 (2) (3) or 80 (2) may be made even though that sanction has not been obtained. There are several answers to this. In the first place going to section 79 (3) it will be seen that the local legislature may not without the previous sanction of the Governor General make or take into consideration any law of the kind specified subsequently in that sub-section. Now 'law' there must mean 'measure', and if they cannot take into consideration a measure of this description, they certainly cannot entertain a motion for leave to introduce such a measure, because that would be taking into consideration such a measure. So that so far as sub-section 79 (3) is concerned previous sanction is required and the rule which the Honourable Mr. PATEL proposes would be ultra vires in cases covered by that sub-section. The language which is used in section 79 (2) and section 80 (2) is, it is true, somewhat different, but it seems by no means improbable that they would be construed like section 79 (3) with the result that the rule would be ultra vires in cases covered thereby. These are the legal objections.

Let us now deal with the practical objections. The practical objections are twofold, and the first is that supposing a motion is entertained of the kind specified and sanction is not afterwards obtained, the motion would be a mere farce. That is the first practical objection. The second practical objection is this, that under section 83 of the Indian Councils Act any alteration in the rules that we may pass is liable to be disallowed by the Governor General in Council and if so disallowed it shall have no effect. Quite recently the Government of India altered their Legislative Council rules to provide that where sanction is required under section 67 (which corresponds with section 80 (2)) no motion for leave to introduce a bill which requires such sanction can be entertained until such sanction is obtained. Consequently I think we may take it for certain that even if this alteration were agreed to here it would certainly not be agreed to by the Governor-General in Council.

The Honourable Mr. KAMAT :—May I know what would happen if sanction is received and the motion for leave is not granted ?

The Honourable the ADVOCATE GENERAL :—If the motion for leave were not granted, then of course the bill could not proceed. That is very obvious, and that is because though His Excellency the Governor or His Excellency the Governor-General might see no objection to a particular measure on the face of it, the Council might think otherwise, in which case it would never get to a first reading.

Now, there is one other suggestion made by the Honourable Mr. KAMAT with which I should deal, and it is this. He said that it might be a very useful thing to have a motion of this kind before sanction is given, in order to enable His Excellency the Governor or the Governor-General, as the case may be, to decide upon the question as to whether sanction should be given or not. But the answer to that is this—and it is a very simple and conclusive answer—that a motion for leave to introduce is of a purely formal character and consequently no discussion is allowed. Consequently all that His Excellency the Governor or the Governor-General would have before him would be a record of the votes.

The Honourable Mr. DESAI :—Is even discussion about the principle of a bill not allowed ?

The Honourable the ADVOCATE GENERAL :—I say that it has been ruled that the motion for leave being of a purely formal character, no discussion is allowed. I think, if I remember correctly, His Excellency himself ruled that in reference to a bill introduced by the Honourable Mr. PATEL.

The Honourable Mr. PATEL :—Does the discretion for any such discussion lie with the Council or with the Governor ?

His Excellency the PRESIDENT :—The discretion is with the Governor. I am talking of a particular bill. It is perfectly true that I did rule that such leave was going to be given and it was not necessary to discuss it, because that would come on at the first reading.

The Honourable the ADVOCATE GENERAL :—That is really the answer. The motion being of a formal character, no discussion would take place. The result would be that there would be only a record of the votes, and the same result could be obtained by the introducer circulating the bill amongst members of the Council and asking who is prepared to back it, and when sending a copy of the bill to the secretary informing him of the names of the honourable members who are prepared to support it. That, I submit, is a complete answer to the suggestion of the Honourable Mr. KAMAT. I have now I think replied to the various points that have been raised by the speakers, and for the reasons I have given I propose to vote against the amendment of the Honourable Mr. PATEL.

The Honourable Mr. SHRIDHAR BALKRISHNA UPASANI:—Your Excellency,—After the explanation given by the Honourable the Advocate General I will not venture to go into the question of the legality or otherwise of rule 28 (5), but I beg to point out that we have on the Statute an express provision in section 80 of the Government of India Act, which contemplates a motion for leave to introduce a measure into the Council as being of ordinary necessity. Are we to understand that under the power vested under rule 28 (5) and rule 29 that stage is to be dispensed with altogether? Rule 28 provides as follows:—

"(1) Subject to the provisions of the Indian Councils Act, 1861 and 1892, any member may move at a meeting of the Council for leave to introduce a bill.

"(2) Any member desiring to move for leave to introduce a bill as aforesaid shall give the secretary at least two months' previous notice of his intention and shall, together with the notice, send a copy of the bill and a full statement of objects and reasons, and any other necessary papers.

"(3) In speaking to the motion the member introducing the bill may state concisely the scope of the bill and the reasons in support of it, but, unless the motion is opposed, such explanation may be deferred to the first reading.

"(4) If the motion is carried, the secretary shall publish the bill with the statement of objects and reasons in the Bombay Government Gazette.

"(5) Provided that the Governor may order the publication in the Bombay Government Gazette of any bill although no motion has been made for leave to introduce it. In such case the statement of objects and reasons shall be published with the bill."

This last proviso, so far as I understand it, is meant to meet those rare cases where either owing to the mere formal nature of the subject-matter of the bill or its urgency, it may be allowable or necessary that the Governor may dispense with the motion for leave to introduce the bill and allow its publication without such motion. This should not, however, be the ordinary usual procedure. That would be clear from section 80 and rule 29 and the observations recorded by the Secretary of State in the letter, an extract from which is given by the Honourable Mr. PATEL in his minute of dissent. Therein he clearly says as follows:—

"The power vested in this Council at its meeting for making laws and regulations of exercising a control over the introduction of the bills is not to be considered a matter of form.

"In all such cases the power of imposing a check upon the introduction of bills can be most effectively exercised at meetings of the Council.

"The Government might, indeed, refuse to take any steps upon a bill sent to the secretary, but it is not fitting or expedient that the members of the Executive Council alone should exercise a power which belongs to every member of the Council. . . ."

So this power to accept or reject a motion for leave to introduce a bill is vested by Statute in the Council and must be exercised by the whole Council, and the motion for leave to introduce a bill is legally necessary and if for special reasons the Secretary of State may have consented to give to the Governor the power of dispensing with the motion in certain cases and allowing the bill to be introduced by mere publication in the Gazette, that ought not to be the rule but the exception. In our Presidency, however, the actual practice has been otherwise and to the detriment of public interests. We have had enough experience of this. It is, no doubt, true that Government bills are drawn up after a good deal of official investigation, but so far as the public are concerned, there are no means for the Government to ascertain public opinion or for the public to approach the Government before a bill is published, which is a very short time before it comes for the first reading. We had sad experience of this in the case of the bill that was introduced to amend the Land Revenue Code and the bill to amend the Irrigation Act. The Council had not sufficient time to consider the provisions of the bill and the public could not express their opinion. The bills, in fact, were rushed through the Council for first reading, and even the second and third reading stages were hurried through. In these circumstances, considering the backward state of public education and of the public press in the country, and considering also that the publication in the Government Gazette though taken as being a publication to the whole country is a mere matter of fiction seeing that these publications are made for the most part in the English language and the publication of the translations depends upon the pleasure of the select committee after the bill is considered by it, I say, whatever the correct view as regards legality may be, and even if rule 28 (5) be legally valid, still the exercise of the power given under it to dispense with the motion for leave to introduce a bill should be an exception and not the rule and that in all ordinary cases, whether the bill be a Government bill or be introduced by a private member, it ought to come forward before the Council as an ordinary rule in the first instance on a motion for leave to introduce it, and after the leave is granted, then for the first reading.

With these words I support the Honourable Mr. PATEL'S amendment.

The Hononrable Sir MAHADEV BHASKAR CHAUBAL:—Your Excellency,—I need not detain the Council long. My honourable friend the Advocate General has explained the whole history of these rules in connection with the amendment before us. The only remark that I wish to make is that really the whole gist of the Honourable Mr. PATEL'S arguments is contained in those three sentences on page 845 of the Bombay Government Gazette in his dissenting minute. What he is aggrieved at and what he resents most is this. He says:—

"The result is that these rules give the Governor a power and a function which ought to rest, and which do rightly rest in all constitutional countries, with the legislature."

Then he goes on to say:—

"It is difficult to understand, however, how the Government, who themselves did not possess these powers, transferred them to the Governor."

Honourable members perhaps did not catch the earlier portion of the Honourable the Advocate General's speech which referred to the first clause of old section 37, 24 and 25 Victoria, and section 83, clause (1), of the present act, and I think that the Honourable Mr. PATEL, however much one may sympathise with his wish for this Council to have the power of framing rules in the first instance, has got to accept the constitution as it stands at present and as it had stood ever since 24 and 25 Victoria. What he considers as a power which should rest with the Legislative Council and not with the Governor or the Governor in Council has been provided for before the Legislative Council had any being at all, and the power is given by section 83 of the present act or section 37 of the old act to the local Government to frame rules. It is that that we must start with. Section 83, clause (1), distinctly states:—

"The local Government of any province for which a local Legislative Council is hereafter constituted under this act shall, before the first meeting of that Council, and with the sanction of the Governor-General in Council, make rules for the conduct of legislative business in that Council."

So that rules had to be framed and were in existence before the first meeting of the Council was held, and it was under those rules that this power was originally left to the Governor in Council and subsequently, as the Honourable the Advocate General has said, with the sanction of the Secretary of State the Governor-General or the Governor came to be substituted for the Governor in Council. That is really the history of it, and if the Honourable Mr. PATEL, with his democratic leanings, wants this power for the Legislative Council, he has to get it by inducing the Parliament to alter the Government of India Act; but so long as that act stands as at present, I do not think that he can succeed in getting that power by tinkering with the rules. It is quite enough for me to say that the answer given by the Honourable the Advocate General to the amendment is conclusive.

As regards the Honourable Mr. UPASANI'S objection, I do not think he really followed the argument of the Honourable the Advocate General, and that is this: it is true, as Mr. UPASANI says, that section 80, clause (1), says that the Council as a Council shall not entertain any motion other than a motion for leave to introduce; he does not see that the Council is not contravening that clause if the Governor or the Governor-General directs the publication of any bill. You cannot say that the Council has entertained a motion not permitted to it—because the matter has never come before the Council at all. It is not a thing which is done in Council and there is no law which declares that the Governor shall take the consent of the Council before he sanctions introduction by publication. When he in his discretion passes an order under section 28, clause 5, there is nothing that this Council is doing against the provisions of section 80 (1).

The Honourable Mr. UPASANI:—I do not question the legality of the order or say that it is made with reference to anything which passes in the Council, but I say that the passing of an order ordering the publication which will have the effect of introducing the bill should be an exception and not the rule, because after publication the public have not sufficient time to express their opinion, and it is only their representatives in the Council that can express the public voice. That is my argument.

The Honourable Sir MAHADEV CHAUBAL:—Having explained that, I do not think I need go any further. There is nothing in clause 5 of section 28 which is ultra vires under section 80 (1), because the order for publication is not a thing which comes before the Council at all and you cannot say of it that the Council is doing something which is against section 80 (1). I must say I still do not follow the objection of the Honourable Mr. UPASANI.

The Honourable Mr. UPASANI:—I say, assuming that the power given by rule 28 (5) is valid, the exercise of that should be only in exceptional cases.

The Honourable Sir MAHADEV BHASKAR CHAUBAL:—Nobody now disputes that the Governor should have the discretion to exercise the power and to hasten the consideration of a bill by omitting the leave-to-introduce stage. The objection of the Honourable Mr. UPASANI seems to be that it is invariably done in the case of Government bills, while private bills are treated as step-children. I think that objection has been fully dealt with by the Honourable the Advocate General. I do not think any member in this Council will be able to say that it has been exercised differently in the case of Government bills and in the case of private bills. Take for instance the Honourable Mr. BHURGRI's bill. The leave-to-introduce stage was insisted upon by Government. Honourable members will remember that his bill was that the Muhammadan population in Sind should be taxed for the purposes of education. Of course if the Government took straight off the assurance of the honourable member and allowed the bill to be introduced, it would have been a different thing. But Government said that they must have the leave-to-introduce stage in that case and that they must ascertain what exactly was the state of local feeling on the point. They tried to do it and they found that there was a great difference of opinion and therefore later on the bill had to be dropped.

That is the real consideration. I do not think that anybody can say that the discretion vested in the Governor has, in any way, been wrongly exercised in the past when they see that hitherto only four bills have been introduced by the additional members of Council and in 50 per cent. of these His Excellency the Governor dispensed with the leave-to-introduce stage.

The Honourable Mr. VITHALBHAI JHAVERBHAI PATEL:—Your Excellency,—I will reply in a very few words. The amendment of wh ch I had given a notice at the last meeting was that leave stage should be dispensed with in respect of all bills and it was referred to the committee. Whilst the select committee was considering this particular question, viz., whether leave stage should be dispensed with altogether or not, it was pointed out by my friend the Honourable Sir MAHADEV CHAUBAL (and I am absolutely certain, and I am sure my honourable friend the Advocate General will bear me out) that the leave stage could not be dispensed with as section 81 of the Government of India Act contemplates the leave stage. I really am surprised at the attitude now taken by Sir MAHADEV CHAUBAL when I bring forward the present amendment that the leave stage should be required in all cases. When I propose that leave stage should be dispensed with I am referred to section 81 of the Government of India Act and am told the section comes in my way. When I propose to retain the leave stage I am told that it may be retained in respect of private bills but that section 81 does not come in the way of the Governor being empowered to dispense with it. That is the position which unfortunately the Government have taken up in respect of this amendment. However the point is this, that there is such a thing as leave stage in respect of all bills under section 80, sub-section (1), of the Government of India Act. If my honourable friends have any doubt about it, I refer them to page 842 of the Gazette where the select committee says: "The second main question which we have considered is whether the procedure at present provided for in rule 28, according to which a member desiring to introduce a bill first asks leave of the Council for its introduction, should be done away with as proposed in the Honourable Mr. PATEL'S group of amendments dealing with rule 28. The stage of legislation in question is recognized in section 80 of the Government of India Act, 1915, and in the rules of all Legislative Councils in India, and we are of opinion that no case has been made out for its abolition." It is thus clear that there is such a thing as motion for leave to introduce a bill. Now I ask this Council to consider, your Excellency, who has got power to say that in respect of a particular bill this stage shall be dispensed with? Who can say that this Council shall or shall not go on with all the stages, the motion for leave, the first, second and third readings? That is the only question for the consideration of this Council. My honourable friend Sir MAHADEV CHAUBAL referred us to section 83 of the Government of India Act and said that it was no use disputing the validity of the present rules, made before the Legislative Council of 1861 came into existence. Under section 83 of the act the Governor in Council has got power to make rules for the conduct of council business, and under the powers so vested the executive Government had made these rules before the first Council met in the year 1862. That is what I understand the Honourable Sir MAHADEV CHAUBAL to say. Now I grant that this particular rule giving power to the Governor to dispense with leave stage was made by the executive Government along with other rules for the purpose of the conduct of the business of the Legislative Council which came into being in 1862. My honourable friend Sir MAHADEV CHAUBAL relies on section 83 of the Act and says that the Government have absolute power to make such a rule. Well, I beg to differ from him. I say that the section merely gives power to the executive Government to make rules for the conduct of legislative business. It does not mean that the executive Government can make rules dispensing with the leave stage, the first reading, second reading, or any other stage of a bill. If his argument is carried to its logical conclusion, it means that the executive Government can, by their rules, make or unmake, do or undo, the functions of the Legislative Council. In that way, they can make a rule and say: "So far as the Bombay Legislative Council is concerned, we shall have only one reading of a bill; there shall be no reference to the select committee, nor the second and third readings." If the argument of my honourable friend Sir MAHADEV that the executive Government can, under the Government of India Act, section 83, make rules for the conduct of Council business dispensing with any stages of a bill is right, all I say is that such power, in my opinion, could never have been contemplated by the framers of the Government of India Act. We have, as we know, rules for the first reading, second reading and third reading. We have rules regarding reference to a select committee. Does my honourable friend Sir MAHADEV CHAUBAL mean to say that under section 83 (1) of the Act the executive Government could have dispensed with any of these stages? Certainly not. The Government could not have done so. If they could not have done so, the question is whether the leave stage which is contemplated by section 80 (1) of the Government of India Act could be dispensed with by the Governor under any rules made by the executive Government.

It is admitted by my honourable friend Sir MAHADEV CHAUBAL that this rule was made before 1861 by the executive Government, and my honourable friend the Advocate General says that it was adopted by this Council in 1865. Very well. Now if the executive Government could not dispense with the leave stage, as I submit it could not, the next question is, who could? My honourable friend Mr. BELVI very rightly asked the Advocate General to say whether this Legislative Council has got power, under the Government of India Act, to delegate any of its legislative functions to any other authority. I do not think my honourable friend the Advocate General has attempted to reply that query of my honourable friend Mr. BELVI. The Honourable the Advocate General merely relies on the fact, as he puts it, that motion for leave to introduce a bill is not compulsory under the act and so the question of delegation does not arise at all. If we accept the argument of the Honourable the Advocate General as correct, it comes to this that there is such a thing as a leave stage, but it is not compulsory. But I ask who can determine whether leave stage should be required in respect of a particular bill or not? I submit that it is the Legislative Council alone whose function it is to determine on the question of the leave stage to say whether motion for leave to introduce a particular bill shall be dispensed with or not. So far as I understand, the Government of India Act nowhere lays down that the Legislative Council can dispense with any of its legislative functions. I therefore submit, your Excellency, that if, as my honourable friend Sir MAHADEV CHAUBAL puts it, the rule empowering the Governor to dispense with leave stage was made before 1862, the executive Government had no power to make it. If it was made in 1865 by the Legislative Council (which, I respectfully submit, was not the case, but assuming for argument's sake that it was made by the Legislative Council), I respectfully submit that the Legislative Council had no authority to delegate one of its legislative functions to the Governor.

The Honourable Mr. PANDURANG ANANT DESAI:—The Honourable the Advocate General told us that that rule was passed by a meeting of this Legislative Council on the 1st of February 1865. Does my honourable friend doubt the correctness of that statement?

The Honourable Mr. PATEL:—I was going to deal with that question. The Honourable the Advocate General did tell us that; but my honourable friend Sir MAHADEV CHAUBAL clearly told this Council that the rule dispensing with the leave stage was made by the executive Government before the first Council met in 1862, and I am inclined to agree with the Honourable Sir MAHADEV CHAUBAL that the rules were framed by the executive Government before the Council met in 1862. It was pointed out at the very first meeting of the Council in 1862 that the Government bills must pass through the leave stage. The then Advocate General, the predecessor of my honourable friend Mr. STRANGMAN, was then asked to state to the Council his view in the matter. He said that the leave stage was a necessary stage and that every Government bill must pass through it.

The Honourable Sir MAHADEV CHAUBAL :—Well, the honourable member mentions that that was done because of the letter of which he has given an extract. The Advocate General no doubt did that, but the select committee reported that they did that in accordance with the orders of the Secretary of State. Paragraph 3 says :—

> " In accordance with the instructions of Her Majesty's Secretary of State we have expunged from the Bombay rules the word " Sessions " wherever it occurred."

Then they say -- I am reading from the supplementary Bombay Government Gazette dated Saturday, the 6th of September 1863 :—

> " With the view of placing all members of the Council on the same footing in regard to the introduction of bills, we have framed a rule which provides that the initiative step (i.e., obtaining leave) for the introduction of every bill should be taken at a meeting of the Council. This rule will enable the Council to exercise a control over the introduction of all bills. This power was not sufficiently recognized in the old rules in regard to measures proposed by the executive Government for the adoption of the Council ; but is a power which should not, in our opinion, be considered a matter of mere form."

The reference that I gave to the words " in accordance with the instructions of Her Majesty's Secretary of State " is from the despatch of the Honourable Sir Charles Wood, from which the Honourable Mr. PATEL has quoted in his dissenting minute. And I make it prefectly clear that when the Government of India asked later on our explanation for adopting the rule in the way in which the Government of India Act has framed it, we distinctly stated to them in answer that our rule was so made because we had previously received instructions to that effect from the Secretary of State and that if the Secretary of S ate's instructions had not been so received there would have been no change in the previous rules.

The Honourable Mr. PATEL :—My honourable friend Sir MAHADEV CHAUBAL and the Hon ourable the Advocate General referred this Council to the rules of 1865, but let me point out to them that at the first meeting of the Legislative Council in 1862 a difficulty was experienced. I refer the Council to the proceedings of the meeting of 8th February 1862. Mr. Westropp urged that there was a difficulty and asked how the bills then before the Council were to be treated. Mr. Frere suggested that they should be read a first time. Mr. Westropp then said that he thought that the leave of the Council should be asked before any bill be brought forward. It was then agreed that the Honourable Mr. Westropp should give his views at the next meeting. At that meeting he proposed that any honourable member desirous to introduce a bill should apply for leave in the first instance and on such leave being granted he may at the same time propose that it be read a first time. The Honourable Mr. Reeves on behalf of Government disagreed with Mr. Westropp and observed that bills introduced by Government should be brought forward without going through the form of requiring the leave of the Council, but a bill originated by a private member should not be introduced without the leave of the Council. Mr. Westropp in reply doubted the necessity of giving Government any preference in this matter but expressed his willingness to prepare a draft as suggested by Government. So apart from and long before any intimation from the Secretary of State at the very first Council meeting it was suggested by the Honourable the Advocate General that the leave stage was necessary in respect of Government bills, but Government said that it was not necessary. They said : " No, you make a draft of the rules leaving that question alone ; so far as Government bills are concerned no leave stage is necessary and you make a draft in respect of other rules ", and he made the draft accordingly. The Secretary of

[Mr. Vithalbhai Jhaverbhai Patel; the Advocate General.] [13TH OCTOBER 1917.]

State then pointed out in his despatch, which I have quoted in my minute of dissent, that all additional members of this Council should be treated on the same footing and the particular rule should be amended accordingly, and thereupon a committee consisting of the Honourable Sir William Mansfield and others was appointed to draft the rules and that draft came before the Legislative Council when Sir William Mansfield said that the draft was made in deference to the wishes of the Secretary of State. That was the position. The Government from the beginning took an extremely wrong attitude on the question of leave stage in respect of Government bills. It was only when the Secretary of State pointed out that the leave stage was necessary that the rules were amended and were sent for sanction to the Government of India. The Government of India then said: "No, we do not agree with you. You are not to take away from the executive Government the power of dispensing with the leave stage." There the matter stands. My honourable friend the Advocate General said that the Secretary of State was written to and he had agreed with the views of the Government of India. He read to this Council a portion of that letter, but the letter deals with altogether a different matter. It says: "We have received your letter and we agree that publication of a bill should be made with the sanction of the Governor-General." It is not necessary that it should be with the Governor-General in Council.

The Honourable the ADVOCATE GENERAL:—The Honourable Mr. PATEL is entirely wrong. I do not want to bore this Council by reading the whole letter. What happened was that the Secretary of State wrote to the Government of India, and the Government of India wrote and pointed out that the motion for leave to introduce was of an extremely formal character and they expressly asked that there should be a rule similar to the one we have got here; they substituted in the old rule the words "Governor-General" for "Governor-General in Council", that is to say, that the discretion should rest not with the Governor-General in Council as to whether leave to introduce should be dispensed with, but that it should rest with the Governor-General. The Secretary of State agreed with them, with the result that the Government of India framed the rule, which you would still find in their rules, a rule similar to the rule that we are here considering. That is the position; if the Honourable Mr. PATEL doubts my word he can come and look at it.

The Honourable Mr. PATEL:—That is in connection with the rules of the Government of India.

The Honourable the ADVOCATE GENERAL:—Certainly, it is in connection with the Government of India, and the Government of India suggested that exactly the same procedure should be adopted in the Bombay rules.

The Honourable Mr. PATEL:—Your Excellency, the sole question is whether leave stage could be dispensed with. The executive Government could not empower the Governor to do so by any rules made by them under the Government of India Act. The act does not empower the legislature to delegate any of its functions to the Governor.

Now, my honourable friend the Advocate General gives me credit for making this discovery after 56 years. As I pointed out, your Excellency, if he had only read the proceedings of 1862 he would have found that it was his own predecessor that had made the discovery in that year at the very first meeting of the Legislative Council under the Indian Councils Act, 1861.

Now, coming to the second question, namely, whether the sanction of the Governor should be obtained before any motion for leave to introduce a bill is made in this Council or not. The position of Government is that the application for such sanction, where sanction is necessary, should be made along with the notice of motion for leave.

One great argument advanced by my honourable friend the Advocate General is that the Government of India, even if we were inclined to pass this amendment, would not sanction it. How is it, then, that so far as the Bihar and the Bengal Legislative Council rules are concerned the Government of India have been pleased to sanction them, although they are similar to the proposed amendment?

COUNCIL BUSINESS RULES.

[13TH OCTOBER 1917.] [Mr. Vithalbhai Jhaverbhai Patel; the President.]

I have quoted in my minute of dissent the Bengal rule and I do not think I need trouble the Council by reading it here. All I say is that if the Government of India were pleased to sanction the rules made by the Bengal and Bihar Councils, I cannot understand why the Government of India would give us, this Council, a differential treatment in the matter. Apart from that, your Excellency, the point is whether a member of this Council has got a right to come before this Council and make a motion for leave to introduce a bill without the sanction of the Governor in a case where such sanction is required. Although according to the Act the sanction is required for the introduction of a bill, Government goes further and says: "We shall not allow you even to make a motion for leave." All that they are entitled to say is this, "Whatever may be your position with regard to motion for leave to introduce a bill, once that motion comes before the Council for discussion and is accepted by the Council, we shall stop you and say we will not allow the introduction." That is all that you can say under section 80, sub-section (2), of the Government of India Act which merely says:—

"It shall not be lawful for any member of any local Legislative Council to introduce, without the previous sanction of the Governor, Lieutenant-Governor or Chief Commissioner, any measure affecting the public revenues of the province or imposing any charge on those revenues." If that is so, how can you insist that a member of this Council shall at such and such a stage apply for sanction to the Governor or that you will not allow motion for leave to introduce a bill without such sanction having been previously obtained when the Government of India Act does not say so? Not that the Government of India Act does not recognise motion for leave. In fact the very first part of sub-section (1) of section 80 deals with motion for leave to introduce a bill and sub-section (2) with the introduction of a bill. So, there are two stages recognised by the Government of India Act, the motion for leave to introduce a bill and the stage of introduction. Now, how can you tell us "No, we will not allow you to go on with the motion for leave to introduce your bill without sanction" when the Government of India Act distinctly tells you that such sanction is required for the introduction of the bill? It is our right to make a motion for leave without sanction. It is a legal right which is granted by the Government of India Act. I say it is the absolute right, unfettered by any conditions, of every member of this Council, whether additional or ordinary, to come before this Council and to make a motion for leave to introduce a bill, and the restrictions that the executive Government have, by rules, placed on that absolute and unqualified right are ultra vires of section 80 (2) of the Government of India Act. No doubt, the Honourable the Advocate General refers us to section 79 (3) of the Government of India Act. That section says that where the sanction of the Governor-General is required, the Legislative Council cannot take into consideration any law unless that sanction has been previously obtained." My honourable friend the Advocate General says according to this section any discussion on a motion for leave to introduce a bill is equivalent to taking the law into consideration. I most respectfully differ from him. I say that you take into consideration any law only when the bill is introduced, not before that. In any case, even if the construction proposed to be put by the Honourable the Advocate General on section 79 (3) of the Government of India Act be correct, what has he got to say with regard to section 80 (2) of the Government of India Act which makes sanction necessary when the bill is introduced? He cannot say that in both cases sanction shall be required before motion for leave to introduce a bill.

With these few words, I trust the Council will support my amendment.

His Excellency the PRESIDENT:—I intend to add only a few words to the discussion we have had, particularly as I am not competent to discuss in any detail the somewhat lengthy arguments that we have heard from many honourable members who are legal luminaries and who have gone very closely into the various points with regard to this amendment. But I own to honourable members that I have not felt quite at ease during the whole of the discussion, because I think if we really come down to business—and my honourable friend Mr. PATEL seems to have raised himself to a considerable pitch of excitement during his concluding remarks—really the whole question is this: is the Governor fit to be trusted to exercise certain authority with regard to certain matters under these rules? That is the whole question before the Council. After all, what is the position? The honourable member asks for leave to introduce a bill. It rests entirely with His Excellency alone—I am sorry to say without the support of the honourable members of the Executive Council—to say whether he will give leave to introduce a bill or whether he will waive the necessity for the leave stage. I really cannot see why we have had such a lengthy discussion on the matter. Is it better that His Excellency, if he thinks a bill is entirely uncontroversial, should have the power to shorten the proceedings and to go straight to the first reading of the bill, or, on the other hand, if he thinks that further enquiry ought to be made with regard to the bill, to insist on the motion for leave to introduce? Let me say again to my honourable friend who has moved this amendment, as I said to him yesterday, that I do consider that this is rather an unfriendly act on his part, considering the treatment he has experienced at my hands. I can only say that I trust honourable members will not accept the amendment that he has proposed because—apart altogether from the purely personal aspect—in a small matter like this, I think His Excellency the Governor will probably be able to deal with the situation in a satisfactory manner.

I will add only one word more and it is this. The honourable member had a further argument in favour of his amendment, namely, that the motion for leave to introduce is not a purely formal matter. I want to make it perfectly clear to the Council that as far as I am concerned, I should always consider, if motion for leave to introduce were necessary, that it should always be a formal motion. After all, there would be the first reading and the second reading, giving full opportunity for opposing the bill, and I would give a further authority for adopting that course. In the Imperial Legislative Council proceedings of 21st March 1914 a ruling was given by His Excellency the President that as a matter of practice a motion for leave to introduce will be treated as a purely formal matter, and honourable members are also aware that in the House of Commons that is the invariable rule.

The Honourable Mr. PATEL'S amendments to rules 28, 29 and 30 were then put to the vote and lost without a division.

The Honourable Mr. PATEL'S amendments to rules 32, 37 and 45 were by leave withdrawn.

The Honourable Mr. CHUNILAL MEHTA:—Are all the rules to be taken together, your Excellency?

His Excellency the PRESIDENT:—Yes, that is so.

The Honourable Mr. CHUNILAL MEHTA:—But supposing we disagree with the recommendations of the select committee?

His Excellency the PRESIDENT:—I think my honourable friend has had sufficient opportunity for discussion during the last two days.

The Honourable Mr. CHUNILAL MEHTA:—I beg to submit that I was not allowed to move my amendment, your Excellency.

His Excellency the PRESIDENT:—The honourable member will remember what my ruling was yesterday, that on bills and on matters of this sort amendments of principle should be in writing. I think the honourable member must see that it would be impossible to conduct our business if matters of this sort are to be brought up without notice, and I think I must not allow any informal amendments to be brought in by honourable members. With regard to resolutions the matter is different. I think amendments to resolutions can be moved in the Council. If the honourable member wishes to propose any amendment in rules, he can do so after giving due notice on a future occasion.

I have to put before the Council one alteration which my honourable colleague thinks should be made, and that is in the 5th line "in which case the select committee may appoint its own chairman" instead of "their own chairman".

The amendment was then put to the vote and carried.

The whole of the amendments, as proposed by the select committee, as further amended in Council, were then put to the vote and carried.

DISCUSSION OF MATTERS OF GENERAL PUBLIC INTEREST.

His Excellency the PRESIDENT:—Further discussion of the resolution moved by the Honourable Mr. PARANJPYE about the use of Modi script in official correspondence.

The Honourable Ráo Bahádur GANESH KRISHNA SATHE:—Your Excellency,—This question about Modi and Balbodh has been before this Council either in the form of a resolution or question ever since 1913. But this is the only occasion on which this question has been discussed in detail. At the last session the Honourable Mr. PARANJPYE moved this resolution and has given his reasons in full in support of it, but as so much time has passed it will be a good justification for me to enter into a short history of the question within the time allotted to me.

This question of the substitution of Balbodh for Modi was first unofficially taken up by Mr. Kincaid in 1907. He tried the experiment in Poona and Mr. Maconochie, the then Collector of Ratnagiri, tried it there in 1909 with the permission of Government, who then distinctly stated that after one year the result of the experiment should be reported to them. After that Mr. Ghosal came in office and he was emphatically of opinion that the experiment tried in Ratnagiri was not a success. Depending on the recommendation of the then Commissioner, Mr. Gibb, and the Collector, Mr. Ghosal, Government asked the Collector to discontinue the practice of having Balbodh script in official correspondence. There the matter stopped. The officer who had taken up this matter in Ratnagiri was in the meantime transferred to Nasik and he again made an experiment there for one year and Government was good enough to ask him to make a further report after the end of another year. Fortunately for that officer, he got a successor like Mr. Baker, who had served most of his time in Sind. He recommended the continuance of Balbodh, though there was not unanimity in the opinions of his subordinates. Then in 1912 Government put a seal on this question, if I am right, without consulting any other Collectors or District Judges in the Central Division, by making compulsory the use of Balbodh. This matter came up in 1913 before this Council on the motion of the Honourable Mr. UPASANI, who withdrew it, and somehow or other the matter was again taken up by Government and in the year 1915 Government issued a resolution the contents of which I am not able to give because it was not supplied to us. But I know from one of the extracts which was supplied to all the courts that Government permitted the public to give their petitions or documents in Modi. That was the attitude which Government took in the middle of 1915. Then in March 1916 the Honourable Mr. UPASANI moved a resolution on the subject which was without any discussion accepted in a modified form in order to give opportunity to Government to reconsider the whole question in the light of the experience gained. I think in the early part of this year, in March or April 1917, Government issued a resolution, which has been kindly supplied to us along with the question paper book of the July session; it states that Balbodh should be used in all the departments, not only of the Central Division, but of all the three other Marathi speaking districts, Thana, Kolaba and Ratnagiri. So the effect of the reconsideration was not to modify any existing orders, but to extend the scope of those orders, and it was in July last that the Honourable Mr. PARANJPYE moved the resolution which is now before us for discussion.

Now the reasons which have been advanced for the introduction of Balbodh may be summarised as under. First, Modi is written in a cursive hand and has a tendency to degenérate. Secondly, clerks of the present day write illegible Modi and consequently English officers cannot read Modi correspondence for themselves. The necessary consequence of this is to depend upon subordinate officers. Thirdly, it is said that if documents were to be in Balbodh, kunbis and agriculturists would be protected. I have got a summary of this from the papers supplied to us.

Government might reasonably ask me the question, what is the reason for this agitation now? We have allowed the public to present petitions and documents written in Modi. But I think this concession itself has cut away a good deal of the ground underneath the feet of Government, and I will shortly state how. If the public are allowed to put in petitions and documents in Modi, is it not really desirable that the officers who sit in courts as judicial officers and other officers who receive these petitions should be able to know the contents of these petitions first-hand by their intimate knowledge of Modi, or are they going to take these matters on trust from their sheristedars and clerks, which, I submit, has been a great grievance made out by the champion of Balbodh, Mr. Kincaid? Then, if this is so, I would bring one fact to the notice of the members of this Council, that if such documents are allowed to be presented in Modi, all the difficulties which really stood in the way of these officers before the introduction of Balbodh do stand even now. I do not for a moment pretend to say that Balbodh is not easier to read than Modi. That is not my attitude. My attitude is that if Balbodh is going to degenerate, as I say it is bound to degenerate, then is it worth while that Government should undertake this experiment at the expense of a script which has been so dear to the people and which has been amongst them for over 600 years?

There is another point, that Balbodh takes a longer time to write. There is no question about it and my honourable friend who is sitting on my right, Mr. SEDDON, in his report, which has been supplied to us, clearly admits these two facts. I refer to page 436 of this journal. He says: "I should think that there can be no doubt that Modi can be written more quickly than Balbodh, and that the legibility of Balbodh tends to decrease." Then further on he adds a rider: "Nevertheless Balbodh is likely to remain substantially more legible in reading than Modi and the difference in rapidity of writing is not, in fact, causing any serious increase of work, nor is it leading to arrears." Now, this difficulty as regards more time and illegibility even of Balbodh may not be very vividly perceived in official correspondence, where the matter to be written may not be as voluminous as it is in the case of magisterial enquiries and in the case of judicial courts. The real difficulty that one feels, and about which I can speak with a certain amount of confidence, is that clerks who are now asked to write Balbodh have always to make a special attempt to keep pace with the presiding judge, and in doing so what is the natural result? The natural result is that a clerk who has not a settled Balbodh hand invents his own mode of writing Balbodh because he has to keep pace with the judge and has to put in a certain amount of work in the time allotted to him. In fact, there are several officers—I think etiquette prevents me from mentioning their names—second class magistrates, third class magistrates, and so on, who have to take depositions in Balbodh, who write, if I may say so, worse than even Modi though what they write is said to be Balbodh. I am not in the least exaggerating when I say that in the appellate courts it does sometimes happen that a committee of two or three has to be appointed before the district magistrate is able to know what the contents of a particular deposition or statement taken in Balbodh are. I only want to impress upon your Excellency's Government and this Council this fact. I am not fond of exaggerations, I say so because this has come to my notice in my capacity as a lawyer practising in civil and criminal courts. I do not stand alone in this view. Those who were consulted in the beginning of 1917 or the end of 1916 included experienced officers like Mr. Dikshit and the late Mr. Tyabji and the present Collector of Ratnagiri, Mr. Brander; and what do we find? I will read only two quotations, because reading of quotations becomes tiresome. I refer to pages 441 and 443. This is the opinion of Mr. Dikshit: "In criminal cases from Kolaba I have to go through the police diaries and other papers and depositions of witnesses which are written in Balbodh, and in some cases I have found them more illegible than badly written Modi. It cannot be denied that hastily written Balbodh is more illegible than Modi written with the same speed." Then at page 443 the Collector of Ratnagiri, Mr. Brander—though it appears under the signature of his assistant—says: "It is in magisterial work that the disadvantages of Balbodh are so serious and irksome that depositions have to be taken very slowly so that they may be recorded in Balbodh, so that the time of the magistrate is wasted and as also that of his clerks and of the parties to the case." Then he gives his experience when he was an officer at Poona; but I will not trouble this Council by reading more extracts from his letter.

What is the real remedy for this? The real remedy is, not to substitute the slovenly Balbodh for well-written Modi, but to insist upon the enlistment into Government service of those who know how to write Modi in a clear and legible hand. The Modi has been prescribed as a special subject for the Marathi vernacular school final and the English school final, and if Government would take some care in the enlistment of better and well qualified clerks, and would also insist upon the present staff that they should write better and more legible Modi, I think this complaint will really disappear. Instead of that we find that Government has taken this step in a matter of this kind even though experienced officers of Government greatly differ. Then is it too much for us to ask Government that, when the state of things is such, when there is no unanimity of opinion in a matter like this, whether it was right and proper to ask the people to adopt a script which was not in vogue for so many years? Now, sir, there is one point, and that is that English officers do not know much of Modi. Of course, it may be a fact—I do not deny it—because it is not as easy to learn as Balbodh, but is it not in the interest of efficient administration that the officers of the district should know the current script of the district? Is it only the official correspondence which does come under the eye of these officers? Are they not required to see to various other things in their own districts? But even if the correspondence in all offices in Marathi-speaking districts were to be carried on in Balbodh, is it not really necessary that the heads of the several departments should be conversant with the script of the district? I may put it to officers here whether even with the introduction of Balbodh, the marginal notes which were in vogue in previous days have now been done away with? My information is that just as clerks and chitnises and sheristadars were writing marginal notes in the case of Modi correspondences, they are asked to do so even in case of Balbodh correspondences. If that is so, what is really the advantage gained?

Then, sir, there is another point. Why should Government be solicitous for the convenience of officers who serve in the Marathi-speaking districts? Is not Kanarese and Gujarathi a script as difficult to be deciphered as Modi is in Marathi?

The Honourable Mr. LALUBHAI:—Gujarathi script is not so very difficult.

The Honourable Mr. BELVI:—I know Kanarese script is much more difficult than Modi script. There are two different scripts, both of which I know.

MODI SCRIPT IN OFFICIAL CORRESPONDENCE.

[Ráo Bahádur Ganesh Krishna Sathe.] [13TH OCTOBER 1917.]

The Honourable Ráo Bahádur SATHE :—However, my information is that Kanarese script is difficult : perhaps, I may not be correct in making a statement about Gujarathi. If that is so, why should there be a concession, particularly, in the case of officers who serve in Marathi districts ?

Then again, there is the question of handwriting. Is it a question of script or would it usually and invariably depend upon the writer ? Whether you ask him to write in Balbodh or you ask him to do so in Modi, is a man going to write Balbodh much better than Modi if he is himself not a good writer ? So from my point of view, that question must be looked at, not from the standpoint as to which script is better than the other, but whether the writers whom you engage would write legibly whether you ask them to write Balbodh or Modi. That is a point which I want to place before your Excellency's Government.

Then there is another point, namely, the agriculturists are not protected. Of course, nobody is really more anxious to see that agriculturists should not be imposed upon than myself and others of this Council. But is it a real remedy ? Do these agriculturists understand Balbodh ? If the statements in courts and documents registered under the Registration Act are in Balbodh, is it to be understood that the vast agricultural population will be protected ? I believe not. If my information on these matters is to be of some use, an ordinary ryot and the ordinary agriculturist cannot read and write even Balbodh. There are a few, no doubt, who understand how to write and read Balbodh.

One more point. It has been already touched in the correspondence which has been placed before us, that cases of forgeries do sometimes occur. When the writing is in Modi it is easily detected because of the peculiar valan or style of individual writer and imitation becomes very difficult and more impossible in Modi than in Balbodh, and even if resorted to is easily detectable. This is also an advantage from the administrative point of view, and in fact Government should not adopt a measure which will handicap the proper and efficient administration of justice.

Then there is another point and that is this. Is it right or would it be right that, because once orders have been passed, that Government should continue to give effect to those orders even if the change is found not to work well. The real point is, your Excellency, whether we should stick fast to the orders passed. I find again from my friend the Honourable Mr. SEDDON'S report, page 436—I do not know w at he means, but I am going to make use of those expressions in the best way I can : " Under these circumstances, I think it would be a very great error to go back upon the orders already passed." What are those circumstances ? The circumstances mentioned by the Honourable Mr. SEDDON in his report are that no doubt Balbodh takes longer time and Balbodh is bound to degenerate, but it will not substantially degenerate for a considerable time. I am reading this passage to show that my honourable friend Mr. SEDDON and some others do admit this disadvantage of Balbodh, but then it is thought by them that even under these circumstances it would be a very great error to go back on these orders. The strongest point which I wish to place before this Council is this, that if there is a divided opinion on a matter of this kind between officers of Government and if the work is being handicapped in the way in which I have described, and if there is surely a tendency for Balbodh to degenerate, are we going to get an advantage by having this change from Modi to Balbodh which seems to have been introduced ever since 1907 unofficially and in 1912 officially ? My earnest request, your Excellency, is that as it is a question of script, it is bound to be dear to us who have been brought up and bred up in writing that script, and I earnestly trust that your Excellency will be pleased to reconsider those orders and to introduce Modi as before. With these words, I leave this resolution in the hands of my honourable friend.

MODI SCRIPT IN OFFICIAL CORRESPONDENCE.

[13TH OCTOBER 1917.] [Ráo Bahádur Venkatesh Shrinivas Naik; Mr. G. S. Curtis.]

The Honourable Ráo Bahádur VENKATESH SHRINIWAS NAIK:—May it please your Excellency,—My friend the Honourable Principal PARANJPYE has referred to my name in the speech he made with his usual zeal, eloquence and ability, at the time of moving the resolution, and I feel it my duty to say to your Excellency and this Council what my views are on the resolution, and what the people in my part of the country think of the question. Though I come from a district in which the Kanarese language is prevalent, yet there are numerous considerations which weigh with me and compel me to support this resolution. Even in the Karnatic the accounts in many families are kept in Modi script from generations, old and ancient documents are found written in Modi, and even now business and domestic correspondence is carried on in Modi. In my part of the country there are very few schools in which Marathi is taught, still men of business teach their children to read and write Modi privately. I may give my own example as to what I say.

The Honourable Mr. CURTIS:—The honourable member says he was taught to read and write Modi privately. Will he kindly inform us whether the lady members of his community write in Modi or Balbodh?

The Honourable Ráo Bahádur NAIK:—They have very little to write. It is a matter of sentiment with a very large number of people, even in the Karnatic, to know at least a little of Modi and to be able to sign one's name in that script, and it is in my opinion very unwise to brush aside a strong sentiment such as this. It cannot, with any show of reason, be denied that it is much easier to write a letter or a document in Modi script than in Balbodh character. I believe that the principal objection which is taken to the use of Modi script is that the script is difficult to read. But it seems to me that an objection like this may be raised against any other script, which is not written with care and ease by a practised hand. I can cite hundreds of instances of illegible handwriting of highly educated European and Indian gentlemen, but that does not mean that the script in which they write has anything inherently bad in it. It is the fault of the writer and not of the script. I have seen hundreds of documents and account books written in beautiful Modi. Unfortunately now-a-days handwriting in vernacular is not cultivated with the same care that used to be given to it in my younger days. One has only to see certified copies of old documents in Modi supplied to litigants from Government offices in these days to be convinced of the indifference and the utter carelessness with which penmanship in vernacular is regarded. Instead of abolishing the Modi script altogether, more attention should, I submit, be paid to handwriting, and if this is done I have no doubt that even European officers, for whose benefit the change seems to have been introduced, will find it easy to read papers written in Modi. It is extremely fanciful to suppose that it is feasible to use Balbodh as a script for the different languages which are current in the Bombay Presidency. The very idea of writing one language in the script of some other is extremely revolting and I am sure an Englishman would not like the idea of writing a letter to a friend in the English language but in Balbodh characters. The script of each language is suited to its genius and it is never wise to try to effect a violent and radical alteration of the script of any language. I admit that Balbodh is used in our books of religion and by our ladies in writing letters, but that is no reason why where business is to be transacted, and where time is an important consideration, an easy and cursive script like Modi should not be continued to be used by ordinary people. Even Kanarese in its cursive script greatly differs from the printed characters, and becomes as illegible or even more illegible than Modi, if written in careless handwriting. English also, which is written in running and easy script, if carelessly written becomes as illigible as Modi. The writing of each language has got its peculiarities which require to be mastered. The provision of these cursive scripts in almost all the languages is a device for saving time in writing, and if the script is found illegible, the proper remedy is to give greater attention and care to improve the handwriting of the writers than asking them to abandon the cursive script itself.

With these remarks I support the resolution moved by my honourable friend Principal PARANJPYE.

The Honourable Mr. C. N. SEDDON:—Your Excellency,—I suppose that many members of this Council and many gentlemen outside will be inclined to say that this matter might well be left to those who speak and use Marathi. Why, if the people whose mother tongue is Marathi wish it, should Government interfere? Why should Government insist that the Marathi used in their offices should be used in a particular script when the people wish it otherwise? I shall try to answer that question.

First of all, I should like to say that it is not at all probable, and I think sensible men will be ready to admit it, that Government would have passed orders in this matter at all unless there had been good reasons for it. I shall say something about those reasons directly. I intended to put before your Excellency the history of the orders that have been passed by Government in the matter, but the Honourable Ráo Bahádur SATHE has relieved me of this task to a considerable extent. He has told us how the question first arose in 1907 in the Poona district, and how it was dealt with in Ratnagiri and in Nasik, and how it was ordered by Government in 1912 that the Balbodh script should be substituted for the Modi in all the offices in the Central Division. Finally, the Honourable Ráo Bahádur SATHE said that this was done without asking for opinions. But I need hardly say that a mass of opinions was asked for, and although a certain number of people, as is only natural, were in favour of the Modi script, the vast preponderance of opinion favoured Balbodh. Government, after passing orders finally in 1912, reconsidered the matter in 1913, again in 1915, and lastly, on the motion of the Honourable Mr. UPASANI last year, they went through the whole question again. In the course of this consideration and reconsideration an enormous number of opinions were recorded, and as I have just said, the vast preponderance was in favour of Balbodh. I should like to add for the information of honourable members that this change from Modi to Balbodh was not made only by the Bombay Government. It has been made also in the Central Provinces, and in the High Court of Bombay. I think honourable members will recognise that there must have been good reasons for it, and I think honourable members will also recognise that the matter was very carefully considered.

A good deal of stress has been laid on the matter of sentiment, and people say that of course the Modi script should not be banned in this way. But I must emphasise this fact that the Government orders apply only to the working of Government offices. They do not at all touch the outside public who use Modi. Government orders are most careful to say that any documents or petitions presented by the public may be in either script, whichever script people may like. There is nothing whatever to prevent anybody writing Modi in his private business if he wishes to do so. I have been watching my honourable friend on the left, the Honourable Ráo Bahádur SATHE, writing private letters in Modi, and nobody hinders him or prevents him from doing so. It is a matter of convenience to the internal administration of Government departments. The Government order was passed merely to facilitate the business of Government offices. Now since it was done by Government after consulting its officers, I must say that Government must have had good reasons, and unless it were so they would not have gone into the matter. They could not have come to a decision in a matter of this kind without having good and sufficient reasons for it.

I should like to explain what those reasons are. First of all, if your Excellency will bear with me for a moment, I will say a word or two as to what the position really is. I have no doubt that most of the honourable members of this Council understand the matter thoroughly, yet there may be some here, and also people outside, who do not understand and to whom the proceedings of this Council are a matter of interest. The Marathi language is written in one or two scripts, namely, Balbodh and Modi. Balbodh is not only a fine, bold, legible script, but it is a script known all over India. It is a script in which are written the classical Sanskrit works and the classical poetry of the Mahabharata, and anybody who knows anything about Indian languages must of course know the Balbodh script which is usually called in the rest of India Devanagari. It is very legible and everybody knows it and everybody can read it. Modi, on the other hand, although it is when well written a handsome character, is confined entirely to the Marathi-speaking portion of the Presidency. Any one who comes from Gujarat or Sind or Bengal or anywhere else does not know Modi and cannot write Modi. And even in the Marathi-speaking districts I may say that it is not a fact that Balbodh corresponds to the English printed character; it is also frequently used, as all our opponents observe, for ordinary purposes of correspondence It is used by all ladies and in writing to ladies. The Honourable Mr. PARANJPYE says it is used also by uneducated people, including children and ladies. Not that I wish to imitate his way of referring to ladies. The script is in fact used by a large number of people. It is used by authors because they cannot trust the compositors to decipher Modi. If a writer sends anything to the compositors in Modi they will probably humiliate him by wrong spelling. But after all the two great disadvantages of Modi are these: first of all it is used exclusively by the Marathi-speaking people, and people who come from other provinces of India or from Europe cannot decipher it; and, secondly, it is essentially in itself not a legible script. It is illegible and difficult to read. I have been President of the Civil and Military Examination Committee of Bombay for a good many years, and I have seen, although I generally do not take part in the examinations myself, a large number of people examined in Marathi. These people in every case find the greatest difficulty in reading Modi, whether they are Englishmen or Parsis or Mahomedans or Gujaratis. They find it difficult to read Modi. And it is not only illegible for outsiders, but it is illegible for people of the country, inasmuch as a karkun or a clerk, unless he is thoroughly trained, cannot properly read it. If I have before me a document in Modi and I want some one to come in and read it to me, I have to send for a clerk who is accustomed to read it and not any clerk.

Of course Modi takes little shorter time to write than Balbodh. But as has been well said in this matter, quick writing is slow reading, and the people who write are lowly paid clerks while the people who read are highly paid officers whose time is of value. Now I want to emphasise this fact that Modi is in its nature a character which it is very difficult to read and a character which people from other parts of India do not know.

Having said this much I will point out what the reasons are to make it desirable to substitute Balbodh for Modi. If proceedings in criminal cases are recorded in Modi, magistrates cannot read the depositions and the proceedings which come before them. Collectors and Assistant Collectors cannot read the correspondence which is in their offices and cannot read the orders which they sign. The Honourable Mr. SATHE says they ought to be able to read; the fact is that they cannot, and however much they may try, they won't be able to do it. It is a fact that cannot be gainsaid, that Balbodh is a character which our officers can read and Modi is a character which they cannot. That is a very great difficulty. It must be an advantage surely that our officers should be able to read their own orders and papers. It is an advantage that our officers should be able to read the records of their own offices.

Well, the second thing is with regard to the subordinate establishments. I have it on very high authority that their inability to read and write Modi was found in the district of Khandesh to be a great stumbling block to the employment of Mahomedans. These Mahomedans who could not read and write Modi properly have been considered inefficient for service in that district as they could not deal with Modi correspondence. The same thing applies to other important sections of the Indian communities, the Indian Christians, Parsis and Gujaratis in the Thana and Kolaba districts, who could not manage to read Modi. And the consequence is that recruitment for our subordinate service, for clerks and karkuns in our offices, is confined to certain classes of the community only. Unless a man is a Brahmin or a Shenvi or a Prabhu, he finds the utmost difficulty in dealing with Modi correspondence, he finds it difficult to enter Government service. And of course everybody knows that it is an important matter that it is very desirable in the public interest that the staff of our establishment should be drawn from as wide a source as possible.

MODI SCRIPT IN OFFICIAL CORRESPONDENCE.

[Mr. C. N. Seddon; Dewán Bahádur Kashinath Ramchandra Godbole; Mr. G. Carmichael.] [13TH OCTOBER 1917.]

It seems to me, your Excellency, that these are very good reasons for changing the script. It is submitted that the executive orders issued by Government are applicable only to Government offices in the cities and do not touch the script as far as it is used by the public. I submit that this order which has been considered by Government again and again should be maintained, and that it is not right for honourable members to attempt to obstruct the discretion of Government as to what orders they pass with regard to the conduct of work in their own offices.

Now I come to an important part of the argument, which I hope to dispose of in a few moments. It has been said that Government have disregarded sentiment. It is an important charge against Government, but as Commissioner of the Central Division I must say that I see no sign whatever of any sentiment or any feeling existing in the matter. The Honourable Mr. PARANJPYE'S statement that the sentiments and feelings of the people are affected is a very considerable exaggeration. There is, of course, a certain class whose sentiments are affected. That class is, as I have just said, the class whose monopoly has been broken down by the introduction of Balbodh in Government offices. That class, of course, sees that all the places which formerly were reserved for it are now being thrown open to a larger part of the people. That is at the bottom of the sentiment. That is the sentiment which the Government orders have upset.

With these few words, I express the hope that honourable members will vote against this resolution

The Honourable Dewán Bahádur KASHINATH RAMCHANDRA GODBOLE:—Your Excellency,—As a member of the Deccan community, it is appropriate that I should express my views to the Council on this subject, especially as I think the views of a man who can read and write both Modi and Balbodh will be helpful to such members of this Council as are not acquainted with these scripts.

I may tell this Council that I am in perfect accord with the Honourable Mr. PARANJPYE and the Honourable Ráo Bahádur SATHE in the views that they have expressed. I read and write both Modi and Balbodh, and as a youngster when I commenced my education I was taught Modi first and not Balbodh: Modi used to be considered so important in my earlier years.

The Honourable Mr. CARMICHAEL:—May I ask the honourable member for what purpose?

The Honourable Dewán Bahádur GODBOLE:—My father intended that I should be brought up for the ordinary business of life and he thought that the training that I should get should be in Modi at first in preference to Balbodh. I can tell this Council from my personal experience that I can write in Modi in half the time that I take for writing the same matter in Balbodh. I have personally made enquiries of clerks, karkuns, accountants and a number of employés connected with Government offices, and they have all been saying that the course which Government have adopted in the matter of changing the script in the public offices from Modi to Balbodh is a ridiculous innovation, which has been responsible for a great deal of inconvenience. As president of the district

MODI SCRIPT IN OFFICIAL CORRESPONDENCE.

[13TH OCTOBER 1917.] [Dewán Bahádur Kashinath Ramchandra Godbole; Mr. Pandurang Anant Desai; Mr. G. S. Curtis.]

local board, I have had opportunities recently of seeing the Balbodh correspondence that takes place in public offices, and I can honestly tell this Council that the Balbodh that comes up in this correspondence is hardly superior in the matter of legibility to the correspondence in Modi as it is usually carried on Balbodh as it is written in official correspondence to-day is as illegible—perhaps I should say more illegible—than Modi if the latter is written by a good clerk. One of the arguments that have been advanced by the Honourable Mr. SEDDON against the resolution is that Modi is a script that is not understood by other communities and therefore it restricts the field for the appointment of karkuns and other subordinate officials in Government offices. As regards this argument I would ask the Council to consider where the recruitment of these karkuns and subordinate officers comes from. Does it come from Sind or Bengal or Madras or other Provinces? The recruitment takes place in the district itself or in the immediate adjacent districts. The recruitment of clerks for the Sholapur district for instance will be from the Sholapur district and the adjoining districts of Poona and Nagar; and Modi and Balbodh are equally well understood and written in these districts. Therefore the argument that the field of selection for appointments in subordinate offices is restricted on account of the Modi script is, I think, not worthy of much consideration.

Then again, this Council has to remember that at present in all our public schools in the Deccan we teach both Balbodh and Modi, and the rising generation are equally well acquainted with both these scripts, and there ought to be no difficulty in the future in the recruiting of clerks who are acquainted with both Modi and Balbodh. Modi is equally well understood with Balbodh by the rising generation.

Government should I think insist upon good Modi writing in selecting their karkuns and clerks in future and then the difficulty that is complained of as regards the illegibility of Modi will disappear. As I remarked before, the Balbodh script that is written today in official correspondence is just as difficult to read as Modi. I admit that in the case of European officers such as Assistant Collectors and Forest officers the duality of scripts causes some difficulty, because they have to acquaint themselves with both Modi and Balbodh, but for the convenience of 3 or 4 officers in the district it will not be proper to sacrifice the convenience and time of a large staff of subordinate servants of the state.

With these remarks I heartily support the resolution of my honourable friend Mr. PARANJPYE.

The Honourable Mr. PANDURANG ANANT DESAI:—May it please your Excellency,—I come from the Karnatik district of Bijapur and I belong to the Ratnagiri district, so I have got a double claim, so to say, to speak about this Modi script. The history of the Modi script, as far as we know, is that it was first introduced in the 13th century by Hemad Pant, the prime minister of the Hindu King Devagiri Ramraja. Our connection with Modi is therefore over six centuries old, and the beginning which has been made to abolish that connection must be very keenly felt by every one whose mother tongue and whose current script is Marathi and Modi respectively.

The Honourable Mr. CURTIS:—May I have an authority for the statement that Modi was invented in the 13th century?

The Honourable Mr. DESAI:—That I have heard from persons whose authority for that statement cannot be questioned. I have heard it from Ráo Bahádur Sane and other persons, whom, if necessary, I shall mention. Ráo Bahádur Sane, who has experience of many years and who is an expert in history, says that it was invented in the 13th century.

MODI SCRIPT IN OFFICIAL CORRESPONDENCE.

[Mr. Raghunath Purshottam Paranjpye; Mr. Pandurang Anant Desai; Mr. G. Carmichael.] [13TH OCTOBER 1917.]

The Honourable Mr. PARANJPYE:—It is stated in the history of the Mahrattas that all the bakhars were written in Modi.

The Honourable Mr. DESAI:—The majority of authorities and the general understanding of all Deccanis is that we have been connected with that script from the 13th century, if not earlier. Under these circumstances, I should like to impress on all the members of this Council that the question here is whether they would be willing to give up this script, whether the change has been made in the interest of many or a few? If we are to decide the question of convenience or inconvenience, it stands to reason that the convenience of many should be taken into consideration. The minority is not to tyrannise over the majority and the majority should not be made to give way to the minority. Therefore I should like to place before the Council whether the change has been demanded by the majority or by the minority. That is the question.

The Honourable Mr. CARMICHAEL:—Would the honourable member put it as not for the convenience but for the benefit?

The Honourable Mr. DESAI:—I say convenience and benefit. Whether it is for the benefit of the minority or of the majority is what we are to see. Now when we are asked to deal with this question of minority and majority we must at present exclude persons who have not to do much with business matters. A question was asked a short time ago, "Do your women write Modi"? Of course, the answer is that at present they do not. At present you will find that 75 per cent. of our women are illiterate. It may be that the averge among the Parsis might be higher, but so far as the Hindu community is concerned, even among the upper classes you will find that the percentage is not less than 75 per cent. Now under the circumstances, if we exclude women and if we take into consideration persons who are to deal with business matters, is the present change for the benefit of those persons? Now one of the reasons which has been assigned for this change is that it is necessary for the protection of the agriculturists and that it should be introduced in the office for the benefit of the kunbis. I cannot understand that argument at all. What has a kunbi to do with the script which is written in the office?

The Honourable Mr. CARMICHAEL:—May I draw the attention of the honourable member that he has to read official records, the land record, mortgage deed or sale deed?

The Honourable Mr. DESAI:—Government officers say that we do not at present object to receive private documents or petitions of the public written in Modi. We simply want this introduction for the convenience of the officers of Government. When you take into consideration the interests of the kunbis, I think the next change which will be introduced will be that no documents written in Modi should be registered and that no document registered in Modi should be admitted under the Registration Act. At present the Government says, well, we are not interfering with your freedom, you can have your sons taught Modi, you can write to your friends in Modi and write letters and accounts in Modi. No doubt the order as it stands at present affects your offices to a certain extent, but it does also affect us in practice. If it is known that a clerk who has to enter a Government office has to write the deposition and correspondence in Balbodh, others who are to follow him will think that it is unnecessary for them to learn Modi at all. What will be the effect? The effect will be that in course of time it will be very difficult to read ancient documents in offices for persons who know no Modi at all. A time will come when there will be no persons who know Modi, and if Modi is discouraged the difficulty will be about reading Modi documents. Therefore my submission is that the present change affects the interests of others also, the interests of those who are outside Government offices.

MODI SCRIPT IN OFFICIAL CORRESPONDENCE.

[13TH OCTOBER 1917.] [Mr. Pandurang Anant Desai; the President.]

Then my honourable friend Mr. SEDDON said that Government must have good reasons for effecting this change. Of course, this proposition is a somewhat dangerous proposition. If we are to accept this, then why should we discuss the matter at all? If anything which is done by Government is to be presumed to have been done for good reasons, then why do so many members come forward with resolutions for discussion?

His Excellency the PRESIDENT:—I do not think the honourable member suggests that Government does anything for bad reasons.

The Honourable Mr. DESAI:—Your Excellency,—What I say is that we cannot presume and shut up further discussion by saying that whatever has been done by Government has been done with good reasons. Of course, Government may have very good reasons, no doubt; but it is for this Council to say so, after they are satisfied by Government that the change was necessary and desirable in the interests of all. Unless a member is so satisfied he will not vote against the resolution. I have submitted that our connection with this Modi script is of a very long standing and unless a very strong case is made out by Government that the change is necessary I think that we will never be able to vote against the resolution.

Then, your Excellency, another reason which was suggested by the Honourable Mr. SEDDON is this. He says that Balbodh is fine, bold and legible. No one would deny that Balbodh is fine, bold and legible, but in the same way I submit Modi which we find in ancient documents is equally bold, fine and legible. It is not that the script is bad, but it is the person who writes the script who makes it bad. My question to this Council is this. If there was no convenience in Modi script, why was Modi created? The Devanagari Balbodh was in use for many centuries before Modi was invented, and if Balbodh was more convenient and more beneficial to the people, then I ask why was the Modi script introduced at all? When there was Balbodh already in existence Modi was brought into use; that would show that there must be some good reason for the introduction of Modi, and that reason, as far as I can see, is that Modi could be written very quickly. The writing work that can be done by writing Modi in a given time is much larger than writing work which can be done in Balbodh script in the same time. Therefore I say that for convenience and, if convenience is also an indication of benefit, for benefit, Modi is the more suited of the two.

Then one reason which was advanced by the Honourable Mr. SEDDON is this. He says: "You have to compare between two sorts of officials, clerks and officers. Clerks are to write and the officers are to read." I say this statement is to a certain extent inaccurate. Clerks are both to write and read, and officers, if they are pleased, to read. We find in offices that clerks read as well as write. Sometimes no doubt there are exceptions of officers who read themselves the documents either written in Modi or Balbodh or Gujarati. Therefore we have to take into consideration the inconvenience caused to the writing staff. If a clerk has to write anything in Balbodh which he could write in half the time in Modi, is not that an inconvenience to him? Then we also find that, as the clerk has to keep pace with the officer, his Balbodh would in a short time come down to the same level, that is, would be as bad as Modi written illegibly. Therefore my submission is that there is no convenience in the official correspondence being written in Balbodh.

Then another reason advanced by the Honourable Mr. SEDDON was that it is impossible for these high officials to learn Modi. Now, it is a matter which I can leave to the common sense of the members of this Council, whether it is impossible for these officers to learn to read Modi. It may take some time, but I think, if they are to do work themselves, if they think that first-hand information is necessary, then I submit that they should take a little more trouble and learn Modi, if they want to decide a matter on first-hand information. In that case I think it would not be, at any rate, impossible for these officers to learn Modi.

Then another difficulty which was suggested by the Honourable Mr. SEDDON was that, if we keep Modi as the writing script in offices, then it would be very difficult for Mahomedans, Parsees and Gujarathis to be appointed in offices; how could they be appointed if they do not know Modi? I say, of course, the answer has been given by my honourable friend Dewán Bahádur GOKHALE and I need not repeat the same answer.

One of the reasons why Modi should not be discontinued, as pointed out by my honourable friend Ráo Bahádur SATHE, is that it is not difficult to commit forgery with respect to Balbodh script. It is very difficult to commit forgery with respect to Modi script.

I submit, therefore, that if we take all these circumstances into consideration, there is no case made out by the other side who say that Balbodh should be introduced and Modi should be discontinued.

The Honourable Mr. F. G. PRATT:—Your Excellency,—One of the many advantages of the Northern Division is that although it is composed of six districts only in one of those districts is it possible to use the Modi script; in the other five districts we have Gujarathi which is very closely akin to the printed Gujarathi character. Gujarathi members of this Council will perhaps be interested to know that though I had served in the Central Division, the Northern Division and in Sind, it was only in the Gujarathi districts that I have been able easily to receive at the tent door vernacular petitions, read them at once and discuss them at once with the petitioners who presented them. Now, as I have only one Marathi district in my division which uses Modi, perhaps I have not so much claim to enter upon this discussion as the previous speakers have done. Before entering upon the merits of the discussion, there are one or two things which I would like to say about the discussion itself.

I do not think that I am alone among additional members of this Council in feeling that to invite this Council to discuss a matter of this kind, a very minor detail of the subordinate executive arrangements made for the administration of the Presidency, is to invite this Council to enter upon a discussion which it is really not competent to deal with satisfactorily. Also I think members of this Council, for that reason, will agree with me that discussion of this sort is largely a waste of time.

Coming now to the actual merits of the discussion, I would, without wishing to be in the least polemic or to hurt the feelings of those members who are interested in Modi and who venerate it and like the script, I want to sum up my experience of it by saying—I repeat not in any polemic spirit—that it is a dangerous nuisance. I will explain what I mean. I say it is dangerous for this reason. I frequently have to try revenue appeals and criminal appeals. This Council is full of lawyers who will understand what I mean when I say that in the decision of such appeals the exact wording or the exact phrasing of a document or a letter which has been read out is often of vital importance and will turn the scale in the decision on that matter. The Honourable Mr. SEDDON has told you, what I was interested to hear, that even in the Central Division it takes a clerk with special training and experience to read Modi satisfactorily. What is my fate in the Northern Division where I have very few such trained clerks? But every clerk whether untrained or trained is very apt, in reading Modi, in order to get through with the reading which he is doing, either to skip over difficulties and omit words and so mutilate the text of what he is reading or, when he comes to a difficulty, to guess. That is equally unsatisfactory and is, I submit, a dangerous thing in the interest of the public, because the officer, who is having the matter read out to him, may thereby be misled and brought to a wrong conclusion, it may be in a criminal appeal which would affect the liberty of the public, or it may be in a revenue appeal which would affect adversely the property of the public. This is why I describe the Modi script in Government offices as dangerous. It is a nuisance because of its inefficiency—that has been sufficiently demonstrated by other speakers, but I will quote my own experience. It often happens that I am in camp, say, in Broach or Surat, when a Thana revenue appeal full of Modi papers comes before me (I am quoting from my actual experience during the last few months); my clerks and I are stumped. There are particular documents or particular letters to be deciphered and there is no pandit available and the appeal has to be kept waiting for a month or more until I can get back to head-quarters and get hold of the pandit to read that document or letter. We have heard from the Honourable Mr. SATHE that these difficulties are felt chiefly by English officers. I wish to emphasise my friend the Honourable Mr. SEDDON'S remarks that it is not only English officers who are inconvenienced. In the Northern Division every Mamlatdar, before he is confirmed as a Mamlatdar, has to pass an examination in Marathi which connotes passing an examination in reading and writing Modi. Well, all my Gujarathi Mamlatdars have passed the examination in Modi and although they scrapped up sufficient proficiency in Modi to pass the examination, since passing the examination they have forgotten most of it. And when those Mamlatdars come to be promoted—as they will be promoted—to be Deputy Collectors in districts where they will have to deal with Marathi correspondence, they will have difficulty with correspondence which is in Modi writing. Then they will have to rely on such officers as the Sheristedars. Then there is the case of Mahomedan Deputy Collectors who also will be as much in the hands of their clerks or Sheristedars as any Indian Civil Service officer. These are some of the grievous disadvantages of the script.

MODI SCRIPT IN OFFICIAL CORRESPONDENCE.

[13TH OCTOBER 1917.] [Mr. F. G. Pratt.]

Now what do we find on the other side of the scale? We have first my friend the Honourable Mr. DESAI'S statement that the orders of Government will probably prohibit the use of Modi by the outside public. But it was clearly pointed out by the Honourable Mr. SEDDON that the orders of Government in this matter have been passed solely for the regulation of the Government offices which are under our control and I submit that they do not affect the public in the least. The arguments on the other side that we are faced with are purely arguments of sentiment. We are seriously assured by the Honourable Mr. PARANJPYE that the effect of this order of Government will not only affect the clerks of Government offices, but that Modi will disappear altogether. I will ask honourable members, are we to suppose that the Deccan is wholly illiterate, that outside the Government offices there is no literary person whatever? Are we to believe that the knowledge of Modi is confined to these Government clerks only who are now proficient in the use of Modi, and that therefore the public at large will forget the use of Modi because this "handful of functionaries" are prohibited from using it? Surely such statements are nothing but very great exaggeration and misrepresentation. There is just as much exaggeration in it as in the Honourable Mr. PARANJPYE'S assertion that Government is not in touch and does not care to be in touch with popular sentiment in matters of public interest.

It would be as reasonable to argue that the use of typewriters in Government offices would certainly cause the art of writing to be forgotten. We all know the story of the rustic who appealed against his conviction on the ground that the magistrate (who had recorded the evidence on a typewriter) had paid no attention to the witnesses but played on a musical instrument all through the trial.

I say that the superiority of Balbodh over Modi as regards legibility is as great as the superiority of typewritten documents over manuscript, and I also assert that the Honourable Mr. PARANJPYE'S argument about the inevitable decay of the art of Modi writing because of this trifling order affecting clerks in Government offices is on the same intellectual level as the objection of that rustic to the use of the typewriter by the magistrate.

MODI SCRIPT IN OFFICIAL CORRESPONDENCE.

[The President; Mr. Raghunath Purshottam Paranjpye.] [13TH OCTOBER 1917.]

His Excellency the PRESIDENT:—I think probably honourable members would like to come to a decision on this matter, so I shall use my authority by asking the honourable mover of the resolution to reply to the whole debate under rule 18 of the resolution rules.

The Honourable Mr. RAGHUNATH PURSHOTTAM PARANJPYE:—Your Excellency,—The Honourable Ráo Bahádur SATHE and my other honourable friends have ably dealt with all the arguments brought forward on the other side and therefore I need not waste much time in replying on this question. But let me first say that there is no question at all that on this point public sentiment is a great deal roused. Your Excellency's Government must have received a large number of petitions on this point, because several copies of these petitions have been sent to me and also to my honourable friends, and on examining the signatures to these petitions it will be seen that the signatures do not include, as the Honourable Mr. SEDDON says, only Brahmins and Prabhus and Shenvis, but that they include Gujarathis and Mahomedans and all other classes of the community; so that it is clear that anybody who has occasion to do anything with the writing of Marathi generally always writes in Modi. I will not consider the historical details about this Modi, but here I have got a letter written by a great historian who has studied carefully the historical records of Maharashtra, and he says that this Modi script has been current for 600 years. There is some reason to think that it has been current for even more than 600 years. In any case all well-known historical personages of Maharashtra such as Daulatrao Scindia, Haripant Tatya, Shivaji, Rajaram and others have all their documents always written in Modi. When, for instance, they subscribe their names to a particular document or state paper, at the end they write in their own hand a few words in Modi and also sign their names in Modi.

I think rather too much is made of the argument that ladies only write Balbodh. Now as regards that, I might point out that about 99 per cent. of the ladies in the Presidency are absolutely illiterate. It is therefore the question of the only one solitary lady out of a hundred that is left; and even she generally only knows how to read a little Balbodh. Therefore it is not a very great hardship to ladies, who can if at all just spell out a printed religious book, that the Government records should not be written in Balbodh but Modi.

Again, we are told that printers require their manuscripts in Balbodh. As I have already explained to the Council, I myself have written articles in Modi and the printers have been able to set these articles up, and I know several other persons have had similar experience. Now, of course, in these modern days, and perhaps degenerate days as some might say, printers have become luxurious and some English newspapers and printing presses require that all manuscripts in English should be also typewritten and they will not take any work that is not typewritten. That does not mean that ordinary English, written English, also should disappear.

I have already answered the argument of the Honourable Mr. SEDDON about Mahomedans, and only this morning I have received a copy of a petition from Khandesh signed by more than a hundred persons, of whom several signatures which are in Modi are of Mahomedans, and unless the Honourable Mr. SEDDON says that those signatures were forged, I am afraid he will have to admit that there are several Mahomedans who can read and write Modi.

I must strongly protest against the argument that has been brought forward by the Honourable Mr. SEDDON, that the proposal that I have brought forward before the Council is in the interests of any class. If I had the faintest idea that this proposal was likely to be construed as put forward in the interests of any one class, at least I personally should not have had anything to do with it. It is because I think this change has been brought about in the interests of a class, namely, a very microscopic minority of public servants, that I protest against the introduction of Balbodh.

MODI SCRIPT IN OFFICIAL CORRESPONDENCE.

[13TH OCTOBER 1917.] [Mr. Raghunath Purshottam Paranjpye; Mr. G. Carmichael.]

Well, after all, when we have been supplied with opinions on this Modi-Balbodh controversy in answer to various questions in this Council, whose opinions are these? They are the opinions generally of European heads of offices. Now I have very great respect for that class, because on them depends the government of the country; but all the same, the writing has not to be done by the European officers. They have occasionally to read it; but I have very grave doubts as to what fraction of the vernacular correspondence that comes daily before them is actually read by them, or will be read by them, whether it is in Modi or Balbodh. At any rate, if opinions are to be considered, there are also the opinions of subordinate judges, deputy collectors, mamlatdars, deputy educational inspectors, and so on. These are the opinions that we must have before us if we have to make any reasonable pronouncement upon this question, and I think it is not too much to say that over 95 per cent.—I was almost tempted to say 99 per cent.—would be in favour of the retention of Modi and not of the introduction of Balbodh. First of all, with the introduction of Balbodh they have to work a little longer. We have seen from some of the published correspondence that arrears do occur. The clerks have to work a little longer. I have been told that petitioners are not able to get copies of state papers in time because they have got to be copied in Balbodh. In fact, so far as I understand it, the work prima facie is likely to be blocked, and I have not yet heard that Government have increased the budget grant for the karkuns in order to increase the number of karkuns for doing the increased amount of work.

The Honourable Mr. CARMICHAEL:—Has the honourable member heard that the correspondence work is actually in arrears in some places?

The Honourable Mr. PARANJPYE:—I see that it is so by the correspondence that is published.

The Honourable Mr. PRATT'S argument only refers to his experience of the Thana district. Now I am afraid if we are only to go by what he thinks of one single Marathi district in the Northern Division, we cannot go any further. The only way to solve Mr. Pratt's difficulty is to separate this Marathi-speaking district from the Northern Division and put it into the Central Division. That would be the only real remedy for not only this evil, but for several others which everybody knows.

I remember there was several years ago an order from Government that in order to make Modi more legible the words in Modi ought to be separated. Now, I have never found that an honest effort was made to bring about this change. Officers never did anything at all to bring this change into force. I know one officer who told me his experience. He was an educational inspector. He wanted to carry out this change honestly and he said that for a month or two he sent back every official paper which came to him in which the words were written together, and after that all the official documents came to him with the words separated and then the Modi became quite legible. In this direction a very great improvement could have been made; and, in fact, if an officer chooses to scrutinise the handwriting of his subordinates occasionally, his subordinates will write legibly. If he does not do so, the subordinates will not write legibly. After all, it depends upon the officer himself whether the work in his office is to be written legibly or not.

In my own school days—rather too many years ago now—we were taught to write Modi from our earliest classes and in our 5th standard documents from the courts were brought to be read in the class and we used to learn to read those documents. Now I know the educational department is not very keen in this direction, and the case of ladies is to a certain extent due to this department. In girls' schools the department does not insist upon an acquaintance with Modi. The boys are to a certain extent required to learn Modi, but the girls are supposed to be able to do without a good knowledge of Modi. If, therefore, the department interests itself in the case of girls' schools as in the case of boys' schools in this particular matter, I do not think that the girls would complain and the ladies of the future will not be ignorant of the Modi system of writing. After all, when we are told of illegibility of any script, you must understand that this illegibility or otherwise is dependent to a very great extent on the knowledge of the language. You may know each letter completely, but unless you know that language properly, you will not be able to read that language fast. Give an ordinary printed English book to a man who has studied English only for a year or two. He sees every letter, but he will not be able to read fast; on the other hand in the case of one who knows English well, while reading, after seeing one or two letters and by the meaning that he takes in at each moment, he will be able to read quickly what is written there. Without a detailed examination of each and every letter that is printed a beginner will not be able to read properly. That, I think, is the psychology of reading. If a man does not know Marathi properly, no amount of clearness will improve his reading even if the manuscript is written in printed Balbodh characters. He ought to know what is going to come ahead as he reads. It is only in this way that I read English, Marathi or any other language that I might be conversant with. In this way, therefore, legibility to a very great extent, nay almost entirely, depends upon the knowledge of the language that the officers have. If, therefore, the officers find that they are not able to read Modi, I can only say that their knowledge of the language is very indifferent in most cases.

As regards the fact that Modi is really a national script, I would just quote one single sentence of the Honourable Mr. COVERNTON'S report on the vernacular text-book committee, which has been published by the Government of India. Mr. COVERNTON says:—

> "The Devanagari is adopted from the classical Sanskrit which is used for printing and rarely for writing, and Modi, a current script, is almost universally used in correspondence. Generally these are the two scripts. The latter, Modi, may be called the national script. The Devanagari script bears as little close resemblance to Modi as printed English bears to written English."

I say that the action taken by Government in doing away with Modi is really against all sentiment and, after all, we must give some weight to sentiment in a matter which the Honourable Mr. PRATT considers a minor detail but which I think a very important detail in this part of the country. Government practically tells the people of more than a division that their script is to be tabooed once for all. I do not understand this fiction of Balbodh being required to be used only in offices and not outside, because I think that, if a petitioner wants his petition to be read by an officer who is conversant with only Balbodh, he will naturally write that petition in Balbodh. Therefore, although you are giving him liberty in this matter with one hand, you are taking it away with the other, when you are enforcing the change, on account of the fact that the officer is ignorant of Balbodh.

Englishmen with their very illogical system of spelling are not willing to go in for reform in spelling and we very often see various funny paragraphs in the newspapers ridiculing this proposed simplified spelling. But to a logical mind if you want to do away with this very great trouble of English children and their early miseries, the best way will be to have the spelling simplified. Well, Englishmen are not able to go in for this change or tackle with the spelling nuisance simply because it clashes with their sentiment, history and language. If such sentiment is allowed to have sway even in advanced countries in the west, is it not right that sentiment on a matter of this kind should be given full weight, when all people in this Presidency do not want this Modi to be abolished? I do not see why for the convenience of a few officials we should make this change. In 20 years or so there will be a new kind of the Marathi written script. One of the officers says we are having a new Modi and when that goes on for 20 years, to suit the convenience of another officer we shall have another script and so not only will you have one Modi but several Modis. But I think that one standardised Modi script is much better than the various scripts that we have and are likely to have. After all Modi is evolved in a particular manner. Various persons have given different turns—or valans—to Modi. At present one kind of Modi is called the Chitnis' Modi and another is the Biwalker style of Modi. Just as in English you have vertical writing, oblique writing and so on, there are similarly different forms in Modi, but they have been standardised. If we do not have a standardised script there would be various difficulties with the scripts which people find in later ages.

MODI SCRIPT IN OFFICIAL CORRESPONDENCE.

[13TH OCTOBER 1917.] [Mr. Raghunath Purshottam Paranjpye; the President; Mr. G. Carmichael.]

We are told that Balbodh as written is legible; but, I have here copies of a photo of a Balbodh notice sent to me from Wai, which is all printed, with only a few items written in Balbodh filled in. I ask the Europeans here who know Balbodh to say whether they are any more legible than Modi. In this way it is not correct to say that all Balbodh is legible. Good Balbodh is legible and I say that good Modi is also legible. It is not only that Modi may be illegible but the same is the case with English also. I think that something should be done also occasionally in the case of people who write illegible English. I have seen specimens of English writing which probably the writers themselves cannot read and possibly none of their clerks. I know of a former Principal of the Deccan College that he used to write a hand so illegible that 3 or 4 people used to sit in a committee to find out what it was that he had written.

His Excellency the PRESIDENT:—I really cannot admit this personal observation.

The Honourable Mr. PARANJPYE:—Therefore I can only say that the resolution that I propose is very much according to the feelings and the sentiments of the people who are most affected. It is a matter entirely for the Marathi-speaking people to decide and I think the Council will best go by the opinion of the people who are really affected by this Government order. With these words, I commend the resolution to the Council.

The Honourable Mr. G. CARMICHAEL:—Your Excellency,—I am in accord with what the Honourable Mr. PRATT has said, that it is very doubtful whether this Council should be discussing this resolution. After all it is a mere detail of official machinery and the sum and substance of the arguments put forward by the Honourable Mr. PARANJPYE and those who have supported him are that Modi is the better script and Balbodh is not an efficient script for Government use. But that, I say, is a mere detail. It is a question of the means which Government use for carrying out their work. I would remind honourable members that Government are responsible for the work that is done and that the machinery they employ works efficiently. Government should be allowed to choose the type of machinery which they wish to employ. If that machinery does not work they are bound to receive complaints and to apply a remedy. But I do not think that they should be compelled to adopt a particular remedy which may not prove a remedy at all but may in fact be worse than the disease. I wish to bring this point to the attention of honourable members, because I am afraid that if we do take up matters of this kind we may find ourselves discussing what are the best kinds of pencils or pens or typewriters that should be used in Government offices.

The honourable mover has told the Council that there is an element of sentiment connected with this question. From the Government point of view there is an element of policy and perhaps it is better that we should have had this discussion in order that the position may be clearly understood. It has been pointed out that the orders apply only to writing done in Government offices. Some of the honourable members misunderstood what the Honourable

MODI SCRIPT IN OFFICIAL CORRESPONDENCE.

[Mr. G. Carmichael; Mr. Raghunath Purshottam Paranjpye; Mr. Dattatraya Venkatesh Belvi.] [13TH OCTOBER 1917.]

Mr. SEDDON said that officers cannot always undertake to be proficient in Modi. That is true, but many of our officers are proficient, those who have had the opportunity and the time for practice. There is no doubt that to acquire proficiency in Modi takes years and to retain it takes constant practice, and I do not know whether we can expect all our officers to spend their time in practising Modi. Then again, Modi is taught in all the schools from the beginning. I corroborate what the Honourable Mr. PARANJPYE has said that Modi is prescribed from the earliest standards and goes right through, I think, into the high school course.

The Government orders do not affect any private correspondence in Modi, but the position which the honourable mover puts before us, it seems to me, is this, that unless Government support Modi it is bound to disappear. Now, sir, I think that suggests two things. First, either Modi is not a very efficient script or that it has not touched the life of the people. I do not think that you can say of any other script in the world that the cessation of its use in Government offices would cause it to disappear. There are perhaps two reasons why the script has not touched the lives of the people and why it is not more generally used than it is. We have to remember that it is only, as was said by the honourable mover, in the Maharashtra that there are two scripts. In the other parts of India the people are content to get along with one script. If that is so, in spite of the fact—

The Honourable Mr. PARANJPYE:—What about English?

The Honourable Mr. CARMICHAEL:—The use of Mahomedan and English scripts is an entirely different matter. We are now dealing with the question of the Hindu script. Most of the Indian scripts are derived from one source. I think it is sometimes called the Ashoka script. From it are derived the Devanagari and Balbodh scripts which extend over the largest area of the country. You have Bengali descended from the same source and Gujarathi also. Of the Indian scripts Gujarathi is the most efficient, particularly its writing script. I think the one used in handwriting is one of the best. It approaches more closely than any other script to the European standard. Then you have Telugu and Kanarese.

The Honourable Mr. BELVI:—There are two scripts for Kanarese also. Written Kanarese is even more difficult to read than Modi.

The Honourable Mr. CARMICHAEL:—I am very glad that the Honourable Mr. BELVI has given us this information, but I do not think they have got different names. Then there is Burmese which was also taken from the Ashoka script. I do not know whether the Honourable Ráo Bahádur NAIK will sympathise with the Burmese on the revolting imposition on them of an Indian script. They are racially an entirely different people, and in spite of that they adopted an Indian script for their purposes. I do not think they have found this at all revolting. We have seen that except perhaps in Kanara and in the Marathi-speaking districts, everywhere else in India the people have been content with one script, and that script, except perhaps in the case of Gujarathi, is no easier than Balbodh to write.

Then the other point is that Modi has never supplanted Balbodh as a writing script. The honourable mover said that it is used occasionally by uneducated people, including ladies and children. The Honourable Mr. SEDDON pointed out to the honourable mover that he had been somewhat ungallant in the treatment of the ladies, by including them among the uneducated. A point I wish to bring to the notice of this Council is his use of the word "occasionally". I think the honourable mover meant that the uneducated, including ladies, use Balbodh whenever they have occasion to write. The ladies all write their own letters in Balbodh, and as the Honourable Ráo Bahádur NAIK told us, when the men write to ladies they have to write in Balbodh. It is all very well for the honourable members being bold in this Council, but in the domestic circle are they equally valiant? Do they not when writing to their ladies indite their epistles in Balbodh?

Modi is taught in schools, but writing in Balbodh is also taught. The writing of Balbodh is taught from the very beginning right up to the high school standard according to the syllabus which is prepared by the educational department.

There is one other point. The honourable mover wishes us to believe that the educated classes always write in Modi. The other day I went to a school in which the Deccan Education Society is interested, which is supervised by Professor Kanitkar, and I was very much interested by what I saw there. The particular point I wish to bring to your notice is this. I looked through the visit book and found there were four entries in it, two in Balbodh and two in Modi. The persons who wrote in Balbodh were not uneducated persons. One of them was the Chief of Sangli. Now I would ask the honourable mover in what category of users of Balbodh he would put the head of the ancient house of Patwardhan?

Well, I need say very little about the reasons which Government had in making the change. That has been fully explained by the Honourable Mr. SEDDON. I only wish to say a word with regard to the criticisms made by certain officers which the Honourable Rao Bahádur SATHE read out to us. There are two reasons why some of our officers objected to the change. One is the conservatism which you will find in every class. Some officers are more conservative than others. I am perfectly certain that Modi did not establish itself even to the limited extent which I hold it has established itself, without a great deal of opposition. The ladies, who usually are most conservative, have always adhered to Balbodh and refused Modi. The other reason why some of our officers have expressed an opinion against the orders is that they have not taken the trouble to carry them out. It is not enough in a matter of this kind to issue orders particularly when to the majority of clerks who have to do the work the change causes trouble. That is one reason why we have had difficulties. Good results could not be expected unless the officers took pains to see that the script was properly written and that it was given a fair chance.

With regard to the photograph which the honourable mover handed over to us, I think I could in five minutes decipher it notwithstanding what the honourable mover has said about it. But that is not a typical example of what can be done. If the honourable mover wishes to see some of the files, not selected files but ordinary files taken at random, from the Court of the District Judge of Poona, he will find in them absolutely legible and clear Balbodh handwriting written at a pace very nearly as fast as Modi.

With regard to the question of sentiment, I entirely endorse what Mr. SEDDON has said, that it is the sentiment of a very small class of people. The honourable mover refers to ten millions. In the Konkan Districts and the Central Division Marathi-speaking people number about eight millions. But you have to make large deductions. Uneducated people, and ladies, and Mahomedans, and Balbodh users, and a large number of agriculturists have to go out. With regard to the Mahomedans I wish to point out that in their education, if they take Urdu standards, they have to learn three scripts, first Urdu, then Balbodh and finally after a year or so they begin with the Modi alphabet. But it is quite impossible to expect that Mahomedans should ever be proficient in Modi unless they take much time to acquire it specially. When it is not the script to which they are accustomed from the beginning, they can never be expected to acquire the same proficiency as what the Honourable Mr. SEDDON called the clerical class. Therefore if we have Modi in Government offices it comes in the way of Mahomedans and other classes of people, not Marathi speakers by birth, being taken into employment.

The last question I wish to touch upon is the question of the policy of Government.

MODI SCRIPT IN OFFICIAL CORRESPONDENCE.

[Mr. Vithalbhai Jhaverbhai Patel; the President; Mr. G. Carmichael; Mr. Raghunath Purshotam Paranjpye; Dewan Bahadur Kashinath Ramchandra Godbole.] [13TH OCTOBER 1917.]

The Honourable Mr. PATEL :—May I rise to a point of order? The time fixed for resolutions was 2-30 p.m.

His Excellency the PRESIDENT :—Do I understand that the honourable member is rather anxious to catch his train?

The Honourable Mr. PATEL :—No, not at all.

His Excellency the PRESIDENT :—Well, I gather it is for others that he is anxious.

The Honourable Mr. CARMICHAEL :—The critics of Government have put this matter on the basis of inconvenience to clerks themselves in Government offices and to the clerks of pleaders and pleaders themselves. Well, I can tell the Honourable Ráo Bahádur SATHE that I have assisted at a committee to decipher Modi in my own office. There is no doubt that Balbodh has one advantage inherent in the script itself. It is easier to insist on having it written clearly.

The second point I wish to make before concluding is this. Yesterday the Honourable Mr. BELVI talked of the democratic tendency of the present day. It is true, it seemed to me, that he indicated that he would like it tempered a little in favour of the Brahmins. However, the point is that in these days we ought to try to educate the people and to reduce the amount of illiteracy amongst all sections of population. Now there is no doubt that what really sticks in the minds of the bulk of the boys who pass through our vernacular schools is not Modi but Balbodh. Balbodh can be read by every one who can read at all. Modi cannot. I would ask the honourable mover to say whether he ever saw any advertisement in Modi.

The Honourable Mr. PARANJPYE :—Modi is never printed. I meant Modi only with regard to writing

The Honourable Mr. CARMICHAEL :—There are any number of advertisements in Italian round hand both in this country and in England.

The Honourable Mr. PARANJPYE :—I do not call it Italian. It is called English script hand.

The Honourable Mr. CARMICHAEL :—I believe it is called Italian round hand. I think I am correct in describing it so. Advertisements in Italian round hand are not uncommon. The honourable mover shakes his head, but I can assure him there is a prominent one not far from the entrance gate of the Fergusson College.

The agriculturist should be able to read the notices and summonses he may receive, his land revenue account, the record of his holding, his mortgage deeds and sale deeds—simple things for him to read if they are written in Balbodh, as they must be under our orders. This is bound to help the spread of education in this country. The honourable member perhaps thinks that there are better means of achieving this end. If a kunbi can read a little and is given a script which he can decipher, his curiosity is excited. He goes on reading, and by practice maintains and improves his proficiency. But if you present him with a document which might, for all he knows, be written in Egyptian hieroglypics, it is the surest way of discouraging him from trying to read anything at all.

The Honourable Dewán Bahádur GODBOLE :—In the vernacular schools and vernacular standards we teach both Modi and Balbodh in all the standards.

The Honourable Mr. CARMICHAEL :—I quite admit what the Honourable Dewán Bahádur states, but the point is that if a cultivator has not gone through more than three or four standards, what sticks in his mind is Balbodh, because he sees more of Balbodh than he does of Modi. He very seldom has the opportunity of reading or writing in Modi. I admit that Modi is taught in the schools, and there is the further fact that the educational department adopted Modi in their rural standards. But that was admitted by every one to have been a very great mistake. I simply wish to press very strongly on the attention of this Council that the democratic script is not Modi, but Balbodh; that the Balbodh is the older script; that it is an Indian script, an indigenous one; and that it is the script which is most familiar to the greater number of the people in this Presidency.

With these remarks I oppose the resolution.

The resolution was then put to the vote and carried, with eighteen members voting for and seventeen against it. The Council divided as follows:—

2. (1) Have Government noticed a paragraph in the issue of the Kesari, dated the 14th of August last, in which it is stated that in the Vengurla Taluka of the Ratnagiri District a policeman attempted to forcibly enter a place where a performance in aid of the Women's War Fund was to take place, and being refused admission without a ticket the proposed performance was stopped by the Head Constable, and that a man named Kothari and seven others were subsequently prosecuted in this connection?

APPENDIX I.

Dear Sir,

As you must know by this time the Government of India has just issued a War Loan for an unlimited amount of money. This is an excellent opportunity for all Temple Committees to invest their spare money in an absolutely safe and profitable security. Apart from this consideration it is the duty of your Temple Committee to help to swell this loan. It is a duty to yourselves. For the enemy has systematically destroyed the religious buildings in all the countries which she has invaded and confiscated the wealth and property of religious institutions. The loan is required by Government because it is only possible to defeat the enemy and secure immunity from future danger by throwing all our resources into the scale against the foe. It is your duty to Government. Under the Government of India your temple has been absolutely secure from interference and mischief. Government is entitled to your gratitude. It would be rank ingratitude and disloyalty were your Committee to fail in their duty now to invest as much as they can in the War Loan. The temple possesses land paying Rs. as assessment to Government and receives from Government annually a grant amounting to Rs. . Will the Managers please consider the matter consulting the Mamlatdar if necessary and let me know to what extent they can help Government at this great opportunity as early as possible?

Yours sincerely,

(Signed) J. T. LAWRENCE,
Assistant Collector, Sirsi Division, Kanara.

To

The Manager of temple.

Press Note.

No. 1549.—From time to time Government had received petitions from the Muhammadan community that the system of mixed electorates in the Municipalities of Sind did not provide proper representation for protection of their interests.

In the comparison below, the figures of population are those of 1911, in round figures.

In Karachi there are 62,000 Hindus and 71,000 Muhammadans. But out of 28 elected members before the introduction of the communal system only 5 were Muhammadans. In Hyderabad there are 46,000 Hindus and 23,000 Muhammadans, but out of 16 elected members not one was a Muhammadan. In Sukkur there are 22,800 Hindus and 14,700 Muhammadans. Out of 20 elected members only 2 were Muhammadans. In Shikarpur there are 35,000 Hindus and 19,000 Muhammadans. Out of 20 elected members only 3 were Muhammadans.

An attempt was made by the re-arrangement of wards and by the system of single votes in a multiple constituency to increase the number of Muhammadan elected members, but this did not prove a success. To some extent the balance was corrected by nomination. But this will become increasingly difficult with the policy now adopted of increasing the elected members in Municipalities wherever possible to two-thirds of the whole number.

In view of these facts and the desirability of ensuring that schemes for taxation are considered and approved by persons representing all classes of the population, His Excellency the Governor in Council has decided to adopt the principle of communal representation for Municipalities in Sind.

Education of Muhammadans.—

Orders of Government on certain urgent recommendations made by the special Committee appointed to consider generally the question of Muhammadan education in Sind.

GOVERNMENT OF BOMBAY.

EDUCATIONAL DEPARTMENT.

Order no. 2261.

Bombay Castle, 17th September 1917.

ORDER OF GOVERNMENT.

The report submitted by the special Committee appointed to consider generally the question of Muhammadan education in Sind, together with the remarks thereon by the Commissioner in Sind and the Director of Public Instruction, has been received and is under the consideration of Government. The recommendations made by the Committee cover practically the whole ground of education, and it will take considerable time before they can all be examined in detail. In view of their urgency, however, the Governor in Council has considered the following recommendations first and is now pleased to pass the orders mentioned in paragraphs 2 to 8 below:—

(i) Section B-I-(3) of the Committee's report.—That the provision recently made for scholarships in secondary schools be gradually increased to at least Rs. 1,00,000 per annum.

(ii) Section B-II-(13) of the Committee's report.—That 30 additional scholarships for arts colleges and 10 for professional colleges be provided, similar to the Sir Amir Ali Murad and King Edward Memorial scholarships for which Muhammadans are indebted to the generosity of His Highness the late Mir Sir Faiz Muhammad Khan and His Highness Mir Sir Imambux Khan, Talpur.

(iii) Section A-I-(2) of the Committee's report.—That the standard of education in the Mulla schools be gradually raised and that pari passu the grants paid to these schools be enhanced.

2. With regard to recommendations (i) and (ii) generally, the Commissioner in Sind is very strongly in favour of a definite co-ordinated scheme for granting scholarships to selected Muhammadan boys throughout the whole of their scholastic career, subsequent to its primary stages, from the lowest standard of the 'middle' school course to the completion of the fourth year at college. As regards 'secondary' schools in particular, while suggesting the ultimate creation of a total number of 490 scholarships, he recommends that 140 scholarships, distributed over the 7 Anglo-Vernacular standards at the rate of 20 scholarships per standard, should be instituted as a begining. After careful consideration Government are pleased to sanction the scheme of scholarships explained in the appended memorandum in respect of 'secondary' schools. This scheme involves the abolition of the existing 'middle' and 'high' school scholarships reserved for Muhammadans as also the special 'secondary' scholarships for Muhammadans created under the scheme sanctioned in Government Order, Financial Department, no. 3762, dated the 16th October 1915, and the institution in their place of an entirely new system of special scholarships for Muhammadans tenable for the whole period of the 'secondary' school course. When the scheme is in full force in the seventh year of its existence, there will be 49 Muhammadan scholarship-holders in each of the 7 Anglo-Vernacular standards, distributed over the several Government, aided and unaided but recognized 'secondary' schools in Sind or, in other words, a total of 343 scholarship-holders in all. The net maximum charge on provincial revenues on account of these scholarships will amount to Rs. 43,260 per annum as compared with the present sanctioned allotment of Rs. 21,680, which is made up as follows:—

	Rs.
(i) Cost of 28 'high' school scholarships of the value of Rs. 5 per mensem each reserved for Muhammadans	1,680
(ii) Allotment for special 'secondary' scholarships for Muhammadans (vide Government Order no. 2213, dated the 18th July 1914, and Government Order, Financial Department, no. 3762, dated the 16th October 1915)	20,000

The annual increase in the charge on provincial revenues on this account will, therefore, be Rs. (43,260—21,680=)21,580.

3. The abolition of the existing 'middle' and 'high' school scholarships reserved for Muhammadans will involve certain modifications in the rules regulating these scholarships published in Government Notifications nos. 2883 and 2884, dated the 1st October 1915. The Director of Public Instruction should accordingly be requested to submit in due course the necessary amendments to these rules for publication in the Bombay Government Gazette. The Director should also submit at an early date a draft notification containing rules regulating the grant of the scholarships to be given under the new scheme.

4. At present District Local Boards in Sind incur an annual expenditure of Rs. 3,780 on account of the existing 'middle' school scholarships reserved for Muhammadans. This expenditure is debited direct to the District Local Boards concerned. As it is not intended to relieve the Boards of this liability and as under the new scheme the scholarships will be paid direct by Government, the amount in question should, as indicated in paragraph 7 of the scheme, be credited in future to the receipt side of the provincial budget as a contribution from the District Local Boards towards the cost of the scheme, the gross expenditure on account of the scheme being provided on the expenditure side of the budget.

5. As regards colleges, the Commissioner in Sind, while suggesting an ultimate goal of 225 scholarships at Rs. 30 per mensem, recommends that for the present there should be (in addition to the 22nd existing scholarships) 12 of these scholarships in each of the four years of the arts course, it being understood that a scholarship given to a student in the first year will be continued to him for the full period of four years of the course, subject only to good conduct and satisfactory progress. There will thus be 12 × 4 or 48 additional scholarships in all, costing Rs. (30 × 48 × 12 =) 17,280 per annum in the fourth year and thereafter. The Governor in Council readily accepts the Commissioner's recommendation and is pleased to sanction the additional charge on this account. The Director of Public Instruction should be requested to submit at an early date a draft notification containing rules for the grant of the scholarships in question. The Committee's recommendation regarding scholarships in professional colleges, which is less urgent, will be considered hereafter.

6. With reference to the first part of recommendation (iii), it will be seen from paragraphs 10 and 14 of Mr. Wright's "Note on the policy of aiding the indigenous Mosque schools in Sind" that it has been the policy of Government for several years past to raise the standard of instruction in Mulla schools with a view to their gradual elevation to the status of ordinary aided primary schools. In this connection it must also be observed that under the revised Mulla Code (1915), which came into force from 1st April 1916, Mullas have been permitted, subject to certain conditions, to teach an additional, viz., a 'fifth' vernacular standard in their schools with the special sanction of the Deputy Educational Inspector, a grant of Rs. 6 per boy being allowed for such instruction.

As regards the latter part of the recommendation, the Committee have proposed that the grants-in-aid to Mulla schools, which are admissible only in respect of pupils receiving secular education, should be enhanced by a round sum of Rs. 20,000 per annum equivalent to an increase of 75 per cent. The Commissioner in Sind, however, recommends that the grants to these schools should be immediately doubled at a cost of Rs. 28,394 per annum approximately. The present rates of grant, which are laid down in the Mulla Code, are as follows :—

	Rs.
Standard I	2 per boy.
Standard II	3 ,
Standard III	4 ,
Standard IV	5 „
Standard V*	6 „

* (To be allowed to be opened in special cases only.)

The total grant calculated at the above rates is, however, subject to the maximum limit of Rs. 138 per annum per school laid down in rule 29, Chapter III (indigenous schools), of the Grant-in-aid Code. After full deliberation Government are pleased to approve the Commissioner's recommendation on the understanding that the Mullas will make every effort to improve further the standard of secular instruction imparted in their schools and that grants at the revised rates will not be passed by the inspecting officer concerned unless the progress made is statisfactory. The necessary amendments in the Mulla Code should be carried out by the Educational Inspector in Sind. As regards the maximum limit laid down in the Grant-in-aid Code, Government are of opinion that the simplest and most direct method of carrying out the object in view is to remove this limit and to substitute in its place such other safeguards as may be considered necessary. The Director of Public Instruction should accordingly be requested to consider this question and to submit the requisite draft amendment to rule 29 of the Grant-in-aid Code.

7. The total maximum cost per annum of the proposals sanctioned in paragraphs 2, 5 and 6 above amounts to Rs. (21,580+17,280+28,394=) 67,254 This charge should be debited against the recurring grant of Rs. 1,00,000 for Muhammadan education in Sind sanctioned with effect from the current year. The balance of Rs. 32,746 from the grant in question should be utilized for such of the other purposes recommended by the Committee as are approved hereafter by Government, the distribution of the amount being at the discretion of the Director of Public Instruction. A list of the objects on which it is proposed to spend the amount should, however, be submitted to Government for information.

8. From paragraph 6 of the appended scheme it will be seen that the maximum expenditure on its account will not be incurred till the seventh year of its introduction, and there will therefore be considerable savings in the intervening years in the allotment of Rs. 43,260 sanctioned for this purpose. Government desire that these savings should be utilized partly in giving special scholarships in 'secondary' schools to poorly circumstanced boys not benefiting by the scheme itself and partly in making non-recurring grants towards such items of the Committee's recommendations as are approved hereafter by Government and cannot be otherwise provided for at present. This disposal of the savings should be made by the Director of Public Instruction at his discretion, but the actual allotment of the special scholarships should be in the hands of the Educational Inspector in Sind. The savings accruing in the first three years in the allotment of Rs. 17,280 for college scholarships should be similarly utilized.

9. The school and college scholarships sanctioned in paragraphs 2 and 5 above will be granted with effect from the next academic year 1918-19. There will, therefore, be no expenditure on their account in the current year. The current year's provision of Rs. 1,00,000 for Muhammadan education in Sind should accordingly be utilized as follows :—

(i) In doubling the grants-in-aid for Mulla schools (vide paragraph 6 above);

(ii) In increasing the value of the existing 'middle' and 'high' school scholarships reserved for Muhammadans from Rs. 5 to Rs. 10 and Rs. 12-8-0 per mensem, respectively, with effect from the 1st October 1917;

(iii) In making non-recurring grants towards such items of the Committee's recommendations as are approved hereafter by Government.

G. A. THOMAS,
Secretary to Government.

G. O. no. 2261, E. D., dated the 17th September 1917.

To

The Commissioner in Sind,
The Director of Public Instruction,
All Collectors in Sind, including the Deputy Commissioner, Upper Sind Frontier,
The Accountant General,
The Financial Department.

Accompaniment to Government Order, Educational Department, no. 2261, dated the 17th September 1917.

Scheme of scholarships for Muhammadan boys in secondary schools in Sind.

It is intended to abolish all the existing 'middle' and 'high' school scholarships reserved for Muhammadans as also the special 'secondary' scholarships for Muhammadans sanctioned in Government Order, Financial Department, no. 3762, dated the 16th October 1915, as soon as their present holders cease to hold them. In their place it is intended to substitute a single series of scholarships, tenable for 7 years (subject to satisfactory conduct and progress) beginning with the first and ending with the seventh Anglo-Vernacular standards. The number of these scholarships which may ultimately be sanctioned will depend upon the funds available, but it is intended, in the first instance, to create 49 new scholarships a year for a period of 7 years, which will give 343 scholarships when the scheme is in full force in the seventh year. Their value will be Rs. 10 per mensem in the first three standards and Rs. 12-8-0 per mensem in the last four standards. The scheme will begin to come into operation at the beginning of the first school term in the year 1918-19.

2. The existing 'middle' and 'high' school scholarships of the value of Rs. 5 per mensem reserved for Muhammadans will be raised to Rs. 10 per mensem in the first three standards and to Rs. 12-8-0 per mensem in the last four standards from the 1st October 1917.

3. As regards the present Rs. 5 'middle' school scholarships there will be 42 of these in existence at the beginning of 1918-19, namely, 21 in the second standard and 21 in the third standard. It is intended to continue these throughout the year (enhancing their value to Rs. 10 per mensem). In the following year there will be 21 of these scholarships in the third standard (i. e., the second standard scholars of 1918-19 will become the third standard scholars of 1919-20). Thereafter these scholarships will entirely disappear.

4. Similarly, as regards the Rs. 5 'high' school scholarships, which will be enhanced in value to Rs. 12-8-0 per mensem, there will be 7 of these in 1918-19 in each of the fifth, sixth, and seventh standards. In the following year there will be 7, in both the sixth and seventh standards. In 1920-21 there will be 7 in the seventh standard only. Thereafter they will disappear.

5. The exact number of the existing 102 "secondary" scholarships of Rs. 12-8-0 per mensem in each standard is not known, so that it is impossible on present data to predict how many will cease to exist each year until they also are finally eliminated. But, assuming, for the sake of rough calculation, that they are evenly distributed over the 7 standards, about 15 would disappear each year.

6. The main object of the scheme is to continue the new scholarships throughout the scholastic careers of the scholars, and for this reason it is intended ultimately to provide an equal number of scholarships in each standard. Until the scheme is brought into full operation, however, there will be more scholarships in the lower standards than in the higher, as the total number is being increased and they are all commencing in the first standard. It is not intended to bring the number of scholarships in the higher standards up to that in those in which the scholarships under the scheme have been introduced whilst the scheme is in progress of completion. It is, however, desirable to make provision every year for as many scholarships in each standard as there were in the standard immediately below it in the previous year. At present there are 21 annual Rs. 5 'middle' school scholarships as against only 7 annual Rs. 5 'high' school scholarships, so that, assuming the 102 "secondary" scholarships to be evenly distributed over all the standards, there is a reduction in the number of scholarships available after completion of the third standard. In order to rectify this defect and to ensure a seven years' tenure of scholarship to each deserving boy, it is intended to increase the number of scholarships in the upper standards, until the new scheme embraces them, in the manner indicated above. The following figures explain what is meant. They give the assumed number of scholarships existing at present in each standard (assigning 15 of the "secondary" scholarships to each of the first six standards and 12 to the highest standard :—

1st St.	2nd St.	3rd St.	4th St.	5th St.	6th St.	7th St.	Total.
36	36	36	22	22	22	19	= 193

It will be seen from these figures that more than a third of the third standard scholars must cease to hold scholarships when they pass into the fourth standard. It is intended therefore during the first few years of the scheme to increase the number of scholarships in the upper standards, so as to prevent deserving boys from losing their scholarships. The figures in 1918-19 would accordingly be as follows :—

1st St.	2nd St.	3rd St.	4th St.	5th St.	6th St.	7th St.	Total.
49	36	36	36	22	22	19	= 220

That is to say, besides the grant of an increased number of new scholarships in the first standard, 14 additional scholarships will be allotted to the fourth standard so as to provide scholarships (if necessary) for all the scholars coming up from the third standard. Similarly, the figures for the following years will be as under :—

	1st St.	2nd St.	3rd St.	4th St.	5th St.	6th St.	7th St.	Total.
1919-20 ...	49	49	36	36	36	22	19	= 247
1920-21 ...	49	49	49	36	36	36	22	= 277
1921-22 ...	49	49	49	49	36	36	36	= 304
1922-23 ...	49	49	49	49	49	36	36	= 317
1923-24 ...	49	49	49	49	49	49	36	= 330
1924-25 ...	49	49	49	49	49	49	49	= 343

The cost each year on this basis would be as follows :—

		Rs.
Current year	(i) (existing rates)	16,680
	(ii) (enhanced rates for six months)	19,830
1918-19	... ...	25,590
1919-20	... ...	29,250
1920-21	... ...	33,360
1921-22	... ...	37,410
1922-23	... ...	39,360
1923-24	... ...	41,310

7. It should be explained that the above figures are the cost to Government after deducting a sum of Rs. 3,780 per annum, which is the expenditure incurred from local funds on account of the existing 'middle' school scholarships reserved for Muhammadans and which will in future be paid in the form of a contribution to provincial revenues towards the cost of the above scheme. The figures are not exact, as it is not known how many of the 'secondary' scholarships are held in each standard nor how many of these will cease each year, but the figures are near enough to give an approximate idea of the cost of the scheme from year to year. It will be seen that the ultimate annual cost will exceed the present sanctioned allotment by Rs. 21,580.

8. As regards the distribution of the scholarships, it is thought that if a rigid equality of distribution by districts is insisted upon, instances would occur of a poor district getting less assistance than it required and a backward district getting more scholarships than it could dispose of. It is therefore intended that while the general basis of distribution should be that of an equal number of scholarships for each district, the Educational Inspector in Sind should have full discretion to vary it according to circumstances.

REPORT OF THE SELECT COMMITTEE ON BILL No. II OF 1917.*

We, the members of the Select Committee appointed to consider and report on the Bill to provide for the extension of primary education in municipal districts in the Bombay Presidency other than the City of Bombay (Bill No. II of 1917), have the honour to report as follows:—

The principal alterations which we have made in the bill are noted below against the clauses affected. The other modifications made in the text relate to matters of drafting to which it is unnecessary to allude.

Clause 2, sub-clause (1). Attendance.—As the enforcement of the act will in the main devolve upon the school committee under the orders of the municipality, we have altered this sub-clause so as to give the power of fixing the obligatory times of attendance at school to the school committee, subject to the approval of the prescribed educational authority.

Clause 2, sub-clause (2). Eleven years.—We have lengthened the period of compulsory attendance at school so as to include the whole of the child's eleventh year of age, as we think that this is the minimum period for which education should be continued if any lasting results are to be expected.

Clause 2, sub-clause (3). Definition of parent.—We have deleted the words "is liable to support or", as they might lead to disputes regarding legal liability.

Clause 2. Prescribed educational authority.—As "the educational department of the local government" would be construed as meaning the department of the secretariat which deals with educational matters, we have in clause 2, sub-clauses (1) and (6), substituted the phrase "prescribed educational authority". The actual educational officers on whom the several powers will be conferred will be specified in the rules.

Clause 4. Adequate provision.—Under the bill as introduced the municipality was compelled to make adequate provision for compulsory education before sanction could be given for the issue of a notification under clause 3. It would not however be practicable for the municipality to build or enlarge schools or to tax itself for that purpose, or to make final arrangements with respect to other matters which would be included in the term "provision," without a definite assurance that its intention to introduce compulsory education could be carried into effect. We consider that if the intention of the municipality is expressed by a resolution passed in the manner provided by revised clause 5, and the municipality also satisfies the local government of its bona fides, there will be no objection to the granting of sanction for the issue of a notification. We have therefore slightly altered the wording of clause 4, and have in revised clause 13 omitted the condition that the tax may be levied only when the notification under clause 3 is actually in force. We have however inserted words in clause 3 which will enable the notification to be expressed to take effect at any date later than the date of its issue. The usual procedure will then be to allow some period between the date of issue and the date when the notification is to come into operation, in order that the necessary preparations may be made by the municipality in the interval.

In municipal or other recognized schools.—It will be open to the municipality to make arrangements with the managers of aided or other recognized schools for the reception, without charging fees, of pupils liable under the act. This course will often be more feasible than extending municipal schools.

Clause 8. Reasonable excuse.—Certain additions and modifications have been made under this head mainly on the lines of the English Law (Elementary Education Act, 1870, section 74).

* The Bill as amended by the Select Committee was published in the Bombay Government Gazette, Part V, dated the 9th November 1917.

Clause 9. Attendance order.—We have provided that the attendance order shall be made by the school committee as we are of opinion that it is desirable to avoid having recourse to the magistrate until the necessity arises for a prosecution.

Clause 10. Failure to cause child to attend school.—The wording has been modified to give the magistrate power to go behind the attendance order and satisfy himself that there has been an actual contravention of the law.

Fine.—We have raised the maximum from three to five rupees.

Clause 11. Employment of children.—After carefully considering the English law relating to the employment of children of school-age in factories and workshops (Factory and Workshop Act, 1901, section 68; Elementary Education Act, 1876, section 5 (2)) and also the recent proposals made for the revision of the law, and taking into account the provisions of the Indian Factories Act, 1911, we have left this clause substantially as it stood. But we are not in favour of permitting the employment of children of school-going age, because it appears to us that this must prejudice their health and education. Apart from this question, moreover, we recogniże that clause 12 is not complete as it does not provide for casual employment or such other exceptions as it may be necessary to make. But we are of opinion that, at any rate for some time, no practical difficulty is likely to occur, because no prosecution can be undertaken except on the complaint of the school committee, which will be able to exercise discretion, and because the present state of economic development in the mofussil is not such as to furnish intricate questions for decision.

Clause 13. Education cess.—This clause has been entirely recast. As it will be necessary in most cases to encourage municipalities to tax themselves for educational purposes we have omitted the sub-clause which imposed the condition of a resolution supported by the votes of two-thirds of the members present. We have also struck out the sub-clause which purported to ensure that the proceeds of the tax should be devoted solely to primary education; such a provision would be ineffectual because it would be open to a municipality to evade it by devoting less of the proceeds of other taxes to education. Again in view of the provisions of section 59 of the principal act, taxation imposed for educational purposes will always fall within the purview of that section. For the above reasons, therefore, we have framed clause 13 within restricted limits and have removed the definition of the education cess, which is not referred to elsewhere in the bill.

Clause 14. Remission of fees.—As under the bill when introduced it was open to the parent of any child to claim remission of fees, we are of opinion that the amount of fees received would be negligible. At the same time if some parents are exempted and others charged, the latter will pay twice over. We, therefore, consider that it should be explicitly provided that compulsory education should be free.

Inspection of schools by educational department.—(Original clause 16). Although, as we understand, this clause was expressly inserted under the advice of the Government of India, we desire to point out that the only schools at which attendance will be compulsory will be "recognized" schools. As it will be optional to the educational authorities to give or withhold recognition, they will presumably in all cases make liberty to inspect a condition of recognition. We have therefore omitted this clause as unnecessary.

Clause 15. Power to exempt.—We recommend that this power, which was included in the late Mr. Gokhale's Bill (No. 8 of 1911) should be added to this bill, in order that Government may be enabled to exercise it in cases of children whose education cannot be conveniently arranged for, who should not be required to undergo the course of education which is compulsory in the district or for whose education sufficient provision is already made.

Clause 17. Fines.—We are of opinion that the municipality has a reasonable claim to the proceeds of fines.

Clause 18. Rules.—A general rule-making power appears necessary.

Saving clause.—(Original clause 18). This clause has been omitted, with the approval of Government, because there is nothing in the bill which affects the public revenues.

Minute of dissent by the Honourable Mr. A. F. I. Pathan.

There were two questions raised by some of the Mahomedan members at the last debate on this Bill.

One of these was that as the Bill enables the Municipalities to introduce compulsory education in their districts and to impose any fresh tax or increase any tax already levied for meeting the consequential additional cost, it ought to embody a provision for securing due representation of the Mahomedan community on these bodies. With regard to this I am strongly of opinion that the representation of Mahomedans is necessary, particularly in educational matters. It follows therefore that their representation on School Committees should be specially provided for in this Bill and not left to the idiosyncracies of individual members of the general body the majority of whom will be naturally non-Mahomedans. The necessity of such a provision is emphasised by the fact that at present it solely depends on the sweet will of the majority to elect or not to elect Mahomedan councillors as members of the School Committee and also by the fact that the School Committee is invested under the provisions of this Bill with very large and responsible powers. There will always be a paucity of Mahomedan councillors on the Municipal Boards and especially of those qualified to speak on educational matters. I am strongly of opinion that School Committees should be so constituted as to admit of co-opted Mahomedan members whose number may vary according to local circumstances. If no safeguard such as that proposed above were embodied in the Bill, I am afraid more harm than good would be done to the Mahomedan community by the enforcement of the provisions of this Bill as they now stand.

The other question raised was as to whether Mahomedan children whose mother tongue is Urdu will under this Bill be compelled by the Municipality to attend non-Urdu schools against the wishes of the parents. After giving a good deal of consideration to this subject I am convinced that some provision should be made in the body of this Bill that before introducing compulsion Municipalities should provide schools for the education of children of the principal communities resident in their areas, giving instruction in their respective mother-tongues. Without this provision I think the principle of compulsion must be considered most unreasonable and is bound to create difficulties which would be most difficult to solve. When I spoke at the last debate on this Bill, strongly supporting the principle of compulsion, I had not the least apprehension then in my mind that there would ever arise any question of the medium of instruction for Mahomedan children in public schools, necessitating a safeguard such as that proposed above. But as this question has unfortunately been brought recently very much into prominence and has given rise to a tremendous feeling amongst the Mahomedans I should be wanting in my duty to my community, did I not insist upon a clear provision being made in the Bill for instruction being given through the medium of Urdu to Mahomedan children.

The proposed provisions on the two points mentioned above are essentially necessary to safeguard the interests of the Mahomedan community so far as they are affected by this Bill. The necessity for such provisions was pointed out to the Select Committee but I regret to say that the points mentioned above have neither been fully and freely discussed in the Select Committee nor dealt with in the Committee's report. This is all the more to be deplored in view of the assurance given by His Excellency the Governor in his concluding speech at the last debate on the Bill that " those members who will be on that Committee will go most carefully into all the various questions that have been raised with regard, for instance, to the Mahomedan question."

As I have been the only Mahomedan member present at all the sittings of the Select Committee I feel a special sense of responsibility to ventilate the main points in connection with the compulsory education of the Mahomedans as the same have not been considered and dealt with in the Select Committee's report. I am therefore compelled to record this minute of dissent with a view to place before the members of the Council the Mahomedan point of view.

A. F. PATHAN,
Additional Member.

Poona, 4th November 1917.

Minute of dissent by the Honourable Rao Bahadur G. K. Sathe, C.I.E.

Clause 10.—This is a penal clause. That some penalty should be provided for to punish any failure to cause a child to attend cannot be gainsaid. The only point upon which I dissent from the majority report is as to the forum for the trial of cases of this kind. It is very likely that such cases will be, more often than not, referred to the Honorary Magistrates who are generally laymen. When cases are tried by courts constituted under Criminal Procedure Code, the procedure is bound to be lengthy and expensive. When there is a remedy provided by law people are tempted to take full advantage of such remedies. I am afraid the employment of a pleader and provision of appeal will make litigation protracted and costly. From the initial stage of serving a notice or summons there is such an amount of roughness in the treatment given to accused in criminal courts that one should try to avoid that machinery as much as possible. These cases are not likely to involve such intricate questions of law and fact as should require their trial at the hands of trained minds like those of stipendiary magistrates. Such cases can be disposed of on broad considerations and from a strong common-sense point of view. I, therefore, propose that a board consisting of the President, Vice-President (if he is not a member of the school committee) and one member of the school committee to be nominated by the general body for this purpose be formed to try such cases. No one acquainted with the English police courts, on the days set apart for hearing school attendance cases, can desire to see such scenes enacted in India. It may be true that magisterial courts inspire more awe and dread than ordinary tribunals, but that ought not to be the guiding principle in a measure of this kind which ought to be worked out on least offensive lines.

Clause 11.—This clause prohibits all sorts of employment of children under 11 complete. This is evidently done with a pure desire to secure physical development of children but in so doing the majority of the Committee seem to have overlooked other important considerations. When compulsion is being introduced for the first time in British India our efforts ought to be to work it on the lines of least resistance and in such a way as not to prejudicially affect the labour class. Cost of living is increasing day by day and there is no reasonable prospect of prices going down at least for a generation more. Provision like clause 11 in the bill will tend to cut off some source of income of parents. Should we do it? Moreover, looking to the economic condition of those who will be affected by this provision one cannot advocate entire prohibition. This legislation is permissive and does not apply to the City of Bombay. In Bombay the question of the employment of children in mills, factories, workshops, and as office boys, errand boys, etc., is of greatest magnitude. But as this bill is not to apply to Bombay, the labour question there will at least for some time (until similar bill is introduced) receive a treatment different from the one in industrial centres like Ahmedabad, Broach, Surat, Viramgam, Jalgaon, Sholapur and others. There is no reason for this differentiation. The legislation being permissive, it may not be introduced simultaneously in all trade and industrial centres, and this being so, places where this is not introduced will be in a more advantageous position than neighbouring places where it is introduced. If any real effort is to be made in this direction, the effective remedy for it is a change in the Factory Act. If that is done, all places will be treated alike.

Under English Factory and Workshop Act of 1901 and under English Education Act of 1876 and 1902, employment of children was not entirely prohibited as it is intended to be done in the present bill. The only obligation on the parents and employer was to make adequate provision for the education of children thus employed. No doubt, the Right Honourable Mr. Fisher has recently introduced an education bill under which he proposes to prohibit employment of children in factories and workshops under any circumstances, but he, even in his present bill, does not stop any other employment, provided suitable arrangement is made to educate children thus employed. It will not be safe to take English precedents as our guides in all matters.

This change is being introduced forty years after the introduction of compulsory education in England. Besides the economic conditions in India materially differ from those in England and one ought to take account of the illiteracy of the masses and consequent apathy on their part for such legislation. On these and other grounds which I could not state here for want of time I am not in favour of clause 11 as it stands.

5th November 1917. G. K. SATHE.

Minute of dissent by the Honourable Mr. C. V. Mehta.

I regret I cannot agree with the majority with regard to clause 11 prohibiting the employment of children. On economic and other grounds it is a matter for consideration whether the clause, as it stands, will not in practice prevent Municipalities from applying the Act. When compulsion is being tried for the first time it is necessary to proceed on the lines of least resistance. I entirely approve of the necessity for conserving the physique of young children, but looking to all the circumstances and the abnormally increased cost of living, the danger of the application of the Act being delayed, it would be wise to adopt the course which Mr. Gokhale took, viz., to penalize the employment of children unless it could be shown that the time and nature of the work did not interfere with their receiving instruction in a proper manner.

His Excellency the PRESIDENT :—Order, order. A bill to provide for the extension of primary education in municipal districts in the Bombay Presidency other than the city of Bombay—Bill No. II of 1917—Second reading. The Honourable Mr. PATEL.

The Honourable Mr. VITHALBHAI JHAVERBHAI PATEL :—May it please your Excellency,—I rise to move the second reading of a bill to provide for the extension of primary education in the municipal districts in the Bombay Presidency other than the city of Bombay—Bill No. II of 1917.

The Honourable Mr. V. J. Patel moves the second reading of the bill.

The Council will remember that the bill was referred to a strong select committee of fifteen members. The report of the committee with the bill, as amended by them, has been circulated to all the honourable members. At this reading, therefore, I need do nothing more than draw the particular attention of the members of this Council to the more salient and important features of the alterations effected in the original bill during the deliberations of the select committee.

Clause 18.—The much-abused clause 18 is, I am glad to observe, deleted with the sanction of the Government of India. The honourable members will also notice that the select committee in new clause 18 (c) provides that the local Government may make rules specifying the extent to which the cost of free and compulsory education shall be borne by them, when they decide to share such cost.

Clause (2) sub-clause (2).—Select committee has lengthened the period of compulsory attendance at school so as to include the whole of the child's eleventh year of age. The Council will see that according to the bill as amended compulsory period will be full five years, i.e., from the beginning of the seventh year to the end of the eleventh year. The select committee thought that if any lasting results were to be expected, five years should be the minimum period for which education must be given to a child.

Clause 14.—Under the bill as introduced it was open to the parent of any child to claim remission of fees by declaring to the Head Master of the school that he was unable to pay it. The bill, as amended, provides that compulsory education shall be free. In this connection I should like to invite the attention of the Council to two considerations, which prompted the committee to alter the clause as it stood originally. The municipality is empowered to impose any fresh tax or increase any tax which is already imposed, in its area, for the purpose of introducing compulsory education. Now if some parents are exempted from the payment of the fee and others are charged, the latter will have to pay twice over. The second consideration is that under the bill, as introduced, the municipality was bound to grant exemption on mere declaration of inability by the parent without any enquiry and consequently the amount of fee proceeds would have been almost negligible.

Clause 15.—This clause in the amended bill empowers the local Government to exempt any particular class or community from the operation of this act. We know as a matter of fact that in some municipal districts there are communities the education of whose children could not be conveniently arranged for by the municipality concerned. These children should not, in fairness, be required to undergo the course of education which is compulsory in the particular district. The case of Anglo-Indian children living in the mofussil municipal district is an instance in point. I should like to specially draw the attention of the members of the Council that when in respect of a particular community the local Government makes use of the power vested in them by this clause that community will be exempted also from the payment of the tax imposed by the municipality under clause 13.

Clause 16.—Under clause 17 of the bill as it stood originally the local Government was given power to cancel any notification regarding compulsory education. Clause 16 of the amended bill retains that power, but provides that the municipality shall be given an opportunity of furnishing an explanation before Government cancels any notification.

Clause 16 of the original bill provides that all primary schools maintained by the municipality shall be open to inspection by the educational department and the municipality shall maintain such buildings and appliances as the said department may require. It was pointed out to the select committee that the only schools at which attendance would be made compulsory would be recognized schools and the department would in all cases make liberty to inspection a condition of recognition. The clause is, therefore, omitted as unnecessary.

Clause 17.— Under this clause all fines in respect of any offence against provisions of this act in any municipal district are to be credited to the municipal fund. This is what it should be. The municipality has a reasonable claim to the proceeds of such fines.

Clause 4.—This clause is altered so as to enable the municipality to get a notification of compulsory education issued by Government before they make actual provision necessary to introduce compulsion within its area. I will read what the select committee says on this point.

"Clause 4. Adequate provision.—Under the bill as introduced the municipality was compelled to make adequate provision for compulsory education before sanction could be given for the issue of a notification under clause 3. It would not however be practicable for the municipality to build or enlarge schools or to tax itself for that purpose or to make final arrangements with respect to other matters which would be included in the term "provision", without a definite assurance that its intention to introduce compulsory education could be carried into effect. We consider that if the intention of the municipality is expressed by a resolution passed in the manner provided by revised clause 5, and the municipality also satisfies the local Government of its bona fides, there will be no objection to the granting of sanction for the issue of a notification. We have therefore slightly altered the wording of clause 4, and have in revised clause 13 omitted the condition that the tax may be levied only when the notification under clause 3 is actually in force. We have however inserted words in clause 3 which will enable the notification to be expressed to take effect at any date later than the date of its issue. The usual procedure will then be to allow some period between the date of issue and the date when the notification is to come into operation, in order that the necessary preparations may be made by the municipality in the interval."

Clause 9.—In the bill as introduced the power to pass an attendance order was reserved to the magistrate. This clause provides that such order should be made by the schools committee in view of the fact that it is desirable to avoid having recourse to the magistrate until the necessity arises for a prosecution.

Clause 13.—The bill as introduced provided that the tax for the purposes of the act shall not be imposed unless the resolution in that behalf was supported by at least two-thirds of the councillors present at the meeting. In the bill as amended this provision is dropped, and very rightly too. It is necessary to encourage municipalities to tax themselves for educational purposes so long as the State has not definitely decided to assume the responsibility of financing primary education, and therefore a municipality should be empowered to impose the tax by a bare majority resolution. The select committee has also struck out sub-clause 4 of clause 14 which purported to ensure that the proceeds of the tax should be devoted solely to primary education. Such a provision, they thought, would be ineffectual, because it would be open to a municipality to evade it by devoting less of the proceeds of other taxes to education.

Clause 11.—In the select committee this clause was subjected to very close and careful consideration. The committee had the advantage of seeing the recent proposals made by Mr. Fisher, the minister for education in England, for the revision of the English Education Act. After taking into consideration all the circumstances, the committee were of opinion that it was not desirable to permit the employment of children of school going age for the purposes of profit. They, therefore, allowed the clause to remain as it originally stood. My honourable friends Mr. CHUNILAL MEHTA and Rao Bahadur SATHE have minutes of dissent on this clause. They have also given notice of amendments. I do not wish to say anything at this stage regarding the merits or demerits of those amendments and I trust my honourable friends will also reserve their observations.

My honourable friend Mr. PATHAN has raised two points in his minute of dissent. He contends that school committees should be so constituted as to admit of co-opted Mahomedan members and that before introducing compulsion, a municipality should provide schools for the education of the children of the principal communities resident within their areas, giving instruction in their mother tongues. He has given notice of the necessary amendments in that behalf and I have no doubt the members of the Council will give them their anxious consideration.

The other points embodied in the report of the committee are not of sufficient importance to justify me in detaining the Council any longer.

Your Excellency, before I conclude I should like to make one observation. The bill has been considered by a very large, a very strong and very representative committee. The committee was very fortunate in possessing my friend the Honourable Sir MAHADEV CHAUBAL as its chairman. This was the first occasion when I had the honour to serve on a committee with Sir MAHADEV as chairman and I am glad to be able to tell this Council that Sir MAHADEV makes an ideal chairman, always open to reason, ready to conciliate when conciliation would be desirable and above all courteous to his colleagues. I, therefore, take this opportunity of congratulating him for enabling me to successfully steer this most important measure to a safe haven. I would be failing in my duty, did not I express my sincere gratitude to your Excellency personally, to your Excellency's Government and to every member of this Council for the assistance that I have been fortunate to receive from them in connection with this bill. I venture to say, my Lord, that in the whole history of legislation in British India so important a measure is for the first time being placed on the Statute Book and I rejoice that the Bombay Legislative Council takes the credit for it. The Bombay Presidency has taken the lead and I am glad to notice that some of the other provinces are following it up. The Punjab, Bihar and Madras have already taken up the question in right earnest. Very soon after the bill was published in the Bombay Government Gazette in July last I received hundreds of letters from various parts of India asking me for copies. I at once got one thousand copies printed and not one is now left with me.

Your Excellency, I now conclude but not without an expression of my sincere gratitude and the gratitude of the millions of this country to His Excellency Lord Chelmsford's Government who have allowed us to tread—though tread gently—on this the hitherto forbidden ground. With these remarks I beg to move the second reading of the bill.

The Honourable SHEIKH GHULAM HUSSEIN HIDAYATALLAH:—Your Excellency,—When this bill came for the first reading I made some suggestions and the minute of dissent of my honourable friend Mr. PATHAN makes reference to the provisions which I thought necessary at that time. One was that an express provision should be made in the bill that Urdu should be the medium of the instruction of Mahomedan children and the second was that the school committees should be purely a representative committee of all important communities.

As regards the first point, i. e., the medium of instruction, when the bill was brought for its first reading I was given to understand by some of the honourable members that the instruction that is provided would be that determined by the educational department and that my fears were groundless, but after July 1917 the attitude of the educational department and of the Government as regards Urdu which is the medium of instruction for the education of Mahomedan children is well-known, and under the circumstances if this bill is passed into law, it will give effect to the new policy of Government and Urdu will not be the medium of instruction for Mahomedan boys. The result will be that nearly 70 per cent. of the total population of the Mahomedans of the three divisions whose mother-tongue is Urdu, as shown by the last census report, shall have to pay the educational cess or tax, and they will be compelled to send their children to school where they will not be taught in their mother-tongue. And if they decide not to send their children to school, what will be their fate? They will be punished under the bill. In short if the bill be passed into law, the Mahomedans shall have to pay their tax, their children will not be taught in their language, and in case of non-compliance they will be punished. I think if the bill is passed into law it will do more harm than good to the Mahomedans.

Coming to the second point about the school committee, they are invested with large and responsible powers. They have to discharge important functions. The principle of compulsion in the domain of education will be a sudden and abrupt change to the people, and it will be the duty of the Government to see that the change is as little felt by the people as possible. For that it is very necessary that moral persuasion should be resorted to. But who will use this moral persuasion? It is not the representatives of the other communities, but those who enjoy the confidence of the people and are the chosen representatives of the people. I think it is very necessary that school committees should be very representative bodies not only composed of Hindus and Mahomedans but any other important communities. I would have moved my own amendments to give effect to my suggestions, but I was restrained because I knew of the fate that had befallen my honourable friend Mr. PATHAN in the select committee, and I am afraid that a similar fate would befall us because we are a minority. Your Excellency, I would appeal that in the bill of the Honourable Mr. PATEL he should embody these two suggestions. I utterly fail to see what objection my honourable friend can have to a demand which is reasonable and just, which will benefit in the highest degree the Mahomedan community and does not affect any other. If my honourable friend does not accept my proposal I am afraid I will have to oppose the second reading. I appeal to the Mahomedan members of this Council that they have to realize their responsibility, that if this bill is passed into law the Mahomedan boys and girls of the three important divisions of the Presidency proper shall have to pay the tax and they will be compelled to learn in a language which is not their mother-tongue, and in case of non-compliance they will be punished. With these remarks I oppose the second reading of the bill unless my honourable friend Mr. PATEL would agree to embody the suggestions I have made.

The Honourable Sir MAHADEV BHASKAR CHAUBAL:—May I ask my honourable friend what is the mother-tongue of Mussalmans in Sind?

The Honourable SHEIKH GHULAM HUSSEIN HIDAYATALLAH.—Sindhi.

The motion for the second reading was put to the vote and carried, 38 voting for and 2 against the second reading. The Council then divided as follows:—

His Excellency the PRESIDENT:—Clauses.

The Honourable Mr. SIDDHANATH DHONDDEV GARUD.—Your Excellency,—I rise to a point of order. I had sent 19 amendments to the several clauses of the bill to the secretary, for the second reading, but they were returned to me by the secretary, and the letter which was sent to me said that they were returned because the only purpose of the amendments was to introduce compulsory education in local board areas. I submit, sir, that the purpose of these amendments is not, in all cases, the introduction of compulsory education in local board areas, though some of the amendments do seek to extend the scope of the bill. Under section 80 of the Government of India Act, I submit that I should be allowed to move these amendments, and I therefore request your Excellency's ruling as to whether these amendments can or cannot be moved. In this case the letter is signed for the secretary to the Legislative Council by someone on the staff and he says "I am directed to state that the only purpose of your amendments is to introduce compulsory education in local board areas. This is an entirely different subject." I should therefore like to know whether this is your Excellency's ruling.

His Excellency the PRESIDENT:—I cannot understand the difficulty of the honourable member. He first sends in certain amendments. He receives a letter explaining the reasons why these amendments cannot be accepted, but he takes no further steps. He does not try to state his view to either my honourable colleague or to the secretary, but waits until he arrives here to state his case. Does not the honourable member think that it would have been better, if he was anxious to move his amendments, to press his view on my honourable colleague without waiting till the last moment?

As to the merits of his amendments, he is perfectly aware that this bill is for providing free and compulsory education in municipal areas only. My honourable friend wishes to extend the scope of the bill so as to include urban areas and local boards. That is quite out of the province of this particular bill and I think his amendments have been rightly refused.

The Honourable Mr. GARUD:—Your Excellency, there was no time to communicate by post with the secretary.

His Excellency the PRESIDENT:—May I ask the honourable member when he received the letter?

The Honourable Mr. GARUD:—I received it on the 30th of last month.

Clause 1 was then put to the vote and carried.

His Excellency the PRESIDENT:—Item No. 1. Amendment (a) to clause 2 (2). The Honourable Khan Bahadur PIR BAKSH.

The Honourable Khan Bahadur PIR BAKSH walad MIAN MAHMUD:—Your Excellency.—I beg to move the following amendment:—

"(a). The word "child" to be deleted and substituted by words "a boy". This correction to be made throughout in the Bill".

I am of conviction that it is yet too early to introduce a bill making education for girls compulsory. We may gain this object later on as the compulsory education of boys has manifested its benefits. Even if we made an exception for girls in certain cases or places as the bill means to provide, yet in its present form it is bound to add to the difficulties in several places. A bill for compulsory education of male children is a real necessity and will not be found objectionable.

In general reference to the Presidency and in particular to Sind Province, I may clearly say that the bulk of Muhammadan gentry views the sending of their girls to a public school after they have attained an age of 8 or 9 years, as against custom and propriety. In fact most educated Muhammadans believe in giving girls only religious education and arts like sewing and cooking are taught them at home. To make education for girls a compulsory provision will be looked upon by most pardà-nashin families as a decided hardship, and will be found unworkable. The circumstances of Sindh, and the sentiments of its people are well known to those who have remained with the people and who have been in touch with them either officially or privately. Some orthodox heads will even consider the scheme as intended to interfere with their privacy and to gradually discourage parda system—a thing so sacred and religious.

And I must assure your Excellency that if the bill is passed as it is, it will be attended by difficulties rather than success in any appreciable degree. We have not so many schools for girls, neither an adequate number of mistresses available, sufficient for the number of girls coming under the operation of the bill, and really a great many families will be put to an undesirable discomfiture.

There ought also to be considered the fact that in certain communities the girls are given away in marriage when they have not yet reached the age of 10 years, and I doubt if we can induce or force married girls to join a school at the cost of their taking part in their new family life.

In order to spread and encourage education among girls, the easiest and the most feasible course would be to give girls of our present girl schools scholarships. With these words I trust the Council will accept my amendment.

The Honourable Mr. RAGHUNATH PURSHOTTAM PARANJPYE:—Your Excellency,—I rise to oppose this amendment of my honourable friend Khan Bahadur PIR BAKSH because I think he has not quite appreciated the fact that the bill is merely a permissive bill. The application of this bill to any municipal district is to be made on the application of that municipality itself and I suppose that all members of the municipality, at any rate most of them, belong to the communities from which the children themselves are to come. If, therefore, there are any great difficulties for the application of compulsion in the case of girls, I think the members of the municipality will see that there are such difficulties and will not come forward with a proposal to apply compulsion to girls. But if it were the case that all the members of the municipality were drawn from some other places and not from the people themselves, then there may have been some grounds for the fears that have been entertained by my honourable friend. Again there is a further safeguard. Supposing, for instance, in a particular municipality the members went in for this bill inspite of the conviction of the people against it, then there is Government to see further whether the application is really justified or not. In all these matters. therefore, I think the bill being merely a permissive one there is no harm in having this possibility of the application of the bill to the girls. There may be some municipalities in which public opinion may be prepared to extend this clause to girls. Of course, we do not expect that the bill will be immediately applied to girls, but after all we expect that we shall soon advance in public opinion sufficiently to be able to apply compulsion to girls, and there may be some districts where at any rate it will not do any harm or cause trouble.

As regards women teachers Government when it gives permission for application of this bill to girls will see whether proper provision is made for female teachers. For these reasons I think the honourable member's amendment is unnecessary and that the Council should not accept this amendment proposed by my honourable friend.

The Honourable Mr. HARCHANDRAI VISHINDAS:—May it please your Excellency,—In addition to the remarks which have fallen from my honourable friend Mr. PARANJPYE I have to say this much, that the Honourable Khan Bahadur PIR BAKSH, with all due deference to him, I do not think, is perfectly justified in speaking on behalf of the whole Presidency so far as female education is concerned. In fact the provision in this bill as regards girls is permissive. If it had been repugnant to the feeling of the whole of the Presideney, or for the matter of that to the feeling of Mahomedan members of this Council we should have expected an amendment of this kind to have come from other sources than my honourable friend. Therefore, I would presume from the fact that the only sponsor to this amendment is my honourable friend Khan Bahadur PIR BAKSH that the Council may run away with the impression that so far as the province of Sind is concerned or for the matter of that so far as the Mahomedan community of that province is concerned public opinion may be against female education there, or in other words, against the provision being made applicable for girls in that province. Well, I may say, I intend to correct that kind of feeling which may be created by the remarks of my honourable friend Khan Bahadur PIR BAKSH by saying that so far from the feeling being against female education in Sind it is in favour of it. Recent movements all over the country—

The Honourable Khan Bahadur PIR BAKSH :—I said compulsory education, not voluntary education.

The Honourable Mr. HARCHANDRAI :—The recent movements all over the country have accentuated the feeling and if there was anything in education that is wanted, one thing more than another, it is female education. Well, I dare say, that members of this Council will have paid attention to the remarks of the Honourable Khan Bahádur PIR BAKSH regarding purdah and other matters, but at the same time it must be remembered that in spite of purdah among Mahomedan communities and other communities in Sind and other provinces you will find that even persons who observe purdah do send their girls to school. As regards any impression that may have been generally created by the remarks of the Honourable Khan Bahádur PIR BAKSH that there is a feeling against female education in Sind, I submit that the honourable member, more correctly speaking, and more definitely speaking, is only entitled to offer an opinion with regard to his own municipality of Sukkur of which he is the President. I dare say if there is any feeling against the introduction of compulsory education for girls in Sukkur, he will have a potent voice there and he can very easily oppose the introduction of compulsion to girls.

The Honourable Khan Bahádur PIR BAKSH :—I was not referring to Sukkur, but the whole province of Sind.

The Honourable Mr. HARCHANDRAI :—I do not know whether my honourable friend Khan Bahadur PIR BAKSH'S interruption is called for. I said that he is not entitled to speak for the whole of Sind. He is entitled to speak for Sukkur and his authority is confined to that place alone. He does not represent Karachi, he does not represent any other district in Sind but Sukkur and I may say that so far as my own knowledge is concerned—

The Honourable Khan Bahadur PIR BAKSH :—Your Excellency, I am not appointed an honourable member of this Council on behalf of Sukkur only.

The Honourable Mr. HARCHANDRAI :—I appeal to your Excellency whether these interruptions are in order.

His Excellency the PRESIDENT :—I should think the honourable member need not have found it necessary to interrupt so often, but I would suggest to my honourable friend Mr. HARCHANDRAI that his remarks are becoming rather of a personal nature.

The Honourable Mr. HARCHANDRAI :—I did not mean to be personal, your Excellency. What I mean to say is this that if the introduction of this bill, as has been pointed out by my honourable friend Mr. PARANJPYE, is to be permissive, it does not make it absolutely necessary to introduce compulsory education for boys and girls also. It is optional to the municipality to make it compulsory for boys only, and therefore, if there is any municipality in Sind, or for the matter of that in the rest of the Presidency, in which sentiment is entirely against the introduction of compulsory female education, and I dare say that there will be found certain local areas where it is so, then it is left to that particular local area to confine the operation of this clause only to boys. The effect of the change which is recommended by the Honourable Khan Bahadur PIR BAKSH is so sweeping that it would deprive the whole of the Presidency of the advantage of compulsory education for girls, in any part of it, when the whole of the municipality of any particular area is of opinion that this clause of the bill should be extended not only to boys but to girls also. Therefore, I wish to submit—I am sorry my remarks had the interpretation of being personal—that the very wording of the bill is such that its operation with regard to girls can only be local. If there is a municipality in which there is a universal sentiment that the clause should be made applicable to girls also, the effect of the change as recommended by the Honourable Khan Bahadur PIR BAKSH, would be to deprive the municipality of that advantage, which I say this Council should not permit. I submit if there should be any feeling in the Council that by the word "child" appearing in the bill, any particular community would be deprived of the right of excluding girls from the operation of this bill that feeling is entirely wrong. I am perfectly certain that in any municipality wherever this bill is sought to be introduced, and I do not think it would be introduced at the outset in many, whenever it is found that girls education is not in consonance with the feelings of a community or any section of a community, the municipality will not extend it. For these reasons I oppose most strongly this amendment and point out distinctly that it ought not to be made operative in the case of the whole Presidency whereas it can be made operative only in those few places of the Presidency where the feeling is against female education.

The Honourable Mr. PANDURANG ANANT DESAI:—May it please your Excellency,—I rise to oppose the amendment moved by the Honourable Khan Bahadur PIR BAKSH. I oppose it because it is of a reactionary character. It excludes the females of this Presidency from the benefits which would be obtained for them by this bill. I should like to bring to the notice of the honourable mover of this amendment the provision in sub-clause ( ) of clause 3 of this bill. It says: "The municipality in any municipal district constituted under the principal act may with the previous sanction of the local government declare by notification that the primary education of boys or of girls or of children of both sexes shall be compulsory in such district from a date to be mentioned in the notification; provided that, where a notification has been issued under this section with reference to children of one sex only, the municipality may with the like sanction issue a subsequent notification with reference to children of the other sex." This provision will clearly show to the honourable mover of this amendment that every safeguard is made, and if the local conditions of a particular municipality are peculiar and are such that the extension of female education is not desirable there, I think the municipality will take into consideration the peculiar local circumstances and will not extend the act to the girls there. We see that female education in the Presidency is far from being satisfactory and every facility should be given for the extension of female education. Under these circumstances, I think that the word "child" should be retained and that the proposed amendment should be rejected.

The Honourable Mr. GHULAM MUHAMMAD walad Khan Bahadur WALI MUHAMMAD BHURGRI:—Your Excellency,—Coming from a part of the country from which the Honourable Khan Bahadur PIR BAKSH comes, I am constrained to oppose this amendment of his. The honourable mover of this amendment says that amongst Muhammadans in Sind there is a feeling against the education of girls. May I ask him how many families in Sind can be taken to be examples of what he says? Although I am myself accustomed to very strict parda I may tell my honourable friend that if his argument is pushed to its logical conclusion, then his argument would apply to the very education of girls under any conditions.

I think, my Lord, it is no use at this time of day to propose an amendment of this kind. The education of girls is very important and even under the parda system, it is quite practicable; and if we are to improve the status of our women we should pay as much attention to their education as we pay to the education of our boys. Besides, this Council must remember that the Bill is a permissive one, and it is certain that any municipality which seeks to introduce compulsory education in any area in which the parda system prevails will take order that due regard is paid to the requirements of that system in the arrangements provided before they apply for the application of the provisions of the bill. With these words I oppose the amendment.

The Honourable Mr. VITHALBHAI JHAVERBHAI PATEL:—Your Excellency,—I regret very much that I have to oppose the amendment of my honourable friend Khan Bahadur PIR BAKSH. I must say that it is not right for this Council to push by legislative force the education of boys to a higher level and not to make any provision for girls. Female education is already very backward and if we confine the provisions of compulsory education to boys only, I do not know where it would land us. I should like to point out further that even if members of this Council were inclined to accept the amendment, it does not fit in with the other sections of the bill. My honourable friend Khan Bahadur PIR BAKSH tells us that the words "a boy" should be substituted for the word "child" wherever the word "child" occurs in the bill. I might invite the attention of this Council to clause 7. In line 5 of that clause the word 'child" occurs. According to this amendment it would read "the parent of every 'a boy' to which" etc. Coming to sub-clause (a) of clause 8 the same difficulty would be found. According to the amendment it will read "where the 'a boy'". That is what my honourable friend wants. I do not want to go further. You will find the same difficulties in several clauses of the bill. The whole thing is so ridiculous thal I hope this Council will reject the amendment.

The amendment was put to the vote and lost.

His Excellency the PRESIDENT:—Amendment (b) to clause 2 (2), item No. 1. The Honourable Khan Bahadur PIR BAKSH.

"For the words 'eleven years' substitute 'twelve years'".

The Honourable Khan Bahadur PIR BAKSH walad MIAN MAHMUD:—Your Excellency,—By this amendment I wish to substitute "twelve years" for the words "eleven years" appearing in sub clause (2) of clause 2. The one year's margin, which is evidently intended by the bill to provide for a year of failure or natural deficiencies of small boys during their school-going age, is not sufficient in my opinion and may be extended by a year more. Your Excellency may remember that I had in my last speech pointed out that in this country the health of the children is not favourable so as to enable them to grasp what they are taught. I therefore move my amendment and trust that the Council will accept it.

The Honourable Mr. VITHALBHAI JHAVERBHAI PATEL:—May it please your Excellency,—I do not think that this Council would be justified in accepting this amendment. The question was fully discussed by the select committee and they have decided to raise the age from ten to eleven. Now my honourable friend is so enthusiastic over this compulsory education bill that he wants the age limit to be raised to twelve. But I would ask him, whether in the present circumstances of the country it is wise to run too fast in this matter. We should see that our proposal does not work special hardship when the measure is applied to girls. I hope my honourable friend Khan Bahadur PIR BAKSH will agree with me in this view. I therefore trust that the Council will reject the amendment.

The amendment was then put to the vote and lost.

His Excellency the PRESIDENT:—Item 2, amendment to clause 2 (2). The Honourable Mr. CHUNILAL MEHTA.

PRIMARY EDUCATION BILL.

[3RD DECEMBER 1917.] [Mr. Chunilal Vijbhukhandas Mehta; Mr. Vithalbhai Jhaverbhai Patel; the President.]

The Honourable Mr. CHUNILAL VIJBHUKHANDAS MEHTA:—Your Excellency,—The amendment which stands in my name on this clause is an addition to the definition of the word "child" as it now stands. The addition is:—

"or, in the case of a child employed in a factory, not more than 13 years;"

It is with some diffidence, your Excellency, that I move this amendment and I would request the Council to consider this amendment in conjunction with my two other amendments, namely, one to clause 4 which provides that the cost of all provision for education of all the children who are employed in factories shall be borne by the factories themselves, and the amendment to clause 11 which I find has also received the support of other members of this Council.

The Honourable Mr. PATEL:—Does my honourable friend move all the amendments together, or does he confine himself to this one amendment?

The Honourable Mr. MEHTA:—Your Excellency,—I wish to confine myself only to this one amendment; but it should be remembered that the Honourable Mr. PATEL requested us not to make any remarks at all with regard to the second reading and he wished us to make them when we came to consider the bill clause by clause. I submit, therefore, sir, that this amendment of mine is so bound up with the one under clause 4 that I may be allowed to make a few remarks in regard to this amendment. I do not want to take much time on the other clauses, but I only want the Council to remember that these amendments go together.

His Excellency the PRESIDENT:—But I should like to ask my honourable friend what he proposes to do. Does he propose to make his speech on this particular amendment and not make any further reference to the others? Is he going to confine himself to this amendment?

The Honourable Mr. CHUNILAL MEHTA:—I must confine myself to this amendment, your Excellency.

His Excellency the PRESIDENT:—Then I must ask my honourable friend to stick strictly to his present amendment and to make no reference to the others.

The Honourable Mr. CHUNILAL MEHTA:—The amendment will provide for the extension of the age of compulsion in the case of those children who are employed in factories from eleven to thirteen years and I submit, sir, that in the present circumstances of this Presidency and in view of the permissive nature of this bill it would be advisable to go slow in the first instance and to accept the amendment which I propose, more in the nature of a compromise and more with a real desire to see that this act really comes into operation in fact and not only as a piece of legislation. The Honourable Mr. PATEL very rightly congratulated himself on the first and I may say tentative steps that are being taken now in the region of compulsion, and I think we shall have every reason in fact and in practice to congratulate ourselves when we find municipalities coming forward enthusiastically and in large numbers to take advantage of this act; and it is with the desire to help municipalities to come forward for this purpose that I think it right to move the amendment in its present form.

I will at once say that my amendment is open to the charge that it makes a special favourable concession in the case of factories. Personally I have no desire to give factories any particular preference, but I believe that what would happen in practice when the school committee wants to know whether a particular child is employed or not and wants to penalise that child being employed, it will turn its attention to organized employment, to employment in large numbers, and this can only be found in the case of factories. It has been said that employment in factories ought to be prohibited because such employment is deleterious to the health of children. Your Excellency, if that were the only ground on which the employment should be prohibited, then I venture to submit that the proper course, and to my mind the only course, that this Council ought to follow is to ask for an amendment of the Factory Act. That act, as it now stands, allows the employment of children between the ages of nine and fourteen. That act was brought into force after careful and detailed consideration and after the sittings of a very strong commission. I dare say that it may be that circumstances have now changed and that in our opinion the age ought to be raised. In that case our only course is to try and amend the Factory Act. When that is done all the areas in this country will be upon an equal footing, and it will not be that this Presidency alone, which has the largest number of factories, should be unfavourably penalized. I myself have my doubts whether a bill of this nature providing for the prohibition of employment can really over-ride the effect of the Factory Act which is a Government of India Act and which applies to the whole of India. However, whether that is so or not, I think that practical considerations ought to be placed before this Council and I hope that honourable members will see that in the circumstances in which we are now placed it will be very difficult indeed for municipalities to come forward and take advantage of this act.

I very well remember the lively debate which we had at the first reading of this bill and I think I am correct in saying that almost without exception every honourable member of the Council who spoke on that bill directed his attack against clause 18 and it was very distinctly pointed out by almost every speaker that it whould be impossible for municipalities to come forward and apply this act unless they receive very substantial assistance from Government. Under this amendment I suggest a means by which the costs can be thrown upon the shoulders of those who wish to employ children and I find that the majority of the select committee do not wish to take their contribution or to employ any children at all.

The next practical consideration to my mind is this: I have something to do with the employment of children in the factories in the district municipalities and I find that the class of persons now employed in factories who do not send their children to school is so poor, so illiterate, that it would be a real hardship to deprive them of the earnings of their children.

I wish to point out a case which is not altogether singular. I may assume for my illustrations that parents have 2 to 3 children of the ages between 6 and 11 to whom compulsion would be applied. The earnings of all parents employed in factories who are of the class that I have referred to do not as a rule exceed the figure, let me say, of Rs. 15 at the outside. I should say Rs. 15 a month is the average and to my mind a figure, on the top side, of what he is earning a month. Now what will compulsion applied to these children mean? It will mean that the child is prevented from adding to the common stock of the family fund. It is all very well to say that education is free. It is free inasmuch as no charge is going to be made for fees. Now it is well known that the fees in themselves amount to very little. But it is also very well known that in addition to fees there are various other expenses which the education of children entails. Every one knows that there are slates and books and papers and pencils and so forth which are to be paid for. When a child goes to school it must go decently or at least adequately dressed and all that adds to the expenditure which the family will have to incur. My fear is that that expenditure will come out of the stomach of the poor parents and I venture to think

The Honourable Sir MAHADEV CHAUBAL:—I do not want to interrupt the honourable member. Would the honourable member give us the details of the family's earnings. I mean, how much a man employed in a mill makes, how much a woman makes and how much a child makes. I should be much obliged to the honourable member if he gives us that information.

The Honourable Mr. CHUNILAL V. MEHTA:—I said that the parents who do not send their children to school earn on an average the maximum of Rs. 15 a month. The man himself earns that and his wife probably earns between 9 and 11 rupees a month and the child earns between 3 to 6 rupees a month and in the case of 2 to 3 children that figure must be multiplied. I do not refer to that class of labourers which already makes between 25 and 35 rupees a month. Most of these labourers are employed in the weaving section of the factories and they usually send their children to school if they can afford it.

I wish to point out, sir, that in England when the act of compulsion came to be applied there was the same kind of difficulty experienced in a country which is acknowledged to be proverbially rich, and I will only refer to the strong views that were expressed by one of the leading papers of this city which, when no body else supported the late Mr. Gokhale when he moved his bill for free and compulsory primary education in the Imperial Council, went out of its way to support Mr. Gokhale. That writer speaks from experience and his views are entitled to respect.

Then again I wish to point out the conditions to which we have drifted with regard to the cost of living. I do not think I need dilate upon the excessive rise that has taken place in the cost of living all over the country. It has been said that an increase of wages has been received by persons employed in the factories. But I venture to think that the rise in the cost of living has more than swallowed that increase and that there are no signs that we can see at present of any abatement in the ever increasing cost of living.

I will now come, your Excellency, to what I think—

The Honourable Sir MAHADEV CHAUBAL:—I hope my honourable friend will pardon my interruption. I take it that he is speaking only on the particular amendment which is now put before the Council.

The Honourable Mr. CHUNILAL V. MEHTA:—I shall now refer to what I consider one of the difficulties of the present administration of the Factory Act. It has been stated that six hours' work in a factory as half-timers which is at present allowed under the Factory Act absolutely unfits a child from spending any further time either in work or in instruction and that even if instruction were to be given for half the period for which it would ordinarily be given in a full time school, it would be deleterious to the health of the child. Now let us see what is the actual state of affairs with regard to the number of hours that a child works in factories. I will quote from the report of the Collector of Bombay with regard to the operation of the Factory Act, during the year 1916. Mr. Shepherd says:—"There appears to be little doubt that a good many children certified as half-timers really do a full day's work". The factory inspector himself adds:—

"The certification of children has been carefully attended to and efforts have been persistently made to abate their tendency to rove from one mill to another, with, however, little or no result. Their motives, too, are difficult to ascertain with certainty but it would appear that they move about from mill to mill with the hope of obtaining a full-time certificate of age if they are frequently put before the certifying surgeon by various employers."

This shows one of two things your Excellency.—Either that the boy can do the 12 hours work which I myself very much doubt and won't agree to. In fact I may say I would not agree to putting the boy to this work at all if I thought the economic circumstances of the country permitted it. The other thing the extract which I have read shows is that the parents are so poor that they must make up their present earnings by those of their children which range from Rs. 3 to Rs. 6 a month. It may be a small matter, perhaps, but I venture to submit that the Rs. 3 to Rs. 6 a month makes a very considerable difference to the budget of the poor man's family. Now, if the amendment which I propose is acceptable to this Council then the employment of children during the whole day which is so bitterly complained of and has been in the past also complained of by factory inspectors will be prevented. The child will work 6 hours in the morning and he will have to attend not more than 3 hours in a school which is to be provided either by the factory owners or by the municipality, and it will be the duty of both the factory owners and the school inspector to co-operate and see that the child does attend the school, and if the child does attend the school, he cannot attend for the remaining part of the time in other factories.

But the strongest fear, your Excellency, in my mind is that if the bill is passed as it stands it will unduly and unnecessarily delay the application of this act. I may certainly think it will do so in those municipalities where at any rate factories at present exist. It may be said that the number of those municipalities is small. Perhaps, so it is, but these municipalities are the largest, they have the largest population and these municipalities are such that can with assistance from Government undertake the burden of compulsory education in their districts. I refer particularly to municipalities like Ahmedabad and various other municipalities where there are factories and where it is well-known factories have considerable influence on the members that direct the work of the municipalities and it seems to me that the act being only permissive it is very natural that neighbouring municipalities where at any rate factories exist must wait to see what the other municipalities are doing for fear of losing its child labour. I quoted just a minute ago the remarks of the factory inspector which shows how roaming the population is in such factories, and every one who has had experience of factory working knows that the hands roam about not only from mill to mill but from place to place in an extraordinary manner. That being the case unless some method is devised by which the opposition of factories will be allayed, and by which the opposition of those who really believe that parents are unable to do without the earnings of their children is also overcome, I am afraid the actual application of the act will be greatly delayed, and I do not think there could be a greater disaster to this act. I would like to point out in this connection the practice which has been adopted by the States of Mysore and Baroda. When they applied this act they allowed all sorts of facilities to see that the act actually did come into force and gradually and slowly.

The Honourable Mr. PATEL:—Is my honourable friend in order in referring to the Baroda or the Mysore State, your Excellency?

His Excellency the PRESIDENT:—I am bound to admit he is not in order.

The Honourable Mr. CHUNILAL MEHTA:—I must say, your Excellency, that my honourable friend Mr. PATEL is inclined to be too technical sometimes. However, I referred to the states because they alone have actually worked compulsion in this country and I thought I might quote their experience as that of people in this country. The example of England has been quoted and I showed that when the act was first applied in England there too all sorts of facilities were allowed. It has always been pointed out in this Council and elsewhere that a great difference exists between conditions in England and this country, and also that this country is an extremely poor country and I am surprised to find that on this matter my colleagues on the select committee did not think that this country was poor enough not to start slowly in a matter of this kind. I beg to point out that the provisions of this bill are so strict, inasmuch as they allow for two-thirds majority before the act comes into force, that it would be easy for the factory owners, if they were so minded, to block the introduction of this measure at all. On these considerations, and because I have a sincere desire to see that the act is applied as widely and as freely as possible, I have suggested the amendment and I have raised the age from 11 to 13. I may also point out sir—that the work to which children put in a factory is, as must be well-known to all who have seen the work of the factories, more or less of a light character. They employ boys to doff spinning and speed frames. Whenever the bobbins are filled the boys are called in from all sides—they are not confined all the time to the interior of the mill but they roam about the factory compounds– and have to remove the bobbins from the spindles and put new ones on. That is almost entirely the nature of the work they are put to in factories.

I have only one more point to mention and that is with regard to the effect which my amendment will have upon the actual education of the children. The child will as usual attend school from the age of 6 to 9. If the child joins school there is no compulsion on him to join a factory but if his parent or he choses to join a factory from the age of 9 upwards, then he shall have to undertake training in the manner which is approved of both by the schools committee and the educational authorities.

The Honourable Mr. PATEL:—Where is it stated? My honourable friend says that the education that has been received by the children will be such as will be recognized by the educational department but there is nothing in this amendment to show that.

The Honourable Mr. CHUNILAL V. MEHTA:—I hope the Honourable Mr. PATEL will not take me to task again for referring to another section in the act. I have stated in the amendment to clause 4 that there shall be only 3 hours' employment in a factory school and all such schools, as he knows, are to be more or less recognised by the educational authorities. I hope this explanation will satisfy the honourable mover.

The Honourable Sir MAHADEV CHAUBAL:—I hope the honourable member is not speaking on his amendment to clause 4. The amendment now before us is simply changing the definition of the word "child".

The Honourable Mr. CHUNILAL MEHTA:—With your Excellency's permission, I think—

His Excellency the PRESIDENT:—I think it is rather a difficult situation; and that I made a mistake in agreeing to the Honourable Mr. PATEL'S suggestion that remarks may be made when the bill comes to be considered clause by clause. Now I would ask my honourable friend Mr. CHUNILAL MEHTA to stick to his amendment as far as he can. He should have made these observations at the time of the second reading. I think I have given him a great deal of latitude.

The Honourable Mr. CHUNILAL MEHTA:—I wish I had spoken at the time of the second reading. However, the raising of that age will give the opportunity for the child to avail himself and to take advantage of the full primary course up to nine years of age which he will get in the ordinary school and from 9 to 13 he will get half the course every day, so that what in an ordinary school will be taught in 2 years he will learn in 4 years now. I hope, therefore, that the amendment will meet with the approval of this Council.

The Honourable Sir MAHADEV BHASKAR CHAUBAL:—Your Excellency,—I sympathise with my honourable friend Mr. CHUNILAL MEHTA'S difficulties owing to his neglect to speak on this question when the second reading of the bill was passed. But however that may be, the merits of his present amendment must be measured independently. I ask this Council to note that the only amendment before us now is whether this Council should retain the definition of the word "child" as it is given in clause 2, sub-clause (2), or accept the one proposed by his amendment. If the amendment is accepted the definition will read as follows:—"child means a child whose age is not less than six and not more than eleven years, and in the case of a child employed in a factory not more than thirteen years". I suppose it ought to be "and" and not "or." Perhaps that is a clerical mistake.

The Honourable Mr. CHUNILAL MEHTA:—Yes.

PRIMARY EDUCATION BILL.

[Sir Mahadev Bhaskar Chaubal; Mr. Chunilal Mehta.] [3RD DECEMBER 1917.]

The Honourable Sir MAHADEV CHAUBAL :—Now I wish to know why there should be such special solicitude for factory children. The Honourable Mr. CHUNILAL says that it would go very hard with the poor parents of factory-children to be compelled to give up such support as they get from child labour; but surely it is not only children who work in factories that are of any earning value to their parents. The Honourable Mr. CHUNILAL'S particular solicitude is only with respect to one class of children. It does not matter to him whether the other children who will have to attend school between the years of six and eleven cause any loss to the earnings of their parents. I ask "Is that right in principle?" The child not working in a factory may be earning only Rs. 3 or Rs. 4 and not Rs. 5 as the honourable member says he earns in a factory, still whatever any other child not employed in a factory earns must certainly be of some value to the parents of the child. It is not to be supposed that the parents of all children who are not employed in factories are rolling in wealth and do not mind the loss of the earnings of their children. Some loss there must be. The very introduction of this bill means that there shall be such loss and that the parents shall bear it. Therefore I think it is not proper that we should show particular favouritism towards the parents of children who are employed only in factories.

The Honourable Mr. CHUNILAL MEHTA :—May I point out that it is not fair to me to put the case in that way, because as the Honourable Sir MAHADEV CHAUBAL will see there is an amendment to clause 11 which says that other children can also be employed. I do not think that he need put the case in the way that he is trying to put it.

The Honourable Sir MAHADEV CHAUBAL :—I am extremely sorry that I cannot do what my honourable friend wishes me to do. I can only take the amendment which is now before this Council for consideration and that amendment is an amendment for the change of the definition of the word "child". My honourable friend no doubt says that if the factory owners so chose they could wreck or block this bill. Well, I should have expected enlightened factory owners rather to assist this bill by making it a point to employ children only above the age of eleven. There is no inconsistency between the Factory Act and the present bill. The Factory Act defines a child for the purpose of employment as between the years of nine and fourteen. The present bill defines that for the purpose of compulsory education a child means a child between the years six and eleven. The only result of this bill being passed as adopted by the select committee, will be that factory owners will not be able to employ children between the years of nine and eleven. That is the only hardship which will be thrown upon them, in common with the parents of other children who will be compelled to attend school. That is the great point which I think is ignored in the consideration of the question of factory employment. Why should we be so particular about this one employment in factories, and why should we ignore the fact that a number of other children who may not be working in factories, but may have other occupation, will deprive their parents of the same assistance which the parents of factory children will be deprived of if they were compulsorily put to school?

Then my honourable friend was arguing on the assumption that his subsequent amendments were passed and these contemplate factory children receiving elementary education in factory schools. I think that perhaps it would be more correct first to start factory schools and then to ask this Council for an amendment of the law. We are not enacting an unalterable or unchangeable law for all time. As a matter of fact, I am not aware of any regular factory schools existing at present either in Ahmedabad, Bombay or any other place. I believe an attempt has been made by Government to induce factory owners to start such schools, but my belief is that it has not materialised. Let them start factory schools, let the factory owners make provision for the efficient elementary education of the children whom they employed and then let them come before the Council and say; "As we have started such and such schools and have made adequate provision for the education of the children whom we employ, there should be an exception made in the case of such children". That will be a far more reasonable request to make than proposing at this stage a definition of the word "child" which would leave the parents of children not employed in factories grounds for reasonable complaint.

For these reasons I think the change will be very unsuitable under the present circumstances of our educational department. One of the reasons why the age of eleven was selected was that it generally fits in well with the first four standards of primary education. If you take the general average, you will find that an average boy at the age of eleven ought to be able to go through the first four standards, from which he bifurcates into the study of English. That was one reason for fixing the age limit at eleven, because it marks out a definite stage in the educational course as it stands at present If you adopt the age limit of thirteen, we will be doing so in entire ignorance of what the curriculum for primary education is going to be in factory schools and how the boys who have taken education in our present primary schools between the ages of nine and eleven are going to fit in with the factory schools from the age of nine to thirteen. At any rate, this is certain that the amended definition of "child" will not fit in with our present arrangements in primary schools.

For these reasons I beg to oppose the amendment which has been moved by the Honourable Mr. Mehta.

The Honourable Mr. VITHALBHAI JHAVERBHAI PATEL:—Your Excellency, I endorse every word that my honourable friend Sir MAHADEV CHAUBAL has said. In the first place I must very heartily congratulate my honourable friend Mr. Chunilal Mehta for the most able manner in which he has pleaded the cause of the poor labourer. I do not, however, at all agree with him that, if the bill passes into law as it is, it would delay the application of the measure. This bill has been before the public for the last six months, from July till December. It has been published in the Bombay Government Gazette and, if I am not wrong, in all the English and vernacular papers of the Presidency. And yet we have not had any petitions protesting against the particular provision to which exception has been taken by my honourable friend Mr. CHUNILAL MEHTA. If the mill owners of Ahmedabad or factory owners of Broach or Surat or Sholapur had any objection to urge, they had full five or six months to send in their petitions of protest.

The Honourable Mr. CHUNILAL MEHTA:—May I point out to the Honourable Mr. PATEL that the Bombay Mill Owners' Association have already sent in their protest to Government, and that the Bombay Mill Owners' Association is not merely confined to Bombay?

The Honourable Mr. PATEL:—Your Excellency, if such a representation has been made, I must say that that representation has so far not reached the members of this Council. Probably the representation was made by them after my honourable friend Mr. CHUNILAL took objection to this clause in the select committee. But the fact remains that during these five or six months no petitions or protests have come in from the mofussal factory owners. This bill does not apply to Bombay at all.

Then I ask your Excellency's Government and this Council to look at this question on humane considerations. I strongly hold that it is the duty of the State to protect that class of the population which is least able to take care of itself. And who are they? They are the children under ten and eleven years of age. My honourable friend Mr. CHUNILAL MEHTA wants that these children should work in factories six hours and then attend school for three hours. The school may be one mile from the residence of a boy. That means one mile to go and one mile to come. So practically my honourable friend Mr. MEHTA wants that a boy of ten should work for ten or eleven hours of the day. I therefore appeal to your Excellency's Government and this Council to look at this question from this point of view, namely, whether it is in the interests of the children and of the country at large to allow the physique and health of a child to deteriorate in the manner suggested by my honourable friend Mr. CHUNILAL MEHTA. He said that there might be cases of great hardship where the maintenance of the family depends upon the gains of child labour, and the Act makes no provision to meet such cases. Well, may I point out to him that the school committee has been given ample power under the Act which leaves it open to it to prosecute or not to prosecute in any particular case. If there are such cases as the Honourable Mr. MEHTA suggests, surely there is the school committee with local knowledge and therefore the knowledge of the circumstances of the particular place, and they will certainly not order a prosecution without proper inquiry. And, after all, how many boy-labourers are there in this Presidency? I have got figures to show that the total number of boys working as labourers in all the mills of the whole Presidency is 11,823, including labourers in the Bombay mills, and this number includes all the boys between the ages of 9 to 14.

Now the effect of this bill is to prevent factory owners from employing boys of the ages of 10 and 11. Under the present Factory Act the mill owner is not allowed to engage a boy till he is 9 years of age. Under this bill he will not be allowed to employ a boy till he is 11. Now this figures of 11,823 extends over five years. Therefore the approximate number of boys between the ages 10 and 11 would be only 3,500. This is the number of boys that is likely to be affected by this Bill.

With these few words I trust the Council will reject the amendment.

The Honourable Mr. CHUNILAL VIJBHUKHANDAS MEHTA:—Your Excellency,—I have got only a few words to say in reply. The issue has been prejudiced by the discussion having been restricted to this amendment only. I will take the figures that have been quoted by the Honourable Mr. PATEL. It is true that in the rest of the Presidency, excluding Bombay, the number of children between the ages of 9 and 11 employed in factories is 11,000. I do not know by what process of reasoning he got the number of boys between the ages of 9 and 11 as 3,000. It is impossible to get the actual figures, because the reports on the factories do not and have not any reason to give the ages of the different boys, but I have had figures taken of one particular mill and I may mention that it is the Sholapur mill and the figures are as follows.

The total number of half-timers employed in the mill is 559 boys and 95 girls, total 654. Half-timers between the ages of 9 and 11, 232 boys and 49 girls. Therefore out of 654 the total number is 281. Therefore the average works out at something like over 42 per cent. If we apply the same average to the factories in the whole of the Presidency, then the figures would be something between 4,500 and 5,000. But quite apart from the actual strength of the figures, as I said, my greatest fear was that the introduction of this bill would be opposed in municipalities, and the result of that would be that for the sake of this small number of children employed in factories the other children in the municipality will have to go without the benefits of compulsory education. It is perfectly true that the Honourable Sir MAHADEV CHAUBAL pointed out that he expected the owners of factories to be enlightened people who would welcome the introduction of this measure. I have no doubt that they will try to do all that they can, but as he is aware, there is such a pronounced scarcity of labour in the districts, particularly in the districts outside Bombay, that industries are bound to be very materially affected. The very fact that in the rest of the factories of the Presidency which, although they exceed in number do not exceed in size the factories in Bombay, employ nearly three times the number of children that are employed in Bombay shows what is the scarcity of labour that factories outside have to contend with. The number of children employed in Bombay is 4,000 and the number of children in the rest of the Presidency is 11,000. The Act, I may point out, also applies to other factories besides textile factories, such as ginning factories, etc., which work for certain periods of the year only. All these factories employ a certain number of children. They work during a certain portion of the year and if they could they would be only too pleased to employ grown up people and pay more wages, but the scarcity of labour is such that it really would work as a hardship.

There is only one other point to which I should like to refer which has been made by the Honourable Mr. PATEL. He says that such cases of hardship will be considered by the schools committee. I should be very glad if the schools committee could undertake to go into all the details of all the cases that will be brought before them. But I have grave doubts whether a single schools committee which is all that is proposed to be appointed for each municipal area, under this bill, and which has got other work to attend to besides the attendance of children in schools, will ever be able to cope with the work that will be put before them in say a large town like Ahmedabad or Sholapur. It is apparent that the committee will have to do its work through a paid Secretary and the Secretary must act according to certain rules. If a child is found employed which ought not to be employed, the parents of that child will be hauled up for prosecution. I therefore think that the provision that has been made is more illusory than real and hope that my amendment will be accepted.

The amendment was put to the vote and lost.

His Excellency the PRESIDENT:—The Council will now adjourn till 3 o'clock.

The Council then adjourned for lunch.

After lunch.

The Council reassembled after lunch at 3 o'clock.

His Excellency the PRESIDENT:—Order, order. Further discussion on the clauses of a bill to provide for the extension of primary education in municipal districts in the Bombay Presidency other than the City of Bombay. Item No. 3. The Honourable Mr. PATHAN.

The Honourable Mr. ABDUL KADIR alias FAKIR MAHOMED walad IBRAHIM KHAN PATHAN:—Your Excellency, first of all I must ask your Excellency's permission to move the amendments (a) and (b) to clause 2 (5) together.

His Excellency the PRESIDENT:—Will the honourable member tell me how he wants to move these two amendments as one?

The Honourable Mr. PATHAN:—Clause 5 refers to the definition of primary education.

His Excellency the PRESIDENT:—I hope the honourable member will agree to this that instead of inserting the new clause as suggested in his amendment he would let his first amendment, that is, amendment (a), read in the following way:—

> "Add at the end after the words 'local government' the words 'in any vernacular of the district such as Marathi, Gujarati, Kanarese, Sindhi, Urdu or such other language or languages as may be notified from time to time to be in vogue in any particular municipal district by the local government."

That would deal with the whole matter in one amendment and, I think, would carry out what the honourable member wishes.

The Honourable Mr. PATHAN:—Your Excellency, I accept the amendment as was read out just now by your Excellency.

PRIMARY EDUCATION BILL.

[Mr. Abdul Kadir Pathan; Sheikh Ghulam Hussein Hidayatallah; Mr. Ebrahim Haroon Jaffer.] [3RD DECEMBER 1917.]

My Lord, the expression primary education as understood in this Presidency applies to the course of instruction imparted in the vernacular schools in the several parts of the country and the languages that are used as media of instruction in several parts are Sindhi in the Province of Sindh and Marathi in the Marathi Districts, Kanarese in the Kanarese Districts and Gujarathi in the Gujarat Districts and Urdu in Mahomedan schools. But the expression does not apply to the elementary education imparted in the European schools.

My honourable friend Mr. COVERNTON raised this difficulty in the select committee, namely, that this bill could not be applied to the children of the European or Anglo-Indian community in the municipal districts and in view of that difficulty a particular clause, clause 15, has been inserted in the bill by which it has been provided that certain communities and classes may be excluded from the operation of this bill. But in course of time it may become possible, or Government may find it necessary or expedient to extend the provisions of this bill to the children of the Anglo-Indian or other communities and to make their education also compulsory; or, if there is an appreciable number of Anglo-Indians in any particular district, they might come up to Government and ask for the extension of the bill to them also, or there may be any other community such as Telugu speaking community or any other community and they might come up to Government and ask for an extension of this act to their community. In that case this amendment will make it possible for Government to recognise the particular language of such community as a vernacular of the district and make this bill applicable to that community by recognizing that as the language of that community.

I therefore hope that this amendment will be accepted by this Council.

The Honourable SHEIKH GHULAM HUSSEIN HIDAYATALLAH:—Your Excellency,—I rise to support the amendment of my honourable friend Mr. PATHAN. All that he wants by this amendment is that compulsory education should be imparted in the vernacular of the district. Supposing there is a district where the vernaculars that are taught are Urdu and Gujarathi, I think it is very necessary that the children of the district ought to be given education in the ordinary vernaculars of their district. Otherwise what would be the result? Under the present bill we make the people pay a tax and force them to learn a language which is not their mother-tongue and if they do not send their children to the school under the law they will be punished. In short, the effect will be that they will have to pay the educational tax and be forced to learn a language which is not their language, and finally if they do not comply with it they will be punished. With these remarks I beg to support the amendment of my honourable friend Mr. PATHAN.

The Honourable Mr. EBRAHIM HAROON JAFFER:—My Lord, I warmly support the amendment moved by my honourable friend Mr. PATHAN. I think that there are two points in which there will be a general agreement in this Council, namely, that instruction in all primary schools must be given through the mother-tongue of the children and that this arrangement should be ensured, by its being prescribed by law.

The obligation to provide schools imparting instruction through the media of vernaculars spoken by different bodies of inhabitants in the area of a municipality must be thrown on the shoulders of that body, as in the absence of such a statutory obligation there is the danger of certain vernaculars only being forced upon children whose mother-tongue is different. The vernaculars of a district must, therefore, be specified and they should be notified by Government from time to time as being in vogue in particular municipal districts. The amendment moved by my honourable friend is thus absolutely necessary, and will, I hope, meet with the approval of the Council.

PRIMARY EDUCATION BILL.

[3RD DECEMBER 1917.] [Mr. Mahadev Bhasker Chaubal; Mr. Abdul Kadir Pathan.]

The Honourable Sir MAHADEV BHASKER CHAUBAL.—Your Excellency,—I rise to speak, against the proposed amendment. In the first place, I wish to point out that a definition of the words "primary education" was considered necessary by the select committee not because they wanted to connote by the expression anything other than what it ordinarily connotes now; but because it desired that for the purposes of this bill which concerns itself with the education of children between the ages of 6 and 11, the expression should connote only that portion of the full primary course which could ordinarily be taught during those years. The Honourable Mr. PATHAN has, I am sorry to say, indulged in some remarks in his dissenting minute, about the select committee having paid scant attention to his proposal: but if that is so I must say that it was entirely the honourable member's fault. He never raised the question at the proper time. I will remind the Honourable Mr. PATHAN that on the first day when the select committee met in Bombay, it was resolved with a view to the early and satisfactory disposal of the work entrusted to them that a future date should be fixed for the next meeting and that in the meantime, each honourable member should send to the secretary such amendments to the draft bill as might suggest themselves to him, so that it would be possible to collate all amendments to each clause, and discuss them seriatim. The Honourable Mr. PATHAN never gave notice of any amendment on this question. There was never any question raised as to the means or medium of the language in which primary education, was to be imparted. No one ever during the course of the discussion of the amendments ever suggested that it was necessary to refer to the medium of the language: and it was only at the last meeting at which the draft of the report was to be adopted that the honourable member in a half-hearted manner referred to his language question no doubt with a view to bring in Urdu. Even then he did not move any regular amendment for being discussed and voted on. Every one assumes that it will ordinarily be conveyed through the vernacular which may be prevalent in the particular municipal area. Now so far as any question of principle is involved in the proposed amendment and the speeches of those who have supported it, I think it would be a burden, which it would be impossible for any municipality to bear if they tried to carry out the suggestions made in the honourable member's amendment and the speeches in support of it.

Take, for instance, the Southern Division and if from the Southern Division a representation is sent signed by say a thousand persons that their vernacular was Urdu or Marathi or that they wished to adopt either as their vernacular and therefore, it was the duty of the municipality that wishes to apply this act that it should start schools in both the languages for the benefit of the children of those 1,000 persons. As a matter of fact, the vernacular of the district is an expression which is understood perfectly well by everybody and the only responsibility which can reasonably be thrown upon any municipality is to make provision for the elementary education of children in its area in the vernacular which is the accepted vernacular of that district. Take the case of Madras. Supposing this act was applied there, I dare say there may be several thousands of Marathi or Gujarathi speaking people in that Presidency. Would any municipality listen if it was said that although in Madras in different districts either the Tamil, or Telugu, or Malayalam, or Uriya was the language of a district concerned, a municipality should start either Marathi or Gujarathi schools for the convenience of a few thousands living in such districts? I do not think any such principle can possibly be accepted by Government and the only thing that a municipality or Government can be reasonably asked to do is to provide facilities for elementary education in the recognized vernacular of the district but not attempt to force a vernacular upon a district which is not the vernacular of the district at present. I do not think therefore that the language question comes at all within the puryiew of the definition of primary education.

The Honourable Mr. ABDUL KADIR alias FAKIR MAHOMED walad IBRAHIM KHAN PATHAN:—Your Excellency,—I have only one word to say about the remarks made by my honourable friend Sir MAHADEV CHAUBAL. He said that no amendments were submitted by me in the select committee. But my honourable friend, Mr. PATEL, will bear me out that when the select committee met for the first time I submitted my amendments and then the amendments were circulated to the members of the select committee. And not only that, when the select committee met for the second and third time, I put before the Committee these two points about the schools committee as well as the medium of instruction being provided through the mother-tongues of the children of the several communities.

The Honourable Sir MAHADEV CHAUBAL :—It was on the last day of the meeting of the select committee when we came to adopt the final report that you mentioned these points I think.

The Honourable Mr. PATHAN :—I beg your pardon, sir. It was at the second meeting; and when these points were taken up I was told that they were not pertinent and I had to keep quiet. My honourable friend, Mr. PARANJPYE will bear me out that it was at the second meeting of the select committee that I put these points before the select committee and at the third sitting of the select committee when the chairman said that all were unanimous I said "No, I have to take up these two points" and after that discussion the chairman asked what were those two points and I explained them.

As regards the vernacular I do not think there is any question about the other four vernaculars, Sindhi, Gujarathi, Marathi and Kanarese. I think my honourable friend, Sir MAHADEV CHAUBAL, wanted to omit Urdu. But Urdu is in vogue and there are Urdu schools in the mofussil districts and that is not a new vernacular. That is the medium of instruction in Mahomedan primary schools. Of course as regards the other languages it is open to Government either to recognize a vernacular for particular communities or not, but this amendment makes it possible for Government to recognize or not to recognize it.

With these words I trust that the Council will accept the amendment.

The Honourable Mr. VITHALBHAI JHAVERBHAI PATEL :—Your Excellency,—I am bound to say a few words as my name has been mentioned by the Honourable Mr. PATHAN. I remember that my honourable friend, Mr. PATHAN, did circulate some amendments at the first meeting of the select committee, but I am not prepared to say at this time what they were.

With regard to the second question mentioned by the Honourable Mr. PATHAN, so far as my recollection goes I think he made some attempt on the last day of the second meeting of the select committee to place this amendment. I do not think he was audible to all the members of the select committee and I think other members of the select committee will bear me out in this statement.

The amendment was then put to the vote and lost, 9 members voting for and 26 against it. The Council divided as follows :—

"Clause 2 (7). For the words 'appointed under section 28 of the Principal Act' substitute 'appointed under this Act.'"

Your Excellency, I beg to be permitted to speak on the present amendment and the one on clause 6 together as they bear on the same question.

PRIMARY EDUCATION BILL.

[The President; Khan Bahadur Pir Baksh; Mr. Abdul Kadir Pathan.] [3RD DECEMBER 1917.]

His Excellency the PRESIDENT:—I gather that the present amendment that the honourable member is moving is consequential on the main amendment that he moves under clause 6. Would my honourable friend be good enough to withdraw the present amendment?

The Honourable Khán Bahádur PIR BAKSH:—Your Excellency,—I am not willing to withdraw the present amendment as I wish to speak separately on both.

His Excellency the PRESIDENT:—The honourable member says that he would like to speak on item No. 11. I gather that the present amendment which he is moving is consequential on that. I would therefore suggest to him to postpone it.

The Honourable Khán Bahádur PIR BAKSH:—Then I beg to postpone my amendment.

His Excellency the PRESIDENT:—Item No. 5. Clause 2 (7). The Honourable Mr. PATHAN.

The Honourable Mr. ABDUL KADIR alias FAKIR MAHOMED walad IBRAHIM KHAN PATHAN:—Your Excellency,—I find that there is another amendment standing in the name of the Honourable Mr. BHURGRI on the same point, that is No. 12. I will speak on it and I beg leave to withdraw my amendment:—

Clause 2 (7). Add the following proviso:—

"Provided that such Committee shall have, for the purposes of this Act, a sufficient number of Mahomedans as members, co-opted wherever such co-option is necessary, subject to the limitation in section 31 of the Principal Act as regards the number of persons so appointed."

The amendment was by leave withdrawn.

His Excellency the PRESIDENT:—Item No. 6. Clause 3 (1). The Honourable Khán Bahádur PIR BAKSH.

The Honourable Khán Bahádur PIR BAKSH walad MIAN MAHMUD:—Your Excellency,—I beg leave to withdraw this amendment:—

Clause 3 (1). "Delete the words 'or of girls or of children of both sexes' and the proviso at the conclusion of the paragraph."

The amendment was by leave withdrawn.

His Excellency the PRESIDENT:—Item No. 7. Clause 4. The Honourable Mr. PATHAN.

The Honourable Mr. ABDUL KADIR alias FAKIR MAHOMED walad IBRAHIM KHAN PATHAN:—Your Excellency,—I beg leave to withdraw my amendment:—

Clause 4. Add at the end after the word "education".—

"Through the medium of the vernaculars of such principal classes or communities residing in the municipal district as are not exempted under section 15 from the operation of this Act."

The amendment was by leave withdrawn.

His Excellency the PRESIDENT:—Item No. 8. Clause 4. The Honourable Mr. C. V. MEHTA.

PRIMARY EDUCATION BILL.

[3RD DECEMBER 1917.] [Mr. Chunilal Vijbhukhandas Mehta; the President; Mr. Shridhar Balkrishna Upasani.]

The Honourable Mr. CHUNILAL VIJBHUKHANDAS MEHTA:—Your Excellency,—The amendment that stands in my name is as follows:—

Clause 4. Add the following words:—

"Provided that the Municipality shall provide or cause factories to provide schools for children employed in factories in which such children will receive instruction for not more than 3 hours on each day of attendance, the cost of such provision to be borne by the owners of the factories concerned."

My amendment is consequential on the amendment I proposed to clause 2 of the Bill. I therefore beg leave to withdraw it.

The amendment was by leave withdrawn.

His Excellency the PRESIDENT:—Item No. 9. Clause 5. The Honourable Mr. UPASANI.

The Honourable Mr. SHRIDHAR BALKRISHNA UPASANI:—Your Excellency,—The amendment which I propose to move runs as follows:—

Clause 5. "Omit the words 'two-thirds of the councillors present at the meeting and by at least' in lines 8, 9 and 10 of the clause."

What I propose is this. The section as it stands insists upon two conditions. It provides firstly that a notification shall not be issued under section 3 unless the municipality has so determined by a resolution passed at a general meeting specially called in this behalf, and unless such resolution has been supported by at least two-thirds of the councillors present at the meeting, and secondly unless the resolution is supported by at least one-half of the whole number of councillors. I propose that instead of these two conditions only one condition should be imposed, viz. that the resolution is passed by at least one-half of the whole number of councillors and that the second condition as to requiring it to be passed by also two-thirds of the councillors present at the meeting be omitted. That is, I mean that the ordinary majority, which is usually required for the passing of a resolution on any other subject, should be sufficient also for passing a resolution for the introduction of compulsory education. I urge this particularly because we have to see whether the clause as it stands will facilitate or come in the way of the passing of a resolution in favour of compulsory primary education. From what we have already heard in the course of this discussion it will be seen that several interests are concerned in the matter of compulsion and, therefore, there will be some opposition and it will not be easy to pass such a resolution if both the conditions required in the clause are retained. Therefore it is much better that we should allow the ordinary majority to be sufficient for the passing of this resolution especially as even if the resolution is so passed by an ordinary majority the whole matter is to be considered by Government in the light of all the circumstances of the case. When these are to be considered by Government I do not think that both the conditions are necessary. As I provide that the resolution should be supported by at least half of the total number of councillors, it will prevent its being passed by a snatch vote of a minority required to form a quorum. If a special meeting is called, we may well expect that the majority of the total number of the councillors will be present. Supposing there is only the quorum present at a meeting and all the members present join in passing the resolution it will not be passed unless the number required to form the quorum is at least one-half of the total number of the whole body and not only two-thirds, but all those present join in passing it. So it will not be passed in any case by a snatch vote of a minority of the whole body. If that is the case, I do not see why we should impose a further condition that two-thirds of the members present at a meeting should vote for such a resolution. With these words I move my amendment.

PRIMARY EDUCATION BILL.

[Sheikh Ghulam Hussein Hidayatallah; Sir Mahadev Chaubal; Mr. Raghunath Purshottam Paranjpye; Mr. Siddhanath Dhonddev Garud.] [3RD DECEMBER 1917.]

The Honourable SHEIKH GHULAM HUSSEIN HIDAYATALLAH:—Your Excellency,—I rise to oppose this amendment. As this bill affects the interests of the various communities, two-thirds of the number is a safeguard provided in this bill. That will clearly show that, if a resolution is carried by two-thirds of the members present of the municipality, that it has been carried by an overwhelming majority of the members present. So that it cannot be said that the majority of one community has passed that resolution. Because I know that the number of Mahomedan members in the mofussil municipalities is very small. If it is by a bare majority, any one community can carry a resolution against the wishes of another community.

The Honourable Sir MAHADEV CHAUBAL:—Does the honourable member realise that it is two-thirds of the members present?

The Honourable SHEIKH GHULAM HUSSEIN HIDAYATALLAH:—Yes.

The Honourable Mr. RAGHUNATH PURSHOTTAM PARANJPYE:—Your Excellency,—I also rise to oppose this amendment proposed by my honourable friend Mr. UPASANI, because I want that the principle of compulsion shall not be enforced in any municipality if there is a very large minority in that municipality opposing this compulsion. While on the one hand I want this provision about one-half of the total number of members to ensure that there is a very large feeling in favour of compulsion, on the other hand, if at least two-thirds of the members present vote for it, it will ensure also that the minority against this bill being applied is not of very considerable magnitude. In this bill, it must be remembered, we are going to introduce the principle of compulsion. Take, for instance, the case of Poona municipality, where there are 39 members. If the Honourable Mr. UPASANI'S amendment is carried, compulsion would be introduced if only 19 members are in favour of it, but suppose that the feeling in the city of Poona is very strong and opinion is very keenly divided and supposing at a meeting all the 39 members are present and 20 are on one side and 19 on the other,—quite a possible contingency,—I do not think that the Poona municipality should introduce compulsion, when there are 19 out of the 39 voting against the proposal. I want the strong general sense of the community in favour of compulsion, but not merely a bare majority. On the one hand, therefore, if half the total number of councillors vote for it and, on the other hand, there is the provision that two-thirds of the councillors present at the meeting should agree, it will ensure that the minority which is dead against the bill is not very strong. I therefore think that both these safeguards are necessary for the success of this bill and I strongly oppose the amendment.

The Honourable Mr. SIDDHANATH DHONDDEV GARUD:—Your Excellency,—I beg to support this amendment. There are already two safeguards provided in this case. The first is the calling of a special meeting of which everyone gets notice and if canvassing takes place it takes place before that notice and then there is also the condition that more than half shall agree.

I think that if these two conditions are satisfied then a recommendation might safely be made to Government that a notification should issue. That is the only consequence of that resolution. That resolution does not directly introduce compulsion within the municipal area. It only makes a recommendation to Government that a notification to that effect might issue. Then Government will examine the various circumstances and see whether proper provision is made and whether all the conditions are satisfied, and then they will issue that notification.

So I submit, my Lord, for the purpose of a recommendation to Government this safeguard, namely, that more than one-half shall agree is quite ample.

I, therefore, support the amendment.

PRIMARY EDUCATION BILL.

[3RD DECEMBER 1917.] [Mr. Pandurang Anant Desai; Dewán Bahádur Kashinath Ramchandra Godbole; Mr. Balkrishna Sitaram Kamat; Sir Mahadèv Bhaskar Chaubal.]

The Honourable Mr. PÀNDURANG ANANT DESAI:—Your Excellency,—I rise to oppose this amendment. As the Honourable Mr. PARANJPYE said, the element of compulsion is to be introduced only when a very strong majority of the councillors are in favour of the introduction of compulsion.

Now, if the amendment is carried it simply means that a simple majority will introduce the element of compulsion. Take the case of a municipality with 18 members. If 10 are in favour of the introduction of compulsion and if 8 are not in favour, I think it is an important minority and therefore the introduction of compulsion should not be made.

Sometimes it happens that all the members are not present at the time when a particular resolution is taken up. Suppose there are six members out of 18 present. Then it might be that four might be in favour of compulsion. But it will not be safe to abide by their opinion. Therefore there must be the second safeguard, namely, that unless more than one-half of the councillors on the roll are in favour of the resolution the resolution should not be enforced.

I therefore think that both these provisoes are necessary and that the amendment should be rejected.

The Honourable Dewán Bahádur KASHINATH RAMCHANDRA GODBOLE:—Your Excellency,—I am also opposed to the amendment that has been brought forward by the Honourable Mr. UPASANI. I think that in introducing compulsion in municipal areas we should have a very substantial majority and I am therefore going to vote for an amendment which is to be brought later on by my honourable friend Khán Bahádur PIR BAKSH on this point.

The Honourable Mr. BALKRISHNA SITARAM KAMAT:—Your Excellency,—I am against the amendment of my honourable friend Mr. UPASANI for one or two reasons and I shall illustrate them to show how this clause would work, and also how both safeguards are necessary.

If it is considered necessary to have only one safeguard, namely, that one-half of the councillors should be in favour of accepting the principle of compulsion, then, in that case, out of, say, every hundred councillors of the Board if fifty are present, and they all vote for compulsion, their will, will be binding on the whole municipality.

Now, take the other alternative as suggested by the select committee, and it will be seen that it will not conflict with Mr. UPASANI'S suggestion. If more than 50 per cent. of the councillors are present, and as the select committee insist on having two-thirds of that, if supposing 60 are present, then two-thirds of 60 is 40, which is less than what Mr. UPASANI wants. If there are 70 present, even then in that case two-thirds of 70 will be less than 50 per cent. Then also there can be no objection for Mr. UPASANI whatsoever. If 80 per cent. of the members are present, then probably by easy calculation we find that two-thirds of 80 exceeds 50 per cent, and the Honourable Mr. UPASANI may have a cause for complaint. In that case, however, it must be pointed out that the remaining one-third are an important minority and when out of 80 per cent. of the members who care to be present one-third cannot agree with the measure, then, I think, the measure ought to be rejected. These safeguards, therefore, are absolutely necessary. Barely 51 out of every 100 members have no right to fasten their will on the remaining 49, and at an adjourned meeting it is not also desirable that only two-thirds of the members present should carry the resolution. I therefore think that for the above reasons both those safeguards are absolutely necessary.

The Honourable Sir MAHADEV BHASKAR CHAUBAL:—May I, with your Excellency's permission, mention one point? This amendment comes from the Honourable Mr. UPASANI who was a member of the select committee. I think he will bear me out when I say that this particular clause was discussed, so far as my memory carries me, for about an hour and a half. The Honourable Mr. UPASANI and several other honourable members started the question and it was fully discussed, and the select committee came to a certain conclusion which has been adopted by Mr. UPASANI, as you will see from the third signature to the select committee's report. I leave it to the Council to consider whether it is right and proper that questions which have been threshed out in that way and accepted by the members of the select committee should again be started here by those very members. In that case I suppose the appointment of a select committee becomes useless.

The Honourable Mr. VITHALBHAI JHAVERBHAI PATEL:—Your Excellency,—I should like to point out that when the bill was originally drafted by me it was provided that two-thirds of the total number of members present should be considered sufficient for a resolution to be binding. The select committee did not agree with me and after carefully considering all the pros and cons of the question, and after a good deal of discussion, as my honourable friend Sir MAHADEV CHAUBAL said for an hour and a half, we unanimously came to the conclusion that both the safeguards are necessary, namely, not only that there should be two-thirds of the total number of councillors voting for the resolution present, but that the number so voting should not be less than half of the total number of councillors on the board. Under these circumstances, I hope my honourable friend Mr. UPASANI will withdraw his amendment.

The Honourable Mr. SHRIDHAR BALKRISHNA UPASANI:—Your Excellency,—As to what happened at the select committee it will not, I think, serve the purpose of argument, but it is admitted that the matter was discussed for a long time, i. e., 1½ hours, and that will show that there was strong difference of opinion on this point. The original proposal was that a majority of two-thirds of the members present should be sufficient to pass a resolution, but then it was objected to on the ground that supposing out of the total number only one-fourth were present and that number was sufficient to form the quorum, and then if we had two-thirds of that number it would be less than even one-fourth and that would not be sufficient. My own amendment is that a vote of not less than half the total number of councillors should be required to pass any resolution on this subject. As to my signing the report, I do not think it estops me from moving my amendment. We had only one day to send our minute of dissent and we were given to understand that even if we did not send any minute of dissent it was open to us to send our amendments on the points on which we differed. Under the circumstances I do not think I went out of my way in moving my amendment on this point particularly as in the discussion in the select committee I did not side with the majority on the point. As to the arguments of my honourable friend Mr. KAMAT, he said that we could not carry a proposition even if two-thirds of the members present voted for it. He does not, I am afraid, realise that two-thirds of the members present would not in all cases amount to more than one-half. Supposing that the whole body is not present, then two-thirds of those present would not always come to one-half, sometimes it would be more and sometimes less than one-half. Even in the case put by the Honourable Mr. PARANJPYE the passing of a resolution will be defeated not by the vote of the majority of the whole body, but by a minority, and a very small minority, and in the face of a substantial majority in favour of the resolution the opposition of that minority should be allowed to prevent the resolution from being taken to Government for consideration. It is for Government to consider the strength of the minority opposing the resolution and it is open to the public to send its representation if it does not approve of the resolution passed by the majority of the entire body. And, even if no representation be submitted, it would be open to Government itself to consult public opinion before sanctioning compulsion. Under these circumstances the chances of this resolution being carried will be facitated and the spread of primary education will be helped more by adopting my amendment than by allowing the clause to stand as it is. With these words I beg to commend my amendment to the Council.

The amendment was then put to the vote and lost.

His Excellency the PRESIDENT:—Item No. 10. Amendment to clause 5. The Honourable KHAN BAHADUR PIR BAKSH.

The Honourable Khán Bahádur PIR BAKSH WALAD MIAN MAHMUD:—Your Excellency,—I beg to move the following amendment:—

Delete the words "supported by at least two-thirds of the councillors present at the meeting and by at least one-half of the whole number of councillors" and substitute the following:—

"Supported by at least two-thirds of the whole number of councillors on the Board."

In connection with this I want to say that if this clause is allowed to stand as drafted, it means that 15 out of 30 councillors can decide the fate of half a million, if not more of population, which is most undesirable and detrimental to the interests of the masses of the people. This question of compulsory education is so important that any proposal concerning it should be discussed thoroughly, and accepted by at least two-thirds of the board if not by a full board.

The Honourable Mr. RAGHUNATH PURSHOTTAM PARANJPYE:—Your Excellency,—I rise to oppose this amendment also, because while I do want that there ought to be respectable majority of the whole body of the municipality to start the measure and also while the interests of strong minorities ought to be respected, I do not think that we ought to pass an amendment which will have a practically stultifying effect. If there is a very considerable minority of the body who are really opposed to it and honestly come forward and say that they are opposed to it, that will have the same effect as the amendment proposed. Because if there are more than one-third of the people who are definitely and truly opposed to the introduction of the measure they ought to come forward and say so. What I want is that simply more than one-third of the people sitting quiet at home and not wishing to be present at the meeting ought not to be allowed merely by their silence to stop such a measure being carried. Take again the case of the Poona Municipality. If 14 people of the Poona Municipality are definitely opposed to the principle of compulsion, the principle of compulsion should not be introduced, but on the other hand if 13 or 14 people want to stay away from the meeting and do not wish to take the unpopularity possibly owing to the need for increased taxation and so on, I do not want that these 13 people should tyrannise over the majority of the whole body. If they want to oppose it they ought to say that they oppose it in the general body. Therefore if there is real opposition it will be made vocal and that opposition will have all the weight and influence that it should have; but simple silence or absence ought not to have the force the amendment proposed by the Honourable Khán Bahádur PIR BAKSH will give it. Therefore, I am opposed to this amendment.

The Honourable Dewán Bahádur KASHINATH RAMCHANDRA GODBOLE:—Your Excellency,—As I said before, I am in favour of the amendment that has been brought forward by the Honourable Khán Bahádur PIR BAKSH. The proposition of introducing compulsory education ought, I think, to be supported by the whole of the municipality and my honourable friend is asking that it should be supported by two-thirds of the total number of councillors. I think this is a reasonable proposition. He is asking that the introduction of compulsory education should be supported by two-thirds of the total number of councillors. I would have gone a little bit further and would have said that it should be supported by at least three-fourths of the total number of councillors on the board. The proposition is so important, as it involves the municipalities in serious financial burdens and concerns all classes of the municipal population, that I think that it should be supported by a substantial majority of the municipality. The two-thirds limit that has been proposed by the Honourable Khán Bahádur PIR BAKSH seems to me to be very reasonable and I therefore support it.

The Honourable MR. C. N. SEDDON:—Your Excellency,—I should like to oppose the amendment brought forward by the honourable member. As the Honourable Sir MAHADEV said, the matter was discussed at full length in the meeting of the select committee and we came to the conclusion that by the provisions as they now appear we get the happy mean. We provide that the matter should not be carried by a snatch vote, or by a very small majority, and at the same time we do not make it impossible to bring into operation this principle of compulsory education. I was somewhat inclined at first to think that we might perhaps have agreed with the mover of the amendment and made it two-thirds, but I am bound to say that the views brought forward by the Honourable Mr. PARANJPYE have stilled my doubts and confirmed me in my original opinion. I think it is necessary that, if members of municipalities wish to prevent such a desirable consummation as the introduction of compulsory education, they should be brave enough to come forward and vote in the municipality against the measure. They should not be allowed to prevent its adoption by merely stopping at home. I hope, therefore, that this Council will accept the amendments in the bill as they now stand as a very fair and suitable standard, and I shall vote against the amendment moved by the Honourable Khán Bahádur PIR BAKSH.

The Honourable Mr. VITHALBHAI JHAVERBHAI PATEL:—Your Excellency,—The amendment of my honourable friend Khán Bahádur PIR BAKSH is really too backward a step, just as the preceding one of my honourable friend Mr. UPASANI was too forward a step. As my honourable friend Mr. SEDDON just now remarked, the select committee came to a golden mean and I think the report of the select committee ought to be supported. Those who really realise what the constitution of our district municipalities at present is will have no doubt that it is absolutely necessary that the proposed amendment should not be accepted. Out of 157 municipalities in the Presidency nearly as many as 100 have a constitution of half elected and half nominated members. If the representatives of the people who are elected on a particular municipality choose to oppose the compulsory education measure or, for the matter of that, the nominated members make a common cause, it will be absolutely easy for them to defeat the object of this measure. Under these circumstances, the requirement of two-thirds majority of the total number of councillors will make the present measure almost a dead letter in most of the district municipalities. I therefore trust that the Council will reject this amendment.

The amendment was then put to the vote and lost.

(His Excellency the PRESIDENT at this stage withdrew and the VICE-PRESIDENT, the Hon. Sir M. B. CHAUBAL, occupied the chair.)

The Honourable the VICE-PRESIDENT:—Item No. 11. Amendment to clause 6. The Honourable Khán Bahádur PIR BAKSH.

The Honourable Khán Bahádur PIR BAKSH walad MIAN MAHMUD:—Sir,—My amendment runs as follows:—

For the words "if a school committee has not already been appointed, appoint such committee (to end)", substitute the words "appoint two committees, one of Hindu gentlemen and the other of Muhammadan gentlemen, and it shall be the duty of such committees, subject to the provisions of this act, to enforce the provisions of the same, respecting the attendance at school, respectively, of Hindu and Muhammadan boys and their employment."

As my honourable friend Mr. BHURGRI has a similar amendment, item No. 12, which he is going to place before this Council for consideration, I would like to withdraw my amendment.

The amendment was by leave withdrawn.

The Honourable the VICE-PRESIDENT:—Item No. 12. Amendment to clause 6. The Honourable Mr. BHURGRI.

The Honourable Mr. GHULAM MUHAMMAD walad Khán Bahádur WALI MUHAMMAD BHURGRI:—Sir,—Before I proceed with my amendment I would ask you to kindly allow me to make some alteration in my amendment. I think the amendment which stands in my name at present may not be acceptable to many members and if my alteration is approved it might be acceptable to many members of the Council.

My altered amendment would read as follows:—

"Provided that such committee, whether appointed under this section or already appointed under section 28 of the principal act, shall have power to co-opt members and to appoint sub-committees and to delegate powers to such sub-committees in accordance with the rules which may be framed under section 18 of the Act."

The Honourable the VICE-PRESIDENT:—I have carefully looked into the way in which the honourable member's amendment will stand after his correction and I find that it so materially changes the original amendment, of which he had given notice, that I do not think that I can permit it to be moved without there having been previous notice as required by clause 4 of rule 35 of the rules of Council business.

The Honourable Mr. BHURGRI:—Then, sir, I am entitled to move my original motion.

The Honourable the VICE-PRESIDENT:—Yes, of course.

The Honourable Mr. BHURGRI:—The amendment which I wish to move runs as follows:—

Insert at the end the words "provided that such committee, whether appointed under this section or already appointed under section 28 of the principal act, shall, on the issue of the notification hereinbefore referred to, be so constituted as to be representative of the Mahomedan community in proportion to the strength of that community on the Municipal Corporation."

Sir, my reason when I gave notice of this amendment was that I knew the feelings of the Mahomedan community in my part of the country. There was another reason for suggesting this amendment, and it was this, that to make this bill of compulsory education successful it is imperative that certain members of the Mahomedan community ought to be on the school committee, because they will be able to know all about the difficulties in the way of Mahomedans in their part of the country. Therefore, it is absolutely necessary that some provision of this nature should be put in. From the speeches which have been made by various Mahomedan honourable members to-day I find that this is the feeling which is uppermost in their minds. That shows how strong the feeling of my community is on this matter. If you had allowed me to move my amendment with the modification that I proposed I would have been pleased, but, as it has not been done, I am forced to fall back upon my amendment as it originally stood. I therefore move the amendment and, as every one of us here is anxious that this bill should be a success, we ought to see that a certain number of Mahomedans is present no the committee. If it is a committee of only Hindus or a committee of non-Mahomedans, some Mahomedans might put it, whether rightly or wrongly I do not say, that their views would be representative of that community only. So in order to ensure that their views will be respected, we must see that there is no doubt in the minds of the Mussalmans that any unfair treatment is accorded to them. I think, sir, if we are all trying to make this experiment a success, we should not overlook this important point. Therefore I trust that this Council will accept my amendment.

The Honourable SHEIKH GHULAM HUSSEIN HIDAYATALLAH :—Sir,—I rise to support the amendment of my honourable friend Mr. BHURGRI. The principle of compulsion in the domain of education in this part of the country will be a sudden change, and I think it is the duty of every one of us to see that this change is as little felt by the people as possible. Therefore, it is necessary for us to resort to moral persuasion, and moral persuasion could only be done by the leaders of the particular communities. It is, therefore, very necessary that on these school committees, which have to discharge very important functions and which are invested with large and important powers, there should be representatives of the important communities, and here I find in the Presidency proper two important communities, the Hindus and the Mahomedans. As has been rightly pointed out my honourable friend, if there are no Mussulmans on the school committee, their action would be misjudged by that community. Therefore, it is very necessary that there ought to be some Mahomedans on the municipal school committee.

The Honourable Mr. EBRAHIM HAROON JAFFER :—Sir,—The amendment moved by my honourable friend Mr. BHURGRI lays down a proviso that is rendered essential by the peculiar position the Mahomedan community occupies in municipal districts. The educational needs as well as the number of Mahomedans require that they should be well represented on the school committees, which will have to deal with important matters connected with education. The number of Mahomedan councillors on municipal boards is seldom proportionate to the Mahomedan population in the municipal areas, and the elected Mahomedan members are rare. Hence it is only fair that provision should be made for Mahomedan members on the school committees. I think this is a reasonable proposal and I give it my cordial support.

(His Excellency the PRESIDENT at this stage returned and resumed the chair.)

The Honourable Sir MAHADEV BHASKAR CHAUBAL :—Your Excellency,—In respect of the amendment which has been moved by the Honourable Mr. BHURGRI honourable members will kindly turn to the main act for a few moments and see what the main act is to which the present bill is stated to be supplementary. I think you have noticed already that in sub-clause (3) of the first clause of this bill it is said that this act shall be construed as part of and supplementary to the Bombay District Municipal Act, 1901. That being so, if you turn to the main act you find there certain provisions under which the municipality has got the power of appointing committees for certain purposes. Let me first clear the ground by saying that I am not in the slightest degree opposed to the desire and anxiety of the honourable Mahomedan members of this Council to their having a voice on the schools committees. On the contrary my desire is that they should have that voice not only on the schools committees, but upon any committees which may be appointed by the municipality. But they should note this, that any improvement which they desire to be brought about in the main act they should not try to get indirectly through the present act. I really cannot understand what prevents honourable Mahomedan members from saying that they must have their part in all municipal activities whether they be for education or for sanitation or for other purposes. There may be, for instance, a sanitary committee appointed. Why should the Mahomedan members lay so much stress upon education and neglect sanitation? They do not get by the present amendment any representation on the sanitary committees or on any other committees that may be appointed; but what they do is this: they insult the schools committees which are appointed by the whole responsible body of the municipality. Here is a municipality appointing a school committee under section 28 of the main act. As you will see, under that section "the municipality may appoint, subject to such limitations as are prescribed by the rules for the time being in force under section 46 and subject also to the proviso contained in section 58 a committee consisting of such councillors as they think fit, for managing all or any primary or other schools vested in or maintained by the municipality, or for conducting the business of the municipality in respect of any educational institutions aided by the municipality." That is the provision which obtains in the main act to which this is to be read as a supplementary act, and I certainly cannot understand why if there is an honest effort made for having Mahomedan representation in municipal administration, it should not extend the whole way along and why they should not insist upon that representation for whatever purpose of municipal administration a committee is appointed. But to put this in the present compulsory education bill and try to get representation on the schools committees under this act is, I think, a very wrong procedure.

I have perfect sympathy with the desire of my Mahomedan friends that they should have representation for themselves not only on the schools committees but also on other committees. But let them get that representation by moving for an amendment, if they want, of the main act, and not by a subsidiary act intended for one object only. Even if you put in this amendment, you cannot change the main act. It cannot override the provisions of the main act. Section 28 throws on the municipality the responsibility of appointing out of its members four to seven men, best suited to take care of educational interests within the municipal area.

There is another provision which I wish you to take note of before you consider the merits or demerits of the present amendment. You find in the main section 28-a reference to section 58, where it is said: "The municipality may appoint, subject to such limitations as are prescribed by the rules for the time being in force under section 46 and subject also to the proviso contained in section 58 . . ." Let us turn to section 58 and see what the proviso is. The section says: "The management, control and administration of every public institution exclusively maintained out of municipal property and funds shall vest in the municipality by which it is maintained." The proviso says: "Provided that the extent of the independent authority of any municipality in respect of public education and their relations with the Government Educational Department shall from time to time be prescribed by the Governor in Council." Now is it solemnly proposed that notwithstanding the section of the principal act which provides that any appointment of the school committee which is made under the main act should be subject to this proviso of section 58 and to any rules that may be framed under section 46, notwithstanding that, we should by way of amendment in this ancillary and supplementary bill get the representation which the Mahomedan members want? Let it be perfectly clear to my honourable friends that I am not in the slightest degree opposed to the representation and adequate representation of Mahomedans on all kinds of municipal administration. But I hope and pray that they will not try to get it on a side issue as it were, by taking advantage of the present proposals for compulsory education, when their proper remedy is to move for an amendment, if they want it, of the main act and not to get it in this indirect method.

PRIMARY EDUCATION BILL.

Mr. Vithalbhai Jhaverbhai Patel; Sir Mahadev Bhaskar Chaubal; Mr. Ghulam Muhammad Bhurgri.] [3RD DECEMBER 1917.]

The Honourable Mr. VITHALBAAI JHAVERBHAI PATEL: —May it please your Excellency,—I do not wish to say anything about the merits of the present amendment. I must say, speaking for myself, that this is really carrying sectarian interests too far. Separate representation on committees, to my mind, is carrying sectarian interests too far. If there was anything to be gained by this amendment, I should have been very pleased to support it. Further, the amendment, as it stands, to my mind, even if this council were inclined to accept it, contradicts other provisions of the bill. The amendment says: " Provided that such committee, whether appointed under this section or already appointed under section 28 of the principal act, shall, on the issue of the notification hereinbefore referred to, be so constituted as to be representative of the Mahomedan community in proportion to the strength of that community on the municipal corporation." Surely, no committee is to be appointed under this section. All the school committees are to be appointed under the principal act and not under any clause of this bill. We have already passed the clause to the effect that the committee shall be appointed under the principal act.

The Honourable Sir MAHADEV CHAUBAL:—If there is none to be appointed under the principal act, one shall have to be appointed under this Bill.

The Honourable Mr. PATEL:—The principal act says that the municipality may appoint a school committee. If none is appointed, then this bill says under the principal act the committee shall be appointed. No committee is surely to be appointed under the provisions of this bill.

The second difficulty is this. The Honourable Mr. BHURGRI desires that the representation of the Mahomedans should be in proportion to the strength of that community on a particular board. Suppose there are 16 members on a municipality and there is one Mahomedan member on it. According to the honourable member's amendment, one-sixteenth of the total number of schools committee should be Mahomedans. There are ordinarily four or five members on a schools committee. Now one-sixteenth of that number would be what? How are we going to work the amendment in actual practice?

The third objection that I take is in regard to the words " municipal corporation". I have read something of the municipal act, but I have never read or heard a " district municipality " described as a municipal corporation. The words " municipal corporation " apply only to the Bombay Corporation and not to the mofussil municipalities. The word should be " municipality". I am surprised how my honourable friend Mr. BHURGRI should have made that mistake. On these grounds, therefore, I think the amendment should not be accepted.

The Honourable Mr. GHULAM MUHAMMAD walad Khán Bahádur WALI MUHAMMAD BHURGRI:—Your Excellency,—It gave me great pain to hear the remarks of the Honourable Mr. PATEL. He says that I am trying to carry sectarian principles too far. Surely my honourable friend Mr. PATEL knows that I would be the last man to push things to any extent in that direction. If this bill of the Honourable Mr. PATEL is to be successful, then it is absolutely necessary that there should be a certain number of Mahomedans on the school committee. The Honourable Sir MAHADEV CHAUBAL said: " Oh, you don't want representation for sanitation and other purposes, but you want it for education only." I would tell him that the school committee is going to have powers to bring people to trial, etc., and therefore we ask for representation on it. My honourable friend Sir MAHADEV CHAUBAL and the Honourable Mr. PATEL realise that the committee which will be appointed under this bill will have powers of a magisterial character, such as bringing people up for trial. As the Mahomedans will have to send their children to school, in a place like Sind with a vast Maho-medan population, it is doubtful whether it will work satisfactorily without Mahomedan members on the committee. I said in my speech and I made it quite clear that I was not in favour of separate class representation. But I honestly feel that the presence of Mahomedan members on this committee will certainly help and will lead to the success of the bill and give us the representation which all of us want.

Then my honourable friend Mr. PATEL took shelter under technicalities. He pointed out that there are words here "municipal corporation". Surely, where there is a will there is a way. If my honourable friend was willing to accept my amendment, he could do so.

My honourable friend Sir MAHADEV CHAUBAL told me: "There is a way for you; you may bring in an amendment of the main act, namely, the municipal act." But does he assure me that if I bring in an amendment of that character he will accept it on behalf of Government?

These are all the observations which I desire to make just to show that the committee as at present constituted could not work satisfactorily. Therefore, sir, I am constrained to press my amendment.

The amendment was then put to the vote and lost, twelve members voting for and twenty-six against it. The Council divided as follows :—

The Honourable Mr. Purshotamdas Thakurdas.
The Honourable Mr. Shridhar Balkrishna Upasani.

His Excellency the PRESIDENT:—Item 4. Amendment to clause 2 (7). The Honourable Khán Bahádur PIR BAKSH.

The Honourable Khán Bahádur PIR BAKSH walad MIAN MAHMUD:—Your Excellency,—I suggest this amendment because there is no provision which enables us to solve the difficulty. This amendment is necessitated by the fact that the principal act does not authorize the municipal board to appoint more than one committee or to include therein persons who are not municipal commissioners, and therefore I suggest the appointment of two committees in my amendment, item No. 11.

His Excellency the PRESIDENT:—What amendment is the honourable member speaking on now?

The Honourable Khán Bahádur PIR BAKSH:—I am speaking on item No. 11, amendment to clause 6, your Excellency.

The Honourable Sir MAHADEV CHAUBAL:—I think the amendment under item No. 11 was by leave withdrawn.

The Honourable Khán Bahádur PIR BAKSH:—I said that in case the Honourable Mr. BHURGRI'S amendment is carried I would agree to withdraw it.

His Excellency the PRESIDENT:—From what I gather I understand that the honourable member withdrew his amendment under item 11 in favour of the Honourable Mr. BHURGRI'S amendment. He cannot move it now if he withdrew it.

The Honourable Khán Bahádur PIR BAKSH:—I said that if the Honourable Mr. BHURGRI'S amendment is accepted I would like to withdraw this, not otherwise. It was conditional.

The Honourable Sir MAHADEV CHAUBAL:—I think my honourable friend Mr. PIR BAKSH would bear me out at least in this, that I stood up when I was temporarily in the chair and declared that the amendment was by leave withdrawn. I declared that to the Council and the Honourable Khán Bahádur PIR BAKSH did not say anything about misunderstanding or anything of the kind. Well, now he allows my honourable friend Mr. BHURGRI'S amendment to go on for half an hour, and after that is defeated, is it fair that he should get up and dispute the decision?

The Honourable Khán Bahádur PIR BAKSH:—I have great respect for the Honourable Sir MAHADEV CHAUBAL, but I am sorry I have been misunderstood.

His Excellency the PRESIDENT:—Order, order. I must say to the honourable member that the record in the minutes of the Council show that the honourable member withdrew his amendment.

PRIMARY EDUCATION BILL.

[3RD DECEMBER 1917.] [Khán Bahádur Pir Baksh; the President; Mr. Siddhanath Dhonddev Garud; Mr. Vithalbhai Jhaverbhai Patel.]

The Honourable Khán Bahádur PIR BAKSH :—I bow to your Excellency's ruling, but I am very sorry that my amendment has not been allowed to be moved.

His Excellency the PRESIDENT :—Does the honourable member withdraw his amendment, item No. 4, which is consequential on this amendment, item 11 ?

The Honourable Khán Bahádur PIR BAKSH :—Can I speak on this now ?

His Excellency the PRESIDENT :—No. The honourable member cannot, as he has withdrawn No. 11.

Amendment was by leave withdrawn.

Clauses 2 to 6 were then put to the vote and carried.

His Excellency the PRESIDENT :—Item No. 13. Clause 7. The Honourable Khán Bahádur PIR BAKSH.

The Honourable Khán Bahádur PIR BAKSH walad MIAN MAHMUD :—Your Excellency,—The amendment that stands in my name reads as follows :—

Clause 7. A proviso to be added to this clause as under :—

"Provided that this clause will not apply to the parent, if the latter is a Parda-Nashin lady or a woman belonging to a tribe which originally resided at places beyond Bombay Presidency."

Your Excellency, this amendment provides that if the parent of a child be a Parda-Nashin lady, she will not be liable to action. The bill as it is now worded will give rise to resentment among Parda-Nashin families. It will be quite impossible, and in some measure undesirable and most objectionable, to serve a Parda-Nashin lady with any writ or summons to appear in public and reply on behalf of her child. No Parda-Nashin lady will submit to such treatment and discontent will run high in the family and in the community. There will be only a limited number of such Parda-Nashin ladies, or the females of other tribes, but there is no reason why they should not have protection at the hands of Government.

The second part of the amendment refers to an exception being made in the case of tribes not originally belonging to the Presidency proper. By this I allude to tribes of borders and frontiers such as Beluch, Bugtis, Sayads, Makranis, etc., who settle for short periods or permanently within municipal limits but whose natural professions are in no way connected with the public at large or with educational professions. Their sentiments and motives remain unchanged in spite of the fact that they stay in towns and no real gain is to be obtained by bringing this class of people under the sphere of compulsory education. With these words I hope that my amendment will be accepted.

The Honourable Mr. SIDDHANATH DHONDDEV GARUD :—Your Excellency,—I beg to oppose this amendment. In the case of a Parda-Nashin lady, where she has to appear before a magistrate, she will not be compelled to appear in person, but will be permitted to appear by pleader, because this will not be a warrant case but a summons case. Under these circumstances I think that there will be no hardship to a Parda-Nashin lady even if a summons is issued against her. She will be saved the trouble of appearing in person as she can get herself exempted under the Criminal Procedure Code.

The Honourable Mr. VITHALBHAI JHAVERBHAI PATEL :—Your Excellency,—I rise to oppose this amendment. The amendment is intended to exempt from the operation of the act parents who are Parda-Nashin ladies or women belonging to a tribe which originally resided at places beyond Bombay Presidency.

At one time, they say, all of us resided beyond the Bombay Presidency. It is very difficult to accept the honourable member's amendment as it stands. So far as the Presidency proper is concerned, I know of no tribe which is entitled to exemption under the proposed amendment. I think after the explanation given by my honourable friend Mr. GARUD in regard to the rare cases of Parda-Nashin ladies, the honourable mover of the amendment will see that there is no need of the proviso he wishes to add to this clause. After all there will be only very few cases, if at all, of this kind, and I cannot understand what particular tribes the honourable mover refers to. Perhaps it would have been better if he had described in his speech what tribes he meant.

I therefore trust that this Council will reject this amendment.

The amendment was then put to the vote and lost.

His Excellency the PRESIDENT:—I think perhaps it will be to the convenience of the Council if we adjourn till 11-30 to-morrow.

The Council then adjourned till 11-30 a.m. on Tuesday, the 4th December 1917

His Excellency the PRESIDENT:—Order, order. Further discussion on clauses of the bill to provide for the extension of primary education in municipal districts in the Bombay Presidency other than the City of Bombay. Item No. 14, clause 8 (c).

Clause 8 (c).—Substitute the words "half a" in place of the word "one".

The Honourable Dewán Bahádur KASHINATH RAMCHANDRA GODBOLE:—Your Excellency,—The amendment of which I have given notice relates to clause 8 which deals with parents' excuses for not sending a child to a school recognized by a municipality. Sub-clause (c) of that clause states that if a municipal school is not within one mile of the residence of the child, the distance will be taken as sufficient excuse for not sending the child to school. It is expected that a child which is residing within one mile of a municipal school will attend that school. In the case of the children of poor parents this means that the child will have to walk to the school for a distance of one mile, if that is the distance of the school from the child's residence. In some municipal areas schools meet twice, morning and evening, and in others only once, in the afternoon. In the case of schools that meet twice the child whose residence happens to be at a distance of one mile from the municipal school will have to walk one mile to the school in the morning and go back home, and come and go back again in the evening, which means a total walk of four miles in the day.

Now I put it to the Council whether in the case of a child that is six or seven years of age, it will be reasonable to ask it to walk a distance of four miles. I think this will almost be an impossible feat. A child would take half an hour to walk one mile. So in the course of the day the child will have to spend two hours in walking to and from the school, which will mean a great hardship.

In the case of schools which meet once in the day in the afternoon, the child will have to walk in the sun for a distance of one mile and come back the same distance afterwards. I think this also will be a hardship. Moreover, in the case of small children, their mothers and guardians have very often to accompany the child to the school, otherwise the child cannot be induced to go to school. In such cases, not only will the child have to walk four or two miles, but also the mother or guardian of the child will have to do the same. I think, therefore, that the limit prescribed in this sub-clause should be reduced from one mile to half a mile.

This reduction will not place any serious financial burden on municipalities, because generally there are a number of schools in every municipal area and they are usually less than half a mile apart. The change which I advocate in my amendment will relate to a few children only that reside at long distances from municipal schools, and in the case of such children, I submit, that the Council should allow their parents the option of not sending their children to school, unless the municipality provides a school nearer to their homes. I might tell the Council that I have been consulting school masters on this subject. I have also been consulting deputy inspectors and other officers that have had to deal with the educational department and with the management of schools. These gentlemen are of the same opinion as myself, namely, that this distance clause of one mile will be a hardship in the case of the smaller children of 6, 7 and 8 years of age. In the case of the elderly children it will be workable. It is in the interest of the smaller children, I submit, that the distance ought to be reduced from one mile to half a mile.

The Honourable Mr. RAGHUNATH PURSHOTTAM PARANJPYE:—Your Excellency,—I beg to oppose the amendment of the Honourable Dewán Bahádur GODBOLE. I think the Honourable Dewán Bahádur's recollection of his own childhood is rather distant now. But I think you will find that the energy of children so far as walking is concerned is considerably more than he apparently thinks. If I might give the Council a little of the experience of my own childhood, I might say that I was born and used to live in my early days in a village in which there was no school and every day I had to walk to the neighbouring village once in the morning, return from the school and then walk the same distance in the afternoon; so that I had to do that journey four times, and that village was more than one mile distant from my own village. And it is not only in my single case that it was so, but about 20 children from my own village used to walk every day twice to that school. I do not know whether the children of these days are so degenerate in their physical capacity as not to be able to walk that distance. After all, we are only legislating for cities and towns, and generally it will happen that there will be a school within half a mile of every house. I might point out even the experience of Poona. Your Excellency knows that in the village of Aundh there are a number of young children who walk every day to Poona and back. Children living in Kirkee also come to Poona to attend school and walk the distance. So that it is not a very great hardship for a few children to be made to walk a distance of one mile. If any difficulty is found, what will happen is that most of the municipalities if they cannot provide sufficiently numerous schools will have school hours once only, so that the children will have to go to school only once and not twice. So also the difficulty pointed out by the Honourable Dewán Bahádur GODBOLE about guardians having to accompany their children to school is more imaginary than real. I think a healthy child wants to go to school rather than sit at home. The difficulty is rather for the parents to keep the children away from school than send them to school. I think boys will generally like to go to school, particularly to a school where they can get more enjoyment than they get at home. I think therefore that the amendment should not be accepted.

The Honourable Mr. MUNMOHUNDASS RAMJI :—Your Excellency,—I rise to support the amendment of the Honourable Dewán Bahádur GODBOLE. There is a very great deal of force in the argument that he has advanced about the distance that a child is expected to walk for attending school every day. Besides that, a child after it attains the age of six years has to attend school under this bill. Supposing the bill applies to a city like Poona or Ahmedabad where a child will have to go to school as soon as it is six years of age, I doubt whether that child may be left alone to walk a mile in the streets in order to attend school unprotected. Of course, it is a different case with rich people who can send a servant, or some family member may accompany the child to school. What are all those people who have to work from early morning and return home late in the evening to do? What becomes of that child of seven years when it has to walk in a city like Ahmedabad, Surat or Poona a mile's distance unprotected? In order to work this clause satisfactorily, I think every school will have to provide some means of taking the school-going children from their homes to the school and return them safely in the evening. Either that provision has to be made or the distances have to be curtailed, and with a view to avoid any hardship I think the provision of half a mile in the beginning is quite sufficient.

The Honourable Mr. VITHALBHAI JHAVERBHAI PATEL :—May it please your Excellency,—I rise to oppose the amendment moved by my friend the Honourable Dewán Bahádur GODBOLE. Yesterday we heard some members say that the physique of children was such that they could stand the strain of six hours' factory work and attendance at school also for four hours. Today we hear the other side of it, that a child cannot go to school and return, if the school be a mile away from the house, otherwise than in a condition of exhaustion. Speaking for myself, I say that it would do more good to the health and the physique of a child by making it compulsory for it to walk one mile to school and back the same distance.

But there are other considerations why this amendment should be rejected. The main reason is that of finance. We have heard it said that municipalities will not be in a position to take advantage of this act in view of their financial circumstances. Well, if you lay down that the municipality shall provide schools within a distance of half a mile from the residence of every child, that will entail additional burden in the case of some municipalities. There is also another consideration. We have the Town Planning Act in operation in some of the municipalities, and in those areas certain plots are definitely assigned to schools. It may be desirable in the interest of general sanitation to locate the schools in a particular place. But if this amendment were carried it would certainly interfere with the operation of the Town Planning Act by having to locate schools in places other than those shown in the scheme.

With these words I oppose the amendment.

PRIMARY EDUCATION BILL.

[4TH DECEMBER 1917.] [Dewán Bahádur Kashinath Ramchandra Godbole; Mr. Raghunath Purshottam Paranjpye.]

The Honourable Dewán Bahádur KASHINATH RAMCHANDRA GODBOLE:—Your Excellency,—I find that my amendment has been opposed by the Honourable Mr. PARANJPYE and the Honourable Mr. PATEL. The Honourable Mr. PATEL says that it will do good to a child if it is made to walk four miles a day. I would ask the Honourable Mr. PATEL to wait until he gets a child or grand-child of six years of age. The question is nearer home to me, because I have a grandson who has to be sent to school. The question is whether in the case of a child in the sixth year of his age a walk of four miles a day will do him good. The case is quite different in the case of grown-up children like the Aundh children. I know these Aundh children; their ages vary between 9 and 11. I am referring to children of six and seven years of age, and I think in the case of these children it would be a great hardship if they are made to walk four miles a day. I should like to know when the Honourable Mr. PARANJPYE commenced his walking of four miles.

The Honourable Mr. PARANJPYE:—I said I used to walk not less than six miles.

The Honourable Dewán Bahádur GODBOLE:—Then the Honourable Mr. PARANJPYE must have been a child of an exceptionally virile type.

I have nothing to add except to emphasise the remark that was made by the Honourable Mr. MUNMOHUNDASS RAMJI, that a long walk in a crowded city like Ahmedabad or Poona is a trial to which I would not expose a child of six years of age. I would therefore ask the Council to accept the amendment that I have proposed.

The amendment was then put to the vote and lost, 16 voting for it and 22 against it. The Council divided as follows:—

Clause 7 was then put to the vote and carried.

His Excellency the PRESIDENT:—Item No. 15. Amendment to clause 8. The Honourable Mr. PATHAN.

The Honourable Mr. ABDUL KÁDIR alias FAKIR MAHOMED walad IBRAHIM KHAN PATHAN:—Your Excellency,—The amendment that stands in my name is as follows:—

Clause 8. Insert the following new sub-clause as sub-clause (d):—

"(d) where there is no school, within the distance mentioned in sub-clause (c), teaching the mother-tongue of the child and the parent declares that he objects to his child getting education in any other tongue."

Your Excellency, with regard to this amendment, there may be many parents who do not want to send their children to school and who may take shelter under this sub-clause. I therefore beg leave to withdraw it.

The amendment was by leave withdrawn.

Clause 8 was put to the vote and carried.

His Excellency the PRESIDENT:—Item No. 16. Amendment to clause 9. The Honourable Dewán Bahádur GODBOLE.

The Honourable Dewán Bahádur KASHINATH RAMCHANDRA GODBOLE:—Your Excellency,—Clause 9 relates to the issue of an attendance order. The clause provides that the attendance order should be issued by the school committee after enquiries in the case of defaulting parents, and that they should issue the order after these enquiries, fixing the date for the attendance of the child. I am referring to the wording of the clause as it stands. The school committee is at liberty, in issuing the order of attendance, to fix the date for the attendance of the child on the next day after the date of the order. What I submit to the Council is, that after the issue of the order there should be sufficient time to enable the parents and guardians to make the necessary preparation for sending the child to school. In the case of poor parents and guardians it will be necessary to spend some money in equipping the child before it goes to school. In the first place, if the child has heen engaged in any small vocation the parents will have to make arrangements for relieving it. In the second place, they will have to clothe the child decently, and in the third place they will have to provide the child with school requisites, such as books, slates and so on. I therefore think that an interval of ten days should intervene between the issue of the order and the day fixed for the attendance of the child. It should not be within the power of the school committee to say to the parent "Send the child to school from tomorrow". With this object in view I have brought forward my amendment and I hope the Council will accept it.

PRIMARY EDUCATION BILL.

[4TH DECEMBER 1917.]

[Mr. Vithalbhai Jhaverbhai Patel; Dewán Bahádur Kashinath Ramchandra Godbole; the President; Khán Bahádur Pir Baksh.]

The Honourable Mr. VITHALBHAI JHAVERBHAI PATEL:—Your Excellency,—In the clause as it stands power is given to the school committee to determine and to settle after asking each parent in each individual case when the child should attend the school, whether from the next day or whether after a month or any other period. In each case the school committee will settle the length of time on the merits of the representation made to them. It may be that in a particular case they think it desirable that an obstinate parent, although he has got all the means at his command, does not care to send the child to school, and then the school committee will be justified in saying "Send your child from to-morrow or the day after". Why should ten days be allowed unnecessarily in such a case? There may be cases in which the parent is too poor, or the child is ill and it may not be desirable to ask the child to attend for a month. In that case the school committee would be at perfect liberty to say "Send the child after a month". In the clause as it stands the school committee have got power to decide each case on its merits. I therefore think that there is no valid reason shown why the amendment should be accepted.

The Honourable Dewán Bahádur KASHINATH RAMCHANDRA GODBOLE:—Your Excellency,—I have only to repeat what I have said before. I want this limit of ten days to be imposed in order to prevent hardship upon poor parents. The poor parents must have time to equip the child for attendance at the school, and it should not be within the powers of the school committee to say that the child should attend earlier than ten days after the issue of the order.

The amendment was put to the vote and lost.

Clause 9 was then put to the vote and carried.

His Excellency the PRESIDENT:—Item No. 17. Amendment to clause 10 (1). The Honourable Khán Bahádur PIR BAKSH.

The Honourable Khán Bahádur PIR BAKSH walad MIAN MAHMUD:—Your Excellency,—Since my amendment for the appointment of two committees is not accepted, the words "Hindu or Muhammadan" appearing in this amendment may be omitted. The work of regulating and enforcing the provisions of the law in this respect had better be left to the committee appointed. The committee will naturally have the full facts before them which would enable them to satisfactorily deal with cases. It is hoped that in this manner desired results would be obtained more easily and in an appreciable way and in comparatively far shorter period at the hands of the committee than through a magistrate without at the same time producing adverse comments and the necessity of appeals to higher courts by parties concerned.

The Honourable Mr. PATEL:—I understand that the Honourable Ráo Bahádur SATHE has got an amendment similar to the one of the Honourable Khán Bahádur PIR BAKSH.

The Honourable Khán Bahádur PIR BAKSH:—In that case I would like to withdraw my amendment in favour of the amendment of the Honourable Ráo Bahádur SATHE.

The amendment was by leave withdrawn.

The Honourable Mr. VITHALBHI JHAVERBHAI PATEL:—Your Excellency,—With regard to the Hnourable Ráo Bahádur SATHE'S amendments I rise to a point of order. In the last December meeting your Excellency ruled that any amendments which are in any way hypothetical in any degree or shape shall not be allowed. Now, my honourable friend Ráo Bahádur SATHE'S amendments are "if this is not accepted he will move that, and if that is not accepted he will move the other thing, and so on". In view of the ruling of your Excellency I beg to enquire whether his present amendments are in order.

The Honourable Sir MAHADEV CHAUBAL:—I think the Honourable Mr. PATEL sees that it is item No. 18 which is now proposed.

The Honourable Mr. PATEL:—Yes, but item No. 22 says, if amendment to clause 10 (1) (item 18) be not carried, then the following amendment will be moved in clause 11 (1). Let my honourable friend Ráo Bahádur SATHE decide which of the two amendments he proposes to move.

His Excellency the PRESIDENT:—I think there is nothing hypothetical about the amendment which is now before the Council. When we come to the hypothetical amendments, the honourable member may rise to a point of order and the President will then give his ruling.

The Honourable Ráo Bahádur GANESH KRISHNA SATHE:—I wish my honourable friend Mr. PATEL had waited till I proposed my amendment before the Council.

By the amendment which I now wish to propose I only intend to change the machinery for trying the offences covered by this penal clause, clause 10.

I want, your Excellency, to make a few observations in support of this amendment. When I wish that my amendment should be carried I am bound to place before this Council in the first instance the reasons why I object to the present clause, and then having given those reasons I will try to answer the several objections which were raised in the select committee and outside the select committee when I talked with several of my honourable friends, and then I will make a few observations generally on the amendment.

The only change I wish to make is to take away the word "magistrate" and to substitute for it the word "president". It may not be understood that by taking away the word "magistrate" I am inclined to show any distrust in that machinery. There are other considerations which have induced me to lay this amendment before this Council. When we use the word magistrate, then all the procedure which is prescribed by the Criminal Procedure Code has to be followed, namely, the employment of a pleader, the sifting of evidence according to the rules of the Evidence Act and the provision of appeal to the district magistrate or a revision application to the sessions judge according to the magistrate who decides the cases.

Now I put it to this Council whether in cases of this character such a complicated machinery is really required and whether we are not putting in the way of the people who are likely to be affected by this penal clause something which would make them lose their money. It is our general experience that when law provides for a certain remedy the litigant wishes to take full advantage of it; and these are not cases which really call for any decision at the hands of a trained magistrate. Besides we find that in many cases before magistrates the proceedings are protracted and in a matter of this kind the sooner the disposal the better.

Another ground is that there are in all 156 municipalities in the Presidency proper and I am not quite sure how many of them are at the head-quarters of a taluka which are provided with a magistrate of the second or third class. At any rate I am sure of one fact, that there are certain places where you have got municipalities but where you have not got the machinery of magistracy. In such cases is it really desirable to ask people to go a long way to attend taluka head-quarter towns, to wait there until the cases are called on, and also to go there a second time if the cases are not taken up on the dates fixed by the magistrates who are generally revenue officers and who have to do both revenue and criminal work? Besides this the expense involved in the conduct of a case is also a matter which one ought to take into account. Though I belong to a profession against the interests of which this amendment goes, I really feel, in the interests of those who will be affected by this penal clause, that it is much better that we should not introduce legal talent in the disposal of these cases.

Now, sir, the objections that might be raised to my amendment are as follows (I state them in brief): The first objection is that the president of a municipality will have no legal training. But do we not find that in many places honorary magistrates are appointed to decide cases of a much more complicated character and that honorary magistrates with a few exceptions are laymen? If you could confide in those people, would it be too much to confide in the presidents of municipalities and would the presidents of municipalities not be just as good laymen and would not justice at their hands be as good as it is at the hands of honorary magistrates?

Then the second objection that is taken is that these presidents of municipalities will be local men and will not be ready to take the odium of punishing their own people. That, sir, is rather a reflection on the presidents who stand for election and occupy such a responsible position due to the election by their brother councillors. If a president wishes to avoid that odium, I think one who is not quite strong and fit to do his work in a fearless manner would not stand for election in times to come; and we would not be losers if that is going to be the result.

Another objection that is likely to be put forward is, why do you make much of this penal clause? Are not nuisance cases tried by magistrates under the present Municipal Act? Well, sir, it is so. But I never considered that it was a desirable state of things that ordinary cases of nuisance should be tried by a regular magistrate. I am constrained to state for your Excellency's information that sometimes in the place from which I come I have seen that the complainants in the nuisance cases, who are clerks of the municipality, have to put in appearance more than half a dozen times before their cases are decided, and I do not consider that this is a desirable state of affairs. I am told (and I stand open to correction) that in the Central Provinces presidents of municipalities have got summary powers to punish nuisance cases. Of course at present nuisance cases, according to the Bombay District Municipal Act, are tried by magistrates, but that is no reason why we should add one more to that category and increase the difficulties of the people.

Then there is another objection, and that is this, that the presidents will not find time to try these cases. There may be some truth in this objection in the case of very large municipalities. But such cases are not going to be very many at the start, because we have provided for a very salient safeguard, namely, that no offence will be taken cognizance of unless the school committee lays its complaint before a magistrate. The school committee in the early days of the operation of this act is sure not to rush through cases of this kind and will only take resort to these penal clauses in such cases where they find that the parents are recalcitrant and unwilling to send their children to school with all the warnings given after all the necessary inquiries are held by the school committee.

There is another thing to be said in this behalf, that the presidents under the Municipal Act have got power to delegate certain of their other duties, and if this act is introduced in large cities and as this is an important part of the duties of a president, then certainly the president, when he finds that he is overworked on account of this work, will see his way to transfer or delegate certain other duties to the vice-president and I do not believe for a moment that the objection has any foundation in fact.

Then it may be said, sir, "Why a president alone; and why not a committee or a bench?" I am bound to answer this because I have stated in my minute of dissent that something like a committee consisting of a president, vice-president and one other councillor to be elected by the councillors ought to be formed for the disposal of such cases. But on reconsideration I found that it would be difficult to secure punctual and regular attendance of committees and I also found that there is a special section with respect to presidents. I refer to section 23, clause 7, of the main act, under which Government has got power to remove a president for neglect of duty or for misconduct, and I thought that so long as Government does not possess any power under the act to remove a committee, which I once contemplated advocating, it was much better to authorise a president of the municipality, who, if he neglects his duty or misconducts himself, is liable to be removed by the Governor in Council without any reference to the municipality. I thought, and I do even think now, that a responsible officer like the president of a municipality will never behave in a way which will call for such a drastic action on the part of Government. It will be quite safe to entrust these duties to the president without any danger of those powers being abused.

Then as regards another objection, namely, that all municipalities have not elected presidents. Assuming that it is a fact, what then? If the president is an official there can be no objection, because he generally is a deputy collector or an assistant collector. If we take account of provisions in other acts, we find, sir, that under the Village Police Act, which is a very old act, by section 14 you have invested the village police patel of each village with powers, one of which is of confining a man in a chavdi. He has to record no evidence, his proceedings are to be oral. If under this section 14 we rely upon an officer like the village police patel, would it be too much if I ask my honourable friends here to consider whether they would not prefer to have such cases tried by a president in preference to a magistrate of any class. Under the schedule of Criminal Procedure Code such cases are triable even by third class magistrates. Considering the position of the president of a municipality and the status and pay of a third class magistrate, I think I would be correct in saying that the president may safely be relied upon, if this Council agrees with me in thinking that the enquiry before a magistrate is likely to be more irksome, more distasteful, likely to be protracted and likely to land the litigants into heavy expense.

Then it may be asked—I am practically anticipating some of the arguments which my hourouble friend, the mover of the bill, is likely to bring forward—"What is the procedure you are going to lay down for these trials?" I do not think it is such a very difficult subject. The municipality can frame rules under section 46 or even under this act. It is a matter which need not trouble us and I do think that the matter of procedure is very simple and means can be devised to lay down a procedure for these cases. After all, sir, these cases have to be disposed of not by any legal technical knowledge, but on broad considerations and from a practical common-sense point of view. If that is the character of work which we may expect of the persons who are to try these cases, I think presidents of municipalities may safely be considered fit for such work. I am not going to make any comparison between the relative merits of a president and of a magistrate, whether the magistrate belongs to the first, second or third class, but I am only putting it on the ground that one is more suited to the requirements of the case and the other is not.

Then, sir, what is the punishment we have provided for? The punishment is only one of fine and there is no reason for apprehending that the presidents would abuse their powers if they are so invested under the amendment which I have proposed.

Now there is one more thing to be said, and that is this. If at all we find, after some experience is gained, that this machinery is unsuited, that people go unpunished, that real justice is not being done, are our hands tied down? Can we not amend the act? We can come to this Council and say: "Here is a provision which was accepted in 1917 but which does not work well in practice, and the time has arrived when we should go back to the section providing that all these cases should be tried by a magistrate." We are introducing compulsory education for the first time in this presidency. Is it not our duty to see that we work the act in the least irksome way possible? My earnest desire is to see that nothing should come in the way of this act which would either make it distasteful to the people or retard its progress or hamper its introduction in the several municipalities. That is my only anxiety and I stand second to none in the desire to see that in all municipalities this act should be introduced and that education should be made compulsory. When we do so we are in fairness bound to see that our action is of a character which will, without diminishing the efficiency of administration, go in the direction of inducing people to take up this piece of legislation. These are, sir, in short, my reasons for putting forward an amendment of this kind. In the select committee no doubt this question was discussed, but I only wish to bring to the notice of the members of this Council that the only reason that was given during the discussion was that magisterial powers inspire awe and dread. True, but is it really necessary in a matter of this kind that we should have magistrates to inspire awe and dread? Are we not going to work this act more on the policy of persuasion and not one of compulsion? If this is the desire of all of us let us not start with a machinery like the one which is suggested by the clause under discussion. With these few words I commend my amendment to the members of the Council.

The Honourable Mr. HARCHANDRAI VISHINDAS:—Your Excellency,—I have great pleasure in supporting the amendment that has been moved by my honourable friend Ráo Bahádur SATHE, and in addition to the important catalogue of arguments which he has adduced I may only urge one which I think will appeal to almost every member of this Council, and that is this. Whilst going before a magistrate carries with it the implication that the offence with which the man is charged is criminal, such a kind of interpretation will not be put upon such an offence if it is tried by the president of the municipality. I think it may be generally conceded that to every measure there is a certain kind of odium attached by reason of any penalties being attached to it. Therefore, however beneficent and popular to the educated public a measure of this kind that has been moved by my honourable friend MR. PATEL may be, there will be a certain odium attached to it by the general class of people by reason of the fine. Well, I am of opinion that a great deal of this odium will be taken away if the criminal nature of the offence is taken away by reason of the trial of the offence by the president of the municipality, and offences of this nature would not be made a criminal act which would be the interpretation put upon them if they are tried by a magistrate, but if they are tried by the president I think the unpopularity that might otherwise be attached to it would be to a great extent taken away, and that is one of the reasons on which I am bound to support the arguments of the Honourable Ráo Bahádur SATHE in favour of his amendment.

The Honourable Mr. BALKRISHNA SITARAM KAMAT:—Your Excellency,—All the arguments the Honourable Ráo Bahádur SATHE gave in the select committee and the new arguments which he has placed before the Council just now have failed to convince me that the president of a municipality is the better person to try these cases than the ordinary magistrate, and I am afraid that, probably, what is at the back of the mind of the Honourable Ráo Bahádur SATHE is the fact that if the case is tried by an ordinary magistrate there would be some stigma attached to fines imposed by him and not so if cases are tried by the president of the municipality. The Honourable Ráo Bahádur SATHE gave us a very long list of probable objections. He said that trial before a magistrate is cumbrous, expensive, protracted and so on, whereas in the case of the president it would not be so protracted and it would be rather speedy. Well,

I believe he has omitted to place one important fact before the Council, and that is this: that the trial before a magistrate or president will not be taken up in hand at once, but that the school committee will, in the first instance, give the fullest opportunity to the parent or guardian to place all facts in his favour before the committee. Only a warning will be given first, and probably as a result of that there may not be any case to go before a magistrate, and those persons only who have disobeyed that order will be brought before a magistrate. Now it follows that persons who defy or disobey the order of the school attendance committee must be in the very nature of things either too ignorant or they must be too perverse or too obtuse to obey the order. If they are too ignorant to understand the order for the improvement of their children, they will have no reason to grumble at the roughness of the treatment, and if they are too perverse or if they disobey the order of the school attendance committee purposely, in that case, if they have to undergo a magisterial trial, or if they have to incur any expense, or if they are ordered to go before a magistrate a number of times, they will have to thank themselves. Well, in the case of a trial before a president, I submit in respect of that procedure that the president generally is an overworked gentleman in the municipality and he has various other executive duties to do, and I do not think it is desirable that these judicial powers should be saddled upon him. Secondly, although he may try to be as impartial as possible, still if all the cases which have been once heard by his own school attendance committee were sent up to him, in spite of his attempts to be impartial (after all it is but human nature), he will be likely to be swayed one way or the other to decide in favour of the school committee. Therefore, I say it is not desirable that all orders of the school attendance committee should go up for trial before a president of the municipality. It is much better that they should be tried by an independent court. Take, for instance, the case of a mill-owner or factory-owner who happens to violate the law. I put it to the Council who would be the best judge? Would the president of a municipality be a much better judge or an ordinary independent magistrate to try any cases of employment of child labour?

The Honourable Mr. PARANJPYE:—Your Excellency,—May I point out that this clause refers to attendance orders and not to employment? Because some of the members are in favour of the Honourable Mr. SATHE'S amendment on this point but not on the other amendment. So I hope the two amendments will not be confused.

The Honourable Mr. KAMAT:—I am giving a hypothetical case to show that the president may have to try certain cases of members who may be factory owners and who have disobeyed the law. In such a case I think the president should be the last person to try a case of this character. The Honourable Ráo Bahádur SATHE told us that police patels also, or even some honorary magistrates, are entrusted with similar cases, and he therefore concluded that the president of a municipality would be far better suited to try these cases than a bench magistrate or the village patel. I do not deny, but it is not a question of training, it is not a question of time; it is a question of an independent mind being brought to bear upon the question, and I think it would be far better if these cases are tried by an ordinary court than by the president of the municipality.

The Honourable Mr. F. G. PRATT:—Your Excellency,—I rise to oppose the Honourable Ráo Bahádur SATHE'S amendment, because, I think, in the discussion before the select committee, by a majority we came to the conclusion that unless these cases were taken before a magistrate there would be grave risk that the usefulness of the act would be to a large extent undermined and the act would be in a serious danger of becoming a dead-letter and it would not work at all in practice.

The Honourable Ráo Bahádur SATHE in his speech has laid great stress and he took great pains in elaborating a number of objections which might be raised to this proposed amendment, but I find that he equally elaborated his objections to the provisions of the bill as adopted by the select commitee that offences of this kind should be tried by ordinary magisterial courts. He says in his minute of dissent that the cases tried in courts would be tried by a procedure which would be bound to be lengthy and expensive. Well, with all deference to the Honourable Ráo Bahádur SATHE'S experience as a lawyer, I venture to dissent altogether from that statement. What will be the nature of these petty cases? They will be tried under the procedure laid down under the Criminal Procedure Code for summons cases. The accused comes to the court, the magistrate says, have you anything to say in defence? The accused says I am innocent. No evidence is taken and the magistrate proceeds to pass his order. That is the procedure prescribed for summons cases. Why, I ask, should that procedure become lengthy and expensive even with all the efforts of pleaders who might appear in the trial?

Then we in the select committee thought, sir, that if you are going to have compulsory education you must face the situation and make your act a really compulsory act, make the public really understand that these duties are enjoined upon them by the law and that they are bound to comply with the provisions of the act and that the failure to comply with them would be treated as an offence and would be punishable under the act.

The Honourable Ráo Bahádur SATHE writes in his minute of dissent that no one who is acquainted with the English police courts, on the days set apart for hearing school attendance cases, can desire to see such scenes enacted in India. Well, sir, I have been present in English police courts and I personally would be very glad if the procedure in the Indian courts when these cases would be before them were to be as brisk and prompt and as businesslike as in the English courts. There each case is disposed of in about 5 or 6 minutes and the parties leave the court. That is how it should be, and I hope will be if the procedure recommended in our draft bill were to become law. We are afraid that if these duties are handed over, as the Honourable Ráo Bahádur SATHE suggests, to the presidents of municipalities, that it will put upon the presidents, without any magisterial powers, duties and responsibilities which in many cases they would dislike to undertake and would not be prepared to undertake.

The Honourable Ráo Bahádur SATHE says that the presidents may if they like delegate their duties to the vice-presidents. Well, I am afraid (and I think my honourable colleagues in the select committee would agreee with me) that there would be a serious risk in the presidents' delegating their duties. When these cases come before a president, even though they may not constitute such a serious tax on him or the vice-president or other councillor to whom he would delegate his duties, the delegate would in his turn look round to try and find out some other person to whom to delegate these duties. I am afraid also that if cases of this kind came to the president, he would not be able to deal with them in a prompt and businesslike manner and in accordance with the procedure prescribed in the Criminal Procedure Code, and he would be very likely indeed (I can say so from my experience of municipalities) to sit down and correspond and the correspondence may very likely drift into a period of many weeks, if not months, in each individual case.

Then there is another point and that is that my honourable friend Ráo Bahádur SATHE is anxious that this work should be conducted by the presidents of municipalities. Well, sir, in any given case where the president of a municipality would want to do this work I would be extremely glad to see him do it. But the difficulty can easily be met by that president being nominated by Government as honorary magistrate for these cases. That would give him the power to deal with them and it will also enable him to deal with them under the Criminal Procedure Code and the matter will be disposed of promptly and in a businesslike manner.

IMARY EDUCATION BILL.

The Honourable Sir MAHADEV BHASKAR CHAUBAL :—Your Excellency,—I rise to speak to a small point about this amendment which has been moved by the Honourable Ráo Bahádur SATHE which I oppose. It has been rather a surprise for me to see lawyers of the reputation of the Honourable Ráo Bahádur SATHE and the Honourable Mr. HARCHANDRAI bringing in and supporting an amendment of this character, because so far as I am aware jurists and lawyers have always complained that the one flaw in British administration of justice in India is that there are some cases in which the prosecutor is the judge. In cases under the forest and abkari laws this is a frequent ground of complaint made by the public at large. The trial of these cases, they say, takes place before revenue officers who are directly interested in the departments which start these prosecutions. Now what is the present case here? The act is a supplementary act to the District Municipal Act. Under the main act municipal prosecutions are conducted before the ordinary magistracy, but the amendment moved proposes to remove this particular class of municipal offences from their jurisdiction. Now I do not know how it accords with the notions of jurisprudence of my honourable friends Messrs. SATHE and HARCHANDRAI that in these cases, which must be municipal prosecutions, the officer of the municipality who is directly concerned in them and who has the control and supervision over all municipal affairs, under section 24 of the main act, should himself be the trying judge!

We must further remember that by the amendment which has been made by the select committee all the fines which will be inflicted and realised in these prosecutions are to be credited to municipal funds. Now if you say that all these trials should be before the president or vice-president of a municipality, is his conduct not liable or open to the aspersion—I do not say it will be justified—that the municipality is directly interested in increasing its funds for compulsory education and therefore there is no fair justice in these cases?

Then again I do not at all agree with the Honourable Ráo Bahádur SATHE that the public should be under the impression that offences under this act are venial or trifling offences, and therefore offenders should not be regarded as criminals. I do not at all agree with this proposition, and am opposed to any attempt to sweeten the pill. I wish the public and the offending parents who bring themselves under the penal provisions of the law by keeping their children away from schools without reasonable excuse to realise to the full that they are criminals, and deserve to be penalised for the offence of encouraging illiteracy.

The only other point which I wish to allude to is as regards what happened in the select committee on this point. If you refer to the original bill, you will see that presence before a magistrate was required on two occasions, and after a full discussion in the select committee it was decided that the discretion to start the prosecutions after a warning should be given to the school committee, and that it is only in the last resort that the magistrate should be brought in. Further, the select committee considered that the conduct of the school committee in bringing their complaint may not be justified in any particular case. There may be a reasonable excuse and the school committee may have been wrong in deciding that a particular boy had no reasonable excuse for non-attendance. While therefore the original bill made non-compliance with the school-committee's order itself an offence, the amendment by the select committee specially empowers the magistrate to go behind the school committee's decision, so that there may be a judicial decision by a properly constituted authority.

For these reasons I think the Council will be pleased to reject the amendment moved.

The Honourable Mr. SHRIDHAR BALKRISHNA UPASANI :—May it please your Excellency,—I rise to support the amendment which the Honourable Ráo Bahádur SATHE has moved. I have myself sent in an amendment on the same lines proposing that the power to hear these cases should be vested in the president as also the vice-president of the municipality.

Now the Honourable Sir MAHADEV CHAUBAL, in speaking on this amendment of the Honourable Ráo Bahádur SATHE, said that to allow a president of a municipality to try these cases would mean to allow a prosecutor to try the case of which he himself has sanctioned the prosecution. I wish, your Excellency, this argument were allowed to prevail as regards cases relating to matters which concern Government themselves. Sir MAHADEV referred to cases under the Forest Act and under various other acts. In these it happens that the officers of Government who sanction the prosecution do try them as magistrates. There is no doubt some force in this argument of the Honourable Sir MAHADEV CHAUBAL, but when that argument is not allowed to prevail in the cases in which Government themselves are concerned, I do not know why that argument should be brought forward now in connection with the less important cases coming under this act.

Again, apart from this I do not think that the enforcement of this act should be in a manner which may give unnecessary cause for complaint. This act is meant for the good of the people and so far as possible it should be left to the good sense of the people to take advantage of it and we should secure its enforcement with their co-operation rather than create any misapprehension in their minds that any breach of the provisions of this act would be considered a moral wrong or a criminal offence. However necessary it may be to enforce this act, it will not do to entrust its enforcement to magistrates as if it were part of our criminal laws.

Now what is there special in these cases to make it necessary that they should be triable by magistrates? The cases will be petty and the power to be exercised will be to only levy a small fine for failure to send a child to school as required by the act.

Now, if even illiterate village patels are allowed to exercise the power to fine and even to detain a person under the Village Police Act, why should we not allow the presidents of municipalities, who are chosen by the people and who are men with far greater qualifications and much higher sense of responsibility, to try these petty cases under this act? If we make these cases triable by magistrates, all the elaborate procedure of magisterial inquiry will have to be gone through and the police will also come in, for at the outset the magistrate's summons will have to be served by the police. I do not see why in these small matters we should allow the police to come in. I am afraid that it will give a different complexion to this measure and make it unpopular if we allow magistrates to take cognizance of these cases and the police to have any concern with them. Therefore, I think it will be better to allow these cases to be heard and disposed of by the municipal president and vice-president than to allow the act to be enforced through the agency of the magistrate and the police.

Now if these cases are allowed to be taken up by magistrates most of them will go before honorary magistrates. In my own town there are four or five honorary magistrates and the majority of them are municipal members. If these will be competent to try these cases without detriment to public interests, I for myself feel quite sure that the presidents of municipalities would be as good as and even better judges to try these cases than these magistrates.

Then as regards the amount of additional work which would be imposed on the presidents if these cases be tried by them, I do not think it will add much to their other duties, because the school committees will in the first instance hear the parties and a reference to the president will be necessary only in case the parties do not obey the school committee's order. Therefore we need not be afraid of any heavy additional work being imposed on the president, especially if he is relieved by the vice-president who also should I think be given power to hear these cases as I have proposed in my amendment on this point.

PRIMARY EDUCATION BILL.

With these words I beg to support strongly the amendment moved by my honourable friend Ráo Bahádur SATHE.

The Honourable Mr. VITHALBHAI JHAVERBHAI PATEL:—May it please your Excellency;—I strongly oppose this amendment. My principal objection is that under the main act a municipality is entitled to appoint a school committee and that school committee may include the president. There is nothing in the main act to debar the president from being a member of the school committee, and I know of some instances in which presidents of municipalities are members of school committees, and in that case the president, by virtue of his office, becomes the chairman of that committee. Now the position becomes this, that under this bill we give power to the school committee to pass an attendance order. The president as chairman of the school committee, in consultation with the other members of the committee, passes an attendance order. That order is disobeyed and a prosecution has to be lodged. Now is it desirable that that prosecution should lie before a person who has sanctioned the prosecution? Will not, as my honourable friend Sir MAHADEV CHAUBAL said, the prosecutor be the judge in his own cause? It would be entirely wrong on principle. Even under the Criminal Procedure Code when a magistrate has personal interest in a case, the case has got to be transferred from him to another magistrate. I do not see how the president, who is a member, and therefore the chairman, of a school committee, could legally try a case the prosecution of which he himself has sanctioned. That is the main objection to the acceptance of the proposal of my honourable friend Ráo Bahádur SATHE.

The second point is, your Excellency, that there are a number of municipalities where we have got official presidents. Now these official presidents are of the rank of first class magistrates, of long standing and experience and have a number of other duties to perform. Of course, in some cases they are in charge of sub-divisions and have magisterial, revenue and other work to do. Is it right that these official presidents, who have been exercising the powers of a first class magistrate and whose time is very valuable in other respects, should be asked to try these petty cases, which in the usual course would go to third class magistrates? These official presidents in their capacity as assistant or deputy collectors are touring officers; they have to go from place to place; and does my honourable friend Ráo Bahádur SATHE mean to say that for these petty offences the parties should be asked to go from place to place to attend the courts of these officers? My honourable friend Mr. UPASANI tells us that they need not be presidents, but we have to take things as they are and I believe we have to consider the clauses of this bill on the basis of circumstances as they are today. Personally I am prepared to vote for, and I would be glad if we had, non-official presidents in all the municipalities. But that is a different matter altogether.

Then there is another serious difficulty in the way of accepting the amendment. In the bill which we are now considering, is there any provision which empowers the president of a municipality to summon accused persons and witnesses? What is the procedure and what is the machinery under which these trials are to be held? My honourable friend Ráo Bahádur SATHE says that if these cases go to the stipendiary magistrate the trials will be lengthened and expensive, pleaders will be allowed to appear, and so on. May I ask him under what procedure are these cases to be tried by the president of a municipality? How is the president going to ask the parties to attend and how is he going to summon the witnesses to come and give evidence? Of course, if the select committee had come to the conclusion that the president should be the person to try the cases, then they would have considered the procedure and they would have put all these provisions necessary for the purpose of enabling the president to try cases. But at this stage, to accept the amendment of my honourable friend Ráo Bahádur SATHE, empowering the president to try these cases, would make practically the whole act unworkable, unless this Council is prepared at the same time to provide the requisite machinery and put in additional clauses giving powers to the president to summon witnesses to give evidence and parties to appear for the trial of these cases and similar other provisions. As I say, if the amendment of my honourable friend is accepted it would mean practically the suspension of section 28 of the municipal act. The president could not in that case, under any circumstances, be a member of the school committee. Unless you say that the president shall not be a member of the school committee, you will not be justified in accepting this amendment at all, and when you say that the president shall not be a member of the school committee, you practically amend section 28 of the principal act, which process we have so far in the bill tried to avoid.

Then again, my Lord, the amendment is quite novel. There is not a single country where compulsion is introduced that magisterial power is given to the president of a corporate body. In all countries where compulsion is introduced it is the magistrate who has been given the power to fine the offender. Even in India—I do not wish to refer to Native States at all—wherever compulsion has been introduced, the cases have to be tried by magistrates and not by the presidents or vice-presidents of municipalities; and when by experience we know that that institution has worked well in other countries and this country also, I do not see why we should try this novel experiment so far as our Presidency is concerned. My honourable friend Ráo Bahádur SATHE suggests that we might have experience first and if after five or ten years it is found that his proposal does not work smoothly or that it is not practicable, then we can easily amend the act. I say, why not try this experiment which has been found successful elsewhere instead of trying a novel experiment? But of all the arguments that have been advanced in this Council the one argument that appeals to me strongly is that advanced by my honourable friend Mr. PRATT. He says that there is nothing to prevent Government from empowering presidents of select municipalities with powers of honorary magistrates, and in such cases they will try the offenders under this act. But, after all, as I say, the president is the executive head of a district municipality and is always interested in the administration of that municipality, and I do not know if it is advisable to ask him to try cases instituted by that body. I am of opinion that it is not wise to entrust these cases to the executive head of the municipality, particularly when clause 17 of the bill provides that all fines leviable under the act shall be credited to the municipality.

With these few words I trust the Council will not accept the amendment.

The Honourable Ráo Bahádur GANESH KRISHNA SATHE:—May it please your Excellency,—I will take first the objections urged by my honourable friend Mr. PATEL. But I must say this, that in the latter part of his arguments he was really not consistent, because he agreed with my honourable friend Mr. PRATT when he said that Government will not have the slightest objection in fit cases to invest the presidents with magisterial powers for the trial of criminal offences.

The Honourable Mr. PATEL:—I said, if so desired.

The Honourable Ráo Bahádur SATHE:—In fit cases! I doubt if my honourable friend Sir MAHADEV CHAUBAL would agree with my honourable friend Mr. PATEL. Well, he says that the president is the head of the municipality, he is interested in promoting the interests of the municipality, and that he will always try to augment the finances of the municipality, as if he has no other means wherewith to find his means. So far as this part of the argument goes, it does not appeal to me as a sound argument or as a sound objection.

The Honourable Mr. PATEL has put forward a very very strong objection and that is this, that in the main act there is nothing to prevent a president from being a member of the school committee. It is really paying a very poor compliment to the councillors to say that even with the amended clause, as I have proposed, the councillors would go the length of having the president as a member of the school committee. I think his apprehensions on this ground were really uncalled for. If we amend the clause in the way in which I have suggested, the councillors are sure to show better sense in not having the president as a member of the school committee, and in that case objection on that score would not really survive.

Then, for the procedure to be prescribed, I do say that there is no doubt that under existing section 46, so far as I am able to read it, means may be found out for laying down the procedure for serving summonses by chief officers and issue of notices, etc.

Then, sir, as regards the argument which has been put forward by the Honourable Sir MAHADEV CHAUBAL, an answer has already been given by my honourable friend Mr. UPASANI, but I go further and I do say that the principle of separation of judicial and executive is the best no doubt, if it is going to be accepted in the near future. Our city magistrates are invariably members of municipalities in cities and towns and those city magistrates try cases arising out of the Municipal Act and fine people who come before them. Are not such magistrates in a sense both prosecutors and judges at the same time, but have we ever found that complaints were raised either by the public or by the municipality that these magistrates are partial and are inflicting fines to supplement the funds of the municipality? Under the Criminal Procedure Code at present there is no bar to the city magistrate trying such cases. If my view of the law is correct, the fact that a president happens to be a member of a body a sub-committee of which sanctions a prosecution, ought not to be considered a disqualification to try that case even under the present state of criminal procedure. Therefore, though it will appear as a serious objection at the outset, it does not survive after a close scrutiny. The question of the ideal of the separation of judicial and executive is a high ideal. No one would be more glad than myself if Government introduces it. So long as Government does not accept it in practice it would never be proper for Government to advise us not to commit similar mistakes. The argument advanced by the Honourable Sir MAHADEV CHAUBAL does not appeal to me, though at the same time I am strongly in favour of the ideal which he now placed before us.

Then coming to the objection of my honourable friend Mr. PRATT, he quoted a sentence from my minute of dissent. I must plead my inability to speak with authority on that point, not having had occasion to go to England; I based my remarks on the article appearing in the prominent Anglo-Indian organ of this city, the Times of India in its issue of July 28, 1917. In the discussion on primary education in the Council meeting of July last the Honourable Capt. Fernandes made a suggestion in this matter and in referring to it the Times of India gave this experience of English courts. I think it is a better authority on questions like this. Then he called my attention, as if I was not alive to it, that it was a summons case and the procedure was very simple. Of course, from his own point of view he is perfectly correct, but I find that it is not the actual trial of a case that takes long, but it is the number of times that a case is called on for hearing that I am complaining of. If the man is called on the first day and he pleads guilty I admit it will be finished in a few minutes.

I gave experience of my city and experience may be similar in other places unless mine is the only unfortunate place in this respect.

Then, sir, coming to the opposition of my friend the Honourable Mr. KAMAT, he went rather behind what I had said. He said he was justified in making that observation, because I had said so in the select committee. But I do not want to take my stand upon that; people ought to learn to rise above this sentiment of stigma. His other arguments appeared to me not to be very strong. He said that such cases would arise if the people are ignorant and too perverse.

He said that the people who are ignorant ought to come before a magistrate, as if illiteracy is their sin. I can appreciate his argument when he said that if they are perverse they should go before a magistrate. But I really fail to appreciate his argument when he says that because they are ignorant they ought to be made to go before a magistrate and stand their trial there.

As regards impartiality, I really do not wish to enter into this tender question. However, the Honourable Mr. KAMAT'S remarks lead me to enter into that discussion and I will only make one observation on that point. Are not cases in which sanctions are given by superior officers tried by subordinate officers and is there no room to doubt that the decision of the subordinate officer is influenced by the superior officer's orders? But we never doubt the subordinate officer's impartiality. In the case of a president, the school committee will go into the whole procedure and when it finds that the parent refuses to send the child even after due warning, then only the case is to go before the president, and I think there is no reason to doubt the impartiality of the person occupying such a responsible position which he owes to the confidence of his councillors.

These are, in short, my remarks in answer to the objections which were raised by those who opposed the amendment. With these few words I place this amendment for such consideration as it deserves at the hands of this Council.

The amendment was then put to the vote and lost, 14 members voting for and 21 members voting against it.

The Council divided as follows :—

The Honourable Mr. SHRIDHAR BALKRISHNA UPASANI:—Your Excellency,—My amendment is as follows:—

Clause 10 (1).

"In line 12, omit the words 'a magistrate' and substitute the words 'the President or the Vice-President of the Municipality'."

As my amendment is similar to the one moved by the Honourable Ráo Bahádur SATHE, I beg leave to withdraw it.

The amendment was by leave withdrawn.

His Excellency the PRESIDENT:—Item No. 20. Amendment to clause 10 (2). The Honourable Ráo Bahádur SATHE.

The Honourable Ráo Bahádur GANESH KRISHNA SATHE:—Your Excellency,—My amendment is:—

Clause 10 (2).

"For the word 'court' substitute the word 'president'."

As my previous amendment was lost, this amendment also goes away.

The amendment was by leave withdrawn.

Clause 10 was then put to the vote and carried.

His Excellency the PRESIDENT:—I own frankly that the Honourable Mr. PATEL in his objections to the Honourable Ráo Bahádur SATHE'S amendments has raised a question of some difficulty. I do not think, on the whole, that these amendments can be called hypothetical. They are rather consequential. The second one, at all events, is consequential on the one which has just been negatived. But I do urge on honourable members that it is very undesirable to put amendments in this form. If an honourable member wants to put an amendment he should stand by it without making any conditions with regard to any other amendment. In this particular case I think the Honourable Mr. UPASANI has in his amendments exactly the same object in view as my friend the Honourable Ráo Bahádur SATHE; but he has moved an amendment to each clause which would carry out practically what the Honourable Ráo Bahádur SATHE intends. It seems to me that the Honourable Ráo Bahádur SATHE had a definite amendment to the clause which has been just thrown out by the Council. There was no necessity for him to say in his amendment No. 22: "If amendment to clause so and so is carried", because that amendment relates to a specific matter. The intervening amendment, however, appears to be an amendment which is of a consequential character. What I think would have been a wise thing to do was to have taken each amendment as it stood and dealt with the particular matters raised in each of the amendments; then the difficulty that is brought to notice would not have arisen at all. Under the circumstances item No. 21 will go out, and then my honourable friend Ráo Bahádur SATHE, as I hold that item No. 22 deals with an entirely separate question, can move that amendment.

PRIMARY EDUCATION BILL.

[4TH DECEMBER 1917.] [Ráo Bahádur Ganesh Krishna Sathe; Mr. Vithalbhai Jhaverbhai Patel; the President.]

The Honourable Ráo Bahádur GANESH KRISHNA SATHE :—Your Excellency,—The amendment that I propose (item No. 22) is as follows :—

In clause 11 (1) drop the words "for the purpose of profit" and between the words "apply" and "shall" insert the words "so as to interfere with the efficient instruction of the child".

Yesterday my honourable friend Mr. CHUNILAL MEHTA moved his amendment to clause 2. It referred only to the question of factories. I shall state at the outset for the information of my honourable friends that I do not propose to make any distinction between organized labour like that in factories and labour of a varied character which we find in the mofussil places other than industrial centres.

My principal object in moving this amendment is to remove the bar which is intended to be put on the employment of children by the select committee. No doubt in view of the discussion that took place yesterday and in view of the strong feeling which was exhibited during the discussions in the select committee I do consider it as an uphill task before I can or I am able to——

The Honourable Mr. PATEL :—I rise to a point of order. My honourable friend Ráo Bahádur SATHE refers to a very strong feeling on the part of the select committee.

His Excellency the PRESIDENT :—I do not think there is any point of order. It is merely an expression of opinion on the part of the Honourable Ráo Bahádur SATHE.

The Honourable Ráo Bahádur SATHE :—My honourable friend misunderstood me. I did not mean that there was strong feeling on my part, but that there was strong feeling on the other side. However, I beg your Excellency's pardon for this digression.

Looking to the fact that the majority of the select committee was very strong on this point and that they wanted to prohibit all sorts of employment, I do consider it as an uphill task to persuade my honourable friends to accept this amendment. However, I intend to make a full attempt to convert those who served with me on the select committee and others who had not the advantage of being on the select committee to the view which I entertain on this point. The principal idea in my mind is to put into the forefront the ideal of compulsory education. I do not intend to say for one moment that you should sacrifice compulsory education in favour of employment. That is far from my mind. What I really intend to do by this amendment is that in so far as you can make a sufficient provision for the instruction of children it would not be legitimate for us to put a wholesale bar on the employment of children whether they are children employed in factories or elsewhere as domestic servants. With your Excellency's permission I refer to about three or four lines in the select committee's majority report and particularly these lines: at page 2 in referring to clause 11 the majority of the select committee state: "But we are not in favour of permitting the employment of children of school-going age, because it appears to us that this must prejudice their health and education. Apart from this question, moreover, we recognize that clause 12 is not complete as it does not provide for casual employment or such other exception as it may be necessary to make." I make use of these sentences from the majority report of the select committee in order to emphasise the fact that the majority of the select committee were alive to certain defects in the present clause, but instead of removing those difficulties in the way in which I now suggest to do they depend upon the good sense of the school committee and expect the school committee to connive at casual employment rather than insert an explanatory clause on the subject. That would appear from the subsequent sentences of the majority report. "But we are of opinion that, at any rate for some time, no practical difficulty is likely to occur, because no prosecution can be undertaken except on the complaint of the school committee, which will be able to exercise discretion, and because the present state of economic development in the mofussil is not such as to furnish intricate questions for decision." If we take this entire paragraph as it stands in the majority report, there can be no manner of doubt at least on one point, and that is this, that nobody wished to prevent casual employment or domestic employment. The way which I have suggested by the amendment makes the matter easier, and it is in this way. If honourable members will kindly turn to the definition of the words "to attend" as given in the bill, they will see that to "attend" a recognized primary school means to be present for instruction at such school on such days and at such time or times on each day as may be required by the school committee with the approval of the prescribed educational authority." I understood, during the discussion of the select committee, from the remarks of my honourable friend Mr. COVERNTON, that even now there is a latitude given to the department to prescribe less complicated or less comprehensive standards according as they suit the boys who are to receive instruction. For instance, in the case of boys of the depressed classes or backward classes there is, if I have rightly understood his remarks, at present a rule for making that kind of differentiation between a full primary course and a course which might be somewhat less comprehensive than the ordinary primary course.

Then again, we have to consider whether it would not be advisable to prescribe a course for the class of boys who are likely to seek employment outside school hours. I think you will all be one with me when I say that it would never be the desire of a parent to employ a child provided he can do so without depending upon his small earnings, and it is only in rare cases that a parent would think of putting the child to employment with a view to making some money out of it even though he might do without it.

So the amendment which I have proposed ensures the efficient instruction of the child according to the standard and the hours which will be laid down by the school committee in consultation with the educational authority, and so long as that is being done, so long as that requirement is satisfied, there ought not to be really anything which should be in the way of the parent in employing the child wherever he likes. The question of employment in a factory stands on quite a different footing. There a child has to work for six hours; the atmospheric conditions are injurious to its health, and so on. But in the case of ordinary employment these considerations really do not apply. If, for instance, a boy of ten were to go and sweep an office and clean the furniture and receive Rs. 3 a month, why should that be prohibited so long as he is able to attend the school during such hours as may be prescribed by the school committee in consultation with the educational authority? Now it may be asked as to why the employment of such a child is required. It is only because if that child can come and work for a couple of hours, it is available for Rs. 3 or Rs. 4 per month and one is not required to spend Rs. 9, Rs. 10 or Rs. 11 which he would have otherwise to pay for an adult servant. And looked at from another point of view, we will find that the economic conditions of the people who are likely to be affected by this provision is really such as to require them to supplement their resources by small wages which these children might earn. I am only repeating my argument on this point when I say that in a bill of this kind it is no use putting a wholesale bar on the employment of children even though they are in a position to comply with the other requirements laid down by the school committee. The mover of this bill in his first draft seems to have taken some account of this. I refer to clause 54 (c) of his bill, which said: "No person shall take into his employment during school hours any boy who ought to be at school under clause 54 (a)." That is the clause which he had inserted in his original draft. Of course, I do not grudge him the liberty of growing wiser and of improving upon the original bill, but I base my argument upon this to show that the mover of the bill himself did not intend at the outset to put such a wholesale bar on the employment of children.

If we are to go by a precedent on this subject let us go to Mr. Gokhale's draft. He introduced his draft bill in the Imperial Legislative Council and it had a clause, No. 14, at page 4 of the book which was circulated to us. I do not know whether all the members have got it, but I will read it for the information of the Council.

"That the time and nature of the boys' employment are such that he is not prevented from receiving elementary education at school."

Now there is another point from which this ought to be considered, namely, that there is a clause under which certain reasonable excuses are mentioned; for instance, "where the child is receiving, otherwise than in a recognized primary school, instruction which in the opinion of the school committee is efficient, or has already completed his primary education." Now, sir, if there be cases where the parent proves to the satisfaction of the school committee that a boy under 11 has completed his primary education or that he is receiving otherwise efficient primary education, that he has already received or is receiving it, then even in that case, though there is no compulsion on him to send the child to school as his case comes under the clause of reasonable excuse, are we going to put a bar on the employment of such children? I think we cannot.

Now it was said, and it is also referred to in the select committee's report, that the recent education bill in England prohibits the employment of children in factories. As I have already stated, I do not make any differentiation between the two kinds of labour; but even there in the draft bill of the Right Honourable Herbert Fisher, the educational minister, he does not prohibit employment of all sorts. But when I make this statement I make it relying on my memory when I read that bill about a month ago, a copy of which was kindly lent to me by my honourable friend Mr. Covernton. If that be the case, if my memory serves me right, and if even in the recent legislation which is going to be introduced in England employment is not prohibited wholesale, shall we be justified in introducing such a clause in the bill when we are making primary education compulsory for the first time in our Presidency? There the Compulsory Education Act came into force in 1876 and if the education minister found it necessary after a long period of 40 years to change the Act and to introduce a more comprehensive bill in England, would it not be better for us not to put a wholesale bar on employment, in the first instance, but to watch the working of this bill for some time and then think of introducing a clause like the one which the select committee has thought fit to introduce? No doubt in mofussil places the question of labour is becoming very complicated and necessity is really felt of employing children of 10 or 11 for doing really very light work. In this kind of employment there is no strain, their physique is not impaired, and they are not to locate themselves for six hours in that uncongenial atmosphere of factories; I do not think that they should be prevented from working for one or two hours if a boy can add to the poor wages of his parents so as to be able to maintain 3 or 4 persons of his family. Taking into account these considerations of the people in the mofussil who are really to be affected, I think it would be better to change the present clause so as not to impair the efficiency of education and to leave it open to the parent and employer to employ a child if he can do so without interfering with the provisions of this bill. That is the point of view from which I intend to move this amendment.

Now coming to factories, I only want to mention one fact. In Sholapur during the last 1½ years Government have started a school for factory boys, and boys of three factories attend it in batches. One batch attends for three hours in the morning and another batch attends for another three hours. I am only citing this not because I want to differentiate one kind of labour from another, but because in the present circumstances the education department is finding out means wherewith to give education even to factory boys, and at the same time not to come in the way of employment of these boys. That is the kind of effort which has been made in Sholapur during the last year.

PRIMARY EDUCATION BILL.

Then, I may say a few words as to why I have dropped the words "for the purpose of profit". Because those words seem to me to be redundant in case no prohibition is placed upon employment so long as a boy gets education according to the standard prescribed for boys of classes or sections to which such boys belong, and therefore I thought that these words "for the purpose of profit" need not be there if my amendment is accepted and the bar on employment is removed. With these words, sir, I place my amendment before the Council.

His Excellency the PRESIDENT:—I think it will be to the convenience of honourable members if we now adjourn till 3 o'clock.

The Council then adjourned for lunch.

After Lunch.

The Council re-assembled after lunch at 3 o'clock.

His Excellency the PRESIDENT:—Order, order. Further consideration of the Honourable Ráo Bahádur SATHE'S amendment to clause 11.

The Honourable Dewán Bahádur KASHINATH RAMCHANDRA GODBOLE:—Your Excellency,—With regard to the Honourable Ráo Bahádur SATHE'S amendment to clause 11, item No. 22, I wish to draw the attention of the Council to amendment under item No. 23 which stands in my name. This amendment is almost identical with the amendment of the Honourable Ráo Bahádur SATHE. I am therefore interested in the Honourable Ráo Bahádur SATHE'S amendment and I think that it ought to be supported by the Council.

Let the Council take into consideration the case of an agriculturist or an artisan or labourer who has a large family of five or six children; say three children under 7 years of age and three of the ages of 8, 9 and 11. Will it not be a hardship on such a family if we deny them the earnings of two or three grown-up children? I think that a family like this residing in a mofussil municipal area for which compulsory education has been prescribed ought to be given an opportunity of utilising the earnings of grown-up children; otherwise their life in the city will be difficult. There are numerous petty and small employments which can be found for grown-up children without militating against their education. I know a friend of mine in Poona who is blind and who requires the services of a lad for taking him out for a walk. He gives the lad Rs. 2 a month. Then I know of instances in which lads are employed as tennis boys on Rs. 2 a month. I know of lads that are engaged in small gardens in front of houses. They get Rs. 2 or 3 a month for watering trees, etc., in those gardens. I know of lads that are employed in sweeping the floors of offices and in fetching post and in posting of letters. These lads get two or three rupees a month and the employment that they have of two or three hours a day will not interfere with their adequate education. I therefore think that the amendment that has been brought forward by the Honourable Ráo Bahádur SATHE is an amendment that should be accepted by the Council.

I find from the definition of attendance that is given in the bill, that the school committee, at their discretion, can have separate schools for these workmen's and artisans' children if they are so minded. If the school committee look at the question in the right way, they will probably start separate schools for artisans' children and prescribe only four hours' attendance in these schools. I submit, sir, that with an attendance of four hours in these special schools, it is quite possible to give these workmen's children the education that they really want. These children want education in the three R's only, and the three R's can be successfully taught to them in a half-time school or in a four hours' school. After attending school for three or four hours, the grown-up children can utilise two or three hours a day in earning small wages which will be a contribution for the maintenance of the family. The instances that I have given of labourers with five or six children are not very rare. I can tell the Council from my experience that in the case of agriculturists and labourers the number of children in a labouring family often goes up above six and seven. I therefore think that the Council should accept this amendment unanimously.

The Honourable Mr. BALKRISHNA SITARAM KAMAT:—Your Excellency,—I rise to oppose the amendment of my honourable friend Ráo Bahádur SATHE. He argued that this section as drafted by the select committee puts a wholesale bar against the employment of boys, either for domestic purposes or in factories, and he then argued that it was necessary to provide for casual employment, and that as the definition of the word "attend" was elastic enough it was easy to provide such a course of instruction in schools and at such hours as would make it possible to make adequate arrangements both for the schooling of the boys as well as their employment. Now the principle underlying the whole of this argument is to my mind not a sound one. In the first place, the clause as drafted by the select committee does not preclude entirely the casual employment of children as is supposed by the Honourable Ráo Bahádur SATHE and the Honourable Dewán Bahádur GODBOLE. If I remember aright, I believe it was the Honourable Mr. SEDDON who pointedly illustrated the whole thing by taking up the instance of tennis boys and of office boys, and the select committee came to the conclusion that the clause as drafted now would not preclude the employment of boys for such purposes, and the words put in by the select committee were that if a man employed a boy "for the purpose of profit", then only he would come under the clutches of the law. Now to employ a tennis boy or an office boy for casual employment is to my mind not employment for the purpose of profit, at any rate profit for the employer, and if that wording is adequate enough, I do not see where the Honourable Ráo Bahádur SATHE'S and the Honourable Dewán Bahádur GODBOLE'S objection exists. The thing is that, if the amendment as drafted by the Honourable Ráo Bahádur SATHE is accepted, it would open up a door not only for casual employment, but also for employment in factories, and no hard and fast line could be drawn whereby we could employ boys for domestic purposes and prevent them from going to factory labour. In fact, if the amendment is accepted, I think what would be possible is the sweating of child labour in factories and also perhaps the employment for casual purposes, and what the majority of the select committee think, and thought at that time, was that it was absolutely necessary to prevent the sweating of boys for factory labour; at least the majority of the select committee looked at it from this point of view, viz., that it is absolutely impossible to burn the candle at both ends. In other words it is impossible to get work out of boys and give them efficient schooling at the same time. What the Honourable Ráo Bahádur SATHE calls efficient schooling for a few hours in a day school may really speaking not be efficient schooling at all. He gave the instance of a factory school started at Sholapur, but he failed to tell us whether that school has been a success or a failure. I think that if a boy is kept at school from the age of 6 to 9 and then at the age of 9 he is weaned away from school and put on to factory labour, as is just possible according to the definition proposed by my honourable friend, then it is quite likely that he will forget all that he has learnt in the school and the three years' attendance at the school is likely to be wasted. There cannot be a half-way house between these two things and, if at all we care for conquering the illiteracy of the labouring classes, I believe we should not think of giving them schooling for a short time as well as get work out of them. I therefore think that if this amendment is accepted it would be impossible to give efficient schooling in any sort of school for factory boys or domestic boys and yet take work out of them. For these reasons I think the amendment ought to be rejected.

The Honourable Mr. F. G. PRATT:—Your Excellency,—I would like to corroborate what the Honourable Mr. KAMAT has said about the object of putting in the words "for the purpose of profit". The select committee in putting these words into the clause, to the best of my recollection, intended on the one hand to allow casual employment which will not interfere with education, and on the other hand, to prevent such a continuous and serious industrial employment as would in the opinion of the school committee constitute a serious tax upon the energies, physical and other, of the child, and therefore prevent them from getting the full benefit of the school hours. It seems to me, sir, that the Honourable Ráo Baḥádur SATHE'S amendment will only be carried by this Council if it comes to the conclusion that the school committees who will be entrusted with the working of this act are not fit to be trusted with the powers which this section 11 will invest them with. The issue is this. When a child is in employment the clause as we have drafted leaves the discretion with the school committee to decide whether that employment is of such a nature as to be objectionable. In the section as my honourable friend Ráo Bahádur SATHE wants it to stand, that discretion and that decision will be taken out of the hands of the school committee and will be invested in the hands of the trying magistrate. That is the result of putting in—

That means that it is the magistrate who has to decide whether that employment would interfere with the efficient instruction of the child. If the Council will refer to sub-clause 2 of clause 11 it will be seen that it is the school committee who has to lodge the complaint. The school committee will satisfy themselves as to the facts of the case and after perfectly considering it will come to the conclusion that a particular employment is objectionable and will thereupon authorize the prosecution or lodge a complaint in the magisterial court. When that thing is done the clause as proposed by my honourable friend Ráo Bahádur SATHE will enable the magistrate to go behind that decision of the school committee and to re-open facts on the representation of the powerful interests concerned of the mill-owners and the pleaders and the counsel, which they will bring to bear upon the question. The Honourable Dewán Bahádur GODBOLE in his remarks about this urged that the school committee should have power to allow some sort of a half-time system, a certain number of hours to be devoted to attendance and a certain number of hours to be devoted to employment of such a reasonable nature as will not interfere with primary education. Well sir, my reply is this, that in the section as we have drafted it the school committee has full power and full discretion to allow of such employment and if the school committee after consideration of the merits of any particular case were to come to the conclusion that the factory-owner affording employment to a child for a certain number of hours a day was at the same time providing education for it and that combination was not injurious to the efficient instruction of the child, the school committee, I have no doubt, in the exercise of their discretion, would allow it. There is nothing in the clause as it is in the bill which will interfere with the exercise of such discretion on the part of the school committee.

On the other hand, to take that discretion away from the school committee would I think be a very dangerous course. After all, who is more suited to decide upon difficult questions of this kind? The third class magistrate who will try these cases or the trained and experienced councillors, interested in education, who have been elected by the local authority to sit on the school committee and manage the educational affairs of the municipality? Is not such a committee much better fitted to be entrusted with such powers and such discretion than the magistrate who might for the time being be sitting on the bench and hearing arguments of pleaders and barristers in cases of this kind?

I would also like to point out that in entrusting this discretion and these powers to the school committee we are doing what has been already done in clause 8 of the bill where it is the school committee which decides whether a child which is not attending a recognized school is receiving instruction in other ways which can be accepted as efficient. One of the reasonable excuses for absence is: "Where the child is receiving, otherwise than in a recognized primary school, instruction which in the opinion of the school committee is efficient". Not in the opinion of the magistrate but in the opinion of the school committee. The magistrate will not be allowed, will be debarred from hearing any argument that the child is receiving instruction in any way, and it is the school committee under section 8 (b) which will have to decide it, and their decision will be final. On the same analogy, I submit, sir, that it is reasonable and proper that the school committee should have the discretion of deciding under section 11 of the act. At any rate I think we may confidently expect that the school committee who will be entrusted with the working of this act and anxious to make it a success will certainly not interfere with casual employment such as picking tennis balls and taking a blind man out for a walk, but on the other hand will prevent the employment of a child in continuous and serious industrial employment which will undermine the health and education of the child. For these reasons I oppose the amendment, and I hope the Council will allow the school committee to continue the exercise of the powers and discretion vested by section 11 of this act.

The Honourable Mr. PHEROZE C. SETHNA:—Your Excellency,—I rise to say a few words in support of the amendment of the Honourable Ráo Bahádur SATHE. It seems to me that his amendment clears the ground and removes what doubts are apparently in the minds of even the majority of the members of the select committee. The quotation which the Honourable Ráo Bahádur SATHE read out from the majority report of the select committee explains my meaning. They there say: "But we are not in favour of permitting the employment of children of school-going age, because it appears to us that this must prejudice their health and education". The members of the select committee, I mean the majority of them, are in favour of the casual employment of children of school-going age, but they leave the decision in the hands of the school committee and endeavour to help the school committee by the insertion of the words "for the purpose of profit", that is to say, that the school committee will withhold permission where the children are employed for the purpose of profit.

The opinions expressed by honourable members who oppose this amendment deal principally with the fear that if the Honourable Ráo Bahádur SATHE'S amendment passes it will enable the school committee to permit boys of school-going age to attend factories. I for one contend that this will not be so, but that on the other hand the Honourable Ráo Bahádur SATHE'S amendment will make the position of the school committee much clearer. The clause clearly lays down that permission will not be given in a case where children are employed for the purpose of profit. Instances have been quoted by various speakers such as the employment of children for picking up tennis balls, sweeping office floors, running errands, etc. I suppose it is in the minds of the majority of the committee that such occupations cannot be considered to be for the purpose of profit. It might, however, be argued, and rightly, that even such employment might be considered as being for the purpose of profit to the employer in the sense that he engages the services of a child or children on smaller pay and saves money which he would otherwise have to pay to an adult or adults. The school committee would certainly be in great suspense whether to construe such a case as coming within the purview of employment for the purpose of profit or otherwise.

Again, sir, this section can easily be circumvented by those who want to do so. Suppose a servant lives with his family in the compound of the house occupied by his employer and has with him children of school-going age, who help the father in his work. Suppose the father gets a pay of Rs. 12. If the school committee consider the employment of these children as being for the purpose of profit, then it would be easy to arrange that the children receive no pay themselves but that the father instead of receiving Rs. 12 gets Rs. 16 or Rs. 20 or more and his children, before or after school hours, would be running errands, sweeping floors and doing various other things and thereby circumvent the "profit" clause of this bill.

The Honourable Sir MAHADEV CHAUBAL:—Who would be making profit in that case?

The Honourable Mr. SETHNA:—At any rate the object of the bill would not be served. Where is it provided that school boys should not do work of any kind?

My Lord, the main contention is that the school children should be prevented from joining factories and it is argued that the Honourable Ráo Bahádur SATHE'S amendment will enable them to do so. I contend that this is not possible. According to the Factory Act children can only work for six hours at the most. If in addition to these six hours it is contemplated by factory owners to open schools in the neighbourhood of factories for the purpose of primary education it will follow that they will have to put in some more hours at such schools. Now what the particular hours of attendance in such schools will be will not be determined by the school committee but Government will have a say in the matter. Clause 2 (1) gives the definition of the word "attend". It runs as follows: "To 'attend' a recognized primary school means to be present for instruction at such school on such days and at such time or times on each day as may be required by the school committee with the approval of the prescribed educational authority." No educational authority would lay down that an hour or two would suffice for the factory children, and I have it on the authority of an eminent educationist in this Council that at least four hours a day would be considered necessary for the primary education of school-going children of that age. This would mean, sir, that children will have to work for six hours in the factories and in addition put in four more hours at the factory school, so that these children would be required to work for longer hours than the average adult.

Let us assume a more favourable case. Suppose some factory employers are liberally inclined and will be content with, say, only three hours' labour in the factory on the part of these children and that they attend school for four hours, viz., seven hours a day. Now it might be argued that in such cases perhaps the school committee would agree and the children consequently suffer. Such liberality can hardly be expected from the factory employer, but even if it were possible it would rest with the school committee to decide whether such an arrangement, namely, three hours in the factory and four hours in the school attached to the factory, would not be construed to be interfering with the education of the children. In nine cases out of ten I take it, sir, (no matter whether engaged by millowners or others) the school committee will hold, and ought to hold, that this would seriously interfere with the education of the children, and thereby the children of school-going age will be prevented from working in factories.

Again, my Lord, assuming that this enactment works harshly for the first year or two from the point of view of the parents of the children, the parents will soon see that rather than send their children to factories or to factories and schools, it will be to their own interest to allow these children only to attend schools at the ages prescribed, because thereby not only will their physique be improved but they will be mentally so greatly profited that they will make up for lost time by earning better wages when they join factories after the compulsory school-going period is over.

PRIMARY EDUCATION BILL.

[4TH DECEMBER 1917.] [Mr. Phiroze C. Sethna; Mr. C. N. Seddon; Mr. J. G. Covernton.]

These are the reasons which ought to weigh with the honourable members of this Council, for the Honourable Ráo Bahádur SATHE'S amendment, I repeat, will not enable factory owners to employ children as is sought to be made out by those who spoke against this amendment.

I trust that honourable members will see their way to support this amendment because to my mind it is but a paraphrase of the original clause of the bill and removes whatever doubts there may be regarding casual employment.

The Honourable Mr. C. N. SEDDON:—Your Excellency,—The select committee admitted that there was some fault to be found with the wording of clause 11, but they were quite clear as to their intentions. I may say that if the Honourable Ráo Bahádur SATHE could propose some amendment, or would propose some amendment, which would secure the possibility of casual labour and at the same time cut out factory employment, I dare say that both in the select committee and here a good many members would have been found to support him. But he is quite clear in what he says, namely, that he intends to allow factory labour for children under 11 years who are forced to attend school, and this is what we particularly wish to avoid. We think that we allow casual labour by our wording of this clause, and we shall be very glad if anybody would suggest any other wording which can be considered more suitable. We do intend in any case to prevent, if we can, the employment of children under 11 years in factories. Under the amendment of the Honourable Ráo Bahádur SATHE it would be possible to force a child of 9 years of age to work in a factory for 6 hours and then sit 4 hours in school. We want to avoid that. Six hours is the half time, I understand, and 4 hours is the minimum time for schooling. Even if it were 9 hours altogether, it would be a monstrous strain for a child to undergo. So that I feel, and those who think with me feel, that this impossible task should not be laid upon the children. We feel sure that it cannot fail to do them a serious injury.

Now there are one or two arguments brought in in favour of factory labour. It has been said that this introduction of compulsory education will be a great shock and that we should mitigate it as far as possible. But this particular point is a trifling matter really, as it is only a few children who are employed in factories. I suppose that for one child who is employed in a factory there are hundreds who are not employed in factories or not employed at all. That being so, the factory question will have no serious effect upon the willingness of municipalities to adopt this act and to enforce compulsory education. Even in the case of those municipalities, like Sholapur and Ahmedabad, which have considerable factory interests, I think they will be quite unable to resist the pressure of public opinion if compulsory education is introduced in other places. It will be impossible for the factory interests to keep it out in Sholapur or Ahmedabad. If Poona or Nagar or any other place adopts this compulsory act, Sholapur and Ahmedabad will be forced to do the same. They will be quite unable to resist it. We feel, therefore, that whatever disadvantages there may be—I think some were pointed out by the Times of India—they are of no weight. We think that 9 or 10 hours' work for a child is quite intolerable and ought not to be allowed at any cost, and we think further that, if any industry really requires the labour of children of 9 and 10 years of age, it is very questionable whether such industry is worth protecting.

With these words I propose to vote against the amendment.

The Honourable Mr. J. G. COVERNTON:—Your Excellency,—The honourable mover of this amendment has made a reference in the first place to the educational department and its connection with the question of half time and the preparation of the curriculum for half-time pupils, and also to myself in regard to a copy of the Right Honourable Herbert Fisher's bill which I was glad to be able to offer to him. I am sorry, however, that he does not seem to me to have made a good use of that copy. I think with the copy of the bill I also lent him a copy of Mr. Fisher's speech. The Honourable Ráo Bahádur SATHE no doubt read the bill, but I doubt whether he read Mr. Fisher's speech also, and with your permission I should like to read a very short portion of Mr. Fisher's speech which bears directly on this question and which shows the position taken up by educationists and at any rate by the educational section of the cabinet in England. Mr. Fisher says:—"At the present moment the effect of our elementary school education is greatly harmed by the work which is imposed on children out of school hours. They are liable to be employed for three hours before the school opens and for some hours after the school closes, and the general opinion of my inspectors is that of all reforms affecting elementary education there is none more vital than the enforcement of strict limitation of the employment of children in their school-going days. This is not merely a question of scholastic efficiency; it affects the physical welfare of the race. We have now an overwhelming mass of evidence to the effect that the health of our children suffers from premature or excessive employment. You may trace the evil effects in diminished height and weight, in curvature of the spine, in cardiac affections, and in deficiency of the senses, especially the sense of vision and in the bad dentition of our working classes. The reports of our school medical service are full of them. Accordingly, we propose that no child under 12 shall be employed for profit." It will be noticed that the words are almost the same as the select committee has adopted here. Mr. Fisher then goes on to say: "We have already been anticipated by bye-laws passed in some of our large municipalities." It has also been provided in England that no child under 14 shall be employed for more than a very limited extent in addition to going to school. Apart from Mr. Fisher's speech I have been able to look up certain opinions passed by the medical inspectors of the board. I won't trouble the Council by reading any long extracts, but there are one or two points that I should like to make. Since the war began in England under pressure of circumstances there has been a tendency to revert to child labour, but the Board of Education condemns that and is doing its best to put a stop to it.

In the report on the medical inspection of school children in England which was submitted to the Board of Education several opinions have been quoted. A particular opinion of one medical inspector is quoted in regard to the question of half-timers. He says that it is a very serious problem. The physical condition of such children is deplorable. Then he gives various ailments to which such children are subject. Well, these are some of the opinions of the medical faculty and the inspectors and Minister of Education in England where, if I may say so, the general sanitary conditions of factories are superior to those in India. That being so, the employment of children of the age contemplated in this country on factory or other labour in addition to school work should, in my opinion, be checked as far as possible.

A reference in this matter has been made to the educational department by some honourable members and in that connection I want to make two points clear. In the first place the officers of the educational department are servants of Government and if it is decided that a half-time system is to be followed in some schools it is the duty of the educational department to draw up a curriculum under that system and to make the best of it. It does not follow that the individual officers of the department or the department as such necessarily approve of such an arrangement. Secondly, the half-time curriculum and the action of the department in regard to those schools were undertaken rather in connection with the working of the Factory Act than with the ordinary operations of the department; that is to say, as the Factory Act provides for half-time schools for factory children, it was the duty of the department to draw up a scheme accordingly. But if you ask me whether in the abstract as an educationist I would prefer that those children should not be treated as half-timers but should be dealt with in the ordinary way and should be allowed to be exempted from attending mills or undergoing employment of any sort, I should certainly answer in the affirmative.

The Honourable Ráo Bahádur SATHE, I am afraid, gave his case away rather too openly (I do not know whether it was an accident) when he said that after all one reason for the employment of children was a very obvious reason and one which would appeal to many employers, viz., that if you employ a child for certain kinds of work you need pay that child three or four rupees only a month, whereas if you employ an adult for the same kind of work you will have to pay him nine or ten or eleven rupees a month. But, sir, we surely ought not to allow children to be employed in occupations detrimental to their health, detrimental to their growth, and therefore detrimental to the rising generation and detrimental to the country. We ought not, I say, to allow work entailing results of that kind merely for the sake of saving employers the difference between three rupees and nine rupees.

The Honourable Mr. G. F. KEATINGE:—Your Excellency,—I confess that clause 11, as it stands now, seems to me to be very inelastic. The arguments so far of most of the honourable members of the select committee who defended the wording of it seem to be based on the case of factory labour. But there are, I think, as pointed out by the Honourable Ráo Bahádur SATHE, a good many cases where it would not be in the least desirable to leave the position as it stands now.

Section 11, as it stands now, might prevent the employment of children even for casual labour for one or two hours a day. It is argued, I understand, by the Honourable Mr. SEDDON that it is for the school committee to decide whether they would institute any prosecution or not in these cases. But it seems to me to be very difficult for the employer of labour to escape from the liability of being prosecuted at any time by the school committee unless on every occasion when he wished to employ a boy he went to the school committee and asked if there was any objection. I do not know whether the school committee would be prepared to give a decision off-hand. It seems to me that the practical effect would be that boys of the age of nine would not be able to get casual employment of one or two hours a day which might be otherwise unobjectionable.

I cannot see what objection there would be to the insertion of the words proposed by the Honourable Ráo Bahádur SATHE. It would then be for the magistrate to decide whether such employment did interfere with the education of the boy.

The Honourable Mr. PRATT and the Honourable Mr. SEDDON have said that it would be intolerable that boys who are doing six hours' work a day should be compelled to work four hours more in the school. I quite agree with them, and I think that that is the view that the magistrate will take; and in point of fact the effect will be that people will not be able to employ a boy for long hours. The Honourable Ráo Bahádur SATHE'S amendment will, in reality, make this section as elastic as the magistrate may consider to be reasonable, and will be fair both to the boy and to the school committee.

The Honourable Sir MAHADEV BHASKAR CHAUBAL:—Your Excellency,—I rise to oppose this amendment moved by the Honourable Ráo Bahádur SATHE. Most of the reasons against it have been brought out in the debate. I wish to impress upon the Council the fact that the object of this section is to fix the liability of the employer of child labour. So far as the parent of the child is concerned, his or her liability is provided for by section 7 It is the duty, under section 7, of the parent of every child to cause the child to attend a recognised primary school. The parent's liability is satisfied, so long as the parent makes him attend a school during the specified hours and receiving instruction there. But the question arises as to who should be liable, if the child accepted regular employment for profit for working out of school hours. We in select committee by a majority decided that it was not in the interests of the child that any further strain should be put upon him by being made to work regularly for profit out of school hours by accepting employment which was likely to impair his health and physique by overwork. The object, we thought, would be better attained by throwing this liability upon the employer. At the same time all, including the Honourable Ráo Bahádur SATHE, were agreed that this criminal liability was not incurred by any casual or occasional employment of a child such as picking up tennis balls for an hour or so in the evening. We cudgelled our brains for a long time to see exactly what wording would appropriately provide for what was in the minds of us all. The amendment moved, however, in my opinion entirely fails to carry out the desired object. On the contrary the proposed amendment is likely to encourage the mischief the prevention of which was aimed at.

I will give an instance of employment outside factories. A child attends school, whatever be the hours of attendance in a recognised school, either in the morning or in the afternoon. As we have seen, there is no criminal liability incurred by the parent so far. But suppose a person has two or three domestic servants working at his house whom he has got to pay Rs. 10 or Rs. 12 a month. It may be cheaper to employ two or three children out of school hours and get the household work done by them. In my opinion this would be cruel treatment of the children which should if possible be prevented. We thought it was best to leave it to the judgment and discretion of the school committee to distinguish between casual employment which need not be visited with any punishment and regular employment for profit which was likely to prejudicially affect the health of children. In fact, you cannot work the act unless you put some confidence in the discretion and judgment of the school committees which will be appointed.

The school committee will consist of men of common sense, practical men of the world, who will consider in each case whether the employment of the child is casual employment by the person who is hauled up before them as the employer of labour, or whether he employs the children under circumstances which bring him under the criminal liability provided for by this bill. They will see if it is continuous employment in industrial occupation in addition to the school hours which is likely to affect the health of the child. Under the amendment proposed what is there to prevent, for instance, an employer of labour or a mill-owner or factory owner from employing children at night, say, between the hours of 8 to 10 or 11 ?

The Honourable Ráo Bahádur SATHE:—The Factory Act prohibits the employment of children at night.

The Honourable Sir MAHADEV CHAUBAL:—No doubt, but that is only children of a certain age.

I was going to point out that under the English Act of 1901 the employment of children under the age of 12 is absolutely prohibited. It is not open at all to employ children under 12. Here we have got to make some provision for the two years between 9 and 11 which are common to this act and the factory legislation. And personally I have no objection, nor do I think the Honourable Mr. PATEL would have any objection whatever, to accept any amendment which will carry out the intention which everybody has in view, namely, an amendment which will permit the sort of casual employment that we have been speaking about, but at the same time will prevent the employment of organised child labour in the way in which all of us wish to stop it. Supposing you take away the words "for the purpose of profit" which is the first portion of the Honourable Ráo Bahádur SATHE'S amendment, what does it do? The employer still becomes criminally liable whether it is for profit or not. The words "for the purpose of profit" were introduced because unremunerated work was more likely to be casual and unobjectionable.

Now something was said about factory schools. You know that section 7 and the definition of "to attend" refer to a recognised school. I heard from the Honourable Ráo Bahádur SATHE that a school has been started at Sholapur.

PRIMARY EDUCATION BILL.

[4TH DECEMBER 1917.] [Sir Mahádev Bhaskar Chaubal; Ráo Bahádur Ganesh Krishna Sathe; Mr. Balkrishna Sitaram Kamat; the President; Mr. Dattatraya Venkatesh Belvi.]

It is called a factory school. But I do not think factory schools are recognised schools yet. At least I am not aware of any school being recognised by the department of education. Therefore it is not proper to argue about what the operation of this act is likely to be on the assumption that factory schools exist all over the country and there are facilities for boys to attend them. Let them be started, let their curriculum be subjected to an examination by the department, let them come to a judgment as to whether the education which will be imparted there during certain hours for children between certain ages is appropriate or not. After that is decided, then only would it be proper to start a discussion as to the propriety or otherwise of the wording of the amendment proposed in the latter part of the section. When factory schools which are considered by the Department as adequately provided for imparting elementary instruction are started, then we can very well amend the act so as to provide that all children who are employed in factories and attend the recognised schools attached to them should be exempt from the operation of this act; but we have not got any factory schools yet. We do not know whether the factory school which is said to be started in Sholapur or which may be started in Ahmedabad will be schools which Government or the department will recognise for the purposes of elementary education.

The Honourable Rao Bahadur SATHE :—The factory school in Sholapur was started by Government.

The Honourable Sir MAHADEV CHAUBAL :—May be, but I wish to know whether it is recognised for the purposes of elementary education by the department of education. If it is recognised by the department, then I do not think the parent of any factory child or the employer of such child can be hauled up under this bill, because under the wording of it the boy is attending a recognised school and therefore is not liable to any penalty at all. For these reasons both the amendments proposed are undesirable and should be rejected.

The Honourable Mr. BALKRISHNA SITARAM KAMAT :—With your Excellency's permission, as suggested by the Honourable Sir MAHADEV CHAUBAL, I would like to propose an amendment. I want to know whether your Excellency will permit me to propose an amendment without the requisite notice.

His Excellency the PRESIDENT :—I have already ruled that I will not allow any amendment on matters of principle to any clause without requisite notice. I think I must hold to that ruling.

The Honourable Mr. DATTATRAYA VENKATESH BELVI :—Your Excellency,—I have listened with great care to the discussion on this amendment. It seems to me that the arguments advanced by the Honourable Ráo Bahádur SATHE are unanswerable. If we keep in view the main object of the bill, for whose benefit is this bill intended? Not for the classes who are well-to-do and who already know the benefits of education. To my mind the object of the bill is to infuse better education among classes who do not at present take advantage of the educational facilities which obtain in the Presidency. What will be the effect of keeping this particular clause as it stands in the bill? Will it not frighten people who live in municipal areas and will it not lead to an exodus of the poor people from municipal areas where this act may be introduced? Will not the labourer say to his son "Well, my son, let us better leave this place and go to a place where we may be at liberty to earn what we can"? Will not that be an inevitable effect of keeping the wording as it stands? It is all very well for men who can make thousands a month to say that there should be no sweating of child labour. It is perfectly intelligible. But we have to realise the position of poor parents who find it extremely difficult in this poor country to make two ends meet.

Education is a blessing; there is no doubt about it. But unfortunately for us, we are all very poor people. We have to make the best of the situation in which we have been placed by God. It is no use taking the example of a country like England. Even in England we find that it took over 40 years to bring in a bill which provides that the employment of children below a certain age, namely, 12, I understand, is penal. We are just beginning to introduce compulsory education into not the whole of the Presidency, but into particular specified areas of it, and we wish to run fast. It seems to me that nothing can be more unreasonable than to say that children should not be put to hard labour even when they have to earn a small amount of money to supplement the income of their parents. Which is better? To starve a child, to starve a whole family, or to give it some sort of education provided he and his family live? If it were possible for a father to educate his son without putting the son to any labour, he will be very glad to do it. People allow their children to work in some other employment not because they like it as a matter of pleasure, but because they have to do it as a matter of necessity. That point should be borne in mind. We have to take into consideration the peculiar economic conditions of the country. We have no right whatever to impose upon poor people conditions which obtain in rich countries like England.

Now, it has been very frankly admitted by the Honourable Sir MAHADEV CHAUBAL that the wording of the particular clause which we are now considering is not quite apt and to me it seems that he was prepared to accept an amendment if one was proposed. Is it right for this legislature to pass a bill into law leaving a wording which is admittedly unsuitable as it stands? It may perhaps be said that we may trust the members of the school committee. But after all, the speeches which we make, not even the speech of the Honourable Sir MAHADEV CHAUBAL, will be of the least value in a court of law. We know that it is an elementary principle of law that speeches delivered at meetings of the Legislative Councils are of absolutely no use when judges and magistrates have to interpret the law. It is admitted that the clause admits of a vague interpretation to the effect that even casual employment may be penal. It is said that we may trust to the good sense of the school committee. But it is not for people who are supposed to put a reasonable interpretation upon sections of a law that it is enacted. We have to see, taking the worst case, what is possible in the interpretation of a clause like this. It is most unwise to trust to the discretion of the school committee. What guarantee is there that a poor man will not be harassed by the school committee? We were told that we could not trust to the discretion even of the presidents of municipalities, but we are now told that we can very safely pass a law the wording of which is not apt and at the same time we can afford to trust to the good sense of the school committee. It seems to me that it is a poor compliment to the members of this legislature to pass a law of this kind and then say that we should trust to the good sense of the school committee.

I think it is much better to accept the amendment which has been suggested to this Council by the Honourable Ráo Bahádur SATHE. To me it seems that the amendment is a very good one and deserves the support of every member of this Council who chooses to bear in mind the peculiar economic conditions of this country. It is not for members of this Council only to consult their own incomes and ask "Why should a man put his son or his daughter to any hard labour? He has no business to do it. He must look to the physique and health of the child". It is not for people who are sitting in this Council that the law is enacted, but it is for the benefit of the whole of the population of the Presidency which consists of poor people.

Now your Excellency will see that a gentleman who has the high education and the long experience of the Honourable Mr. KEATINGE agrees with the Honourable Ráo Bahádur SATHE that the amendment proposed by the Honourable Ráo Bahádur SATHE is an eminently sensible one and he sees the danger of keeping the wording of the clause as it now stands. I make no doubt that at some time the Honourable Mr. KEATINGE was a magistrate and he must have exercised magisterial powers for a number of years. Now this clause is to be interpreted not by a magistrate of the long experience of the Honourable Mr. KEATINGE, but by a magistrate of the third class drawing Rs. 50 or a bench magistrate who does not know what law is and who does not know how to interpret it.

I trust this Council will be pleased to accept the amendment of the Honourable Ráo Bahádur SATHE in spite of the cant which is frequently brought forward that the select committee has done everything to consider each clause and it will not be necessary to go behind what they have done. We should brush aside an argument of that kind. We are not to surrender our reason to the decision of the select committee. Gentlemen who acted on the select committee naturally believe that what they did was eminently satisfactory, but they must convince the majority of the members of this Council that what they say is reasonable.

With these words I support very heartily the amendment of the Honourable Ráo Bahádur SATHE.

The Honourable Mr. PURUSHOTAMDAS THAKURDAS:—Your Excellency,—I rise to support the amendment of my honourable friend Ráo Bahádur SATHE. The question before the Council is not what the select committee's intentions were, but it resolves itself, my Lord, in my opinion to this, that for the fault of not finding a better wording we are to allow the passing into legislation of an act with a clause bearing the very strictest meaning that could be attached to the clause that is now before the Council. The bill, as we all know, is a permissive one and when passed into law it will be taken up by the municipalities at their discretion. Is this Council prepared to say to the municipality that has the courage to enforce compulsory education that it shall enforce that compulsory education under the very strictest conditions and the strictest interpretations of this act? After all what is there to prevent the labouring class and the other classes for which the select committee have shown so much solicitude from migrating from within the limits of that municipality to neighbouring ones? In view of the fact that labour for the factory and labour for other purposes is getting scarcer day by day, and also in view of the fact that it will not be right to the parents of children that are employed in factories if we do not give them the credit of having the ordinary human feelings towards their children, is this Council prepared to pass into legislation a clause the interpretation of which is admitted to err on the side of strictness if not on the side of severity?

I fully sympathise with the feelings of the members of the select committee when they show so much solicitude for the building up of the constitution of the children. This bill, in the first instance, has been conceived with a view to give education, and I am quite prepared to admit that in giving this education and in compelling children to take education this Council should take such precautions as will keep up the constitution of a child and prevent it from being seriously run down by the insidious effects of hard labour. But at the same time, sir, I cannot help feeling that after all mere rest is not sufficient to keep up the constitution; it is also a question of filling the stomach. If the select committee is convinced that the economic conditions of the districts are such that you can very well take away children from a source of revenue to their parents, and the select committee have absolutely no doubt that all those who employ their children in factories and private service do it merely wantonly, and not because the children have poor parents, only then can this Council pass this clause with the strict interpretation that has been put forward by the Honourable Sir MAHADEV CHAUBAL on the clause under discussion. The Honourable Sir MAHADEV CHAUBAL has very candidly told us that he is quite prepared to accept another amendment if it can be worded so as to convey the meaning which the select committee have in view——

PRIMARY EDUCATION BILL.

[The President; Sir Mahadev Bhaskar Chaubal; Mr. Purushotamdas Thakurdas; Mr. Chunilal Vijbhukhandas Mehta.] [4TH DECEMBER 1917.]

His Excellency the PRESIDENT:—I must remind my honourable friend that it is the Honourable Mr. PATEL who should accept it.

The Honourable Sir MAHADEV CHAUBAL:—Personally, I have no objection to accept any amendment of that kind.

The Honourable Mr. PURUSHOTAMDAS THAKURDAS:—The Honourable Mr. KAMAT has readily offered to put in one and your Excellency is not pleased to allow it, perhaps owning to precedents. I also submit, sir, that if none of these amendments that are before the Council appeals to the Council, we should oppose passing into legislation a most important clause in one of the first bills of its kind that is passed in British India, because this clause is much too strict.

My fear, sir, as regards this bill is this. To begin with it is made permissive because it was feared that it would not do to make it compulsory for the municipal areas for want of finances. Whenever a municipality proposes to put this act into operation there will be additional taxation on the tax-payers of that area. If at the same time we are going to do anything serious, if the act is going to bring any serious trouble to the labouring classes in those districts, I submit, sir, that there is very little doubt that the act will become a dead letter and no municipality will either introduce it or take advantage of it. Are we going to allow rather a lenient construction on the whole thing or are we going to insist upon the strictest conditions for the children for whose welfare the honourable mover has brought forward this bill? I fully sympathise with the Director of Public Instruction in the views that he has put forward, but I submit, sir, that although technically those views might be correct, this Council should bear in mind that it is only a permissive bill, and after all, I submit, that the easiest acceptable interpretation should be put upon this bill. I therefore appeal to the Council to do nothing that will in any way tend to make this bill a dead letter or make this bill very hesitatingly acceptable to any of the municipalities. I do not think that the amendment proposed by the Honourable Mr. SATHE will in any way encourage the employment of children in factories any more than it is done at present. The only question, therefore, is which of the two would we prefer? Would we prefer that children who are employed in factories should have the chance of receiving a little more education than at present, admitting that it is not the ideal one that one would like to have, or would we prefer that the whole thing should be put off from day to day until we get the ideal? With these remarks, sir, I hope this Council will accept the amendment.

The Honourable Mr. CHUNILAL VIJBHUKHANDAS MEHTA:—Your Excellency,—I am not at all surprised at the agreeable reception that has been given to the Honourable Ráo Bahádur SATHE'S amendment. He said distinctly in the select committee, and he said distinctly to-day, that his amendment does not make any differentiation between ordinary labour and factory labour and in spite of that categorical confession we find several honourable members of this Council, in my opinion rightly, supporting the amendment. I am surprised that the Honourable Sir MAHADEV CHAUBAL should have stated, as he did yesterday, that in my opinion the only classification of children in the world was children who were in the factories and who were outside factories. Apparently it ought to have been perfectly clear to the Honourable Sir MAHADEV CHAUBAL from the amendment that stands in my name, substantially the same as that of the Honourable Ráo Bahádur SATHE, that no such classification was at all intended by me.

Sir MAHADEV CHAUBAL also objects to the addition of the words which have been very wisely suggested to be put in by the Honourable Ráo Bahádur SATHE and which also appear in the amendment of Dewán Bahádur GODBOLE and myself. Those words are, "so as to interfere with the efficient instruction of such child". It appears to me that to leave out those words as suggested by the Honourable Sir MAHADEV CHAUBAL is indeed reactionary, because if the words were in the act, then at any rate either the school committee or the magistrate would be able to take cognizance and punish cases where employment was resorted to which would interfere with the efficient instruction of children.

The Honourable Sir MAHADEV CHAUBAL quoted the case of a man employing a child at night who has been learning in the school during the day and who has been going through the full primary classes in the day, and he said that that could very well be done if the words "so as to interfere with the efficient instruction of the child" were not removed. Surely for Sir MAHADEV CHAUBAL to suggest that those words should be removed means an acquiescence in the employment of such a child all through the night. Surely he gave little credit to the school committee or to the magistrate when he said that the employment would be permitted during the night of a child which had already gone through the full course of education during the day, as if he could be fit for instruction the next day.

The whole issue, as has been pointed out by several speakers before, means this: Are we or are we not going to prohibit employment of children which will add to the scanty resources of the people of an admittedly poor country like India? If the Council is convinced that such supplementary additions are not necessary and that circumstances and economic conditions will afterwards adjust themselves to the working of this act, then by all means pass the section as it stands. But those who have experience of conditions existing in the mofussil municipalities like my honourable friend Mr. BELVI must see that it is going to cause the greatest hardship to poor parents, and it is on that ground, your Excellency, that I support the amendment that has been moved by the Honourable Ráo Bahádur SATHE.

It has been stated that we should give latitude to the school committee to decide upon each particular case. Apparently it has been forgotten that in the first place it is the whole municipality that will have to suggest the course which must be adopted before education can be made compulsory. After the whole municipality has done that, then comes in the educational department of Government which must give its sanction or which must approve of the course that has been suggested, and it is only after that that the act can at all come into force. Is it wiser to give discretion to the school committee which may consist of perhaps three or four members, or is it wiser to rely upon the whole municipality backed up by the approval of the educational department of Government? If you leave this provision as it stands and permit the school committee to interpret it in the most loose way, it means encouraging an absolute defiance of section 11. I do not think, sir, that this ought to be permitted by this Council and I hope that the Honourable Ráo Bahádur SATHE'S amendment will be passed.

The Honourable Mr. LALUBHAI SAMALDAS MEHTA:—Your Excellency,—I may say that I am not an employer of factory labour, nor do I hold any brief for them. I would be the first to support what my honourable friend Mr. SEDDON said that there should be no sweating of child labour. So far as that is concerned, I think there is no difference of opinion. The question is, as the Honourable Mr. SEDDON said and the Honourable Sir MAHADEV CHAUBAL said, whether the clause as it stands exactly solves the difficulty. My honourable friend Mr. KEATINGE says it does not. Listening to the debate in the Council to-day one feels rather surprised to think of the fact whether the Honourable Mr. PRATT, who said that he has more confidence in the school committee than in the magistrate, represents the views of the Government. On the other side, we have the Honourable Mr. BELVI, who has been always for self-government, strongly supporting this amendment and trusting the magistrate more than the committee. I am simply surprised at this. Possibly the Honourable Mr. PRATT is affected by the self-government atmosphere that we have at present. If so, we are progressing.

PRIMARY EDUCATION BILL.

[Mr. Lalubhai Samaldas Mehta; the President; Mr. Shridhar Balkrishna Upasani.] [4TH DECEMBER 1917.]

Your Excellency ruled just now that no amendments could be accepted. Technically they could not be accepted. I think there is only one precedent—I am talking from memory. I realise there is some difficulty in this particular case, but is it possible, your Excellency, to postpone the consideration of this clause for a few hours and go on with the next clause and then leave the members of the Council to——

His Excellency the PRESIDENT:—I know my honourable friend is always acting on the principle of suaviter in modo, but I may tell him that certain negotiations have been going on and I took the line which is, I think, only a fair line. Certain honourable members had been to me with reference to an amendment and I refused to admit it, and I think I am perfectly right in refusing any amendments right through. But my honourable friend Mr. PATEL came to me only a few moments ago suggesting a certain amendment and my answer to him was that, if he could get the honourable mover to agree, he could move the amendment and I was perfectly ready to admit it.

The Honourable Mr. LALUBHAI SAMALDAS MEHTA:—But can the honourable members get more time to do that?

His Excellency the PRESIDENT:—I think it is most unusual and I do not think it necessary to give any time.

The Honourable Mr. LALUBHAI SAMALDAS MEHTA:—My honourable friend Sir MAHADEV CHAUBAL said that under the proposed amendment there was no safeguard against the sweating of children. I agree that there is some difficulty. Efficient instruction does not necessarily mean instruction in a school. I think the whole question resolves itself into this, namely, which is a better course, whether to keep the clause as it is and leave the power in the hands of a committee, or to accept the amendment and leave the power to the magistrate, who, after all, will be able to decide a case much better, I believe, than the members of the school committee? If no compromise is come to, I propose to vote for the amendment.

The Honourable Mr. SHRIDHAR BALKRISHNA UPASANI:—May it please your Excellency,—I rise to support the amendment moved by my honourable friend Rão Bahádur SATHE. My Lord, we have in the first place to remember that the object of this bill is to provide for extension of primary education and our consideration, so far as this bill is concerned, must be limited to that proper object only. Your Excellency has very properly ruled that no amendment which is not accepted by the mover will be allowed, and I think that the amendment that he has moved as it stands covers all that is needed for the purpose that we want to secure by this bill. The amendment suggests that a child shall not be employed in a manner so as to interfere with his efficient instruction. I think, so far as the object of the bill is concerned, this provision is quite sufficient to secure it and we need not go further in this bill to absolutely prohibit employment of child labour.

This bill is not intended to legislate for regulation of the employment of child labour either in factories or elsewhere. So far as factories are concerned, there is already special legislation provided for that purpose in the Factory Act. Under that act a child below 9 cannot be employed in a factory and a child below 12 cannot be employed more than six hours. If it appear that six hours' work is dangerous to the children's health in the latter case when the child attends school, it will be open to Government, under the Factory Act, to reduce the hours from six to three, and in that case I do not think there will be any difficulty under the proposed amendment for the school authorities to allow these childern to attend as half-timers. As a matter of fact, our present school hours are far too long. The children have to attend for three hours in the morning and again for as many hours in the afternoon and even with these long hours of attendance what is the result secured? The result is that out of 6,70,000 children who attend our primary schools nearly one-third do not know even to read or write, and of the rest, 3,20,000, or more than half, are in the lower primary stage. That being the case it will be for the Council to consider whether it is necessary to keep the children daily for so many long hours in the morning and in the evening, and for that purpose to absolutely prohibit in their case all kind of employment.

It is admitted that considering the economic condition of the poorer classes for whose children this bill is mainly intended, it is absolutely necessary that this measure will have to be worked in a manner so as not to inflict any needless hardship on them or their children. The Honourable the Director of Public Instruction has referred us to the opinion of Mr. Fisher and other gentlemen on this point, but we have on record in our Council library the evidence taken by a special commission in England which examined nearly 200 witnesses on this very question of employment of child labour in the case of children who have to attend school. I have got a copy of their report in my hand. The evidence recorded in this report will show that a very large majority of the witnesses examined was for only restriction and not for absolute prohibition of employment of child labour. In fact many of the witnesses were of opinion that it was in the interests of the children that they should be allowed to do some work for a few hours and to earn something to have a good hearty breakfast rather than that they should be kept absolutely unemployed and be half starved on only one meal. I think in our country not only the children are half starved, but in many cases their parents also, and those parents who have to depend to any extent upon the wages of these children will be subjected to unnecessary hardship as also the children themselves if their employment is absolutely prohibited.

Under these circumstances, I think the clause should not be allowed to stand as it is. It is admitted by the Honourable Sir MAHADEV CHAUBAL that the clause as it stands does not cover all that the select committee intended to provide for. Their objection was chiefly as regards factory labour. The amendment of my honourable friend will cover all cases of employment which may interfere with the child's efficient education and will not be limited only to factory employment nor make any distinction between employment for profit or otherwise. Whether the work for which the child is employed be for the purpose of profit or not can make no difference if the amount of work to be done will be the same. That being the case, I think the clause should not be allowed to stand as it is and the words "for the purpose of profit" should be taken out and those proposed by the mover of this amendment ought to be inserted in their place so as to allow the employment of a child only in a manner which shall not interfere with the efficient instruction of that child. If it is found that it interferes with the efficient instruction of the child, then the school committee may interfere and the persons concerned may be punished.

With these words I fully support the amendment.

The Honourable Mr. RAGHUNATH PURSHOTTAM PARANJPYE:—Your Excellency,—I rise to oppose the amendment of my friend the Honourable Ráo Bahádur SATHE, and for these reasons.

In the first place, I might say that the very fact that we are legislating for the purpose of compulsory education shows that we are, to a certain extent, invading the rights and conveniences of parents. That is a thing which we must bear in mind. We cannot, in the interest of children, look only to the interest of the parents or their employers, and therefore it is no argument to say that this clause would work harshly towards parents or the employers, because the act is intended to do something harsh with respect to the parents and the employers in view of the larger interests of the children.

Some members said that if it is found that this employment works injuriously to the children, the parents will themselves find out the defects and they themselves will come to better ways. I think that it will be always found that there are parents, and there are also employers, who do not always look to the larger interests of the children. They look to their own immediate interests and it is in order that there should be roused an enlightened self-interest among parents that we are passing this act.

We have also been told by several members that England has had this act for 40 years and it is only during this year that Mr. Fisher has brought forward a bill for the stopping of the employment in factories of children under 12. Therefore we should wait in the same way, get 40 years' experience of imperfect compulsory education, and after that experience mend our ways. I think this shows that we are asked to lose absolutely all sight of the experience of other nations. If other countries have found that they made certain mistakes, it is the duty of statesmanship to profit by those mistakes and not go on committing them again until we ourselves, by bad experience, find out the error of our ways.

If the Honourable Ráo Bahádur SATHE'S amendment is carried, I have no doubt at all in my mind that what will happen in municipalities where this act is put into operation will be this. Factory owners will get round the school committees and say that they are going to have their own schools, possibly in their own compounds, where the school hours will be from 7 to 11 in the morning or 1 to 5 in the afternoon and the children will go to school in shifts of four hours and that will provide for the efficient instruction of the children, which, I take it, would be regular attendance for four hours. They will say that so far as efficient instruction is concerned it has been provided. I do not know what it otherwise means. Suppose a child goes to school without either working at home or doing anything else. Are you going to say that the child is not receiving efficient instruction? That child is regularly attending school. No committee or inspector who comes round can say that the child is not receiving efficient instruction. But we have got to see whether the child will receive any benefit from that instruction, and I do not think it would receive any benefit if it has also to work in factories in addition to these school hours.

I was rather surprised to find the Honourable Dewán Bahádur GODBOLE coming forward to support this amendment, because only this morning he has been reading us a heart-rending tale of the difficulty which children would experience in walking to school at a mile's distance. Now he does not find the least difficulty in allowing these boys to work in a factory for six hours in addition to four hours' schooling. If a choice is given to a child, I think he would prefer to walk four miles and not work in a factory rather than have a school near his own house and be made to study there for four hours in addition to the six hours' work in a factory. The clause, in fact, has been left intentionally vague. The Honourable Sir MAHADEV CHAUBAL told us that if any amendment could have been proposed which would get over this difficulty, i. e., avoid the regular employment of children in factories but at the same time allow casual employment of a domestic nature, the select committee would have been very glad to amend the clause in that manner. In this connection I might particularly refer to the Honourable Mr. BELVI'S remarks. He has got no leg to stand upon. He was a member of the select committee, but he did not attend it, and therefore I do not think the Honourable Mr. BELVI can be allowed the use of arguments of this nature.

Other people have been telling us that the three R's which alone we include in primary education can be learnt in a short time, even in a half-time school. I do not think so. We are often tempted to judge from our own experience of a maturer age and deduce that what is suitable for us would be suitable in the case of children also. But children do require a certain definite length of time in imbibing and in digesting what is taught to them. Therefore it will not do to say that in two hours' teaching every day the child would get over his three R's and be able to imbibe as much as a mature person may be able to do even in a shorter time. Children require a considerably greater amount of time in digesting all the instruction that is imparted them and in making actual use of this instruction. Therefore they have got to be in a school at least four hours a day. In fact, the department has got a rule that no day is to be counted as a full working day unless there is four hours' instruction.

I think that the school committees could very well be left to this common-sense working of this act. They have got first of all to see that the employment is really of such a nature as would not interfere with the efficient instruction of the child. That is what they would actually do In fact, even if the committee are so perverse as to bring before a magistrate one or two such cases, the magistrate will stop their bringing forward any more such cases by fining the man only one pie, and the committee will think twice before bringing forward such frivolous cases before the magistrate any more. I think therefore that the clause as it stands should be passed. Our great idea is that factory employment should not be allowed. Employment which is of a regular nature, which is likely to cause hardship and which is injurious to their health should be stopped. Casual employment such as for instance picking up balls and so on is not going to be stopped. In any case, we are not, at present at any rate, going to be in a socialistic age where every act of ours is to be regulated according to an act of Parliament. After all, the people who are to administer this act are common-sense people and they will work for their own people themselves. If they are perverse,—I myself think that the tendency of the committees would be towards leniency rather than strictness,—even if they are perverse, there is the magistrate who will have to try these cases, and I do not think that with these two safeguards, the school committee and the magistrate, any harm could come if the clause remains as it is.

On the other hand, if the Honourable Ráo Bahádur SATHE'S amendment is accepted, it will make it clear to every factory owner that provided he satisfies the main conditions, that is, if he allows the child to go to school for four hours, there is no harm in the least in employing that child for any further length of time, and the evil of child labour will continue. I think in the larger interests of this country it is not right for children up to 11 years of age to be employed in such surroundings, in such hard and regular labour which certainly is not consistent with the healthy upbringing and education of the child, and I hope this Council will not accept the amendment of the Honourable Ráo Bahádur SATHE.

The Honourable Mr. MUNMOHUNDASS RAMJI :—Your Excellency,—I rise to oppose the amendment moved by my honourable friend Mr. SATHE. This bill is proposed to introduce the means of adopting compulsory primary education in municipal areas, areas which are quite different from rural areas, and the fear is expressed by my honourable friend Dewán Bahádur GODBOLE about the earning capacity of the family being reduced if a child or two of that family is to be deprived of their earning during the training of their infancy period. The head of the family and other members who are adults, and the other children also who will be past the age of taking education, will be earning sufficient, and if there be any loss on account of the just application of this act to that area it would be quite open for these people to ask for more wages from the industries where they are employed. After all, what is the total amount that will be required to cope with that hardship? It will take so many years before it is applied generally by all municipal areas. If this act is applied, say, in a place like Poona or Ahmedabad or Surat, there the number of children will not be more than 1,000. I do not think it will be a 1,000 even, but I shall put it at a liberal figure of 1,000. If these young children are to be deprived of work earning 5 rupees per month, it means Rs. 5,000, a sort of tax on tax on the industries or trade of that particular area.

PRIMARY EDUCATION BILL.

[Mr. G. Carmichael; Mr. Munmohundass Ramji; Mr. Vithalbhai Jhaverbhai Patel; the President.] [4TH DECEMBER 1917.]

The Honourable Mr. CARMICHAEL:—Might I ask whether the clause also applies to boys employed by the hand-loom weavers in Poona?

The Honourable Mr. MUNMOHUNDASS RAMJI:—It will apply to everybody, but if we consider that it is essential in the interests of the growing population that they should take education at a certain period of their lives and they should not seek employment that would be detrimental to their health, then no other consideration ought to weigh in the minds of the people who have to administer this act. My argument is this: that it is safe to ask people who want to employ young children to contribute more towards the employment of adults rather than ask for employment of young children and save some money thereby. My point is that if these children are properly grown, I mean physically and mentally looked after in their younger life, in their after life they will be better citizens, they will be better able to earn more and better fitted to endure the hard work of the day. Therefore I think it would be much better if we pass this clause of the bill as it is drafted by the select committee.

The Honourable Mr. VITHALBHAI JHAVERBHAI PATEL:—Your Excellency,—Both sides have been so ably placed before this Council that I consider it waste of time to detain it any longer. I should, however, like to make one or two points clear. I had anticipated this opposition when I drafted my bill. Speaking for myself I am emphatically of opinion that the employment of children whom we are going to compel under the bill to attend school for a certain number of hours every day should be prohibited. Holding these views, but at the same time recognizing that there would be opposition in this Council, I in my original draft had stated that the employment of children should be prohibited only during school hours. When I gave notice of the bill, and submitted it, the same was returned to me, after some months, redrafted by the legal department, and I found that in the revised draft the words "during school hours" were dropped. I must say I was delighted to see those words dropped; and though the bill as redrafted by the legal department was subjected to some criticism at the first reading, it was not attacked on this point. Those honourable members who support the Honourable Ráo Bahádur SATHE never said a word about this particular clause when the bill passed through the first reading in this Council. In the select committee my honourable friends Ráo Bahádur SATHE and Mr. CHUNILAL MEHTA took exception to this employment clause for the first time. Now the question resolves itself into this: whether the employment by factory owners of children under compulsory attendance is to be prohibited or not? That is the sole question to my mind. We are generally agreed that the employment of children for domestic purposes or in a casual way should not be affected in any way by any provision in the bill. Doubt has been raised that if the clause be allowed to remain as it is, even this casual employment will be prohibited.

His Excellency the PRESIDENT:—May I ask my honourable friend to just see a copy of the Factory Act? There are many other industries which do not come under the Factory Act. Would he apply this clause to the children in those occupations? He refers entirely to factories; does that exclude children who are employed in various other industries, such as cabinet-making and so on, or any other industrial children?

The Honourable Mr. PATEL:—My object is to prevent the employment of children in a factory or any other industrial concern.

His Excellency the PRESIDENT:—Under the clause as it stands the honourable member has just told us that he wishes to confine his attention under this clause to factory children. Under the clause as the Honourable Ráo Bahádur SATHE wishes to amend it it would read so that the school committee would have the responsibility and discretion for all children. What is the objection to include all children and what is his reason for merely keeping to factory children?

PRIMARY EDUCATION BILL.

[4TH DECEMBER 1917.] [Mr. Vithalbhai Jhaverbhai Patel; Ráo Bahádur Ganesh Krishna Sathe; Mr. Purshotamdas Thakurdas.]

The Honourable Mr. PATEL:—The reason why I lay particular stress on the question of factory children is this. What I understand from the discussion is that it is at the back of the minds of several honourable members that it should be left open to the owners of factories to work the children after school hours.

The Honourable Ráo Bahádur SATHE:—You are doing me injustice.

The Honourable Mr. PATEL:—Not at all. Although your Excellency ruled that no amendment will be allowed without the usual notice, your Excellency was perfectly prepared to accept an amendment which I just showed to your Excellency; but your Excellency then stated that if my honourable friend Ráo Bahádur SATHE was willing and agreeable to it, then only your Excellency would permit that amendment to be put. That amendment was to the effect that employment of children in factories should be prohibited and not any other employment. But the Honourable Ráo Bahádur SATHE did not agree to it. I think it is generally agreed in this house that the employment of children in factories should be prohibited and yet my honourable friend Ráo Bahádur SATHE says that he is not willing to accept the amendment proposed to him. Then I ask what is at the back of his mind?

The Honourable Mr. PURSHOTAMDAS THAKURDAS:—Is the honourable member prepared to improve upon what is suggested by the Honourable Ráo Bahádur SATHE?

The Honourable Mr. PATEL:—What I suggested is this: I suggested that instead of the words "takes into his employment" in clause 11 (1) the words "takes into regular employment in connection with a factory or other industrial concern" may be substituted. This was the amendment that I suggested with the permission of His Excellency and which His Excellency was practically willing to allow and yet my honourable friend Ráo Bahádur SATHE is not willing to accept it and therefore I conclude that he and his advisers want that these children should be allowed to work in factories after school hours. Otherwise there is absolutely no reason why he should not accept the amendment that I have suggested. If he does not want these children to work in factories there seems no reason who he should not accept the amendment I have suggested.

With these few words I trust that the Council will throw off the amendment moved by the Honourable Ráo Bahádur SATHE.

The Honourable Ráo Bahádur GANESH KRISHNA SATHE:—Your Excellency,—The discussion has been very instructive and complete on this point and the arguments in favour and against it have been stated by various speakers. I will therefore take a very few minutes by way of reply.

Coming to the remarks of my honourable friend the Director of Public Instruction, I should like to tell him that I did read the speech of the Educational Minister Mr. Fisher. But in drafting this amendment I depended entirely on section 16 (a) of the Educational Bill of Mr. Fisher. With your Excellency's permission I will read that section. It says: "If any person employs a child in such a manner as to prevent the child from attending school according to the Education Acts and the bye-laws in force in the district in which the child resides".

That is what appears in the proposed clause 16, sub-clause (a), of the Educational Bill of Mr. Fisher. And in order to make it quite clear that I was not an advocate of factory labour and in order to make it quite clear that my clause should not in any way hamper the employment of children I particularly used the words "so as to interfere with the efficient instruction of such a child". If we enact the section in the way in which I propose it seems to me that it would create practically a non-possumus position for the factory owners to take children in employment.

My honourable friend Mr. PARANJPYE said that it was no use keeping a child for four hours in the school as it would not be able to retain what it has learnt. But in that case what are you going to do with boys who will merely attend for full five hours and who will not learn anything?

But, sir, coming to the other observations of the Director of Public Instruction, I may only make one or two observations. The first is that as the words "to attend" have been defined in the act and as it has been left to the school committee to fix the hours in consultation with educational authorities of Government, I always counted upon that fact as a sufficient protection. It was on that account that I specially used the words "so as to interfere with the efficient instruction of such a child", meaning thereby that the educational authorities would have always a voice in the matter and the education of children even if they were to be employed will not be allowed to suffer. Then another point is that throughout the discussions which took place in the select committee and here, what is passing in my mind is not to neglect the education at the cost of employment, but to leave it open, if at all any means can be devised if not today, five years hence, for factory employers or other employers to employ children. The question of factories is brought here only to make matters complex. That is not in my mind at all. I am not advocating the cause of factory owners.

Now coming to the remarks of the Honourable Sir MAHADEV CHAUBAL, he drew our attention to clause 8, sub-clause (b); this is rather a technical point, but I do not think I should skip over it. According to clause 7, what is stated is "in the absence of a reasonable excuse". That is what is stated in clause 7. I only quoted an instance that in cases where a reasonable excuse can be put forward to the satisfaction of the school committee there is nothing to prevent the employer to take such a child in employment as section 7 would not apply to such a child. That is the view which I take as regards the interpretation of clauses 7, 8 and 11.

Then my honourable friend Mr. PARANJPYE made a very stirring appeal and impressed upon us the necessity of moving forward and looking to the development of the physique of children. If this is your solicitude, why have the act as a permissive measure? Why do you show such solicitude for boys living in a particular municipal district where this act is going to be introduced? Is not the physique of children living in other municipal districts as dear to you as the physique of the children who live in those districts where the act may be introduced? Nobody can disagree so far as our solicitude in that direction goes.

Then something was said as regards the words "for the purpose of profit". I took away those words because having looked at the English Act, section 47, I get this definition there. It says:—"A parent who employs his child in any labour exercised by way of trade or for the purposes of gain is regarded as a person taking the child into his employment", and I thought that it does not matter if the words are taken away so long as you do not prohibit entirely the employment of children. And who is going to employ a child if not for profit? I think the cases where an employer wishes to take a child in his employment and a parent wishes to allow a child to work without any commensurate profit to him would be extremely rare.

Then, sir, the arguments which were advanced by the Honourable Messrs. PRATT and SEDDON have been already answered by other speakers who have preceded me, and to my mind it appears that if we look at the definition of the word "factory" as given in the act, it is not only that kind of labour which is going to be covered by the amendment; there is a large class of other labourers who will be affected. Factories we take account of because it is a kind of organized labour. But if this Council is convinced that there is a large amount of inconvenience if we allow this clause to remain as it is, leaving aside the question of factories, then are we not really called upon to improve upon the clause in the way I have suggested? It has been said by the Honourable Sir MAHADEV CHAUBAL and others, and it is also said in the select committee's report that the clause as it stands at present is not a complete attempt and that there are some flaws in it. But if the select committee was conscious, and if the honourable members who have listened to this debate are conscious, that there is such a flaw in the clause as it now stands, and if they are convinced that by accepting my amendment they are not going in any way to allow the education of the child to suffer, then I trust they will have no hesitation in accepting my amendment. By doing so they will remove the bar on casual employment which is sought to be imposed by this ambiguous clause 11.

With these few words, sir, as we are getting late and as the debate has been already very lengthy, I do not add anything more. I trust this amendment will receive a very cordial support from my honourable friends.

His Excellency the PRESIDENT:—I think if the Council approves I shall have to put this amendment in two parts. One is to omit the words "for the purpose of profit" and the second part is to insert such words as my honourable friend wishes to. Has my honourable friend any objection?

The Honourable Ráo Bahádur SATHE:—I moved my amendment as one and it is marked as item No. 22.

His Excellency the PRESIDENT:—But has my honourable friend any objection to my putting it to the vote in two parts?

The Honourable Ráo Bahádur SATHE:—Of course it is within your Excellency's power to divide the amendment in two parts. But the two parts have connection with each other and therefore, I think, if I may be allowed to use that word, it will not be fair to put the amendment in two parts.

His Excellency the PRESIDENT:—But I should like to know what exactly is the connection between the two parts.

The Honourable Ráo Bahádur SATHE:—The connection is this, your Excellency. The first is to drop the words "for the purpose of profit". The second portion of the amendment is really the most important one and it is by the incorporation of those words that I am able to put forward my view of the case, namely, that you will always put in the forefront the question of education and you will remove the bar on employment.

His Excellency the PRESIDENT:—I think on consideration that as the amendment on the paper is one, I must take it on this occasion as one.

The amendment was then put to the vote and carried, 25 members voting for and 13 against it. The Council divided as follows:—

Clause 12.—In lines 4 and 5 omit the words "a magistrate" and substitute the words "the president or vice-president of the municipality."

The Honourable Mr. SHRIDHAR BALKRISHNA UPASANI:—Your Excellency,—I beg leave to withdraw this amendment as it is consequential.

The amendment was by leave withdrawn.

Clauses 12 and 13 were then put to the vote and carried.

His Excellency the PRESIDENT:—Item No. 28. The Honourable Khán Bahádur PIR BAKSH.

Clause 14.—Delete the words "of sex" and substitute "twelve years" for "eleven years" occurring in the last four lines of this clause.

The Honourable Khán Bahádur PIR BAKSH walad MIAN MAHMUD:—Your Excellency,—I beg leave to withdraw this amendment.

The amendment was by leave withdrawn.

Clauses 14, 15 and 16 were then put to the vote and carried.

His Excellency the PRESIDENT:—Item No. 29. The Honourable Ráo Bahádur SATHE.

Clause 17.—If amendment to clause 10 (1) as proposed above (item No. 18) is accepted the following clause to be substituted for present clause 17:—

"17.—All fines levied by a president for an offence under this act shall be recoverable in the same manner as an amount claimed on account of any tax recoverable under chapter VIII of the principal act and shall be credited to the municipal fund."

The Honourable Ráo Bahádur GANESH KRISHNA SATHE:—Your Excellency,—As my amendment covered by item No. 18 of the agenda was rejected yesterday, I beg leave to withdraw this amendment.

The amendment was by leave withdrawn.

PRIMARY EDUCATION BILL.

[Mr. Shridhar Balkrishna Upasani; Mr. Raghunath Purshottam Paranjpye; Mr. Vithalbhai Jhaverbhai Patel; Mr. Ghulam Muhammad walad Khán Bahádur Wali Muhammad Bhurgri.] [5TH DECEMBER 1917.]

Clause 17 was then put to the vote and carried.

His Excellency the PRESIDENT:—Item No. 30. The Honourable Mr. UPASANI.

Clause 18 (2) (e).—Omit in the first four lines the words "When the Local Government determines to share the cost of providing free and compulsory primary education."

The Honourable Mr. SHRIDHAR BALKRISHNA UPASANI:—Your Excellency,—With the assurance given by Government that they will give the help necessary I do not wish to press this amendment and I therefore beg leave to withdraw the same.

The amendment was by leave withdrawn.

Clause 18 was then put to the vote and carried.

The preamble was then put to the vote and carried.

The Honourable Mr. RAGHUNATH PURSHOTTAM PARANJPYE:—Your Excellency,—In clause 18 we have given Government power to make rules about various points. Yesterday the Council passed an amendment to clause 11 (1) to the effect that the employment of children shall be such as not to interfere with their efficient instruction. Government, therefore, might take, under clause 18, power to decide what that efficient instruction is.

His Excellency the PRESIDENT:—I gather, if I am right, that the purpose of the amendment is to leave it to the school committee and educational authorities to decide what is efficient instruction and so I do not see any necessity for framing such rules.

The Honourable Mr. VITHALBHAI JHAVERBHAI PATEL:—Your Excellency,—

The Honourable Mr. Patel moves the third reading of the bill.

It is with very great pleasure that I move the third reading of this bill and I trust that the Council will support it.

The Honourable Mr. RAGHUNATH PURSHOTTAM PARANJPYE:—I have very great pleasure in seconding this motion for the third reading of the bill and in doing so I beg to take leave to congratulate heartily my honourable friend Mr. PATEL on the masterly way in which he has piloted the bill through the Council and the select committee. This is the first bill of its kind which is now going to be placed in the statute book of the Legislative Council of this Presidency. Only in the Imperial Legislative Council one or two bills introduced by private members have been placed on the statute book; but I think this Presidency can take credit to itself that this is the first bill of a private member that has been passed by a provincial legislative council. I hope this bill will only be the first of a series of important legislative measures referring to matters that deeply affect the people of this particular province, and I trust that Government will in similar cases extend the same amount of sympathy as they have extended to this bill. With these words I heartily support the third reading of this bill.

The Honourable Mr. GHULAM MUHAMMAD walad Khán Bahádur WALI MUHAMMAD BHURGRI:—My Lord,—I want to associate myself with what has fallen from my honourable friend Mr. PARANJPYE. I think, sir, that the non-official members of this Council fully realize that this bill, which has been piloted by the Honourable Mr. PATEL, has had the full sympathy of your Excellency's Government from the first reading onwards and I feel that if it were not for your Excellency's kind personal interest in the matter it would have been impossible to get a bill like this passed in the Council. On behalf of the Mahomedan honourable members, I certainly beg to offer my congratulations to your Excellency personally. Coming from a backward community I can assure your Excellency that I feel that this bill will do a good deal for the betterment of the condition of those who are backward in education, and I cannot help congratulating my honourable friend Mr. PATEL on the labour and persistence with which he has tackled the subject and brought it to fruition and to a successful issue. With these words I support the third reading of the bill.

Bill read a third time.

Motion for the third reading was then put to the vote and carried.

Discussion of matters of General Public Interest.

His Excellency the PRESIDENT:—Order, order. Before we commence to discuss the resolutions, I wish to inform honourable members that I am going to carry out what I suggested on the occasion of the last Council meeting, namely to give every honourable member an opportunity in order of moving his resolutions. What I mean is this: the Honourable Mr. PATEL will move resolution No. 1 first, and then I shall take the first resolution of the Honourable Mr. JAFFER and so on, giving each honourable member an opportunity to move a resolution; then I will recommence from the beginning in the same way.

The Honourable Mr. VITHALBHAI JHAVERBHAI PATEL:—Your Excellency,—Resolution No. 1 was already discussed at the last March meeting and if your Excellency permits me to move the second resolution I shall be grateful.

His Excellency the PRESIDENT:—Does the honourable member wish to withdraw No. 1?

The Honourable Mr. PATEL:—No, I am not going to withdraw it, your Excellency. It has already been thoroughly discussed and it has only to be voted upon.

His Excellency the PRESIDENT:—The honourable member then wishes a vote to be taken upon the resolution?

The Honourable Mr. PATEL:—Exactly.

His Excellency the PRESIDENT:—I think, as a matter of order, it would be better if the honourable member moves his resolution formally at all events.

The Honourable Mr. PATEL:—Then, do I lose my chance of moving the second by formally moving this resolution, your Excellency?

His Excellency the PRESIDENT:—No. Under the circumstances, I will depart from the procedure I have indicated. Let the honourable member formally move his first resolution and then he will have an opportunity to move his second.

The Honourable Mr. PATEL:—Your Excellency,—I now beg to move:—

"This Council recommends that His Excellency the Governor in Council may be pleased to rule that no officer of Government shall stand as a candidate for the office of vice-president of any local board of which any other officer of Government is president."

His Excellency the PRESIDENT:—Order, order. I think that probably I should inform honourable members of the views of Government on the matter at this stage. I understand from my honourable colleague Mr. CURTIS that, since the discussion of this resolution at our last meeting in March, Government have taken action with regard to this matter, and my honourable colleague wishes to make a statement, the effect of which I hope will be to produce a desire in the mind of my honourable friend Mr. PATEL to withdraw his resolution.

LOCAL BOARDS: NON-OFFICIAL VICE-PRESIDENTS.

[Mr. G. S. Curtis; Mr. Vithalbhai Jhaverbhai Patel; the President.] [5TH DECEMBER 1917.]

The Honourable Mr. G. S. CURTIS:—Your Excellency,—There was considerable discussion in the March meeting of the Council over a similar resolution which was moved by my honourable friend Mr. PATEL. We were unable then to accept the resolution absolutely to the letter, but in view of the recommendations which had been previously made by the Local Boards Committee that the vice-presidents both of district boards and taluka boards should, as far as possible, be non-officials, instructions were issued to Commissioners to endeavour to bring before district local boards and taluka boards the advisability of replacing, as far as possible, official vice-presidents by non-officials, if fit and willing persons come forward, and there are no inherent objections.

I may, perhaps, give the Council a short account of the effect of those orders. The Commissioner in Sind, the Honourable Mr. LAWRENCE, reports that all district boards in Sind have elected non-officials as vice-presidents. In September no taluka board had as yet appointed a non-official vice-president but instructions had been given to keep the policy steadily in view of bringing in non-officials as far as possible, and to bring in a mukthyarkar along where a non-official is unwilling to serve as vice-president.

In the Northern Division before March the only district local boards with a non-official vice-president was Broach. Since then the remaining 5 district local boards have elected non-official vice-presidents. In that division there are 41 taluka boards. Before March 8 had non-official vice-presidents. Since then, 11 more have substituted non-officials for official vice-presidents. In Kaira it is reported that it is thought that with the re-constituted boards suitable non-official candidates for the office of vice-president will be forthcoming.

In the Central Division, it is reported that since March 10 taluka boards have substituted non-officials as vice-presidents for officials. The Commissioner's report makes no referenee to the district local boards.

In the Southern Division the Commissioner reports that in district boards whose triennial elections have recently been completed steps have been taken to have non-officials as vice-presidents. With regard to taluka boards the wishes of Government have been communicated to the Collectors.

The effect is that efforts are being made to obtain non-officials as vice-presidents where suitable gentlemen are forthcoming. The Council will no doubt notice, as I pointed out last time, that the expression "officer of Government" is rather a sweeping one and that in practice it would be very undesirable to apply it to officers other than revenue officers of Government. There are certain officers, school-masters, engineers and officers of the medical department who are capable of rendering very useful public service in local boards, and it would be very undesirable where officers of that class are willing to come forward and act as vice-presidents that they should be debarred from doing so. Also it must be remembered that many taluka boards are situate in backward agricultural tracts where the services of non-officials with adequate education and knowledge of English are not obtainable. In those places it may be necessary that a Government servant should continue in the position of vice-president. As far as possible, however, Government intend to encourage the appointment of non-officials as vice-presidents, and I think the figures that I have quoted show that they are being seconded in their endeavours by the Commissioners, and that in course of time the non-official element will largely take the place hitherto occupied by officials. To that extent the recommendations of the Honourable Mr. LAWRENCE'S Committee are being and will be given effect to.

The Honourable Mr. VITHALBHAI JHAVERBHAI PATEL:—Your Excellency,—In view of the explanation given by my honourable friend Mr. CURTIS I beg leave to withdraw my resolution.

The resolution was then by leave withdrawn.

LOCAL BOARDS: ELECTED NON-OFFICIAL PRESIDENTS AND VICE-PRESIDENTS.

[5TH DECEMBER 1917.] [The President; Mr. Vithalbhai Jhaverbhai Patel.]

His Excellency the PRESIDENT:—Resolution No. 2. The Honourable Mr. PATEL.

"This Council recommends that His Excellency the Governor in Council may be pleased to undertake legislation so to amend the Local Boards Act as to provide that presidents and vice-presidents of all local boards in the Presidency proper shall be elected non-officials, with power to the Governor in Council to direct, by a notification in the 'Government Gazette,' that the said provision shall not apply to any local board to which for exceptional reasons, which shall be set forth in the said notification, he shall deem such provision unsuitable."

Your Excellency,—Local self-government as applied to rural areas dates back to the year 1863. It was laid down in that year that the success of local self-government would depend upon the degree of control that would be allowed to the local managers of the funds. Local fund committees were appointed and funds were raised. The constitution of these committees for the management of the funds was legalized in 1865 in Sind and in 1869 in the Presidency proper. Somehow or other the office-bearers of those committees who were officials managed the funds in the manner that suited them best, on the principle of everything for the people and nothing by the people, with the result that people began to feel that local self-government was merely sham. This state of things attracted the attention of Government of Lord Ripon and I cannot do better than quote the very words of the resolution issued on the 18th May 1882 by his Government:—"There appears to him (the Governor-General in Council) to be great force in the argument that so long as the chief executive officers are as a matter of course chairmen of the municipal and district committees there is little chance of these committees affording any effective training to their members in the management of local affairs or of non-official members taking any real interest in local business. The non-official members must be led to feel that real power is placed in their hands and they have real responsibilities to discharge. It is doubtful whether they have under present arrangement any sufficient inducement to give their time and attention to the transaction of public business. There is this further objection to the district officer acting as chairman that if the non-official members are independent and energetic, risk may arise of unseemly collision between the chairman and the board. The former would be in a far more influential position if——"

His Excellency the PRESIDENT:—I do not want to interrupt the honourable member, but with a view to shortening, if possible, the discussion on this resolution, I should like to explain what the position of Government is on this matter. Honourable members are well aware that I was extremely anxious to get a bill introduced into this Council with regard to this question at this session. But there are circumstances of which honourable members are aware, namely, the arrival of distinguished gentlemen in India, which have made it difficult to lay down any definite policy with regard to the question of local self-government. Honourable members are also aware that at this very moment there is considerable discussion as to the policy to be laid down for India, and it is the opinion of some that district local boards ought to be done away with altogether. Under these circumstances, Government have felt it undesirable to commit themselves to any definite proposals with regard to this question until the general situation as regards future policy is more developed. I do not think I can go further than that, but honourable members can perfectly well understand what I mean. Therefore, it is impossible for Government to commit themselves finally to such a resolution as this, although they may have considerable sympathy with it, and I honestly think, if I may say so to my honourable friend, that at this particular juncture it would be, I do not say waste of time, but unnecessary to move such a resolution, having regard to all the circumstances.

LOCAL BOARDS: ELECTED NON-OFFICIAL PRESIDENTS AND VICE-PRESIDENTS—URDU IN PRIMARY SCHOOLS—URDU TRAINING COLLEGES.

[5TH DECEMBER 1917.] [Mr. Vithalbhai Jhaverbhai Patel; the President; Mr. Ebrahim Haroon Jaffer.]

The Honourable Mr. PATEL:—Am I to understand that your Excellency's Government is not prepared to say that local boards should have elected non-official presidents and vice-presidents?

His Excellency the PRESIDENT:—The honourable member is not to take what I have said in that form at all. All I say is this, that the whole position with regard to the form of local self-government is so extremely fluid at this moment, as my honourable friend if he reads the papers must know, that we are not going to commit ourselves to any definite action with regard to local self-government, whatever our views may be with regard to official or non-official presidents and vice-presidents.

The Honourable Mr. PATEL:—May I enquire if the appointment of the special officer has been discontinued on that account?

His Excellency the PRESIDENT:—The special officer has just issued his report and it will be before the members of the Government in a short time. But we are going to take no definite action at all with regard to the matter until, as I say, the situation is further developed.

The Honourable Mr. PATEL:—In that case I beg to postpone my resolution till the situation clears up.

The resolution was by leave postponed.

His Excellency the PRESIDENT:—Resolution No. 3. The Honourable Mr. JAFFER.

The Honourable Mr. EBRAHIM HAROON JAFFER:—Your Excellency,—The resolution that stands in my name reads thus:—

"This Council recommends to His Excellency the Governor in Council that the experiment of giving instruction to Mahomedan students in primary schools through the medium of Urdu be given a fair and full trial by its being extended for a further period of five years."

As the result of my interview on 30th October last the Director of Public Instruction in his letter dated 7th November informs me that your Excellency has decided to consider the question of the teaching of Urdu in vernacular schools for Mahomedans at a meeting of Mahomedan gentlemen which will be convened shortly.

I therefore beg your Excellency to allow me to postpone the consideration of my resolution till the next session of the Council.

I have every hope that no action will be taken in the meantime by Government on the Press Note published.

The resolution was by leave postponed.

His Excellency the PRESIDENT:—Resolution No. 4. The Honourable Mr. JAFFER.

The Honourable Mr. EBRAHIM HAROON JAFFER:—Your Excellency,—The resolution that I wish to move is as follows:—

"This Council recommends to His Excellency the Governor in Council that (1) a second year's course be added to the Urdu Training Class at Ahmedabad with a view to develop it in time into an Urdu Training College; and (2) that the class be removed to Poona with a view to develop it in time into an Urdu Training College."

URDU TRAINING COLLEGES—FREE STUDENTSHIPS FOR MAHOMEDAN STUDENTS.

[5TH DECEMBER 1917.] [Mr. Ebrahim Haroon Jaffer; the President.]

On the advice of my Mahomedan colleagues of this Council, I beg your Excellency's permission to postpone this resolution also as the whole question is to be re-considered by Government.

The resolution was by leave postponed.

His Excellency the PRESIDENT:—Resolution No. 5. The Honourable Mr. JAFFER.

The Honourable Mr. EBRAHIM HAROON JAFFER:—Your Excellency,—The resolution which I beg to move is as follows:—

"This Council recommends to His Excellency the Governor in Council that five per cent. or one-third of the free studentships reserved for the advanced and the backward communities in secondary schools be ear-marked for Mahomedan students."

Your Excellency,—Poverty is one of the causes which prevents many students from continuing their education in secondary schools. The cost of living is rising on all sides and many parents are doubtless deterred from sending their children to secondary schools by the expenses their education involves. When the scale of fees was raised some years ago, the complaint was made that the enhancement would cause a lot of hardship to people of the lower and middle class. The hardship is bound to be severely felt by the people of the backward class. The bulk of the Mahomedan population is poor and they cannot afford the fees that have to be paid for the schooling of their children.

The claim of the backward classes to concessions in the matter of the remission of fees has always been recognized by Government. The educational department has invariably insisted upon a fixed proportion of the free studentships allowed in schools being reserved for the pupils belonging to the backward classes. The aim of this policy is to encourage members of these classes to send their children to schools. They do not understand the value of education and are not inclined to let their boys prosecute their studies in secondary schools. Inability to bear the costs of education only strengthens the attitude of the people of the backward communities and the result is that the spread of education suffers to the great detriment of the communities. It is not necessary to labour further on this point about the need of setting apart a fixed number of free studentships for pupils belonging to the backward classes. What I have to urge is that in view of the needs of the education of Mahomedans, five per cent. or one-third of the free studentships reserved for advanced and backward pupils together should be given to boys of this community.

I hope the Council will see that this is by no means an unreasonable request. During the five years 1911-12 to 1915-16 when 10 per cent. free studentships were allowed, Mahomedan students received, on an average, less than 15 per cent. of the total number of free studentships available for advanced and backward pupils, and in 1916-17, when 15 per cent. were allowed, the share of Mahomedan students was 13·64 per cent. of the total. A much larger proportion, nearly double, should have fallen to the lot of Mahomedan students in view of the ratio Mahomedans bear to the total population. I have therefore to plead for 5 per cent. free studentships being given to Mahomedan students.

It may perhaps be contended that Mahomedan pupils do not receive their proper share, because a sufficient number is not forthcoming to claim the free studentships. With regard to this point I have to say that if on a fixed percentage of free studentships being set apart for the benefit of the students of my community they are not taken advantage of within a certain period, they may be given away to pupils of other backward communities. I think the fixing of the percentage will induce Mahomedan students to avail themselves of the facility given to them and thus the cause of Mahomedan education will benefit. The proposal I have made does not in any way encroach upon the rights of other communities or prevent them from receiving what is their due. It will only encourage the pupils of my community, which is so backward in the matter of education, to take advantage of the concession which has been made to backward classes and the true object of the arrangement Government has made will be attained. I have every hope, therefore, that the Council will accept my resolution.

The Honourable Mr. RAGHUNATH PURSHOTTAM PARANJPYE:—Your Excellency,—I wish to propose an amendment to this resolution. It is this: I would add the word "Government" between the words "in" and "secondary" in line three, and would further add at the end the words "provided any free studentship so allocated to any particular class and not availed of for want of suitable applicants may be given to a suitable applicant of any other community."

With the additions that I propose the resolution will read as follows:—

"This Council recommends to His Excellency the Governor in Council that five per cent. or one-third of the free studentships reserved for the advanced and the backward communities in Government secondary schools be ear-marked for Mahomedan students, provided that any free studentship so allocated to any particular class and not availed of for want of suitable applicants may be given to a suitable candidate of any other community."

His Excellency the PRESIDENT:—We will discuss the resolution and the amendment at the same time.

The Honourable Mr. PARANJPYE:—Your Excellency,—My amendment, I think, will receive the support of the honourable members of this Council. On the one hand I fully sympathize with the contention of the backward classes, whether they are Mahomedans or others, that they should be considered rather more favourably than the more advanced classes so far as giving them opportunities for advancement are concerned. While I protest strongly against reserving any posts for the backward classes where a definite acquisition of knowledge or a definite condition about character or other such things are required, I think that the contention of the backward classes who have not got sufficient opportunities at present or at any rate who have not properly availed themselves of the opportunities in open competition with other classes, that they should get rather more opportunities under the present circumstances, is justified. So far, therefore, I fully sympathize with the Mahomedans and other backward classes in asking for a little preferential treatment. As a mater of fact in the institution with which I am connected I myself always consider the claims of the Mahomedans and other backward classes a little more favourably than I consider the claims of the more advanced classes. A few conditions which I insist upon in the case of more advanced classes are relaxed in the case of Mahomedans and other backward classes. I think under the present circumstances such a relaxation is quite reasonable.

But at the same time there are certain ultra-extreme advocates of the backward classes who occasionally advocate a policy of the dog in the manger. They often say that such and such a number of free studentships should be reserved for them, and even if they are not availed of, they say that they should not be given to any students of the advanced classes. That is in fact what happens at present. We have in our various classes in schools half the number of free studentships reserved for the backward Hindu classes and Mahomedans. These $7\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. of free studentships are not actually availed of. Some of them remain unallocated, while for the other $7\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. of these free studentships there are far more suitable candidates than could be given the free studentships. So that while some free studentships reserved for one class of students on the one hand remain unallocated, students belonging to the other, namely the advanced, are clamouring for more free studentships. Now I do not understand why such a state of things should be allowed.

FREE STUDENTSHIPS FOR MAHOMEDAN STUDENTS.

Then again, there is another part of the amendment which confines this resolution only to Government secondary schools. I do not think that this Council should make a change in the grant-in-aid code and apply this resolution even to the aided schools. The circumstances of aided schools might be different. A particular aided school might appeal to the people of one community. But if we pass a general resolution of this kind that school may have to reserve 5 per cent. of the free studentships for Mahomedans though they do not figure at all in the attendance roll of the school. I do not think, therefore, that the Council will at present be justified in applying this resolution to all schools. The Mahomedan community might possibly for the moment make up a fairly reasonable case for giving them more suitable opportunities than they at present have. I myself think that at present there is hardly any Mahomedan student who is suitable who goes without a free studentship. I find in my college, for instance, not a single Mahomedan who really deserves a free studentship that goes without one, and also in the schools with which I am connected I never find that Mahomedan students if they are properly qualified are refused the opportunity of learning in the school simply for want of free studentships. But if my Mahomedan friends want the particular condition mentioned in this resolution I have no objection. At present I think the resolution will be practically inoperative because every Mahomedan that is qualified will naturally get the free studentship required.

There are several funds at the disposal of the Mahomedan community which enable poor Mahomedan students to get free studentships also. But at the same time I do not want to come in the way of my Mahomedan friends if they want a rule on paper. But I only want to see that this rule on paper does not work any hardship to the students of other communities.

With these words I propose my amendment.

The Honourable Sheikh GHULAM HUSEIN HIDAYATALLAH:—Your Excellency,—I rise to support the amendment moved by my honourable friend Mr. PARANJPYE. It is a very sensible amendment and I hope it will commend itself to this Council.

The Honourable Mr. PARANJPYE agrees so far that five per cent. out of the fifteen per cent. of the free studentships should be ear-marked for Mahomedan students. But he says further that when Mahomedan students are not available for those five per cent. of free studentships they may be utilized for the purpose of other backward communities. That also is a very reasonable proposal and I hope my honourable friend Mr. EBRAHIM HAROON JAFFER will agree to the amendment proposed by my honourable friend Mr. PARANJPYE.

The Honourable Mr. EBRAHIM HAROON JAFFER:—I accept the amendment moved by the Honourable Mr. PARANJPYE.

The Honourable Mr. VITHALBHAI JHAVERBHAI PATEL:—Your Excellency,—The resolution, as amended, is now before the Council for discussion and I should like to say a few words regarding it. In the first place, I may say that I do not want to come in the way of the legitimate aspirations of my honourable Mahomedan friends, but I should like to be satisfied on this one point. I should like to ask them whether any poor and deserving Mahomedan students have been so far refused free studentships. My honourable friend Mr. JAFFER can only make out a case if he can show that a particular Mahomedan student, who has obtained a certain number of marks according to the rules permitting the education department to grant free studentships, is left out. If that is so, there is a case for discussion. I do not want to say anything on the question as to how this claim of one-third free studentships being reserved for Mahomedans is based, but I must say this, that I do not wish to vote in favour of the resolution unless I am satisfied that deserving students have been refused free studentships.

FREE STUDENTSHIPS FOR MAHOMEDAN STUDENTS.

[Mr. Vithalbhai Jhaverbhai Patel; Mr. Lalubhai Samaldas Mehta; Mr. Ebrahim Haroon Jaffer; Sir Mahadev Bhaskar Chaubal.]

The Honourable Mr. LALUBHAI SAMALDAS MEHTA:—Your Excellency,—I have only one question to ask the Honourable Mr. JAFFER. I want to ask him whether he can give me the figures of the percentage of Mahomedan students in secondary schools. My information is that the percentage of Mahomedan students is 8·35, and I shall be glad to know if that is correct. Does the Honourable Mr. JAFFER mean that 50 per cent. of them should get free studentships? I want to know the number of students attending the secondary schools.

The Honourable Mr. JAFFER:—It is 6 per cent.

The Honourable Mr. LALUBHAI:—So that my honourable friend wants that out of 6 per cent. 5 per cent. should be given free studentships.

The Honourable Sir MAHADEV BHASKAR CHAUBAL:—Your Excellency,—I rise in order to explain the situation to my honourable Mahomedan friends of this Council and the position of Government as regards this resolution.

The Honourable Mr. JAFFER has accepted the Honourable Mr. PARANJPYE'S amendment, but I have my misgivings as to whether all the Mahomedan members have correctly understood the situation. Honourable members are perhaps aware that some years back, I think it was in 1915, the Honourable Moulvie RAFFIUDDIN AHMED brought forward a resolution in this Council that the number of free studentships which was at that time 10 per cent. should be increased to 15 per cent. in secondary schools, and I remember having then got up and tried to explain the position to the Honourable Moulvie RAFFIUDDIN AHMED. I then explained to him that while he was on the one hand doing no good to his community by raising the 10 per cent. to 15 per cent., he was on the other certainly reducing the income from fees to Government, which was being utilized for several educational purposes. But if he had at heart the interests of his community I desired him to appreciate the fact, by giving him the figures, that out of the 10 per cent. even the 5 per cent. allotted to his community along with the other backward classes was not exhausted. But the Honourable Moulvie RAFFIUDDIN AHMED——

The Honourable Mr. JAFFER:—After the Honourable Moulvie RAFFIUDDIN AHMED moved his resolution I asked a question on the 24th July which I will read to this Council together with the reply of Government. My question was:—

"Will Government be pleased to state what percentage of free studentships Muhammadan students got (a) during the last five years of the period in which 10 per cent. free studentships were allowed, (b) during the period in which 15 per cent. were allowed?"

The reply from Government was:—

"The subjoined statement gives the information required by the honourable member:—

(a) Percentage during the period in which 10 per cent. free studentships were allowed:—

Year.	Percentage.
1911-12	14·62
1912-13	14·89
1913-14	16·26
1914-15	14·95
1915-16	13·9

FREE STUDENTSHIPS FOR MAHOMEDAN STUDENTS.

[5TH DECEMBER 1917.] [Mr. Ebrahim Haroon Jaffer; Sir Mahadev Bhaskar Chaubal.]

"(b) Percentage during the period in which 15 per cent. free studentships were allowed :—

Year.	Percentage.

The Honourable Sir MAHADEV CHAUBAL :—The Honourable Mr. JAFFER will permit me to proceed with my statement. When the total number of free studentships was 10 per cent. it was pointed out by me that the 5 per cent. out of the 10 per cent. which was allotted to Mahomedans and the backward classes between them was not, as a matter of fact, exhausted, and therefore neither the Mahomedan community nor the depressed classes nor the other backward classes were likely to derive any advantage by the increase from 10 to 15 per cent. Notwithstanding this statement the resolution was passed, and I remember the Honourable Mr. PARANJPYE and the Honourable Mr. UPASANI spoke eloquently in support of the Honourable Moulvie RAFFIUDDIN'S resolution. Now the total number of free studentships permitted has been 15 per cent. from 1915 onwards. The Honourable the Director of Public Instruction has been getting information, which he was specially asked to do, if there were any Mahomedan poor and deserving students who have been refused free studentships, and the reports from all the schools that have reached him distinctly state that the free studentships which are open to the Mahomedan and the backward classes are not exhausted on account of suitable applicants not coming forward. I think this statement is perfectly clear. If after this statement——

The Honourable Mr. JAFFER :—May I know the meaning of suitable candidate?

The Honourable Sir MAHADEV CHAUBAL :—I think the honourable member ought to understand that it is not everybody who attends a school who can get a free studentship. There are certain rules and regulations as to the place that a boy who is given a free studentship should keep and as to his general competence. Simply because a boy belongs to a certain community, he cannot be allotted a free studentship. So long as there is no fear that the percentage of free studentships allotted to them is withheld on account of the boys of the advanced classes coming forward, I do not think they can complain of any injustice in the regulations for the grant of free studentships which are the same as govern those granted to the advanced classes. That is the meaning of suitable candidate. It is not because a candidate is simply a Mahomedan that a free studentship may be given to him. They are bound to follow the rules for the award of scholarships and free studentships, and that being so, I would ask my honourable Mahomedan friends of the Council to consider if they should accept the Honourable Mr. PARANJPYE'S amendment which is sure to have this effect, that while it is open to any Mahomedan students or students from the backward classes to come forward and take up the free studentships which have not been exhausted and which are still available if there are suitable candidates, those which will remain vacant are likely to be taken advantage of by the advanced classes as the Honourable Mr. PARANJPYE has frankly admitted, because there are many deserving and suitable candidates from the educationally advanced classes who are not given free studentships because there is not a sufficient number of them. Therefore it is for the Mahomedan members of this Council to consider if they should accept the proposed amendment, but if they do, the position of Government is that Government have no objection whatsoever to the resolution as amended and they will accept it.

The Honourable Mr. JAFFER :—I thank Government for accepting the resolution.

The resolution, as amended, was then put to the vote and carried.

STUDENTS AND POLITICS.

[The President; Mr. Munmohundas Ramji.] [5TH DECEMBER 1917.]

His Excellency the PRESIDENT:—Resolution No. 6. The Honourable Mr. MUNMOHANDAS RAMJI.

The Honourable Mr. MUNMOHUNDAS RAMJI:—Your Excellency,—The resolution that I have given notice of reads as follows:—

"This Council recommends to the Governor in Council that the circular of the educational department of the Government of Bombay, dated the 7th June 1917, preventing students from attending public meetings, should be revoked."

Before discussing the merits or demerits of the circular in question, I would like to make the ground clear, by first inviting your attention to the aims and objects, which all civilized and progressive nations of the world have constantly kept in view in devising their systems of national education. It is now generally recognized that no system of education is sound, unless it imparts to the students a knowledge of civic duties, in addition to a general and moral culture to enable its recipients to lead an honourable and independent life and to improve the moral and material condition of their country. The precincts of the schools and colleges, necessities as they are, are not the only agencies of education. In all countries, the political environments of a people have also to be counted in moulding the character and opinion of the youths and any attempt to curtail the liberty of the students or their guardians in this respect will always meet with a certain amount of resentment and suspicion. The surroundings of the home, the tone of the school, and the politics of country act and re-act upon one another in the education of its youths and create the educational atmosphere, which will permanently influence the character and thought of the younger generation. The education which has raised England to its present exalted position, is not only the education imparted in its schools and universities but also in school and college debating societies and in its social and political clubs.

There is no gainsaying the fact that India has commenced to manifest signs of a distinct consciousness and vitality and through her educated leaders is now insisting on reforms in all directions, and if the students were shut out from any activities of this kind, what chances, my Lord, have they of turning out able citizens? The educated Indians have also been asking for a control over the educational policy of the country in general. The university or school education will have its correct supplement, if the students have opportunities to come in contact with the various national associations or societies doing useful work for the uplift of the nation. Let each student be able to say with St. Paul: "I am a citizen of no mean country." Indian students, who study the great classical writers like Shakespeare, Burke, Bacon and Macaulay, should have the rights and privileges of their fellow-students in the United Kingdom and the self-governing colonies. They should not only be able to read and write, but should also get an opportunity of learning something at least of the Government of their own country and its methods of administration. They ought to know also their present position in the Empire their rights as well as disabilities under the present constitution of Government. And this kind of knowledge can be gained by them only outside the premises of their schools. To deny them this privilege, would be an unstatesmanlike step, which no Government should take. In other countries, the Government takes special pains to rear a healthy, vigorous, self-reliant generation, which should keep pace with the general progress of the world. Strength of will, nobility of character, and firmness of mind, and vigour of body are looked upon as essential qualifications which ought to be developed in the rising generation. So far as I am aware, in no other country are students placed under so many disabilities and restrictions in regard to public activities, as is contemplated by this circular. In this connection I may draw the attention of the Council to the views of the late Mr. Gokhale who expressed himself as follows when addressing a meeting of the Students' Brotherhood in 1909:—

> "To leave them (the students) thus to their own devices amidst the perplexities of a difficult situation is to neglect a plain duty towards them at a critical period in their lives, and the consequences of this neglect have been and are bound to be serious and far-reaching."

I was glad to see this view urged the other day in a letter to the press by the Rev. Mr. Andrews, of Delhi, than whom there is no better friend of the Indian students and of Indian aspirations in the country:—"The historical and economic questions," says the Rev. Mr. Andrews, "which lie at the base of at least three-fourths of the politics of the modern Indian student, should be dealt with wisely and sympathetically by those who are teaching history and economics, and sound opinion should thus be built up within the colleges themselves. Different teachers will, no doubt, take different views of the same questions, but it is not so much the views urged on the attention of the students as the proper cultivation of their political sense and the habit of careful and comprehensive thinking induced in their minds in regard to political problems that must be the chief object and will constitute the real gain. The very fact that our students cannot help taking an interest in politics before their time, goes to emphasize the great need that exists for their efficient political education. I think our students, especially college students, should enjoy every possible facility for acquiring an accurate knowledge of political matters and forming sound views in regard to them. They should be encouraged to discuss such matters freely in the college. Publicists, whose opinions are entitled to weight, should from time to time be invited to take part in the discussions. They should be at liberty to attend public lectures and addresses on political subjects, and they may even attend political meetings with advantage, provided they are there only as spectators."

With these preliminary remarks, I shall come to the consideration of the circular itself. The very first sentence of this circular reveals an apprehension on the part of the Government, on noticing that a large number of students attended political meetings. So long as these students did not take any active part in the proceedings of these meetings by delivering impassioned speeches or by any other acts showing their direct sympathy with the object of the meetings, and so long as the meetings themselves are conducted on constitutional and peaceful lines, the mere fact of the attendance or presence of the students would not have become an object of the attention of the local Government anywhere else. The wording of this circular and its annexures is likely to convey an impression that under the guise of discipline the authorities wish to discourage the students from acquiring a knowledge of the public activities of their own country. The Government desire that the rules be strictly observed, not only by Government schools and colleges, but even by the aided or recognized institutions. The first paragraph of this circular is in general terms and quotes three documents which will be noticed seriatim.

Government Resolution No. 2395, dated 30th September 1908, devises certain measures for the protection of pupils from evils resulting from their incursions into political affairs. It gives ample powers to the managers and principals of schools and colleges to enforce authority and to check the alleged laxity of manners. This resolution recommends also that parents be called in council and the objects of Government be explained to them.

The most drastic measure proposed in this resolution is that "no school-boy shall attend or take part in the organization or conduct of a public meeting of any kind." If according to the wording of this clause, the students are prohibited from attending any kind of public meeting, what opportunities, my Lord, have they of acquiring a correct knowledge and general information regarding the social, economic, religious and other requirements of their own country or community? It is also possible that the wide powers placed in the hands of the head masters and heads of colleges and schools, may at times be abused by them and the prospects of many a promising student are likely for ever to be blasted through the caprice or inexorable disposition of the head of his school or college.

The second enclosure is a circular addressed to the school teacher and lays down certain rules for his guidance. Paragraph 5 of this circular enjoins the teacher not to allow the boys to go to any public meeting and to persuade the parents to help him in keeping them away. My Lord, I fail to understand how this object of the Government can be attained, unless the head masters or principals make it a point to attend each and every public meeting themselves, to find out what particular students have attended those meetings? This would be throwing an additional responsibility upon them and involves a violation of the rules laid down for the "Conduct of public servants." In trying thus to prevent the students from attending political meetings, Government will have to relax this rule so far as the principals and head masters are concerned. The position of the Government is, therefore, rendered by this circular somewhat awkward and untenable.

The third circular which is a notification, dated 4th August 1909, from the educational department, enacts certain rules for the guidance of parents or guardians. The tone of paragraph 1 of this circular, instead of being compromising, is rather peremptory and lays down that "Parents or guardians, who send their boys to Government schools, must understand that by so doing they delegate all the powers to the head master and educational authorities." The wording of this paragraph will come as a surprise to those who are advocating systems of education for Indians on national lines. The paragraph essays to exercise a full control over the boy's education and leaves nothing in the hands of his parents or guardians. This circular is an insult to the understanding and notions of self-respect of any free-born citizen. Its language is certainly not calculated to bridge the gulf between the conqueror and conquered, which has been the aim of all right-thinking leaders of Indian public opinion, but to create an unnecessary ill-feeling without a corresponding benefit.

After expressing my views on the annexures quoted in paragraph 1 of Circular No. 1405, dated 7th June 1917, which forms the subject of my resolution, I shall proceed to the consideration of paragraph 2 of this circular. This paragraph lays particular stress on the Home Rule league movement and declares the intention of the Government to prohibit both college and school students from attending the meetings of the "Home Rule League." It is a patent fact that the Home Rule agitation has been pronounced by His Excellency the Viceroy as a constitutional and peaceful agitation and the Government have expressed its sympathy with it on various occasions. Instead of taking the time of the Council by citing numerous extracts, I shall content myself with only one extract which I quote from the speech delivered by His Excellency Lord Pentland on 24th May 1917 as the President of the Madras Legislative Council :—

> "Self-government is the salt and strength of the British Empire. It stands or falls on self-government : and you know well how it is standing now for justice and freedom all the world over and that all parts of it will at all times welcome any signs of growth in the willingness and capacity of Indians to undertake in an increasing measure a share in the administration of India——"

His Excellency the PRESIDENT :—I am afraid the honourable member is not talking about students and politics at the moment. The honourable member is developing matter which is rather controversial. I am not sure that this has got anything to do with students and colleges at the moment.

The Honourable Mr. MUNMOHUNDAS RAMJI :—I have to say something in support of my resolution and I am only quoting what Lord Pentland said on the subject of self-government in support of my resolution. Lord Pentland further continues :—" It has been said that prosperity makes and adversity tries them, and it is some compensation for the common sufferings and anxieties of the past three years that they already seem to have increased mutual good-will and understanding between all parts of the British Empire——"

STUDENTS AND POLITICS.

[5TH DECEMBER 1917.] [Mr. Munmohundas Ramji; the President; Mr. Raghunath Purshottam Paranjpye.]

His Excellency the PRESIDENT :—Order, order. Has this got anything to do with students and colleges ?

The Honourable Mr. MUNMOHUNDAS RAMJI :—Your Excellency,—By way of explanation I may be allowed to say that the resolution which I have moved deals with Home Rule and the educational circular of 7th June. This quotation of His Excellency Lord Pentland has a bearing on self-government, and therefore, to prove my case I cite this quotation, namely, that the students' attending meetings where self-government questions are discussed is not objectionable in any way and therefore to support my case I read this quotation.

His Excellency the PRESIDENT :—I cannot allow the honourable member to discuss the general question of Home Rule. What I am perfectly ready to do is to allow him to justify his resolution as it stands. I quite see his point but I cannot allow him to go into any discussion on Home Rule.

The Honourable Mr. MUNMOHUNDAS RAMJI :—May I take it that I cannot go on with this quotation ?

His Excellency the PRESIDENT :—The honourable member can go on and if I find that there is anything objectionable I will have to call him to order.

The Honourable Mr. MUNMOHUNDAS RAMJI :—Self-government is the salt and strength of the British Empire. It——"

His Excellency the PRESIDENT :—Order, order. I really cannot allow the honourable member to go on. What he is referring to has got nothing whatever to do with the resolution that is before the Council, nor does it refer to the Government's order prohibiting young men going to public meetings where Home Rule is discussed. I do not think we have got anything to do with the pronouncement of Lord Pentland or anybody else on Home Rule.

The Honourable Mr. MUNMOHUNDAS RAMJI :—Then I will drop that quotation.

My Lord, the rules laid down in this circular, if strictly enforced, will create also an ill-feeling amounting to hatred and aversion on the part of the students towards their teachers or principals whom they will no longer regard with the respect and honour which are their due, and hence the good feeling and amicable relations which are the essentials of a smooth working in the class will be wanting.

In connection with my resolution, I may also invite the attention of the Council to the question of the Honourable Mr. SHRINIWAS SASTRI in the Imperial Legislative Council and the reply of the Honourable Sir C. SANKARAN NAIR thereto, from which it would appear that at a conference of the heads of colleges in the Madras Presidency the order of the local Government on this subject was pronounced to be unworkable.

If this is the experience of Madras, there is every chance of its impracticability being discovered in the Bombay Presidency and elsewhere in India wherever similar orders have been issued.

With these observations, I commend the resolution to the Council and hope it will meet with their approval.

The Honourable Mr. RAGHUNATH PURSHOTTAM PARANJPYE :—Your Excellency,—The resolution which is proposed by my honourable friend Mr. MUNMOHUNDAS RAMJI and the speech he has made in support of it has put some of us in a rather difficult position. If he had confined himself to the circular which has been issued by Government on the 7th of June 1917, then we would have known exactly what line of action to take, whether to vote for or against this resolution ; but I think he has brought forward in his speech several extraneous considerations which I am afraid it is impossible for us having once been raised in this Council to shut our eyes to.

As regards the circular of 7th June itself it enclosed the old one called the Risley circular and not only called the attention of the managers and principals to that old circular of 1907 but went further and prohibited students from attending any meetings of Home Rule leagues or any meetings organized by them or any of the meetings at which well-known leaders of Home Rule were to speak.

His Excellency the PRESIDENT :—May I say to the honourable member that there is no question of prohibition? It was only a suggestion to principals and managers. The wording is : " Government particularly desire that school and college students should not be permitted to attend meetings which are organized by Home Rule leagues or at which Home Rule is to be advocated."

The Honourable Mr. PARANJPYE :—I refer to the words " should not be permitted," your Excellency. The Risley circular considers that so far as college students are concerned attendance at political meetings should be permitted at the discretion of the principals and so far as that went I do not think there was very much objection to that circular, at least so far as that circular was in force. This circular of 7th June, however, took away that discretion so far as attendance at Home Rule league meetings was concerned. That is how I read it. So far as other political meetings are concerned the discretion is still left to the managers and principals of schools and colleges, but so far as Home Rule leagues are concerned that is taken away. Now, if my honourable friend Mr. MUNMOHUNDAS RAMJI had confined himself to that circular, and that circular alone, and if he had said that the discretion of the principals as to giving permission to students to attend meetings whether they are convened by or are under the auspices of the Home Rule leagues or any other organization should be unfettered, then I would have supported my honourable friend Mr. MUNMOHUNDAS RAMJI wholeheartedly, as, particularly after the recent pronouncement of Mr. Montague in the House of Commons that the advocacy of Home Rule for India is a perfectly reasonable and perfectly justifiable agitation, I think that this special point of this circular loses all its force and Government may very well take away this special point from it and leave the old circular in force as before.

But my honourable friend has ranged over a wider ground and considered the general question of students and political meetings. In the first place, may I point out to my honourable friends Mr. MUNMOHUNDAS RAMJI and others who take an advanced view on this question that they are doing themselves very great harm by not exactly defining the words which they are using? When they talk about students and political meetings, I think they should, first of all, understand what is exactly meant by students. There are students of various classes : there are students in primary schools, secondary schools and students in colleges and post-graduate students, studying for LL.B. and other examinations. Now, I do not think it is good policy on the part of the extreme advocates of allowing students to attend political meetings to confuse all these four classes of students. I think if they only confine themselves to particular classes of students, which are very sharply defined from each other, they will improve their position as advocates tremendously. Now, so far as one class of these students are concerned, the post-graduate students, who are studying for the LL.B. and other examinations, I am glad to say that Government have already taken away every restriction on their movements. Then there is the vexed question of the students of colleges. Before I go on to them, I may say, that so far as students of secondary and primary schools are concerned I do not think any extreme advocates of liberty for students will advocate that they should be allowed to take part in political agitation so far as political meetings are concerned. After all, what are these students? They are students generally below 16 years of age and I do not think that students with healthy tendencies ought to interest themselves in politics or ought to think that it is desirable to attend political meetings, and I think reasonable and sane public opinion is on the side of those who say that students at schools should not be allowed to attend political meetings. The question of the college student is a much more vexed question. They are after all not quite boys, and on the other hand, they are not quite grown up citizens as my honourable friend Mr. MUNMOHUNDAS RAMJI would call them. Therefore, there is a wide latitude for the exercise of discrimination in the question of college students attending political meetings.

Now, your Excellency yourself and a large number of people to whom we need not take the least exception have always been telling college students in season and out of season that they should in their college days learn and study political questions and take interest in the general matters that are going on about them, but all the same they are to restrict their activities in this direction to the regular study of these questions and not take part in political agitation. Now, what my honourable friend Mr. MUNMOHUNDAS RAMJI says is that attending political meetings to get accurate knowledge of political questions is not at all undesirable. What I would put to my honourable friend Mr. MUNMOHUNDAS RAMJI is whether all these meetings are such that they can give accurate knowledge of political questions or political instruction to students. Some meetings of a particular nature are of a form in which they can get a knowledge of political questions; for instance, when the Honourable Mr. SASTRI or the Honourable PANDIT MADAN MOHAN MALAVIYA delivers a lecture on public questions, that is a lecture which students, in my opinion, can very reasonably attend, because they are likely to get ideas and increase their knowledge of public questions; but there are other meetings in which accurate knowledge is the last thing in the mind of the promoters. They are meetings in the form of agitation. Attending a meeting is in itself taking part in public agitation. Now, I want to ask my honourable friend Mr. MUNMOHUNDAS RAMJI whether it is these meetings which he wants students to attend. Any reasonable manager or principal of a college does not object to students studying public questions, discussing them in their debating societies and hearing lectures of eminent lecturers, and in fact, so far as I am concerned, I have always been encouraging my students to study all these questions from all points of view. Occasionally in my own college I have a series of lectures on public questions arranged, particularly for the students of the B.A. class, to deal from all points of view with questions that are agitating the minds of the public, and therefore I think that my attitude on this question will not be misunderstood. I do think that students should study these questions, not only from the practical and political point of view, but from the larger theoretical point of view also. When they, for instance, are discussing any questions on politics they ought to study the principles of political science and the economic theories underlying such questions, and I do encourage my students to study these questions as far as possible. Not only that, but in a large number of cases when I and my colleagues come in personal contact with the students we always allow them to discuss in the freest possible manner all current political questions and take the opportunity of correcting any wrong notions as far as we possibly can. I thus think and hope I have made my position clear that so far as studying those questions is concerned no objection can and should be taken.

But one cannot possibly take his mind away from the fact that some meetings at least, I am not concerned with the organizers of the meetings, are not of this kind. There are some classes of meetings where even if the professed subject of the lecture and the object of the meeting is one, other subjects are introduced into the meeting, by hook or crook, which are very undesirable and which students ought not to be allowed to attend. I say this with every sense of responsibility. Now, what happens in these days with our students is that a certain class of people have been pressing and are encouraging students to take part in things which are not their legitimate province. They must do first their own regular work and in their spare time they should read newspapers and study political questions. There is further an unhealthy tendency in boys to take part in political agitation to advertise themselves. Now, I think the tendency in students to advertise themselves is an unhealthy tendency. Well, I saw the other day that the object of one of the organizations here was to interest students in the study of political questions. One of the well-known leaders of the Home Rule League started a class for the study of the well-known book called "Seely's Expansion of England." The student-members of that organization were asked to go regularly over to special classes for the proper study of that book. But what happened? The students who were very fond of advertising themselves thought that this was too heavy a strain on their energies, and for the first day, probably owing to the novelty of the thing, 40 or 50 students attended and after two or three days only 7 or 8 people attended, and Mr. P. K. Telang of the Home Rule League had to drop that course because the students would not take the trouble to study and attend. Now, is this a very desirable tendency in them, not to study political questions but simply to advertise themselves by taking part in public meetings? Therefore, I say that when the Honourable Mr. MUNMOHUNDAS RAMJI introduced this more general question, I think he has followed a policy which is not quite politic if he wanted his resolution to commend itself to the Council.

On the other hand, I must also say that on the part of managers and principals of colleges there is also a grave responsibility. If the managers take too restricted a view of their responsibility then the students are likely to get out of hand. I have in my mind the recent example of a professor in Madras who used various punitive measures against a student who in a college essay advocated some extreme opinions and views. In a case like that the professor should not have taken any drastic measures but he ought to have called that student to himself and discussed the matter very calmly with him and advised him. When, however, he asked for an official apology for advocating these extreme opinions which were in the air, after all he advocated them in a college essay meant only for the eye of the professor, I think the professor did not understand his proper responsibility. I think therefore that while we are telling students that they must not before their time take part in political agitation and indulge their desire to advertise themselves, on the other hand, college professors ought to encourage them by all means in their power by using their personal influence and lead them in the right path. If on the one hand professors do not do these things it is bound to cause a reaction on the other hand and lead students to attend political meetings and hold extreme views. As it is said, stolen apples and stolen kisses are sweet: in the same manner if a student is prevented from taking any intelligent interest in these public questions which he finds agitating in all directions he will be by hook or crook led to satisfy his curiosity in some way or other. Therefore, it is the bounden duty of educationists to see that this natural curiosity of students in respect of these subjects is not curbed and to see that this curiosity of students about questions which are agitating the minds of his leaders is directed into the proper channel, and if the educationists do their own proper share of the work this question of students and politics would not attain very undesirable dimensions.

On account of these considerations, as I said, I do not know in what way to construe the Honourable Mr. MUNMOHUNDAS RAMJI'S resolution. The expression "student" is a very vague one. If he had confined himself to the first part then I think Government might very easily have accepted it because I find that the question of Home Rule leagues, at least after Government have publicly enunciated their policy, is not a question that Government can view with disfavour, but on the general question, so far as the remarks that he made on it are concerned, I am afraid I cannot support him. With these words I resume my seat.

The Honourable Mr. GOKULDAS KAHANDAS PAREKH:—Your Excellency,—I quite agree with my honourable friend Mr. PARANJPYE that the resolution which has been moved by my honourable friend Mr. MUNMOHANDAS RAMJI might have met with the approval of several of us if it had been framed in different language and had not been as wide as it is. The resolution involves a number of points upon many of which the majority of this Council cannot be in full agreement with the mover. It is not confined to the students who are studying law after they have completed their course in the arts colleges or even to college students, but involves all sorts of students including those in the secondary schools and perhaps even primary schools. Then it is not confined to lectures or meetings at which political instruction is imparted but extends to gatherings convened for carrying on violent propagandist agitations.

In my opinion it is exceedingly undesirable that students should be prohibited from attending lectures and addresses on political subjects delivered by gentlemen of learning and experience of the world. At the same time I am of opinion that there should be some sort of restraint to their attending and taking part in meetings and lectures for dilating on the evils of the existing system of Government, which may create in them wrong ideas, distract their minds from their studies and prompt them to disregard authorities. Where the effect of the lectures is to cause students to neglect their studies, to make them discontented and to create difficult positions in reference to them I deem the necessary restraints on their liberty as justifiable. But I should at the same time say that the circular which Government have issued could have been made much milder and they should not prevent the students from attending meetings at which the students are likely to derive considerable information and instruction. But that is not the question now before us and I do not think that the resolution which my honourable friend Mr. MUNMOHANDAS has placed before the Council in the form in which it stands is one which should be properly accepted.

The Honourable Mr. GHULAM MUHAMMAD walad Khán Bahádur WALI MUHAMMAD BHURGRI:—My Lord,—I want to move an amendment as follows:—

"This Council recommends to the Governor in Council that the part of the circular of the education department dated the 7th of June preventing college students from attending public meetings and the paragraph dealing with Home Rule leagues and meetings at which Home Rule is preached shall be revoked."

The reasons which have prompted me to propose this amendment are these. In the first place, sir, the case of college students is quite different to that of students of schools, and I find that even in England college authorities rather encourage college students to discuss politics and to go to political meetings and so forth.

His Excellency the PRESIDENT:—Will the honourable member give his authority for that?

The Honourable Mr. BHURGRI:—I have not the authority with me now, but I have read it in newspapers that there are political meetings and students are encouraged by the principals of the colleges to attend them.

His Excellency the PRESIDENT:—The authorities of the colleges at home are encouraging students to go to public and political meetings. Is that the honourable member's point?

STUDENTS AND POLITICS.

[Mr. Ghulam Muhammad Bhurgri; Sir Dinshaw Manockjee Petit; Sir Mahadev Bhaskar Chaubal.] [5TH DECEMBER 1917.]

The Honourable Mr. BHURGRI:—Yes, your Excellency. But may I ask your Excellency if in any civilized country there is any restriction placed upon college students to keep them away from public meetings? On my part I have not heard of any orders in any civilized country to this effect.

Then, sir, taking it from another point of view, I see that this circular prohibits all college students from attending any public meetings where Home Rule is preached. I have often come in touch with some of these young men and I can tell you, sir, that this circular has only caused irritation among the students and I find that they are now more eager than before to discuss politics. If that is so, I do not see why this circular which irritates not only the public but students also should be enforced. That is my reason for putting forward this amendment and distinguishing between students of colleges and students of schools.

As regards the paragraph regarding Home Rule, the position is this. I think, sir, what is at the back of Government's mind is that there is something wrong with these meetings of Home Rule leagues. If Government think that any of these meetings are illegal, why not frankly say so? Why put a restriction on students from attending these meetings and at the same time say that the meetings are quite legal and that there is nothing wrong with the meetings? If Government think that students should not attend Home Rule meetings the best course for Government is to come out and say so instead of issuing a circular of this sort.

With these remarks I trust that the Council will accept my amendment.

The Honourable Sir DINSHAW MANOCKJEE PETIT:—Your Excellency,—My position as regards the resolution is somewhat of the same difficult nature as has been described by my honourable friend Mr. PARANJPYE. But the amendment moved by my honourable friend Mr. BHURGRI has simplified my difficulties to a considerable extent. The amendment suggests that college students should be allowed to attend political meetings. Well, I think, sir, that even the mentality of the college students is in a process of being moulded at the time when they attend college and I think it would be still better if the privilege of attending political meetings is given only to post-graduate students. The consequence of meddling with politics if indulged in the extreme becomes of a much graver nature in this country where the government is not government by the people of the country, but by the people of a foreign country. Therefore, I do not think that we can be too cautious in seeing how the students mix themselves with political movements in this country. I should have preferred if my honourable friend Mr. BHURGRI were to put the word "post-graduate" in his amendment.

The Honourable Sir MAHADEV CHAUBAL:—I may inform the honourable member that since the misunderstanding about this circular came to the notice of Government they have notified that it does not affect the students of the Government Law School and they have also notified that it does not affect graduates. That has already been declared.

The Honourable Sir DINSHAW PETIT:—That being so, your Excellency, I regret I will not be able to support my honourable friend Mr. BHURGRI'S amendment, as far as it concerns college students; but if some means could be found by which his amendment may be voted upon in two parts, so that one would deal with the omission of that part of the Government circular which deals with the Home Rule movement and the other with regard to the liberty that he wants to give to the college students to attend political meetings, it will facilitate matters considerably. It is rather unfortunate, sir, that Government should have picked out the Home Rule movement for special reference in their circular, and now with the changed angle of vision I think Government would do well if they would agree to rescind that part of the circular.

[5TH DECEMBER 1917.] [Mr. G. S. Curtis; Mr. J. G. Covernton.]

The Honourable Mr. G. S. CURTIS:—Your Excellency,—In view of what has fallen from the Honourable Mr. BHURGRI, I think perhaps it might help matters if I make clear what I understand is the fact as regards the internal discipline of the English universities. My information is naturally not very modern, but my own experience, which dates back some 30 years, leads me to make the following statement. As far as the discussion of political subjects among the students themselves, in their debates and so on, was concerned, there was practically no restriction on what the students at colleges might or might not discuss. Not only could they discuss such subjects among themselves, but they were encouraged to invite competent statesmen, sometimes of advanced views, to come down from London and lecture on important questions of the day, and it was always felt, I must say, that there was no danger in statesmen who would normally hold advanced views coming down and speaking to the students and addressing them, because the meetings of course were generally of an open nature and access was always open to the authorities responsible for the discipline and for the diffusion of sane ideas among young men at this peculiarly malleable period of their career.

But, sir, as regards the attendance of students at public meetings, my recollection is that there was a strict university rule that they were not allowed to attend them. University discipline required that they should be in their colleges at a given hour. That, I understand, is the express object of this circular. As far as the discussion of political questions is concerned, it is open to students to discuss political questions among themselves, as they have I gather recently done, but as for attending meetings held by leaders of public opinion, that is a different matter altogether.

As regards Sir DINSHAW PETIT'S remarks, he will notice that recent Government orders say expressly that post-graduates are exempted from the circular under discussion.

The Honourable Mr. J. G. COVERNTON:—Your Excellency,—I would like to say a few words on this subject. What I am going to say has been very much better put by my honourable friend Mr. PARANJPYE and I endorse practically the greater part of his speech. I think that he has shown us very clearly the dangers of what I may call unrestricted license in regard to this matter.

The amendment which is the particular subject of the present discussion purports to follow the lines of the Honourable Mr. PARANJPYE'S speech and I have no doubt that the honourable mover of the amendment thinks that he is following those lines. But it seems to me that he is not altogether on the same plane in his views as far as this amendment goes. As a brother educationist I can sympathize with the Honourable Mr. PARANJPYE in the line which he takes and which I think is perhaps not clearly understood by the honourable mover of this amendment. What I gather the Honourable Mr. PARANJPYE really wants is not that the right of attending public or political meetings should be given freely to students but rather that the reasonable discretion of the principals of the colleges should be admitted and that within natural limits jurisdiction should be left to them, practically as it was under the previous circular. Now, that is one thing, but the Honourable Mr. BHURGRI'S amendment, so far as I understand it, is rather different. It throws open the whole question and so far as I can see it might make it very difficult for the principals of colleges to exercise that discretion and that right, which I think apart from the question of Government orders, is certainly in the abstract theirs. No educationist at any rate wishes the hands of principals of colleges to be tied in respect of either a particular student or of some society. If a principal held that some meeting or other was not such as might benefit a student and issued an order prohibiting or preventing him from attending, it is very obvious that it would raise a very awkward position if the student were able to quote a resolution passed by this Council to the effect that students were allowed to attend political meetings. That would raise, as I said, a very difficult position and would practically cut the ground from below the feet of principals of colleges throughout the country.

I should like to add a word or two about the term "students". There are a good many misused words in this country but this is one of the most misused in my sad experience. I hear a child who can hardly walk to school described as a student. I have also heard of an aged person who has failed many times to get through an examination,—not in this country but in a country further east—a parent who has a child at school and who himself is in the 6th form in school,—also described as a student. Well, I cannot say honestly that I can admit persons of these sorts to the ordinary category of students. The word "student" does not mean a primary school child nor does it mean a secondary school boy but it means generally a young man or young woman attending college. I think it will be very much better if we bear this connotation in mind, and we will, therefore, do well when we use the word "student" to confine it to persons who attend colleges or to students of equivalent status.

But I am not quite sure that even so we can accept the view that because a youth is a student at college, therefore, he is competent to entertain views and to form his own opinion on subjects as wide and difficult as those with which politics are concerned. I would remind you that at any rate in England the student up to the time he is educating himself for the B.A., no matter what other examinations he may have passed, and however clever he is or advanced in views, is still considered to be in statu pupillari, i. e., intellectually a child. Technically he is simply a pupil and as such he is not supposed to have arrived at years of discretion and is not at liberty to form judgments on all manner of subjects which either door do not come within his activities. Therefore, I do not think that the restriction which has been placed——

The Honourable Mr. BELVI:—Will the honourable member tell us whether there are any circulars of this kind issued in England in any of the Universities?

The Honourable Mr. COVERNTON:—I am coming to that. It is a little difficult to make it understood. This view is to be inferred from statutes and notices, etc., from the terms used therein; such are issued in Latin in the older universities. In these it is understood that every student (and I am not putting forward mere fiction or mere supposition but what is an acknowledged fact) is considered to be a 'pupil' until he has passed his B.A., and even then he is not supposed to be fit to be called an intellectual adult until he has passed his M.A. The reason is that there was a parallel in the old days between a student at college and an apprentice and a journeyman. The apprentice did work under a master, also the student at a college worked under a 'master'. A boy had at first to work as an apprentice for some years to become a journeyman and even as a journeyman he was not at liberty to hold any views he liked as regards his trade or public affairs but had to do a certain class of work and to abide by certain principles and rules. Similarly the student was an apprentice till he had taken his B.A. and even then was not supposed to be a full adult or free to enjoy the privileges of an adult but was intellectually in the journeyman stage and had to wait until he became an M.A., to be considered an intellectual adult. As far as the older universities go at any rate, the degree of B.A. has still to be passed before the state of 'pupillage' is left behind and the Latin definition of 'student' holds good even at the present time.

Well, I revert to my original point. I was maintaining that it is not wise to allow all students to attend all kinds of meetings just as they choose. Whether that restraint should be effected by a Government order or whether it should be done through the more delicate method of collegiate jurisdiction was more precisely the point which I wished to consider. Now, I am sure that a good many of us here would feel that it is preferable where we can to rely on the principals provided we can rely on them to exercise their jurisdiction reasonably. If we can tell them that, it would be preferable to follow that course rather than to impose a policy on them from without or to force their hand.

STUDENTS AND POLITICS.

[5TH DECEMBER 1917.] [Mr. J. G. Covernton; Rao Bahâdur Ganesh Krishna Sathe.]

In this regard I would like to point out that the particular mention of Home Rule and Home Rule meetings in the circular to which objection has been taken was intended not, I think, to indicate disapproval of Home Rule as such but rather to emphasise the fact that attendance at political meetings was prohibited to students. Home Rule meetings being an obvious illustration of political meetings it was thought desirable to state also that students should not be allowed to attend Home Rule meetings. Cases of objectionable Home Rule meetings have been brought to notice and it has been found that such meetings exercise an undesirable influence on students, and therefore, for this reason also particular mention of them was made in this circular. It was not intended to add anything to the previous circular but merely to illustrate particular cases that can come under it It is very easy of course for people to say that students should be allowed to attend outside political meetings. But it is very dangerous to give a general concession. In many cases that have come to my notice there is one particular instance which will be within the recollection also of one honourable member here. He was there at that particular meeting, which on the face of it was unobjectionable and at which his students were permitted to attend. So far as my knowledge of it goes, not gradually but almost at once the discussion degenerated into mere declamation which was violent, and quite unreasonable, regarding a certain policy of the principal in question. The result was that so far from the principal being respected and obeyed, his own college students joined the agitators and the principal had to see his own students rejecting his advice. Such an example shows the danger of meetings even at first sight unobjectionable. I think that if we are to modify this circular we must be sure that principals will really exercise their discretion. If principals will exercise their discretion and are prepared—I say this after due consideration—to take this responsibility, then I imagine, as far as the department is concerned, we may be prepared to trust them. It is for this reason that I should be sorry myself to see the amendment which the Honourable Mr. BHURGRI has put forward accepted exactly at any rate in the present form. I should prefer to modify the circular so as to allow the principals that jurisdiction which they desire and which I am sure most educationists would feel that they should be allowed to exercise.

The Honourable Rao Bahadur GANESH KRISHNA SATHE :—May it please your Excellency, I cannot see my way to accord support to the amendment proposed by my honourable friend Mr. BHURGRI. In fact the effect of that amendment would be that if it is accepted by this Council the orders passed by Government Resolution No. 2395 of 30th September 1908 will be reversed. Though I am not an educationist and though I do not profess to speak with authority, as to whether students should attend political meetings or not, still as the subject affects the student class as a whole, I think I should give articulate expression to my views on this subject.

The present circular about which complaint is being made by the honourable mover of this resolution is of 7th June 1917, and if honourable members were to look at the circular they will find that it only reiterates or reaffirms previous orders on the point, namely, of 1908 and 1909, and what is further added in that circular is paragraph 2 which states : " Government particularly desire that school and college students should not be permitted to attend meetings which are organised by Home Rule Leagues or at which Home Rule is to be advocated. Proved instances of the breach of the rules or connivance at their breach by the heads or managers of educational institutions will be taken serious notice of by Government." What gave Government reason for adding this clause ? The reason is given in the preamble of the circular and it is this: "It has recently come to the notice of Government that students from schools and colleges have latterly been attending political meetings in large numbers. Such attendance is contrary to the rules regarding the participation of students in public meetings laid down by Government in connection with the maintenance of discipline in schools and colleges. It is the desire of Government that these rules should be strictly observed at the present time by pupils of all educational institutions, whether Government, aided, or unaided but recognized." It appears from this that Government thought that the instructions which were conveyed to the principals of colleges and headmasters of schools by the Resolution of 1908 were not being complied with—let me say that I do not mean any disparagement to my honourable friend Mr. PARANJPYE—but as Government seems to have found it, they thought of bringing it again to the notice of headmasters and principals and particularly impressing upon their attention the undesirability on the part of students to attend Home Rule meetings.

[Raq Bahadur Ganesh Krishna Sathe; Mr. Munmohundass Ramji; Mr. Raghunath Purshottam Paranjpye.] [5TH DECEMBER 1917.]

Before going to the next point of mine I will only with your Excellency's permission read paragraph 11 of the circular of 1908. That paragraph says: "The above rules will apply to all schools and colleges, Government or aided, except that college students may attend public meetings with the previous permission of the Principal, to whose discretion it shall also be left what papers are admitted into the college." So this was the original paragraph as it stood in 1908 and as both the educationists who are on this Council are of opinion that discretion in this matter should entirely be left to the heads of the several educational institutions whether to allow their students to attend meetings or not, I think the best course will be to drop paragraph 2 of the circular of 1917 and with your Excellency's permission I would propose an amendment, namely,

That this Council recommends to the Governor in Council that paragraph 2 of the Circular of the Educational Department of the Government of Bombay dated 7th June 1917, preventing students from attending public meetings, should be revoked.

If I am allowed to move that amendment I will state in a few words my reasons for it.

In speaking to this amendment I have to make a very few observations. The circulars on this point have been in vogue ever since 1908 and what has really led my honourable friend Mr. MUNMOHANDAS RAMJI to move this resolution is the distinction made in paragraph 2 of the circular of 7th June 1917. If that paragraph is taken away as regards all public meetings of Home Rule the the result will be that it will always be open to the principals' discretion whether to allow their students to attend public meetings or not according to the nature of that meeting and according to the person who is to be the lecturer or speaker in that meeting. If that addition of the paragraph has really actuated my honourable friend Mr. MUNMOHANDAS RAMJI to move this resolution, then the deletion of it ought to satisfy him. And though it is not my province to enter into the question as to whether students should attend public meetings or not, still, so long as the discretion has been given to the principals of colleges and headmasters of schools, I do not think that there is any danger in allowing the previous orders to stand as they are. The only thing that we need do is to take away paragraph 2 of the circular which really forms the subject-matter of this resolution.

The Honourable Mr. MUNMOHUNDASS RAMJI:—Your Excellency,—With regard to the statements made by the various honourable members on this resolution, the Honourable Mr. PARANJPYE seems to think that my resolution is a very wide one.

The Honourable Mr. PARANJPYE:—I said that the honourable member's speech was a wide one and not the resolution.

STUDENTS AND POLITICS.

[5TH DECEMBER 1917.] [Mr. Dattatraya Venkatesh Belvi; the President; Mr. Vithalbhai Jhaverbhai Patel; Mr. Munmohundass Ramji.]

The Honourable Mr. BELVI:—May I know if the Honourable Mr. MUNMOHUNDASS is replying to the amendment?

His Excellency the PRESIDENT:—The Honourable Mr. MUNMOHUNDASS is replying to the amendments as well as on the resolution.

The Honourable Mr. BELVI:—If that be the case, I must speak on the resolution. I was under the impression that the last amendment was under discussion.

The Honourable Mr. PATEL:—I also want to speak on the resolution, your Excellency. I also thought that the amendment of the Honourable Rao Bahadur SATHE was being discussed.

His Excellency the PRESIDENT:—I am afraid that my honourable friends are too late now. They had plenty of time before my honourable friend Mr. MUNMOHUNDASS got up to reply.

The Honourable Mr. MUNMOHUNDASS RAMJI:—As the Honourable Mr. PARANJPYE has said that he takes objection to my speech and not to my resolution, I am satisfied that he agrees with my resolution, either wholly or partly, but that he does not agree with my speech. He tried to differentiate between students of different grades. How is it possible to differentiate between the students when they have attended a public meeting? It is a task where either the C. I. D. or a special class of people ought to be sent to watch the proceedings of every meeting where a note should be taken by that officer or officers showing which of the students and of which grade attended; that would be a very difficult task to perform. I say that it is a task which it is impossible to put into practice.

As to the qualifying statements made by several honourable members, I have to point out to them that my intention is not merely to have the second clause deleted of the circular which is the subject matter of my resolution. I intended to go a little further, because in that circular references are given to two previous circulars. Circular No. 2395 has in all 12 paragraphs and circular No. 1570 of 1909 has 8 paragraphs, suggesting different remedies and containing certain suggestions. In circular No. 1570 in the last paragraph instructions are given to the school masters where it is pointed out that no boy is to attend or take part in the organisation or conduct of any public meeting of any kind, or without the express permission of the headmaster in the collection of a fund. Now that circular dated 7th June also has a reference to this paragraph. Now my contention is whether it is right for the Government to issue a circular prohibiting students—primary students, secondary students, college students, or post graduate students—from attending any public meeting. Therefore I want to take out from the circular also that suggestion. That was my object in including the whole resolution. My object was that this paragraph in that particular Government resolution should also be deleted along with paragraph No. 2 prohibiting the attendance of students at Home Rule meetings. That was my object. However, I have no particular desire to insist that my resolution should be carried. If honourable members think that any one of the two amendments that are before them will serve the purpose of my resolution and if they vote in favour of them, I will have no objection.

His Excellency the PRESIDENT:—Does the honourable member mean that he wants to withdraw his resolution?

The Honourable Mr. MUNMOHUNDASS:—If either of the amendments is carried, it will naturally drop, your Excellency.

His Excellency the PRESIDENT:—Well, the honourable member does not want to withdraw his resolution?

STUDENTS AND POLITICS.

[Mr. Munmohundass Ramji; Mr. Ghulam Muhammad Bhurgri; Rao Bahadur Ganesh Krishna Sathe; Sir Mahadev Bhaskar Chaubal.] [5TH DECEMBER 1917.]

The Honourable Mr. MUNMOHUNDASS:—Not at this stage, your Excellency.

I only expect that honourable members will see at the time of voting whether they would like to have clause 8 of the circular which I just read out where prohibition is wholesale and where it is stated that students of any description should not attend any public meeting, revoked.

With these few remarks I hope that the Council will carry my resolution.

The Honourable Mr. GHULAM MUHAMMAD walad Khan Bahadur WALI MUHAMMAD BHURGRI:—Your Excellency,—In replying to the criticism which has been levelled against my amendment I have to say only a few words. In the first place, the Honourable Mr. CURTIS told the Council that in England it is not the practice that the college authorities allow students to attend public meetings, but that the college authorities sometimes arranged for lectures to be delivered under their supervision in the college by public men and politicians. But may I tell my honourable friend that I have myself with a number of friends of Oxford attended public meetings at the time when I was studying in England. I myself with a number of friends have attended public meetings where the question of tariff reform was being discussed at the time and nobody took the least objection to our doing so.

Then, sir, the Honourable the Director of Public Instruction told us that the Home Rule clause was simply put in to illustrate that the students should not go to political meetings, and this was one of the political meetings. Well, that is, I think, rather an ingenious explanation. But, as every one knows, a Home Rule meeting is most obviously a political meeting, and there was therefore absolutely no necessity for Government to specifically mention Home Rule meetings. As I say, sir, I think that there is a sting in that paragraph and the proper course for Government would have been, if they considered meetings at which Home Rule was preached were unconstitutional, to plainly say so; and then the country would have been able to judge for itself. My amendment proposes to remove this unnecessary sting, and I hope the Council will accept it.

The Honourable Rao Bahadur GANESH KRISHNA SATHE:—Your Excellency,—I think I did not make myself quite clear, but I would put it to the members of this Council whether, even if they were to accept in its entirety the resolution of my honourable friend Mr. MUNMOHUNDASS, they really expect to get over the instructions which already exist under the rules or resolutions of 1908 and 1909. My own opinion on the point is that even if the circular of 7th June 1917 is withdrawn or this Council recommends the withdrawal of the whole circular, still the old orders of 1908 and 1909 do remain and the instructions and restrictions which are at present in existence will continue to exist. The only addition which was made was with respect to Home Rule meetings, as enunciated in paragraph 2 of the circular, and if there is no justification for this kind of differentiation between public meetings of other kinds and public meetings on Home Rule, then, sir, the mere dropping of the second paragraph of the circular would meet the requirements of the case. Government will also see that their old instructions remain intact and that the discretion vests in the principals and headmasters which they should exercise rather more rigorously, if Government thinks that they have not been so doing hitherto. I once more say that even if the whole resolution is accepted, what is wanted to be gained will not be gained.

The Honourable Sir MAHADEV BHASKAR CHAUBAL:—Your Excellency,—I rise to explain to honourable members the position of Government on this point, particularly as this subject has formed food for discussion in most Indian papers latterly. So far as the original resolution which the Honourable

Mr. MUNMOHUNDASS has moved is concerned, one objection to its being accepted has been already pointed out by the Honourable Rao Bahadur SATHE, viz., even if, as he suggests, this circular is cancelled, the old circulars of 1908 and 1909 will still remain in force: and the honourable member and his students will remain much the same as they are now.

I will now explain to honourable members how and why this circular came to be issued. At the time when it was issued, Government got reports of certain Home Rule speeches which had been made in different parts of the Presidency, and Government with what wisdom you will credit it with, thought that those particular speeches were not the sort of speeches to which students should be treated, and it was ascertained that most of the audience at these lectures consisted of students. Therefore Government thought that perhaps the old circular required to be brought more definitely to the attention of managers and heads of schools and educational institutions. That really is the reason why this circular of the 7th June was issued. It will be seen that the preamble of the circular does absolutely nothing more than repeat the old circular of 1908, and the only point which I think requires explanation is the one made by the Honourable Mr. PARANJPYE as regards the possible interpretation of the second paragraph, that it was intended to interfere with the discretion of the principals of colleges which was given to them under rule 11 of the circular of 1908. I rise to state that this circular has been misunderstood in certain ways. It was never intended to apply to students in the Government law school who have already passed their B.A. and have kept terms for a couple of years. It was never intended to apply to them. It has further been decided that the circular should not apply to students who had taken their degrees in arts and were therefore supposed to be naturally interested in the study of political questions and the study of subjects which they had taken up as their voluntary subjects, such as economics or constitutional history, etc. I must confess that it did not occur to Government that the circular would be interpreted by principals of colleges as interfering with their discretion, and if any pronouncement is wanted on that particular point, I now give it on behalf of Government, that it had not the remotest intention to so interfere. Government perhaps rendered the task of the heads of colleges easier by laying down that Home Rule league meetings owing to the kind of speeches made at them generally would fall within the category of meetings from which students in colleges had better keep away, but it was not intended that the principal of a college should not exercise the discretion which has been given to him by rule No. 11. You may therefore take it that Government would not object to the head or principal of a college inviting eminent persons or those in whom he has confidence, to come to his college and give a discourse to his students on any political question, nor would it object to a principal permitting his students to attend a public lecture which he has reason to believe would be instructive and calculated to impress on their young minds the correct duties of loyal citizenship. If therefore the Honourable Mr. PARANJPYE and principals in his position are ready to take upon themselves the responsibility of deciding what particular meetings they will permit their students to attend, I think Government would have no objection to their doing so, notwithstanding the wording of the second paragraph of the circular of 7th June as it stands. Unfortunately, all the specimens which Government got of the speeches made on these occasions were, they thought, speeches to which the principals of colleges would certainly not permit their students to go. But if this circular is misunderstood as interfering with the discretion given to them by rule 11 of the old circular, I rise to correct that misunderstanding and say that the discretion of the principal is not intended to be taken away.

But as regards schools, I think Government is perfectly definite that even under the Honourable Rao Bahadur SATHE's amendment, we are not prepared to accept that it should be open to any high school boy or secondary school boy to go and attend any public meeting, even with the permission of his head master. There are no less than 200 schools, aided and unaided, and these are subject to the general rules of conduct which Government wish to impose upon all students attending them. Therefore Government is not prepared to cancel paragraph 2 wholesale, but would only be prepared to state that the discretion which is given in rule 11 of the circular of 30th September 1908 is not intended to be taken away in any way by this paragraph 2.

The Honourable Mr. PARANJPYE :—May I point out that the old circular does not allow any students to attend any political meeting and the word 'school' in the second paragraph was not required ?

The Honourable Sir MAHADEV CHAUBAL :—Perhaps my honourable friend is right in saying that it was not necessary, and the word possibly crept in as the whole circular of 1908 referred both to schools and colleges. I do not think anybody in this assembly will advocate, as the Honourable Mr. MUNMOHUNDASS wants, that there should be free license to boys to attend any political meeting whatever. I only rise to correct the possible misunderstanding which the Honourable Mr. PARANJPYE has pointed out, and Government would be very glad to see principals of colleges taking upon themselves the responsibility of seeing that students are not permitted to attend objectionable meetings.

But I ask honourable members most earnestly to consider the argument which the honourable mover of the original resolution, Mr. MUNMOHUNDASS, advanced in his reply to induce you to accept it. That argument is tantamount to saying that any offence which is difficult to discover and bring home to the offender should not be provided for in any penal statute or code. That is really the argument which the Honourable Mr. MUNMOHUNDASS RAMJI was reduced to advance in support of his resolution. He says, "Why do you declare that such and such a thing should not be permitted ? You will never be able to catch him." I think I need only mention the unsoundness of the argument which has been advanced, and with that I leave the Council to vote upon the amendments and the resolution.

His Excellency the PRESIDENT :—I do not think I need add very much to what my honourable colleague has said, because most of the honourable members know that I already had an opportunity of expressing my own views on this particular matter while addressing the Honourable Mr. PARANJPYE'S students and I think they did not disapprove of my views. They did not show any violent opposition when I met them ; so presumably they rather approved of my views.

I should just like to put the case as clearly as possible before honourable members as far as Government is concerned. I think we may take it, first of all, that very few Governments, certainly not this Government, wish to employ restrictive measures, as far as they can be avoided, in the case of either students or principals, and surely it is perfectly obvious why action was taken in this particular case. I do not wish to conceal anything in any form or shape. There was a Government resolution with regard to this very matter issued seven or eight years ago. Well, I think honourable members, of whatever political views they may be, would be prepared to agree that at a certain period not so very long ago there was considerable agitation about a certain public question ; some rather violent speeches were made—I would be almost inclined to say a great many violent speeches were made—and Government found that a good many students were going to these meetings. Well, obviously what Government had to do in these circumstances was to add to these resolutions of 1908 and 1909 a clause which impressed very clearly and definitely on the minds of principals that Government disapproved entirely of young men attending meetings on this particular subject, and it seems to me a perfectly common-sense view for Government to take. I own that—I do not want to go into any controversial matter—I have read a good many of these speeches and I am perfectly convinced that no parent—at least I would be very sorry if any parent were so inclined—would like his children to go and listen to a good many of the speeches that I have read, and I am bound to admit that as an old politician I do remember having attended a good many meetings myself which I should be very sorry indeed if my own son were to attend. But what I would impress upon honourable members is this, that these were the circumstances in which Government added this particular clause.

Now I gather from the Honourable Mr. PARANJPYE that he says that the circular has restricted the discretion of principals and that that discretion should remain unimpaired. Well, we are most anxious to do so, but I would ask in the first place one question. I noticed not very long ago a meeting of students at which I think he presided and at which, if I may say so, he made some most admirable remarks with regard to students and political meetings, and there was at that meeting another gentleman who has obtained some eminence from putting forward very forcibly a certain political propaganda. Well, that gentleman, I think rather reprehensibly, got up in direct opposition to my honourable friend Mr. PARANJPYE. He suggested that my honourable friend's point of view was quite wrong. Now my honourable friend was the principal and a great many of his students were present at that meeting and that other gentleman was trying to undermine his influence, and as far as I read the account of that meeting the students seemed to vociferously applaud, not my honourable friend, but the other gentleman.

Well, now, I come to the point. We are perfectly ready to consider, if principals of colleges will say to us definitely: "We can control our students", whether we cannot give the principals a fuller discretion in the matter. Our object in inserting this particular clause was to assist them and to strengthen their hands in regard to their students. But if they will say to us: "We can perfectly control our students; we can stop them going to such meetings as we do not want them to go to; we will be fully responsible to Government if they go to those meetings and we will take severe measures if they do go", if they are going to take up that position, then we are perfectly prepared to consider some alteration in this particular circular; but all principals of colleges must clearly understand that that is the Government's position. We believe that for a student to go to political meetings as a regular habit is a most undesirable thing. We believe that undergraduates should have perfect liberty to have their political debating societies and to get distinguished politicians to come and discuss political questions with them. But we cannot accept the proposition that students must have absolute freedom, as my honourable friend Mr. MUNMOHUNDASS RAMJI wishes, to go to any political meeting at any time. That is a proposition that Government cannot accept, a proposition that I am sure all reasonable men would not expect Government to accept.

That is all I wish to say on the merits of this resolution, but I would add that, as far as I can see, it would be impossible for Government to accept either the resolution or any of the amendments and we must leave it at that; that if the principals really feel that there is any serious interference with their authority over their students, and further that they can guarantee to us full and absolute control over their students and full responsibility for them, we are perfectly willing to consider some modification of the circular. We have no wish to interfere with their discretion or to take away their responsibility; in fact, it is our one desire to leave them as they stood.

The Honourable Ráo Bahádur SATHE'S amendment was then put to the vote and lost, 11 members voting for and 28 against it. The Council divided as follows:—

His Excellency the PRESIDENT:—The Council will now adjourn till 4 o'clock.

The Council then adjourned for lunch.

[After Lunch.]

The Council re-assembled at 4 p.m.

His Excellency the PRESIDENT:—Order, order. Resolution No. 7. The Honourable Mr. GARUD.

The Honourable Mr. SIDDHANATH DHONDDEV GARUD.—Your Excellency,—The resolution which stands in my name reads as follows:—

"This Council recommends to His Excellency the Governor in Council that no pass be required for the removal of wood which is not Government property from private lands."

I may, with your Excellency's permission, briefly explain the situation as it now obtains. The Honourable Mr. UPASANI once asked Government whether any pass was necessary to cut wood in private land. The answer of Government was in the negative. The Honourable Mr. UPASANI again asked another question which I shall read because it relates more to the question which we are now considering. He asked:—

> "Has Government's attention been drawn to the complaint referred to in the Kesari of 28th August 1916 about one Sher Mohummad Khan Jabarkhan of Panvel being required by the forest authorities to obtain a pass from the village talati for taking a cartload of rafters belonging to a private owner from his Malki land to Panvel, a distance of two and a half miles, though he had the owner's pass with him?"

Government's answer to this was that "the answer is in the affirmative".

He went on to say:—

> "Is a pass from the village officers necessary for transit of wood which is not Government property?"

The answer was:—

> "Under certain conditions.

FOREST PASSES.

[Mr. Siddhanath Dhonddev Garud; Mr. G. Carmichael.] [5TH DECEMBER 1917.]

"The rules for transit of forest produce were published under Notification No. 4133 of 9th August 1880 at page 689 of Part I of the Bombay Government Gazette of 1880."

Government in this Gazette published the rules which they were entitled to make under section 41 of the Forest Act. This section 41 enabled them to make rules to prohibit the import and export or moving of timber or other forest produce without a pass from an officer duly authorized to issue the same. This power which Government took under the rules was apparently taken on account of the definition of forest produce given in section 2 of the Forest Act. This section 2 of the Forest Act defined forest produce to mean the following, whether found in or brought from a forest or not: "timber, etc." Apparently the Forest Act was intended to protect the rights of Government in Government forests and forest produce apparently would have meant the produce from Government property.

The Honourable Mr. CARMICHAEL:—May I ask the honourable member with regard to the definition which he quoted, whether it specifies Government forest.

The Honourable Mr. GARUD:—It does not, and therefore I stated that it enabled Government to require these passes. Apparently the Forest Act was intended merely to protect the interests of Government in Government forests but it did not say that clearly in the definition and so Government thought they were entitled to take to themselves powers which also regulated the transit of private wood from private land. The situation is this. Any man may in his Malki number move wood from one part to another without any pass. He is entitled to take it from his land to the village without any pass but if he wishes to move that wood from his own village to another village or any other place where he can sell it, a pass under the rules is required from the Conservator of Forests or from some officer who is empowered by him to issue these passes. Usually when a pass is required for the removal of wood from a Malki number that pass is issued by the village talati and this pass under rule 4 of the rules framed by Government is to be handed over to the officer of the forest specified in that pass when the wood arrives at its destination. I submit these precautions, though they may have been necessary at one time to preserve and protect the interests of Government in their reserved forests, are now hardly necessary. There are a few reserved forests and the approaches and exits from those forests can easily be guarded. Many of them are now wire-fenced, but in any case the depôt is usually situated in such a place as will enable proper supervision to be exercised on the wood that is removed from Government forests.

This condition of requiring a private owner who fells wood in his Malki number to get a pass from the talati to move wood from one part to another works great hardship in practice. It is not very sound in principle. It appears to me like a rule made to require everybody who moves property from one district to another to show it to an officer of Government, just to enable them to make sure that he is not carrying away Government property. This rule which is bad in principle works worse in practice. The village talati is usually not to be found in his place now. At the time when these rules were made the village talati was a member of the village community. He was usually a resident of the village like the village headman, but now the talati is in charge of four or five villages and usually he is not to be found at any particular time at any particular village. Then, even if the talati is approached, there is very little chance of that man going and finding out from what malki number that wood is actually cut. Because, as I observed, the actual cutting and the removal of the wood to the village does not require any pass. He has therefore to give that pass more or less on trust, and that is how it is usually done. It leads, however, to much petty harassment in practice, and if the owner fails to get a pass from the talati the penalties are exceedingly severe. His cart, his bullocks and all the wood that he is carrying from one place to another and also any other property that he is carrying along with that wood are all liable to be confiscated. I submit that if he wishes to escape petty harassment, he has no other remedy but to submit to this graver harassment. Under these circumstances, considering that it is now difficult to get a pass from the village talati who is usually not to be found at any particular time in his own village, considering that the exits and the entrances into Government forests are usually well protected now, and considering that the people have, by long practice, learnt to respect the rights of Government in their forests, this rule does not appear to me to be necessary. I submit, therefore, that the time has come when this rule should be revised and should be so revised as to enable private owners to cut and remove wood from their own lands without any pass from the village officers.

The Honourable Mr. C. N. SEDDON:—Your Excellency,—The Honourable Mr. GARUD has complained of a certain rule which works harshly, causing inconvenience and loss. It may be so possibly. But I submit for your Excellency's consideration and the consideration of this Council that the honourable member's procedure is open to objection. If a rule works harshly, I would suggest that the better procedure for the honourable member would be to ask a question to enable Government to consider the matter or to apply to the officers of the revenue or forest departments to see how far they can go to meet the difficulties that he points out. I have had no notice of this objection, and without enquiring and ascertaining why the forest department has framed the rule, how it works, and whether it can be altered, it is extremely difficult to answer the honourable gentleman's objections. I would suggest that it would be fairer if some opportunity for enquiry and consideration were given to the officers of Government in this matter. One can easily imagine that there must be difficulties which have rendered it necessary to have some pass for the removal of forest produce. How far it would be possible to modify a rule of that kind in order to avoid harassment to people, and how far it would be necessary to maintain some restriction, I think, are matters which want consideration and consultation with the forest department and the local officers of the district. So I submit that this Council should not countenance a decision about this matter without giving the officers of Government some chance of enquiry and consideration.

The Honourable Khan Bahadur PIR BAKSH walad MIAN MAHMUD:—Your Excellency,—I do not think that the resolution of my honourable friend Mr. GARUD should be accepted by this Council as, if the resolution is adopted, it will merely encourage theft of fuel from Government land and forests. The restrictions as to the removal of fuel from private land are based on very good principles and it causes practically no inconvenience or any unnecessary delay. When an application for a pass is made, the village accountant goes to the land and satisfies himself whether the required quantity of fuel is available in private land, and when he is satisfied he issues the required pass. If this restriction is removed, the occupant of the land will no doubt easily remove as much quantity of fuel from Government land or forest as he chooses without payment of the usual fees or royalty and without being detected, as it is quite impossible for the revenue or forest subordinates to keep a proper watch on a vast area of Government jungle and forest, nor is it possible for Government to appoint so many watchmen for the purpose. These remarks may not be considered to be imaginary fears, but they are based on facts. Some years ago there were some cases of theft detected in some of the talukas in Sind and they were severely punished, but detection is not an easy thing. These thefts cannot always be detected. I am sure that less strict measures to check thefts will not prove successful. I therefore strongly oppose the resolution as the adoption of it is bound to facilitate abuses.

FOREST PASSES.

[Mr. Ghulam Muhammad Bhurgri; Mr. Siddhanath Dhonddev Garud; the President; Mr. Shridhar Balkrishna Upasani.] [5TH DECEMBER 1917.]

The Honourable Mr. GHULAM MUHAMMAD walad Khan Bahadur WALI MUHAMMAD BHURGRI:—My Lord,—After listening to the remarks of my honourable friend Mr. GARUD, I confess that it will not be desirable to accept the resolution as it stands. Recently I have come across a lot of complaints of this nature. It is a very great hardship on the private land holder. He has to wait for months together before he can remove the wood which is his property, and for which he has paid assessment. In order to draw the attention of Government to this matter, at this Council I had put a question as follows:—

"Will Government be pleased to state—

"(a) If a zamindar in Sind who proposes to cut trees in his own 'Huri' and send the fuel to some town for disposal has to apply to the Mukhtyarkar for a pass-book to be obtained from the Divisional Forest Officer;

"(b) If the application of the zamindar is forwarded by the Mukhtyarkar to the supervising Tapadar or Tapadar and subsequently by the Divisional Forest Officer to the Range Forest Officer;

"(c) If it is true that if the Range Forest Officer states that the quantity of the fuel is not large the zamindar is asked to go to the Tapadar and take a pass from him every time that he sends out fuel for disposal;

"(d) If it is true that this procedure results in corruption and great inconvenience to zamindars who have to run after the Tapadars out in the district?"

The reply given by Government is as follows:—

"(a) to (e) The honourable member's attention is invited to the rules, and particularly rule 4 under section 41 of the Indian Forest Act for the Province of Sind, printed in section 297 of the Standing Orders of the Forest Department. Government have not received any complaints about delay caused by the procedure."

This gives you an idea, sir, as to how much difficulty and how much inconvenience a zamindar has to go through in order to get a pass to remove the wood which is his own property. Therefore I think, sir, that the Honourable Mr. GARUD is right in bringing the question before the Council, and though I am not proposing any amendment, I think if my honourable friend adopts a suggestion which I am going to make, it can simplify matters.

I suggest this as an amendment, namely, that the resolution may run like this:—

"This Council recommends to His Excellency the Governor in Council to consider the question of passes at present required for the removal of wood which is not Government property from private lands."

If my honourable friend Mr. GARUD adopts my amendment it will be all right.

The Honourable Mr. GARUD:—Your Excellency,—May I suggest that I am agreeable to the postponement of my resolution to any subsequent meeting till this question is considered by the proper authorities.

His Excellency the PRESIDENT:—I think it would be better if we go on with the resolution as I am sure the Council would like to know Government's position in the matter.

The Honourable Mr. BHURGRI:—Then, my Lord, I move it as an amendment to the resolution of my honourable friend, Mr. GARUD.

The Honourable Mr. SHRIDHAR BALKRISHNA UPASANI:—Your Excellency,—The Honourable Mr. GARUD has placed the facts and arguments in support of his resolution so clearly before the Council that I need not take much time of the Council to further support it.

On this point the Honourable Mr. SEDDON has asked for time to enable Government to consider this question and if time is necessary the Honourable Mr. GARUD will, I think, have no objection to allow the resolution to be postponed.

In this matter a question was asked by me some time ago in connection with the right of private owners to remove wood from their own lands. There were complaints from Karhad that came to me and I drew the attention of Government and Government were pleased to state that no permission was necessary to cut wood in one's own private forest. I thought the matter was being properly dealt with, but then further complaints were heard from the Kolaba district that removal of wood from private land without permit was objected to even when such wood was private property and was to be carried to a short distance from such land and that it was detained by the forest guards for want of a permit. In fact the parties concerned had no option but to obtain the passes from the talati before they could take the wood to their village.

I think, your Excellency, so far as the law is concerned it would be possible to remedy this evil. The intention of the law was the protection of Government forest and the rules made under that Act were meant to refer to Government property to be taken from those forests. With a view to prevent any theft of produce from that forest it would not be proper to compel private owners to obtain passes from Government officers to remove their own property from their own lands.

The fears which my honourable friend Khan Bahadur PIR BAKSH has expressed relating to the pilfering of Government property do exist, and to a larger extent, with reference also to private property, but I do not think that the suggestion made by him would commend itself to this Council if it were enforced as regards private property. Government have enough machinery to protect their forest produce and they have passed stringent rules for its protection and those rules would be sufficient to protect Government property.

I would, therefore, support the resolution which has been just moved and if time is required by Government as desired by the Honourable Mr. SEDDON, I think the Honourable Mr. GARUD will have no objection to the postponement of the resolution. We only want the grievance to be redressed and if that could be done by allowing the resolution to be postponed we shall be well satisfied.

With these words I support the resolution.

The Honourable Mr. G. CARMICHAEL:—Your Excellency,—Perhaps it would be well if I explain the position, as the Honourable Mr. GARUD did not make it quite clear.

Chapter VIII of the Forest Act contains a definition of timber and forest produce. In the first place when the Forest Act of 1878 was passed, Chapter VIII was included in it and it was made quite clear that Chapter VIII referred not to forests or forest land but to forest produce in transit. It regulated the transit of timber and forest produce. The rules to which the Honourable Mr. GARUD referred were drawn up on that basis and published in 1880. Then it came to the notice of Government (in connection I think with a case from the Thana district where there is a good deal of timber in private lands) that it had been decided by the High Court in a case which went up to it, that when timber or forest produce did not come from a forest properly so called, whether private forest or Government forest, the rules were not applicable to it.

My particular point is that the rules under section 41 contain the regulations for the removal of wood in transit or forest produce whether that comes from a Government forest or private forest.

Then the question is whether all forest produce or timber brought from it or cut from privately owned land could not be called forest produce. The Bombay Government represented the matter to the Government of India pointing out the difficulty which had occurred in the working of the rules. It is quite impossible, once a tree has been cut and moved, to say whether it came from a Government forest, or from a private forest or from a malki number. The Honourable Mr. GARUD might suggest to us any way in which he could distinguish it from Government forest produce. Our forest officers found that they were unable to make any distinction. The result was that a man came along with a cartful of wood, and under the rules in force he was asked to show his pass. He said: "I have not got a pass; but the wood has come from my own malki number." The forest officer suspected that it did come from a Government forest and he had to detain the cart until he made enquiries. Then in 1887 I think Government appointed a committee of enquiry into the working of the forest laws, particularly with reference to the Konkan, Thana and Kolaba districts, and they also made fairly extensive enquiries with regard to the honourable mover's own district, Khandesh. The position was that there had been many complaints from the land-owners and cultivators in these districts, and the committee, which consisted of the Collector of Thana as president, Mr. Vidal, and Mr. Krishnarao Nulkar, who was afterwards a member of this Council, and two other Indian members who were forest officers, submitted a report to Government in 1887 in which they dealt with this particular question. Their proposals included a great many recommendations with regard to the exercise of the privileges of the people. They recommended a large number of ways in which concessions might be made in order to facilitate the people's taking advantage of the privilege of using the forests. But they made it a fundamental part of their whole recommendations that the removal and transit of timber should be regulated. They said that the one fundamental thing was that the removal and transit of timber and forest produce, whether coming from a Government forest or a private forest or a malki number, should be regulated by rules under section 41.

They said it was fundamental for two reasons. The first was that it was necessary to control the cutting of tree growth on malki numbers, in the Konkan particularly. That was one reason. The other was that, if you were to extend the privileges and to enable the people to take full advantage of them, it was very necessary to take this step to prevent the abuse of those privileges. It would not be fair to ask Government to extend the privileges and at the same time to take no steps to regulate the removal of forest produce or to prevent abuse. That was a measure designed to benefit the honest cultivator who wished to take advantage of what Government was offering but at the same time did not wish to abuse that concession. But to prevent the others who were inclined to take advantage of, and to abuse, the concession which Government was giving, they (the committee) said it was very necessary to enact that these rules under section 41 of the Forest Act should apply to all kinds of timber and forest produce. Then, on their recommendations, the Government of India were addressed. At that time it happened that the Forest Act was under amendment, and by the Act of 1890 the amendment was carried out. The definition in section 41 was altered. Instead of "timber and other forest produce" it was put down as "timber and forest produce"; and the definition of "forest produce" was altered as follows:—

> "'Forest produce' includes—
> the following, whether found in, or brought from, a forest or not, that is to say:—
> Timber, charcoal, caoutchouc, catechu, wood-oil, resin, natural varnish, bark, lac, mahua flowers and myrabolams."

That is, it was confined to articles for which a large market could be found. Other materials or articles, such as trees and leaves, flowers and fruits, and all other parts or produce such as wax and grass creepers, etc., were also defined as forest produce, only when found in, or brought from, a forest. This was done deliberately for the two reasons which I told you and on which the Bombay Forest Committee of 1887 based their recommendations.

FOREST PASSES.

[5TH DECEMBER 1917.] [Mr. G. Carmichael; Mr. Siddhanath Dhonddev Garud.]

The Honourable Mr. GARUD says that it is quite easy for Government to look after their own forests. They should bring the produce into their depôt. He also said that many of the forests were now fenced with wire fencing. But he has forgotten the fact that there are a very large number of people who go into the forests every day in the exercise of the privileges which they enjoy. Now is it right that we should exclude these thousands of people from the forests in order to remove the restriction which is imposed by the rules under section 41 upon the one man, say, who has to go up to the talati and ask for a pass in order to move some timber which he has cut in his private land and which he wishes to take to the market some distance away? I say that is a position which Government could not contemplate at all. These people who have been exercising their privileges fairly and honestly must be allowed to come into the forests.

Then the rules protect land-owners like the Honourable Mr. GARUD himself who has private forests, and I do not think that he can say that he has had any difficulty in obtaining a pass or a book of passes for his tenants. When a land-owner wishes to remove a quantity of timber growing in his own malki land, he can apply to the Conservator of Forests and gets permission to issue his own passes. The rules are not in force in all districts, but only where there are Government and private forests. I do not know whether the question has been examined whether it is possible to exclude other parts of the presidency, like Ahmedabad, Broach and Kaira districts, which have been excluded from the operation of the rule. No pass is required, as the Honourable Mr. GARUD said, for the removal of forest produce in headloads (from one village to another) or in Sind by camel-load or cart-load, where too the application of the rule is restricted to areas within ten miles of Government forest. The rules were passed in 1880 but the rules, so far as the point with which this resolution is concerned, with regard to malki numbers and with regard to Government forests, really came into operation in 1890 and that was a good many years ago. So far as I know there have not been any serious complaints to Government on this subject but as the rules came into operation many years ago I am quite willing that the matter should be examined again. I may say that Government are prepared to accept the resolution in the form in which the Honourable Mr. BHURGRI has amended it, which is as follows:—

"This Council recommends to His Excellency the Governor in Council to consider the question of passes at present required for the removal of wood which is not Government property from private lands."

I am sure the Honourable Mr. SEDDON when he is taking up the question will give ample opportunities to the Honourable Mr. GARUD to state what difficulties exist with regard to this question in Khandesh.

The Honourable Mr. SIDDHANATH DHONDDEV GARUD:—Your Excellency,—The only objection made out by the Honourable Mr. CARMICHAEL is that it is possible that wood may be stolen from Government forests. Under the English law a dog is allowed one bite but under the forest law, sir, a man cannot steal even once. The Honourable Khan Bahadur PIR BAKSH said that some cases of thefts of forest produce were found out in Sind and that the thieves were severely punished. He was right when he said that the thieves were "severely punished." The sentences inflicted on thieves of forest produce are always exemplary and deterrent. Then if a thief has two previous convictions for theft against him he becomes liable to be transported for life. So that the game of stealing wood from Government forests is very dangerous and risky indeed.

The Honourable Mr. CARMICHAEL:—Nobody suggested that it is very easy but it is extensively carried on in some districts.

The Honourable Mr. GARUD:—Well, sir, I can only say my own experience to the Council that whenever a theft of forest produce is detected and the thief is put before the court the punishment is always exemplary and that it is much more severe than in ordinary cases of theft. I own to being an owner of a forest in my jaghir village. I have every sympathy with the stringent rules that Government might impose to regulate the transit of wood from their own forests, and I have every sympathy for any rule introduced to protect the rights of Government in their own forests. That is Government property and Government may take as good care of it as they can, but when it comes to the question of private wood the situation is somewhat altered. The Honourable Mr. CARMICHAEL said that I am also one of those who are entitled to issue passes for the transfer of wood from one forest to another but I have a different kind of pass. There are four kinds of passes: the green one for timber brought from foreign country, the white one for timber exported from jaghir land, the yellow one for timber exported from Malki numbers, and the red one for timber exported from Government land. So that if I have to export from my own Malki number a few cart-loads of wood the pass is different.

The Honourable Mr. CARMICHAEL:—Does the colour of the pass make any difference?

The Honourable Mr. GARUD:—Yes, sir. The forest rule says that the passes shall be given in four colours: the green one for foreign produce, the white one for timber from jaghir land, the yellow one for timber from Malki numbers, and the red one for Government produce. Now as I have said if I have to send or transfer a few cart-loads of wood from my own Malki land together with wood from my own land the pass for Malki wood would be issued not by me but by the village talati. This, however, is merely a private matter and I do not wish to put it before the Council except to illustrate my argument and to exemplify what actually happens.

I have my own experience of going to the village talati for passes. He does not live in the village, he lives far away and I have always to send my man after him. Usually in practice the pass is given not after proper examination of the wood, or of the place from which the wood is taken but on trust and my resolution asks for this same leniency which is sometimes extended to us by the talati to be extended to us by Government. Why may not the passes of owners be accepted? Let the depôt officers store those passes and when they go to the inspection of the village let them satisfy themselves that the owners have given proper passes. In case an owner gives a false pass and tries to pass off Government property as his own property, well, he might be tried and convicted. The safeguards which Government have already provided for the protection of their own property in village forests are in practice quite ample and they might even be made more stringent but private persons should be allowed to exercise their own rights of ownership without petty harassments.

May I just request your Excellency, again that I am agreeable to postponing this resolution if officers of Government want time to consider it. That would have substantially the same effect as the amendment moved by my honourable friend Mr. BHURGRI.

His Excellency the PRESIDENT:—I think the position is that the honourable member has moved a resolution and the Honourable Mr. BHURGRI has moved an amendment. Well, the Council will decide and the honourable member's resolution will stand or fall on their decision.

The Honourable Mr. BHURGRI:—I think my honourable friend Mr. GARUD has accepted my amendment, sir.

The Honourable Mr. GARUD:—Your Excellency, will not my resolution be put to the vote also?

FOREST PASSES; SANITARY COMMITTEES AND NOTIFIED AREAS.

[15TH DECEMBER 1917.] [The President; Rao Bahadur Venkatesh Shrinivas Naik.]

His Excellency the PRÉSIDENT:—The position is somewhat difficult. I think if an amendment to a resolution is passed the resolution must pass as amended.

The resolution as amended was then put to the vote and carried.

His Excellency the PRESIDENT:—Resolution No. 9. Honourable Rao Bahadur NAIK.

"That this Council respectfully recommends that early steps be taken to amend by legislation section 187 of the District Municipal Act (Act No. III of 1901) so as to enable the Governor in Council to issue a notification under that section with respect to any area in which a Sanitary Committee or a Board, constituted under section 8 or 19 of the Village Sanitation Act, 1889 (Act No. I of 1889), has worked satisfactorily for at least three years even though such area is at a distance of more than one mile from a railway station."

The Honourable Rao Bahadur VENKATESH SHRINIVAS NAIK:—May it please your Excellency,—The request contained in the resolution, that stands in my name on the agenda, is a very modest one, and does not require strong arguments from me, to convince your Excellency and this Council, about the beneficial results that will accrue to the small villages and towns, if the course suggested by me is accepted. I ask, by this resolution, our Government to take early steps to amend section 187 of the Bombay District Municipal Act, so as to enable your Excellency in Council to declare by notification any area in which a sanitary committee or a board constituted under section 8 or 19 of the Bombay Village Sanitation Act has worked satisfactorily, for at least three years, even though such area is situated at a distance of more than one mile from a railway station. The chief object, with which provision is made in the Bombay Village Sanitation Act and District Municipal Act, for the constitution of these village sanitary committees or boards and notified areas, is for the purpose of improving sanitation and providing other amenities in the villages and small towns, which have not sufficiently advanced, and are not ripe for regular municipal administration. The sanitary committees and boards constituted under the Bombay Village Sanitation Act, are authorised to spend the funds at their disposal for procuring and preserving adequate and pure supply of potable water, cleaning and sweeping the streets and making new ones wherever necessary, and for such sanitary objects, which would conduce towards the preservation of public health and conveniences of the villagers. They have also been given powers, to take such actions as would prevent the accumulation of offensive and noxious matters, prevent the commission of nuisances, and indecent or insanitary acts or omissions, in the villages where such committee or boards are constituted. The notified area committees also have all these powers, in addition to such of the powers under the District Municipal Act, as will be extended to them by the Government.

As to the funds required for the working of the sanitary committees and boards, they are not authorised to levy any rate or cess upon the villagers under the Bombay Village Sanitation Act or rules framed thereunder, but to raise the funds only by voluntary contributions. These funds when raised are usually supplemented by grants from local boards and Government, in the proportion of 5, 4 and 3, that is if the committee will be able to raise 5 by voluntary contribution from villagers, the local board will pay 4 and Government 3. These grants depend entirely upon the popular contribution the committees or boards will be able to collect, and vary every year according to this popular contribution, and there are no chances or possibility for these committees to get proportionate grants from local boards or Government, unless they collect popular contribution. The income of these committees and boards is therefore uncertain and they cannot undertake any systematic and large sanitary works. As these committees have no other deliberative work, their life also is uncertain and depends entirely upon the goodwill and generous spirit of the villagers, in making their contributions voluntarily. They are therefore not sure as to what amount they will be able to collect during the year, and whether they will be able to collect at all any contributions during the next year, and being uncertain of their income they cannot undertake any large sanitary works for the benefit of the village. All they will have to do is to adjust their programme of work, after they have collected the popular contribution from the villagers, and have applied for proportionate local fund, and Government grants, confining themselves to the mere sweeping of streets, repairing and lighting them here and there, and doing such small works of temporary nature. Unless these committees have a minimum fixed income to rely upon it is not possible to undertake any large sanitary works of permanent benefit.

In these villages and small towns it is well known that factions have been the rule instead of exception, and the villagers generally divide themselves into factions, on account of private motives or feud between two parties or individuals. If any influential inhabitant of a village, belonging to a party with a large following at his back, takes into his head to bring a committee or a board to a sudden end, however good work it may be doing or however long it might have existed, only with the object of thwarting a member of the opposite party working on the board or committee, he can very easily do so by asking the villagers belonging to his party to refrain from making their voluntary contribution, and thus bring the committee or board to a wreck. Those honourable members of this Council, who are acquainted with the ways and methods of the villagers and residents of small towns, will bear me out in this respect. From the reply given to one of my interpellations, at the last meeting of this Council, it is found that out of five sanitary committees, which had worked in most cases for more than ten years, that dissolved, four were due to the failure of the villagers paying their voluntarily contribution, and I am sure in all these cases the failure of villagers must have been due to factious spirit, and not to their inability to pay. I know personally of such difficulties having occurred in a few sanitary committees in my district, where they have been much imperilled by their inability to collect their resources, and though these committees are doing excellent work, I do not know when they will come to an end. The Bombay Village Sanitation Act, though it is in existence for the last 28 years, has not made any substantial progress in the sanitary improvement of the villages, only on account of its basis being on voluntary principles, and consequent uncertainty as to how long a committee or a board constituted under it, would continue to work.

The notified area committees, on the other hand, when they are once formed, are given statutory powers to levy a rate or tax upon the villagers, and thus raise a fixed and a sure income year after year. These notified area committees which have the power of taxation, have been reported to be working satisfactorily, and some of them are raising a tax upto Rs. 16,000 a year, and spending that amount upon sanitary improvements, and upon the local amenities for the villagers in their respective areas. The chief reason that has induced me to bring this resolution before this Council, is that when the villagers or residents of small towns have learnt the act of taxing themselves, and have realised the benefits of local improvements, by the working of sanitary committees or boards in their villages, for a number of years, instead of allowing them to be dissolved on account of the existence of factious spirit or other reason in the village, they should be given taxing power. The only courses that strikes to me to give effect to this my proposal, are three: firstly, to amend the Bombay Village Sanitation Act, so as to empower the village sanitary committees or boards to levy a rate or cess upon the villagers; secondly, to have village punchayats with the power of local taxation, and thirdly, to amend section 187 of the District Municipal Act, so as to remove the bar to declare any area into a notified area, viz., of the situation of the village being within one mile from the railway station. Now as to the amendment of the Village Sanitation Act, it is entirely upon a voluntary basis and as we want to afford opportunities to the villagers to understand and realise in the first place that it is their duty to contribute for local sanitary improvements, and give them also preliminary training in the matter of local administration, I think we should not disturb the Bombay Village Sanitation Act, for this purpose only, though the Act requires remodelling, being old and rusty. The introduction of village punchayats with local taxation and administrative powers in this Presidency, has long been overdue, and we have been anxiously waiting for them. As there seem to be no hopes of their being created within reasonable time, and as we do not know in what form, and with what powers these long hoped for punchayats will emerge, we cannot any more tire our patience unless an assurance is given to the effect that such punchayats will come to be realised very soon. I therefore think that we should take such steps as will enable your Excellency in Council to convert certain areas into notified areas where the people have understood and realised the principles of self-taxation and local sanitary improvements. Now under section 187 of the District Municipal Act, it is not within the powers of your Excellency in Council to declare any area into a notified area, unless such area forms the taluka head-quarter, or is situated within one mile from the railway station. I submit humbly that in the interests of the good and continuous working of sanitary improvements in the villages, this restriction of an area being within one mile of a railway station, for being converted into a notified area, should be removed from the section. By referring to the Legislative Council proceedings in 1901, it is found that the object of providing this restriction, for an area being converted into a notified area, viz., of either its being the taluka head-quarter or within one mile from a railway station, is only to guard against small rural villages, being treated as quasi-municipal districts and to prevent the unregulated conglomeration of mean buildings that might spring into existence in the vicinity of a railway station, on or near the railway lines. Most of the places in which these sanitary committees or boards have been working, are pretty big villages, some of them even bigger than taluka head-quarters, and after the training of and satisfactory working of these committees or boards for at least three years, there seem to me to be no valid reasons to apprehend any misuse of power or hardship upon the villagers. Before declaring any place a notified area, Government can take all precautions, and be satisfied as to whether there are sufficient number of public spirited people in the area, that the people have understood the principles of self-taxation, and realised the benefits of local sanitary improvements, and that it is in every way fit to be declared as a notified area. For these reasons, your Excellency, I move that this Council respectfully recommends that early steps be taken to amend by legislation section 187 of the District Municipal Act (Act No. III of 1901) so as to enable the Governor in Council to issue a notification under that section, with respect to any area in which a sanitary committee or a board constituted under section 8 or 19 of the Village Sanitation Act, 1889 (Act No. I of 1889), has worked satisfactorily, for at least three years, even though such area is at a distance of more than one mile from a railway station and commend the resolution for the acceptance of this Council.

The Honourable Mr. F. G. PRATT :—Your Excellency,—I am not quite sure if the honourable mover of this resolution is correct in his statement of the law as to the manner in which sanitary committees can raise their revenues and spend them. I understood him to say that the only revenue which they can raise and administer is revenue raised by voluntary subscription in the village. But I think if he would refer to section 18, sub-section (2) of the Village Sanitation Act he will find that when voluntary contributions or subscriptions fail for raising the necessary revenues, then resort can be had to a rate on the inhabitants and householders of the village subject to the proviso that the maximum amount that can be levied in such a manner does not exceed one-half of the local fund cess on agricultural lands levied within the limits of that village. That is a slight correction which I think the honourable member will allow me to make.

The Honourable Mr. NAIK :—When the villagers promise to pay and they fail to pay and thus if the subscription is not collected, the Collector can levy the rate, not beforehand. If they once promise one year they may contribute that year and the next year they may not.

SANITARY COMMITTEES AND NOTIFIED AREAS.

[Mr. F. G. Pratt; Dewan Bahádur Kashinath Ramchandra Godbole.] [5TH DECEMBER 1917.]

The Honourable Mr. PRATT :—Well, that is quite true. If I understand the law right, once a rate has been raised by voluntary contribution the rate is continued year by year and the sanitary committee would take that rate as part of their budget. But the law which provided the maximum leviable for that rate is 28 years old and I am in sympathy with the intention of the honourable mover which I gather is to make such legislative provision as would allow of a larger sum being raised locally for the necessary purposes of the Act.

I have often found in looking into the budgets and finances of sanitary committees what a very minute amount this maximum leviable rate will produce and how very inadequate that amount would be even when added to the local fund contribution, and the provincial contribution, and how inadequate that total amount is when compared with the needs and the necessities of the village.

It must be remembered I suppose that the explanation is that the section of that law is now 28 years old and a great deal of caution was then exercised in so framing the section as not get too far ahead of the well-known reluctance of local bodies especially marked in the case of small local bodies, to tax themselves for local purposes. So when that section was made 28 years ago they fixed the maximum amount at a very low and modest figure and it may well be if the matter were to be considered and revised now that that ratio might be raised and larger sums might be made available for the necessary expenditure.

The honourable mover's proposal that satisfactory sanitary committees, which he wants to be put in a stable financial position, should under certain conditions be elevated to the status of notified areas, would have this effect that the notified areas would not be tied by the same financial limitations and they would be able to raise large sums. To that extent I am certainly in sympathy with the honourable mover's proposal and the resolution but there are other considerations which I would ask him and the Council to remember and the chief among them is this that at present the whole question of local self-government, and so to speak, the ladder of local self-government, is under careful consideration as to what the various rungs of that ladder should be, what should be the intermediate rungs leading up to the top, and while that question is under consideration it seems to me to be undesirable that we should make such a small change as the honourable member proposes in the intermediate rungs. The Council knows very well that we are now considering the question of punchayats, which will stand at the bottom of the local self-government ladder and we have also to consider the question of notified area committees. While these things are under consideration I think it will be undesirable to commit ourselves to the resolution as proposed.

I may again repeat that I am personally in sympathy with the desire that these bodies should have, that the enlightened members of these bodies should have, it in their power to increase their usefulness and their financial stability and resources in order to meet the needs of the village localities.

The Honourable Dewan Bahadur KASHINATH RAMCHANDRA GODBOLE :—Your Excellency,—I want to make a few remarks with reference to the resolution that has been brought forward by my honourable friend Rao Bahadur NAIK. I am in sympathy with his resolution because I think that the present sanitary committees and sanitary boards in the Presidency are working very unsatisfactorily, mainly because they have no powers of taxation.

There is another reason also why this section 187 of the Bombay District Municipal Act should be modified, and that is the recommendation made by the pilgrim committee during their visit to this Presidency. I had the honour to be on that committee. We found in that committee that there was a small municipality established temporarily at Gokarn in this Presidency only for three months. The municipality existed while the pilgrim traffic lasted, and for a month before and a month afterwards. The temporary municipality did work for three months, and whatever improvements they made in these three months, we found, were nullified during the succeeding nine months on account of want of continuity in administration. The place could not have a sanitary committee, because the people were unwilling to tax themselves or to pay any contributions. It could not get any notified area, as this section 187 came in the way, the town not being within one mile of the railway nor a taluka town. It could not therefore be declared a notified area. It could not be a regular municipality, as the town population was very small.

The Honourable Mr. CURTIS:—Assuming the restriction as regards the place being one mile from a railway is removed, how will the substitution of notified area machinery for the regular machinery improve the sanitary condition of the place?

The Honourable Dewan Bahadur GODBOLE:—I will explain the situation. These temporary municipalities improve the roads leading to particular places where pilgrims have to bathe, by clearing gutters and waterways of culverts and bridges. During the succeeding nine months, there is no one on the spot to remove the debris which accumulates from time to time, in these gutters and waterways. The consequence is, that expenditure has to be incurred to a very large extent in doing the clearance work which could have been done by a regular establishment on the spots at one-fourth of the cost. If a notified area had existed, in place of the temporary municipality, it would have been able to keep this regular establishment to maintain in repairs, works which were carried out during the pilgrimage season. On account of the want of this regular establishment on the spot, the work done in the pilgrimage period goes to ruin.

The Honourable Mr. CURTIS:—How would a notified area committee be more able to maintain a competent and permanent establishment at Gokarn than the committee of the municipality?

The Honourable Dewán Bahádur GODBOLE:—Because of the pilgrim taxation. They could reserve a small amount from the pilgrim tax realised, and keep the funds required for the regular permanent establishment during the 12 months of the year. This is the recommendation which the pilgrim committee have made. I will read it for the information of the Council:—

> "We think some permanent form of administration is required. The municipality lasts for three months only and though a karkun and four menials are maintained for the whole year there is no responsible person to carry out a policy of sanitary improvement of the town. The town is mainly agricultural and the residents object to having a permanent municipality with its obligations of taxes, and maintenance of schools. Their attitude is reasonable, as apart from the pilgrims a permanent municipality is not required. To make Gokarn a 'notified area' would give the required continuity of administration without imposing full municipal obligations. But Gokarn not being a taluka headquarters or near a railway station cannot at present be legally made a notified area. We recommend that section 187, District Municipal Act, be altered to allow areas containing a place of pilgrimage to be made notified areas and that Gokarn be created one. Continuous improvement of lodging-houses, water supply and sanitary arrangements will then be best secured."

This is a recommendation that was made by the pilgrim committee, and I think this Council should bear that recommendation in mind in the consideration of the resolution that has been brought forward by the Honourable Rao Bahadur NAIK.

The Honourable Mr. CURTIS:—What is the average attendance of pilgrims at Gokarn?

The Honourable Dewan Bahadur GODBOLE:—It is about 10,000. To me the best solution seems to be, that we should have village panchayats as early as possible, and if we are going to get these panchayats, then this resolution need not be considered at present. But if the village panchayats are going to come after 10 years, or after a similar long interval then I think the resolution deserves the immediate consideration of this Council. I would, however, admit smaller towns in the mofussil, as well as places of pilgrimage, to the benefits of notified areas and would modify and amend Rao Bahadur NAIK'S resolution in the following way :—

"This Council respectfully recommends that early steps be taken to amend by legislation section 187 of the District Municipal Act (Act No. III of 1901), so as to enable the Governor in Council to issue a notification under that section with respect to any town or village which contains a population of over 2,500 or contains a place of pilgrimage."

The Honourable Rao Bahadur NAIK :—I accept the amendment.

The Honourable Mr. VITHALBHAI JHAVERBHAI PATEL :—Your Excellency,—My honourable friend Mr. PRATT just now remarked that the whole question of local self-government was under the consideration of Government and it would be much better if such questions were postponed till some future date. Well, I put this question to him and to this Council. Are these notified area committees or municipalities to be entirely done away with under the new legislation? If notified area committees and municipalities are to be retained, as I believe they will be, what is the resolution of my honourable friend Rao Bahadur Naik? He wants certain sanitary boards to be transformed into notified area committees. That is all that he wants, and his object in turning the sanitary boards into notified area committees is to give the people powers of self taxation in order that they may raise funds in order to carry out sanitary and other improvements in that area. I am very glad to know that he thinks that people in rural areas could still stand some amount of further taxation, and I am perfectly prepared to support the resolution as amended; but I maintain, your Excellency, that before we give people powers of further taxation, I say that there should be no taxation without representation. Notified area committees, of which I know something, as at present constituted, are almost entirely nominated bodies, except in a few instances in Salsette and even there the nominated members are in a majority and not only nominated members are in a majority but except in one solitary instance there is an official majority on these Committees. Are we going to have notified areas formed on these lines and to give power to such notified area committees? So far as I understand, these notified area committees are a one-man show. In Salsette most of the powers of the committees are delegated to the Chairman of the committee who is always an official. Under the circumstances I won't have any notified areas unless substantial changes are proposed to be made in the constitution of these committees. I therefore propose an amendment to this resolution as follows :—

Add at the end of first line: "grant elective majority to notified area committees and".

His Excellency the PRESIDENT :—This will be an entirely new resolution, is it not?

The Honourable Mr. PATEL :—I only wish to add two words to the resolution, your Excellency.

His Excellency the PRESIDENT :—There seem to be a great many but I think the proposed amendment of my honourable friend Mr. PATEL refers to an entirely new matter altogether. It refers to the granting of an elective majority. There is no reference to that at all in the resolution of the Honourable Rao Bahadur NAIK.

SANITARY COMMITTEES AND NOTIFIED AREAS.

[5TH DECEMBER 1917.] [The President; Mr. Vithalbhai Jhaverbhai Patel; Mr. Shridhar Balkrishna Upasani; Mr. G. S. Curtis.]

The Honourable Mr. PATEL :—Under the rules, it is only negative amendments that cannot be moved, your Excellency. This amendment does not negative the original resolution.

His Excellency the PRESIDENT :—But if the President rules that this is a new resolution and it should be brought in on another occasion, I am afraid the honourable member cannot move it.

The Honourable Mr. SHRIDHAR BALKRISHNA UPASANI :—Your Excellency,—So far as the resolution of my honourable friend Mr. NAIK refers to the improvement of the financial resources of sanitary committees I sympathise with it but so far as it proposes to extend the scope of the notified areas as at present constituted under the Municipal Act I am not in sympathy with it. My Lord, the notified area committees occupy a very anomalous position and it is a position which requires to be improved in the manner suggested by my honourable friend Mr. PATEL. I have myself sent up a resolution on this point and it is on the agenda for this Council session. As a matter of fact the notified area committee is more or less a one-man show in which the leading strings are in the hands of an official of Government. The primary principle is that there should be no taxation without representation but at present that principle is entirely ignored in the case of these notified areas. Under section 187 of the Municipal Act, Government have absolute power to constitute any town into a notified area irrespective of its population, to charge it with any duties and liabilities which may be imposed on a municipality and to empower it to raise from the town any funds required to meet those liabilities without the people having any representation on the body or any voice in the administration of the funds which it may levy from them. Thus a town with a population of only 1,000 or one with a population of 6,000 or 9,000 may be constituted into a notified area and be charged with the maintenance of schools and dispensaries without the people having any voice in its constitution or any control over its administration which they would have if the body were a sanitary committee or a regularly constituted Municipality.

The Honourable Mr. CURTIS :—I rise to a point of order, your Excellency. The honourable gentleman seems to be introducing the discussion of his resolution which comes later on into this resolution. The honourable member's resolution is No. 50 and his remarks are not to the point of this resolution.

The Honourable Mr. UPASANI :—I do not want to enter into any discussion of that resolution at this stage but I refer to these defects in the constitution of notified areas to support my objection to the extension of these bodies in place of the existing sanitary committees as proposed in the resolution. In the case of the latter committees the people have a voice in their constitution and their power of taxation is limited. It is otherwise in the case of the notified areas in both these respects. As a matter of fact the notified areas should not, in my opinion, be charged with the maintenance of schools and dispensaries. If a town is not constituted a notified area its school expenditure is borne by the local board and the medical expenditure by provincial funds, but when the town is constituted a notified area all this expenditure is thrown on the people of that area without their consent and without their having any control over that expenditure. Well, that should be avoided and steps should be taken to only improve the resources of sanitary boards by grants from provincial funds on account of sanitation. My point is that there should be only sanitary boards and not notified areas in small towns with a population of less than 5,000 and where the population is larger than 5,000 we should have regular municipalities and this anomalous body of the notified area should be done away with entirely rather than be extended to towns where it does not exist. With these words I resume my seat.

SANITARY COMMITTEES AND NOTIFIED AREAS.

The Honourable Rao Bahadur GANESH KRISHNA SATHE:—Your Excellency,—I think in proposing resolutions of this kind we rather go upon a wrong track, and I say this because the discussion of resolutions of this kind becomes complicated owing to various issues being involved in it. If it is the real desire of the Honourable Rao Bahadur NAIK to improve upon section 187 of the District Municipal Act, why does he take the course of simply recommending to the Governor in Council a resolution? Why not take a little more trouble and draft a bill himself and place it before the Council in a clear form embodying as to all what he really wants to have? In that case we would know exactly what the provisions are and what the amendments he is advocating are and this Council will be in a better position to judge of the question, and the second advantage is that instead of leaving it to His Excellency's Government to carry out or not the resolution the remedy lies with us if we take up the course which I suggest. If the question of village panchayats and local self-government is under the consideration of Government, as your Excellency stated before lunch time, it is much better that this resolution should not be pressed on the attention of this Council.

The Honourable Mr. G. S. CURTIS:—May it please your Excellency,—I think perhaps a short statement from me will enable this Council to dispose of the resolution. We have heard from the honourable mover of the resolution an account of life in villages in the Karnatic. I would ask the Council to note that the picture he draws of that life does not show one that the ordinary village is the ideal one which it is often supposed to be. He talks of factions, and of one party fighting with another and of outbreaks of quarrels among them, rendering the administration of any local body somewhat difficult. That is only by the way. But as regards the resolution itself, as the Council has been informed, the question of local self-government is at present under discussion and I am unable at the present moment to commit Government as to what will emerge from the new bill when it is before us, except as regards one point. As regards that I can assure the Council that Government propose to proceed with the formation of panchayats in suitable areas with reasonable despatch as suitable areas come forward and there is reason to presume that these panchayats will have powers of taxation as they have in Madras and that they will receive reasonable subventions from the provincial revenues. I think that assurance should be sufficient to assure this Council that the continuance of any organization on the lines of village sanitary committees or sanitary boards will no longer be necessary. Of course, taxation will be compulsory. There will be regular by-laws framed and I can give an assurance that the panchayats themselves will have powers to punish breaches of their laws and by-laws with a reasonable quota of punishment. So much as regards the first part of the resolution.

The next point is as to what would be the next rung in the ladder between the panchayats and the district local boards on the one side and the municipality on the other, or, in other words, what would be the best system of government for what may be called urban and rural district areas? On that point I am unable at present to commit Government to anything.

I have listened with interest to the Honourable Mr. PATEL'S and the Honourable Mr. UPASANI'S denunciation of the working of notified areas. Personally I have never been enamoured of the notified area. Section 187 was, it seems to me, added in 1903 quite unnecessarily. For the areas for which it is necessary to make a special provision a special notification under section 7, and sections 4 and 8 of the Act is all that is necessary. It is quite possible to provide municipal government for special areas under those sections in any form which may be necessary. If it is considered desirable that a municipality should not bear the whole cost or burden of schools, it is always possible for Government to dispose of the matter by giving liberal grants. That is purely a matter of executive order which could be arranged in a very short time.

SANITARY COMMITTEES AND NOTIFIED AREAS.

[5TH DECEMBER 1917.] [Mr. G. S. Curtis; Rao Bahadur Venkatesh Shrinivas Naik.]

As regards the Honourable Dewan Bahadur GODBOLE's suggestion, I still do not follow why a notified area committee should be more competent to keep a pilgrimage town in decent order than a committee managed by a municipality. I note by the way that the population of Gokarn is something like 8,000. The Honourable Dewan Bahadur himself has told us that in the pilgrim season the number of pilgrim goes up to something like 10,000; and as I see from the annual report that the income of that place is only about Rs. 2,000, including Rs. 595 which is received from the pilgrim tax, it seems to me that the trouble which it suffers from is under-taxation—a trouble from which many other similar areas are suffering. It ought to be possible to recover 2 annas a head as pilgrim tax, so as to secure a proper revenue and to provide proper establishments, etc.

However, all that I can assure this Council at the present moment is that the question of providing satisfactorily a link between the panchayat on the one hand and the full grown municipalities on the other is at present receiving very careful consideration. Whether any link or rung is necessary or whether it would not be possible by means of Government grant or a slight modification of sections 7 and 8 to work even relatively small areas, with a population of 4,000 to 5,000 inhabitants, on the ordinary municipal lines has to be carefully gone into. Probably in any case, whatever the organization which would be formed, it would have a reasonable elective element, unless, of course, the circumstances render that impossible.

I think that is all I have got to say with regard to this resolution. Government are fully aware of the difficulties which at present arise from the inadequate character of the Village Sanitation Act and also from the inconvenient restrictions imposed on the working of the notified area chapter by section 187 and also from the alleged defects on the working of the notified area committees. I can tell this Council that the observations made by the various members shall receive careful consideration when the amendment of the Municipal Act comes to be considered. I therefore ask the Council to reject this resolution and leave the matter to the discretion of Government.

The Honourable Rao Bahadur VENKATESH SHRINIVAS NAIK:—Your Excellency,—I am thankful to the honourable members of this Council who have shown their sympathy with the resolution moved by me. The Honourable Mr. PRATT has raised an objection that there was a section in the Bombay Village Sanitation Act by which the Collector can levy a rate for the notified areas. But this section can only come into operation after the notified area committees have made provision for the expenditure of the amount promised by the villagers, but who later on have refused to pay the same according to their promise, and for the next year's budget they will have to rely entirely upon the promises given by the villagers during the previous year. There is nothing binding in the Act itself on the part of the villagers that the promise given in the previous year will be continued during subsequent years and so practically in the next year the Collector will not be able to levy a rate again. Moreover, the limit to which the Collector can levy such a rate is only half the local cess raised in the village, and this amount will be insufficient for the working of these Committees and in most cases it is negligible.

Now with regard to the panchayats, of course, I said when moving the resolution that there were three remedies for bringing into effect the suggestions asked for by me in the resolution. The first was to amend the Bombay Village Sanitation Act, empowering village sanitary committees to levy a cess; the second was to have village panchayats with powers of taxation, and the third was to amend the Bombay District Municipal Act as asked for by me in the resolution. I was very glad to hear that village panchayats are shortly coming into existence and nobody would be more satisfied than myself, if they will be introduced soon with powers of local taxation for local improvements. I only asked for an assurance whether they would come into being within a short time and I am glad that my honourable friend Mr. CURTIS has been kind enough to say that they are under the serious consideration of Government and that they will come into existence very soon.

Of course, with regard to the Honourable Mr. UPASANI'S observation that if sanitary committees are turned into notified areas, the expenditure on schools and dispensaries and other things will have to be borne by these notified areas, I do not think that when a sanitary committee is turned into a notified area all the powers of the District Municipal Act regarding these institutions will be given to the notified areas and they will be saddled with consequent burden of expenditure. Only such of the powers of that Act which His Excellency the Governor in Council, after inquiry as to whether a particular notified area committee is competent to exercise and is able to bear the burden of expenditure such committee will have to incur in the discharge of these powers, is satisfied, are usually extended to the notified area committees and there is no need to apprehend any fears on that score.

As an assurance has been given by the honourable member in charge of the portfolio of local self-government that village panchayats are shortly coming into existence, I think I should withdraw this resolution and wait till the result of the panchayats is out.

His Excellency the PRESIDENT:—I am much obliged to the honourable member for withdrawing his resolution, but before we go further I should just like to say this. Of course, the honourable member does not wish us to specify a definite time. I keep saying to honourable members that such resolutions as this do raise very great difficulties, because, as honourable members know, we are getting out this bill which does include the question of panchayats, notified areas, municipalities and district local boards, and to ask us to pass a resolution on this matter is, of course, as honourable members must understand, quite impossible. I can quite understand honourable members endeavouring to discover what is in Government's mind by bringing in resolutions of this kind, but I hope that they will not endeavour to do so too often and embarass Government in regard to these matters.

The resolution was by leave withdrawn.

His Excellency the PRESIDENT:—Resolution No. 10. The Honourable Dewan Bahadur GODBOLE.

The Honourable Dewan Bahadur KASHINATH RAMCHANDRA GODBOLE:—Your Excellency,—I am likely to take half an hour in speaking on this resolution.

His Excellency the PRESIDENT:—We can go on for an hour and a half more.

The Honourable Dewan Bahadur GODBOLE:—The resolution of which I have given notice reads as follows:—

"This Council recommends that His Excellency the Governor in Council will be pleased to investigate and subsidise, if necessary, the establishment of factories for the production of manures and fertilisers in this Presidency."

This Council is aware that agriculture is the premier industry of India and that four-fifths of the population of this country derive their subsistence from agriculture. The successful prosecution of the profession of agriculture is meeting with numerous difficulties at present of which the main difficulty is rise in the price of labour. In 1912 the rates of labour varied between $2\frac{1}{2}$ and 4 annas per day, and now they range between 5 and 10 annas per day. Then, as to efficiency of labour, in 1912, an ordinary labourer was willing to work for 8 and 9 hours a day, and now he gives work to the extent of 6 hours only. Taking these circumstances into consideration, the prices of labour may be said to have gone up to the extent of from 100 to 150 per cent. The rise in the prices of agricultural produce has not been commensurate with the rise in the price of labour. I find that the price of jwari in 1912 was 12 seers per rupee, and now it is 9 seers per rupee. This is a rise of 33 per cent. against 150 per cent. rise in price of labour. The natural consequence of these disproportionate enhancements in prices is, that the profits of cultivation are dwindling down seriously and I am afraid that in the early future, these profits of cultivation will come to the zero point. I should not be surprised under these circumstances, if after a few years the dry crop lands in the Deccan go out of cultivation, on account of serious labour difficulties. Actually we find that in the Deccan villages, some of the dry crop land has remained uncultivated on account of labour difficulties, and has been turned into pasture and babul preserve land.

To save the situation, we must have recourse to intensive methods of cultivation as they are practised in advanced countries. According to these intensive methods, the outturn per acre from the soil increases very greatly. We find that in India the outturn of wheat per acre is about 674 lbs., while in European countries, before the war, the outturn figures that I have got are, in England 1,938 lbs. per acre, in Belgium 2,094 lbs. per acre, in Denmark 2,916 lbs. per acre, and in the Netherlands 2,298 lbs. per acre, against 674 lbs. per acre only in India. The Denmark yield before the war was more than four times the yield in India, and in the Netherlands the yield was more than three times the yield in India. These figures will show that if we adopt the European intensive methods of cultivation, we will be able to produce very much greater crops than we do at present.

Now, what are the requisites of these intensive methods of cultivation? They are principally water and manure. The water difficulty is being met by the construction of wells and canals wherever that is practicable, and it is the manure difficulty with which I propose to deal in the present resolution. The supplies of ordinary indigenous manures in this country are getting dearer year by year. The indigenous manures principally in use are oil cake, fish, bone meal and farm yard manure.

As regards farm yard manure, the Council is aware that the numbers of cattle are dwindling fast in this Presidency and therefore the extent to which this farm yard manure is available is also decreasing. There is another reason why farm yard manure cannot be had to a considerable extent and that is the use of this manure for fuel proposes which is increasing very fast year by year. The scarcity of farm yard manure is being felt to such a great extent, that it is selling at present at from 4 to 6 annas per bag. Oil cake manure during the last ten years has increased 50 per cent. in value. As regards bone meal, the prices realised by the export of bones are so high, that it does not pay the cultivator to purchase bone meal for use as manure in agriculture. The consequence of this shortage of indigenous manures has been, that the importation of chemical concentrated manures has commenced in this country. We find accordingly that before the war, in the year 1912-13 there were 8,324 tons of chemical manures imported into India. I might tell the Council that in the bulletin of the agricultural department No. 76 of 1915 Dr. Mann, by means of experiments that he has carried out, has proved that the use of the chemical manures is profitable in the growth of certain crops in this Presidency.

Now the question is whether these chemical manures can be manufactured in this country, instead of being imported from abroad. If we can manufacture them here, we can deliver them to the cultivator at a much lower price than he is paying for the imported stuffs. The principal chemical manures that are used in agricultural operations are sulphates, nitrates, chlorides and superphosphates. We find that potash manures cannot be manufactured on this side of India, because we have no potash deposits in this Presidency. As regards ammonia, we have no coal deposits and therefore ammonia is not available to us in this

FACTORIES FOR MANURES AND FERTILISERS.

[Dewan Bahadur Kashinath Ramchandra Godbole.] [5TH DECEMBER 1917.]

Presidency as a by-product during the conversion of coal into coke and coal gas. But I find that it is quite within the range of feasibility to manufacture nitrate manures on the lines on which they have been manufactured in Europe and in America. The supply of nitrogen in the atmosphere is almost inexhaustible. We have 20 million tons of nitrogen per square mile of the earth's surface and if by any process we could fix this nitrogen and convert it into nitrogen fertilisers in this country, we would have gained a great deal. In Europe and America this nitrogen has been taken from the atmosphere and fixed, and nitrates have been manufactured for manurial purposes in factories actually working before the war. I will specify some of the methods of manufacture which have been successfully adopted in European countries and Amarica for the production of nitrates. The first is called the electric arc porcess. In this, a stream of air is brought into contact with an electric arc and the nitrogen and oxygen of the air are made to combine together to form nitric oxide which is afterwards converted into nitric acid and nitrate fertilisers. Similarly by what is called the Haber process, the nitrogen of the atmosphere and the hydrogen in water are combined together to form ammonia and ammonia is turned subsequently into ammonia sulphate and other ammonia fertilisers. The third process which I think is worthy of consideration for adoption in this country is the manufacture of calcium cyanamide. Carbon and lime are fused together to form what is called carbide of calcium. Nitrogen is passed through this carbide mixture in electric furnaces with heat ranging at 1,000 degrees centigrade and this process yields a substance called calcium cyanamide which is a very valuable fertiliser. Sixteen factories for the manufacture of this calciu n cyanamide fertiliser were at work in Europe before the war. They were at work in Norway, Sweden, Germany, Austria, Italy, France, Switzerland, Japan and America.

The main requirement for the establishment of these calcium cyanamide factories is electric energy generated by cheap hydraulic power. I think, sir, that in the Bombay Presidency, serious efforts should be made to establish factories for the manufacture of calcium cyanamide and nitrate fertilisers on the lines that have proved successful in Europe and America. As I said, for the successful establishment of these factories cheap electrical energy generated by hydraulic power is required. In our Presidency, in the Konkan and Ghat districts fortunately, we have many sites where hydraulic power to the extent of over 100,000 horse power can be generated. With this hydraulic power we will have the electric energy, and if we select a suitable site on one of the navigable estuaries of Kanara or Konkan rivers, we will have ideal conditions for the establishment of nitrate and cyanamide factories. We will have cheap electrical energy and economical water carriage and we can easily get together raw materials such as charcoal and lime.

I grant that the problem is a very difficult one and that it requires technical skill and technical experience of a very high order. But looking to the results that can be achieved, I think it is quite worth the while of Your Excellency's Government to make all initial enquiries as regards the establishment of factories in this Presidency, for the fixing of nitrogen and for the manufacture of calcium cyanamide and other nitrate fertilisers. As I have already stated to the Council these factories have been successfully started in European countries and we ought to have them here.

There are other sources of increasing our manure stocks which are not so heroic as the one that I have described. They are three. The first is what is called fish guano. I might tell this Council that I have been in correspondence with Sir Frederick Nicholson, a retired Madras civilian, who is interesting himself in the question of fisheries in Madras. I have had correspondence with this gentleman and he tells me that guano factories have been established in the South Kanara and Malabar districts of the Madras Presidency. There are

FACTORIES FOR MANURES AND FERTILISERS.

[5TH DECEMBER 1917.] [Dewan Bahadur Kashinath Ramchandra Godbole; Mr. G. Carmichael.]

250 of these factories established already. These factories yield fish oil and guano. Fish are cut, boiled, and pressed. This process yields oil. What remains after extraction of the oil is dried and converted into guano, which is a very valuable manure.

The Honourable Mr. CARMICHAEL:—May I ask the honourable member what the outturn is per annum?

The Honourable Dewan Bahadur GODBOLE:—Unfortunately I do not know what it is. I have not got the figures. Sir Frederick Nicholson tells me that these factories were started seven or eight years ago and when their number has increased to 250 in this short period, the conclusion naturally is that they must be paying. Otherwise they would not have increased so rapidly. There are two products given by these factories, one is fish oil and the other is guano. It is stated that the price realised by one of these products (the oil or the guano) is sufficient to pay the cost of manufacture, and the price realised by the other product remains as profit to the proprietor.

Now I submit, sir, that we have a long sea-board in this Presidency extending from Karachi to Bhatkal, and distributed over the district of Karachi, the Cutch State, a number of Kathiawar States and the districts of Broach, Surat, Kolaba, Ratnagiri and Kanara. It seems to me that we may get along this coast line a number of suitable sites for the establishment of fish oil and guano factories. The Bombay Government should make an earnest endeavour to start these factories on the lines adopted by the Government of Madras after making all preliminary inquiries. If they succeed in starting the factories, they will increase the supply of manure to a considerable extent in this Presidency. As the factories will be on sea-coast, the guano manure produced can be transported wherever required in this Presidency at a moderate cost.

Then another possible source of increasing manure supply in this Presidency is, I am told, the likely deposits of potash in the Runn of Cutch which could be utilised for the production of potash manures. This source of obtaining potash from the Runn of Cutch requires investigation at the hands of Government.

There is yet another source of obtaining potash in this Presidency, and that is from the burning of sea-weeds of which there are large quantities on our sea coast line. This source also wants investigation.

I will now briefly state what I want Government to do. I want them first to investigate whether fish oil and guano factories cannot be established on the Bombay sea coast line on the same lines as have been successfully followed in Madras. Secondly, I want Government to make enquires whether the Runn of Cutch will give us potash deposits from which we can manufacture potash fertilizers. Thirdly, I want Government to find out by the necessary experiments if the sea-weed areas on the coast line of this Presidency are sufficiently large to give us potash for manurial purposes, by burning these sea-weeds on lines which are successfully followed in America, and fourthly, I want Government to give consideration to the heroic measures I have suggested for obtaining calcium cyanamide and nitrate fertilisers by methods that have been successfully followed in Europe and America. We have possibilities in our Presidency of generating cheap hydraulic power and cheap electrical energy, and with this special advantage that we have in this Presidency, it is quite worth while considering whether we cannot have nitrate and cyanamide factories on the same scale as obtains in Europe and America. I want Government to make inquiries regarding all these possible sources of increasing manure supplies in this Presidency, and to publish the results of these inquiries when completed, in the shape of press notes. I must congratulate the Bombay Government on two of the press notes that they have recently issued. The first of these two press notes is on brick and tile factories, and the second on the use of the ground-nut as an article of food. I feel almost sure that the publication of these two press notes will lead to the establishment of factories as industrial concerns. What I wish Government to do is to publish similar press notes when their inquiries as regards manure factories are completed. If the results of the inquiries are promising, the published press notes will probably lead to the etablishment of manure factories which will be a great advantage to the Presidency. With these remarks, sir, I commend my resolution to the Council.

The Honourable Mr. G. F. KEATINGE:—Your Excellency,—In the interests of agriculture in this Presidency I cordially welcome any proposal calculated to increase the supply of fertilisers in this Presidency or to decrease their cost. In moving this resolution the Honourable Dewan Bahadur GODBOLE, however, has supported his contentions by various arguments which, I think, are hardly in accordance with facts. For instance, he expresses the opinion that the profits of cultivation and the numbers of cattle in the Presidency have been dwindling, that the land is falling off in value and that much land is going out of cultivation. Well, the statistics show that the numbers of cattle have of recent years steadily increased and are now standing at a higher figure than they have stood before. Then as regards the profits of cultivation; with the commercial crops there has been a very large increase in the value of the crops.

The Honourable Dewan Bahadur GODBOLE:—What about dry crops?

The Honourable Mr. KEATINGE:—As to the dry crops their values have gone up, inasmuch as the prices of common staple foods like jowari have gone up. In so far as people use hired labour no doubt the cost of production has gone up too, but most of the ordinary cultivation of staple crops such as jowari and bajri is, I think, done by the land owners themselves. However, I do not wish to enlarge on this point.

As regards the land going out of cultivation my experience is quite the contrary. In the Deccan I think there is hardly any piece of land fit for cultivation which is not under cultivation. In fact a great deal of the land which is cultivated is below the economic margin of cultivation, and personally I should be glad to see some of it go out of cultivation. In Gujarat, I know, much of the land which formerly was uncultivated has within the last few years been taken up, and brought under the plough.

As to land values it is a matter of surprise to me to find how extraordinarily high they are almost everywhere. In the cotton tracts of the Dharwar district I found that land was changing hands at Rs. 450 per acre, and that too as a business transaction; and it struck me as being enormous. I was told generally that there the land value has greatly increased.

However, without going into details, I would only be too pleased to see more intensive cultivation introduced if fertilizers may give us more intensive cultivation. I am afraid that the comparative figures of wheat outturns given by the Honourable Dewan Bahadur GODBOLE are rather fallacious ones. I quite admit that in India the outturn of wheat is very much smaller than in European countries, but that really is not entirely due to want of fertilizers, but to the fact that the conditions are quite different. In Europe wheat has a growing season of 8 or 9 months in the year, whereas in India it has only 3 or 4 months in the Deccan and 4 or 5 months in the north. The condition of the climate and the unevenness of the rainfall make wheat production more difficult in India than in many parts of Europe, and however much fertilizers you may apply you never can get an outturn of dry wheat equal to that of some parts of Europe where the conditions are different. However, we certainly could do more with additional fertilizers, not so much I am afraid for the ordinary dry crop, but for the more valuable irrigated crop, and if any means can be found to produce fertilizers at a lower cost the agricultural department will certainly see its way to introduce them.

FACTORIES FOR MANUERS AND FERTILISERS.

[5TH DECEMBER 1917.] [Mr. G. F. Keatinge; Mr. Purshotamdas Thakurdas.]

Within the last few years we have worked up to a consumption of several hundred tons of ammonium sulphate, and there has been a large increase in the use of oil cake as manure. But for the high prices of artificials caused by the war, I have no doubt that we should have at the present moment been asked to supply at least a thousand tons. Ammonium sulphate, however, can only be produced in coal districts or in places where coal is changed into coke and coal gas. We cannot produce it here on a large scale. It is being produced in the steel works of Messrs. Tata in Bengal.

As regards bones, no doubt there are a lot of bones, and they are exported. It is generally assumed that crops would be greatly increased if bones were not exported. But, as a matter of fact, it is difficult with most crops to get any advantage out of the application of bones. Rice is the crop which with us shows most advantage from the application of bone meal. Bone meal increases the produce, but the increase hardly pays the cost of the bone meal, and that I think is the reason why it is exported.

As regards calcium cyanamide and other nitrogenous manures of this kind if they can be produced, we can find a market for them. I believe, however, that in the countries where they are produced cheaply, it is under conditions of cheap electric power. Whether it will be possible to produce them in a country like this I do not know.

As regards fish guano, this is, as I understand it, mainly a by-product. If a big fish curing and canning industry can be established on the coast, I have no doubt we shall be in a position to manufacture fish guano. The matter of fish manure has not entirely escaped the notice of the agricultural department, and for several years we did make enquiries as to where a considerable amount of fish could be secured. We found at one place in the Ratnagiri district there was a good deal of such fish and next year we intended making an experiment; but unfortunately the fish shifted to another locality, and the next year when we were trying to make an experiment there was no surplus of fish there at all.

I hope my honourable friend Dewan Bahadur GODBOLE will not think that I am in any way opposing this resolution. I shall be only too glad if enquiries are made which will lead to an increased supply of fertilisers, and I think with the increase of canal irrigation there will be a very large demand for cheap fertilisers.

The Honourable Mr. PURSHOTAMDAS THAKURDAS:—Your Excellency,—I think this Council will agree with me when I say that the Honourable Dewan Bahadur GODBOLE has given us a very interesting and instructive narration of what his experience was in connection with these matters. When the whole country is passing through a wave of enthusiasm for the industrial development of India, it is very gratifying to find experienced persons standing in the position of my honourable friend Dewan Bahadur GODBOLE turning their attention to agriculture. Looking at the evidence that has been placed before the Industries Commission we find proposals placed there by responsible and representative citizens of Bombay in connection with Government undertaking factories for the sake of demonstration and as pioneer factories too, and it has been seriously recommended to the Commission that Government should undertake this work out of public funds. If this holds good for the industrial development of India, I submit, sir, that it holds much better and is on a stronger footing when my honourable friend recommends Government to pioneer and make investigation and subsidize factories for the welfare of the agricultural population of the Presidency. The difference between the agricultural and the industrial development to my mind is this. As far as industrial development is concerned, it may be contended that there are capitalists who should put their shoulders to the wheel and, as the capitalists would benefit solely from it, there may not be much reason, as it has been contended by Government, to spend the tax-payer's money on experiments. But I submit, sir, that the same objection, whether it is valid or not in matters industrial I am not prepared to say,—for this is not the occasion to say that,—but I say that nothing like that objection stands when it comes to the question of the welfare of the agricultural population. In matters agricultural it has been now recognised that there is a sad want of capitalists, and where the experiments want any capital at all, I submit that the tax-payer's money would not be wasted even though the investigation might not be so fruitful.

The Honourable Mr. KEATINGE has in some minor detail here and there tried to point out or criticise Dewán Bahádur GODBOLE'S figures. I am not prepared to go into the figures given by my honourable friend, as I have not the same intimate knowledge about matters agricultural as the Honourable Mr. KEATINGE has. But I take the whole question in a broad light and I submit, sir, that whatever money, whatever help, Government could give to the matter of a better outturn of agricultural crops would be best spent. Dewán Bahádur GODBOLE has shown to this Council the various directions in which experiments may be made. I dare say in some of these directions a few members of this Council may have some of their own experience; but the proposition as it stands before the Council is one which should appeal to the Council, and I hope they will pass it.

The Honourable Mr. F. G. PRATT:—Your Excellency,—I have only a few remarks to offer with regard to this resolution. My honourable friend Dewán Bahádur GODBOLE himself admitted that some of the measures he recommends are heroic, and it is not for me to say anything against his resolution or against those measures, especially when the honourable the Director of Agriculture has expressed himself to be in general sympathy with the resolution. But there is just this one consideration which I would put before the Council. Before resorting to heroic measures, is it not a good thing to make use of those simple means which lie ready at hand? I refer to a particular manure which I do not think the Honourable Dewán Bahádur GODBOLE has referred to at all in his remarks. That is night soil. Now this matter has been investigated by careful experiments both by the sanitary department and by the agricultural department. I believe that Dr. Mann has analysed the output of carefully manufactured night soil manure and has certified that it has very high manurial properties indeed. I remember reading recently a leaflet by the agricultural department in which it was shown that a test of this manure upon land showed that it would very greatly increase the output and fertility, and so far as my recollection goes, it need not be repeated at least for five years.

The Honourable Dewán Bahádur GODBOLE referred to the practice and experience of other countries, and I think he particularly mentioned the well known name of Sir Frederick Nicholson of Madras. Some years ago I had a very interesting pamphlet of his in which he described the experiments in Japan, and he showed how in that country the Japanese cultivator wasted practically none of the night soil in villages or towns. My special object in getting up and speaking on this subject is to refer to the methods which have been perfectly successful in Nasik and which have been successfully reproduced at Surat in the Northern Division. That has the double advantage of not only producing a first rate manure, but has a further advantage of being the most excellent way of disposing of the refuse matters of our town in such a way as to keep that town in a clean and healthy condition and removing the danger of fly nuisance. That is a very cheap and simple experiment which every municipality in every town in the Presidency could try, especially the municipalities in the particular portion of Sind where rain is negligible. It can be tried with success and profit to agriculture and profit to the municipalities, because the income which they will derive from this source will enable them to carry out more efficiently the conservancy of their towns.

FACTORIES FOR MANURES AND FERTILIZERS.

[5TH DECEMBER 1917.] [Mr. F. G. Pratt; Mr. Balkrishna Sitaram Kamat; Sardar Dulabawa Raisingi; Mr. Chunilal Vijbhukhandas Mehta.]

I apologise to the Council for detaining them on this particular subject in which I am keenly interested. But I thought that it was very well worth bringing to the notice of this Council, and especially of municipalities, because the system is so simple, so admirable and so effective.

The Honourable Mr. BALKRISHNA SITARAM KAMAT:—I have great pleasure in supporting this resolution. May I tell my honourable friend Mr. PRATT that the experiment of night soil being turned into manure has been tried in the town of Poona and the suburban municipality has been for some years turning the night soil into manure for the use of cultivators, but the supply is so limited that I believe along the canal where sugarcane is cultivated very largely the supply gets exhausted in no time, and as a source of manure I do not think night soil could be counted upon as a very large source at all.

I would look to another source of manure, to which the Honourable Dewán Bahádur GODBOLE referred in his remarks, namely, the source of fish. I have had something to do in connection with the supply of fish manure to agriculturists for sugarcane growing, and I have imported for trial purposes fish guanos from South Malabar. In fact, there are merchants in Poona who import this fish guano every year in very large quantities, a id it has been tried along the canal and found successful. But the difficulty, I may tell the Council, is the question of transport at cheap cost from Malabar to the Poona market. If this guano can be imported at a smaller cost than at present or if it could be manufactured along the Bombay coast as suggested by the Honourable Dewán Bahádur GODBOLE, then I think, according to the statistics given by him, we shall have next to our doors as it were, a very good source of fish manure. This is a problem which I think the Bombay Government may well investigate. It is not like the other problems, namely, nitrates, for which hydro-electric power is required, or a problem for which a large scheme is required.

Efficient manure could be manufactured from fish as Sir Frederick Nicholson has done on the South coast, and I think the Bombay Government can well try to establish fisheries for the manufacture, both of fish oil for commercial purposes and fish manure for agriculture in the Presidency.

The Honourable Sardár DULABAWA RAISINGJI, Thakor of Kerwada:—Your Excellency,—I consider it to be the duty of every honourable member to support this resolution. The subject of agriculture, my Lord, is a very important one, and I think we cannot expect satisfactory results by way of improvement, unless the science on the subject is brought to bear upon it. In this country, agriculture is in a backward state. We should, therefore, profit by the example of other countries who have developed their agriculture scientifically to a great extent. Your Excellency, the question of manure forms a very important item in agriculture, and I think it would be better if it is very carefully considered by Government.

With these words, I support the resolution.

The Honourable Mr. CHUNILAL VIJBHUKHANDAS MEHTA:—Your Excellency,—I think the Honourable Dewán Bahádur GODBOLE deserves the hearty congratulations of this Council, not only for having made an excellent speech, but for having put before this Council constructive proposals as regards the improvement of manure in this Presidency. Perhaps the examples or instances which he gave and which were chiefly criticised by the Honourable Mr. KEATINGE he need not have mentioned, but they bring forth one fact, and it is this: that there is a large and increasing demand for manure. That demand is admitted, and I think it is the duty of Government, especially when it concerns a large mass of the population and a mass which is unable, in its present stage of knowledge, to supply its own needs to manufacture manure on a large scale or try and help, as far as possible, in that manufacture.

FACTORIES FOR MANURES AND FERTILIZERS.

[Mr. Chunilal Vijbhukhandas Mehta; Mr. G. Carmichael; Mr. Siddhanath Dhonddev Garud.] [5TH DECEMBER 1917.]

In addition to the sources of manure that the Honourable Dewán Bahádur GODBOLE mentioned, I may be permitted to state that there is at the present time an enquiry going on to add another source of fertilizers, and I believe that if that enquiry comes out successful, it will be a very valuable source of manure. I am referring to certain arrangements that I understand are at present being made with the Bangalore Institute of Science to produce manure out of scrap. I do not think I need go more into details on this matter.

The Honourable Mr. CARMICHAEL:—May I know what the honourable member means by scrap?

The Honourable Mr. CHUNILAL MEHTA:—Iron scrap. There is a further source of manure which has been already referred to by the Honourable Mr. PRATT and the Honourable Mr. KAMAT. In that direction, too, I think enquiries on a detailed and extensive scale are at present being made, and I hope that the result of these enquiries will be such as to place within the reach of cultivators these manures at a cheap cost. I am not so sure whether at this present moment it is necessary to ask Government to subsidise the establishment of these factories. I am not in the least bit opposed to this suggestion, but I quite see, as the Honourable Dewán Bahádur GODBOLE says, that subsidising is to be resorted to only if it is necessary, and on that understanding perhaps it may be allowed to stand. But the main thing is that investigation in this direction is needed quickly. I also think, sir, that it would be an advantage to consider whether manures cannot be obtained as a by-product of industries, and I think it must be within the knowledge of this Council that an extensive and valuable source of manure could be obtained out of oil-cake. The public know at the present moment that a very large company is being formed which will utilise the by-product of this industry, viz., oil-cake for manure. At present the difficulty is that the cultivators do not take kindly to oil-cake, and almost all the cake that is made has got to be exported. The question is whether means cannot be devised or attempts cannot be made to induce and educate cultivators to the true value of oil-cake as a valuable manure, and energy spent in that direction will, to my mind, be spent in the right direction.

With these remarks, I have great pleasure in supporting the resolution of the Honourable Dewán Bahádur GODBOLE.

The Honourable Mr. SIDDHANATH DHONDDEV GARUD:—Your Excellency,—As one of those interested in the question of the cheap production of manures, I beg to accord my hearty support to the resolution which has been moved by the Honourable Dewán Bahádur GODBOLE. The resolution merely asks Government first to undertake an investigation and then, if necessary, to subsidise the production of cheap manure. If your Excellency's Government is able to assure this Council that an investigation will be taken up, I think a very large portion of the agricultural community would feel indebted, because one of the questions in which they are most interested at present is really receiving the consideration which is due to it from your Excellency's Government.

The question of the application of night soil and the use of night soil in rural areas is not so easy as the Honourable Mr. PRATT appeared to think. It is indeed very difficult to get night soil and to apply it even in a crude form. The agricultural department have just demonstrated the utility of applying even crude night soil to land and they have shown that at least thrice the amount of crop can be grown if the land is treated with crude night soil. But even that experiment can only be undertaken near very large cities and near very large municipalities. In rural areas the cost is so prohibitive that it cannot be undertaken with any prospect of success as a business proposition. The real question, therefore, though there are several manures before the cultivator, is to find out one for him which will suit his needs and which will suit his purse. This is one of the questions that really requires very serious investigation and one of the matters which really requires a solution in the interest of the agricultural classes.

The Honourable Sardár SHRINIWAS COOPOOSWAMY MUDLIAR:—Your Excellency,—I have very great pleasure in supporting the resolution put before this Council by my honourable friend Dewán Bahádur GODBOLE. He has placed facts in support of his resolution so very ably, that in the interest of agriculture in this country, I am sure every one here will support this resolution.

He has not at all exaggerated the difficulty of obtaining cheap labour. I can say from my personal experience that agriculturists feel this difficulty so keenly that they prefer to neglect good fertile lands to grow into grazing lands. The only way to get out of the difficulty and to improve agriculture entirely depends on the establishment of factories for the production of manures and fertilizers.

The Honourable Mr. KEATINGE differs from the Honourable Dewán Bahádur on some points which he has placed in support of his resolution, yet he is prepared to consider this question favourably, which is really very encouraging. With these few words, I support this resolution.

The Honourable Mr. LALUBHAI SAMALDAS MEHTA:—Your Excellency,—I do not in any way desire to throw cold water on the Honourable Dewán Bahádur GODBOLE'S proposals. But I would like to make it quite clear that the matter is not so easy as the Honourable Dewán Bahádur has tried to make it out. The Industrial Commission had a meeting with the Industries Committee, and, as the Honourable Mr. PURSHOTTAMDAS said, the question of starting pioneer industries was discussed thoroughly. The Commission have expressed their views on the subject, but as regards the Committee we were divided among ourselves, and personally I do not know whether we can at present take up this idea. Is it right for us when the Government of India have not yet decided as to their general line of action on the report of the Industrial Commission to take up this question now?

The second question that I want to put before this Council is the question of the expense of making these investigations. It is not a slight matter. We must have a research institute. We must have eminent chemists. All these matters have to be taken into consideration.

I would divide the proposition into two parts. The first is the manufacture of fertilizers and manures and the second the popularising of the same. As regards the second the agricultural department is doing all that it possibly can. I may say here that I have heard from various persons that when they wanted the help of the agricultural department, they have received support from that department in helping them to introduce the oil-cake manures. My honourable friend Mr. CHUNILAL says that the cultivator must be taught the true value of oil-cake; but that portion of the work is being done by Government, and I do not think that even the Honourable Dewán Bahádur GODBOLE wants them to do more than they do at present. They are doing their very best.

The other work is really very big. We have got at the head of industries a man whose special work will be to see how far it will be possible to start pioneer works, but his duties will be carried out only when he has got experts in carrying on this research work. Merely to pass a resolution in this Council to show sympathy with the objects of the Honourable Dewán Bahádur GODBOLE is no good, and I do not think any practical steps could be taken. My honourable friend Mr. CHUNILAL MEHTA referred to the Bangalore Institute of Science Some of the Bangalore experts were here and we talked with them, and they said that possibly they could not do the work themselves privately unless the director and the staff all agreed with them that they should work for us. That is one thing. The second question is about the remuneration they will have to be paid for this kind of work. As I say, this question is bristling with difficulties. The matter is not so easy as it might appear from the Honourable Dewán Bahádur's resolution.

As to the question of fertilizers, there is no difference of opinion as to the necessity of manufacturing them. But is the Government now going to take this work up, taking for granted that the investigation is successful and it is shown that commercial industries could be started for the manufacture of fertilizers? I might mention for the information of this Council,—I do not think it is a confidential thing—that the Tata Iron & Steel Company are in negotiation with a big company for the manufacture of zinc and sulphate of zinc from Burma, and it is possible that we may be able to manufacture sulphuric acid at a very cheap rate and as much as would be required for years to come, even with the canals working at a much lower rate than they are doing now. Supposing this industry is started here with the help of Government experts and then the Tata Company are able to produce these fertilizers, what would be the position of factories started under Government subsidies? I say that this whole question is bristling with difficulties, and I would strongly request my honourable friend Dewán Bahádur GODBOLE not to press his resolution here, but to bring it before the Director of Industries who will go through the details of the whole question and will consider whether it is necessary that Government should take up this work.

The Honourable Mr. G. CARMICHAEL:—Your Excellency,—I do not really intend to take a very long time in replying to this resolution. The hour is very late and another reason is that on behalf of Government I am prepared to state that Government will accept the Honourable Dewán Bahádur GODBOLE's resolution. It will be accepted to this extent that we should be guided by the orders which will be passed on the report of Sir Thomas Holland's commission.

With regard to the second part of the resolution "and to subsidise if necessary the establishment of factories" the action to be taken will have to be governed by the orders passed on the recommendations of the report of Sir Thomas Holland's commission. The Honourable Mr. KEATINGE has told us very clearly the conditions which apply in India, and I do not think I need go into that part of the case. The Honourable Mr. PRATT has referred to the use of, or rather the desirability of making more use of, night soil as good manure than is made at present. The Honourable Mr. GARUD said that that is not a suitable manure, but I think the Honourable Mr. PRATT intended to point out that the manure is actually used by the Japanese in their villages and that such suitable material should not be allowed to go to waste. The Honourable Mr. CHUNILAL MEHTA has mentioned oil-cakes. I do not think the Honourable Dewán Bahádur GODBOLE referred to the use of oil-cake, but I understand that the position is, as pointed out by my honourable friend Mr. CHUNILAL, that there is a sufficient supply if machine pressed cake is taken into account and that what has to be done is, as the Honourable Mr. LALUBHAI SAMALDAS suggests, to take measures to popularize this form of manure. This the agricultural department already does.

As regards fish manure, I have already asked the Director of Industries, Mr. Mead, on the conclusion of the work of the Commission here, to go to the United Provinces and Madras, and one thing which I have asked him to look into when he goes to Madras is what has been done there in regard to fish canning factories and manufacture of fish guano. I think fish manure is really a by-product, and in order to get an appreciable supply there ought to be an appreciable demand for fish as food, and possibly there is now an appreciable demand. Government some 10 or 12 years ago did direct that certain enquiries should be made as to what measures might be taken to increase the supply of fish and improve the methods of fishing. The report was submitted, and it was ascertained, as far as Bombay was concerned, that the fishermen of Ratnagiri and the Konkan were well ahead of any other fishermen in India, and on that account Government thought it not necessary to do anything except to carry out some improvement with reference to the establishment of fish curing yards in various parts of the coast. Since then the demand has increased very much, and I think there is a possibility in Bombay and also North Konkan offers possibilities for the establishment of large fish-yards. I think the question is one which requires investigation. It is a large question, because to make any appreciable difference in the supply of fish manure and also in the supply of fish would necessitate very extensive enquiries, as it is necessary to know where the fish can be had. They are not to be had in every part of the ocean, they move about from one bank to another, and it is necessary to acquire a very complete knowledge of the fishing grounds. Then, the further question is whether it would pay to run a fishing trawler. Until you increase the fish supply, it seems to me that you will not be making a very great advance in regard to the supply of fish guano or fish manure. As I have said, we are asking Mr. Mead to go to Madras and to see what they are doing there.

FACTORIES FOR MANURES AND FERTILIZERS.

[5TH DECEMBER 1917.] [Mr. G. Carmichael; Dewán Bahádur Kashinath Ramchandra Godbole.]

With regard to the heroic measures which the Honourable Dewán Bahádur GODBOLE recommended, I think it was the Honourable Mr. KEATINGE who said that it all depends upon whether you can get your electrical power at a sufficiently cheap rate and another honourable member pointed out that the difficulty in Bombay was that before we get that power we have to build a very costly storage reservoir, and I think we should have to compare the possibilities in Bombay with those of European countries where hydraulic power is obtained from a constantly running stream without any storage.

There is no doubt that the determination of this difficult question will require very close investigation, and it will be a costly work, and I am not prepared to say that we can undertake to investigate the subject as it really requires. But with regard to the fish manure question that will be gone into.

With regard to obtaining a supply of potash, the honourable member said that it is likely that a supply may be obtained in the Runn of Cutch. I do not know on what authority he makes that statement.

The Honourable Dewán Bahádur GODBOLE:—It is in the report of the acting Director of Agriculture, Dr. Mann.

The Honourable Mr. CARMICHAEL:—I think Dr. Mann says that it may be possible. But that is a very different thing. I should like to ask the Geological Department of the Government of India whether they consider that there is any likelihood of obtaining a supply of potash in the Runn of Cutch. They will possibly be willing to help us in this matter.

With regard to the remarks that fell from the Honourable Mr. LALUBHAI, he says that there is a possibility of one of our leading companies in Bombay undertaking work which will give a cheap supply of sulphuric acid. I think there is still another scheme which is under contemplation which will help in the same way, but I do not know whether that will help with regard to the preparation of sulphate of ammonia in Bombay. I presume it will be prepared somewhere in the coal mines area. Given a cheap supply of sulphuric acid it would be useful for the manufacture of superphosphates. That is a question which, I understand, the Board of Agriculture, at their next meeting, have under consideration; so that, that particular development will not be neglected.

With these remarks, sir, I repeat again that the Government of Bombay are ready to accept the resolution of the Honourable Dewán Bahádur, subject to the qualification with regard to the recommendations of the Industries Commission.

The Honourable Dewán Bahádur KASHINÁTH RAMCHANDRA GODBOLE:—I am very glad that your Excellency's Government has practically admitted my resolution, and will take the necessary steps for carrying out the suggestions that I have placed before the Council. Now that your Excellency's Government have got their Director of Industries, I hope their pace will be very rapid in the industrial development of this Presidency.

His Excellency the PRESIDENT:—I wish to add one word and it is this. Of course everybody, and Government in particular, is anxious for the improvement of agriculture and will do everything possible in order to see that improvement comes about, particularly in connection with manures and fertilizers. But I want to make a few observations to honourable members, with some diffidence as I have been in India only for a short time, with regard to the position of agriculture and particularly with regard to the improvement of agriculture which we are discussing this evening. It seems to me that everybody says that Government ought to do this and Government ought to do that. May I, on behalf of Government and particularly of the agricultural department under the able headship of the Honourable Mr. KEATINGE, say that I think that the agricultural department has done a very great deal for agriculture in this Presidency from what I have seen? But may I suggest this, that the owner of property who has tenants under him in this Presidency is generally not a practical farmer himself and knows nothing about practical farming? Government can do a great deal by experimental means and by assisting fertilizer factories and in other ways, but I am perfectly clear on this, that without the real and active co-operation of the land-owning classes, by taking a practical interest in their own properties and taking a practical interest in the advancement of their own tenants and assisting them in the various ways that a land owner can assist them with regard to farming, without that co-operation from the land-owning class, I do not think that we shall advance nearly as fast as I think we ought to. That is a feeling which I have entertained almost since my arrival in India. The situation will improve rapidly; things have advanced very rapidly in the Bombay Presidency, but I give this suggestion to honourable members as something that comes from my inner heart.

The resolution was put to the vote and carried.

His Excellency the PRESIDENT:—I think it will be to the convenience of honourable members if we now adjourn till 11-30 a.m. tomorrow.

The Council then adjourned till 11-30 a.m. on Thursday, the 6th December 1917.

His Excellency the PRESIDENT:—Resolution No. 13. The Honourable Mr. BHURGRI.

"That this Council recommends to His Excellency the Governor in Council that a mixed committee of officials and non-officials be appointed to consider what measures should be adopted for the suppression of 'rasai' or free supplies, 'lapo' or illegal exactions, and 'cherr' or forced labour in Sind."

The Honourable Mr. GHULAM MUHAMMAD walad Khán Bahádur WALI MUHAMMAD BHURGRI:—My Lord,—The resolution which I rise to move, and which I trust this Council will accept, has reference to certain well known abuses connected with the administration in Sind. Rasai connotes supplies, and refers to the supplies obtained from the people for the benefit of officers of Government touring in the country. Lapó means illegal exaction, and is the tax levied by the tapedars from the people originally for the ostensible purposes of rasai. Lastly, cherr is forced labour, and refers to the labour extracted from the people for various purposes connected with official touring. These three abuses are intimately connected with each other. In fact, they form one stock, of which rasai and cherr are the elder members, and lapo the younger. Of these rasai is the first in importance, and I, therefore, place it in the forefront of our consideration.

The practice of rasai owes its origin to the touring system. An officer of Government going on tour in the rural areas with an establishment generally obtains for himself and his establishment such supplies as he can obtain in the locality through which he is touring. Things which cannot be had locally are sent for, sometimes from great distances, such as the larger towns. For these supplies the payment made is generally inadequate, and sometimes woefully so. The bills that are submitted to and paid by the officers are generally the veriest make-believe. A gazetted officer of Government, who lives in the European style, recently stated on oath in a court of law that he received and paid a bill of a rupee for two days for supplies which included meat, a fowl and eggs; and, when questioned further, he stated that he generally paid 8 or 9 annas a day, thus showing that he considered such payment adequate. These 8 or 9 annas a day, I presume, covered also fodder for his horse, and milk, fuel, etc., for himself. I have mentioned this case merely for the purpose of showing how the matter is regarded by certain officials, and this is by no means an isolated case, but is a typical illustration of the nominal and almost apologetic character of the payments generally made. And what is worse is that even these payments do not reach the poor suppliers, and are absorbed by the establishments of the officers concerned. The grievous hardship and injustice entailed by the system are obvious. But the most unfortunate feature of it is that the burden falls heaviest on the shoulders of those least able to sustain it. For it is not the landowner, who in the first instance meets the expenses of the supplies, but it is the needy cultivator, who ultimately bears the greater part of burden of this iniquitous charge. And the burden is a heavy one. For the officers who tour in the districts in connection with various departments of the administration are many, and the sums spent on some of the camps are large, and hence the burden is, in the result, both heavy and of some duration.

Fortunately for me, the existence or the extent of the evil is not a point that I need at all labour. It has been the subject of almost infinite complaint and representation from every quarter during a long course of years. It has been discussed, almost threadbare, in its every aspect and feature, by responsible private individuals, by public men, by public bodies, by the press and by responsible officers of Government. And, finally, the evil has arrested the attention of Government themselves, who some years ago held an enquiry in the matter, and issued a resolution penalizing the practice. It is to be deplored, however, that that investigation was of a purely confidential character, and public opinion was not at all consulted in the matter by Government. At the same time, it is worthy of note that, though official opinion alone was taken in the matter, that opinion was such as to lead Government to pass the resolution referred to. That resolution, unfortunately, has been practically a dead letter. It has been honoured more in the breach than in the observance. It has crystallized, and beyond, perhaps, some historic interest and value, is void of any practical worth. Hence the evil has only grown and gained strength with the passing of the years and the evident impunity that would seem to attend it. I might almost say it has been sanctioned and hallowed by a long and undisturbed existence. The evil has, indeed, attained the proportions of a public calamity.

Begotten of the system of rasai is the institution of lapo. Lapo represents a certain fixed percentage on the acre of land or the rupee of assessment, levied by the tapedar from the landowner or cultivator, originally mainly for the purpose of meeting the demands of rasai. When an official encamped at any place, it was the duty of the mukhtyarkar, through the tapedar, to provide the necessary supplies. This necessitated the maintenance of a fund for the purpose, and this fund had to be raised from the people. For the tapedar and the mukhtyarkar would not and could not find the supplies out of their own pockets. This was the origin of lapo. But bad as was this state of things, it was superseded by even a worse condition of affairs. For, the proceeds of lapo were subsequently devoted to the providing of supplies for the smaller camps only, and for the larger camps a separate rasai fund was maintained by the mukhtyarkar at the cost of the poor zemindars who made fixed and regular contributions towards it. The unfortunate result is that, though lapo has practically lost its rasion d'être it continues to exist without any justification for its existence. And, finally, the present arrangement, according to which the individual zemindar in whose land the official is for the time being encamped is made responsible for the providing of the supplies, is even worse than the old. It has shifted the burden from the shoulders of many to the shoulders of one, and thus made the burden more insupportable.

I come lastly to cherr, or the system of impressing the labour of agriculturists for purposes connected with official touring. On the arrival of a touring officer in a place, a demand is made by the mukhtyarkar for the supply of free labour. This demand is reluctantly answered by the cultivators, whose free labour is utilized for sundry purposes in connection with official touring, such as making roads, preparing camping grounds, pitching tents, fetching water, fuel, etc., and generally, running errands of all sorts. This sort of thing goes on from camp to camp, and entails the greatest hardship on the poor cultivators and also on the zemindars. The taking away of the cultivators from their ordinary labours has the most disastrous effect on their subsistence, and their withdrawal from cultivation, sometimes at very necessary and critical periods, inflicts serious damage on the zemindars in the shape of a poor outturn and consequent financial loss.

It is a matter for deep gratification and thankfulness that Government have recognized the evil, and have put forth high endeavour to suppress it. But the regret is that that endeavour has almost completely failed to effect any improvement. The reasons for that failure are, to my mind, patent enough. The first is that the attack first made was made in the wrong quarter. A blow was aimed at lapo, and not at rasai. But, as shown above, rasai is the cause, and lapo the effect. Rasai is the parent, and lapo the offspring. Lapo is the fund which the system of rasai has directly begotten and reared, and which it continues to nourish even though the necessity for the nurture has long departed. It is therefore very necessary to consider the question of changing the objective of attack from lapo to rasai. Rasai is the main position, and lapo only a subordinate earthwork. If rasai is stormed and taken, lapo must needs collapse. Starve out rasai, and lapo must needs perish with it. The latter must die of inanition.

On the other hand, all attempts at directly suppressing lapo without touching rasai are so much misdirected waste of effort. The above view of the situation would appear to be obvious enough, but, if authority were needed in support of it, I believe it could be found in the opinion of some of the most eminent and experienced officers of Government. At any rate, the matter is one worthy of careful consideration.

The second reason for Government's failure to suppress rasai is that all the orders of Government have left the prevailing conditions unaffected. The practice of rasai is a result of the touring system, and while that system, within proper limits, is expedient and even necessary, the question of its duration, which appears to many to exceed the actual requirements of the situation, is a matter that deserves the most serious consideration. Again, so long as the providing of supplies is left to the executive officers of Government or to the zemindars, so long will the evil continue. Hence, the expediency and practicability of a system analogous to the military commissariat is yet another matter for consideration.

The last, and, perhaps, the most outstanding, reason for the failure of Government in this direction is that Government have from the outset treated the whole matter as strictly private. They have not taken the people into their confidence. The opinion of the parties concerned or of the public at large has never been consulted. Both the enquiries held and the orders passed by Government have been confidential. The public have never been in a position to know the nature or result of the investigation held or the nature of the orders issued by Government in the matter. The result has been unfortunate both for the people and for Government. The people have not had the advantage of putting their case before Government, and Government have been without the benefit of public advice and assistance in the matter.

It may be objected that the system owes its origin to the spirit of hospitality on the part of the agricultural classes; that the system cannot be considered to be a hardship or a grievance of that class, inasmuch as they consider that their honour is involved in its maintenance; that at any rate the hardship and grievance are greatly exaggerated inasmuch as there has been little or no complaint on the part of the zemindars; and finally, that the maintenance of the system is bound up with the prestige of the officials and of Government. To these objections I would answer that, while the system no doubt originated in the hospitality of the zemindar, the burden in the olden days used to be scarcely appreciable owing to the extreme rareness and smallness of the demand on that hospitality; that the immense growth of the touring system has enormously added to the weight of the burden, so as to make it almost intolerable; that it is not true that there has been no complaint on the part of the zemindars and that, on the contrary, there has never been a more fertile subject of complaint; that the surprise is not that there has not been more complaint, but that there has been so much in view of the fact that resistance is not only futile but dangerous, and that complaint in this matter is known to be often attended with the gravest consequences to the poor complainer, who generally not only recieves no sympathy or support from official quarters but becomes an object of serious disfavour in that quarter; and that it is not true that the maintenance of the system involves the prestige of the officials, and that, even if this were so, the question of prestige is a consideration which should give way to the clear demands of justice.

RASAI, LAPO AND CHERR IN SIND.

[6TH DECEMBER 1917.] [Mr. Ghulam Muhammad Bhurgri; Mr. Vithalbhai Jhaverbhai Patel.]

I have purposely refrained from going into details of fact or into the evidence, for I consider that to make disclosures in such a matter while being extremely unpleasant to me, was also quite unnecessary, as the subject is one of the greatest notoriety. Very much, indeed, could be said and written on the subject, but I am afraid that it would be anything but savoury and would, at the same time, be superfluous.

My Lord, the question is one of the deepest concern both to the Government and to the people. It involves the welfare of the silent suffering millions of the field, whose welfare is, after all, the welfare of Government. The situation is one of the utmost gravity, and needs to be grappled with with promptitude and decision. The attempts hitherto made by Government have been determined enough, but they have failed mainly because wrong remedies were applied and because the co-operation of the people was not enlisted in their support. What is needed is a concerted effort on the part of the Government and of the people to suppress an evil of such antiquity and of such dimensions, and hence the urgent necessity for the present resolution, which I earnestly trust will commend itself to this Council.

I merely move this resolution in order that there may be an enquiry. But I want an enquiry at which the people will have some voice. Therefore, I have put it as a committee of officials and non-officials. As I have shown, sir, in this question hitherto all enquiries and all other materials that were supplied were only conceived and brought out by officials. In no case, so far as I am aware, the opinions of the public were invited, and therefore, I think that the remedies. Government have applied have failed. Therefore, sir, I have brought this resolution and hope that Government, as they are themselves as anxious as we are, to suppress the nuisance, would see their way to hold an investigation and give the public also a chance of making suggestions which will be not only in the interest of the public and the country but of all.

The Honourable Mr. VITHALBHAI JHAVERBHAI PATEL.—Your Excellency,—I rise to accord my hearty support to the resolution which has been so ably moved by my honourable friend Mr. BHURGRI. After hearing his speech one wonders whether the province of Sind is a part of the Bombay Presidency under the enlightened British rule. What does his speech show? It shows that there is a system known as rasai or free supplies to touring officers, lapo or illegal exactions and cherr or forced labour in Sind.

I for a moment ask the Council to confine its attention to lapo, a system which is unknown in the three divisions of the Presidency proper. Lapo, if I understand my honourable friend Mr. BHURGRI rightly, is a sort of cess on assessment, a cess not for works of public utility or for education which is known as the local fund cess, but cess collected from the zamindars for the purpose of meeting the expenditure incurred by officers on tour.

With regard to the question of what is known as forced labour, I may say that I had occasion to look up resolutions of Government on the subject in connection with my own resolution on the agenda. I read a number of resolutions applicable to the Presidency on the subject of free supplies and forced labour, but I must say that the state of things that has been brought to light by my honourable friend Mr. BHURGRI is not justified by any of them. The first Government Resolution that I could get hold of in this connection is of the year 1883. It is Resolution No. 6126 dated the 18th August 1883, and with your Excellency's permission I should like to read it to this Council. "Circumstances occasionally occur in the districts where in order to carry out the requirements of public servants it is necessary to procure forced labour, but it is distinctly to be understood that labour is not to be pressed when free labour is available; and that no officer under the rank of a Mamlatdar is authorized to press labourers or coolies."

Now this resolution, I respectfully submit, is against the spirit of the criminal law obtaining in this country. No person has any right whatsoever to compel any other to do any thing against his will. The resolution in question, however, allows much compulsion. It is now 34 years since this resolution has been passed and I respectfully submit that the time has come when it should be repealed altogether. Your Excellency, whatever may be the justification in those days for such a resolution, I submit that in these civilized days, the resolution should not be allowed to remain on the Government records.

The Honourable Mr. BHURGRI'S resolution prays for a committee: What is the use of a committee? What will that committee do ? The facts are clear that there is the system of free supplies, lapo and cherr, prevailing in the province of Sind and if Government have the will they can by one stroke of pen do away with these monstrous practices.

His Excellency the PRESIDENT:—Will the honourable member show us the golden means of so doing?

The Honourable Mr. PATEL:—Your Excellency,—Indian and European travellers do not find the least difficulty in getting labour and if only a fair price is paid people would be willing to sell supplies also. I cannot understand why officers of Government with influence at their command, with servants at Government expense at their beck and call should not get what they want by paying the fair price for it. If Government rules that in future Government officers shall not have recourse to free supplies, to lapo and cherr, there would not be the slightest difficulty in putting an end to these practices. What would the committee do in the matter? They may say that such and such a thing is not fair or such and such a thing is oppressive and should not be resorted to. But what remedy would the committee suggest to put a stop to it?

I therefore propose an amendment to this resolution, namely, that the words "that a mixed committee of officials and non-officials be appointed to consider what" should be dropped and the resolution should stand as follows:—

"That this Council recommends to His Excellency the Governor in Council that measures should be adopted for the suppression of 'rasai' or free supplies, 'lapo' or illegal exactions, and 'cherr' or forced labour in Sind."

There is no reason why a committee should be appointed in this matter. The case is as plain as anything and steps should be taken at once by Government to prevent and remedy the evils which have been pointed out by my honourable friend Mr. BHURGRI.

RASAI, LAPO AND CHERR IN SIND.

[6TH DECEMBER 1917.] [Mr. Vithalbhai Jhaverbhai Patel; Mr. Dattatraya Venkatesh Belvi; the President; Mr. Siddanath Dhonddev Garud; Khán Bahádur Pir Baksh.]

With these few words I move my amendment and I hope my honourable friend Mr. BHURGRI will accept it.

The Honourable Mr. DATTATRAYA VENKATESH BELVI:—Your Excellency,—I wish to add the words "in the Presidency" at the end of the resolution.

His Excellency the PRESIDENT:—I cannot admit the Honourable Mr. BELVI'S amendment as it does away with the whole object of the Honourable Mr. BHURGRI'S resolution. If the Honourable Mr. BELVI looks at resolution No. 29, which is to be moved by the Honourable Mr. PATEL, he will find that the very point which he raises is to be dealt with in that resolution.

The Honourable Mr. SIDDANATH DHONDDEV GARUD:—Your Excellency,—I do not think I can support the amendment which has been moved by my honourable friend Mr. PATEL. This question needs not only to be enquired into in Sind but also in the other three divisions of this Presidency. This evil is practically common to both the Presidency proper and Sind. So, your Excellency, I am going to move an amendment that the words "Sind" might be dropped.

His Excellency the PRESIDENT:—Order, order. Has not the honourable member heard the ruling that I gave to the honourable Mr. BELVI? I think he must confine himself to Sind.

The Honourable Mr. GARUD:—Your Excellency,—my submission is that this resolution requires a committee to be appointed and the other resolution which the Honourable Mr. PATEL is moving does not require any committee, but only requires an enquiry, and therefore, I suggest this amendment.

His Excellency the PRESIDENT.—If the honourable member wishes to move an amendment to resolution 29, he can do so later on.

The Honourable Mr. GARUD:—Then my only submission is that a committee should be appointed in the first instance to enquire and find out to what extent the evil is rampant in that particular place and then measures might be taken to suppress it. With these words I support the original resolution.

The Honourable Khán Bahádur PIR BAKSH walad MIAN MAHMUD:—Your Excellency,—I am sorry I have to oppose the resolution and the amendment respectively of my honourable friends Mr. BHURGRI and Mr. PATEL. I do not think that it is at all necessary to appoint a committee to consider what measures should be taken for these supposed evils or grievances, for the reasons I am just going to mention. Rasai is already suppressed and in order to prevent its recurrence strict orders are issued every year by the administrative and executive officers and the result is that some of the mukhtyarkars, police inspectors and even officers of lower grades carry supplies with them. I have had occasions to be in the camps of some officers and I learnt that the tapadars—here they are called village talatis—were strictly prohibited from attending the camps except on public business and I found that shop-keepers who had opened shops in camps through zemindars were paid to a pie.

As regards cherr, I know that touring officers have at their services tent-pitchers or khalasis. Hence they need no cherr. The public works department as a rule give on contract the work of clearance or excavation of canals and of the construction or repairs of buildings and pay the contractors direct. It is only in the case of emergency, such as breaches in canals or in protective bunds, that the department calls upon the zemindars to come to its aid and in this case too the cherr (labourers and coolies) are fully paid and I may add here that on such occasions the zemindars themselves willingly come forward to help the public works department in closing breaches as soon as possible in order to avoid their crops and villages being damaged or destroyed by floods. Therefore, to hold an enquiry into the matters suggested by the resolution would be a waste of energy.

RASAI, LAPO AND CHERR IN SIND.

[Khán Bahádur Pir Baksh; Mr. H. S. Lawrence.] [6TH DECEMBER 1917.]

As regards lapo I do not think the proposed committee would be able to suggest more effective measures for the punishment of such evil than what the Indian Penal Code provides. The measures will be found in chapter IX of the code and in the compilation of departmental rules which are worked whenever and wherever necessary.

The Honourable Mr. H. S. LAWRENCE:—Your Excellency,—The terms employed in this resolution are liable to some misunderstanding. Rasai does not mean free supplies but all supplies. Lapo is not necessarily an illegal exaction, it means in Upper Sind the rent of a landlord; cherr is not necessarily forced labour, but includes the services which tenants are bound by agreement to render to their zemindars.

It is well to define these terms, for if any members of this Council were to visit Sind in a year or two, and enquire if rasai, lapo and cherr had ceased, they would be understood by the Sindhi zemindar to enquire whether the zemindar had ceased to receive rent or his customary dues from his tenants; and they would be distressed to learn that these customs still continue.

The honourable member has drawn a very black and gloomy picture. I think that his speech suggests that the officers of Government in all departments oppress the people by exacting supplies of all kinds without payment, by levying illegal gratifications, and by enforcing unpaid labour.

Now these different forms of tyranny are of course possible in every country by all persons who are entrusted with the power of the state; and it is to prevent such tyrannies that the British Government has established its elaborate machinery, with grades of supervising officers one above the other; and I have no doubt that this Council recognises, as many impartial observers have recognised, that this machinery works with substantial justice. No one will deny that in a vast country, with millions of inhabitants, and thousands of Government agents of every variety and calibre, petty acts of tyranny must occur; but when these are brought to light, they are visited with condign punishment.

Firstly in regard to rasai. This has many heads, with slightly differing characteristics as concerns different departments. But if we take the form which seems to bulk most largely in the view of the honourable member, rasai by village accountants, in its usual form this is understood to mean the collection by the village accountant of supplies of various kinds and also of cash. The supplies are collected under the guise of being consumed by the touring officer and his establishment, and the cash is collected under the guise of presents to the clerks, pattewalas and private servants. It is generally believed that the collections by the tapedar are very greatly in excess of any consumption by the establishments or payment to the establishments. Anyway the evil has existed, and for a good many years now a rule has been made that wherever possible supplies should be obtained, not from the tapedar, but from some neighbouring zemindar or bania; that these supplies should be kept down to the smallest quantity of articles possible, and that notice should be given of what articles would actually be required. This system is reported, in the reports which I have received very recently, to be working fairly satisfactorily; in some places quite satisfactorily, but in some places, where the zemindars are men of high position and wealth, it is impossible to induce them to agree to perform a duty which they regard as derogatory to their dignity. But all reports coincide in holding that a great advance has been made in educating the zemindar to a sense of his rights, in reducing his fear of and dependence upon the tapedar, and thereby in reducing the amount of the loot which the tapedar secured from the zemindar. This is the result of continuous efforts by the superior officers of Government over several years, and these efforts are being persevered in.

The next point is lapo or in more familiar terms dasturi or graft. This is a far more insidious and widespread evil; and whereas rasai is confined to the occasional sporadic visits of officers, lapo goes on all the time. It has been attacked by various methods, and it is generally agreed that it is far more under control than it was, say, even ten years ago.

As you have been told by the honourable member, it has been customary for the tapedar to add a percentage to the Government revenue. The remedy lies in better supervision; and some twelve years ago a vigorous effort was made by adding 50 per cent. to the number of supervising officers called supervising tapedars, under whose immediate supervision the tapedars work. There had been 150 of these officers in Sind, and they were suddenly increased to 225. But complaint has been made that these supervising tapedars do not supervise and that the evils continue. Then efforts have been made to improve the class of our mukhtiarkars; and I think there is no doubt that with the spread of education, our mukhtiarkars are better men all round than they were twenty years ago. I have heard from many sources that the tapedars do not now gather in more than a fraction of what they used to gather before.

At the same time the Council may be assured that this is not always a one-sided business. The zemindar often receives his quid pro quo, and that, naturally enough, at the expense of Government. Cases not infrequently come to light where cultivated lands are shown as uncultivated, and the zemindar thereby escapes payment of the assessment, but the tapedar and the zemindar conjointly share the profit. If supervision is tightened up, as I hope it will be more and more, I am not at all sure that the zemindar will not before long be pining for a return to the good old days of lapo.

Only recently I have submitted a scheme to Government for the improvement of the position of the tapedar, for the improvement, above all, of the supervision under which he will be controlled, and have told Government that I trust that this scheme will result to the benefit both of the zemindar and of Government: that the zemindar will be free from exactions, and that Government may be free from frauds upon its revenue.

The third head mentioned by the honourable member is that of cherr or unpaid labour. This is the first time that I have heard a complaint made of this matter and I am not therefore in a position to discuss it with any detailed knowledge. Conditions in Sind are not really in the deplorable condition which he depicts. But I should like to tell the Council that the relations between the zemindar and his tenants are similar to those which prevailed in England in former years. The landlord not only shares the produce with the tenant, but also gives the tenant his protection and advice in times of difficulty. In Sind the landlord also gives his tenants advances of money free of interest. In return he is entitled to receive services from his tenant; for which he pays not in cash but in friendly services. I was unable to hear the honourable member fully but I gathered he referred to occasions of shikar.

The Honourable Mr. BHURGRI:—No, I spoke of the preparation of roads and camping grounds.

The Honourable Mr. LAWRENCE:—I can only say at present that if the honourable member can give any instances of unjust treatment, I shall be very glad to have the matter investigated, and any person responsible made liable for his misdeeds.

The honourable member has suggested a public enquiry and has complained that the public has not been consulted hitherto. I have received reports from the Collectors which, as every one who knows Sind can appreciate, are based upon consultation with the principal zemindars of the district. The Council will realise that it is often more easy to secure full advice from zemindars in private discussion that in a public enquiry.

However, if the Government desire a public enquiry, there is of course no possible objection on the part of any officers in Sind. I have no great confidence that the enquiry will be more effective than the measures already in operation; but of course those measures will continue.

The Honourable Sardár DULABAWA RAISINGJI, Thakor of Kerwada:—Your Excellency,—I rise to support the amendment moved by my honourable friend. I must confess that I have neither the experience of my honourable friend Khán Bahádur PIR BAKSH, nor have I the advantage which my honourable friend Mr. LAWRENCE has of knowledge with regard to Sind. But I do think that it is a revelation to many of us to hear of this forced labour and supply of lapo that is required by officers, which really means an illegal imposition in these days of civilisation. I consider that the evil as it exists in Sind certainly exceeds the limits. However great facilities these customs may give to touring officers in the matter of getting supplies that they may want, Government should really do something to put a stop to these old customs which could not have been sanctioned by any law.

With these remarks I support the resolution moved by my honourable friend Mr. BHURGRI.

The Honourable SHEIKH GHULAM HUSSEIN HIDAYATALLAH:—Your Excellency,—Coming from the same part of the country to which this resolution relates, I consider it my duty to say a few words about it. Referring to the speech of my honourable friend Khán Bahádur PIR BAKSH, I was very much amused to hear that there is no rasai and lapo in Sind. The Honourable Mr. LAWRENCE, the Commissioner in Sind, whose speech all the members of the Council have listened to, leaves the impression on the minds of every one of us that there is rasai and lapo in Sind. That is the honourable mover's complaint, and the Honourable Mr. LAWRENCE admits that there is a real evil. But the evil exists not only now, but it existed before the British came to Sind. It is the duty of Government to see that it is put down. Now, this system originated before the British conquered Sind. The original custom used to be that small officials of the Government used to get from the zemindars a certain percentage of the assessment either in cash or in kind for the purpose of entertaining officials when they came on tour, and that system continued even after the British advent. Originally all these arrangements used to be made before the British Raj by petty officers, now known as tapedars. Now the tapedar has been prohibited, under the orders of the local Government, from taking rasai and has nothing to do with the rasai and his place has been taken by the zemindar of the local area. Now I must make it very clear to this Council that though there is a complaint about rasai on our side, we know that there is not much of railway communication in Sind and officers of the revenue department especially have to tour 210 days out of each year, that is, seven months. Now, supposing you take the example of a deputy collector, he has about three talukas in his charge. He has to go about and spend those 210 days at each corner of the taluka. Now there are places where it is very difficult for him to get supplies. For instance, supplies of the nature of flour, bread and ghee he might carry with himself. But what about grass, fuel and milk? It is very difficult for him to carry these things. There I quite realise the difficulties of the officer. Besides that, these things have not much value in the mofussil in normal times. Generally Mussulman zemindars who have got a large number of cattle do not like to sell their milk and they therefore willingly give gratis milk, and also grass and fuel. I do not resent that. But it is not only grass and fuel that is given gratis to the officials, but besides that cash payments are made to the clerical establishments, pattewalas, butlers, and so on, of the superior officers. Supposing a deputy collector comes on tour, his head munshi and his head clerk are given something of the lapo paid to the tapedar. I resent these cash payments. I know of zemindars who can provide supplies to ten officers if they come along. They won't mind that. But they have to pay very heavily in the form of cash payments which are given to the office people, to the pattewalas and other menials.

RASAI, LAPO AND CHERR IN SIND.

[6TH DECEMBER 1917.] [Sheikh Ghulam Hussein Hidayatallah; Mr. Raghunath Purshottam Paranjpye.]

Now I have told the Council that formerly this arrangement used to be made by the tapedar. This evil is admitted even by the Government of Bombay. If I am not wrong, there was a resolution by the Government of Bombay in 1902 that this evil ought to be put down. Again I remember four or five years ago the Commissioner in Sind reduced a mukhtiarkar for making rasai. No doubt the Government officials, specially the Commissioner in Sind, have been from time to time taking steps to put it down, but to my mind it appears that all this depends on the individual officers and on individual zemindars. I know an instance of an officer in Sind who asked the tapedar why no arrangements had been made for his rasai, and who, on being told by the tapedar that there was a circular of the Commissioner prohibiting rasai, told the tapedar that that circular was only binding on the Commissioner and not on him, and that till he issued such a circular himself arrangements for his rasai should continue to be made.

Again, I must blame the zemindars also. I know of a zemindar who called upon an officer with a dhali (present), and who, on being told by the officer that there was a circular of the Commissioner prohibiting rasai, told the officer it would be very humiliating for him to take it back and that anyhow he must accept it. The problem, I admit, is really a hard one.

Coming to the present system that is being carried on in Sind, the zemindar has to make "rasai". Now the poor zemindar, although he has to make rasai and the tapedar has absolutely nothing to do with it, yet the zemindar has to pay lapo to the tapedar. That is an additional burden. I must say that for this the zemindar is burdened with extra cost now. He has to make the rasai and he has to pay the lapo. The Honourable Mr. LAWRENCE has told this Council that the tapedar has very wide powers. He can do a lot of favours and a good deal of harm as well. The zemindars pay money to him, I think, in some cases because he can show cultivated land as uncultivated. So, this system of lapo, I am afraid, will continue unless Government puts it down with very stringent measures.

Now, the resolution of my honourable friend Mr. BHURGRI is that an enquiry should be made by the appointment of a committee. I would suggest to my honourable friend to leave the matter to the Commissioner in Sind. I feel confident that the Commissioner in Sind will take the non-officials into his confidence, consult them, consider the suggestions that they will make, and try his level best to put down the evil, and I hope that the Honourable Mr BHURGRI will accept my suggestion.

The Honourable Mr. RAGHUNATH PURSHOTTAM PARANJPYE:—Your Excellency,—I rise to support heartily the motion of my honourable friend Mr. BHURGRI. The honourable the THAKOR OF KERWADA has said the state of things revealed in the speech of my honourable friend Mr. BHURGRI is nothing short of a scandal. We have been always told that strict orders have been issued in these matters and we have occasionally been told that the explanation of this state of things is that the zemindars are so very hospitable. This leads one to wonder whether the Indian is a different being from the people of other countries in his ideas. We have thus been told that the Indian criminal is so anxious to confess his crime that he will come before the courts to confess anything that he has done or even anything that he has not done. In the same manner we are often told that the zemindar in Sind particularly is so very anxious to be hospitable to officers whom he had never seen before and whom he is not likely to see again that he will not accept any payment for all the services that he renders them. I am afraid, however, that, as the Honourable Mr. LAWRENCE has admitted, there is an object in all this vociferous hospitality that the zemindars show. I believe that the Honourable Mr. LAWRENCE as well as the honourable mover of the resolution has made out a very clear case for an enquiry. The Honourable Mr. BHURGRI says that these practices constitute a very great hardship to the people. The Honourable Mr. LAWRENCE has told us that they result in great loss to Government; so that from both points of view, from the point of view of the people and from the point of view of Government, there has been made out a clear case for enquiry.

As regards the remarks of the Honourable Khán Bahádur Pir BAKSH, I am tempted to think that he is more royalist than the king himself. The Honourable Mr. LAWRENCE admits that to a certain extent the evil does exist, whereas the Honourable Khán Bahádur PIR BAKSH thinks that there is no evil at all.

The Honourable Khán Bahádur PIR BAKSH :—Not as regards lapo.

The Honourable Mr. PARANJPYE :—The Honourable Mr. LAWRENCE has told us that he has appointed supervisors, but I would ask him "who watches the watchmen themselves?" If these supervisors get a share of the illegal exactions some other and better machinery has got to be provided for stopping all these evils. So I think a clear case has been made out for an enquiry; but I think the Honourable Mr. PATEL'S amendment should not be carried, but I would rather vote for the Honourable Mr. BHURGRI's resolution, because it wants that a public enquiry of the nature suggested should be conducted and the committee might suggest methods in preference to those which the Honourable Mr. LAWRENCE says are being used, because admittedly they are not proving very effectual.

With these words I beg to support the resolution of the Honourable Mr. BHURGRI.

The Honourable Mr. P. R. CADELL—Your Excellency,—As a member of the Council who has perhaps done more touring in Sind than any other member of this Council with the exception of the Honourable Mr. LAWRENCE, I may be allowed to say a few words in support of the remarks just made by that gentleman. I must, in the first place, point out that this is a very difficult subject for members of the Council who have not been in Sind to understand. This is proved by the Honourable Mr. PATEL'S remarks. He apparently imagines, for example, after hearing the honourable mover's speech, that lapo is a fund got up for entertaining officers. Of course it is nothing of the kind. I did not hear the whole of the Honourable Mr. BHURGRI'S speech, but he has been good enough to let me read his own copy of it. I can only say that if other honourable members were able to follow that speech, they must have been most seriously misled. Take for example the question of rasai, i. e., the procuring of supplies for officers on tour. He alleges an instance of an officer being supplied with all articles on tour, including fowls and eggs, at a cost of a rupee per diem, and says that that is a typical case of rasai. I say that if the case is true at all it is not a typical case of rasai but it is a case of corruption. I gather from the honourable gentleman that the officer was not a European. Perhaps the honourable gentleman will tell us whether he was a Hindu or a Mahomedan and what rank he held.

The question of rasai is undoubtedly one of considerable difficulty. The honourable mover's remarks about the hospitality of the zemindars seem to have caused amusement to some members of this Council, among others to the Honourable Mr. PARANJPYE, who apparently cannot believe that such hospitality can exist. All I say is that the Honourable Mr. PARANJPYE does not know the spirit of the Baluch. It is perfectly true that it is extremely difficult to get a Baluch zemindar to accept payment for what he regards as a gift or to understand that it is improper for an officer to accept anything without payment. But, even where payment is readily accepted, it is extremely difficult to see that payment reaches the proper person. This is due to the petty corruption of subordinates, particularly the tapedars. We know the evil to exist and it is an evil which can be met only by constant supervision and constant care. That care and attention is being given by the Commissioner in Sind.

As regards lapo, the honourable mover adduced no evidence for his statement that it is derived from rasai and the statement is on the face of it absurd. Lapo is not only a much bigger but a much more ancient thing than rasai. As the Honourable Mr. LAWRENCE pointed out, lapo has in Upper Sind the perfectly legitimate sense of a rent or cess levied by the zemindar on land occupied by his tenant. It has now obtained the derived and improper sense of a percentage taken by the tapedar from the zemindar. The latter often does not regard it as extortion, but as a mere extra rate, which it is worth while to pay to the tapedar. The unfortunate thing about lapo is that it is lucrative both to the zemindar and to the tapedar. The latter reports the land to be uncultivated or unirrigated or to have a poor crop. The zemindar benefits by much more than the amount of lapo he pays to the tapedar. The only sufferer is Government, that is, the public revenue. It is undoubtedly a serious evil, and one that must be prevented. But at any rate it is an evil which does not injure the zemindar, in most cases, but Government.

As regards cherr or forced labour, the account given by the honourable mover was so lurid that it made the Honourable Thakor of Kerwada marvel that such things were possible under British rule. I have no hesitation in saying that that account is a ridiculous exaggeration. I shall try to bring home to members not acquainted with Sind what this amount of labour really means. In Sind the labour for preparing a camp and pitching tents for a district officer on tour is less than in the Presidency proper for the sole reason that at least in a good many places in Sind there are camping grounds already prepared at the expense of Government for the camping of Government officers. Honourable members know that prepared camping grounds are rare in the Presidency proper, and that when district officers visit a place it is necessary to have a camping ground prepared before they encamp; but no one has ever thought of complaining that the small amount of labour involved is a serious hardship for the villagers.

The Honourable Mr. BHURGRI:—What about roads?

The Honourable Mr. CADELL:—I am coming to the roads. It is perfectly true that roads are occasionally prepared for officers, but who gets the benefit of them? the district officer who merely goes from one place to another or the people who use the roads constantly? And it must be remembered that in some cases the zemindars are responsible to the local boards for the upkeep of portions of roads. The condition, or rather the absence, of roads in Sind is undoubtedly a hardship. There are, of course, great natural difficulties in maintaining them but it would be a very good thing if the Honourable Mr. BHURGRI would pay attention to the subject. But that has nothing to do with the question of rasai, lapo and cherr.

But honourable members may well ask why the Honourable Mr. BHURGRI should have made so misleading and inaccurate a speech. I cannot help feeling after reading the Honourable Mr. BHURGRI'S speech that he is attacking the system of officers' touring. Gentlemen like the honourable mover do not like the touring system. They do not wish officers to go round to ascertain the condition and wants of the people. In respect of touring, however, the Presidency system does not differ from that in Sind. The touring system, that is to say, the obligation on officers of Government to travel in their charges for seven months in the year, is the foundation of our Bombay system of government. It was, I believe, as a historical fact, introduced by that great administrator Sir Thomas Munro.

who brought it from Madras. It was, and I hope still is, known as the "Char Darwaze Kole", the system of the four open doors. It was and is literally true that the tents of officers are always open to the people in places near their homes. That system has continued and exists I believe more in Bombay than in any other part of India, with the possible exception of Madras, and I believe it to be one of the principal causes of the success of our district system. I would point out to honourable members that if Indians are going to have a larger share in the administration, if, for example, the Brahman from the Deccan is to be employed in Upper Sind, it will be not less but more necessary that the system should prevail, and I hope it will always continue. It is perfectly true that this system means a severe tax on the time of officers and their establishment; it is true that these establishments are liable sometimes to become a burden; but I say that the good of the system far outweighs the evil. I remember once when I was a Collector in Upper Sind, I once checked the average number of petitions that were given me by hand in one particular tract and I found that it was between 80 and 90 a day. It may be imagined what trouble and time were saved to the people by this opportunity of giving petitions. Honourable members may take that as a sample of how an officer's touring in Sind is appreciated. As the Honourable Mr. GHULAM HUSSEIN HIDAYATALLAH said, communication is very difficult in Sind. Apart from the opportunity given to the poorer classes to petition, the big zemindars are glad to see the officer coming round and it is in the interests of administration that he should go round. To attempt to destroy the touring system because of the admitted difficulty of supplies would be a great mistake. The difficulty, as I have said, does exist, but it is now very much better in Sind than in the old pre-British days or even than it was a few years ago. It is almost impossible to eradicate that evil altogether, but it can best be reduced by the measures which the Honourable Mr. LAWRENCE has sketched. It would be very unfortunate if gentlemen like the Honourable THAKOR SAHEB OF KERWADA were led by the honourable mover's speech to think that the evil is increasing or that the touring of officers, particularly in Sind, causes serious hardship; I think that is absolutely untrue. I think that the best way of meeting this evil would be to strengthen the hands of the Commissioner; to bring home to the zemindars, notwithstanding their notions of dignity, that payment for supplies must be taken; to bring home to them still more that payments to tapedars whether in the form of lapo or otherwise are illegal; and also to make tapedars understand that the taking of illegal gratifications is dangerous; while at the same time, as the Honourable Mr. LAWRENCE has said, taking steps to improve the tapedar's pay and prospects.

The Honourable Mr. F. G. PRATT:—Your Excellency,—I would like to add my testimony to that of the Sind officers who preceded me. I have served in Sind for a good many years and have done a fair amount of touring there. The last time I served in Sind was in 1905, and I remember that one of the first things that I did after taking over charge of the Hyderabad district was to deal with a case in which an assistant collector in the course of trying certain income-tax appeals had seen the books of certain village banias and on looking at those books had found evidence that a number of tapedars and supervising tapedars had been taking illegal gratifications of the nature included in the term lapo. He held careful departmental enquiries into the matter and the case came to me, and one of the first things which I had to do in the district was to pass an order of dismissal at one stroke of about six tapedars and one supervising tapedar. That was twelve years ago.

Well, sir, in the discussions which we have heard today, I do not think that those who have spoken in favour of this resolution have made it clear, as they ought to have made it clear, that this evil is on the increase. I think the facts are exactly in the other direction. This evil has long been recognised and Government and has been receiving continuous attention from touring officers, by supervising officers in Sind, and not only in the province of Sind but in the other parts of the Presidency also; I think it is incumbent upon those who ask the Council to give their time to a discussion of this question to show that the matter is not receiving sufficient attention, that the evil is on the increase, or is not being adequately dealt with. We contend that Government officers are well aware that it is an evil which is deeply rooted in the habits of the population of this country and in the subordinate Indian officials of this country, and that it is only through increased enlightenment that this evil can be remedied. It is only by the people more and more co-operating with the officers of Government to put a stop to these practices that we will get any improvement. I think it is unquestionable that this evil has very greatly decreased during the last 20 years, and that decrease is due to the continuous attention which it has been receiving from Government officers.

I would like to add a word or two also as to what the Honourable Mr. CADELL was saying just now about the touring system. One disadvantage, I venture to suggest, that an unnecessary discussion of this kind has is that it produces an idea that the touring system is a monstrous system which villagers who are very easily misled in this matter would be justified in hindering or opposing; I have recently received information from at least one of the districts in my division that the tour of the collector has been hindered by organised opposition to such a trifling requirement as the carts required to move his kit for the purpose of travelling from camp to camp. Now, sir, without such touring, the administration of this country could not be carried on well. It was only yesterday that a member of this Council spoke to me personally about a matter in which he was interested in one of the larger districts of the Northern Division. It was with regard to the question of a burial ground in which the Hindus and Muhammadans were in conflict with each other. As I happened to be there on the spot, I took the opportunity of seeing the place and I heard what both sides had to say in the matter. If officers do not tour, such questions cannot properly be investigated and if such questions are not investigated the result would be likely to be serious disturbance and perhaps a riot and disorder in the village.

The Honourable Mr. G. CARMICHAEL:—Your Excellency,—I confess that I have no acquaintance with Sind itself, except on paper, and I feel a difficulty in discussing this particular subject without local knowledge. The Honourable Mr. PATEL and a good many others who have spoken on the subject are in the same position as myself in that respect. The honourable member proposes that the resolution should be amended so as to recommend that measures be taken to suppress this undesirable state of affairs, but he himself does not suggest any measures, and I find as the Honourable Mr. LAWRENCE and the Honourable Mr. CADELL have pointed out, that none of the members who really know the actual state of things in Sind make any suggestion at all with regard to any particular measure. They recommend that the question should be investigated first of all. None of them are prepared to say that any particular measure should be applied.

The Honourable Mr. BHURGRI suggests that the system of officers' touring is at the root of this evil and goes on to argue that if touring were to be put a stop to, the evil would stop.

The Honourable Mr. BHURGRI:—What I say is that there is a good deal of touring apart from necessary touring. That might be curtailed. I have not said that touring should be abolished.

The Honourable Mr. CARMICHAEL:—It is very difficult to ascertain what the honourable member means by unnecessary touring.

The Honourable Mr. BHURGRI:—There are certain periods fixed by Government under certain rules for the touring of a collector, assistant collector or district superintendent of police. Of course, I can understand that they have to do this touring in connection with their work. But in many cases a good deal of unnecessary touring is done and this may be curtailed to some extent.

The Honourable Mr. CARMICHAEL:—I think he must leave it to the collector and to the assistant collector to decide what amount of touring is necessary in order to complete the work which he has to do. You cannot tie down his conscience and say that he should not do any particular work if he feels that it is his duty to do it.

The Honourable SHEIKH GHULAM HUSSEIN HIDAYATALLAH made out that as a matter of fact the custom of rasai and lapo has had its origin from a date long before the advent of British rule in Sind. It is a legacy from ancient times and it is a legacy which perhaps in some form or other existed when the British Government came into other parts of India. The difficulty with regard to Sind is that the conditions there are peculiar, particularly with regard to the method of cultivation. The cultivation there is dependent on irrigation and the method of land settlement which has been found most suitable for Sind is different from that in the Presidency. These conditions are special and there are others too, as the Honourable Mr. LAWRENCE pointed out, such as the rarity of bania shops. These conditions have made it a very difficult matter to diminish the evils arising out of the ancient customs which were found to exist when the country was taken over by the British. In other parts of the Presidency I think there is no doubt that the success of the British administration in purifying the atmosphere has been much greater and more rapid than in Sind, but that is no reason why we should despair of reaching in Sind the same standard which has been obtained in this matter in the other parts of the Presidency proper. In any area which has to depend on irrigation for cultivation, there is no doubt that it is very difficult to suppress an evil of the nature of lapo, even in the Presidency proper; I may say that one of the measures which will tend to reduce the dependence of the zemindar on the tapedar is a more regular and systematic cultivation of land and greater control over the water supply and the possibility of selling water in bulk. When these improvements are achieved in Sind, the evil of lapo at least would practically be stopped. The zemindar will then have nothing for which to look to the tapedar, the tapedar would not be able to do anything for the zemindar in return for the lapo and I presume the zemindar would not pay him. But that is looking a long way ahead. In the meantime we have to deal with matters as we find them. There is no doubt that the evil does exist. The Honourable Mr. PRATT and the Honourable Khán Bahádur PIR BAKSH have told us that it has diminished, that it is still decreasing owing to the action which has been taken by Government or rather by the Commissioner in Sind under the instructions of Government. The matter came prominently to the notice of Government in 1902 and Government took certain measures at that time which have had, I believe, a great effect in diminishing the evil results of this practice. There is still more to be done and personally I am inclined to agree with the Honourable SHEIKH GHULAM HUSSEIN and the Honourable Mr. CADELL that the best way might be to leave it to the Commissioner in Sind to devise measures and to maintain constant vigilance in suppressing the evil practice wherever it can be found out. I am inclined to think that that would be the best method of dealing with the question, but if this Council is of opinion that the enquiry recommended in the Honourable Mr. BHURGRI'S resolution would be a better method, then I can assure them that Government will be prepared to accept that recommendation and act upon it and have a public enquiry held. At the same time the measures taken by the Commissioner in Sind will be proceeded with simultaneously.

The great difficulty is to secure the co-operation of the zemindars themselves. The Honourable Mr. PARANJPYE rather mocked at the hospitality of the zemindars. I do not think that his remarks would be appreciated very much, in fact, I am sure that they would be resented by a great many of these zemindars. That is one of the difficulties which has to be faced in dealing with this problem.

The other difficulty is, as the Honourable Mr. LAWRENCE pointed out, that of securing the co-operation of the zemindars and of preventing them from depending on the tapedars.

The Honourable MR. LAWRENCE has referred to the proposals which he has submitted to Government for the improvement of the pay of the tapedar. His proposals Government are disposed to regard with favour and they are being taken up. In this direction I think I can safely say that the necessity of obtaining a better staff is a matter of considerable urgency. We have seen the results which have been obtained in the Presidency proper when these improvements have been carried out, and there is no doubt that at the present day in the Presidency proper—I speak of that part of the Presidency which I know best—there has been a very great improvement in this matter in all branches of the revenue service, if we compare the condition of things as they exist now and as they existed say 30 years ago. But the possible advantage of having a committee, which is recommended by the Honourable Mr. BHURGRI, is that the attention of the zemindars themselves would be focussed on the problem and we may hope, by stimulating them, to obtain much greater co-operation in this particular matter than has been obtained in the past. So if this Council is in favour of the Honourable Mr. BHURGRI'S recommendation, I say that Government are prepared to accept it and to act upon it. I do not think that the amendment proposed by the Honourable Mr. PATEL should be accepted, because no one has any measures to suggest and no non-official member who has spoken has any definite measure to recommend.

The Honourable Mr. PATEL:—I understand that Government is going to accept the resolution of my honourable friend Mr. BHURGRI. In that case I withdraw my amendment.

The Honourable Mr. GHULAM MAHOMED walad Khan Bahadur WALI MAHOMED BHURGRI:—Your Excellency,—It is only left for me to thank the honourable member in charge for accepting my resolution. There are, however, a few remarks which I should like to make in reply to certain objections. First it has been urged that the meaning I have attached to the words rasai, lapo and cherr is misleading. I have only to say that the meaning I have given these words is the meaning which these words actually convey to the people. Then, my resolution has been construed into an attack on the touring system. But I have made it clear in my opening speech and in my statement during the course of my honourable friend Mr. CARMICHAEL'S speech that all that I have contended is that there is a great deal of unnecessary touring, which might profitably be curtailed. Further, the remarks which have fallen from officers who have been in Sind and know Sind seem to imply that I have drawn rather a gloomy picture. But I can assure this Council that, far from the picture being gloomy or exaggerated, my presentment of the situation has been made with studied care and moderation, and that, if anything, it rather understates the truth. It has also been urged that the present system has been working well. But I can state with certainty, from my personal knowledge as a zemindar, that the present state of things is worse than the old, as the burden which formerly rested on the shoulders of many has now fallen on the shoulders of one. Then it has been objected that the instance I have given is not a typical case, and that the officer in question was not a European. But I can assure this Council that the case is, by no means, an isolated case, and that I know of far worse cases involving even European officers; but I have studiously avoided being dragged into personalities.

RASAI, LAPO AND CHERR IN SIND.

[Mr. Ghulam Muhammad Bhurgri; the President.] [6TH DECEMBER 1917.]

As regards lapo, my honourable friend Mr. LAWRENCE has tried to make out that lapo is quite separate and unconnected with rasai. But I maintain that this is not the case. Else, how comes it that lapo is levied only by those subordinate officers who have to do with rasai, such as the tapedar and the darogah? In regard to lapo, it has also been contended that zemindars pay lapo with a view to obtain some benefit for themselves from the tapedar. It is alleged that tapedars are sometimes known to enter cultivated numbers as uncultivated, and thus cause damage to Government revenue. I asked my honourable friend Mr. LAWRENCE how many such cases had come to his notice, but I received no reply. The pity is that the poor zemindar is mulcted, and, at the same time, a grievance is made against him that he profits at the expense of Government.

In regard to cherr an attempt has been made to show that there is no such thing in Sind. It has been contended that camping grounds are kept ready for officials in Sind, and that all that the people are asked to do is to give their labour for a very short time only. I asked my honourable friend Mr. CADELL how about roads. He replied that officials only used these for a short time, and that the people alternately stood to benefit from them. But if such a proposition is once accepted, why then not abolish the Public Works and other departments and get all work for the public good done by forced labour.

Finally, I would repeat that rasai and lapo can be stopped if only a determined effort is made by the officers of Government. As I have said before, lapo is collected by those subordinate officers who have to arrange for rasai, that is, the tapedar. Now, the tapedar is only a subordinate officer, and if he has not got the support of his superior, the Mukhtyarkar, he will find it difficult to impose lapo. The Mukhtyarkar will only give his support when he knows that he must depend on his subordinate officer for the collection of rasai. Hence, I am confident that, if superior officers make their intentions clear in the matter, rasai and lapo will be stopped. They have been stopped in the past by a few officers who have endeavoured to do so. I can give the names of Mr. Monie, Mr. Beyts, Mr. Moysey, Mr. Coverntoh and of other officers who have tried, and successfully, to stop the evil. And what was the secret of their success? It was that they impressed upon the Mukhtyarkars and their subordinate officers that they would not tolerate any nonsense like rasai and lapo. Well, if all officers of Government were to act likewise, rasai and lapo would be no more. With these words, I again thank the honourable member in charge for accepting my resolution.

His Excellency the PRESIDENT:—I have only one word to add. In the first place, I am glad to find that the Honourable Mr PATEL has had the wisdom to withdraw his amendment. With his considerable knowledge of Sind he moved his amendment, apparently thinking that no measures were ever taken by the Commissioners in the past or in the present to try and remove what is admitted to be a serious difficulty. He must know that measures are being taken, measures have been taken in the past, and that this is a question of extraordinary difficulty which Commissioners one after another have been trying to grapple with. I should like to endorse what my honourable colleague has said with regard to the remark that fell from the Honourable Mr. PARANJPYE. I own that I thought that his remark, that the zemindar showed his hospitality with an object, was an extremely ungenerous one. I can safely say from my personal experience—and I think it will be the experience of all gentlemen who go and tour in Sind—that the zemindar is a most open-handed and generous person and, as far as I am individually concerned, I have never found, directly or indirectly, that he ever showed me any hospitality with any object in view.

Government's position, as my honourable colleague has said, is that we are perfectly satisfied in our own minds that the Commissioner in Sind and his officers are doing everything that they possibly can to get rid of this admittedly serious evil. But I hope my honourable friend Mr. BHURGRI will not take it hardly if I say that he and a good many of his friends have been continually representing what I have sometimes read in newspaper reports, the rather shocking behaviour of officials in regard to these matters; having regard to that fact and in order to satisfy him, Government are perfectly ready to have this committee appointed, of officials and non-officials, to enquire into the whole matter and if, which I own I very much doubt, they find the golden way to get rid of these difficulties which have taxed the ingenuity of the various Commissioners in Sind for the last 20 years, nobody will be more gratified than the Commissioner in Sind himself and the Government of Bombay. That is the position in which we stand in accepting the resolution of the honourable member.

The resolution was then put to the vote and carried.

His Excellency the PRESIDENT: Resolution No. 14. The Honourable Mr. KAMAT.

The Honourable Mr. BALKRISHNA SITARAM KAMAT:—May it please your Excellency. The resolution which I wish to place before this Council for its favourable consideration is to the effect that

"This Council recommends that the Governor in Council may be pleased to direct that there should be held periodically in each division of the Presidency a Divisional conference to which may be invited Heads of Departments and non-officials of standing from the districts concerned, with power to them to move recommendatory resolutions on matters of public interest in each division, under a prescribed procedure."

I shall indicate to this Council what I believe would be the composition of these divisional conferences and also what should be the functions and powers of their members and also indicate what I expect to be the advantages to be derived from these conferences and their resolutions.

As mentioned in the text of the resolution itself I believe this conference should be composed of non-officials of standing from the districts concerned and among them I include non-official members of the Legislative Council residing in the division. So also they should invite to this conference the presidents and vice-presidents of the municipalties and local boards. Similarly a few Inamdars and Jahagirdars and such other persons who take interest in public matters. This is so far as non-officials are concerned.

On behalf of the officials I believe that the conference should be composed of the Commissioner, the Collector of the districts concerned, and heads of departments, such as the medioal, educational and so on.

The advantage of having a conference like this held periodically would be, in the first place, a very free and frank interchange of opinion between the officers and men of light and leading in the districts. I believe that it will cut short a great deal of the correspondence that goes on on trivial matters between the various heads of departments and also in the same department from the smallest to the highest officer in the ladder. Another effect of a conference like this would be to decentralize and to reduce the work of the Legislative Council here. I shall illustrate how that would be done. For instance, we had yesterday a resolution with regard to forest passes. When that resolution was moved by my honourable friend Mr. GARUD the Commissioner of the Division, my honourable friend Mr. SEDDON, said he had no opportunity to consider that proposition. Now, if a divisional conference like the one I suggest were held and if honourable members like my honourable friend Mr. GARUD were given an opportunity to bring all the facts to the notice of the Commissioner with regard to matters of smaller importance, I think a question of that sort would be solved on the spot. At any rate the Commissioner would be in a position to give an explanation and if he refers questions to the heads of departments, the head of that particular department to which the subject belonged, if present at the conference, may also be in a position to give an explanation. So that the proposition would be solved more easily than by the present method of correspondence.

I should indicate also what sort of resolutions might be moved in a conference like this. I know that at present there are conferences organized by Government and held in the districts. There are co-operative conferences and conferences regarding agricultural questions, to which non-official members are invited; but these conferences concern themselves only with questions such as co-operation, agricultural matters and some such things. In a conference which I propose, I believe various questions could be discussed. If I may indicate the list of questions, I think members could take up, say, questions about forest grievances, questions connected with the irrigation department about matters which are found to work harshly upon cultivators, questions about the location of liquor shops, questions regarding the subordinate police officers as to whether they are to be reduced or increased and such sort of things.

Similarly, members could be at liberty to propose resolutions in a conference like this, say, on questions of remission and suspension of land revenue at a particular time of famine or scarcity. Then again, they may also suggest means for the prevention of severe epidemics like plague and so on. So also if members wanted more schools in the division and if the head of the educational department be present at the conference, I believe, he would be in a position to give an explanation as to whether such schools are necessary or are unnecessary. I believe all such questions regarding the educational department, revenue department, police department, could be tackled in a conference of the nature I suggest. This is so far as regards the list of subjects to be taken in a conference like the one I suggest.

But the greatest advantage of this conference whould be to associate people with the regular administration of the province and to bring them into closer contact with officers than they are at present, and this, I think, would be the greatest advantage so far as improvements in the district are concerned. Now in the Presidency those gentlemen who get the advantage of coming into close contact with the administrative problems are very few indeed. Whereas if a conference of a division were held and if people from the districts were allowed to move resolutions there and thus to bring to the notice of Government officers certain petty grievances of either particular or a general nature, I believe they would be more educated to tackle administrative questions, and this is exactly what I want to be done by the sort of a conference I propose and this I claim to be the greatest advantage of my proposal.

Then I have to bring to the notice of this Council that I have an analogy and a precedent to quote in favour of the suggestions which I make and that is from the Report of the Decentralization Commission. In paragraph 522 of the Report of the Royal Commission upon Decentralization in India, it is stated: "Conferences of this nature are held in the Province of Bengal. A conference lasting about a fortnight is held there every autumn, and is attended not merely by Commissioners of divisions, but by the members of the Board of Revenue, the Secretaries to Government and heads of Provinicial Departments. Non-officials of standing, such as members of the Legislative Council, are also invited to attend during the discussion of particular subjects in respect of which their views would be useful; and their opinions appear on the records of the conference, though they do not vote as members." Of course I differ from this last measure; on the contrary I further recommend that instead of not being allowed to vote, I think that they should be in these days empowered to move resolutions. The Report further states in paragraph 523: "We recommend the extension to other provinces of a system somewhat similar to that which has been adopted in Bengal. A conference of this sort, bringing Commissioners into periodical touch with one another and with the officials at headquarters, as also with non-official gentlemen of standing, gives great assistance in the disposal of matters which would otherwise take up much correspondence, and affords opportunity for full and friendly interchange of opinion." I therefore think that we should have in this Presidency the trial of an experiment which has been tried in Bengal and which has been found successful there and which has had the favourable recommendation of the Commissioners of the Royal Commission upon Decentralization.

The Honourable Mr. CURTIS:—What is the date of the Commission's Report?

The Honourable Mr. KAMAT:—25th February 1909.

I know in this Presidency there are occasionally held conferences of Commissioners only and they are probably restricted to questions of administration relating to the divisions. No non-official members are allowed at those conferences. I think, your Excellency, the time has arrived to go a step further and that Government should take the public into their confidence; especially those who take an interest in public questions should have their say on special questions like this and Government ought to allow the leading members in the division to associate themselves with the problems which are coming before them from time to time and are found very difficult for solution, as for instance the one we found this morning.

This is the object with which I bring forward this proposition and I trust honourable members of this Council will find that it would be of a very great advantage. I know I shall be told that there are the district durbars which are held occasionally. But such durbars are more or less intended for districts only. There only the Collector of the district is present and not the heads of other departments and the only right allowed to the non-official members is that of interpellation. I go further and say that the time has arrived when non-official members who have the right of interpellation at present already ought also to have the right of moving resolutions and raising discussions regarding public questions and if possible of focussing opinion both on official and non-official side. With this sort of opinion expressed in the divisional conference Government might be in a better position to shape their policy and solve difficult questions regarding the matters of principle. With this object I have moved my resolution and I trust the Council will accept it.

The Honourable Mr. C. N. SEDDON:—Your Excellency,—Being a somewhat fully occupied official I wish to say that I have listened to the speech of my honourable friend Mr. KAMAT with feelings akin to dismay. We have been occupied in this Council here for four days and unless, a very improbable contingency, the Honourable Mr. PATEL will omit a whole block of resolutions or unless —a more likely event—your Excellency will exercise your prerogative of mercy and allow us to go I see no reason why we should not be here for another four days or more. Honourable members will see from this what an amount of time is taken up in discussion, and the legal department, I am sure, will be able to explain better than I can what a deal of labour is required to prepare for this Council. This little book, which is a book of questions and answers, takes a very short time indeed merely to put upon the table, but it takes a very long time of all the officers of Government to prepare. Now my honourable friend proposes that there should be another conference, another Council, held, at which the Commissioners should preside and at which other officials should attend. I think that unless he makes out a very strong case the amount of labour which it would necessarily entail and the amount of time to prepare for such a conference will be a very serious matter, and I would appeal to honourable members to refrain from throwing this extra burden on officers of Government. I admit that the honourable member's intention is excellent. He wishes to provide additional facilities for the ventilation of grievances and for the submission of proposals, but I cannot imagine myself what possible grievances there can be which cannot be dealt with by the machinery now existing, or what proposals remain concealed from Government and Government officers at present. Nor do I think there is the least likelihood of work in this Council being reduced. I cannot imagine that honourable members will, because they attended a conference held under the comparatively lowly presidentship of the Commissioner, deny themselves the pleasure of asking questions or moving resolutions in the Provincial Council. The Honourable Mr. KAMAT says that complaints can be brought and settled quickly by this conference, and he instances the Honourable Mr. GARUD'S complaint regarding the removal of forest produce yesterday. There was nothing to prevent the Honourable Mr. GARUD in the ordinary way from putting forward his complaint by addressing the local officers of Government. If he could not do that now he could not do that any more if he had a Commissioners' conference. The contention that I brought yesterday was that although the door was open he had not chosen to use it.

Then another object which the honourable gentleman has put forward is this: that by this divisional conference, the officers of Government, the Commissioners and others, will be brought into closer contact with the people. Well, we think that in Bombay this object is attained by our touring system. We think that by our touring and going to every district the Collectors and Commissioners and the Assistant Collectors, and, in fact, all officials, do come into close contact with everybody in the remotest corner of the district. The difference will be this. That if we give up this touring system and adopt the divisional conference system the people who will take part in those conferences will not be the people with whom the officers come into contact now. They will not be actually the people but the representatives of the people.

Now with regard to the Commissioners' conference, which exists I am told in Bengal, and which is recommended by the Decentralization Commission, in the first place, it is a different sort of conference altogether, and, in the second place, it is such, as my honourable friend recommends here, that it would do away with touring. In Bengal there is practically no touring. Perhaps, such a conference may be needed there, but we do not require it here so long as the officers do come into touch with the people in their district.

There are certain other objections to the divisional conference here. The division is not a unit of administration. It is not a unit but it is a mere collection of districts. If we had a divisional conference of the Northern Division we should have there people from Thana, Ahmedabad etc., who have really nothing in common at all. In the Southern Division, the people of Ratnagiri would meet the people of Dharwar and Belgaum and they won't even understand one another because they speak totally different languages. For this reason I think it is the district durbar which is really the proper body to discuss matters. A few weeks ago I was present at a durbar held at Satara, and I was very much impressed by the usefulness of the work done in that durbar, the free discussion and the general clearing up of difficulties that took place there. If you have a divisional conference nobody will want to attend a district durbar. I submit you ought to make as much as possible of the district durbar, and I submit you should not reduce its utility by having a divisional conference.

One thing more. There is no salvation in the multiplication of conferences. We have already conferences of every kind. We have agricultural, co-operative, social, educational, industrial, provincial, and political. In any case what we want is not so many conferences, not so much talk but more action, and no further additions to the already long list of conferences would prove of any use. With these words I beg to oppose the resolution.

The Honourable Khán Bahádur PIR BAKSH walad MIAN MAHMUD:—Your Excellency,—We are all aware that each division of the Presidency is sufficiently represented by honourable members on the Council. We fully know the grievances, the wants and the sentiments of the people, at least these are brought to the notice of all honourable members by the public and are placed by the honourable members in this Council for discussion. In support of this argument I would only respectfully invite your Excellency's attention to the number and the variety of the resolutions which are discussed here at each and every session. The collectors of the districts, the divisional commissioners and other executive and administrative officers of Government are touring about in their divisions, listening to the people and bringing the grievances and wants of the people in general to the notice of Government either by means of special references or by annual reports. The adoption of this resolution would mean merely the creation of a branch of this Council in each and every division and to invest them with powers which are now exercised by honourable members of this Council. I might add here that we are thankful to the several newspapers that bring to our notice the views of the public. We know that we have now a conference on each and every subject in the Presidency, and therefore there is no necessity for any further conferences.

DIVISIONAL CONFERENCES.

[6TH DECEMBER 1917.] [Khán Bahádur Pir Baksh; Mr. Raghunath Purshottam Paranjpye; Mr. G. S. Curtis; the President.]

For these reasons I oppose the resolution.

The Honourable Mr. RAGHUNATH PURSHOTTAM PARANJPYE:—Your Excellency,—While sympathising with the object of the resolution of my honourable friend Mr. KAMAT, I would like to have it altered in the following form:—

"This Council recommends that His Excellency the Governor in Council may be pleased to direct that there should be constituted a District Council in each district with a substantial elective majority which should meet periodically and have powers to move recommendatory resolutions on matters of public interest under prescribed regulations and procedure."

The Honourable Mr. CURTIS:—I rise to a point of order. I submit that it is entirely a different question.

His Excellency the PRESIDENT:—Order, order. I cannot accept the amendment, because the Honourable Mr. PARANJPYE is suggesting an elected conference, which is quite a different thing to what my honourable friend Mr. KAMAT proposes. I hope honourable members will not feel that I am exceeding my powers, but I would like to suggest that it is desirable, as far as possible, to keep to the original resolution and not, as some one put it, continually try to move amendment after amendment. The resolutions should be put as they are and not with minor alterations.

The Honourable Mr. PARANJPYE:—I propose then an amendment in the following form:—

"This Council recommends that the Governor in Council may be pleased to direct that there should be held periodically in each district of the Presidency a District Conference to which may be invited heads of departments and non-officials of standing from the districts concerned with power to them to move recommendatory resolutions on matters of public interest in each district, under a prescribed procedure."

Your Excellency, this is a very small amendment that I am moving, because I feel the full force of the Honourable Mr. SEDDON'S remarks that the division is not the unit of administration.

The district durbars at present, your Excellency, are of a very informal and irregular nature and there are no resolutions submitted at the district durbars. The collectors can ask anybody and need not ask anybody, but the Honourable

Mr. KAMAT'S resolution, if restricted to durbars, will regularise, at least to a certain extent, the procedure at these durbars. I would like to go a little further, but at the same time it would be a great improvement on the resolution if the district is used instead of the division.

I do not agree with the Honourable Mr. SEDDON when he says that the work of this Council will not be at all relieved. I think the work of this Council will be a good deal relieved if these durbars are more regularised, and if these durbars properly regularised are given more opportunities for the proper ventilation of grievances. If one looks to the number of resolutions moved and the questions asked in this Council, it will be found that a great many matters dealt with in them are purely of a local interest. When resolutions of local interest of this sort are sent to the secretary to the Legislative Council, occasionally we are told that the matter is purely of a local interest and therefore it is disallowed. Now this state of things cannot happen if there are district durbars with powers to the members to move resolutions and bring forward their grievances before these durbars. I therefore think that at least half the work of the Legislative Council will be diminished and transferred to the district durbars if they are properly organised and if they are given a suitable status in the administration of this Presidency. I think however that the people that are called to the durbars require a good deal of encouragement. At present some people are asked who ought not to be asked to attend and other people who ought to be asked are occasionally not asked to attend, and I must protest against the remark of the Honourable Mr. SEDDON when he said that the honourable members of this Council would not care for the lowly atmosphere of a divisional or district conference and would like, if I may paraphrase his words, to advertise themselves even in this Council. I do not think so at all. I think the non-official members of this Council want to have questions ventilated and this is the only forum at which they can do so and therefore it is that we are compelled to bring them here, but if they can be brought forward by the people who actually feel the grievances in the districts as the units of administration, I think the work of this Council will be greatly diminished.

There is another thing which is a usual thing in the official mind and it is their great aversion for publicity. The Honourable Mr. SEDDON does not want these things to be made public. He wants all these things to be private. I think "light and more light" is the necessity of all our administration, and a great deal of the difficulty could be removed if this procedure were followed to a greater extent. Therefore I hope that the Honourable Mr. KAMAT will accept this amendment. The late Mr. GOKHALE had proposed a similar resolution in the Imperial Legislative Council which was not accepted, but I think we have moved further on since the time that resolution was moved, and I think the present time might be propitious for this resolution to be accepted.

The Honourable Mr. DATTATRAYA VENKATESH BELVI :—Your Excellency,—I regret my inability to accept the amendment which has been proposed by my honourable friend Mr. PARANJPYE. We find that durbars are held at present almost every year in every district of the Presidency and I do not understand what more will be got by accepting the amendment of the Honourable Mr. PARANJPYE. On the contrary, I think that the suggestion made by the Honourable Mr. KAMAT is one which deserves our serious consideration. I am aware of the fact that my honourable friend Mr. SEDDON has said that divisional commissioners are very hard-worked officers and they may not find the necessary time to hold such conferences. That is an argument which has got much force in it; but at the same time we should remember that even divisional commissioners do get time during the rains to convene such conferences as are suggested by my honourable friend Mr. KAMAT. The experiment suggested is worth making and I make no doubt that such a conference will give an opportunity to the leading gentlemen of each district to meet at least once a year in the headquarters of the division or in one of the district towns of the division and to compare notes as to how things are going on in their district. The leading gentlemen of the different districts constituting the division will get an opportunity of speaking to the commissioner about the grievances which may be prevalent in the different districts, in the presence of the heads of the different departments. I shall make plainer what I mean. Supposing we have a grievance against the forest department, is it not better that we should ventilate our grievance in the presence of the commissioner when the forest officers themselves are there to discuss and to give their explanations? Is it not better to have such an informal and friendly discussion in the presence of the commissioner and the forest officer, instead of putting a series of questions in this Council, to which we find very often unsatisfactory answers are given? An informal discussion in a conference under the presidency of a commissioner will in my opinion lead to much good, and I do not understand my honourable friend Mr. KAMAT to say that such a conference should be held once in a month or once in two months. In my opinion if is sufficient if it is held once in the whole year during the monsoon. Such a thing will not cost the commissioner much time; but on the contrary it will give to the people of the different districts an opportunity to speak about their grievances to the commissioner in the presence of the heads of the different departments.

With these few observations I support the original proposition of my honourable friend Mr. KAMAT and oppose the amendment of the Honourable Mr. PARANJPYE, which I consider to be absolutely useless.

The Honourable Mr. F. G. PRATT:—Your Excellency, I hope that this Council will not be tempted by the prospect of relieving themselves of the accumulating and increasing burden of the resolutions which are overwhelming us, especially the busier members of this Council, in the hope that by accepting this resolution that burden will be passed on to the Divisional Commissioners. I do not think that it is at all likely that if this resolution were accepted that the bulk of resolutions offered for the consideration of this Council will be materially, if at all, diminished. On the other hand, we would very likely be overwhelmed by the same evil which is now eating up the time of many members of this Council. But what I particularly dislike in the Honourable Mr. KAMAT'S proposal is the formal procedure which is attached to his proposed divisional conferences. I do not think that any stiff and formal regulations are at all necessary or would be at all appropriate for such interchange of opinion between the commissioner and the leading gentlemen in his division. I was considerably surprised to hear the Honourable Mr. KAMAT say that the gentlemen who had the opportunity, if not the sole opportunity, of access to divisional commissioners were those few gentlemen who happened to be members of this Council and the representatives of that division in this Council. My experience has been different. In the course of my tour I meet I think every prominent non-official gentleman, the inamdars, the presidents and vice-presidents of municipalities and district local boards and all the categories of gentlemen whom he enumerated as possible members for the divisional conference. On the other hand I may tell this Council, as to the members who represent the Northern Division in this Council, that the occasions on which I see them in the course of my tour through the Northern Division are few and far between. They are at the other end of the division and their activities are confined to Bombay.

The Honourable Mr. PATEL:—The Thana district, Mr. PRATT, and not Bombay.

The Honourable Mr. PRATT:—That is at the other end of the division. Then again to compare the nature of the divisional conference with that of the provincial conference. The time of the members of the divisional conference will not be likely to be at all so valuable as the time of the members of the Legislative Council and consequently I am very much afraid that the number of questions which would be put up for discussion in the divisional conference would be vastly greater and also the importance of the questions suggested for discussion would be vastly smaller than that of the resolutions that are presented to us here, and I think it has been the experience of a good many busy members of this Council that they are often asked to spend their time on the discussion of resolutions which are really not of an importance sufficient to justify their being discussed in this Council chamber.

Then again, I need not cover the ground already traversed by the Honourable Mr. SEDDON about the other engagements of the Commissioners because to that extent I am in complete sympathy with the Honourable Mr. KAMAT that it is really important that the Commissioner of a division and every district officer must find time to meet and discuss matters of public interest with gentlemen living in his division or district, but I would like to continue to do what we do now, i. e., to choose our own subjects for discussion. In the course of the last rains we had in the Northern Division a conference, a very useful conference, to which I invited gentlemen from the Northern Division, and we discussed at great length during the two days, and I venture to hope with some profit, the questions connected with local self-government and the question of punchayats and local boards. Another engagement which was similarly arranged was a conference which we recently held to which presidents of municipalities in the Northern Division were invited and we discussed there a lecture which was delivered to us by Mr. Orr about the reform of building bye-laws in the municipalities. In the Christmas of this year I hope in the same way we will be able to arrange a conference whose discussions will be attended by the Sanitary Commissioner and I hope we might be able to invite genlemen who are interested in public questions generally. But discussions of this kind are far more fruitful if they are not tied up with the red-tape of formal rules, formal procedure, resolutions, amendments and all sorts of things as all that sort of machinery would be quite inappropriate and would not produce any useful results. As the Honourable Mr. SEDDON said, it would on the contrary lead to a great deal of unprofitable talking and a great deal of waste of time which would be otherwise much better spent. It was only the other day, sir, that in company with an honourable member of this Council, a distinguished member if I may say so, that we discussed the affairs of an important pilgrimage centre in the Northern Division at a round table with the members of the municipalities concerned in the matter and I hope that that gentleman will bear me out that the results of that discussion were much better and more quickly obtained in that way than they would have been by any such informal procedure and all the rest of it in the manner such as is contemplated by the mover of this resolution.

Then when I come to look at the sort of questions which my honourable friend suggests might be discussed at this divisional conference, I find that practically every one of them are matters which can be very easily discussed in the district durbar. What, I ask, would be the use of asking the head of the education department, the Director of Public Instruction, to neglect his work and come down to this conference and discuss whether the village A or village B should have an elementary school or not? That is what is seriously suggested by the honourable mover; that we should call the Director of Public Instruction one day at Belgaum, another day at Ahmedabad and some other day at some place in the Central Division to discuss some question or some trivial matter of that kind about the opening of a new school. Surely, sir, I hope that members of this Council would agree that it would be a waste of time which is of much value to officers.

The Honourable Mr. G. S. CURTIS:—Your Excellency,—May I throw a suggestion which may perhaps shorten the discussion? Honourable members know that we are discussing resolution No. 14 and there are 36 more resolutions to follow.

The principal resolution relates to a proposed divisional conference and the proposed amendment relates to a district conference. I suggest, sir, that these two questions and the difference between them form serious food for thought. As your Excellency remarked yesterday, the whole question of constitutional reform is in an extremely fluid state. We see in the columns of a Northern India paper, which is one of the most important of the Anglo-Indian papers, suggestions by which the principal unit for legislative action and so forth is to be the Division, that the district council is to replace the provincial Legislative Council, that district local boards are to disappear and their place is to be taken by a divisional council with definite constitutional powers. Now, sir, I do not for a moment wish to discuss the scheme which has been elaborated by a namesake of mine, but, sir, I do interpose with the suggestion that in view of the fact that this scheme has been put forward, I understand with considerable backing, and that it raises a very important constitutional question which both the resolution and the amendment raise, that it is somewhat superfluous for us, at the present moment, to try and discuss these very important questions which are, at the present moment, under discussion by far higher authorities in other parts of India. In other words, I submit, whatever our opinions may be on the relative merits of the district as the unit, the division as the unit, or the province as the unit of administration, the matter really ought to receive much more extended and careful consideration than we can give it now and that it will really be better for the mover of the resolution on the one hand and of the amendment on the other to postpone them until they can receive more careful consideration than they can possibly do at present.

The Honourable Mr. SHRIDHAR BALKRISHNA UPASANI:—Your Excellency,—We are thankful to the Honourable Mr. CURTIS for the suggestion he has made, but I am sorry I cannot agree with him. I for my part would support the amendment which the Honourable Mr. PARANJPYE has moved. We have already district durbars, and for my part I would prefer that these district durbars should be open to non-official members under certain regulations, and if they are made open to non official members they will serve our purpose much better than the conference suggested by the Honourable Mr. KAMAT. There are several matters which cannot be considered in this Council. We have not the time nor the opportunity to discuss here matters referring to any particular district or place as we desire. In fact we deal here with matters that concern the province generally or the public generally, and if you have these district durbars changed into district councils it will be far better in the interests of the district administration. The district councils may not be so formal as this Council. They may be more elastic, but they must bring the leading people of the district into closer touch with the officials so as to enable both to interchange their views freely. The proper time for the meeting of such a district council will be when the district budgets are to be submitted. If at that time the heads of the district and the leading gentlemen meet together, probably many of the suggestions which we make here after the budget is settled will receive timely consideration from the district officers themselves and much labour will be saved and things will be better managed.

These district councils may mean a little inconvenience to the divisional commissioners if they have to attend them. But we can make it possible to fix the meetings of these district durbars at a time when the commissioners may be expected to visit those particular districts. Without these district councils it will be almost impossible for the leading men in the district to discuss public matters relating to details of district administration from the public point of view.

DIVISIONAL CONFERENCES.

The amendment suggests that the district durbars should be brought under certain regularity and that rules should be framed with regard to their procedure, and I fully agree with that suggestion. Even at present there is nothing to prevent a collector allowing such matters to be discussed at such durbars, but they do not allow it. Therefore, if rules are framed on the lines of this Council's rules, the proceedings will be more regular. If unofficial members at the district durbars are allowed to discuss the district budget, ask questions and move resolutions regarding district matters and if needful action is taken in time it will be helpful to the district authorities themselves and it will afford better means of ventilation of public grievances and consequently a portion of work that we have to do through this Council will be lessened. It will also in various ways conduce to the prompt redress of several grievances which have been brought to Government's notice through this Council.

The Honourable Mr. CURTIS :—Does the honourable member support the resolution or the amendment ?

The Honourable Mr. UPASANI :—I am supporting the amendment.

The Honourable Mr. SIDDHANATH DHONDDEV GARUD :—Your Excellency,—I rise to support the amendment. One of the objections which has been urged by the Honourable Mr. CURTIS against the consideration of this resolution or resolutions similar to the one that is before us is that the whole question is now being reconsidered. I know great changes are in the air and large schemes are being discussed, but we do not know at this stage anything definite about them and we do not know what shape they will ultimately take. I do not therefore think it right that we should sit still until a new order of things is evolved and that we should refuse to consider the questions that are placed before us from time to time. We had better go on with questions that come before us and decide them for the moment, and as things take a more definite turn these questions will naturally take the shape that we now desire them to take. Government would not, for instance, be bound to maintain these district conferences if ultimately it is decided to abolish the district as the unit. I therefore submit that these questions should be considered in the light of the present information at our command and should be definitely decided for the moment. The amendment before us suggests that the district durbar which we have at present might be improved by the addition of power to move resolutions in the durbar and by the regularisation of the procedure in the durbar.

The Honourable Mr. CURTIS :—Will the honourable member say who would be the members of the durbar ? What would be the qualifications ?

The Honourable Mr. GARUD :—There is, as your Excellency is aware, a durbar held annually by the district officers in the districts and they have already made up lists of people whom they invite to the durbars. They are what we know as durbarees.

The Honourable Mr. CURTIS :—What qualification is there for entry on the durbar list ?

The Honourable Mr. GARUD :—There is at present no definite qualification for entry on the durbar list, except the discretion of the collector. Several attempts were made to put in some qualifications, but it was thought that the system of leaving the matter to the discretion of the collector was in the present circumstances satisfactory. These durbars were started originally as an experiment by the late Mr Jackson at Nasik, and the experiment as it commended itself to Government was extended to other districts. The durbars have during this period of their existence done useful work, but their deliberations are not yet guided by any rules and regulations. The present resolution merely requests your Excellency's Government to——

DIVISIONAL CONFERENCES.

[6TH DECEMBER 1917.] [Mr. G. S. Curtis; Mr. Siddhanath Dhonddev Garud; the President; Mr. Balkrishna Sitaram Kamat.]

The Honourable Mr. CURTIS:—I beg the honourable member's pardon for my interruption. Who is to preside at the conference? At present the collector presides at the conference and this resolution does not give any detail as to the qualification of the president or as to the procedure.

The Honourable Mr. GARUD:—All I have to say, your Excellency, is that this experimental measure is now in actual practice, and what this resolution seeks is merely the addition of one more feature to the present proceedings in the durbar.

With these words, your Excellency, I beg to commend the amended resolution to the acceptance of this Council.

His Excellency the PRESIDENT:—I should really ask, before going any further, what is the exact intention of this resolution? The resolution reads: "This Council recommends that the Governor in Council may be pleased to direct that there should be held periodically in each division of the Presidency a divisional conference to which may be invited heads of departments and non-officials of standing from the districts concerned, with power to them to move recommendatory resolutions on matters of public interest in each division, under a prescribed procedure." Well, is this to be an independent divisional conference, or is the divisional commissioner to preside or who is to be put on it? Is it to be a non-official divisional conference?

The Honourable Mr. KAMAT:—What the resolution contemplates is that the procedure and all the qualifications are to be laid down and prescribed by Government, if they accept the resolution. If it is decided to hold such a conference, then the next step would be to fix down the qualifications of the durbarees and lay down the rules under which the proceedings are to be carried on, and also who is to preside, and so on. All these details are to be considered.

His Excellency the PRESIDENT:—It must be quite evident to the honourable member, I think, that if he is going to make a suggestion to Government he must give a complete suggestion. It is all very well for the honourable member to come to Government and say: "Please arrange for a conference and make rules and other regulations". What we want are definite suggestions and proposals.

The Honourable Mr. CURTIS:—What happens if on any particular subject, say, the subject is Modi and Balbodh, the divisional conference of the central division decided to prefer Modi and the Provincial Legislative Council decided for Balbodh? What answer does the honourable member contemplate to that?

The Honourable Mr. KAMAT:—The answer is that the resolutions that are accepted by the divisional conference are to be recommendatory like the resolutions which are moved in this Council. Both the resolutions passed by the divisional conference and by the provincial Council will be recommendatory.

The Honourable Mr. G. S. CURTIS:—Your Excellency,—I think we have had perhaps enough discussion on this particular subject. What I would first endeavour to place before this Council is that though the resolution looks extremely harmless, if one thinks about it and devotes to it the same degree of thought and consideration that one is compelled to devote to other questions which are harmless in appearance which have been arising lately, he will see that there is far more behind it than probably the mover of the resolution and of the amendment ever contemplated. We see discussed in the press, I do not say ad nauseam, but at very great length various schemes for the reform and regeneration of representative institutions in India. I have seen, I think, the signatures of every one of the honourable members of this Council appended to some of these schemes. I do not wish to ask any of them inconvenient questions. But as regards only one matter, which I think is a common factor of many of the schemes, that is to say, the representative electorate, I would ask the proposer of the resolution and the mover of the amendment a question. I would like to know in what way they would reconcile a local body meeting in a district or in a division and passing resolutions or discussing matters behind the backs of the parliamentary representatives. It cannot be too often impressed that these proposals which involve important additions to constitutional machinery raise very difficult questions indeed and that it is an impertinence on our part to sit down and try and solve these very difficult questions indeed in the course of a hurried discussion at the end of a four days' sitting in this Council. I refer once more, sir, to the suggestions to which I have already referred. In several memorials which have gone up to the Right Honourable the Secretary of State it has been suggested that the Provincial Legislative Council representatives are artificial congeries of local units and that a more suitable assembly for the discussion of general matters of administrative interest and for legislation and possibly for the eventual control of administrative departments would be the divisional council instead of the Provincial Legislative Council as it exists at present. Of course, it is not for me in any way to express any opinion whatever on the suggestion, but it is at present being extensively canvassed and for that reason alone it seems to me that it would be very much better for us to keep off from what must be very dangerous ground. At any rate, honourable members will see that with these suggestions under discussion, it would be quite impossible for Government to express any opinion which would lead anybody to suppose that they would prefer the division as the unit or the district as the unit of administration.

Quite apart from that, there are obviously elementary difficulties in connection with the resolution which the Council will gather from the questions which I put to the Honourable Mr. GARUD. Of course, it is true that the Decentralization Commission put forward the original idea in 1908. The report was written in 1909. Since 1909 a good deal of water has gone under the bridges. If the Decentralization Commission had seen the 411 questions which I hold in my hand and the 50 resolutions of which we have so far discussed only 14, they might have qualified, at any rate, their opinion as to the advisability of the divisional conference initiated in Bengal. Quite apart from that, sir, I submit that when an honourable member comes forward and puts before us an important constitutional change of this order, it is incumbent upon him, at any rate, to supply a few more details as to its effect. The honourable gentleman says gaily that there should be a conference. Apparently the question as to who is to be called and who is not to be invited is to be left to the collector's discretion, although that discretion, according to him, has hitherto been exercised in a wrong manner.

The Honourable Mr. KAMAT: —I said that Government should lay down the rules and not that it should be left to the collector's discretion.

The Honourable Mr. CURTIS:—It is not clear, at any rate, from the resolution as to who is to be the president, it is not clear what is to be the electorate, and it is not clear what is to be done with resolutions when you have got them. Possibly we may have in the district durbar one resolution, and in the divisional conference another resolution, and in the provincial Legislative Council there may be a third resolution. It is quite possible, judging from the various amendments that are moved to resolutions in this Council, that we may have three separate views on one subject. I tremble to think what would be the lot of Government having to decide these questions when three conflicting views from three different bodies are before them. So far indeed from simplifying administration, I can quite see that the conflicting views of these bodies may lead to still greater trouble. In any case, sir, I hold orders in my hand which lay down that district durbars should be held as far as possible. So far as I know, these orders were passed in 1909 and I believe that durbars are fairly regularly held. As far as I know, district officers are fairly accessible, and if they are not there is a large, growing and influential class of well-trained lawyers who are always ready, in my experience, to place before the officers the grievances and the defects in the administration which they have discovered. Nothing struck me more when I went back to places in which I had served before than the extraordinary growth in the number of lawyers, and if any of these gentlemen does not succeed in disclosing the various defects in the administration—of course there may be abuses at times—all I can say is that I should be very much surprised.

Finally, sir, I would suggest for the consideration of this Council that possibly we may have too much of conferences. At the present moment we are having four Councils a year, there are district durbars and there are conferences on all sorts of things. It makes it, according to my experience, very difficult indeed for the ordinary officer to keep pace with his ordinary work, if he is compelled to devote constant time to talking or listening to other people. There are only a limited number of hours in the day. The number of officers is not increased nor is the establishment, but work is probably increasing four or five-fold. I think, sir, that this Council would do well to remember that it does not pay to place too great a burden on the officers employed by this Government and that probably better results would be shown if they are left to do their work without imposing upon them the constant strain of attending conferences and Legislative Council meetings.

For these reasons I hope that the Council will vote both against the resolution and the amendment.

The Honourable Mr. RAGHUNATH PURSHOTAM PARANJPYE :—Your Excellency,—I do not wish to speak much on this resolution because I think myself that my amendment is more suitable than the original resolution I do not know which scheme the Honourable Mr. CURTIS has referred to when he said that the provinces as the fundamental units of provincial administration are to be done away with and divisions are to be only the units of provincial administration. One thing I know is that there is a vast opinion in the country which will be opposed to have these small toy provincial administrations. On the other hand so far as the utility of these glorified durbars, as it is proposed practically in this resolution, is concerned, I think the utility is very great if our durbars are confined to districts.

There is a considerable body of opinion in this Presidency that at present, at any rate, when we have quicker means of communication, the Commissioners are a fifth wheel in the coach and that with a little re-organization the Commissioners might very easily be done away with. I do not know how far it is feasible but I do know this that there is a considerable amount of opinion in this country which holds this opinion. In any case the districts are the proper units and the Honourable Mr. SEDDON is also of the same opinion. If, for instance, there were a divisional conference in the Southern Division, I do not know what a man from the Ratnagiri District will have to say when the conference is held at Belgaum. He might have a resolution about inconveniences of steamer traffic or something like that, and I do not know what the other people from the three or four districts above Ghauts who had perhaps never seen the sea would be able to say. I do not know what they will have to say about communication by sea. The same thing would happen more or less in the case of people of the other districts. The people in the Thana district speak one language and the people of other districts in the Northern Division an entirely different language. If we are to have any real use of these conferences properly organized, it can be only by confining them to districts and not to divisions. The leading people in a district meet on various occasions and in various parts of the district. But I do not know how many people from the Ratnagiri district have occasion to go to Belgaum and if they do go there they will find themselves like fish out of water.

I do not think therefore that a conference properly organized in the manner that the Honourable Mr. KAMAT suggests should be a divisional conference but that it should be a district conference.

There is only one more point that I should like to mention about the Honourable Mr. CURTIS' objection about the different kinds of resolutions moved in the various conferences. I think the same thing occasionally happens even now in the Provincial and Imperial Legislative Councils. He asked us, suppose we have a certain resolution in this Council and we come to a certain conclusion, and a resolution on a similar matter is moved in the district conference and that conference comes to a different conclusion, what is going to happen in that case? Take the illustration which the Honourable Mr. CURTIS has brought forward about the question of Balbodh and Modi. I think that question need not have come to this Council at all. The Central Division Conference might have decided that question without any reference to this Council at all, and in this manner the work of this Council might be diminished to a great extent by having divisional conferences or better still by having district conferences.

The Honourable Mr. BALKRISHNA SITARAM KAMAT:—Your Excellency,—Replying to the debate as regards what has fallen from the Honourable Mr. PRATT and the Honourable Mr. SEDDON that the work of the Council will not be reduced, I must say I am not at all surprised that both the Commissioners of the divisions tremble at the idea of additional work in the shape of resolutions and interpellations being heaped on their heads but I still believe that by a conference of the kind I propose, a good deal of the work of the Legislative Council will be reduced, for, on this very agenda paper, e. g. there are no less than four or five resolutions which the heads of departments can dispose of in the Division, for instance, that one moved by my honourable friend Mr. GARUD and the other standing in the name of the Honourable Sardar SYED ALI EL EDROOS; again a third resolution in the name of my honourable friend Mr. PATHAN asking for the entertainment of a Persian teacher in the Karnatak college at Dharwar and a fourth one about business regarding the constitution of the Godhra municipality. These four or five resolutions on the agenda are, I believe, enough to convince any man that a good deal of such work which comes before this Council at present can be done away with, and if resolutions are moved at a conference in the lower atmosphere of a Division as the Honourable Mr. SEDDON remarked, it will always save the work of this Council.

Regarding what the Honourable Mr. PRATT said that already there exist a good deal of facilities for consultation by the non-official members I think the whole position is this. I believe the only difference is this. At present the consultation is held according to the choice of the Assistant Collectors, Collectors or Commissioners. They choose the particular man and the particular subject on which they wish to consult non-officials whereas according to the suggestion which I make, if a definite procedure is prescribed, if members are empowered to move resolutions, then the choice of subjects and the persons will not be in the hands of individuals but will be regularized by procedure. That is all the difference between informal consultations and the nature of the consultations which I propose.

Now the question is about the touring system. I do admit that there are immense advantages in the touring system but even then as I pointed out in the beginning of my remarks I believe each officer chooses for himself the places where he will tour. He is never brought into contact in a sort of round table conference as between different officers of different departments; the particular questions raised are considered between certain departments only. It might, for instance, be carrying out a small repair to a bridge or a road. Well, for that sort of thing there is endless correspondence as I suggested in the beginning of my remarks. All this will be cut down if officers can meet at a round table conference and discuss the necessity or feasibility of adopting any proposal brought forward by any member; this would be an extra advantage, in addition to the touring system.

Now coming to the remarks of the Honourable Mr. CURTIS, in the first place, he suggested that this was not an opportune moment in view of the fact that there are already in the air constitutional changes. With all due deference I think that if constitutional changes, such as whether the divisional conference or the district council should be the unit of administration are in the air, the honourable members of this Council ought to be allowed to have their say and to give an expression of their opinion and if they are not allowed to do so and if such changes are being discussed elsewhere officials will be discussing in that case such changes, in fact, behind the backs of honourable members without giving them an opportunity to have their say. For the precise reason that such changes are being discussed somewhere I believe this Council must have the opportunity to put forward its views.

The Honourable Mr. CURTIS:—Have not honourable members of this Council already sent up their representation?

The Honourable Mr. KAMAT:—Yes.

The Honourable Mr. CURTIS:—Well, that representation having gone, it is not correct to say that honourable members have not had their say and the representation being sub judice I do not think honourable members can say that.

The Honourable Mr. KAMAT:—Regarding the qualifications and other details of my scheme which the Honourable Mr. CURTIS wants, I think in a resolution like this it is never intended to give all the cut and dried details but if I were allowed an opportunity to give details I dare say that with the help of my lawyer friends and with the help of the legal department it would not be very difficult to fix down certain qualifications and also the procedure for a divisional conference. But if I may be allowed to throw out merely as suggestions, I believe that the qualifications of members should be, as I have already suggested, persons who are presidents and vice-presidents of municipalities and local boards; also those who are of the status of inamdars, and those who take part in the co-operative movement and people with such qualifications. As to the question of who is to preside I believe it should be entirely left to the choice of Government, and they should decide whether the Commissioner or any other officer should do so.

As to the procedure of moving certain resolutions and asking questions it would not be difficult also to lay down rules for the asking of questions and moving of resolutions, and so far as the difficulty raised by the Honourable Mr. CURTIS of conflicting resolutions both in the Legislative Council or the district durbar, I think my honourable friend Mr. PARANJPYE has answered it already. Even now there are these difficulties. As at present I think there are certain questions which are already discussed even now in the district durbar and a certain view is expressed by Government on them. Well, suppose that an expression of opinion or the view of the district durbar conflicts with the view which has been recorded here in the shape of a resolution, what is the position of Government in that case? As long as the durbar resolution or the Legislative Council resolution is not binding upon Government, I see no difficulty whatever, because it does not tie the hands of Government to a particular resolution at all. When there are 3 or 4 resolutions either coincident or conflicting on one subject, it matters very little, as long as Government gets an expression of the views of the public and they can then take their own stand and shape their own policy.

Regarding the amendment moved by my honourable friend Mr. PARANJPYE I for one have not the least objection to accept it and I withdraw the resolution in favour of the amendment.

DIVISIONAL CONFERENCES.

[The President.] [6TH DECEMBER 1917.]

His Excellency the PRESIDENT:—I have very little to add to what my honourable colleague has said. But I do own, frankly once more to a sense of keen disappointment that honourable members have not supported me in the appeal I made to them at last session and again at this to endeavour, as far as they could, not to embarrass Government by raising such questions on local self-Government. They must realise, I should have thought, that it is extremely difficult for Government to discuss, and certainly to agree to, any suggestions of this sort. Indeed I have been seriously thinking whether under rule 3 (c) of the resolution rules it would not have been right for the Governor to disallow such resolutions. I have not done so because I had hopes that honourable members would support me in my wish and not bring forward such embarrassing resolutions. However, I am sorry to say that honourable members, although in some cases I readily recognise that they have supported me, have felt bound for purposes of their own to bring forward these resolutions.

I have only got a few words to say on the merits of the resolution itself. It must be clear to honourable members, I think, after listening to the speeches of the Honourable Mr. SEDDON and the Honourable Mr. PRATT, that the Commissioners, if you take a division as the unit,—but the same holds good as regards the Collectors,—are extremely hard-worked men and they have a great deal of work to do. The Collector at present does hold a durbar in which matters of interest are discussed. The divisional Commissioner, as you heard from the Honourable Mr. PRATT, is a very busy gentleman; but after all, if you were to ask him to have a conference on any particular subject, I think he would only be too glad to do so at any time. But I want to make a suggestion to honourable members. To my mind there is no necessity for this resolution in any form or shape: and for this reason that it would be a very good thing if honourable members showed more independence in their actions and did not bring resolutions asking Government to do things. Why do they not have a conference of their own? Why do they not have a non-official district conference? They could invite the Collector, they could invite the Commissioner, or any other person to come and join their discussions. Why have they got to come to Government and ask them to lay down the exact formation, the exact constitution of the conference which they require? Do honourable members want at this conference to have the Collector as their chairman, or, if they have a divisional conference, do they want the Commissioner to preside? In these democratic days I should have thought that my honourable friends would have liked that the bureaucratic element should have been excluded from the chair at such a conference. Well, I would suggest to my honourable friend Mr. PARANJPYE that it would be very much better if he were to withdraw his amendment and were to start his own conference, inviting officials, if he wishes, to take part, and I feel perfectly certain that officials would like to assist these non-official conferences in any way that they can. Under any circumstances, it is perfectly clear from what I have said that Government find it impossible to accept the resolution as it stands.

The resolution was then put to the vote and lost, 11 members voting for and 23 against it. The Council divided as follows:—

Ayes.	Noes.
The Honourable Mr. Pandurang Anant Desai, LL.B.	His Excellency the Right Honourable Lord Willingdon of Ratton, G.C.I.E., Governor of Bombay, President.

The Council re-assembled after lunch at 4 o'clock.

His Excellency the PRESIDENT:—Resolution No. 16. The Honourable Sheikh GHULAM HUSSEIN HIDAYATALLAH.

"This Council recommends to His Excellency the Governor in Council that Urdu should continue to be the medium of instruction for Mahomedans in vernacular schools in accordance with Government Notification No. 3833 of the 23rd December 1913."

The Honourable SHEIKH GHULAM HUSSEIN HIDAYATALLAH:—Your Excellency,—As your Excellency's Government is going to consider the question of Urdu I want to postpone my resolution.

Resolution was by leave postponed.

PERSIAN IN KARNATAK COLLEGE.

[The President; Mr. Abdul Kadir Pathan; Sir Mahadev Bhaskar Chaubal.] [6TH DECEMBER 1917.]

His Excellency the PRESIDENT:—Resolution No. 40. The Honourable Mr. PATHAN.

The Honourable Mr. ABDUL KADIR alias FAKIR MAHOMED walad IBRAHIM KHAN PATHAN:—Your Excellency,—The resolution that stands in my name runs as follows:—

"This Council recommends that His Excellency the Governor in Council may be pleased to provide at an early date for the entertainment of a Persian Professor or Lecturer at the Karnatak College."

Most of the honourable members here know that the Karnatak College has recently been opened at Dharwar for the convenience of the students of that part of the Presidency. At present it is a second grade college and as your Excellency has been pleased to give an assurance I hope it will be soon converted into a first grade college. The college, even though a second grade one, has at present removed the long-felt want of Karnatak students to a great extent. But it is a pity that no provision has been made for the teaching of Persian in this college and, my Lord, unless such a provision is made there would be a great drawback for Mahomedan students or other students who take up Persian as their second language.

Of course the first question, that will be put to me, I am afraid, is, what is the number of students in the Karnatak College who have taken up Persian as their second language? I may tell the Council that at present there are in the College three students, two Mahomedans and one Brahmin, who have taken up Persian as their second language, but there is no provision for teaching Persian to those students and consequently five or six boys from Dharwar and Bijapur have joined the Fergusson College and one more student has joined the Deccan College in the Intermediate class. So in all six boys from the Karnatak have joined other colleges as there is no provision for teaching Persian in the Karnatak College. I also know that three other students wanted to join the Karnatak College but they could not do so without help. They are however going to appear for the first year examination as ex-students of the Fergusson College. So if a provision is made in the next year's budget for the appointment of a Persian lecturer I dare say there would be an appreciable number of Persian students in the Karnatak College and they would not be obliged to go to other colleges. In the Government high schools in the southern division there are Persian teachers and I fail to understand why no provision has been made for teaching Persian in the Karnatak College. Further, I may say for the information of this Council that this year I have made enquiries and from the figures I have got from Hubli, Belgaum and Dharwar High schools it appears that no less than 15 Mahomedan students will appear for matriculation this year. So I can safely say that there will be not less than 15 Persian boys in the College if we make provision for Persian. I submit that unless such provision is made the Government cannot expect any Persian students to join the college and if Government are pleased to make provision——

His Excellency the PRESIDENT:—Can the honourable member give an assurance that there are going to be so many boys who want Persian?

The Honourable Mr. PATHAN:—Yes, sir.

His Excellency the PRESIDENT:—How many?

The Honourable Mr. PATHAN:—From these three high schools 15 will appear for the matriculation, namely, Hubli, Bijapur and Dharwar high schools. There are Persian teachers in Belgaum, Bijapur and Dharwar Government high schools. There are Persian teachers in other high schools also.

The Honourable Sir MAHADEV CHAUBAL:—Will the honourable member pardon me. I think it is not fair that any resolution should be moved in this Council on a hypothetical state of things which he expects to come up at a future date. The resolution states that " Government be pleased to appoint at an early date " and therefore, it must be moved on the present state of things and not on any hypothetical circumstances. So far as those circumstances go they will be reported in the usual course by the principal to the Director of Public Instruction and proposals will, in the ordinary course, be put up before Government, but if he wants to move his resolution he can only do so on the present state of things in the college.

The Honourable Mr. PATHAN:—If that argument is advanced by Government I submit that the present state of things will continue for long, nay for ever. Unless provision asked for is made the Government cannot expect Persian students to join the college. So it is rather moving in a circle to say that unless you have students you cannot come and ask for the entertainment of a Persian lecturer. These three boys would not have joined the college had it not been for the fact that they are too poor and they could not leave the place and join a college in Poona, and they would not have stuck to the college had I not prevailed upon them to stick up there and had I not helped them in some other way by giving them the assistance of the principal and Mahomedan staff of the Hubli Karnatak Urdu High School. I said to them that if they could go for a day every week to Hubli they would go on alright. Otherwise they were not willing to continue there. If they failed this year they would be losing one precious year of their lives. With help these three boys have continued in the college and unless any provision is made I do not think the Persian students will join the college in future, and so the college will be practically shut up for this particular class of students. So, in these circumstances I submit that Government will find their way to accept my resolution, and I may further say that after making this provision and after a Persian lecturer is appointed if Government find that there is not an appreciable number of students in the College for Persian they may abolish the Persian lecturer's post. I hope the Council will pass my resolution.

The Honourable Mr. BHURGRI:—May I ask the Honourable Mr. PATHAN to tell me how many students for Persian there are now in the college?

The Honourable Mr. PATHAN:—At present three are in the college and more will join if we appoint a Persian lecturer. As a matter of fact I find that six from Belgaum, Dharwar and Bijapur have joined the colleges in Poona, as there is no provision for Persian in the Dharwar College.

The Honourable SHAIKH GHULAM HUSSEIN HIDAYATALLAH.—Your Excellency,—I rise to support the resolution moved by my honourable friend Mr. PATHAN. He has shown to this Council that there are three students already who have taken Persian as second language. Some have gone to other colleges as there is no provision for Persian in the Karnatak College. I submit that unless there is a clear provision made there will not be students taking Persian as second language. All that my honourable friend wants is a lecturer in Persian. It won't cost much to Government. It would cost at the most Rs. 125 or Rs. 150 for a lecturer to teach Persian. My honourable friend has placed the alternative before Government that if in spite of Government appointing a Persian lecturer many students do not join the college the post may be abolished. With these remarks I support the resolution moved by my honourable friend.

The Honourable Mr. J. G. COVERNTON:—Your Excellency,—This resolution raises a point on which I have only a few words to say. I think the principle which all will accept is that when there is a sufficient number of students who take Persian in the college Government will be willing to provide a lecturer to teach them. But I also think that it is doubtful whether we have any accurate data at all on which to go for the present. I may remark that it is now December; as long ago as June the Honourable Mr. PATHAN was asked to supply us with figures in regard to this particular proposition. He has now presented the figures before the Council but it is a very short while ago that he sent those figures to the principal of the college. The principal of the college sent them on to me and they reached me only the day before yesterday. It is obvious, therefore, that the statement of the Honourable Mr. PATHAN that we have been in correspondence for the best part of six months over this particular point is liable to be misunderstood. And it is also clear that we have not had sufficient time to verify Mr. PATHAN'S figures or to make any further enquiry, which we should like to do. It seems to me that the question turns on the number of students who take up Persian in those high schools which are 'feeders' to the Karnatak College, and at present I regret I am unable to say what that number is; nor, I understand, is Mr. PATHAN able to do so. Assuming that a figure could be fixed for the number of those who are proceeding to the matriculation this year, we are still left in the dark, because it can by no means be taken for granted that all the boys will pass; nor, even if they pass, can we take it for granted that they will proceed to college; and, if they do proceed to college, we cannot take it for granted that they will proceed to the Karnatak College. There are quite a number of pupils who, for other reasons apart from the question of Persian being provided or unprovided, prefer to go to one of the Poona colleges or to one of the Bombay colleges instead of to the Karnatak College. The position, I admit, is rather awkward from another point of view, namely, from the point of view of students who contemplate joining the college in the hope of some provision being made for Persian and who naturally wish to know what actually will be done. If we are to make some financial provision for the post, presumably in the regular way, that ought to be made now by the department. But I feel that we are not yet in a position to make any regular definite provision. It seems to me that, if a sufficient number of students is likely to appear in June at the Karnatak College, we could be informed of the number a short while before, and that we might then make provision out of savings or from whatever funds might be available. But as things are it seemes impossible at the present moment to guarantee that Government will provide a regular post. It has been suggested that if after its creation there is no use for the post, we can abolish it. Well, I suppose we could do so; at the same time the position would be very awkward. Once a man is selected and appointed, if we were to tell him a little later on, if no students come forward, that his post was to be abolished, naturally he would not be particularly pleased with the procedure. I really think that, as things stand at present, it would be better to wait before we take immediate action.

The Honourable Mr. EBRAHIM HAROON JAFFER:—Your Excellency,—I beg to support the resolution moved by my honourable friend Mr. PATHAN. As the president of the Poona Mahomedan Students' Union, I know that there are several Mahomedan students in the Poona colleges from the southern division who are willing to take up Persian and join the Karnatak College. If a Persian lecturer is entertained in that College, on behalf of the Honourable Mr. PATHAN and myself I am prepared to give an assurance to Government that there will be at least fifteen students who will take up Persian in that college before 1st June next.

With these words I support the resolution of my honourable friend Mr. PATHAN.

The Honourable Sir MAHADEV BHASKAR CHAUBAL:—Your Excellency,—I rise to make a statement on behalf of Government about this resolution which the Honourable Mr. PATHAN has moved. I am afraid Government cannot possibly accept it. When I had the honour of opening that college on behalf of your Excellency, I remember I had some conversation with the Honourable Mr. PATHAN on this subject. I had then made enquiries as to how many students were likely to take up Persian, and I was told that there would not be more than two. This was when the college was to be opened and applications for admission into it had been registered, i. e., on the 20th June 1917. He then told me that there were likely to be a few more students who would take up Persian. I then explained to him the circumstances under which with some difficulty Government had been able to push on the scheme for a secondary college at Dharwar. As the Honourable Mr. PATHAN is and all other honourable members are aware, Government did this notwithstanding the financial stringency under which we have to defer a number of useful and desirable educational schemes and improvements. I told the honourable member then that he ought not to expect Government to provide a professorship or lecturership for the convenience of two students only. The honourable member then moved a resolution in this Council to the effect that that college should be made a first grade college. On that point also he has had the assurance of Government that when financial circumstances will permit they have fully the intention of converting the second grade college into a first grade one. The conversion of a second grade college into a first grade institution necessarily means additional recurring and non-recurring expenditure and he was told that it would not be possible for Government to undertake the conversion in the present financial stringency. I do not say that for 200 boys the provision now made of six lecturers in all, or one principal and five lecturers, is an adequate provision and I should no doubt be very glad to increase it, if circumstances permitted it. The first thing to do with any appreciable relaxation of the stringency would be to equip it fully as a second grade college and it would be only after experience had shown that as a second grade college it has worked successfully that Government think of turning it into a first grade one. There has hitherto been only one admission into the college, the one I have referred to, in June 1917. When therefore within such short time the honourable member moved his resolution for a Persian professor I asked him how many more had taken up that second language and he has told us that in addition to the two Mahomedans, there was a third student, a Brahmin, who had taken it up. I therefore repeat that the honourable member has not made out any case for his recommendation. But I go further and say that even if there was a fairly large number desiring to take up that subject Government cannot accept a proposal for additional provision in a new institution that has been only recently started on a non-official representation of this kind. The proposals must come in the proper channel from the principal of the college whose first care would naturally be to develop the institution in accordance with its urgent needs. Students when they are admitted must offer to take up Persian. It is only then that the principal of the college will be in a position to put before the Director of Public Instruction and before the Government the necessity of making any additional provision, either in Persian or Arabic or in any other language or subject. So long, therefore, as the number of students taking up Persian is only two or three, I can state on behalf of Government that they cannot undertake the additional expense, involved in providing a chair or a lecturership in Persian.

One honourable member said that it is only a lecturer and therefore it did not matter; that he could be got on a salary of Rs. 100 or so. But the honourable member will consider that five others on the staff are also lecturers and he must be put on the same level as the lecturer on Sanskrit, for instance. But says the Honourable Mr. PATHAN if a chair were provided there would be more seeking admission next year or the year after that. As the Director of Public Instruction has pointed out, there are so many problematical things which have to be assumed, if an argument is to be based on a state of things which may come into existence in 1918 or 1919. We must look at the state of things as it obtains to-day, and under the present state of things, if there are only two or three students taking up Persian, there is no case made out for the provision asked for: and after all I do not see that there is any considerable hardship if a few students who are keen on learning Persian went and sought admission in a more distant college. Perhaps they would be all the better for it. For these reasons I oppose the recommendation proposed in the honourable member's resolution.

The Honourable Mr. ABDUL KADIR alias FAKIR MAHOMED walad IBRAHIM KHAN PATHAN:—Your Excellency,—I am extremely sorry to hear the remarks of the Honourable Sir MAHADEV CHAUBAL. May I enquire if any such calculations were made at the time of creating Persian lecturerships in the other colleges? I think in respect of the other colleges, when such provision was made it was made as a matter of arrangement, and even now private colleges such as the Fergusson College and the other colleges have made provision for the teaching of Persian although the number of boys is small.

My main contention is this, that unless proper provision is made no Persian students can be expected to join the college. So I submit that provision should be made, and if it is made clear by Government that provision would be made before such and such a date for the Persian students joining the college, then I think there would be something clear to assure the students that some provision will be made. Unless such an assurance is given, Government cannot expect the students to join the college.

I trust, under these circumstances, the Council will accept my resolution My honourable friend the member in charge suggested that this was not the way in which a motion should be made for the provision asked for in my resolution, but unless this difficulty is brought before the Council and before Government, it would not be possible for them to appreciate the difficulties of the student world. Under these circumstances, I submit that this Council will accept my resolution.

His Excellency the PRESIDENT:—I must suggest to the Honourable Mr. PATHAN that his position is a little unreasonable. His position is this. He says that Government should appoint a Persian lecturer in the hope that a sufficient number of students will come forward to take up Persian at the Karnatak College. The position of Government is this. We are perfectly ready, if the principal of the college, on the application of the students entering the college, says that there will be a sufficient number of students, to supply the necessary educational facilities. I really think that the position of Government is a practical one and it seems to me rather unnecessary expense and would be bad in policy to appoint a man in the hope that students may come forward to be taught Persian.

Under the circumstances, I agree with my honourable colleague that Government cannot possibly accept the resolution of the honourable member.

The resolution was then put to the vote and lost.

The Honourable Mr. PHEROZE C. SETHNA:—Your Excellency,—The resolution which with your permission I beg to move is as follows: —

"This Council recommends that His Excellency the Governor in Council may be pleased to appoint a committee consisting of officials and non-officials to consider and formulate proposals for the prevention of professional beggary in the City of Bombay and in particular stopping minor boys and girls from being turned into or sent out as beggars and mendicants by their parents, preceptors or others who may for the time being have the care of such minors."

Your Excellency, every civilized country has dealt with the pauper question on lines chalked out after years of practical experience and attained a fair measure of success. It must be admitted however that this question has not received the attention it deserves from the Government of this Presidency or for the matter of that from the Government of India. In this Presidency the largest number of beggars are to be found in the city of Bombay whither they are drawn by the reports of the wealth of its inhabitants. Charity is an instinct of human nature, but if misdirected and misapplied instead of alleviating human misery it encourages the illegitimate craft of beggary and this charge is not infrequently, and perhaps with some justice, levelled at the heads of several of our charitably inclined citizens. Due, perhaps, to some extent to this misguided charity the number of beggars in Bombay is very large but what the exact number is, the census figures do not help us to make out. In the census returns beggars, prostitutes, procurers, receivers of stolen property and cattle poisoners, a very heterogeneous mass, are all lumped together and their number for the city of Bombay stands at 11,069 and for the Presidency of Bombay at 3,76,288. One quite realises the difficulty of getting an accurate register of a vagrant class of population but there is no reason why the paupers should not be treated as a separate class and they ought not to be mixed up with other people with whom most of these unfortunates have nothing in common.

Broadly speaking those who live by begging may be divided into four classes. There are first of all sadhus or religious mendicants. They live on the charity of others because it is a part of their creed to do so. With proper safeguards this class would require to be exempted from the operation of any legislation that might be introduced and thereby the sentiments of certain communities be respected. Nor would they be a nuisance or menace to society if they desist from infesting the streets. There is next the class of beggars who are physically able to work and yet prefer to earn their living by begging. Stricter legislation than what exists ought certainly to be enforced to deal with this particular class. They require to be kept in houses of detention and other means employed to compel them to work. We now come to the third class of beggars who are physically cripples or invalids or incurables—in fact the outcasts of society and the refuse of humanity. It is absolutely necessary for Government to erect at different places what may be called "Human panjrapoles" for such people, viz., homes for "the homeless, the helpless and the hopeless". Calcutta has gone one better than ourselves in this direction. There is established there what is known as "the Refuge" which was opened in February 1901. It owes its existence and its success to the indefatigable exertions of one Anondo Mohun Biswas who has identified himself with the work and renders noble service to these unfortunates in that city. I understand that the Trustees of the N. M. Wadia charities, who spare no pains to utilize the large funds committed to their care to the best advantage of the poor around us, specially invited Mr. Biswas to help them in the matter of opening a refuge in Bombay. They despaired of practical results without securing the services of willing workers like Mr. Biswas, and Mr. Biswas himself could not be induced to stay away for a few months from his own refuge and set a new one going in Bombay. The excellent intentions of the N. M. Wadia Charity Trustees therefore progressed no further. With Government help something tangible can be done and there is no doubt that such institutions properly looked after by Government would receive large donations from the generous public of Bombay for this particular kind of charity greatly appeals to all Indian communities, Hindu, Mahomedan or Parsee. There is lastly the class of children beggars, children who are put to this trade by their own parents or by others who live on their earnings. Thanks to the efforts of a sympathetic and very capable English citizen, Mr. J. S. Wardlaw Milne, a society was formed last year and the public has helped it with funds. Enthusiasts on the subject of child protection like Mr. R. P. Masani are earnest workers in its cause. The society has opened a home for destitute children and it deserves every encouragement at the hands of Government and our great philanthropists. I understand the society has collected useful data of actual sales of children, also of ill-treatment of children and that it intends to forward at an early date a representation to Government for reform in the existing law dealing with such cases. Perhaps a special Act on the lines of the Children's Act of England will prove salutary. That will adequately stop the "manufacture" of beggars and the heartless neglect and ill-treatment of the juvenile population in our midst.

If Government is pleased to appoint the committee which this resolution asks for, it could, I feel certain, recommend effectual measures for remedying the beggar nuisance which is so greatly on the increase in the city of Bombay and to which we see constant reference in the press. Elsewhere in the Presidency the nuisance is by no means so great but if remedial measures in Bombay prove successful there is no reason why by degrees the same might not be extended to other parts of the Presidency. Some members of this Council might argue that this question falls within the purview of the Bombay Municipal Corporation. There is naturally in that body considerable difference of opinion as to whether the expense that would be incurred in adopting measures should be borne by the city or in all fairness ought to come out of the revenues of the Presidency because the larger percentage of beggars in Bombay come from the mofussil. The Municipality has had the question brought up before it more than once and even at the present moment it is under the consideration of a special committee.

As to existing remedies the Commissioner of Police has certain powers but they do not go very far. According to section 121 of the City Police Act if a person begs or directs or permits children under his control to beg or exposes for the purpose of obtaining or extorting alms any sores, wounds, etc., in any street or public place, he can be punished with imprisonment. The police do bring up people under this section before magistrates but in the great majority of cases the punishment inflicted is a day's imprisonment which means that the accused is kept in the lock-up until the Court rises in the evening. This amounts to a conviction of course. Now section 27 of the same Act lays down that the Commissioner of Police can direct the removal of persons who have been twice convicted under section 121. This seems easy enough but it is very difficult for the police to keep track of the countless number of beggars who have been so convicted and who, as I say, have been sentenced to only a day's imprisonment. The police take finger prints and I understand have recently appointed a special staff for the purpose of finding out the number of beggars who have had two or more convictions, but in spite of their efforts they have not succeeded to an extent that the public would appreciate. What the public desire and what would prove of great help to the police as well would be houses of detention where these beggars might be sent by magistrates. Again under section 27 the Commissioner of Police has power to cause pauper immigrants to so conduct themselves as to prevent the spread of epidemic diseases in the city. He can therefore collect such beggars and detain them in segregation camps and remove them to their native places if they do not belong to the city. This involves the provision of a segregation camp, the feeding of beggars whilst in the camp, and the cost of their removal to their homes. The Municipal Commissioner as recently as the beginning of this year asked for a grant of Rs. 10,000 for this purpose which was immediately voted by the Corporation and I quote this instance to show that the Corporation is quite alive to its responsibilities. I suggest that it should be within the scope of the committee I have asked for to make recommendations in regard to the division of the responsibility as between the Government and the Municipality. Whilst beggars from the mofussil can be dealt with by the local police there is greater difficulty in regard to beggars who are residents of this city. It often happens that when the police want to send away some beggars upcountry, people who are residents of this city come forward to claim them as their relatives and the police have no other recourse but to hand them over to them. Such beggars continue in the city and the best that the police can do is to bring them up before magistrates time after time. If there were a home for those beggars who are residents of Bombay and if the police had plenary powers the situation would greatly improve.

BEGGARY IN THE CITY OF BOMBAY.

[6TH DECEMBER 1917.] [Mr. Pheroze C. Sethna; Mr. G. Carmichael.]

In Ceylon they have tackled this question in a manner which we might copy with profit. The beggar nuisance in Colombo became so great that a commission was appointed which as a result of its deliberations recommended legislation. A special Ordinance was passed and came into effect from 1st January 1914. A house of detention and home for vagrants was opened under the supervision and control of the police. It is the duty of the police to arrest and place before a magistrate all persons loitering in the streets and begging. If the magistrate declares a person so brought up to be a vagrant and a vagrant is defined as a person who asks for alms or is without employment and has no visible means of subsistence then such person is removed to the house of detention. This place is a sort of a clearing house from where those who do not belong to the Island are deported, the sick and the aged are passed on to the Salvation Army who undertake to look after them and light work is found for the able-bodied. The Ordinance has thus rid the Island of its vagrant population and the lot of the destitute who used to flock there in large numbers is much improved. Further east at Singapore and even at Hongkong they have adopted similar measures and there is no reason why the Government of Bombay should not move in the matter. I trust therefore that Government will see its way to accept the resolution and appoint a Committee as asked for. The object of this resolution and of any subsequent legislation is best expressed in the statement of objects and reasons appended to the Singapore bill, viz., " to get rid so far as possible of useless members of society, to help so far as may be possible blameless decrepitude and in cases where the decrepitude or inability to work is of a temporary nature to restore to health and enable the patient to regain the habit of self-support." At the opening of the Exhibition of Foods and Household Products a few days ago at the Town Hall your Excellency claimed for the citizens of the Presidency over which you preside the distinction of being the pioneers in this country of several great undertakings during the past few years. Much of this credit is due to your Excellency personally and to your Excellency's Government and I trust that the Bombay Government will likewise be able to claim the distinction of being the pioneer province in India to deal successfully with the question of professional beggary.

The Honourable Mr. G. CARMICHAEL :—Your Excellency,—The Honourable Mr. SETHNA has referred to the work that has been done by the society for the protection of children in Western India. There are two separate societies, one in Poona, started 7 years ago, and the other in Bombay which was started about two years ago at the instance of the Honourable Mr. WARDLAW MILNE. As a member of the Bombay society, I wish to give to this Council some information which may enable it to discuss this resolution with more information. The particular point I wish to bring to notice is what the society is doing at present with regard to proposals for legislation. The society of course is mainly concerned with children and that has reference to the second part of the resolution that the Honourable Mr. SETHNA has just moved. It is concerned with stopping minor boys and girls from being turned into or sent out as beggars and mendicants by their parents, guardians or others who may for the time being have the care of such minors. The proposals have not yet been sent up to Government, but they have been worked out and they will be very shortly sent up to Government. As the Honourable Mr. SETHNA said, we are following the lines of the Children's Act at home. One proposal is to have children's courts for the disposal of offences by children.

But the main proposals are that the police should have authority to take charge of children and with the sanction of the magistrate place them in some home. At present the society have no authority to detain the children, but when they are found they take them to the children's homes and as far as possible distribute them to the various orphanages, such as the one in which the Honourable Mr. PAREKH is interested, the Lady Northcote orphanage and such other places where they are looked after. But it very frequently happens that the children disappear and go back to the streets. In order to prevent that, it is necessary that the person who takes charge of them should have some authority to detain them, and the proposal of the society is that the police should have power to bring any children before a magistrate, and the magistrate have the power to direct that the children should be detained in a home. In this connection I may refer to legislation which was under the consideration of the Government of India. That deals, I believe, chiefly with the protection of minor girls and their rescue from danger of being sent to a life of immorality. There was a good deal of discussion on that bill in the Council of His Excellency the Viceroy, and I understand that it was postponed as a contentious measure.

The chief difficulty there was that several members took objection to the vagueness of the provisions in the bill which referred to the home into which the children were to be remanded by the magistrate. The objection they raised was that there was no definite provision that the children should be brought up in the religion which the parents or guardians profess. On that point there was lengthy discussion and, as I said, the bill has been held up as a contentious measure. But our society held that conditions in Bombay being different, there being a considerable number of orphanages, Hindu, Mahomedan and others (and also our society hopes to start a home of their own near Bombay) and it not being necessary to make further provision in the matter of homes, there should be no difficulty in giving to the police authority to remove the children to any home. We hope that the children would in the first instance be given to the society for care and it should be left to the society to arrange for their being sent to a suitable home and detained there.

I am very glad that the Honourable Mr. SETHNA has brought this resolution before this Council and I hope that he and other honourable members including the Honourable Mr. PATEL who has a similar resolution on the agenda list will give to the society both moral and financial support. As the question is actually coming up to the Government from the society in a concrete form I do not think that there is any particular point in having a further inquiry on the subject, because the proposals will, if Government think they are reasonable, be brought before this Council for consideration. So that it is hardly necessary to delay matters by having a further inquiry into the position with regard to the protection of children.

With regard to the question of professional beggars, the Honourable Mr. SETHNA proposes that something should be done either by way of a workhouse or as in Calcutta by way of a refuge. There also legislation would be required in order to prevent the beggars, once they are brought into the refuge or workhouse, from disappearing.

I remember that the Honourable Diwan Bahadur GODBOLE and I worked together in connection with an institution in Poona provided for by funds given by a charitable donor. This institution was intended for the reception of beggars and poor people but it was generally found that they came into the refuge simply for a change and after they stayed there for a time they went back and the committee of that fund were unable to control their movements.

The Honourable Mr. SETHNA said that the Bombay Municipality was unable to do anything because the beggars were not their beggars. That is I think taking a very restricted view of the duties of a municipality and I hope that if a refuge for professional beggars is established the Bombay Municipality will help it. It seems to me that it is peculiarly their duty and I also hope that if the society for the protection of children approaches the municipality for a grant that they will help that society, and as a member of that society I hope that if that society approaches Government for a grant that they will also be liberal in the matter.

BEGGARY IN THE CITY OF BOMBAY.

[6TH DECEMBER 1917.] [Mr. Vithalbhai Jhaverbhai Patel; Mr. G. S. Curtis; Mr. Phiroze C. Sethna.]

The Honourable Mr. VITHALBHAI JHAVERBHAI PATEL:—Your Excellency,—It is unfortunate that I have been placed at the furthermost end of the house and I must confess I have not been able to follow all that the Honourable Mr. CARMICHAEL has said. If my honourable friend Mr. CURTIS is going to accept the resolution on behalf of Government——.

The Honourable Mr. CURTIS:—No, no. I am waiting to hear what the honourable member has got to say.

The Honourable Mr. PATEL:—I should ask the Council to turn its attention to resolution No. 25 on the agenda. That resolution has been in my name and it is a resolution which is very comprehensive. The greater includes the less. The resolution of my honourable friend Mr. SETHNA which has been so ably moved by him just now is confined to the city of Bombay. But the resolution No. 25 applies to the whole of the Presidency. I therefore, with your Excellency's permission and in order to save the time of the Council and facilitate its business, would like to move an amendment to the Honourable Mr. SETHNA'S resolution. I would drop the words "in the city of Bombay" and leave the rest of the resolution as it is. If the amendment is agreeable to my honourable friend I would support the resolution in the amended form.

The Honourable Mr. SETHNA:—I have no objection to accept the amendment of my honourable friend Mr. PATEL.

The Honourable Mr. PATEL:—If the words "in the city of Bombay" are taken out the rest of the resolution will read as follows:—

"This Council recommends that His Excellency the Governor in Council may be pleased to appoint a committee consisting of officials and non-officials to consider and formulate proposals for the prevention of professional beggary and in particular stopping minor boys and girls from being turned into or sent out as beggars and mendicants by their parents, preceptors or others who may for the time being have the care of such minors."

Your Excellency, the system of professional beggary to my mind is objectionable on social, moral and economic grounds. Society is not bound to maintain idlers. Every member of the society is bound to render service to it either bodily or intellectually. A 'professional beggar' by which term I mean a person who begs for alms in any public street without rendering any secular or religious service is a public nuisance. It does not require any very great observing faculty to see the danger involved in allowing this sort of nuisance in our social fabric. I know that there are one or two societies in Bombay for the protection of children. The efforts of those societies, laudable though they are, are not sufficient to cope with the ever growing evil of professional beggary in the city and outside and unless Government comes to their assistance the question will not be solved at all. It is not at all my intention to come in the way of sadhus. They may receive alms for rendering their religious service to their laity. My objects in moving this resolution are two. The first is to minimise the nuisance of public begging and the second is to prevent the exploitation of minor boys and girls. In the first place I am bound to explain the situation that has arisen since I gave notice of this resolution. I gave notice in September last and I got a letter from Government to say that Government were considering the question, that they had received some proposals from the society for the protection of children and that some legislation on the lines proposed was in view. The letter further stated that there was already a provision in the City of Bombay Police Act penalizing professional beggary but that such a provision did not find a place in the District Police Act, and that Government was going to amend the District Police Act to bring it on a line with the Bombay Police Act. Your Excellency, speaking for myself, I say that section 121 of the City of Bombay Police Act has not at all served to solve the question. Section 121 no doubt penalises professional beggary. The policemen can under it get hold of beggars and bring them up before a magistrate and the magistrate may sentence them for a day or a week, as my honourable friend Mr. SETHNA said, but the question of professional beggary would not be stopped at all in that way. I would just like to invite the attention of this Council to what the Inspector General of Prisons in his last annual administration report says. In his remarks regarding "nature and length of sentence" he says :—"In this connection I will briefly allude to the imprisonment of beggars in Bombay. In the Common Prison 127 males and 74 females were committed to jail for this offence.

"Seventy-one were sentenced to simple imprisonment : 51 for seven days and under and 20 from seven days to one month.

"One hundred and thirty were sentenced to rigorous imprisonment : under seven days 18, from seven days to one month 112.

"Two females were under 16 years of age; 16 males and 13 females under 21 years of age; 17 were totally blind.

"These beggars are, it is needless to say, a constant danger to the health of the jail. I presume that the object of this imprisonment is the prevention of begging. But short sentences will never have this effect nor will sentences of simple imprisonment. If a beggar's gains from begging were confiscated regularly his trade would cease to be profitable. I have known beggars, sentenced to a few days imprisonment bring with them to the prison sums varying from a couple of rupees to thirty. They are bathed, well fed, medically treated, and then, thoroughly refreshed, they are released and the money handed back to them."

That is the effect of section 121. Of course I do not at all agree with the remedial measures suggested by the Inspector General of Prisons in the latter part of his report, but so far as his remarks on the failure of section 121 is concerned I entirely agree. I therefore respectfully submit, your Excellency, that the insertion of a similar provision in the Bombay District Police Act will not at all solve the difficulty. The question has to be decided once for all after it is seriously tackled by a committee consisting of officials and non-officials. It is no use passing piece-meal legislation in this matter. What I propose is that your Excellency's Government should accept the resolution of my honourable friend Mr. SETHNA as amended and decide the question once for all. It is certainly not the purpose of the Honourable Mr. SETHNA'S resolution to suggest ways and means for the solving of the problem. It is for the committee to do so. However, he has suggested some remedies and I should also like to suggest some. In my opinion instead of sentencing beggars to imprisonment I would send them on to homes provided by the state or private homes recognized by the state and for this purpose I would empower the magistrate to send those beggars who are hauled up before them to these homes.

The Honourable Mr. CURTIS :—How are the homes to be paid for ?

The Honourable Mr. PATEL :—From the public exchequer.

The Honourable Mr. CURTIS :—Has the honourable member any idea of the number of beggars in the Presidency ?

The Honourable Mr. PATEL :—3,50,000.

The Honourable Mr. CURTIS :—What is to be the proportion of beggars who would be kept in these homes? Has he any idea ?

The Honourable Mr. PATEL :—You might send them to industrial homes where they might be employed or they might be sent to mills or other work. If Government has really a will it is easy to find the way. I do not profess to put a complete scheme before Government but I merely make suggestions. It is for the Committee to submit a complete scheme.

The Honourable Mr. CURTIS :—May I ask my honourable friend who would give them the clothing and meals ?

BEGGARY IN THE CITY OF BOMBAY.

[6TH DECEMBER 1917.] [Mr. Vithalbhai Jhaverbhai Patel; Mr. G. S. Curtis; Mr. Raghunath Purshottam Paranjpye.]

The Honourable Mr. PATEL:—I said the public exchequer.

The Honourable Mr. CURTIS:—Has the honourable member any idea of the jail population.

The Honourable Mr. PATEL.—The jail population of beggars, you mean?

The Honourable Mr. CURTIS:—No. I am only trying to hint to the honourable member that the financial problem is rather a large problem and I want to ask how he is going to tackle it. It is rather a very difficult one.

The Honourable Mr. PATEL.—All the problems that come before Government are more or less difficult but Government have got to solve them for the good administration of the country.

I also suggest that the City of Bombay Police Act and the District Police Act must be amended on the lines of the Children's Act in England. Section 58 of the Children's Act in England is as follows (quotes).

With these words I heartily support the resolution.

The Honourable Mr. RAGHUNATH PURSHOTTAM PARANJPYE:—Your Excellency,—I accord my hearty support to the resolution which has been so ably moved by the Honourable Mr. SETHNA. The evil is a very growing one, as everybody admits. But the removal of that evil is also an exceedingly difficult problem. Here is a question on which it is impossible for Government to legislate too far in advance of public opinion, and the one great result of this discussion in the Council will be to serve to educate public opinion in this matter. The various classes of beggars were enumerated by my honourable friend. Now one very great difficulty in this matter is that one fairly inoffensive class that he mentioned is being needlessly swollen by other people who claim to belong to that class,—I mean the class of sadhus or religious mendicants. People claim to possess some sort of religious atmosphere about themselves in order to dupe the public, and I am afraid unless public opinion is properly moved and taken into confidence we shall find that the evil of this class of sadhus, including practically all beggars, will go on very much as before. We find, for instance, that it does not take very long for anybody now-a-days to turn into a sadhu; a little paint, with possibly no kind of dress on at all, will make a man a sadhu. He may not have the slightest atmosphere of religion about him, but he can produce a certain amount of sympathy among the common people. As I say, on this question the public opinion has got to be educated. We have got to bring common people to see that the effect of their indiscriminate charity is really extremely demoralising to the whole body politic. Of course, one feels a certain pleasant sensation when a man comes and asks for alms and he gives it to him. But I think there ought to be a legal provision for preventing beggars from plying their trade in public and for this purpose some kind of legislation would be required.

I myself think that the alternative of the work-house, which has been tried in England, is not a satisfactory solution. Work-houses have been going on in England and we hear various complaints about the management of these work-houses, because, after all, the people who manage them come into so intimate contact with this degraded humanity that their feelings themselves get hardened and, after all, we might have some of the types of superintendents of work-houses typified by Dickens in Oliver Twist. I think, therefore, to a great extent a certain amount of philanthropic agency will have to be utilised for this purpose and I think that large charities which are at present to a certain extent used for the purpose of feeding the poor, whether they are deserving or not, might possibly be diverted for the legitimate purpose of helping the cripples and deserving beggars, but not for the purpose of helping and feeding able-bodied beggars.

Another idea that I have is that these able-bodied beggars, when they are convicted of mendicancy, should not be sent to prison, but they should be sent to special gangs like the Visapur gang of criminal tribes, or something similar to that can easily be done. A large colony of beggars might be started with, of course, full powers for the police to prevent them leaving the colony; but they ought not to be put under the same regime as an ordinary prison. They ought to be made to work in a distinct colony of themselves. Possibly a few beggars might start hunger strikes, but I think in a few cases we shall have to be hard hearted, at least till the strike comes to an end.

Then there are also several other classes in the case of which I am afraid Government has not done its duty. I refer to the class of people who occasionally go with deformed cattle, deformed cows and so on, showing that they have 5 legs or 6 legs, which everybody knows have been secured by acts of almost terrible cruelty upon those animals. We find that these deformed cattle are used for the purpose of eliciting alms. I think Government might very easily try to put the law in motion in cases of this type. They are cases of horrible cruelty to animals and I do not know how these men are allowed by the police or Government.

His Excellency the PRESIDENT:—What are Government to do in the opinion of my honourable friend ?

The Honourable Mr. PARANJPYE:—Prosecute these people. I should take it that every deformed cow which is exhibited in this way is to be presumed to have been made to look like that by criminal means unless it has been proved that they are natural monstrosities. I think it is admitted on all hands that these monstrosities are created by horrible methods of cruelty. That is one point.

Another point is that some of these beggars occasionally secure the services of a child or some cripple, and we have often read in newspapers advertisements for a blind person to go about with an able-bodied beggar to secure the sympathy of the people. Well, there is a trade in these cripples, who are taken round by able-bodied people for the purpose of exciting sympathy. We must take care of these cripples in the proper manner and stop able-bodied beggars from plying their profession; and if we keep them in gangs far away from their houses and allowing them to go only when the superintendents of the work-houses say that they have reformed themselves, something might be done. In this case also in the beginning a certain kind of legislation could be useful, possibly for those municipalities or local bodies which would like to do away with professional beggary within their limits. It is possible that some local bodies, if there are enabling clauses in the Act, may be able to put those clauses into operation and stop professional beggary within their limits. In any case, whatever the means, the proposal of my honourable friend Mr. SETHNA will secure the appointment of a committee which will find out ways and means for doing away with the evil, which is almost eating up the vitals of some classes in our country. For instance, when a beggar sometimes gets more food to eat and in fact is much more happy than a man who works all day long, the incentive for regular and honest work is taken away from the ordinary people. It is not only for the good of the beggars, but it is for the benefit of other people who want to live honestly, that certain remedies are required for getting rid of this nuisance. For this purpose I heartily support the resolution so ably moved by my honourable friend Mr. SETHNA.

The Honourable Dewán Bahádur KASHINATH RAMCHANDRA GODBOLE:—Your Excellency,—I also heartily support the proposition which has been placed before the Council by the Honourable Mr. SETHNA. I have been giving some attention to the subject of charity in municipal areas. I happen to be connected with an infirm asylum in the City of Poona, an institution established over 50 years ago, that has got funds to the extent of about Rs. 80,000. We get interest from these funds from which we keep the asylum which is called the David Sassoon Infirm Asylum. In this asylum we can take 60 inmates and we have been making endeavours to get this number of inmates for a number of years. But unfortunately on account of the indiscriminate charity that prevails in Indian cities, our funds are not fully utilised. We spend out of our receipts about half the amount in keeping up about 20 infirms, and the rest of the money is being added to the funds year after year. This is not a desirable state of things. The reason is that there is no charity organisation, no legal remedy, and no powers with which the police are invested for stopping beggary in the streets. Charity is practised indiscriminately in Indian cities, and the consequence is, that the blind, the halt, the infirm and the old and decrepit people get far better treatment from the general public outside than they get in the asylum itself. We admit the infirms, we feed them, we lodge them and we keep a doctor to look after them in our asylum. But I find from enquiries that I have been making, that in addition to getting their food and raiment, the infirms get a lot of money by begging in the streets and in the temple yards. Unless, as my honourable friend Mr. PARANJPYE has put it, the public realise the evils of indiscriminate charity, the evil, I am afraid, will not stop. But the Government also must come to our rescue by insisting that in areas where due provision has been made for infirms, minors without guardians and others who are incapable of earning a living for themselves, street begging should be made penal. In Poona, for instance, we have got the David Sassoon Infirm Asylum. We can accommodate there 60 people who are lame, halt and blind and who are therefore incapable of earning their own living. This asylum should be sufficiently enlarged and equipped so as to provide for all the incapables in the Poona municipal area.

BEGGARY IN THE CITY OF BOMBAY.

[6TH DECEMBER 1917.] [Dewán Bahádur Kashinath Ramchandra Godbole; Mr. G. S. Curtis; the President.]

The Honourable Mr. CURTIS:—Who would pay for the equipment?

The Honourable Dewán Bahádur GODBOLE:—The funds ought to come partly from the municipality and partly from the state exchequer.

All the minors that have no guardians to take care of them should also be provided for in boarding houses and schools, preferably boarding industrial schools. After this provision at Poona, the magistrate should have powers to step in and to say that begging of any sort will be penal in Poona municipal area, except in the case of recognised sadhus who, on account of their religious teaching and environment, have obtained the privilege of living by begging. I might tell the Council that amongst Hindus certain Brahmins like Ramadasis are allowed to beg when they devote themselves to the worship of God.

His Excellency the PRESIDENT:—May I ask my honourable friend whether he would exempt all sadhus from the provisions of any legislation that might be passed?

The Honourable Dewán Bahádur GODBOLE:—I would insist, your Excellency, that able-bodied sadhus who are doing no religious work should not be allowed to beg.

The Honourable Mr. CURTIS:—What is the definition of a sadhu?

The Honourable Dewán Bahádur GODBOLE:—The word should be defined by the committee. A recognised sadhu should hold a license.

The Honourable Mr. CURTIS:—Does the wearing of a robe constitute one?

The Honourable Dewán Bahádur GODBOLE:—We will have to formulate proposals to discriminate the real from the false sadhu. In the case of every other beggar it should be made penal to beg. Otherwise the evil will not stop. I consider it scandalous, sir, that able-bodied people, in these days should be allowed to beg.

His Excellency the PRESIDENT:—But the honourable member exempts sadhus?

BEGGARY IN THE CITY OF BOMBAY.

[Dewán Bahádur Kashinath Ramchandra Godbole; Mr. Chunilal Vijbhukhandas Metha; Mr. Phiroze C. Sethna; Mr. G. S. Curtis.] [6TH DECEMBER 1917.]

The Honourable Dewán Bahádur GODBOLE :—We must differentiate between the false and the real sadhus. One has to realise in these days, when labour is commanding from 8 annas to 10 annas per day, that it would be a scandalous waste of public funds to feed able-bodied beggars. It is distressing to see numbers of able-bodied people who come from Marwar and Northern India periodically and make begging their profession in this Presidency. If we ask them why they do not do some sort of work they say " Our business is begging ". In these days when labour is commanding such high prices as 8 annas to 10 annas per day, and when the economic conditions of the Presidency are suffering from want of labour, these people must be prevented from begging. Each beggar means a loss to the country of Rs. 200 per annum, Rs. 100 for his own upkeep and Rs. 100 for the price of labour which he otherwise would give to the country. In the Poona district according to the census figures there are 12,373 beggars including procurers, prostitutes, receivers of stolen property, etc. If out of these 12,373 we take 4,000 as able-bodied beggars who have no right to beg at all, it means a loss to the Poona district of eight lakhs of rupees. If this army of 4,000 beggars were given in my charge, in the course of two years I will build a light railway of twenty miles in length with their assistance (laughter).

I think, sir, that the resolution that has been put forward by the Honourable Mr. SETHNA is worthy of every consideration, and that it should be accepted by this Council. I respectfully submit that a committee should be appointed in the manner suggested by him to formulate feasible proposals for stopping beggary by able-bodied people.

The Honourable Mr. CHUNILAL VIJBHUKHANDAS MEHTA :—Your Excellency, while I agree with the remarks that my honourable friend Mr. SETHNA has made on this matter I feel that tackling the question with regard to the whole of the Presidency is a very big matter as will be seen from the census figures that have been quoted, namely, that this Presidency contains something like three lakhs and seventy-six thousand beggars and various other persons. The matter so far as the whole Presidency is concerned is so large that perhaps it would have been better if the Honourable Mr. SETHNA had confined himself to his original resolution and restricted the scope of the inquiry to Bombay city alone, and also I think that perhaps it would have been better if the Honourable Mr. SETHNA had waited to see what decision or results the committee, which the Municipal Corporation of Bombay has appointed and which is considering this matter for some few months past, arrives at before bringing this matter before this Council.

I may mention, sir, that I also feel that if my honourable friend Mr. SETHNA said, as I think the Honourable Mr. CARMICHAEL suggested, that the Corporation had no desire to undertake any liability in this matter because of the influx of beggars that comes into the city from outside, I do not know what authority the Honourable Mr. SETHNA had for saying so.

The Honourable Mr. SETHNA :—I did not say so.

The Honourable Mr. C. V. MEHTA :—The fact of the matter is that under section 63 (k) of the Bombay Municipal Act we are entitled and I may say we are willing to consider any question of contribution that may be required from the Bombay Municipal Corporation to put a scheme into practice which will do away with professional beggary. I do not, however, think that it would be strictly within the province of the municipality to deal with able-bodied beggars who do not expose to the public offensive sores or ailments or who do not in any evil way directly or indirectly affect the health of the city.

The Honourable Mr. CURTIS :—May I ask the honourable member why? I have before me the poor rates of London. It is the recognized duty of local bodies in England to provide for able-bodied vagrant poor. Why should not a local body in India provide for the able-bodied poor?

BEGGARY IN THE CITY OF BOMBAY.

[6TH DECEMBER 1917.] [Mr. Chunilal Vijbhukhandas Mehta.]

The Honourable Mr. C. V. MEHTA:—As the honourable member is aware, section 63 (k) of the Bombay City Municipal Act imposes not an obligatory but a discretionary duty on the Corporation to take such measures as may promote the health or convenience of the public or public safety only. However that may be, I am sure that the Bombay Municipal Corporation would be willing to shoulder its fair burden of the cost of any scheme that may be proposed. It is with a view to ascertain how matters are dealt with in Ceylon that the Corporation put themselves into communication with the authorities there and I may mention that the one fact that comes out of these discussions is that firstly it is absolutely essential that we must provide a home for the sick and the diseased before we can take any further step in the matter at all. That has apparently been done in Ceylon as well. There are two classes that are dealt with in Ceylon—one, those who cannot work owing to disease, and the other, those who cannot work owing to old age. Those who cannot work owing to disease are sent to hospitals and those who are too old are sent to the home for the aged, and those who can work but won't work are dealt with otherwise and are deported out of the island. I may mention that the problem in Ceylon is not at all anything like what we have to deal with even in a single city like the city of Bombay. In the three years that this measure has been enforced in Ceylon there have been only 1,760 beggars that have been dealt with during that period and out of that the number for whom employment is found is 580, the number shifted to India is 641 and the number transported to their homes is 22. The number of those who died or were discharged was 309.

The first essential therefore is to provide a home to which these diseased or old beggars can be sent after they have been put before the magistrate. It must be within the knowledge of the inhabitants of this city that there is already in existence a home of this character situated at Bellasis Road near the Parsi Statue. It is called the Benevolent Institute. But the accommodation in that home is so limited that if we are to deal with this problem in this city in any comprehensive manner, we shall have to provide homes of very much larger proportions.

With regard to the City of Bombay Police Act, which has been quoted by two or three speakers here, mention has only been made of section 121, but I may remind them that there is in existence another section, section 36, which has been framed on the lines of the English Vagrancy Act, and that section gives full powers to the police to deal with vagrants or able-bodied beggars. That section runs as follows:—"Any officer in charge of the section may without an order from a magistrate and without a warrant arrest or cause to be arrested any person within his section who has no ostensible means of subsistence or who cannot give a satisfactory account of himself". So that so far as legislative powers are concerned they are already provided in the City of Bombay Police Act. But the complaint of the Bombay Municipal Corporation has for a long time been that either the police are too over-worked or that the number of police constables is too small to deal with a problem of this nature. And I have no doubt that the honourable member in charge will give due attention to this complaint of the Corporation.

The next point that the committee of the Corporation had to consider in connection with the treatment of this problem was that it must be proceeded with in a cautious manner. The Honourable Diwán Bahádur GODBOLE spoke of sadhus and it seemed to me that he spoke of them in a manner which leads one to believe that the public opinion at large at present would second any effort which is made to deal with all sadhus generally. I am afraid that public opinion not only in the Presidency but in the city has not so far advanced as to allow religious mendicants to be dealt with wholesale in any drastic manner. It is, therefore, that the problem is a greatly complicated one, and it is therefore that it is essential to act with caution in the matter, and to ascertain the views of several religious bodies of Hindus and Mahomedans at present giving subsistence to these religious mendicants, and it is suggested that if a committee is appointed which has on it the representatives of these various sadawarts, wakfs and mirasi funds, it might be possible to carry public opinion with us on this matter and it might also be possible to obtain contributions to the funds which might be required in a large measure if this problem is to be tackled in a comprehensive manner.

BEGGARY IN THE CITY OF BOMBAY.

I should like to add here that it may possibly be necessary to strengthen the hands of magistrates by legislation. At present their powers even if they are exercised to the full are somewhat limited and the punishments that they inflict upon these beggars, whether they are able-bodied or whether they are diseased, are not of such a deterrent character as not to allow them to repeat their offences and it should be possible to allow magistrates to inflict punishments up to two years and to insist upon these able-bodied beggars, these vagrants, who have no ostensible means of subsistence, to do some class of work in a workhouse or a jail which will in a great measure tend to reduce the cost of this measure. The first and foremost thing therefore is having a house or home for the decrepit and diseased, and those suffering from old age, and once we have got that we can ask the police to exercise full powers, and I am sure that if the question is confined to the city of Bombay alone, I have no doubt that not only the Bombay Municipal Corporation but the various other religious bodies in the city will be able to contribute to the foundation and upkeep of such a home. I think that in Ceylon these homes are kept by Government and the municipal bodies. The cost of finding and equipping the home is borne by Government and the cost of upkeep is equally divided between the municipal councils and the Government.

The Honourable Sardar SHRINIVAS COOPOOSWAMY MUDLIAR:—My Lord,—After having heard those honourable members who have supported this resolution, it does not appeal to me to support this resolution, though I confess that the object of the proposer is a very laudable one. I am also of opinion that professional beggary should be stopped; but it is a very big and a difficult problem and in my opinion it is not so very easy to put a stop to this as some of us here think. It is not only finance that will come in our way, but there are many other things. The local conditions of this country are not the same as in England and other western countries. The Honourable Mr. PATEL and other honourable gentlemen just now remarked that sadhus should be excluded; but I would like to know who is to distinguish a real sadhu from a beggar who only professes to be a sadhu for the puposes of begging? Looking to these and other similar reasons I am of opinion that a small start should be made in this direction, and as suggested by the Honourable Mr. CARMICHAEL, I understand that we are shortly going to consider the question of minor boys and girls. And when we take that question in hand, we shall have the satisfaction that we have solved this problem considerably, though not entirely as proposed by the mover of this resolution.

The Honourable Mr. GOKULDAS KAHANDAS PAREKH:—Your Excellency, I heartily support the resolution that is moved before the Council. Professional beggars may be divided into two classes. The first would be the helpless. Amongst the helpless I would put the decrepit, the defective and the invalid. As regards the permanently invalid and the decrepit, they should be maintained and I think it is a public duty, a charge upon the public purse, so far as the maintenance of these people is concerned. Then in reference to the defectives, there are no doubt institutions for the purpose of enabling them to receive some education and to lead an independent life, but I should think they do not get sufficient benefit of this institution and I think there should be some legal provision for the purpose of forcing the defectives that resort to street begging to go to the homes or asylums which are started for their benefit. Another class of helpless beggars consists of orphans, and so far as this class of beggars are concerned I think in Gujarat and Bombay there are a large number of institutions set up for the purpose of supporting them and giving them education and equipping them for the business of life and I am sure that efforts ought to be made in order to bring together all the parentless and helpless. I should think that some legislation to prevent them from begging and to force them to obtain an asylum in some home or orphanage would be really a most desirable thing, because not only they become dregs of society, if they are left alone, they acquire evil habits; they become thieves and they are the sources out of which the dangers to society arise. Therefore, it is absolutely necessary for societies whose business it is to protect children and others to see that the manhood of the country is not lost, and that these people are not permitted to lead idle lives and to beg in the streets. If there is any deficiency in the number of the asylums, the Indian public is sure to make it good.

BEGGARY IN THE CITY OF BOMBAY.

[6TH DECEMBER 1917.] [Mr. Gokaldas Kahandas Parekh; Ráo Bahádur Venkatesh Shriniwas Naik.]

The most difficult question is in refereuce to the able-bodied beggars. I am of opinion that if street begging were to be prohibited altogether by law this nuisance will be reduced to a minimum. It is necessary to deal with beggars of this class. A few of these may be what are styled religious beggars, but most of them assume to be religious beggars when as a matter of fact they are not. They are Waghris and other classes of people who pretend to belong to the class of sadhus. If begging is prohibited altogether, I am sure they will engage in some useful industry or cease themselves to reside in British territory. In reference to these people, I think something out to be done in order to prevent them from begging. It is not a mere economic loss in so many thousands of people not doing anything and living on alms, but most of them or a large number of them make alms one of the means of committing thefts. If one goes to one of these bazaars where these beggars sell the gains of the day and get money for them, he will be disgusted and he will find that he can do no greater harm to society than to give alms to these beggars. I therefore wish that, so far as able-bodied persons are concerned, something ought to be done and the best way of preventing them is to prevent begging in streets by legislature.

(At this stage His Excellency the President withdrew and the Honourable the Vice-President occupied the chair).

So far as other classes of religious beggars are concerned, I do not think that those who do perform some useful service, who when asked for the purpose of census returns say their profession is that of a Bhikshuk, are really beggars; they do some service for which they are paid, and I would not class them amongst the regular beggars. But as regards beggars proper, there may be now and then a few cases of people who are really wanting help and for whom homes may be required. I should think, however, that it would not at all be a very large number, and even in reference to such people as are unable to work, I am sure there would be provision coming out of the philanthropic public of this Presidency. I therefore consider that it would be a great service to society, if the profession of begging in the streets is prohibited altogether by law. I no doubt admit that the matter is full of complications and it could not be disposed of by a discussion in this Council and, therefore, it is most desirable that a committee should be appointed whose business it would be to enter into all the details of this question and to advise how the question of beggars should be disposed of.

The Honourable Rao Bahadur VENKATESH SHRINIWAS NAIK:—Sir,—Though it is very late in the day and though I think I should not trouble this Council with a speech at such a late hour on this important question so ably placed before this Council by my honourable friends Messrs. SETHNA and PATEL and sufficiently discussed, I think I should be failing in my duty if I did not say a few words in support of the resolution as to what people in rural areas think of the question.

For centuries past India has been proverbily known as a land of charity, and it is given in this country to individuals in the form of either food, raiment or money. Though our social and religious laws strictly enjoin that giving charity to the undeserving and receiving the same by them are heinous crimes against humanity, through the influence of self-interested priestly classes at one time, this noble virtue of giving alms and charities is now-a-days so freely and indiscriminately carried on, with the result that many able-bodied persons have become indolent and burden to the society in respect of their maintenance. As a necessary consequence of this, many classes of people in almost all castes and sects, without adopting any honourable profession for their livelihood, have betaken themselves to some form of begging either in open streets in an outrageous manner, or inside the houses. These idlers who have made begging their profession on the pretence of religion, swell their rank by constantly drawing fresh recruits from the society, minor boys or girls are decoyed to join them by false representations, or foolish and credulous parents are made to part with them. The number of these beggars and religious medicants in this country is indeed appalling. It is true that there are some deserving cases amongst them, but it is also true that a vast majority of them are unproductive consumers and consequently dependent upon the earnings of others. These are the parasites of the society and constitute a very great social and economic evil of the country.

This is more a question concerning the society and reforms in this matter should begin with the people themselves. The society must drive these non-productive citizens out of their circle by the force of public opinion, but their evil has taken so deep a root that without the help of Government and legislation the society can do nothing in this matter. The policy of Government has always been, and justly too, one of strict neutrality in all social and religious matters, but when any custom or right has been found to be pernicious to the society, Government in the past history of this country have not shrunk from their responsibility of interfering and putting a stop to it. It appears to me that putting a stop to professional beggary and preventing the minors from being turned into beggars, is more a question of national well-being than that of religion or society. The census reports as we have been just now told show that the number of these professional mendicants and street beggars is greatly increasing and when this vast number of idlers in the society is a source of mischief and weakness to it, I would earnestly request Government to look into and give the question their best consideration. Moreover it is an understood rule of all civilized Governments that the minors are the wards of the State and when there are practices prevalent in the country which have a tendency to corrupt their morals or to demoralize them or make them unfit to be worthy citizens it is the first and foremost duty of Government that instead of allowing them to be ensnared by irresponsible persons or permitting their parents or guardians to dispose of their children or wards as if they were their personal belongings, to take them in their hands and so far as it lies in their power to stop these malpractices. This question of preventing beggary is no doubt a question concerning the whole of India, and as such should have more appropriately been discussed in the Imperial Council, but as this Presidency has a share of this unproductive and inert mass of humanity, my friend the Honourable Mr. SETHNA is not a bit too early or out of order in bringing this subject before our Council. When this very serious evil affecting the society is placed before the highest legislative body in this presidency it seems to me to be most reasonable that Government should appoint a committee of officials and non-officials, as asked for in this resolution, to consider thoroughly the religious aspects of the question, practical difficulties in carrying out the prevention of beggary and conversion of minors into beggars and suggest measures as will prevent the creation of these professional beggars any more, and reclaim those that have been lost to the society. With these few words I heartily support the resolution.

The Honourable Mr. PURUSHOTAMDAS THAKURDAS:—May I say a few words on this resolution ?

BEGGARY IN THE CITY OF BOMBAY.

[6TH DECEMBER 1917. [Vice-President ; Mr. G. S. Curtis.]

The Honourable the Vice-President :—I think I can declare that the resolution has been sufficiently discussed in accordance with resolution rule No. 18. I therefore ask the Honourable Mr. SETHNA to reply.

The Honourable MR. SETHNA :—I would be glad to hear the honourable member in charge before I reply.

The Honourable Mr. G. S. CURTIS :—Sir, I will state as shortly as I can the views which Government hold on this somewhat large and extensive question. The mover of the original resolution which is now under discussion, divided beggars into 4 classes. I would prefer to divide them into 5 for all practical purposes. The first class are the child beggars. As regards those we have already heard what is being done by the society of which Mr. Wardlaw Milne is the moving spirit. That society has made an application for assistance to Government which application is at present under consideration. It will not be suitable for me to say in what way it will be disposed of, but I think we can assume that as regards those children efforts will be made as far as possible to ameliorate the present condition of affairs, and I may remark in passing, what perhaps the Honourable Mr. SETHNA may not be aware of, that the matter of legislation for infants has been already before the Government of India and action has been suspended pending solution of the religious difficulty. The religious difficulty is a very acute one and until some suggestion is made by which it can be surmounted it is not very clear how any progress can be made with regard to that particular bill. But such progress as seems possible is rather in the direction of local effort supported by public contributions to societies of which the Honourable Mr. CARMICHAEL has given us an example. It is very much to be hoped that the efforts of that society will result in many more being established, in places like Ahmedabad and elsewhere. So much for the child beggars.

The second class to which I will refer to is the criminal beggar of the several criminal classes, such as Berads, Bhamtas, Haranshikaris and Ghantichors and numerous other criminal tribes that are described in the Act bearing that title. With regard to these very successful action has of late been taken under the Criminal Tribes Act by the staff which has been so ably headed by Mr. Starte and at the present moment there are I think something like 8,500 of these classes in this Presidency under settlement who are gradually being trained to lead a wholesome life and earn their living by honest labour. In Sholapur in particular the settlement has been very much appreciated by local employers of labour and is now in process of expansion. I think as regards these particular classes it will, I hope, be only a matter of time before they (I must admit they are a very small fraction of beggars) are satisfactorily disposed of.

Now there are three other different classes. First of all, the sadhū, secondly, the physically fit, and thirdly, the unfit. First of all let us take the sadhus. The Honourable Mr. PARANJPYE (I am sorry I don't see him here) gave us an amusing description of the easy way in which it is possible for an ordinary member of the society to become a sadhu. If the reports I have seen in the papers are correct I think the seconder of this resolution has himself had some personal experience of how easy it is to change the habiliments of ordinary life to those of an able-bodied sanyasi. However, sir, the problem of the sadhu is very serious indeed. As the Honourable Dewan Bahadur GODBOLE himself admitted there is nothing as far as one knows to distinguish a real sadhu from a false one, and in the case of an Indian to whom indiscriminate charity to persons wearing the garb of religious mendicants is an act of the very highest religious merit, it seems almost impossible to frame a law by which this practice of indiscriminate charity can possibly be restricted. The only possible way I can see is to go round temples like Bhuleshwar or Matunga and actually take into custody the persons who give out doles to other persons who on enquiry turn out not to be proper sadhus. This Council will have noted that the Honourable Dewan Bahadur GODBOLE was compelled to fall back on a system of licensing sadhus, and that no sadhu should be allowed to accept charity unless when called on by the police he was able to produce his ticket. Well, sir, I think that any measure of that sort contemplates a very serious interference with ancient customs and ancient beliefs in this country and no Government could attempt it without very much clearer indications than we possess at present, that such legislation is likely to become popular and if popular successful.

Now I come to the really serious matters, the physically fit beggar and the unfit. We have had two speeches, namely, the Honourable Mr. SETHNA'S and the Honourable Mr. PATEL'S. I wonder whether this Council realizes that if these speeches are closely analysed they are rather contradictory. What was the main ground for Mr. SETHNA'S motion for legislation? He has given two precedents, one was Ceylon and the other Singapore, and what he urged was a thorough and wholesale enforcement of section 121 of the City of Bombay Police Act, i.e., find the beggar, take him before a magistrate, don't allow him to come back, strengthen your police regulations and if he comes back turn him out.

The Honourable Mr. PATEL remarks that he does not think it would be very successful, and I venture to think that residents of places other than Bombay might be inclined to agree with him and that to this extent, that the mere expulsion of beggars from the city of Bombay where they naturally come having regard to the wealth of the city, is really not to deal with the evil at all. Moreover, the legislation in Colombo which merely consists of finding the beggar and turning him adrift at Tuticorin with Rs. 5 in his pocket, is not really any serious attempt to cope with beggary nor, on the other hand, does the giving of a railway ticket for a beggar to Poona really constitute any proper solution of the beggar problem. At the same time, I must admit that the Honourable Mr. PATEL recognised that he was prepared to go the whole way. "Yes", he says, "we will have houses of detention everywhere. We will have asylums for the unfit and we will cover the country with places to which anybody begging, whether he is fit for labour or whether he is unfit, can be summarily consigned by an order of the magistrate."

I wonder whether honourable gentlemen have read anything about the history of the English Poor Law. It is rather a big question to start talking about at this time of the evening. It is a big question, and if the honourable gentleman will go into the history of the whole matter, he will find that the control of this particular matter in civilised countries is one of the biggest problems which has taxed the energies of the administrator; and even at the present time, with all our progress and wealth the number of paupers maintained in the United Kingdom is nearly 900,000 and that the expenditure on paupers is about 17½ million sterling. I may add that most of the large sum comes from the local rates and that in the ordinary parishes in London the poor rate is something like 8 shillings, that is from 7 to 8 annas on the rateable value in the rupee, that is 50 per cent. Honourable members will see why I interrupted the Honourable Mr. PATEL when he said gaily that provincial revenues could afford to pay this large amount. I will put it in another way. The jail population in this Presidency is about 10,000. The expenditure is about 10½ lakhs of rupees. The possible number of beggars is about 350,000. Well sir, if I only take one-tenth of that number, that is 35,000 and put them on jail diet,—we could not give them less,—and we make them work as prisoners, we may assume arguing from the analogy of the jails that it will cost provincial revenues 35 lakhs of rupees.

The Honourable Dewan Bahadur GODBOLE admitted that it might be possible to find some of this amount by recourse to municipal and local taxation. I do not want to be too personal, but I know a good deal of the finances of the Poona municipality. I may say generally, from what I know of the finances of local institutions, that the municipalities and local boards are far more prompt to apply to Government for grants than they are prepared to take their share in financing any big operation of this nature.

BEGGARY IN THE CITY OF BOMBAY.

[6TH DECEMBER 1917.] [Mr. G. S. Curtis; Dewán Bahadur Kashinath Ramchandra Godbole.]

May I take the matter a little further? It is quite clear, of course, that a large part of the beggar population in Bombay do not come from Bombay at all and that they have not got what is known in English law as a settlement in Bombay. Under the English law, I think the period of settlement is something like three years. Therefore, if they are deported and if we have a regular poor law, we shall have to deport them to their native places wherever they may possess a settlement. As many speakers have noted, quite half the number of beggars in Bombay come from the United Provinces or outside Bombay altogether and therefore if we are to have an act dealing with the poor and putting the whole machinery of workhouses into operation, it will only apply to Bombay Presidency, but it will leave unsolved the problem so far as the rest of India is concerned. The poor law must be tackled as an imperial question, partly on account of the enormous financial cost involved and partly because of the religious questions and difficulties likely to arise, out of the purely religious aspect of the question. I have, I think, Mr. Chairman, exceeded my time. I do not think I will weary the Council any longer with a discussion of this matter.

As regards industrial homes and such like institutions for children or persons of tender years, Government is, at the present moment, supporting small institutions such as the Borstal institution at Dharwar. There is an institution at Byculla and there are other institutions in various parts of the Presidency. But as the Honourable Dewán Bahadur GODBOLE points out, these institutions do not receive very much public support and the consequence is that it is very difficult to keep them going. In fact, in the present state of public opinion in Indian society, it is a sin to stop begging. I may say that with a large class of people, the man who passes his day without giving some definite fraction of his income in charity to a beggar, which he does very frequently without discriminating between the worthy recipient and the unworthy man, may be considered to have committed a sin and it seems probable that until there comes a change in public opinion with regard to the whole matter of charity, in particular to the manner in which large sums accumulated in religious charities which at present are badly or, at any rate, not efficiently disposed of by the managers of these institutions, and until public opinion demands that indiscriminate charity shall not be indulged in, it seems difficult to tackle this question.

However, as there seems to be a wish on the part of the members of this Council to pursue the enquiry with regard to this particular subject, Government are prepared to agree to the appointment of a committee, but they consider, having regard to the very delicate nature of the questions involved, that it will be undesirable that any officer of Government should be associated with it. They are therefore quite prepared, if the honourable mover of this resolution will send up half a dozen names, to appoint them as a committee of this Council and to arrange with the officers of the Secretariat generally that any information that the committee requires will be placed at their disposal, such as books and literature dealing with these matters generally.

The Honourable Dewan Bahadur GODBOLE:—Will the Secretary of the Committee be a Government official?

The Honourable Mr. CURTIS:—He will be some Secretariat official. He will not be a very high official, but he will be a competent officer.

In view of the fact that the Honourable Mr. PATEL has moved a similar resolution, and he also has first-hand experience of these sadhus, he might also join as a member of this committee. I am prepared to accept half a dozen members or any number which the honourable mover of the resolution thinks suitable. Instructions will be given to the Commissioner of Police and any other officers of Government he considers likely to be of assistance to the committee to give the necessary help.

(His Excellency the President at this stage returned and resumed the chair.)

BEGGARY IN THE CITY OF BOMBAY.

[Mr. Phiroze C. Sethna; Mr. G. S. Curtis.] [6TH DECEMBER 1917.]

The Honourable Mr. PHIROZE C. SETHNA:—Your Excellency,—My task in replying is considerably lightened by the fact that the honourable member in charge has kindly agreed to accept the resolution which I have moved. But I may be permitted to say a few words in reply to those who did not see eye to eye with me in the remarks I made. In the first place, I think I must explain why I accepted the Honourable Mr. PATEL'S amendment. My honourable friend Mr. CHUNILAL MEHTA is of opinion that I should preferably have allowed the enquiry to be confined just to the City of Bombay to begin with. That, sir, was my original intention. But members of this Council like the Honourable Rao Bahadur SATHE and others who certainly know much more about the mofussil than I do, advised me to accept the amendment and I have done so. I was under the same disadvantage as the Honourable Mr. PATEL in believing that the Honourable Mr. CARMICHAEL was the member in charge of this portfolio. He spoke however in his capacity as a member of this Council and not officially. I welcome the remarks that fell from him, because he has made them from first-hand information, being a member of this society. The name of the society, I believe, is "A Society for the Protection of Children in Bombay," in which Mr. Wardlaw Milne takes such a deep interest. And I was further pleased to hear from the Honourable Mr. CARMICHAEL, who is our Finance Member, that he will gladly welcome any request for help from Government and that he will afford both moral and financial support so far as lies in his power.

Then, sir, I regret if I did not make myself very clear, which led the Honourable Mr. CARMICHAEL to infer that in my opinion the Bombay Municipal Corporation was opposed to share the expenses in regard to any remedial measures in connection with beggars in the City of Bombay. On the contrary, I observed that the Bombay Municipality is certainly alive to its own responsibilities. Under section 27, among other powers, the Commissioner of Police is also authorised to take certain steps to prevent epidemics in the city, and I may mention an instance that occurred in the beginning of this year. There was fear of a cholera epidemic and the Commissioner of Police arranged to segregate beggars in the city. Now, sir, when these beggars were removed to segregation camps, the cost of erection of such camps and the cost of removal of these men to their homes outside Bombay was shared by the corporation. The corporation, I may mention, without any demur voted Rs. 10,000. I quote this instance to show that the Bombay Municipality is perfectly alive to its responsibilities. I would like it to be put within the scope of the committee I have asked for, not only to recommend, but to differentiate the responsibility of Government and of the municipality with regard to the number of beggars in the city, to apportion if they can the cost of any remedial measures they might suggest and other details.

Then, sir, the honourable member in charge questioned Mr. PATEL in regard to the number of beggars in the Presidency. I am sorry on my suggestion he gave the number as 3,76,000. I should have asked him to add that the 3,76,000 included, besides beggars, the various other classes that I have referred to. If there are 3,76,000 beggars and others in the Presidency, it follows that if you exclude sadhus and able-bodied men who would be dealt with otherwise, the number that Government will have to deal with in asylums or poor houses will be reduced to a much smaller number.

The Honourable Mr. CURTIS:—Is the honourable member quite sure that sadhus have been enumerated under the head of beggars, cattle poisoners, prostitutes and others in the census reports?

The Honourable Mr. SETHNA:—I take it that they are; but I am open to correction.

BEGGARY IN THE CITY OF BOMBAY.

[6TH DECEMBER 1917.] [Mr. G. S. Curtis; Dewan Bahadur Kashinath Ramchandra Godbole; Mr. Phiroze C. Sethna.]

In regard to the cost of expenditure, in Ceylon the cost works out at Rs. 10 per mensem. But the cost in Ceylon is higher, because prices of food stuffs, etc., are certainly higher there than in the Bombay Presidency. But I will accept the figure of the honourable member in charge, namely, that Rs. 35,00,000 will be required for looking after the beggars.

The Honourable Dewan Bahadur GODBOLE:—In our institute the cost is Rs. 7 per month in Poona.

The Honourable Mr. SETHNA:—If it is Rs. 7 a month in Poona, it will be more in Bombay; but it will be much less in other parts of the Presidency. As I have said, I will accept Rs. 35,00,000. Assuming the figure is nearer the mark, I contend that it is quite possible to levy a portion of this amount from the different municipalities; and so far as the Bombay Municipality is concerned, I am perfectly certain that they will be prepared to bear their share in regard to any remedial measures affecting beggars who are residents in the city of Bombay. In that way the burden of Government will be lightened to a certain extent and similarly in the case of Ahmedabad and Poona municipalities.

The Honourable Mr. CURTIS:—If is very difficult to get money out of either.

The Honourable Mr. SETHNA:—I put it to my honourable friend that if he will only appeal to the charitable instincts of the Indian communities, they will most readily come forward to help with funds. I gave your Excellency to understand in the course of my opening remarks that though asked by no one, the trustees of the Wadia Charities of their own accord went to the extent of asking Mr. Biswas to come down to Bombay all the way from Calcutta to advise about starting a Refuge in this city.

Now, sir, I might draw the attention of the honourable member in charge and the members of this Council to the various sadavrats and wakafs in this city. My honourable friend Mr. CHUNILAL MEHTA referred to the society which is located somewhere near the Parsi Statue in Bellasis Road. He gave us the number of people provided for in that institution as about 150. I wish my honourable friend Mr. CHUNILAL MEHTA, who is certainly conversant with the details in regard to similar charities in his own community, had given us further details. For, sir, I understand and I am supported in my contention by the Hindu members of the city of Bombay who are members of this Council that there is a particular sadavrat in Bombay known as the Kesowji Jadhowji Sadavrat where every morning at least one hundred beggars are fed and I think there are various other similar smaller sadavrats amongst Hindus. There is one at Walkeshwar where I understand nearly the same number is fed. Similarly the Mahomedan community entertain the belief that the first act of charity is to feed the poor.

The Honourable Mr. CURTIS:—Does the honourable member propose a comprehensive act dealing with charitable trusts?

The Honourable Mr. SETHNA:—I am not dealing with charitable trusts at all. I am referring to charity on the part of individuals. An ordinary Indian considers it very humane to feed and clothe the poor. As I say, sir, that is the first act of charity that appeals to him. And therefore, Sir, in my opening remarks I observed that if Government interests itself in opening asylums the burden of Government will be very considerably lightened by endowments from individuals. I again mention the case of the Wadia Trustees. If an asylum is opened under Government auspices I would not be surprised if the Wadia Trustees will, without any distinction of caste, creed or colour, come forward and extend substantial help. I am not one of the trustees myself, but I know this much that such a form of charity will greatly appeal to them.

I do think therefore that the task is not as prohibitive as it appears to the honourable member in charge and I do not suppose the expenditure will be as large as he estimates. I do not want to detain the Council as I do not know that there is anything else that I can urge and in conclusion, sir, I thank the Government for accepting this resolution and I shall be glad to propose the members of the committee.

Am I to name both the officials and non-officials or only non-officials ?

The Honourable Mr. CURTIS :—We suggest that the number should not exceed a dozen and that no officials should be proposed. The committee is to be entirely non-official. Those are the terms under which Government will accept the resolution. If information is required from the Commissioner of Police it will be supplied by him to the committee. But the composition of the committee will entirely be non-official.

His Excellency the PRESIDENT :—I can assure the honourable member that Government will give this committee every assistance in their power.

The Honourable Mr. SETHNA :—May I name members who are outside this Council also ?

The Honourable Mr. CURTIS :—Yes.

The Honourable Mr. SETHNA :—I thank you, sir, again for accepting the resolution.

The resolution as amended was then put to the vote and carried.

His Excellency the President :—The Council will now adjourn till 11-30 to-morrow.

The Council then adjourned till 11-30 on Friday, the 7th December 1917.

His Excellency the PRESIDENT:—Order, order. Resolution No. 48. The Honourable Mr. UPASANI.

"This Council recommends that the minimum pay of assistant masters in vernacular schools be fixed at Rs. 12 and of head-masters at Rs. 15."

Will the honourable member allow my honourable colleague to make a statement on behalf of Government in connection with this resolution?

The Honourable Sir MAHADEV BHASKAR CHAUBAL:—Your Excellency,—These two resolutions, Nos. 48 and 49, are resolutions which appear to me more appropriate to be moved as resolutions in connection with the financial statement than as ordinary resolutions on matters of general public interest and if permitted it would perhaps be difficult for this Council to deal with them when the budget is not yet ready.

But so far as the subject of these two resolutions goes, if the honourable member will allow me to make a statement, he may perhaps see his way to withdraw them particularly when the finance committee is to meet shortly and will have to give its opinion on the proposals submitted to it.

I may, however, tell the honourable member that so far as his resolution No. 48 is concerned there is a proposal at present which will come before the finance committee under which it is proposed to utilise a total amount of Rs. 1,73,000 for the purpose of improving the prospects of untrained teachers, and as regards his resolution No. 49 concerning the pay of vernacular trained teachers, an amount of Rs. 31,487, which is necessary for giving them the face value of their certificates, is proposed to be provided. So that as regards resolution No. 49 practically everything that he wants or can want is going to be provided for, and as regards resolution No. 48, as I said before, an amount of Rs. 1,73,000 roughly is proposed to be provided in the budget for that purpose.

PAY OF ASSISTANT MASTERS IN VERNACULAR SCHOOLS—PAY OF VERNACULAR TRAINED TEACHERS—NOTIFIED AREAS: EXPENDITURE ON EDUCATION, MEDICAL RELIEF.

[7TH DECEMBER 1917.] [Sir Mahadev Chaubal; Mr. Shridhar Balkrishna Upasani; the President.]

If in view of this statement the honourable member will see that it would not be of much use moving these resolutions, he might perhaps like to withdraw them.

The Honourable Mr. SHRIDHAR BALKRISHNA UPASANI:—Your Excellency,—In view of the statement which the Honourable Sir MAHADEV CHAUBAL is pleased to make I beg leave to withdraw resolutions Nos. 48 and 49* and I will await the result of the deliberations of the finance committee. If I am not satisfied with the result of those deliberations, I will present these resolutions at the March meeting when the budget will be discussed.

Resolutions Nos. 48 and 49 were by leave withdrawn.

*"This Council recommends to His Excellency the Governor in Council that the vernacular trained teachers be paid their salaries according to the face value of their certificates."

His Excellency the PRESIDENT:—Resolution No. 50. The Honourable Mr. UPASANI.

The Honourable Mr. SHRIDHAR BALKRISHNA UPASANI:—Your Excellency,—The resolution that I move runs as follows:—

"This Council recommends that Notified Areas be not charged with expenditure on education and medical relief and that when it is proposed to be so charged the Notified Areas be raised to a Municipality, and that this be done particularly in the case of the Notified Areas of Chalisgaon in East Khandesh and Nandgaon in the Nasik District and in other cases where the population of the town exceeds 5,000."

Your Excellency, the object of this resolution is that in case a notified area is proposed to be charged with full liabilities of a municipality that notified area ought in justice to be also allowed the rights and privileges which a town with a municipality enjoys.

At present the procedure is rather anomalous. Ordinary villages and towns which have not got a municipality are generally charged with only the expenditure on sanitation, and the expenditure on account of education and dispensaries is for the most part borne by Government. In the case of municipalities, this expenditure on education and medical relief is borne partly by the town and partly by Government, and the people of the town have a voice in the municipal administration. But in the case of notified areas, though both these items are in some cases charged to the notified areas the people of those areas have no voice in their administration, the same being entrusted to small committees which have no elective element on them. What I, therefore, desire is, that towns with a population exceeding 5,000 should, so far as possible, be provided with municipalities instead of being formed into notified areas, and that this should be particularly done in the case of the larger towns, like Chalisgaon and Nandgaon which are the headquarters of the mamlatdar, and where it will not be difficult to find members to work on the municipality; therefore, these are proper cases for raising the existing notified areas into municipalities. Chalisgaon has a population of more than 9,000, and the income of the notified area, I think, is at present over Rs. 16,000 and it pays the expenditure on schools and also on the local dispensary. There are a number of schools in that town which the notified area committee has to maintain. Had it not been for the fact of a notified area being established there, all this expenditure would have been borne by the local board. I dare say it is not the object of Government in establishing these notified areas to relieve the local boards of the charge on account of education and medical relief that is at present borne by them and to transfer the same to these towns. If at all it is to be done, I think it is but fair that the people of those towns should have also a voice in the administration of the local notified area committee and in disposing of the funds which the committee may raise from them.

NOTIFIED AREAS: EXPENDITURE ON EDUCATION AND MEDICAL RELIEF.

[Mr. Shridhar Balkrishna Upasani; Mr. C. N. Seddon; Mr. G. S. Curtis.] [7TH DECEMBER 1917.]

With these remarks I move my resolution and trust that the Council will accept it.

The Honourable Mr. C. N. SEDDON:—Your Excellency,—I think that very probably it might be a good thing to constitute municipalities of these larger towns such as Chalisgaon. One of the main reasons why municipalities have not been constituted is the unpopularity of municipal administration in small towns. The chief reason of the unpopularity is the fact that when a municipality is established, all the expenditure on education and dispensaries has to be borne by the people of the place. But if there is no local institution, it is all paid for by the local boards, that is, by other people. In the case of notified areas, it is not quite the fact, as the Honourable Mr. UPASANI says, that the whole expenditure falls upon the notified area. In the case of Chalisgaon which he quotes, a grant of Rs. 1,500 has just been sanctioned by the local board towards the expenditure of the schools of Chalisgaon, and the dispensary is maintained to a larger extent by the local board than by the notified area. Similarly in Manmad the schools are not paid for by the notified area, but by the district local board. So, I do not know whether my honourable friend understands that it will be a very unpopular measure to constitute municipalities in these places, but if he is willing to face that unpopularity, I do not know why Government should object; because, after all, it is much fairer that the town which is getting the benefit of the educational institutions and dispensaries should pay the expenses of these institutions itself. There are some instances where fairly large towns have not been paying anything at all for such institutions. For instance, Nasirabad in East Khandesh, which has a population of 13,000, gets all its expenditure for schools from the district local board. I should be very much inclined to support the honourable mover, as I said above, in his proposal. And as to Chalisgaon I think that it should certainly be turned into a municipality at once.

And though it is rather an unusual position for me to find myself in, I am inclined to support the honourable member that all the larger places should be turned into municipalities. And whether they are made municipalities or not, I think that in common fairness to the district local boards they ought to pay for their own schools and dispensaries.

The Honourable Mr. G. S. CURTIS:—Your Excellency,—I think perhaps that if I interpose it may shorten discussion in view of the large programme before us of which several matters are rather of more than local interest which might be appreciated by the Council. I venture to point out to the Council that the subject which we are discussing in this resolution has already received a considerable degree of attention at the hands of the Council with reference to a previous resolution. I would once more point out that the whole question of the future policy of Government with reference to these small areas is at present receiving consideration with a view to the amendment of the municipal act. Whether any intermediate body is wanted between the panchayat and the larger body is a matter which is receiving careful attention and I cannot myself say what the policy will be with regard to it.

As regards Chalisgaon, I will only say that I think there I was myself responsible for starting what is known as a notified area committee in 1905, and the progress of the place seems to have been remarkable since. I think when I started, the income anticipated was only Rs. 4,000 or Rs. 5,000 and it seems to have gone up considerably in the last few years. Probably, if a proposal comes up to Government to convert it into a municipal body, that proposal will receive consideration.

As regards, however, the general principle, as I said the other day, I am not at all sure that the interposition of the chapter with regard to notified areas in the municipal act in 1903 was really necessary. All that was necessary was to notify an area as suitable for municipal management and make the necessary allowance in the form of grants from Government and the local board and also with regard to particular sections which are to be applied to that area. At any rate, the question of the future treatment of these areas is at present receiving consideration, and I trust the Council will be satisfied with this assurance.

The Honourable Mr. SHRIDHAR BALKRISHNA UPASANI:—Your Excellency,—I am glad that both the Honourable Mr. SEDDON and the Honourable Mr. CURTIS approve of the principle of this resolution. So far as I am aware, I believe that the people of both the places which I have mentioned in my resolution have already submitted representations asking for their notified areas to be raised to municipalities and I hope their request will meet with the approval of Government. In the meantime, if this resolution is approved by the Council, it will strengthen the hands of the officers who may have to move Government to make the necessary provision on that point. The reason why municipalities are unpopular is because in the case of the smaller towns they cannot bear all the expenditure that is put upon them both as regards education and as regards medical relief and the smaller municipalities get a proportionately smaller share of help for this expenditure from Government than the local boards and the other municipalities which may be better placed. If these matters are properly considered in apportioning the help from Government, I hope the present difficulties will be satisfactorily met. Under these circumstances, I think the resolution as it stands will meet with the approval of the Council.

His Excellency the PRESIDENT:—I do not think the honourable member has quite clearly appreciated what my honourable colleague suggested. His position is this. With many other questions dealing with local self-government, the question of notified areas is under consideration; as regards this particular resolution, my honourable colleague, though in sympathy with the general idea, under the circumstances suggested to the honourable member to withdraw his resolution.

The Honourable Mr. UPASANI:—With this assurance coming from your Excellency, I beg to withdraw the resolution.

The resolution was by leave withdrawn.

His Excellency the PRESIDENT:—Resolution No. 8. The Honourable Mr. GARUD.

The Honourable Mr. SIDDHANATH DHONDDEV GARUD:—Your Excellency,—The resolution which stands in my name reads as follows:—

"This Council recommends to His Excellency the Governor in Council that a third year class be added to the Vernacular Training School at Dhulia and that non-stipendiary students be admitted to that school."

This resolution is capable of being divided into two parts. The first of these parts requires that a third year class be opened in the Dhulia training school, and the second that non-stipendiary students be admitted to that school. Every year more than about 200 students appear for the vernacular final examination at Dhulia. Last year the figure was 225. About the same number appears for the training school entrance examination. These boys are not allowed to appear for the examination as soon as they pass the vernacular final examination but have to go through a probationary training as teachers. Last year the number of those who appeared for the entrance examination was 196, but out of this only a small number was admitted into the school and the rest who had qualified themselves to appear for the examination and who had taken the necessary pains to pass the test in the hope that they would be allowed to undergo the training in the school had to go. The number of admissions into the school is regulated not by the number who pass the test but by the number to whom stipends can be paid by local bodies As soon as that number is reached the other boys are sent away.

This works great hardship in a large number of cases. Many of the boys are willing to avail themselves of the advantage of the training that is given in the training school. Many of them are willing to pay their own way to qualify themselves as teachers and to start on better pay. Government would not, however, be bound to take up these students who have qualified themselves. Government will not have in these cases to pay any stipends and I do not see what harm there is to allow these students to qualify at their own expense. The usual objection that is urged against non-stipendiary students being admitted to the school is that there is no boarding accommodation enough for this large number. When students pay for their own schooling there is no need for boarding accommodation. They will only need the advantage of the training given in the school. The first year class in training schools contains a large number of boys,—about 80 boys now,—and it can easily hold a few more. The second year class too contains practically the same number of boys and that class could easily afford to take on a few more. Then at the end of the second year's schooling, they are all asked to take up their appointments as teachers. As they are bound they all at once take up the teaching profession on the pay which is given to second year trained teachers, but many of them are willing to undergo a further course of training and would easily qualify themselves for the third year at their own expense. The number that was sent from Dhulia last year to the Poona training school was only 5.

Government will not have to pay them more as they will go through the training at their own request but will be able to get the services of third year trained teachers for the pay of second year trained teachers. The difficulty frequently pointed out is that the school would require a larger staff. There are now on the staff of the school 11 teachers and the period for which they have to do the teaching work is in many cases so small that it can easily by a readjustment be increased. In that case there would be enough staff found to start a third year class without any more expenditure, or perhaps, with the loan of not more than one teacher from the Poona training school. The Dhulia training school now teaches about 160 boys. The Garud High School teaches about 500 boys. The accommodation in the training school is by no means small and it can very easily undertake the training of a far larger number than it is doing at present. It will mean a readjustment no doubt, but that readjustment can be easily made.

This question has been placed before Government for their consideration. It has been placed several times before the collector's durbar for being forwarded to the educational authorities for consideration and it has also been considered by the educational authorities. Considering the increased number of trained teachers that would be available to us at almost the same cost, it is in the interest of Government that they should strengthen the present staff by the addition of a teacher and they should undertake the third year class at Dhulia. Apart from the advantages it would afford to Government, it would help the poor students to attain better qualifications. There are several openings where those better qualifications can be used and Government need not guarantee any better pay. Vernacular teachers for instance are required to undertake teaching of higher vernacular in some of the high schools. Then again gymnastic teachers and drawing teachers are required. In all these cases the training which is given in a training school, and particularly that which is given in the third year class, would be sufficient to enable many of these students to take up these better paid posts in the educational service. I therefore hope that this proposition will meet with the favourable consideration of the educational authorities and I commend it to the Council.

The Honourable Mr. RAGHUNATH PURSHOTTAM PARANJPYE:—Your Excellency,—I would like to put before the Honourable Mr. GARUD and this Council a few considerations which will show that the Council will not be well advised in accepting this resolution as it stands. In the first place, it will be found that the number of third year trained teachers required for the conduct of primary education in the Presidency is not quite so large as the number of first and second year trained teachers that are required. These third year trained teachers are generally put in charge of full primary schools and the number of these full primary schools is comparatively limited. Again, in considering any scheme of wide extension of primary education, what we want is not immediately a very large number of full primary schools, but a large number of schools teaching up to the 4th or at the most 5th standard, and for these schools third year trained teachers may perhaps do better work, but they are not absolutely necessary. What we find is really required for these schools teaching up to the 4th or 5th standard is teachers who have been trained up to the second year. The first year is not quite enough, but teachers who have been trained up to the second year do this work quite efficiently, and it would be rather not so good use of the funds at the disposal of Government if people are educated to get a higher qualification, which qualification is not always absolutely necessary.

Again, the third year teachers get a certificate the face value of which is Rs. 20 and some of them get Rs. 25, and I do not know whether the educational department will be able to pay the full face value of the certificate to any teacher that chooses to qualify himself for the third year of the training college. Again, I have an idea that it would be very much better if, instead of asking purely vernacular teachers to qualify for the third year, we allow some people, for instance, those who have passed the matriculation examination, afterwards to go in for the third year of training.

My honourable friend Mr. GARUD said that there is a good deal of opening for these third year trained teachers in the high schools for the purpose of teaching higher vernacular or mathematics and so on in the lower classes. Now, I would put it to him whether it would not be better if, for the purpose of filling up places of this kind, the student had first of all matriculated and then had got training in the third year class of the training college. That is only an idea that I have, but it might possibly be an idea worth considering. I myself think that the syllabuses of these training colleges would require modification; but a modification in the direction of making the students learn English at the same time would be a very desirable one.

Then again, coming to the second part of my honourable friend's resolution about admitting non-stipendiary students, I would put it to him whether he is not proceeding in the wrong way for increasing the supply of trained teachers. Only at the last meeting of the Legislative Council a resolution was passed which recommended to Government the opening of more training colleges. I think a greater supply of trained teachers would be better obtained by the opening of more training colleges than by increasing the number of students in the existing training colleges. So far as I can see, at present the training school at Dhulia admits as many people as it can make adequate provision for. After all, in a training school the accommodation is limited by the area of the lecture rooms; the magnitude of the practical training ought to be taken into consideration, and the practical training that is given to the students is of the highest importance. If, therefore, a larger number cannot be provided proper facilities for receiving practical training, it is no good admitting more students than Government at present admits. I do not know whether the practising school attached to the training school at Dhulia is of a sufficiently large size to allow of this practical training. I know there is a certain class of people who say that you must not have big classes. Well, after all, big classes while teaching certain subjects would not be such a bad thing, but big classes in science for instance, or in a training school would not be suitable, because they are limited by the facilities for laboratory work or, as in this case, facilities for practical training. I think, therefore, that the proper way of getting more trained teachers is not to increase the number of students in any particular school, but to open more training colleges. The Council has already made a recommendation to this effect and I think that that will be a better way of tackling this problem.

With these words I put it to my honourable friend whether it would be right to persist with this resolution and not find out some better means for effecting this purpose.

There is one more word I want to add, namely, that the Dhulia school would probably require more funds for its proper organization for the purpose of giving third year training than it is worth while to spend for the purpose. After all, if we have a very efficient institution for training teachers of the highest efficiency at Poona, it would be better really for the third year students to come to Poona than learn in the Dhulia school which has not quite so efficient facilities. I think, therefore, that the proposal of my honourable friend would require reconsideration before it is put to the Council.

The Honourable Mr. CHUNILAL VIJBHUKHANDAS MEHTA:—Your Excellency,—I am in agreement with all the remarks that have fallen from the Honourable Mr. PARANJPYE and the Honourable Mr. GARUD, with regard to the first part of this resolution. I would, therefore, confine myself only to the second part of the resolution and the remarks that I am going to make are more with a desire to elicit certain information from Government than to express my own views about the proposal that has been made.

After visiting one of these training classes it struck me that it would be possible to use the lecture rooms and practising rooms for the purpose of admitting more students to study and practise in those rooms without being given accommodation in the hostels and boarding houses. It appears that the accommodation in the colleges is really limited not by the space or by the lecture rooms that are available in the colleges themselves, but that it is limited by the space that is available in the hostel or boarding house. Now it strikes me that to ask for more training colleges and to have them built of the size and capacity of those that are at present in existence would require a great deal of money and would mean a great deal of delay. I was wondering whether it would be possible to allow non-stipendiary students either to make their own arrangements for boarding and lodging and to learn in the training colleges and whether it would be possible to make an addition to the teaching staff in the colleges by means of which two shifts of lecture hours might be introduced, so that the number taught in any one day might be double the number that is being taught at present. I understand that one main difficulty in this connection is the insistence of the educational department on the question of discipline that must be maintained for all these students who come up to the training colleges.

[At this stage His Excellency the President withdrew and the Honourable the Vice-President occupied the chair.]

I have myself no particular information on this point and, as I said, I mention this matter in order to elicit the exact state of affairs which is at present in existence. If it is not possible to allow non-stipendiary students to be admitted into the colleges for want of accommodation in the hostels of the colleges, then I am afraid it would not be advisable to accept the resolution of the Honourable Mr. GARUD, because, the consequence of that acceptance would be this: These stipendiary students at any rate are bound, after they pass out of the colleges successfully, to give their services to a municipality or a local board or some other school while the non-stipendiary students are not bound to do anything of the kind, and even if a very small proportion of these stipendiary students leaves the colleges after passing and does not join the teaching profession, then at least up to that number there is a loss in the number of trained teachers for the Presidency. I do not think that that is the result that the Honourable Mr. GARUD would like to see. The object of all of us is to increase the number of trained teachers. The only course that appears to my mind that will meet the situation is in the first place to increase the number of these colleges and, secondly, I may suggest (and I suggest it with a great deal of diffidence as I confessed before) a double shift in the colleges by which students may be allowed to study and also to practise in the training classes without being compelled to join the hostels in which as at present situated there is absolutely no accommodation for a larger number of students.

The Honourable Mr. SHRIDHAR BALKRISHNA UPASANI:—Your Excellency,—I rise to support the resolution moved by the Honourable Mr. GARUD. I think it is a resolution which should also meet with the acceptance of this Council. It is admitted that our existing training colleges are not able to supply the regular number of trained teachers. At present we have in our Presidency only 34 per cent. of trained teachers in our primary schools. The municipal and local board schools have a larger proportion, but all put together the percentage comes only to 34. The greater proportion still consists of untrained men. The Council will find by a reference to the supplement to the last report of the Director of Public Instruction that in the Central Division alone we have 1,981 untrained head-masters as against 791 trained. As regards assistants we have got only 752 trained assistant masters as against 1,522 untrained who have passed the vernacular final examination. In several cases even these are not available and in this Division alone there are not less than 222 untrained assistant masters who are neither trained nor have passed even the vernacular final. This is a state of things which as the Council will see is far from satisfactory. There is a cry in every Division for more trained teachers, and considering the area and population of the Central Division it is absolutely necessary to have both the training colleges in that Division well equipped to teach the full three years' course. The training school at Dhulia should, therefore, be allowed to train students for the third year class also.

The Poona Training College now has on its roll 287 students while the Dhulia training school has 170, Ahmedabad 294 and Dhárwár 310. The accommodation in the Dhulia training school has been recently extended and I think it can well accommodate a much larger number of students than it used to do before. What is required at the present time is not more accommodation but only a few more trained teachers to teach the third year class and that is all. If with the addition of one or two more teachers we can really get what we want, I think it is by all means desirable that it should be done.

At present the Poona Training College has to supply third year trained teachers not only for the districts of Poona, Sátára and Sholápur but also for the districts of Thána, Colába, Ratnágiri, Nagar, Násik and East and West Khándesh. Therefore, I think, it would be better to open a third year class in the Dhulia training school as it would add more to the number of trained teachers.

As the Honourable Mr. GARUD has pointed out at present from the East Khándesh, West Khándesh and Násik Districts only 5 students are sent to the third year class in the Poona Training College, namely, 2 from Násik, 2 from East Khándesh and 1 from West Khándesh. What I propose is that another third year class may be added to the Dhulia training school so that for these four districts of the Central Division there may be a class in the Dhulia training school to train third year students. If this is done, the Poona Training College may at the same time be able to supply a greater number of trained teachers than it does at present for the remaining districts.

DHULIA VERNACULAR TRAINING SCHOOL.

[Mr. Shridhar Balkrishna Upasani ; Mr. J. G. Covernton.] [7TH DECEMBER 1917.]

Now as a matter of fact under the standing rules vernacular standards 5th, 6th, and 7th are required to be taught by third year trained teachers and the number of boys in these standards—the Council will find on a reference to the statement in Supplement II to the last Report of the Director of Public Instruction—amounted to 36,809 in 1916; and if we take one teacher for one class of 35 students we shall require 1,056 third year trained teachers, but we will see that at present we have got only one trained teacher for 935 students. I do not think the present number of third year trained teachers supplied by the Poona Training College will be sufficient for all the Marathi-speaking districts. That being the case, if without any serious additional cost we can provide the needful number by accepting the Honourable Mr. GARUD'S suggestion, I think, by all means, we should accept it. For want of better teachers what do we find? We find that out of 670,000 students we have only 1,08,000 in the upper primary stage, that is, less than one-sixth of the total number, which is smaller than what it was in 1909. Under these circumstances, I think, the honourable member's suggestion for strengthening the Dhulia training school should, by all means, be welcome. Now, the expenditure for opening new training colleges will be excessive and that may well be avoided by this suggestion being adopted. Further it will be noted from the last year's report that in the Poona Training College only 190 students were admitted out of 426, in Dhulia 85 out of 137, in Ahmedabad 160 out of 804 and in Dhárwár 103 out of 505. So it will be seen that we do not admit enough number of candidates from among those who present themselves for admission to these schools, and it is owing to want of accommodation in the several schools. But if there is extra accommodation now provided in the Dhulia training school and more students can be admitted for a third year class, why not do it? We may admit more candidates as non-stipendiary. That has been done in the medical school at Poona. There additional stipendiary students are allowed, and in the same way if we allow students to come to the training schools who do not want stipends, then we shall get a larger supply without any additional expenditure for it. I think it is a very reasonable suggestion in the interests of the candidates and the training schools, and in the case of these four training schools there is enough accommodation for more students and also enough need for these trained teachers in the vernacular schools. My suggestion is to add Nagar to the existing three districts served by the Dhulia training school. Then the distribution will be equal and I think on the whole the interests of primary education will be benefited if the resolution of my honourable friend Mr. GARUD is accepted.

The Honourable Mr. J. G. COVERNTON:—Your Excellency,—This is a proposal of the Honourable Mr. GARUD. The principle is one which all of us would accept willingly and that being so the discussion has turned on questions of detail and questions of practicability. Now as regards these points, I have very little to add to what my friend the Honourable Mr. PARANJPYE has said. He quoted quite clearly and emphatically the various difficulties and objections which lay in the way of both portions of this resolution of the Honourable Mr. GARUD. As I indicated just now, nobody connected with the department, no sensible person, wishes to decrease the number of the most highly qualified trained vernacular teachers. Similarly, if the conditions allow, nobody wishes to prevent the attendance of non-stipendiary students. We admit both principles. But we have to look further than to the general principle.

Take the question of these third year trained teachers. As indicated by the Honourable Mr. PARANJPYE, we have to consider, first of all, the number of schools which would be required to be served by them and, secondly, we have to consider the financial side of the question. Now, I am afraid, it is quite common in various parts of the Presidency for the various local boards and municipalities to be unable to pay the face value of the promotions as they become due of the more expensive class of teacher. We are endeavouring to put that right, but I do not think we shall put it right very quickly if at the same time we increase the corps of the most highly trained teachers. One speaker, I think it was the Honourable Mr. GARUD himself, suggested that we might still go on turning out these third year trained men, but that they should remain on the pay of the second year men. Of course that is a possible proposition, but I put it to the Council whether it is likely to prove a popular measure. If a man takes the trouble to go through the third year of training and he passes what is really a difficult examination, is he likely to thank us or would he be content if we pay him just as much as he might have got without taking that trouble? There is a certain amount of perhaps not unnatural soreness in the minds of the vernacular teachers at the difficulty which has hitherto been experienced in paying them the pay which their certificates entitle them to. We are doing our best to remedy that, but we shall certainly not remedy it if we turn out more trained men without the possibility of their obtaining the full face value of their certificates.

There is also a further point connected with this question of the third year men and the schools to which they may be attached. The Honourable Mr. UPASANI, I think, said that the number of the higher grade primary pupils in the vernacular schools was sufficient to take up these men But he indicated himself that the number had declined. He said that the reason for the decline was that we do not provide sufficient number of teachers. I confess that I do not think that is at all the reason. The reason why such a large number of pupils now do not proceed to the higher standards in the vernacular is one which, I think, is well known to everybody, namely, that the attraction of an English or Anglo-vernacular school course takes away a very large number of students before they can enter the higher vernacular schools.

The Honourable Mr. UPASANI:—May I inquire the number of students who go to the English schools from the vernacular schools?

The Honourable Mr. COVERNTON:—I am afraid I cannot tell you off-hand what the number is; that will require reference. But the point is that our present upper primary schools are very well staffed. I have no complaints either from the deputies or anybody connected with these upper primary schools, namely, schools where education is imparted up to the seventh vernacular standard, as regards the staff. From my own acquaintance with the schools of that class, both here and in another province, I am bound to say that I think our Bombay upper vernacular system is better provided for than in any other province in India and a tribute was paid to that system by Sir Harcourt Butler. Before I left Burma, he told me that in his opinion the Bombay vernacular system was undoubtedly the best in every way in India.

Now, there is a further question put forward in this connection by the Honourable Mr. GARUD and that is that of non-stipendiary students. It is urged that non-stipendiary students should be admitted into the training schools. In the first place, we have no objection to non-stipendiaries, and in certain cases they are allowed. But there is one obvious consideration with regard to them and that, I think, is that we cannot allow them to attend the school and afterwards do what they please and thus be a sort of bar to the proper stipendiary teachers for whom the colleges are intended and with whom Government enters into strict obligations. If in any college after we have provided for all the stipendiary teachers that are required there is still room for non-stipendiaries, naturally, it would not object to take them but in the first case they should take stipendiary teachers on whom the local boards and the municipalities depend for their recruitment. The non-stipendiary is under no particular obligation and if he choses after having had his training and taken up the time of the staff in the training college to go off and seek another profession, all the time and money that has been spent upon him in the training college is naturally thrown away.

DHULIA VERNACULAR TRAINING SCHOOL.

We propose to adopt another method, which I think will meet with the wants of this Presidency—everybody is agreed that we do want many more trained teachers—and which will increase the number of trained teachers and reduce the number of untrained teachers. I have put suggestions before Government for a scheme the basis of which will be the provision of a training school or college (I should not like to adopt the ambitious word "college", we will call them "training schools"), one for each district in addition to existing training schools. That means that each district will then have a centre for training for its own teachers, and that that centre will provide for the local wants both of the municipality and the district local board.

(His Excellency the President at this stage resumed the chair.)

So we have to begin in a humble way. My own idea as to what we should do is somewhat as follows. We should start these schools with first year men and provide for turning out as many first year men as we can pay and as we can find staff to train them. As pointed out by the Honourable Mr. PARANJPYE the most pressing need, and it will be the most pressing need for some time to come, is the training of teachers to manage the lower classes of the primary schools, and for that purpose I think the first year men will do. But it is not at all contemplated to limit these schools to first year men only. I propose that in each case in accordance with the development of the district and in accordance with the provision of funds, we should add eventually another year to the training school and later on still if there is a demand, a third year. I do not myself think that all these 26 training schools would rise to the third year at all. Probably, some will rise to the second year but in respect of all districts we want a centre which would afford training up to first year, for all lower primary schools. In a good many districts these centres will afford training for second year men and in a few they will afford it for third year men. It is proposed that at first for these institutions hired houses shall be taken up. Later proper arrangements for buildings will be made.

What is, however, in my opinion, an even more urgent and more pressing need than buildings is the supply of trained female teachers. What we want to-day in this Presidency is trained women even more than trained men. If you train girls and if we have a sufficient number of trained women teachers I think we shall be able to tackle the large problem of female education.

There is one more consideration I want to press on the Council in this regard and that is that you cannot measure the accommodation and the work in these training schools and training colleges in the same way as you would the work and space in a factory or even an ordinary school. One honourable member, the Honourable Mr. CHUNILAL MEHTA, said that teachers in training colleges might be given double shifts. In this connection I do not think he considered the question of expense in giving this double shift. This means double pay, and will require also more expense for housing the staff and for their pension and there will be many other difficulties.

As a matter of fact I do not think that many members are acquainted with our present training colleges. For instance, if an honourable member visits the training college in Poona he will see that the work begins very early in the morning and goes on to late in the evening. Even so, we cannot pretend, I am afraid, that the work always gives good results or as good results as it is expected to. One of the main factors in the question to my mind is the practical training; I mean in regard to the supply of men from our own training colleges. It is common knowledge that there are training colleges everywhere but I did hope when I came to Bombay to find the supply from our training colleges to be rather superior to that in other provinces. Well, I am afraid that I cannot say that I was altogether satisfied in that respect or that in Bombay the supply is distinctly superior. We want to give much more attention to practical work. As it is there is a good deal less of practice and in certain cases too much theory. Now in order to ensure a thorough practical training we want very good and, I may add, large practising schools attached to the training colleges. Without large practising schools we cannot arrange to give the teachers in training a sufficient number of lessons to enable them to go out with that confidence to do their work which they ought to have. And that applies not only to Poona and Ahmedabad, but also to Dhulia. Honourable members, when they wish to make proposals for adding to the attendance at training colleges, must take into consideration the practising schools as well. I have had certain suggestions just recently put before me by the educational inspector of the central division in connection with the practising school at Poona, and I hope, if we are able to adopt this proposal, it will produce a considerable improvement and we may try it at Poona first, and if it meets with success there, the experiment may be applied elsewhere.

Consequently, while, as I said at the beginning of my remarks, I am glad to accept the principle of this resolution, I am afraid that we cannot guarantee at once to carry out the actual proposals. In my opinion it is better to start and spend money on these new training schools that we propose than to add a third year class immediately to Dhulia school; and in the same way I think it better to spend money on training lower primary stipendiary teachers rather than to add in our existing training colleges a large number of non-stipendiary teachers over whom we have no hold and on whom a certain amount of money spent might be thrown away.

The Honourable Sir MAHADEV BHASKAR CHAUBAL:—Your Excellency,—I do not think that I will detain the Council for more than a couple of minutes after the full and exhaustive explanation which has been given to the Council by the Director of Public Instruction, but I shall very briefly sum up the reasons for which we cannot possibly accept the resolution which has been moved by the Honourable Mr. GARUD. I entirely sympathise with the laudable desire which has prompted the mover of this resolution, as indeed was admitted by the Director of Public Instruction; in fact, everywhere, both in primary education as well as in secondary education, the great difficulty, the great want, that faces us and which we are trying to get over, is the want of proper masters and our object is to get them as early as possible. I stated to the Council last time that Government was trying to see how far it can increase the supply of trained secondary and primary teachers from the existing institutions and then to consider what else would be necessary to do in order to increase the annual output. As a matter of fact, the Director of Public Instruction has informed you that such proposals have been made and those proposals will come on in the regular course of things for consideration before Government. At the same time, as regards the first part of the Honourable Mr. GARUD'S resolution, I draw the Council's attention to the circular which, I think, I read on the last occasion, that the Government of India wishes, if possible, to so arrange the curriculum of the first year in training colleges that after one year's instruction a man could be sent out to take charge of a primary school. So while on the one hand the Honourable Mr. GARUD wants a third year class to be added to the Dhulia school, the Government of India so strongly realise the necessity of very early bringing out a large number of trained teachers that they desire, if possible, that a curriculum should be arranged for one year so that a person after a year's training would ordinarily be fit to take charge of the earlier standards in a primary school. That is a point which the Honourable Mr. PARANJPYE rightly tried to make, that while the third year students or those who have been trained fully were required for the higher standards in full primary schools (which were comparatively few), the great and the immediate want was for the vast mass of primary schools teaching the earlier standards, and for this purpose, as he said, a two years' course would be quite enough. Indeed in order to expedite the supply the attempt is to see whether we cannot possibly devise a one year course which ought to turn out a man fairly competent to teach the first four standards in primary schools. We are trying to carry out the wishes of the Government of India and the promise given to this Council by Government that they will try to increase the output of trained teachers from the present existing institutions and, if that is not sufficient, to see how otherwise to increase that output. As a matter of fact, a suggestion has already been made in this direction, as you have been just informed by the Director of Public Instruction, namely. his proposal that there should be a training school attached to each district; and while this proposal is under consideration I do not think that this Council should commit itself to accepting a resolution which requires us to increase the expenditure on one of these institutions for the purpose of getting a few more masters for full primary schools, who are not so badly needed as masters for the vast number of primary schools teaching the earlier standards.

Then, as regards the second part of the resolution, you will see that as the resolution stands I think the honourable member ought to withdraw it because, from its language the resolution assumes, there is a prohibition at present to prevent the admission of non-stipendiary students.

His resolution is:—"This Council recommends to His Excellency the Governor in Council that a third year class be added to the Vernacular Training School at Dhulia and that non-stipendiary students be admitted to that school." Let me inform the Council that there is no prohibition against the admission of non-stipendiary students into any school provided there is accommodation. You have already been informed by the Director of Public Instruction, that the whole object of these training colleges is that we should get men who would be under an agreement to serve as teachers. If you admit non-stipendiary students, they will avail themselves of the instruction in these colleges and after having done so they would be free to go where they like, and the object for which these colleges are started and are maintained at such expense to Government and to the rate-payer will not be carried out at all. Therefore, it is only proper that the main object should be to provide for the stipendiary students and, if after providing for them there is any accommodation left, then non-stipendiary students should be admitted But, so far as the resolution goes, the Director of Public Instruction has informed you and I can tell the Council that, although it is a small number as it must necessarily be, non-stipendiary students are admitted. The first claims, however, must be of those who are stipendiary students, because they are bound to enter into an agreement with Government that as soon as they complete the instruction provided in the training college they will serve Government for the purpose for which they have been trained; so that I do not think that the second part of the honourable member's resolution is at all necessary. The recommendation appears to have been made under the misunderstanding that training colleges were not permitted to admit non-stipendiary students. The Director of Public Instruction has corrected this misunderstanding and, if necessary, I can give the figures of the small number no doubt of the non-stipendiary students who have been entertained in most of these training colleges during the last few years.

For these reasons I think the Council will decide not to accept the resolution the acceptance of which could only embarrass Government in the consideration of the questions which I have mentioned.

The Honourable Mr. SIDDHANATH DHONDDEV GARUD:—Your Excellency,—The main object of my resolution is to enable the educational authorities to take full advantage of the resources that are at present at our disposal to turn out a large number of trained teachers. This resolution does not come in the way of opening fresh institutions or opening new classes in addition to the existing institutions in any way. All that this resolution contemplates at present is that full advantage shall be taken of the institution at Dhulia to enable non-stipendiary students to go through the training in large numbers.

DHULIA VERNACULAR TRAINING SCHOOL—STREET ACCIDENTS IN BOMBAY.

[7TH DECEMBER 1917.] [Mr. Siddhanath Dhonddev Garud; Sir Mahadev Bhaskar Chaubal; the President; Mr. Balkrishna Sitaram Kamat.]

Now the Honourable Sir MAHADEV CHAUBAL said that non-stipendiary students are admitted in all institutions. So far as I know there are none admitted in the Dhulia institution. The only objection which I have heard urged against this proposal, is that many third year students cannot be paid the face value of their certificates at present. It is for this reason that I urged that those students who are willing to take this third year training at their own expense in the hope that they may better their prospects in the long run by bettering their qualifications may be permitted to take advantage of this training in the Dhulia institution. Therefore, the objection that the third year students are not needed now will disappear and there will be at hand some teachers who are fully qualified when they are needed.

Government have now committed themselves to permit the introduction of compulsory education in some municipal areas and as these municipal areas come up for permission the demand for trained teachers will go on increasing. At the same time it will not be possible to turn out at once the number that is required to meet this demand. We shall have to depend upon teachers that have already qualified and all these teachers will be taken up.

I know that the Dhulia municipality even at the present moment wants a far larger number of trained teachers than can be supplied by the educational department. The difficulty which is often experienced is that the educational department cannot turn out these trained teachers as quickly as they are needed. The only solution, therefore, is to allow students to qualify themselves as trained teachers in the hope that their services may be utilized when they are needed. Government will not bind themselves to take them up nor will these students bind themselves to serve Government. They will be in existence only as a sort of reserve. The present percentage of trained teachers in our primary schools is only 30 and a far larger number than is turned out is needed to cope with the situation even at present.

The Honourable Sir MAHADEV CHAUBAL :—Does the 30 per cent. refer to the second or third year trained teachers ?

The Honourable Mr. GARUD :—I mean trained teachers generally.

The Honourable Sir MAHADEV CHAUBAL :—I hope the honourable member does not suggest that those who have had one year's training or two years' training are not to be called trained teachers. They are not fully trained teachers but they are trained teachers all the same. My question therefore was, whether the 30 per cent. he quoted includes the first two years or only the third year ?

The Honourable Mr. GARUD :—The 30 per cent. does include the three years. The number of trained teachers will also have to increase as more pupils are admitted into primary schools in the first four standards. I submit therefore that there are facilities at present which could be utilized and that Government should not be slow to take advantage of them to create a sort of reserve. These students will not have to be paid as soon as they pass out of the school and may be taken up whenever opportunity arises.

The resolution was then put to the vote and lost.

His Excellency the PRESIDENT :—Resolution No. 15. The Honourable Mr. KAMAT.

The Honourable Mr. BALKRISHNA SITARAM KAMAT :—May it please your Excellency, the resolution which I move reads as follows :—

"This Council recommends that in view of the large number of street accidents occurring in the City of Bombay, Government may be pleased to take such steps as may be necessary to provide at as early a date as possible a street ambulance service for Bombay for the conveyance of injured persons to hospitals."

STREET ACCIDENTS IN BOMBAY.

[Mr. Balkrishna Sitaram Kamat; Mr. Chunilal Vijbhukhandas Mehta.] [7TH DECEMBER 1917.]

Your Excellency,—In a large city like Bombay the need for street ambulance service is almost obvious, especially with the large influx of motor cars in recent years, I believe, it goes without saying that some such arrangements for the conveyance of injured persons to hospitals by means of an ambulance car is of the utmost necessity.

Through the kindness of the Commissioner of Police I have got a statement of street accidents and I shall read it to the Council. Since the 1st of January 1917 to 30th September 1917 there have been in the streets of Bombay, that is within nine months, 1,576 street accidents, not all fortunately of a fatal character. Of these 1,576 accidents, 498 have been due to motor-cars, 176 due to tram-cars, 897 have been due to other vehicles and 5 of a miscellaneous character. That being so, the number of accidents per month comes to 175 or roughly one-half dozen per day. I therefore think the time has now come both for Government and I believe for the Corporation to consider some means for the conveyance of injured persons immediately to hospitals in a decent manner. I do not wish to venture an opinion whether it is the duty of the Corporation or the duty of Government or of both jointly to arrange for an ambulance service. If it is thought that the Corporation ought to do these things, probably Government will be pleased to move the Corporation to take the necessary steps. But what I do know, so far as the public is concerned (and I am speaking from the point of view of the man in the street) is this, that some means have to be devised for the immediate conveyance of the injured persons. The present system is, I gather, to take injured persons from the street to the hospital in a victoria and there is probably no arrangement for any fast conveyance in which to take the injured person to the hospital. The persons who have sustained an accident may have broken a leg or an arm. He is huddled up in the victoria in any manner that the policeman thinks best. This sort of arrangement ought to be changed and some sort of motor ambulance either at a police station or fire brigade station, through some association like the St. John's Ambulance Association is necessary. Some sort of first aid to the injured persons is also necessary. I know that the St. John's Ambulance Association do take certain steps in this regard, but I gather,—I am speaking subject to correction—that at present they have no ambulances whatever. What they do now is only to train people in first aid; I believe they intend to go further and if possible to arrange for ambulances, and if that were the case, I am sure men from the Hindu, Parsi and other communities will come forward to take lessons in first aid and render such assistance in the case of accidents as may be necessary. The first thing, however, to be done would be the equipment of ambulance cars. I think I have only to bring this matter to the notice of Government, and Government will I daresay move themselves in the matter or will be pleased to move the Corporation to make the necessary arrangements.

The Honourable Mr. CHUNILAL VIJBHUKHANDAS MEHTA:—Your Excellency,—It is refreshing to find so much interest being taken in the affairs of this city by those outside it. The Honourable Mr. KAMAT took the trouble of asking the Police Commissioner for certain information with regard to the accidents in the City of Bombay. He got those figures. Had he taken a little further trouble and asked the Commissioner of Police whether there is any arrangement already in existence for the conveyance of injured persons from the streets to the hospital, he would have been told that there is such an arrangement and that it has been in existence for some little time. If his interest also had taken him to the Municipal Corporation, he would have found that there is also a further scheme by which motor ambulances are proposed to be provided in the case of accidents in the City of Bombay.

I shall tell the Council what is the exact state of the arrangements as at present existing. There are seven hand ambulances already in existence situated at some of the most important centres in the city. They are situated as follows :—

STREET ACCIDENTS IN BOMBAY.

[7TH DECEMBER 1917.] [Mr. Valkrishna Sitaram Kamat; Mr. Chunilal Vijbhukhandas Mehta; Mr. P. R. Cadell.]

The first at the Esplanade police station, the second at Princess Street police station, the third at Nagpada police station, the fourth at Suleman Chowki police station, the fifth at Dadar police station, the sixth at Delisle road police station and the seventh at the Princess Dock police station. The ambulances are in the charge of the Commissioner of Police.

The St. John's Ambulance Association suggested a scheme for locating three motor ambulances, one at each of the existing hospitals, the Goculdas Tejpal Hospital, the J. J. Hospital and the St. George's Hospital. When the scheme was being considered by Government, it was pointed out that the location of these motor ambulances at the St. George's and G. T. Hospitals would not be of much benefit to the city, not only because the number of accidents in those parts is comparatively small, but because other conveyances are within easy and early reach of the injured persons. It was also suggested that these ambulances should be in the charge of the Police Commissioner, but it was found on discussion that it would be extremely difficult to work such a scheme by which these ambulances were to be in the charge of the police authorities. It was found that it would be advisable to have one of these ambulances located in the northern parts of the city, namely the mill districts, where these accidents mostly occur, and it was arranged that one such ambulance should be so located But it was found impracticable for the control of the ambulances by the police or by the hospital authorities, and a suggestion was eventually made by which the ambulances should be located at the fire brigade headquarters and should be under the direct control of the chief officer of the fire brigade, the staff being controlled and paid for by the Association. Unfortunately, almost immediately afterwards the war broke out and the St. John's Ambulance Association have, for the present, allowed the matter to remain in abeyance. The Corporation, I may mention, have already expressed their desire to contribute towards any scheme which may be put up after the war by the St John's Ambulance Association or by any body else. The truth of the matter is that at present the ordinary hack victoria is the best means of conveying the injured persons, because it is most easily obtained without much loss of time. It has to be remembered that in the north of the island, telephones are not easily available, and it seems probable that in most cases the speedy utilization of the victoria is the most practical and the safest thing to do in case of accidents. I may mention further that when the scheme was being considered in the Corporation it was at my instance that a report has been called for as to how telephone communication could be put up in the various parts of the city and could be used just as it is being used in the case of fires occurring in the city.

The Honourable Mr. KAMAT :—May I know when the scheme was considered ?

The Honourable Mr. CHUNILAL MEHTA :—The scheme was considered about six months ago. As I say, the St. John's Ambulance Association scheme was proposed before the outbreak of the war, that is in 1914. The great difficulty about any scheme of telephone communication is that it has to be done on a large scale and possibly at great expense. That, however, is still under the consideration of the Corporation, and I am not prepared to say what conclusions have been yet arrived at, because no conclusions have been arrived at at present.

I see that the resolution says that Government should take up a scheme of this nature. I have no doubt if the scheme is at all taken up, as I hope it will be, the cost will be met not only by Government but by the Corporation and by the various large employers of labour in this city. I do not think the Honourable Mr. KAMAT made any further point in this matter.

The Honourable Mr. P. R. CADELL :—Your Excellency,—I may be permitted to add a few words because I was Municipal Commissioner when this question was brought up in the Corporation, just before the outbreak of the war. At that time, as the HonourableMr. CHUNILAL MEHTA has told you, at the instance of the St. John's Ambulance Association the matter was taken up by the Corporation. Something would doubtless have been done, but when the war broke out the St. John's Ambulance Association naturally desired to use any ambulances they could obtain to meet the more immediate needs of the war. I may at the outset remark that when strangers who usually stay at Poona see the enormous traffic in Bombay and hear of accidents occurring are inclined to think that Bombay is a very much more dangerous place than it really is. Accidents, however, of course occur, but, apart from the difficulties of providing ambulances which the honourable member has touched upon, there are other difficulties to be met before a perfect system can be devised. For instance, even when the motor ambulances are provided, you will need a system of telephones to use them properly. I hope the members of this Council will appreciate the difficulty of the question when I say that the London County Council, which is I think I may say in advance of the Bombay Municipality, has not been able to produce such a system of telephonic communication. In the year 1914 the London County Council, when enquiring into the best system of telephone communications for the working of ambulances, curiously enough came to the same conclusion as the Bombay Municipality had done, namely, that the ambulances should be kept at the fire brigade stations in preference to having them at hospitals or police stations. There would be obvious advantages in having such ambulances at hospitals or police stations, but neither the police nor the hospital authorities were willing to be responsible for the ambulances, and we had therefore to decide that we must put the ambulances in Bombay at the fire brigade stations. In dealing with this question I say the London County Council came exactly to the same conclusion, but while they are going to have their ambulances at the fire brigade stations, they propose to have a separate telephone system for the ambulances. We have got a special fire alarm telephone system already in Bombay, and I should think that the simplest method will be to use these fire-alarms to call ambulances in the case of street accidents. The Honourable Mr. KAMAT has, I think, suggested that this is a matter which Government should take up. It is a matter of purely internal administration of the city, and it is a matter which the Corporation is perfectly willing to undertake. The Corporation has not in any way repudiated their responsibility and they are willing to overcome the difficulty of making the system effective. I would again say that the necessity is not so great as it might appear to strangers to Bombay, and it is perfectly true, as the Honourable Mr. CHUNILAL MEHTA has said, that the simplest way of tackling the difficulty is by using the ordinary victoria. When an accident occurs a victoria will almost always turn up and can reach the hospital as soon as a motor which has to be called from a distance can do. It can, at any rate, meet the first essential which is to take the injured person away from the scene of accident as soon as possible. I do not think it is a matter in which Government need be concerned. Perhaps the Honourable Mr. KAMAT is not aware that the Corporation Committee passed a resolution at their meeting of September on the subject, and I think it is a matter which can be very safely left to the Corporation.

The Honourable Mr. G. S. CURTIS:—I have nothing very much to say after the remarks of the last speaker. I would only observe that I do not think it is a matter in which Government can assume any responsibility. Obviously it is in safe hands, as the matter has been dealt with by the Corporation, and when the requisite machines are available they would safeguard the city by placing ambulances in a manner most suitable to be of use. At the same time as the Honourable Mr. CHUNILAL MEHTA remarked, it is extremely refreshing to find gentlemen from Poona making enquiries about the state of things in Bombay, but it seems to me that if this principle is applied in the reverse direction it might be rather awkward for Poona. I should be delighted, I may say incidentally, if honourable gentlemen when they go to Poona in July would take a drive through the city and view the condition of some of the Poona roads and some of the Poona municipal arrangements. If resolutions are passed based on their experience they might possibly receive support from the citizens and the rate-payers of Poona. With these remarks I would ask the Council to reject the resolution.

The Honourable Mr. BALKRISHNA SITARAM KAMAT:—I do not think I have got very much to add to what I have already said on this resolution. I took an interest in this matter because of the number of accidents that occur and I suppose that the majority of the victims come from the mofussil. I am glad to find from the remarks made by the Honourable Mr. CHUNILAL MEHTA that something has been done by the Corporation and a scheme has been taken up in hand although it has not been completed. We only hope that it will be completed very soon. With these remarks I beg to withdraw my resolution.

The resolution was by leave withdrawn.

His Excellency the PRESIDENT:—Resolution No. 17. The Honourable Mr. PATEL.

The Honourable Mr. PATEL:—Your Excellency, I rise to move the following resolution:—

"This Council recommends that His Excellency the Governor in Council may, with the sanction of the Governor General in Council, be pleased to direct that in all districts of the Presidency proper except those of Thana, Surat and Poona, the trial before any court of session of all offences punishable with death, transportation for life, or imprisonment for ten years and all offences in which the accused is charged that he is, by reason of a previous conviction, liable to enhanced punishment under Section 75 of the Indian Penal Code, shall be by Jury."

My Lord, in the backward race of slow progress the question of jury system surpasses even the question of local self-government. This system was introduced in this country by the Criminal Procedure Code of 1861. The Indian Law Commissioners appointed under India Act of 1853, drafted a bill on the Code of Criminal Procedure. That bill contained provisions for the double system of jury and assessors. It was laid before the Supreme Legislative Council and referred to a select committee. The committee did not accept the double system and recommended the introduction of trial by jury. In their report to the Legislative Council they struck out altogether the provisions respecting assessors. The Council accepted the recommendation of the select committee and the bill, as passed, provided for the introduction of the jury system in all districts.

The Secretary of State for India in Council, to whom the bill was submitted for approval, intimated that the course recommended by the Law Commissioners should be followed, and the Imperial Council had thus to modify its own conclusions so as to provide that trial by session courts should be generally conducted with the aid of assessors and that the trial by jury should be extended to such localities as local Government may deem fit. The Council will thus see that but for the interference of the Home Government the jury system would have been introduced throughout the length and breadth of British India as early as 1862.

Let us now proceed to examine how far local Governments have extended this system in their respective provinces during the course of six and fifty years. I take Bengal first. The Government of Bengal introduced in the year 1862 the system of trial by jury into seven districts under Section 322 of the Criminal Procedure Code, 1861. Thirty-five years later, i.e., in 1897, the system was extended to four other districts. Last year a resolution for the extension of the system to the remaining sixteen districts of the Bengal Presidency was moved by one of the non-official members. The honourable member on behalf of Government promised to look into the matter and requested the mover to withdraw the resolution. The offer was not accepted and the resolution after a very interesting debate was put to vote with the result that 24 voted for the resolution and 22 against it.

I now come to the United Provinces. In the year 1884 the Government of the United Provinces issued a notification directing that in the three districts, viz., Allahabad, Benares and Lucknow, the session trial shall be conducted by jury with regard to certain offences. No further advance having been made by Government in this direction since then, a non-official member moved a resolution recommending the extension of the system to nine other districts. Government adopted an extremely hostile attitude towards this modest resolution with the result that when it was put to vote it was carried by 21 against 20.

In Madras the system is extended to all the districts except the agency tracts. In Assam, too, the system, I am informed, is of general application.

In our Presidency the system of trial by jury was first extended to Poona district in 1867. Later on during Lord Ripon's viceroyalty the system was further extended to the districts of Ahmedabad, Surat, Thana, Belgaum and the city of Karachi between the years 1884 and 1885. As matters stand at present, so far as the Presidency proper is concerned, the trial before any court of session in the districts of Poona, Surat and Thana of all offences punishable with death, transportation for life and imprisonment for ten years is by jury ; while in the district of Ahmedabad such trial extends to offences punishable with death only. I do not wish to refer to the unfortunate district of Belgaum in reference to which we had some rather unpleasant discussion in this Council only a few months ago. The object of this resolution is to secure for all the districts of the Presidency proper trial by jury of all offences punishable with death, transportation for life or imprisonment for ten years and of all offences in which the accused is charged that he is by reason of previous conviction liable to enhanced punishment under section 75 of the Indian Penal Code.

The position, my Lord, is quite clear. The last notification was issued 32 years ago. The progress that education has made during that long period cannot be denied, and it is high time that Government threw off this vacillating policy in regard to this question. In this matter of trial by jury, the first and foremost right of the British citizenship, more than half a century has elapsed in a half hearted and a very limited experiment. There has been a long and indeed a very long 'pull' but there should now be a 'pull' altogether. I ask Government and the members of this Council to rise above all narrow considerations and wholeheartedly accept a recognized principle for the vindication of British justice in the administration of this—the foremost province in the country. My Lord, I have always regarded that it is one of the great blots on the administration of criminal justice in this country that whereas in the case of the trial of Europeans all offences are to be tried by jury, in the case of offences committed by Indians hey are not to be similarly tried. But as I do not wish to raise any racial controversy I pass on to other points in support of my resolution.

Those of us who have taken part in criminal practice and appeared in sessions trials specially those presided by a European judge must have noticed that in many cases it has not been so much possible for a European judge to follow the evidence that is given by the witness as would have been possible for an Indian judge or for an Indian who happens to be a juryman sitting along with a European judge. My Lord, only a few months ago I was arguing an appeal before the High Court against the order of conviction passed by a certain sessions judge. The Government pleader pointed out that certain inferences must be drawn against the accused for his having not explained in his statement before the sessions court certain matters appearing in evidence against him. As a matter of fact, these matters had been explained and notes taken thereof by the Shirastedar in the language of the accused. This explanation was not at all noted by the sessions judge in his notes of evidence in English. I brought this to the notice of the judges, whereupon the entire vernacular statement of the accused was ordered to be translated. The translation was then compared with the sessions judge's notes and both read quite differently. The point is that evidence is followed and appreciated most by a person who belongs to the nationality of the witness and who is acquainted with the customs and manners of the people. No doubt there are assessors to assist the judge. But we are all aware that this system is a failure. If the judge agrees with the assessors it is all right. If, on the other hand, the judge disagrees with them, in that case the opinion of the assessors is of no value.

It is said that the institution of trial by jury is exotic to India. To this objection my reply is that in a country where Panchayat system was prevalent from time immemorial and where the voice of the five is up to this day respected as the voice of God, this system cannot be called an institution imported from abroad.

Another argument advanced against the extension of the jury system is that jurors sometimes return wrong verdicts. My Lord, jury system after all is a human institution and the jurors are after all human beings. Like all other men jurors are also liable to err. And it is therefore natural and inevitable that the verdict of the jurors in some cases will be erroneous. But I ask in all seriousness whether there exists any tribunal of any description in any country which is absolutely free from wrong verdicts? Are not the decisions of the sessions judges in the non-jury districts reversed by the High Courts in a large number of cases? Have we not known of capital sentences passed by non-jury judges replaced by the order of acquittal by the High Courts? How often have we heard the decisions of our Bombay High Court set aside by their Lordships of the Judicial Committee? Has not the elaborate machinery of our law courts beginning from the courts of the magistrates and sub-judges with provisions for appeal in the courts of district magistrates and the district and sessions judges and for the second appeal and revision and reference in the High Courts with the Privy Council in England as the highest Tribunal for counteracting and undoing all the blunders committed by courts of the various judges in India, for its basis the fundamental truth that verdicts of all courts and all tribunals must inevitably be wrong in some cases? No institution is or can be ideally perfect.

It is contended, my Lord, that enough number of jurors will not be available in all districts and that the Presidency is not yet fitted for such a progressive institution which requires a good deal of public spirit education and intelligence. To this my answer is that one of our districts was found fit for the jury system in 1867; that four more districts were found fit in 1884, and if after 33 years of further continued progress in education and material prosperity, in public spirit and capacity for self-government, Government cannot find other districts fit for trial by jury, then I think it is our misfortune and our case is hopeless and our aspirations for popular institutions are vain and futile. If the system has proved a success in some districts, there is no reason to suppose that it will not be so in other districts. When you say that enough people are not available, I ask have you tried to find out such people? Whence do come all the assessors? Whence the jurors in the jury districts? Or the honorary magistrates? The nominees of Government on the taluka and district boards and municipalities? What is the use of saying that people are not fit before they have been placed in a position of responsibility? How do we expect people to learn to swim before they have entered water?

Then again, my Lord, we are told that in India a juror is averse to pass a verdict of guilty particularly in murder cases. I say Indians should be given credit for a certain amount of common sense. They are not expected to risk their homes and hearths by keeping a real culprit loose in the society to commit depredations. It is the instinct of self-preservation, of protecting his family, his relations and friends which leads a man to punish the criminals. And an Indian juror is not a bit behind others in seeing that the society gets free of the wrong-doer.

As I observed a little while ago, cases of miscarriage of justice may and will occur. But are there not ample safeguards in the Criminal Procedure Code for it? A judge is not bound to agree with the verdict of the jury and is entitled to refer the matter to the High Court under Section 307 of the Code. Thus the highest court of appeal in the country can set the matter right if there is the least ground for suspecting injustice. I have with me statistics to show in how many cases tried by jury since the year 1885 upto the end of 1914 in the whole Presidency the judges agreed or disagreed with the verdict of the jury and in how many of them on a reference to the High Court that court disagreed with the jury.

The total number of cases tried by jury in Belgaum, Poona, Thana, Surat and Ahmedabad was 1,174, 1,013, 1,268, 402, and 474 respectively from the 1st January 1885 to the end of 1914. The total number of cases in which the sessions judge made a reference to the High Court under Section 307 of the Code of Criminal Procedure during that period was 81, 59, 86, 18 and 55 respectively. And the total number of cases in which the High Court upheld wholly the opinion of the sessions judge was 49, 46, 62, 9 and 34 respectively during that period. These figures show that the total number of cases tried by jury in the Presidency proper during the period of 30 years ending 31st December 1914 is 4,331. The judges agreed with the verdict of jury in 4,032 cases, i.e., 93 per cent. of the total number of cases tried. In 299 cases only judges differed and made a reference to the High Court. The High Court agreed with the verdict of jury in 99 and disagreed in 200 cases.

The Honourable Sir MAHADEV CHAUBAL:—Has the honourable member collected similar figures about agreement with assessors.

The Honourable Mr. PATEL:—No, I have not got them.

What more proof is required to prove that the system of trial by jury has proved a great success in this Presidency and the fears entertained in some quarters regarding competency and capacity of the jurors are unfounded?

The judges either agree or disagree with the verdict of the jury. If they agree, then certainly the verdict is not erroneous in their estimate. It is only when they disagree that the judge calls the verdict of jurors to be erroneous. Now the verdict of the jury cannot with confidence be said to be erroneous merely because the judge disagrees with the same. What is the justification for saying that in all cases of difference of opinion the judge is right and the jury is wrong? One should have thought that the jurymen being drawn from the people themselves are better able to decide questions of fact than the judges who are more or less unfamiliar with the customs and manners and the languages of the accused and the witnesses. It is universally admitted that jurors are more often right in finding of facts than judges. I shall quote the testimony of three judges from three provinces. In the year 1890 Sir Charles Farran, Chief Justice of Bombay, said: "The verdict of jurors, by reason of local knowledge they possess and their perfect acquaintance with the habits, customs and modes of thought of the accused and of the witnesses examined before them, is more likely to be correct than the decision of a judge, though the latter approaches the considerations of a case with a more trained intelligence and a more logical mind but with less accurate perfection of native life and native thought."

Mr. Woogan, District Judge of Cuttuck, observed so far back as 1884:—"I have often found the assessors as a rule take an intelligent interest in the proceedings, and although I think them in some cases prone to acquit, I have frequently found, where I have overruled, that their doubts were endorsed by the High Court on appeal."

TRIAL BY JURY.

[7TH DECEMBER 1917.] [Mr. Vithalbhai Jhaverbhai Patel; the President.]

Mr. Benson, a judge of Madras Presidency, remarked in 1890:—"Jurors are more often right on facts than judges in their self-sufficiency give them credit for."

This view is shared by the Bengal Jury Commission who observed:—"That compared with the sessions judges a local jury shall be better able to draw inference of fact and to discriminate between the truth and falsehood of conflicting oral evidence given in their language. One of the greatest disadvantages of a sessions trial in this country is that many of our European judges do not know the language of the accused and the witness and some of them do not care to know it. This is simply disastrous for the ends of justice."

Again, it should also be borne in mind that some of the erroneous verdicts are probably due to want of practice on the part of judges in the very difficult art of charging the jury. A good and clear charge or an insufficient one makes all the difference in a verdict. In a jury trial the judge must play the roll of a friend, philosopher and guide to jurors.

There is, my Lord, one more point to which I should like to refer. The success of jury system depends upon a proper selection of jurors. Justice is done in all cases if we get intelligent and duly qualified jurors. If the preparation of the list of jurors is left to an irresponsible subordinate officer, it cannot be viewed as satisfactory. The legal practitioners who by virtue of their special knowledge are competent to weigh evidence properly have been excluded from sitting as jurors. Of course, I do not overlook the weighty consideration which may justify the exclusion of practising criminal lawyers from the jury. But there is many a legal practitioner both at the headquarters of the districts as well as in the sub-divisions who does not at all deal with criminal cases. There are also quite a number of graduate and undergraduate teachers who may serve as jurors, and if the jury list is carefully prepared by responsible men and not left to the police officer there will not be wanting a sufficiently strong jury list for every district.

My Lord, the great importance which the people attach to the privilege of trial by jury and the real necessity that exists for its liberal application in this country were some time ago emphasised by a very high authority whose opinion is entitled to the greatest respect. Sir Richard Garth, the late Chief Justice of Bengal, shortly after his retirement said "Of all the privileges, I believe, which Parliament has bestowed upon India there is none more highly prized by the people than the right of trial by jury and well they may prize it. The police are notoriously corrupt and mendacious, and the magistrates too often inexperienced and the Government, I am sorry to say, far too prone to put an undue pressure upon the mofussil judges to convict, so that the life and liberties of innocent persons are often in great jeopardy and the best safeguard they have is an independent jury who knows the crooked ways of police and can see their fraud and falsity."

His Excellency the PRESIDENT:—Who wrote that?

The Honourable Mr. PATEL:—Sir Richard Garth, your Excellency.

His Excellency the PRESIDENT:—Who is this gentleman of whom I have never heard?

The Honourable Mr. PATEL:—That is Sir Richard Garth, the late Chief Justice of Bengal.

His Excellency the PRESIDENT:—When did he write that? Can my honourable friend give me the year?

The Honourable Mr. PATEL:—I think he wrote it just before his retirement but I do not remember the year exactly. His opinion exactly tallies with the opinion recently expressed by the Commissioners in Bengal who were asked to make inquiry in the matter.

My Lord, I ask the Council to bear with me when I read the opinion of the Bengal Jury Commission on police methods referred to by Sir Richard Garth.

TRIAL BY JURY.

[Mr. Vithalbhai Jhaverbhai Patel; the President; Mr. Pandurang Anant Desai.] [7TH DECEMBER, 1917.]

The Commissioners say " There is no doubt that some of the verdicts alleged to be erroneous may be fairly attributed to distrust of police evidence and of the manner in which cases are got up by the police. This distrust has not been without reason in the past. But steps have been taken to improve the police generally and in particular, investigation and preparation of cases shall be entrusted to a higher and more trustworthy class of officers. With these improvements the distrust may be expected to disappear."

Whether the hope of improvement of police and their methods may or may not be justified by the event or whether distrust of the police evidence will or will not disappear, we have at all events here a most significant and unequivocal pronouncement that the alleged erroneous verdict are not always so in point of fact, that it is unreliable police evidence which is the real cause of failure of prosecution.

His Excellency the PRESIDENT :—That I take it was purely with reference to the province of Bengal.

The Honourable Mr. PATEL :—Of course, the Commission was with regard to Bengal but I do not think that in this matter of juries the conditions are different in this province than those in Bengal.

If there is anything wrong in those cases, it is not in the verdict of jury, but in the very inception of the case, i.e., in the placing of the wrong men upon trial and attempt to obtain conviction by evidence which is not acceptable to the jury. The only thing left to the police is the stereotyped cry,—the verdict is wrong—the verdict is perverse.

Lastly, I ask this Council, my Lord, to look at this question from a political and a moral point of view.

In the administration of justice the jury system may be looked upon as a measure of self-government. So far back as 1872 Sir Charles Campbell, although rather hostile to the jury system in India, remarked in the course of the debate in the Supreme Legislative Council that the system had a great effect on the political education of the people inasmuch as they were induced to take part in self-government in the administration of justice.

This system is also calculated to promote co-operation between the people and the judiciary and will provide a common platform where the leading and educated men of the whole district can meet the judges.

Sir J. F. Stephen in his history on criminal law of England observes as follows :—

" Though the judges are known to be independent of the Executive Government it is naturally felt that their sympathies are likely to be on the side of the authority. The public at large feel more sympathy with jurymen than they feel with judges and accept their verdict with much less hesitation and distrust than they would feel towards judgments, however ably written and expressed."

Are not these remarks, my Lord, applicable with much more force to the conditions prevailing in this country ?

In conclusion, my Lord, I ask Government to say whether in their opinion they regard this system, introduced 56 years ago, a success or a failure. Surely the experiment for this long period ought to suffice to enable Government to answer this question. If you answer this question in the affirmative, you are bound to accept this resolution. If you, however, say that the experiment is a failure, it is your duty to make the pronouncement boldly and abolish the system altogether and without delay.

The Honourable Mr. PANDURANG ANANT DESAI :—May it please your Excellency,—I rise to support very heartily the resolution which has been so ably placed before the Council by my honourable friend Mr. PATEL. It is desirable to extend the system of jury to all the districts. The opponents mostly put forth the objection that this jury system is a foreign system and cannot thrive well if implanted on the Indian soil. If we look to the historical works, if we look to the Smritis, we find that the law-givers have laid down that disputes should be tried by persons well-versed in the shastras and by persons well-versed in the several departments of knowledge. In the Smriti of Manu who was the first law-giver of India he says that a learned Brahman should take the assistance of persons who know different professions and who have got experience of the world and through their assistance he is to determine the disputes which are brought before the authorities. We find a similar provision made in the later Smritis. Your Excellency probably knows that the Smriti period was from the first to the sixth century. After the advent of the Mahomedan rule and after the advent of the Maratha rule, we find that the disputes were generally referred to the Punchayats and the decisions of the Punchayats were taken as the decisions of God. Generally five persons were chosen by the litigants themselves with the approval of the judge or with the approval of the state authority and the decision given by these five persons was accepted as God's decision. We have got in Marathi the phrase which means that the voice of the five is the voice of God, probably because the highest deity among the Hindus is the Mahadeva who is described as having five mouths. Therefore the five persons who are chosen as Punchayats were looked upon as part and parcel of God who could have no partiality in the decision of the disputes referred to him. This would show that the argument that this jury system is a foreign system has no force in it.

There is the second argument that has been advanced by the critics or the opponents of this system and that is that we cannot find able and competent men to decide questions with proper judgment. My honourable friend Mr. PATEL has quoted the figures from several reports which would show that in 90 per cent. of cases we find the judges agreed with the jury.

The Honourable Sir Mahadev Chaubal asked about assessors. I have got last year's figures about assessors. The annual administration report of last year shows that judges agreed with the assessors in 69·6 per cent. of the cases which were decided by the judges in sessions courts with the assistance of assessors.

When education is spreading in the whole Presidency, I do not think that it can be urged with any show of reason that there would be any difficulty in finding out good jurors. The sessions cases are tried in the district towns where there would be no difficulty in finding good and competent men to serve as jurors.

Another reason which is put forth by the critics is that by extending the jury system you lose the important right of appeal to the High Court. The law is that the jury being the judges on questions of fact there is no appeal as regards the determination by the jury of questions of fact and an appeal lies to the High Court only on the ground of legal questions. So it is said if we extend the jury system to all the districts the result of that would be that if the jury gives a wrong verdict then on questions of fact, there could be no appeal and thereby as you lose the right of appeal, the people would lose this important right and thereby their case would be prejudiced. As regards that point my submission is that if we see the figures that have been quoted by the Honourable Mr. PATEL we find that in about 50 per cent. of cases the verdict of the jury was accepted by the High Court even when the judges who tried with the assistance of jurors disagreed with the verdict of the jury. So in 50 per cent. of the cases the verdict of the jury was accepted by the High Court and this will show that only in a very small percentage of cases the verdict of the jury was not accepted by the High Court. I therefore submit that there is no force in the argument that the verdicts of the jury are perverse or are verdicts which are not proper. In 90 per cent. of the cases the verdicts of the jury have been upheld during the last 30 years. It is only in 7 per cent. of cases that the judges did not agree with the verdicts of the jury.

[Mr. Pandurang Anant Desai; the President; Mr. Siddhanath Dhonddev Garud; Mr. Sheikh Ghulam Hussein Hidayatallah; Mr. Vithalbhai Jhaverbhai Patel.]

Then it will be seen that the jurors are taken from the communities knowing the manners and customs of the people. They know the language, they know the manners and habits of the people, that is, the witnesses who are examined before them. It is very difficult for a man to appreciate properly the phrases which are used by witnesses unless he knows their language, habits and customs intimately and therefore it is desirable that every trial should be by the help of a jury.

With these remarks I support the resolution.

His Excellency the PRESIDENT:—I think perhaps it will be to the convenience of the Council if we adjourn till 3 o'clock.

The Council adjourned for lunch till 3 o'clock.

After lunch.

His Excellency the PRESIDENT:—Order, order. Further consideration of Resolution No. 17.

The Honourable Mr. SIDDHANATH DHONDDEV GARUD:—Your Excellency, I rise to support the resolution brought before the Council by the Honourable Mr. PATEL. Of all other forms of trials trial by jury is undoubtedly the best. The only objection that has been urged against it so long is that it is not often possible to find enough people in the mofussil to work on juries. That objection I submit is not now tenable. It is possible to find, in the headquarters of every district, enough educated and independent people to sit on these benches.

My lawyer friends will, I think, bear me out when I say that in cases which are tried by individual judges the percentages of convictions and the severity of punishments often vary as they say with the length of the judge's foot. In cases coming before jurors, the general sense of the population practically makes them come to decisions which are usually acceptable. And now that some other provinces have decided to take up the system of trial by jury, I hope that our Council too will persuade itself to adopt this system in our Presidency. The Madras and the Bengal Councils have adopted this system by a majority vote of the Council, the United Provinces Council has also gone in for it and I hope that our Council too would show that this system would be acceptable in our Presidency.

The Honourable SHEIKH GHULAM HUSSEIN HIDAYATALLAH:—Your Excellency, I propose an amendment to this resolution. It is as follows:—

After the words "the Presidency proper" add the words "and in the district of Hyderbad, Sind".

His Excellency the PRESIDENT:—Does the Honourable Mr. PATEL accept this addition?

The Honourable Mr. PATEL:—I have no objection to accept the addition proposed by my honourable friend SHEIKH GHULAM HUSSEIN.

The Honourable SHEIKH GHULAM HUSSEIN HIDAYATALLAH:—Your Excellency, we all know that the jury system is an integral part of the administration of British justice. Previous speakers have shown how the jury system is the great safeguard against bad administration of justice. The real test to decide whether the jury system should be extended to a particular district or not is to see whether in that district there is a sufficient standard of intelligence and education prevalent or not.

My amendment deals with the district of Hyderabad only. I do not propose that this system should be extended to the sessions division of Hyderabad which includes Nawabshah and Thar and Parkar, but I simply ask that the jury system be extended to the Hyderabad district alone.

TRIAL BY JURY.

[7TH DECEMBER 1917.] [Mr. Sheikh Ghulam Hussein Hidayatallah; Sardar Shriniwas Coopooswamy Mudliar.]

My reasons are these:—All who know Sind will admit that Hyderabad is a great centre of education. Looking to the large number of schools it has, and looking to the large number of Sindi students that are in the Sind College and in the various other colleges it will appear that they all belong to the district of Hyderabad. In fact in the town of Hyderabad where the Sessions Court holds its trials a sufficient number of intelligent and educated men could be found who can discharge the duties of a jury very satisfactorily. There is a sufficient standard of intelligence and education in the town of Hyderabad where a sufficient number of people could be had to discharge the functions of a jury satisfactorily.

With these remarks I support the resolution.

The Honourable SARDAR SHRINIWAS COOPOOSWAMY MUDLIAR:—My Lord,—I cannot help supporting the resolution proposed by my honourable friend Mr. PATEL and this I am constrained to do for two special reasons that particularly appeal to me from my experience obtained by observations of jury working in the Deccan. I do not wish to weary the Council with any further details of a historical nature to prove that the jury system in one form or another existed in this country from time immemorial. I prefer to take my stand in favour of the extension of this system in the light of its modern mode of working. I shall concede the strongest point that can be urged against it and would in spite of it submit for maintenance that no dereliction on the part of the system can be pointed out as amounting to gross miscarriage of justice. We know where juries and judges have disagreed and the latter have been upheld, but then after all has been said and done, the analysis can only reveal a fact that it was one opinion against another. It will however, I have no doubt, be conceded that there are also various instances in which the opinion of the juries has been upheld. I am however of opinion as stated at the outest of my remarks that, apart from these considerations, there are two reasons which impel me to support this resolution and I submit that it ought to be done even at the cost of a thought that in some instance some injustice may have accrued. That we know from experience to happen even in the case of any single tribunal as at present constituted. But against the drawbacks we have the educational standards to keep in view and it is these that must drive anyone possessing a reasonable balance of mind and knowledge of his countrymen to conclude that these two standards must be achieved at any cost and there can be no justification at least in going back on the system. Those of us who have served on the jury know that it is a great education which trains the mind to sift the truth and find legal conclusions and this training helps in a way to build up character and mind for appreciating the truth of a given case. Its efficiency too cannot be denied. Whatever else may be said against it, one thing is certain. However good and clever a judge may be, it happens, in innumerable cases, that certain facts transpire in a case of which the best and natural judges are the local men. This fact alone, even leaving several other, ought to be an enormous impetus to bring into prominence the system of trial by jury. Even conceding for the sake of argument that it is a system of western birth we have now in almost all district towns enough of elements to meet the need for appreciation from that point of view. In England the system came into existence when perhaps the education of the people was not what it is to-day and it has grown since its first inauguration. In India it has begun and it would be a great pity to go back on it. The Government ought by every means at its command to support this means of doling out justice which with its drawbacks has other compensating advantages which we cannot afford to overlook. It is a source of great assistance to the judge and besides there are good channels to correct and overcome any error that may arise through any untoward decision on the part of the jury. That being so I submit that the system must not only be not curtailed but extended, and being conscious of its manifold advantages I have much pleasure in supporting the resolution.

TRIAL BY JURY.

[Mr. Gokuldas Kahandas Parekh; Mr. H. S. Lawrence.] [7TH DECEMBER 1917.]

The Honourable Mr. GOKULDAS KAHANDAS PAREKH:—May it please your Excellency,—As an old lawyer I have my natural predilection for trials by jury. I look, however, at the question only from one standpoint. The trials whether by jury or assessors are mere instruments of justice, and the only question that one has to consider is which form of trial will better help the interests of justice—whether the trial by jury or the trial by a judge with the aid of assessors. If the view expressed by some of my honourable friends that an English judge is less competent to form a correct opinion upon the evidence than jurors promiscuously chosen is correct, trial by jury must necessarily be accepted. But I feel some doubt whether in the case of experienced judges — and most of the district judges are experienced judges — you can generally say that the view of the judge on facts where he differs from the view of the jury is less acceptable than the verdict of the jury. It appears to me that in any case we must say that both are entitled to equal weight; if not, the view of the judge of several years' experience is perhaps entitled to greater weight than the view of the jury.

The next thing to which I wish to draw the Council's attention is that it ought not to be taken, from the number of cases where references have been made and the small number of cases in which the verdicts of the jury were set aside, that the judge's view is generally wrong even in these cases. The law upon this point as it is understood is this, that the verdict of the jury is accepted unless it is perverse or so grossly improper as to require interference. Otherwise, unless the party is able to show that the verdict of the jury was perverse or so bad that the judges ought not to accept it, even though the appreciation of the evidence may not be accepted and even though upon the evidence the judges of the High Court may come to a different conclusion from the verdict of the jury, still unless they see that it is quite erroneous, they have to uphold it. This being the law, I think that the number of cases in which the verdict of the jury is upheld is certainly no ground for saying that in all the other cases the judge was wrong

My own view upon this question is that the fact that the intelligence, education and the character of the people in the country have improved during the last few years is a very important element for consideration. I do understand that there have been old views, old expressions of opinion, by the judges of the High Court which lead to the conclusion that the jury system is almost a failure; but I should think, looking to the condition of education in the country, that view may have to be revised. At all events, my own view is that all the districts have not equally advanced. There may be some districts which are very well advanced; there may be some which might still be regarded as backward. There may be places where you cannot get a sufficient number of good or reliable jurors. There are differences in the districts. But Government have the High Court judges for consultation and, if a reference is made to them, they will be able to advise Government as to the districts in which the system may be introduced and those in which it would not be proper to do so. If a reference is made and if the Government try to give the powers of trial by jury according to the view of the High Court Judges, I think an advance in that direction would not all be unwise.

The Honourable Mr. H. S. LAWRENCE:—Your Excellency,—I was much gratified to hear the Honourable Mr. PAREKH discuss the point of view whether trial by jury would or would not advance the cause of justice; for that is a point on which the honourable mover appeared to me to lay insufficient stress. The honourable mover omitted to mention in what language these trials should be conducted. He stated that since Government were able to secure persons fit to be honorary magistrates, co-operators, and municipal councillors, there could be no difficulty in securing competent jurors. He appears to have forgotten that there is no necessity for the qualification of a knowledge of English to an honorary magistrate, a co-operator or a municipal councillor; whereas this qualification is necessary for a juror.

TRIAL BY JURY.

[7TH DECEMBER 1917.] [Mr. H. S. Lawrence; Mr. Siddhanath Dhonddev Garud.]

It may certainly be suggested that whereas for fifty years, under the control of the Bombay High Court, all sessions cases which are tried with the help of a jury have been tried in the English language, this is no longer necessary, and that cases should be tried in the vernacular of the special region. This is an interesting and arguable proposition. We have heard recently of a movement for the renaissance of Indian languages in various matters; that University degrees should be given in the vernacular, that a Women's University should be started in the vernacular, and so on. These movements may have great vitality, and may come to perfect fruition. But the Council will no doubt remember that there has been a considerable divergence of opinion in the past. Some 15 years ago, when His Excellency Lord Curzon, with the assistance of Sir Bampfylde Fuller, held an enquiry whether vernacular languages should not be the medium of instruction in agricultural and other scientific colleges in India, great opposition was aroused; and some hostile critics even accused the Government of India of a desire to retard the progress of higher education in India by this insidious movement. And if the vernacular languages are a suitable medium for the trial of cases of life and death, shall we not naturally proceed to the use of the vernacular languages for discussion in this Council hall? Quite conceivably, that may be a development of the future, but I would only ask now whether the honourable member, in advocating his present policy, is prepared to carry it to its logical ultimate conclusion.

But let us now return to the question whether the adoption of the vernacular in jury cases in a Court of Sessions will really be beneficial to the state. There are two main arguments against the proposition. Firstly, the interests of justice: interests, that is to say, both of the crown and of the accused person. A certain degree of education, of power, of thought and of judgment, is necessary to qualify a man to be a juror; and it has been held in the past that the qualification is best ensured by a knowledge of English. This does not mean that there are no men of ability without a knowledge of English, but simply that the best universal test easy of application, and exempt from the likelihood of error or of favour, is the English test.

The Honourable Mr. GARUD:—May I tell your Excellency that all trials in mofussil in sessions cases are conducted in the vernacular?

The Honourable Mr. LAWRENCE:—Not in English? Is there not an interpreter?

The Honourable Mr. GARUD:—No.

The Honourable Mr. LAWRENCE:—I don't know.

Secondly, as regards our judges. It is not an easy task to charge a jury even in the English language; it is a very difficult task in any vernacular language. It is not easy to be certain that the jury do understand the charge in the English language; it is quite impossible to be certain in the vernacular. But then some light-hearted gentleman will say, "Let all the judges be Indians." This will in no way improve the position. We have four main vernacular languages in this Presidency, Sindhi, Gujarati, Marathi and Kanarese. A Marathi judge will make as many mistakes in Sindhi as an Englishman; and a Gujarati judge has the greatest difficulty in mastering Kanarese; and so with all the other varieties. This multiplicity of tongues in some places even affects the juries. I have heard of a jury sitting in Belgaum, the mother-tongue of one juror being English, of a second Marathi, a third Kanarese, a fourth Konkani and a fifth Portuguese; and the only common language that they all understood was English.

I think the Council will agree that these two arguments render it inadvisable to change the language in which jury cases are conducted from English, and to establish a jury where English-speaking jurors are not available.

On the other hand, it is alleged that accused persons prefer a trial before a jury. I have also heard another version of this story, that an accused person who is guilty prefers a jury, and that an accused person who is innocent prefers a judge. We must remember that the finding of a jury on the facts of a case is conclusive; and every man with experience of law courts knows of cases where an appeal to the High Court could have succeeded on the facts had not the judge been debarred by the verdict of the jury from considering those facts. I mention this not as an argument against having any juries at all, but as an argument in favour of seeing that your jurors are as competent as possible.

Further, it is clearly advisable that the system should be introduced in regard to cases of less importance first. Thirty years ago, when the Bombay Government established juries, they separated themselves from the principles adopted in the rest of India by giving the most important cases to these new and untried bodies to deal with. If any extension is now possible, it should begin by handing over the less important cases to juries, and when they have shown their competence, their jurisdiction may be correspondingly extended.

The Honourable the Advocate General (Mr. T. J. STRANGMAN):—Your Excellency,—I find myself unable to support this resolution as it seems to me that none of the arguments that have been advanced in support have any substance whilst there are arguments against of considerable weight.

Now at the outset I would like to deal with two matters. Certain speakers have attempted to give this question a political aspect. It has been put in this way. Is it or is it not just that a certain further and higher right should be conferred on the people, namely, the right to try their fellowmen? That I submit is an entirely erroneous aspect of the question. The only point on which the Council is called upon to give an expression of opinion is this. Is it or is it not in the interests of justice that the jury system should be extended in the manner proposed? Are better results than are at present obtained likely to be obtained by such an extension? The second matter is this that we are not concerned here with any attempt to reintroduce an indigenous system which has fallen into disuse but what we are concerned with is an attempt to extend a system which is foreign to India. It has been suggested by some speakers that there is an analogy to the jury system in the village punchayat. There is no analogy whatever. The village punchayat, so far as I know, never dealt with criminal cases of a more serious character than petty assaults.

Now it is necessary in approaching the question under consideration to consider in the first place the points of difference between a trial by a judge and jury and trial by a judge either alone or with assessors and these differences are twofold: firstly as to who is to decide the facts and secondly as to the powers of interference of the High Court. In a trial by a judge and jury the jury have to decide all questions of fact and the judge is merely entitled to decide questions of law, whereas in a trial by a judge with or without assessors the judge decides all questions both of fact and law.

As regards the powers of interference of the High Court, in a trial by a judge and jury if a judge disagrees with the jury and he is clearly of opinion that it is necessary for the ends of justice to submit the case to the High Court he has to submit the case accordingly. Here, I would point out that it is not sufficient merely that he should disagree with the jury but he must be clearly of opinion that it is necessary in the ends of justice that the case should be submitted to the High Court. If he does so then the High Court is entitled to deal with the matter as it were an ordinary appeal. A reference to this provision is necessary in order among other things to expose the fallacy of the figures quoted by the Honourable Mr. PATEL. He put those figures forward suggesting that those were the only instances in which judges had disagreed with juries. That is not the case at all. Those are cases where the judge not only disagreed but was clearly of opinion that it was necessary for the ends of justice that the case should be submitted to the High Court. There must, however, have been numerous cases where the judge disagreed with the jury and yet no reference was made. A judge must often have said to himself: "Here are five men who decide this way and it is not for me, although I disagree with them, to carry the matter further." Suppose then the judge does not submit the case the result is that there can be an appeal only on a question of law. Now, generally speaking, a question of law would only arise in three instances. First of all, if it could be said that the judge had misdirected the jury; secondly, if it could be said that he had improperly accepted or rejected evidence; and thirdly, if it could be said that there was an absence of evidence on some material point. A mere weakness of evidence on a material point will not suffice, and the result is that numerous cases come before the High Court where the judges would have come to a different conclusion on the evidence but are powerless to interfere. Now, in other cases, that is to say, in cases tried by a judge either with or without assessors the right of appeal is unrestricted. It lies whether on a question of law or on a question of fact, and that it is an exceedingly important right, will be seen from the number of cases in which the High Court have interfered. So that bearing these matters in mind the design of the resolution is in reality twofold. First of all to hand over the decision on questions of fact to a body of laymen who are quite unversed in weighing or appreciating evidence, and in the second place to cut down the present right of appeal so as to make it in reality illusory. Viewed in this light the proposal of the Honourable Mr. PATEL appears to be far from attractive. If there is one thing dear to the litigant, whether in a civil or a criminal court, it is an unrestricted right of appeal.

Now to deal very shortly with the arguments against the resolution, First take the matter from the point of the jurors: You have five persons, all busy men I suppose, called upon to come and assist one man in performing a duty which that one man is trained and thoroughly competent to perform by himself. This is a waste of public time. It is also at times a matter of hardship. Not unfrequently,—I speak of Bombay and I suppose it is the same in the district,—you find a man in sole charge of an important business or in sole charge of a department of a large business called upon to come and serve on a jury for two or three days to the neglect of that business.

Now let us take it from the point of view of justice. You have five men, as I said before, wholly unversed in the art of weighing and appreciating evidence who are called upon to exercise that art, and I say it is an art, just as much an art indeed as that of conducting an agency of a cotton mill, building a railway bridge or cutting off a leg.

The anomaly is that you have an expert sitting there, actually taking part in the trial, yet precluded from taking any part in the decision on the evidence.

The Honourable Mr. PATEL, as I understand, sought to remedy the difficulty which he foresaw in this respect by suggesting that pleaders might be allowed to serve on a jury. I think I can claim to have more experience than anybody else in this assembly in the matter of juries. I have in the course of my experience come across many persons who wished to avoid serving on a jury. I have never yet met one who wished to serve on a jury. If the Honourable Mr. PATEL were to put to the pleaders that they should come forward and sit on juries, he would assuredly be met with a refusal. That is a privilege that they are entitled to claim and a privilege they are not going to give up. So that, the resolution comes to this, that you have to hand over to five persons unversed in a particular art the duty of exercising that art, and naturally enough, the results of so doing are frequently most unsatisfactory.

Let me give an instance which occurred in the last sessions in Bombay. A man and his wife were alone in a room. The neighbours heard the woman cry out. They tried to get into the room, but finding it bolted sent for the police. The room was then opened by the prisoner from inside and the wife was found on the ground with her head literally pounded to pieces. A short distance away from her body was a curry stone which was covered with blood. The prisoner had blood upon his hands and blood upon his clothes. Those were the admitted facts. The explanation of the prisoner was this. His wife refused to go with him to Poona; she then picked up the curry stone and rushed towards him. He rushed to meet her; she fell down and the curry stone fell upon her head. The medical evidence was to the effect that a great number of blows must have been inflicted in order to produce the injuries which had occurred and that the injuries could not have been caused in the manner alleged by the prisoner. We have nine jurors in Bombay. Five out of these gentlemen were of one opinion and the other four were of another opinion. I cannot tell you of which opinion the five were and of which opinion the other four were. But either the five or the four wanted to acquit that man. That occurred in Bombay, a civilised city, where you get men of exceptional qualifications on the jury. I say that is really a very good instance of the absurdity of the jury system. The truth of the matter is really this, that a jury is far more prejudiced than a judge. That prejudice will sometimes work against the accused and sometimes in his favour. It will work in favour of the accused in a case such as I have described where you get a certain number of men upon the jury whose scruples or ideas prevent them from sending a man to the gallows, although undoubtedly guilty of murder. It will work against an accused person where you have a crime committed which creates considerable popular indignation, such as a dacoity. The jurors are incensed and obsessed with the nature of the crime and they do not stop to consider whether or no the people who are charged before them are sufficiently identified with the crime or not. Numerous cases of that description have occurred.

Now, there is one member at the back of the hall making copious notes with a view I suppose to reply to what I have said. When he does so, I would ask him to address himself to a question I will in a moment propound. He is, I understand, a gentleman who at one time of his career was a renowned subordinate judge. The question I want to ask him is this, whether he considers that the numerous civil cases he was called upon to decide would have been more satisfactorily disposed of if all questions of fact had been decided by a jury and he alone had decided questions of law, and I hope he will see his way to answer to that question.

The first objection then is, as I said before, that you have five men who are not experts asked to do an act which involves great skill and training. The second objection, with which I have already dealt, is that you are taking away an exceedingly valuable right of appeal and substituting something quite illusory for it. Those are the disadvantages with regard to the proposal, and on the other hand the advantages of the present system are, first of all, that you have a trained man to try the case in all its aspects and in the second that you have an unrestricted right of appeal.

There is just one point I want to refer to and it is this. It was said that English judges do not understand the ways and the languages of the people with the result that injustice often occurs. After that remark had been made I took the opportunity of asking a judge on the High Court bench who had the longest experience of appellate criminal work in this court, what he thought about it. What he told me was this, that he could not recollect a single case in which it had ever been urged before him that injustice had been done because the judge did not understand the ways of the people, and it is absolutely certain that if any such contention had been raised it had not been given effect to. I asked him whether he could recollect any case in which it had been said that the judge had erred because he did not understand a vernacular expression. To that he replied that such contentions had been raised at times, but he could not recollect a single instance in which the contention had been given effect to. I think that is a pretty conclusive answer to the objections in that connection which have been raised.

Then, just a word as to the views of Sir Richard Garth. Those views were expressed with regard to Bengal. Your Excellency asked the Honourable Mr. PATEL when it was that Sir Richard Garth retired. He retired, I find, in 1886. With regard to Sir Charles Farran's remarks, as against those you must set off what I have said today as having come from the learned Judge of the High Court with whom I communicated during lunch time.

It seems to me really that it is mere sentiment that has brought in this resolution and the sentiment arose out of the catch phrase that a man must be tried by his peers. That is quite fallacious really, because after all, it is not the Brahmin that is going to be tried by the Brahmin or the untouchable by the untouchable, but that every one is to be tried by persons who are to be selected irrespective of caste or creed owing to certain educational or other qualifications, and the result is that the judge is as much the peer of the prisoner as any one of the jury.

The Honourable Mr. RAGHUNATH PURSHOTTAM PARANJPYE:—Your Excellency,—I had no intention of inerfering in the discussion on this subject, which is rather too technical for me, but I was rather surprised to hear the arguments of the Honourable the Advocate General. If I were to put it in one word, I think that by his arguments he has proved far too much. I think his speech is a complete assault against the jury system anywhere and everywhere, in England, France, Australia and everywhere. I wish he had started a crusade in England against the jury system; and I wonder what success he would get there if he were to preach the doctrine which he has preached this afternoon in this Council. One thing, however, I know; and that is that even in this country the European inhabitants of this country prize very highly their particular right of getting a jury of Europeans and we have heard very often of cases where there has been gross miscarriage of justice, but I have not heard the Advocate General trying to persuade his European fellow citizens that they ought to give up this right of trial by jury and consent to be tried by a single judge.

Well, I am afraid cases of wrong decision do occur and there must be other instances. We occasionally hear of trials in France where on the most clear evidence the juries have come to an apparently contumacious verdict simply because a judge is not allowed to go against the verdict of the jury, particularly in crimes of passion. I remember reading that death punishments used formerly to be given for simple cases of theft when the article stolen exceeds £2 in value. Once a man was charged with having stolen £5 and the case was absolutely clear, but the jury brought in a verdict, not that he stole £5, which would have immediately caused him to be sentenced to be hanged, but that the man stole 5 pieces of gold of value £1 19*s.* 6*d.* There are, therefore, occasionally cases where the juries do consciously come to a contumacious verdict on account of other circumstances. I do not say that all verdicts of the jury are right, but it is on the whole a good system. The jury principle is one which has been accepted on all hands as providing a proper safeguard. One very eminent Englishman has said that the one great object of education is to bring twelve men together in a jury box and let them come to a proper decision by applying common sense. Well, I think, if that is the objeet of education in England, I do not know why that ought not to be the object of education in this country. As I say, the Honourable the Advocate General has proved far too much and I do not know whether the Council will accept all the contentions advanced by him.

TRIAL BY JURY.

[Mr. Shridhar Balkrishna Upasani; Sir Mahadev Bhaskar Chaubal.] [7TH DECEMBER 1917.]

The Honourable Mr. SHRIDHAR BALKRISHNA UPASANI :—May it please Your Excellency,—In matters of law we all quite naturally look up to the Honourable the Advocate General for advice and guidance, and we had hoped that his advice in this respect would have been one which could have been respected by us with great confidence. But, unfortunately, his advice is directly in conflict with the advice and experience which in England has led to the upholding of this institution of jury system. The arguments which the Honourable the Advocate Genetal has urged are unfortunately those general arguments which might come from a layman, but which are, I think, not expected from an authority on law. One of the reasons that he gave is that a judge is a man versed in law. Are the judges in England not as versed in law as our judges are? I daresay they are as much versed in law as our judges, and very probably much more versed, and yet they have juries to help them, why not then let our judges also have juries? Our judges here labour under one very great disadvantage, namely, that they have to hear cases in a language which is not their mother tongue. They have to deal justice to people whose feelings and ideas are different from theirs, and it is not easy for them to understand the feelings and motives of men who belong to a foreign country. If there is necessity for the jury system it is more here than in England, and I should have been glad if due note was taken of that objection. Then, there is another circumstance of which we have to take note, and it is the language difficulty. The Honourable Mr. LAWRENCE has referred to it, and I put it to the Council whether it is possible for a judge to do complete justice if he finds it difficult to understand the native tongue and to read the vernacular script, especially in cases of perjury and forgery. Can he do it without the assistance of men who are Indians? In matters of personal liberty, life and death I think it is much better for the judge to have all possible assistance that he may need, and usefully get from the jury which is more conversant with the language and script of the country than himself. After all, the jury has to follow the lead of the judge, as my Honourable friend the Advocate General should have seen. The jury is meant for the judges help. There is, also a safeguard against failure of justice in the right of appeal. The judge can himself refer the matter to the High Court if he disagreed with the jury and, as a matter of fact, the proportion of cases in which the judge agrees with the jury is far too great to justify any fears as those entertained by the Honourable the Advocate General. If the system in our country had proved a failure, I daresay it could not have been allowed to continue for the past 30 or 40 years as it has been. If it were a failure, the High Court would have taken notice of it or Government itself would have taken needful action in the matter. The very fact that it has been allowed to continue so long goes to show that it has not proved a failure and it is a justification for its retention and its further extension. The circumstances prevailing in these 30 or 40 years are not in any way different from the circumstances which are prevailing now, and if 30 years back Government thought there was no objection to extend the system, I daresay the time has come when in the light of actual experience we are now bound to extend it to all the other districts in the class of cases for which it has proved a success. And not only that, but in the more important class of cases of political offences it is absolutely necessary that people should be tried by men who understand the language, and know the feelings and sentiments of the people and can duly appreciate the situation and matters that come before the court with regard to the alleged offence.

The Honourable Sir MAHADEV CHAUBAL :—Does the honourable member say that the political trials are at present triable by a jury in the mofussil courts?

The Honourable Mr. UPASANI :—I mean that all those cases recommended by my honourable friend, and all serious cases, ought properly to come before the jury rather than before a single judge. You seem to have a travesty of justice in some of these political trials. Here you have a judge who does not know the language of the country or, if he knows it, he knows it indifferently. He has to deliver judgments upon subject matters and evidence recorded not in his own language but in the vernacular of the country; it has to be translated for his perusal; and upon that translation the judgment is to be given. Let the Council take the case of a similar trial in England. Supposing a judge who did not know English were to sit in trial of an English offender and the jury were men who did not know the English language, would a verdict of such a jury and a conviction based on such verdict be accepted in England. Would it be tolerated in England? And when we ask for the simple primary right which has been enjoyed for centuries in England, I do not know why there should be any opposition to the concession of that right? If it were a mere matter of sentiment I do not know why any suggestion has not been made that this right should be given up by those by whom it is enjoyed in England. If the jury system is necessary and desirable in their case, I do not know why our people should labour under the present disadvantages and should not have the right of trial by jury.

As regards civil cases, in England the jury system has been extended to civil cases also. But we have not yet come to that millenium here. This resolution confines itself only to more important criminal cases. That being the case I do not think the question of civil cases arises at all. If it did arise it could be looked at in the light of the experience in England. We have not that experience here. Our experience here is confined to criminal cases only. It is for us to follow that and I daresay, that Government will in the light of that experience be pleased to acept my honourable friend's resolution.

The Honourable Sir MAHADEV BHASKAR CHAUBAL :—Your Excellency,—I did not expect that I would have to address again this Council on a question which was threshed out here less than two years ago when the question about Belgaum juries was raised by my Honourable friend Mr. BELVI. I had hoped to save all this flood of oratory which we have been listening to for the last two hours by approaching the honourable member before he moved this resolution and asking him, whether he would rest content with an assurance from me that Government would call for reports from local officers and get at the necessary facts and figures with a view to see if there were any districts to which the system of trial by jury could with advantage be extended. I explained to him that this was necessary inasmuch as since 1893 at any rate this question had not been inquired into by Government and that this information was necessary in view of section 269 of the Criminal Procedure Code under which for any change in the law with regard to juries we must have the previous sanction of the Government of India and that it was not possible for this Government to approach the Government of India with any recommendation on the question unless we had facts and figures and opinions of responsible officers in the districts. I asked him if in view of this he will withdraw this resolution if I gave him an assurance to that effect on behalf of Government To my surprise he categorically replied "No." I tried to take him into confidence by asking him Dear Mr. PATEL, what is the great urgency about this question that you cannot wait till the necessary inquiries are made. The only answer I could get was; "Oh, self-government, self-government". Well to-day in his address he has not based his case so much on self-government. At least partly he brought in the administration of justice also and I do not think he could have brought forward a more rotten argument than the one which he has been advancing in his remarks based on the administration of justice.

The Honourabe Mr. PATEL :—I rise to a point of order your Excellency, whether "rotten" argument is a parliamentary expression?

His Excellency the PRESIDENT :—I think it is a very undesirable expression.

TRIAL BY JURY.

[Sir Mahadev Bhaskar Chaubal; Mr. Vithalbhai Jhaverbhai Patel.] [7TH DECEMBER 1917.]

The Honourable Sir MAHADEV CHAUBAL:—I plead guilty to the charge of using an expression which I think I should not have used.

But I think all the honourable members will agree with me that if there is one thing in the minds of the public for which British administration has been uniformly and universally given credit it is the sound administration of justice. But when my Honourable friend Mr. PATEL and my Honourable friend Mr. UPASANI get up and say that the administration of justice requires that there should be an extension of the jury system I do not think that they have got any following behind their back so far as the public and the people of this country are concerned. Now that is the point which I wish the Honourable members of this Council to consider.

In the speech which the honourable mover has made he referred to Bengal and Madras and different other provinces: but I waited in vain to listen to any evidence in the speech that his own electorate had ever complained that they were suffering from injustice and that the administration of criminal justice was defective because foresooth the system of trial by jury had not been introduced into some of the Districts of the Northern Division.

The Honourable Mr. PATEL:—Several people in the Kaira district tell me Sir MAHADEV CHAUBAL that there is an urgent need there for this system.

The Honourable Sir MAHADEV CHAUBAL:—I am afraid I cannot take an assurance of that kind. People in these days make petitions to Government about their grievances: public bodies and associations ventilate their grievances: but I do not think that the Government or the High Court have ever had a representation made to them about the extension of the system of jury to any particular district on the ground that the want of it causes failures of notice. Therefore I do say that until I am assured that the people of the Northern Division seriously desire that in order to improve the administration of criminal justice the jury system is wanted, I cannot take an assurance of an individual honourable member about several people in a single district like Kaira having spoken to him. After all these people must be persons who have not seen the jury-system work in their District. He ought to know that there are other people who can speak from their positive experience of the working of the system: and in any event because a few people have spoken to the honourable member in the way he says they have, it is too big a jump to ask for the extension of the system whole sale to all the Districts in the Presidency.

I find that several honourable members have spoken in favour of this resolution but I may be pardoned for mentioning that except my honourable friend Mr. GOKULDAS PAREKH I do not know from what actual experience the previous speakers addressed the house on this question. None of them belong to districts which enjoy or suffer from this system of trial by jury. Is there any evidence I ask, has any of the speakers brought any evidence before this Council, that it is the desire of the people to see this system introduced into districts where it does not obtain, that the public demand in any part of the Presidency is for improving the administration of criminal justice by the extension of this system to districts in which it does not obtain. Well in the absence of such evidence I do not think that Government can possibly move the Government of India. When such evidence is forthcoming, when the people of a particular province or a division have expressed a desire for this extension, Government will consider whether the circumstances are such that the system needs to be extended to any particular district.

I won't take up the time of this Council by referring to points to which the Honourable the Advocate General has already referred. But the Honourable Mr. UPASANI, I think, most eloquently confessed to the strength of the Advocate General's argument and the weakness of his own, when he failed to answer the direct challenge which was made to him by the Advocate General. The Advocate General asked my honourable friend to state honestly to this Council if while he rendered valuable service to the state as a First Class Subordinate Judge in this Presidency he as the presiding judge in civil cases before him would have preferred to have a question of fact determined finally and conclusively by any five persons belonging to the class or classes from which jurors are selected and that would he be prepared to admit that his own decision on that question of fact was wrong if it did not agree with theirs. That was the challenge thrown out to him and his only answer was that we were at present concerned with the administration of criminal justice and not civil. He said let us not confuse matters and make them more complicated by introducing cases of civil justice. I think if that is his only answer he entirely gives up his case, because for the trial of questions of fact in administering civil justice you are not going to get a different type of jury from the one you can empanel for a criminal case. The rules for the appreciation of evidence in the two sets of cases are not going to be different. Take the point of local self-government in the interests of which the Honourable Mr. PATEL is so keen. Is local self-government or education in such government suffering on account of the want of extension of this system or can he say that the people of a district which enjoys this privilege show more capacity for self-government than those of a district which has not that right? As a matter of fact in almost all districts the judge has the assistance of two assessors. These gentlemen are drawn generally from the same class from which juries are selected except that they may not know English. What the Honourable member wants is that instead of two assessors there should be five jurors, but I have not heard any argument to show that the three additional gentlemen who will add to the present number of assessors are likely to be of a different class or men of different attainments from the present assessors. If, therefore, the mere existence of a system of jury is supposed to be any education in matters of self-government the only argument that can be advanced would be that three more men would be getting their lesson in the education for self-government each time, instead of two as at present. If it was only that I do not think Government would have minded the extension asked for. What makes such extension a matter for serious consideration and inquiry is the fact that the opinion of these five gentlemen on a question of fact becomes binding on the judge. That is the point which has got to be most carefully considered both from the point of view of the public and from the point of view of Government. If it is the desire of any members that there may be facilities for criminals to escape or the innocent to suffer I certainly don't sympathise with it. It ought to be the desire of every law-abiding citizen that a criminal should be, so far as possible, brought to book and that an innocent person should not suffer. That desire is not likely to be satisfied by the extension of a system which makes the opinion of a trained lawyer accustomed for years to sift evidence subordinate to that of five men of ordinary intelligence, with meagre educational qualifications, and whose honesty and integrity may vary considerably. I think nobody will maintain that a system which does that can be calculated to improve the administration of justice.

Then the Honourable Mr. UPASANI based some argument on the judge's ignorance of the vernaculars. I do not think that this resolution as it is moved makes any exception in the case of Indian members of the Civil Service or in the case of those gentlemen who having served for years together and proved their merits in the Provincial Service are given posts of District Judges and the argument at least as regards these two is on the face of it absurd. If it is put forward as against European judges only, I have no hesitation in affirming from my limited experience of 27 years what the Honourable Mr. GOKALDAS PAREKH has asserted with his experience at the Bar of over 40 years that any aspersions made against the administration of justice on the ground that the trying judge in a sessions court is a European have no substance in them at all. And I believe that is the experience of all persons, who have been connected with the administration of justice for any length of time. With such experience as I have and with my knowledge of the experience of my friends at the Bar I do not think I ought to allow that remark about European judges to pass unchallenged.

Then the Honourable Mr. PATEL'S resolution as it is moved assumes that all the districts in the Presidency proper stand exactly upon the same level. Well, I am not aware of the experience which the honourable member has of all the districts in the Presidency proper (apparently the only evidence on which he relies is his conversation with several people in the Kaira district) but whatever his opportunities for knowing all the districts may be I do think that the powers of observation of any one who ventures to assert that all the districts in the Presidency proper stand on the same level of intelligence and advancement must be of the most limited character. The honourable member does not wish Government even to undertake an enquiry about the prospect of getting a sufficient number of English knowing people in each district to serve on the jury. He wants that Government should, straight off simply on the assurance given by him to this Council, approach the Government of India and say to them that the time has come for the extension of this system to all the districts. Well, I think I can safely trust to the sense of the honourable members of this Council to see that the utmost that Government could do would be to promise an enquiry before they venture to go to the Government of India as the section of the Criminal Procedure Code absolutely requires them to do. Beyond that I do not think Government can at all move but so far as any evidence is disclosed in the speeches which have been made by the honourable mover and by those who spoke in support of it I fail to see that Government have any grounds to start even any enquiry at all. With these remarks I propose that this resolution should not be accepted by the Council.

The Honourable Mr. VITHALBHAI JHAVERBHAI PATEL:—May it please your Excellency,—I very much regret the tone of the Honourable Sir MAHADEV CHAUBAL'S speech in connection with this resolution, but I am not a bit surprised at it, for I was present last December when he rose to reply in reference to a similar resolution of my honourable friend Mr. BELVI. However, I feel very much grieved to hear the Honourable Sir MAHADEV CHAUBAL say something about the interview that I had with him in connection with this resolution. I have no doubt that my honourable friend was very much put out by the replies that I gave to him during that interviw. I also know it is only rarely that he condescends to talk to a non-official member. What happened, your Excellency, was this. My honourable friend wrote to me asking me to see him. That was in October last. There was a postal strike and I did not get the letter in time. On the day of the Council meeting I entered the Council Hall at Poona. My honourable friend met me and asked me whether I had received his letter. I said, "No, I have not received it." He asked me whether I would withdraw my Jury resolution if an assurance were given by him that Government would make inquiry in the matter. I told him that I regard the question of the jury system as self-government in the administration of justice. My honourable friend catches hold of the word "self-government" and gives an impression to this Council that it is because higher problems of self-government are in the air that I was referring to them in my conversation with him. It was nothing of the kind. I repeat I regard the system of jury as self-government in the administration of justice and am not at all sorry to have made that statement. I further told him that the system is in force for 56 years and I could not believe that Government had made no inquiry so far in the matter.

The Honourable Sir MAHADEV CHAUBAL:—The honourable member will give me credit for saying that I did not hear anything beyond the word self-government.

The Honourable Mr. PATEL:—My honourable friend can say very well what he heard and what he did not hear. However, I do not want to go into it at all. The resolution is there and I have moved it.

TRIAL BY JURY.

[7TH DECEMBER 1917.] [Mr. Vithalbhai Jhaverbhai Patel; Sir Mahadev Bhaskar Chaubal.]

I must say that I have not heard any arguments from my honourable friend Sir MAHADEV CHAUBAL, except those old arguments regarding the paucity of jurors and the eminence and capacity of the European judges. Of course, I quite understand he lays stress on the argument of my honourable friend Mr. PAREKH who says that he has never heard of any injustice being done by a European judge sitting with assessors. I do not know what he exactly said. If I understood the Honourable Mr. PAREKH right, he gave this Council the impression that he was in favour of the extension of the jury system.

However that may be, my honourable friend Sir MAHADEV CHAUBAL is entitled to rely upon the experience of my honourable friend Mr. PAREKH. But this Council will note that my friend the Honourable Mr. PAREKH and the Honourable the Advocate General both have practised mostly in Bombay. We have here three or four gentlemen, the Honourable SHEIKH GHULAM HUSSEIN, assistant public prosecutor of Hyderabad (Sind), the Honourable Mr. GARUD and the Honourable Mr. DESAI, that have practised and are practising in the mofussil and have strongly supported my case for the extension of the jury system.

The Honourable Sir MAHADEV CHAUBAL :—But the jury system does not obtain in all their districts.

The Honourable Mr. PATEL :—They are tired of the system of assessors and therefore they want the jury system. If the experience of these three gentlemen of different districts is of any use to the Council, I trust this Council will support my resolution.

The Honourable Sir MAHADEV CHAUBAL said that he was willing to make enquiries. But I strongly urge that this is not a case for enquiry at all. We have had this experiment of trial by jury for the last 56 years. Enquiries were from time to time made, and surely Government must be in a position to now say definitely whether they regard the trial by jury a success or a failure in this Presidency. If you are satisfied that the system is a failure why don't you say so? But if you say that the system has worked successfully where is the necessity for an enquiry?

My honourable friend Mr. LAWRENCE based his arguments on the supposition that trial in the sessions court was conducted in English. He was at once corrected by the Honourable Mr. GARUD that trial in a sessions court takes place in the vernacular of the district. It is a matter of great regret that so experienced and able an officer as the Honourable Mr. LAWRENCE should not have known so long—I believe he has been in service for 25 years—that in the districts under his charge sessions trials are conducted in vernacular and not in English. When he finds that he is wrong he puts forward another lame argument. He says that because a judge gives the charge to the jurors in English, therefore the jurors must be English-knowing people. Your Excellency, the jurors are concerned mostly not with the charge that is delivered by the judge, but they are mostly concerned with the evidence that is given before them by the witnesses. They follow the evidence given in the language they understand. They know the manners and customs of the people, their ideas and habits, and it is they who are the judges of the facts. The judge says, "Here is the evidence, what do you say?" That is the charge which is delivered to the juries. That being so, where is the necessity that the jurors should be English-knowing people.

The Honourable Sir MAHADEV CHAUBAL :—I ask the honourable member what suggestion he has for repealing the provision in the Criminal Procedure Code. How does he suggest by this resolution to get that repeal?

The Honourable Mr. PATEL :—Your Excellency, I merely answer the argument of the Honourable Mr. LAWRENCE. He says that English-knowing jurors will not be available, but my point of view is that English-knowing jurors are available in every district. But taking a hypothetical case, as he says where English-knowing jurors would not be available, I say that English-knowing jurors are not necessary. The witnesses give their evidence in the vernacular and if the jurors know the language that is quite sufficient.

My honourable friend the Advocate General cited a case from Bombay and observed that the whole jury system was absurd. Very well; I ask, has any attempt been made so far to move Government to cancel the notification applying the jury system to the city of Bombay? Why does not he do so? Dare he do it? Certainly not. And, as I said, his experience is mostly confined to the city of Bombay, and one case, after all, does not prove the absurdity of the jury system. If the jury system is really a failure, I ask why is it extended for the whole of India for trial of Europeans? Is there any reason? Of course, I do not wish to take up the time of the Council, but I must say once more that this is not a case for enquiry. Government must declare once and for all, whether the system tried for six and fifty years has failed or has been successful. If Government is not prepard to make the declaration now, I trust this Council will accept my resolution.

His Excellency the PRESIDENT:—After the lengthy discussion that we have had this afternoon, I am sure honourable members won't expect me to speak on the merits of this particular matter. My duty is merely to put before the Council, in order that they may come to a conclusion, what is the exact position of Government with regard to it. Now I hope he will excuse me for saying so, but it seems to me that my honourable friend Mr. PATEL roused himself to a considerable pitch of feeling with regard to a certain private conversation he had had with my honourable colleague. But he cannot get away from the facts. The position of Government is simply this. We say, and I think we perfectly rightly say, that since 1893, when there was the last report on the jury system, there has been no inquiry with regard to this question. We further say that we are ready to have an inquiry and to make up our minds whether it is a fit and proper time to develop the jury system. But my honourable friend Mr. PATEL with his usual excess of zeal, wishes at once to rush matters, to introduce the jury system throughout the whole of the Presidency. Well, I leave it to the Council to make up their minds which is the right and proper way; but I am bound to say that the Council would be well advised to come to the conclusion that no Government in its senses could possibly accept a resolution of this sort without the very fullest inquiry as to the merits and demerits of the course proposed.

Now, as I say, I do not want to go into the merits of the question. But there were two significant features with regard to this debate, which I think must have struck honourable members. One of them has already been referred to by my honourable colleague, namely, the fact that a very direct challenge was given to a certain honourable member of this house by my honourable friend the Advocate General, to state perfectly clearly as a result of his personal experience whether he would have adjudicated better by himself or with the assistance of five laymen as jurors. For some reason best known to himself, he has declined to answer that challenge. The other significant fact to my mind was the speech of my honourable friend Mr. PAREKH. Now I consider that the Honourable Mr. GOKULDAS PAREKH made an extraordinarily interesting speech. He evidently was extremely anxious not to desert his friend the Honourable Mr. PATEL, and like Agag trod very delicately round this thorny question. I am bound to say that he left me and I expect most honourable members in considerable doubt on which side of the fence he finally selected to come down.

All I can say to honourable members is this, that we, the Government, are perfectly prepared and my honourable colleague thinks it is full time, to make further inquiry into the whole of this matter. But we cannot allow ourselves to be carried away by the impatient suggestions of the honourable member; we must decline to accept his resolution in any form.

The resolution was then put to the vote and lost, 11 members voting for it and 23 against it.

The resolution was by leave postponed.

SIR MAHOMED YUSUF'S DONATION: TRIAL BY JURY.

[The President; Mr. Ebrahim Haroon Jaffer; Mr. Vithalbhai Jhaverbhai Patel.] [7TH DECEMBER 1917.]

His Excellency the PRESIDENT:—Resolution No. 44. The Honourable Mr. EBRAHIM HAROON JAFFER.

"This Council recommends to His Excellency the Governor in Council that arrangements be made to utilise the interest which has already accrued and which will accrue in the next five years on Sir Mahomed Yusuf's donation of 8 lakhs for giving scholarships to Mahomedan students in Colleges."

The Honourable Mr. EBRAHIM HAROON JAFFER:—Your Excellency,—I would like to move an amendment to this resolution of mine as I think I shall then have better support. The amendment is as follows:—

"This Council recommends to His Excellency the Governor in Council that arrangements be made to utilise the interest, which has already accrued and which will accrue, till the donation of 8 lakhs of Sir Mahomed Yusuf is finally disposed of, for giving scholarships to Mahomedan students in Colleges."

His Excellency the PRESIDENT:—I do not know whether it will shorten discussion of this resolution if I were to inform the honourable member that we are in correspondence with the donor with regard to the disposal of these eight lakhs of rupees and it will be quite impossible for Government to give any definite reply for the very good reason that we have not received any answer to that correspondence. Until we get an answer from the donor it will be impossible for Government to make any definite statement with regard to the donation at all.

The Honourable Mr. EBRAHIM H. JAFFER:—I find that for the past two years nothing has been done to ascertain the wishes of the donor. There were two resolutions on this matter before the Council in March 1916 and I am sorry to find that no final decision has been arrived at as yet, although an assurance was then given that some action would soon be taken.

His Excellency the PRESIDENT:—Is the honourable member suggesting that we are not trying to deal with the matter speedily? We have written to Sir Mahomed Yusuf, we have asked him to give us his views as to the way in which this money should be spent and until we receive an expression of his views, obviously it is impossible for Government to move in the matter.

The Honourable Mr. EBRAHIM HAROON JAFFER:—In that case your Excellency will kindly allow me to postpone the consideration of this resolution till the next meeting.

The resolution was by leave postponed.

His Excellency the PRESIDENT:—Resolution No. 18. The Honourable Mr. PATEL.

The Honourable Mr. VITHALBHAI JHAVERBHAI PATEL:—Your Excellency,—The resolution that I move reads thus:—

"This Council recommends that His Excellency the Governor in Council may, with the previous sanction of the Governor General in Council, be pleased to direct that in the districts of Thana, Surat and Poona and in the City of Karachi, the trial before any court of session of all offences shall be by jury."

With regard to this resolution I should like to say that the trial of all offences of death, transportation for life and imprisonment for 10 years in all these districts are for the last 30 years tried with the aid of assessors. If the system had been reported to be a failure Government would have cancelled the notification by which the system was introduced. But the very fact that the system is in existence for the last 30 years and the fact that we have not heard anything

TRIAL BY JURY: URDU STUDENTS IN URDU SCHOOLS.

[7TH DECEMBER 1917.] [Mr. Vithalbhai Jhaverbhai Patel; Sir Mahadev Bhaskar Chaubal; the President; Mr. Abdul Kadir Pathan; Mr. Ebrahim Haroon Jaffer.]

against it goes to show that the system is a success. That being so, I ask this Council to go a step further and say that all other offences in these three districts should also be tried by jury. I hope Government will accept this modest resolution and not put it off on the ground that they are prepared to make inquiry.

With these few words I move the resolution.

The Honourable Sir MAHADEV BHASKAR CHAUBAL:—Your Excellency,—I do not think I need take up the time of this Council on this resolution, because everything that can be said on it, all the arguments for and against, that could be urged, have been urged on resolution No. 17, and I will only say that for the reasons for which I proposed to this Council that resolution No. 17 should not be accepted, I say that for the same reasons this resolution No. 18 should be rejected inasmuch as the honourable mover is against having any inquiry whatsoever and wants Government to take his ipse dixit for the alleged necessity of the extension of the system of trial by jury.

The Honourable Mr. VITHALBHAI JAVERBHAI PATEL:—Your Excellency,—I have not heard a word from my honourable friend Sir MAHADEV CHAUBAL that Government are in any way dissatisfied with the working of the jury system in these districts. I have already said the system has been in existence for the last 30 years. I do not at all agree with the Honourable Sir MAHADEV CHAUBAL that there is a case for enquiry nor has he addressed any reasons why inquiry is called for. For these reasons, I trust the Council will accept my resolution.

The resolution was then put to the vote and lost.

His Excellency the PRESIDENT:—Resolution No. 42. The Honourable Mr. PATHAN.

The Honourable Mr. ABDUL KADIR alias FAKIR MAHOMED walad IBRAHIM KHAN PATHAN:—Your Excellency,—The resolution of which I have given notice reads as follows:—

"This Council recommends to His Excellency the Governor in Council, in connection with the Press Note issued on the 14th of August last upon Mahomedan education, the desirability of continuing the Urdu standards at present in use in Urdu Primary Schools in accordance with the wishes of the Mahomedan Community, and as recommended by the Committee appointed by Government, and of making necessary modifications in the Government Resolution (No. 1143, dated 30th April 1917) to suit this recommendation"

As I understand that Government is calling a conference to consider the question of the medium of Urdu, I beg permission to postpone my resolution.

The resolution was by leave postponed.

His Excellency the PRESIDENT:—Resolution No. 45. The Honourable Mr. JAFFER.

The Honourable Mr. EBRAHIM HAROON JAFFER:—Your Excellency,—The resolution of which I have given notice reads as follows:—

"This Council recommends to His Excellency the Governor in Council that section 11 of the Bombay District Municipal Act be applied to the Poona City Municipality as has been done in the case of Karachi, with a view to constituting a separate Mahomedan electorate."

Having regard to what has fallen from your Excellency yesterday with reference to resolution No. 2 and as the Secretary of State for India is here considering reforms, I think it would be better for me to postpone this resolution

The resolution was by leave postponed.

His Excellency the PRESIDENT:—The Council will now adjourn.

The Council then adjourned sine die.

By order of His Excellency the Right Honourable the Governor,

R. B. MILNE,
Secretary to the Legislative Council of the Governor of Bombay.
